B. The Faith of Israel and the Faith of the Church.—Implicit in all that has been written above is the assumption that the faith of Israel is an integral and vital part of the faith of the church. For the Christian the Old Testament is at once independent of the New and yet without significance apart from the New. It is independent in the sense that we must study it on its own merits as the historical witness to the faith by which a people once lived. Yet its manifest incompleteness, its unreconciled hopes, and its nationalistic framework make it impossible for any subsequent people to live within it alone. Judaism and Christianity are two very different religions precisely because they have seen the Old Testament fulfilled in different ways. Judaism took the specific formulations of the law seriously as the guide to proper life in the interval before the dawn of the new age. The Talmud actually fulfills the law in the sense that the latter is made applicable to the changing situations of Jewish life. The New Testament, on the other hand, emphasizes instead the historical work of God which is climaxed in Jesus Christ. In his person are fulfilled the purposes and promises of God in the Israelite offices of prophet, priest, and king. With him God ushers in the new age which was the goal of Old Testament history and its hope. God's purpose and promise in the election and covenant of Israel are fulfilled in Christ's kingship over the elect and the world. Nationality is broadened in scope so that the elect are the new Israel who are not necessarily the sons of Abraham after the flesh but by adoption according to faith.

Thus both Judaism and Christianity possess the Old Testament and both believe it to be a unique, once for all, revelation of God. But Judaism in thinking of the Old Testament thinks first of the Pentateuch as the law of God and of the Talmud as its exposition. The primary attention of the Jew is thus given to the law and especially to the Talmud. Christianity, on the contrary, refuses to see the law as the center of the Old Testament. The redemptive activity of God is the primary content of the Pentateuch, not the law, and that activity continues through the remaining historical books. Consequently, the Pentateuch cannot be separated as a legal literature from the prophetic histories which follow, for all bear witness to the work of God which leads directly to Jesus Christ. In Christ the essentials of the law are retained, though in a nonjuridical setting, while the specific cultic and national laws which served their divinely given purpose at a given time are set aside and seen to be meaningful only as illustrations of the manner in which the will of God was made applicable then and of the way in which we also must make the same will applicable to our own situation. God's salvation is thus to be conceived not in a forensic or juridical manner, but in the terms of the new covenant of grace in Christ.

The church affirms, therefore, that Christ is the key to the central meaning of the Old Testament; but at the same time it must be emphasized that the Old Testament is the clue to Christ. The church has received an enlightenment from the faith of Israel which has enabled it to see that entrance into the kingdom of Christ cannot be found among the religions of this world, but solely in the faith of Abraham's seed of which we are heirs in the church by Christ Jesus. It is the Old Testament which has always been one of the chief bulwarks of the church against paganism because in Israel the revolutionary faith was first established over against paganism and the theological basis on which we stand was achieved. When the New Testament is separated from the Old, it is a superstructure hanging in midair, a small torso of a literature filled with presuppositions which can be misunderstood and perverted. Without the Old Testament there could be little conception of God's purposive work in and through history, which reaches its climax in Christ. When separated from that perspective, Christ can be conceived only as another in the series of mankind's prophets and martyrs, or else as a new God, or on a par with the old, displacing the old. The whole Bible is needed for a trinitarian theology. By itself the New Testament contains insufficient material for a doctrine of creation, of justice and the responsible society and of man in relation to his world and people. The New Testament presupposes Old Testament faith, while correcting, deepening, and fulfilling it, so that in Christ that faith becomes a new creation for a new Israel which is the body of Christ. In other words, the fathers of the church in the second and third centuries A.D. had the very best of reasons for rejecting Marcionism, the view that the God of the Old Testament was a different God from that of the New. Neither Testament possesses its full significance in the church apart from the other. Both together constitute the Christian Bible; separate one from the other and the theology of the church will be torn asunder.

The term "Apocrypha," a Greek word meaning "hidden, spurious (books)," denotes non-canonical books. Apocrypha (of the Old Testament) in its Roman Catholic meaning—attested in the writings of Origen and Augustine—refers to the books which are here called the "Pseudepigrapha." In its Protestant meaning adopted here, "Apocrypha" is the collection of the Jewish writings included in the Septuagint and in the Vulgate, but not in the Hebrew Old Testament. Catholics call these Apocrypha "deuterocanonical books"; Jerome called them "ecclesiastical books," using "apocrypha" in the sense of all noncanonical books. The contents of the Septuagint and the Vulgate Old Testaments differ slightly. Some Septuagint manuscripts include III-IV Maccabees and Ps. 151, never found in the Vulgate. The standard editions of the Vulgate print in an appendix at the end of the New Testament the following books: The Prayer of Manasses (in some manuscripts of the Septuagint and in some printed editions of the Septuagint it is placed among the Odes or Cantica which follow the Psalms), III Esdras (I Esdras in the Greek and English Bibles), and IV Esdras (lost in the Greek version, except for a few citations in Barn. 12 and Clement of Alexandria Stromata III. 16. 100; it is called II Esdras or Esdras Apocalypse in English).

According to common usage, the following books are here included among the Apocrypha:

I Esdras, II Esdras, Tobit, Judith, the Rest of the Book of Esther, the Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch (ch. 6 of which is the Epistle of Jeremy), additions to Daniel (the Song of the Three Holy Children, the History of Susanna, the History of the Destruction of Bel and the Dragon), the Prayer of Manasses, I-II Maccabees.

In the Greek and Latin Bibles, however, the Apocrypha are scattered throughout the Old Testament, and nothing indicates that they are of debatable canonicity. In the following list of the contents of the Septuagint Old Testament (according to the order of Codex B, Vaticanus) the Apocrypha are italicized: The Pentateuch; Joshua, Judges, Ruth, I-IV Kings (i.e., I-II Samuel, I-II Kings), I-II Chronicles, I Esdras, II Esdras (i.e., Ezra-Nehemiah); Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Job, Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Esther (with the Rest of the Book of Esther), Judith, Tobit, the Book of the Twelve (Minor Prophets), Isaiah, Jeremiah, Baruch, Lamentations, Epistle of Jeremy, Ezekiel, Daniel (with the Song of the Three Holy Children, the History of Susanna, and Bel and the Dragon); (I-II Maccabees are not in the Codex Vaticanus). In the Vulgate, Tobit and Judith follow II Esdras and in turn are followed by Esther, Job, Psalms, etc.; the Book of the Twelve follows Daniel and precedes I-II Maccabees.

I. The Apocrypha in Judaism

All the books of the Apocrypha were written by Jewish authors whose names, with the sole exception of Jesus the son of Sirach (Ecclus. 50:27), are unknown (II Maccabees is the summary of a five volume history of Jason of Cyrene). Biblical authors likewise wrote their books anonymously or using as a nom de plume the name of an ancient renowned leader, such as Moses, David, or Solomon: only the prophetic books (Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, etc.) bear the name of their real authors because the prophets, being primarily preachers, could not conceal their identity. Sirach likewise was convinced that he was writing prophecy (Ecclus. 24:33), and his book contains to a great extent the rewriting of material delivered orally in the form of classroom lectures. Pride of authorship was unknown among the Israelites, and interest in the name of the writers of biblical books arose only in connection with their divine inspiration.

The books of the Apocrypha (except I-II Esdras) were written presumably during the last two centuries B.C., and certainly before the Council at Jamnia (ca. A.D. 90), where the Jewish scriptural canon was fixed for all time; later rabbinical discussions on the canonicity of certain books were purely academic. Before that time the Hebrew Bible had consisted of "the Law and the Prophets" (II Macc. 15:9; Matt. 5:17; etc.). The third division, the Writings or Hagiographa, was in a fluid state between 200 B.C. and A.D. 90, although we may surmise that at least Psalms, Proverbs, and Job had attained a more or less official canonical status by 100 B.C. During this period there must have been great differences of opinion in regard to what books were to be accepted as canonical. We may well imagine that some Jews preferred Judith to Esther, Wisdom to Ecclesiastes, I Maccabees to Chronicles, Ecclesiasticus to Proverbs—and vice versa. What were the criteria by which the rabbis at Jamnia distinguished inspired from human books? In view of the prevailing confusion and of the circulation of Christian books, drastic steps had to be taken—and they could be taken only on the basis of arbitrary standards and a priori principles. It so happens that two sources contemporary with the council at Jamnia ca. A.D. 90 (Josephus Against Apion I. 8; II [IV] Esdras 14:45-46), besides later rabbinical ones (Seder 'Olam Rabba 30; Baba Bathra 14b-15a; Tosefta Yadaim 3:5), have recorded for us the basic principle of selection.

At least as early as ca. 250 B.C., as we see from the writings of the Chronicler, the shadowy figure of Ezra—whose historical role seems to have been insignificant compared with that of Nehemiah—was growing in importance until he became almost a second Moses. The Chronicler had merely claimed that Ezra was the founder of the guild of the scribes and came from Babylonia with God's law in his hand (Ezra 7:11-12, 25); but according to II (IV) Esdras, Ezra had, through divine inspiration, dictated to five scribes the twenty-four books of the Hebrew Bible, besides seventy esoteric (apocalyptic) works, in forty days. Josephus likewise, and manifestly the rabbis at Jamnia, were convinced that the Old Testament canon was complete and closed forever in the time of Ezra because the Lord ceased at that time to reveal himself to prophets: after Artaxerxes I (465-424), during whose reign Ezra was active, "the exact succession of prophets no longer existed" (Josephus Against Apion I. 8). Consequently no book written after the time of Ezra could be regarded as inspired and canonical scripture. Incidentally, this is why no Jewish apocalypse was attributed to an author later than Ezra. On the basis of this principle some of the Apocrypha were automatically excluded from the canon: I-II Maccabees, because they dealt with a later period of Jewish history; Ecclesiasticus, because Jesus ben Sirach committed the error of naming himself as the author, and was known to have lived long after Ezra.

The other books, which were not manifestly too recent for canonization, were excluded for other reasons. Some of the Apocrypha were ipso facto excluded because they had been written in Greek: Wisdom of Solomon, II Macc. 2:19-15:39, III-IV Maccabees. The following books were written in Hebrew: Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, I Maccabees, Judith, Prayer of Manasses, additions to Daniel. The others were written in Aramaic: II Macc. 1:1-2:18, I Esdras 3:1-4:47 (the rest was for the most part written in Hebrew), Tobit, Epistle of Jeremy.

Thus we have some books (Judith, Tobit, Baruch, Epistle of Jeremy) which had every qualification for inclusion into the canon: the ostensible early date, Hebrew or Aramaic language, sound orthodox teaching, and the literary quality of these books—all of these are on a par with (if not superior to) the latest parts of the canonical Old Testament. Why were they excluded? Habent sua fata libelli. In every case the primary condition for canonization at Jamnia was survival, which depended on popularity. Popular taste is unpredictable, irrational, and often at variance with expert opinion. The success of certain books, plays, and paintings, or the failure of better ones, has baffled the best of the critics. All that we can say is that, with the exception of Ecclesiasticus

THE LITERATURE AND RELIGION OF THE APOCRYPHA

(which is quoted three times as scripture in the Talmud and survived in Hebrew until the twelfth century), the Hebrew and Aramaic Apocrypha did not strike the popular fancy and therefore ceased to be copied soon after their translation into Greek. Thus they were lost in the original language. Except for Ecclesiasticus, it seems probable that no copies of the Apocrypha in Hebrew or Aramaic were readily available to the rabbis at Jamnia, and that there was no popular demand—such as is apparent in the case of Esther, Song of Songs, and Daniel—for their canonization. At least since the beginning of our era the interest in these books has been at low ebb. In the reorganization of Judaism after the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70, works such as the Apocrypha and the apocalypses soon ceased to be written and copied (II Esdras 3-14 and the Apocalypse of Baruch, ca. A.D. 90, are among the last), and existing copies of earlier non-canonical books may have been systematically destroyed. Henceforth the Scriptures alone were searched by the Jews for inspired truth, guidance, illumination, and the edification of congregations or individuals. Other literature was either useless or dangerous, and Jews were warned against it: "Whoever brings together in his house more than twenty-four books [the Hebrew Old Testament] brings confusion" (Midrash Qoheleth 12:12). Rabbi Akiba (died ca. 132) even declared that readers of apocryphal literature had no part in the future world (Jerusalem Talmud, Sanhedrin X. 1, folio 28a; Babylonian Talmud, Sanhedrin 100b). The survival of the Apocrypha and of the Pseudepigrapha is due entirely to the Christian Church.

II. The Apocrypha in Christianity

A. Before the Reformation. 1. The Septuagint.—While the Bible of Jesus was "the Law and the Prophets" in Hebrew, the Old Testament of Paul and of his Gentile converts was—and remained, at least in principle, until the Reformation—the Septuagint (LXX), the Greek version begun in Alexandria ca. 250 B.C. and continued by various hands during more than one century.

Except for a few ancient scraps of papyrus, all extant manuscripts of the Septuagint are Christian. Nevertheless it is commonly assumed that the Septuagint (including the Apocrypha) was the Bible of the Alexandrian Jews before the Christians adopted it. If such was the case, as seems probable, what was the canonical status of the Apocrypha among the Alexandrian Jews? Opinions vary, and even the evidence is ambiguous. Flavius Josephus (died ca. A.D. 100) in his use of the Septuagint as a source for his Jewish Antiquities regarded I Maccabees, I Esdras, and the additions to Esther (omitting the first and last, A and F) as no less authentic and canonical than the Hebrew Bible. Philo of Alexandria (died ca. A.D. 50), however, adhered strictly to the Hebrew canon, ignoring the Apocrypha in toto, and like the Palestinian rabbis regarded the Pentateuch as the central and supreme revelation of the Lord. But the Hellenistic Jews were not all as strict as Philo. In Palestine sacred and profane literature were both circulating in Hebrew and Aramaic, but in Alexandria all profane literature was in Greek, while all sacred literature was translated into Greek from Hebrew or Aramaic. Consequently it was natural to regard as holy writ all Palestinian books translated into the Greek vernacular. Thus, for instance, the translator of the second half of Jeremiah also translated the book of Baruch, at least in part, as if it were no less canonical. Moreover, it is difficult to explain how the Christians could have regarded the Apocrypha as an integral part of their Greek Bible—the Septuagint which they received from Alexandria—if the Hellenistic Jews had not so done before them.

2. The New Testament.—Eighty per cent of the Old Testament quotations in the New Testament reproduce the Septuagint, although by no means always verbatim. The New Testament writers never quote from the Apocrypha, but allusions to certain passages in the Apocrypha occur: Ecclus. 5:11 (in Jas. 1:19; James has many other reminiscences of Ecclesiasticus); II Macc. 6-7 (in Heb. 11:35-36); echoes from the Wisdom of Solomon in Paul's epistles (Rom. 1:20-32; 9:21; II Cor. 5:4; Eph. 6:14; etc.), in Heb. 1:3 (ἀπαύγασμα, "effulgence, reflection"; Wisd. Sol. 7:26), and in Matt. 27:43 (Wisd. Sol. 2:18). References to some of the Pseudepigrapha are even more direct: Assumption of Moses (Jude 9; according to Origen), the book of Jannes and Jambres (II Tim. 3:8; according to Origen), Martyrdom of Isaiah (Heb. 11:37, "they were sawn asunder"), and Enoch (Jude 14, 15).

3. Church Fathers and Councils.—Allusions to passages in the Apocrypha occur in the earliest Christian writings outside of the New Testament beginning with the Didache or Teaching of the Twelve Apostles (cf. Did. 4:5 with Ecclus. 4:31). The Epistle of Barnabas in chs. 6, 12, and 19 quotes Wisdom, Ecclesiasticus, and II Esdras. I Clement quotes the Wisdom of Solomon. Tertullian praises Judith, cites Ecclesiasticus as scripture, and attributes Wisdom to the pen of Solomon. Irenaeus quoted Baruch as a work of Jeremiah, and Susanna (as also Bel and the Dragon) as part of Daniel; Hippolytus paraphrased Susanna and wrote a commentary on the Song of the Three Children. Clement of Alexandria, Origen, and Cyprian not only quoted passages in the Apocrypha, but they specifically regarded them as scripture. Athanasius reports that catechumens were taught parts of the Apocrypha, which he freely cites as scripture. The same point of view prevails in Chrysostom, Ambrose, Augustine, and other church fathers.

This acceptance of the Apocrypha as canonical scriptures in the early church was frowned upon by some of the most learned of the church fathers, beginning with Origen. As a churchman (see above) Origen followed the general practice, but as a scholar he clearly and definitely limited the canonical Old Testament to the Hebrew Bible, without the Apocrypha. Similarly, Cyril of Jerusalem exhorted the catechumens to hold fast to the twenty-two books and to disregard the Apocrypha; he distinguished between recognized and questionable scriptures, but in practice he could not deviate from the general usage. Such is also the attitude of Jerome: in theory he made a sharp distinction between libri canonici and libri ecclesiastici, declaring categorically that books which were outside the Hebrew canon should be placed inter apocrypha (among the apocryphal writings); but in practice he overcame his scruples and included the Apocrypha in his Latin version of the Bible, the Vulgate, which is still the official Roman Catholic Bible. He even cited Ecclesiasticus as scripture.

Thus the two divergent points of view, the canonicity of the Apocrypha in Roman Catholicism and their relegation outside the scriptural canon prevailing in Protestantism (together with controversies on the matter), reach back to the early church, if not indeed to the difference between the Palestinian and Alexandrian Jewish canons. In 238, Julius Africanus of Em-maus wrote to Origen of Alexandria expressing amazement at his quotation of the story of Susanna as canonical scripture. Origen, being unable to defend his position with scholarly arguments, merely appealed to the authority of the church, which is not derived from the Jews, and quoted the verse, "Remove not the ancient landmark, which thy fathers have set" (Prov. 22:28).

But only a few scholars expressed some qualms about the tacit canonization of the Apocrypha. Jerome reports that the Council of Nicaea (325) reckoned Judith among the Scriptures; but this information is not confirmed otherwise. Local synods, however, issued decisions on the matter. The African Council of Hippo (393), attended by Augustine, recognized the canonicity of Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Tobit, Judith, I-II Maccabees, and, presumably, I Esdras, Baruch, Epistle of Jeremy, and the additions to Daniel and Esther, which did not need to be specifically mentioned, being considered parts of canonical books. The third (397) and the sixteenth (419) Councils of Carthage, likewise attended by Augustine, confirmed the decision of the Council of Hippo. The Council of Trent (April 8, 1546), confirmed by the Vatican Council (1870), both of which Roman Catholics alone regard as ecumenical, pronounced the anathema against whoever did not regard as "sacred and canonical" all the books contained in the Vulgate. The Sistine edition of the Vulgate (1590) had omitted I-II [III-IV] Esdras and the Prayer of Manasses, but in the Clementine edition (1592), which became official and was followed in later editions, these books were printed in smaller type as an appendix to the New Testament, with the statement that they are not included in the list of canonical books decreed at the Council of Trent.

In the Greek Church, despite some objections, the Apocrypha were recognized as canonical, and the second Trullan Council (692) followed the African councils in recognizing the canonicity of the Apocrypha. The Council of Jerusalem (1672), however, limited the Old Testament to the Hebrew canon (probably with the tacit assumption that I Esdras, and the additions to Esther and Daniel were included therein) and to only four books of the Apocrypha (Tobit, Judith, Ecclesiasticus, and Wisdom of Solomon).

The Syriac Church, which in the early period was greatly influenced by the Jews, at first read only the books of the Hebrew Old Testament (omitting Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah, and Esther) and Ecclesiasticus, in the Peshitta ("simple") version. Eventually, however, the influence of the Septuagint became dominant (except among the Nestorians). The Syro-Hexaplaric version made by Paul of Tella (in 616-17) from the Septuagint column in Origen's Hexapla, preserved for the most part in the Ambrosian Manuscript published by A. M. Ceriani (1874), contained Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Baruch, Epistle of Jeremy, and the additions to Daniel. The Codex Ambrosianus of the sixth century, also published by Ceriani (1876-83), contains the Apocrypha (omitting I [III] Esdras, Prayer of Manasses, Tobit, and the additions to Esther) scattered in part among the canonical books, and also III-IV Maccabees, II [IV] Esdras, and Josephus Jewish War VII.

In the Instituta regularia divinae legis (ca. 550), Junilius Africanus has preserved for us in a Latin translation the course on biblical introduction given at the theological school of

Nisibis (northern Mesopotamia) by Paul the Persian. The critical liberalism and rational scholarship of the school of Antioch survived for a while at Nisibis and through this volume became known to the Western Church. Theodore of Mopsuestia (died in 428) not only rejected the Apocrypha, but also Ezra-Nehemiah, Esther, and Job from the Old Testament canon. Paul the Persian, in the Instituta attributed to Junilius, taught that the following books were of unquestionable canonicity: the books of the Hebrew Bible, except those mentioned in the next two groups, and also Ecclesiasticus. He added that the following books, which many placed in the first group, possessed only limited authority: Job, Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah, Esther, Tobit, Judith, I-II Maccabees. Finally he ascribed no authority whatever to all other books, although some regarded Wisdom of Solomon and Song of Songs as canonical. He did not mention Ecclesiastes at all.

All the other ancient churches in Africa and western Asia used vernacular translations of the Greek Bible (Septuagint), and consequently accepted the Apocrypha as a matter of course; some of them even added one or more of the Pseudepigrapha to their Bible, and have thus preserved in Oriental translations some books that would otherwise have utterly perished.

A few ancient lists of canonical books may also be mentioned. Melito, bishop of Sardis (ca. 180), according to Eusebius (Church History IV. 26), omitted from his list not only the Apocrypha, but also Lamentations and Esther (which may, however, have been included in Jeremiah and Ezra). Origen (Eusebius Church History VI. 25) lists the books in the Hebrew canon, adding τὰ Μακκαβαϊκὰ (I-II Maccabees) outside their number at the end. The Muratorian Fragment (ca. 180) is confined to the New Testament, except that it curiously places Wisdom of Solomon before Revelation. Epiphanius, in one of his lists, adds Wisdom of Solomon and Ecclesiasticus after the New Testament, but in another he places them after the Old Testament, on a lower plane. A third-century list in the Codex Claromontanus (sixth century, Paris) includes the Apocrypha (except the Prayer of Manasses) in the list of canonical books.

The principal uncial Greek manuscripts contain the Apocrypha, but with some variations. The Codex Vaticanus (fourth century) omitted I-II Maccabees and the Prayer of Manasses; the Codex Sinaiticus (end of fourth or beginning of fifth centuries) in its extant portions contains the Prophets, Esther, Judith, Tobit, I and IV Maccabees; the Codex Alexandrinus (fifth century) contains, in addition to the standard Apocrypha, also III-IV Maccabees and the Prayer of Manasses (among the Odes, supplementing the Psalms).

B. Since the Reformation.—After the Apocrypha had thus enjoyed almost undisputed canonicity during the Middle Ages, two factors contributed to their relegation outside the Scriptures in the majority of the Protestant churches: the polemic against Roman Catholic doctrines, and the study of Hebrew.

The basic principle of the Reformation was, "The just shall live by faith" (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11; Heb. 10:38; cf. Hab. 2:4)—not by works. The Roman Catholic doctrine of justification by works was supported by proof texts in the Apocrypha (Ecclus. 3:3, 14-15, 30; Tob. 4:7-11; 12:9; 14:11; etc.), but had been vigorously attacked by Paul (Rom. 3:20, 28; Gal. 3:2). Equally, if not more distasteful to the Reformers was the Roman Catholic doctrine of the merits of the saints, for which likewise the Apocrypha furnished confirmation (Song of the Three Holy Children 12; contrast Luke 3:8).

The revival of classical learning, humanism, the Renaissance, and the invention of printing—all had contributed to a renewal of interest in the study of Hebrew (which had been in abeyance since Jerome) among Christians, before Martin Luther nailed his Ninety-Five Theses to the door of the Wittenberg castle church (October 31, 1517). Nicholas of Lyra (died ca. 1340), a Franciscan of Jewish parentage, wrote an important commentary on the Old Testament, omitting the Apocrypha. Thoroughly familiar with Hebrew, he interpreted the Scriptures accurately, with the help of the famous Jewish commentaries; regarding Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Judith, Tobit, and I-II Maccabees as noncanonical, he interpreted them later in a separate work. He even published in 1333 a pamphlet on the differences between the Vulgate and "Hebrew Truth" (i.e., the Hebrew Bible). Lyra's influence may have induced Luther to study Hebrew, but in any case is apparent in his biblical interpretation. The first Hebrew grammars written by Christians were those of Konrad Pellicanus (1503) and especially of Johann Reuchlin (1506). Christian students of the Hebrew Bible would naturally conclude with Jerome that it alone—the hebraica veritas (Hebrew truth) without the Apocrypha—constituted the canonical Old Testament.

The determination of the exact contents and wording of the Scriptures was of primary importance to the Reformers. Having refused to recognize the authority of the Papacy, they made the Scriptures the supreme guide and norm in matters of faith and conduct. Since the Vulgate was no longer regarded by the Protestants as the correct transcript of God's word, it became imperative to publish vernacular translations made from the "inspired" original texts in Hebrew (Old Testament) and Greek (New Testament). As a result, the canonicity of the Apocrypha could no longer be maintained.

The first to draw the natural conclusions from the Protestant principles was Andreas Rudolf (Bodenstein) Karlstadt, who in his De canonicis scripturis libellus (Wittenberg, 1520) divided the Old Testament scriptures into canonical writings (the Hebrew Old Testament), hagiographic apocrypha (Wisdom of Solomon, Ecclesiasticus, Judith, Tobit, I-II Maccabees), and worthless apocrypha (the other books, not listed). Luther accepted these conclusions (to some extent) when in his German version of the whole Bible (1534) he relegated those six books of the Apocrypha, together with the additions to Daniel and Esther, and the Prayer of Manasses (but without I-II Esdras) to an appendix at the end of the Old Testament, with the following superscription, "Apocrypha, these are books which are not held equal to the sacred Scriptures, and yet are useful and good for reading." Luther's example was immediately followed by Coverdale, who in accordance with the Latin Bible omitted the Prayer of Manasses and added I-II Esdras to the books placed at the end of the Old Testament under the title The Apocrypha (1535). Wycliffe's Bible (ca. 1382, revised 1388) had failed to segregate the Apocrypha. All English editions of the Bible prior to 1629 contained the Apocrypha, either with the canonical books or relegated to an appendix: "Thomas Matthew" (1537, in which the Prayer of Manasses appeared for the first time in English), the Great Bible (1539), the Geneva Bible (1560, in which for the first time in English some of the Apocrypha were translated from the Greek instead of the Latin), the Bishop's Bible (1568), and the King James Bible or Authorized Version (1611, made from the Hebrew and Greek, in which the Apocrypha are scattered among the canonical books). But as early as 1629 the Apocrypha were omitted in some editions of the English Bible and, following some bitter controversies, the British and Foreign Bible Society has excluded them since 1827 from all printings of the Bible (except some pulpit Bibles).

The Church of England, in the sixth of the Forty-Two Articles of Religion (1553; Thirty-Nine in 1563), declared: "The other Books (as Hierome saith [see Jerome's Preface to the Books of Solomon]) the Church doth read for example of life and instruction of manners; and yet doth it not apply them to establish any doctrine."

In conclusion, there are three attitudes toward the Apocrypha in Christendom: they are fully canonical (Roman Catholicism); they are not God's word but are edifying (Lutheran, Anglican, and Zurich Reformed churches); they should be rejected (Calvinistic and other Protestant churches).

III. The Books of the Apocrypha

A. I Esdras. 1. I Esdras and Its Canonical Parallels.—This book—or rather this torso of an edition of Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah—is called I Esdras in the Septuagint, Old Latin, and Syriac versions; II Esdras in Lucian's recension of the Septuagint; III Esdras in the Vulgate (where it is relegated outside the canonical Bible, after the New Testament). It relates the Jewish history from Josiah's celebration of the Passover to the reading of the Law in the time of Ezra. Except for some changes in order (Ezra 4:7-24 here precedes Ezra 2:1), some omissions (Ezra 4:6; Neh. 1:1-7:5; 8:13b-13:31), and the addition of 1:23-24 and of the Story of the Three Youths (I Esdras 3:1-5:6), the book is merely an older, more idiomatic, freer, and better translation of the following portions of the canonical Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah: II Chr. 35:1-36:21 (I Esdras 1); Ezra 1:1-11 (I Esdras 2:1-15); Ezra 2:1-67=Neh. 7:6-69 (I Esdras 5:7-43); Ezra 2:68-4:5; 4:24-6:22 (I Esdras 5:44-7:15); Ezra 7:1-8:36 (I Esdras 8:1-67); Ezra 9:1-10:44 (I Esdras 8:68-9:36); Neh. 7:73-8:13a (I Esdras 9:37-55).

A comparison of the Greek I Esdras with the canonical Hebrew-Aramaic parallels listed above will show that our Greek Esdras was translated from a text which differed only in minor variants from the canonical text. Thus I Esdras 1:11 ("before [liḥnē] the people") is a better reading than II Chr. 35:12 ("of the children [liḥnē] of the people"); similarly "and he lodged" (וילן, I Esdras 9:2) is preferable to "and he went" (וילך, Ezra 10:6), which the King James Version mistranslates "and when he came" in order to make sense.

The Greek Ezra is not a revision of the Septuagint of Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah. It is true that at times the same Hebrew or Aramaic words are given a very different meaning in the two Greek texts: "being arrayed in their vestments" (I Esdras 1:2) corresponds to "and he encouraged them" (II Chr. 35:2, LXX). Moreover, at times the two Greek texts agree in the use of unusual words, and even in vocalizing the Hebrew otherwise than in our Masoretic text (לִבְקָרִי is vocalized to mean "in regard to the oxen" in II Chr. 35:12; the two Greek versions, however, read it as "in the morning"). But the differences are more significant than the agreements. I Esdras is idiomatic and free, not pedantically literal and obscure like the Septuagint version of the canonical books. It correctly renders "beyond the river" (i.e., west of the Euphrates) with "Coelesyria and Phoenicia"; "according to the hand of the Lord his God upon him" (Ezra 7:6) becomes "having found favor in his sight" (I Esdras 7:6). The stylistic superiority of the Greek of I Esdras over that of the Septuagint of Ezra appears from the following exact English version of unintelligible Greek jargon, "And they performed the Feast of Tents according to the written, and burnt offerings day in day in number like the judgment, a word of the day in its day" (Ezra 3:4, LXX). Contrast the lucidity of I Esdras 5:51, rendering the same Hebrew text, "And they celebrated the Feast of Tabernacles, as it is commanded in the law, and sacrifices daily, as it was proper." Of course the rendering in I Esdras is not always correct: erroneous renderings occur in 5:7; 8:62; 9:4, 37; etc. Occasionally when the translator does not know the meaning of a word, he simply omits it (e.g., 2:19, 27; 4:13; 8:22; etc.). But generally he attains a notable clarity, distinction, and freshness of diction which are far superior to the Septuagint translator of the canonical parallels. In some twenty instances I Esdras reveals a better Hebrew-Aramaic text than the Masoretic one.

It has been plausibly surmised that I Esdras is a surviving fragment of the oldest Greek translation of Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah which, exactly as in the case of Daniel (where the original Septuagint survives solely in the Chigi Manuscript, while all others give Theodotion's version), was eventually discarded in favor of Theodotion's by the Christians. Flavius Josephus used I Esdras exclusively, ignoring the Theodotion text of the canonical parallels, which probably did not yet exist at the time.

The differences in contents and in sequence between I Esdras and the canonical parallels are best explained by supposing that both represent two revised editions of the Chronicler's work (Chronicles-Ezra-Nehemiah), for it is hardly possible to derive one from the other. The first edition of the Chronicler's work apparently still lacked the genuine Memoirs of Nehemiah (Neh. 1:1-7:5, which is lacking in I Esdras), as also the Story of the Three Youths (I Esdras 3:1-5:6). It was primarily the popularity of this story among Christians that saved the fragment of the old version of the Chronicler's work, which we call I Esdras, from being lost and forgotten.

of Darius I, king of Persia, wrote what he considered the strongest thing in the world and placed the sealed slips under the pillow of the sleeping king, with the expectation that the winner in the contest would be richly rewarded (3:1-12). In the morning the king, after summoning his courtiers, invited the youths to expound and defend their opinions (3:13-17). The first one maintained that wine was the strongest because it affected so deeply the mind of all men, from slave to king (3:18-24). The second asserted that the king was the strongest (4:1-12). The third one (identified with Zerubbabel in a gloss), after recognizing that woman dominated over man (4:13-32), concluded that "great is truth, and stronger than all things" (4:35). "And all the people shouted, Great is truth, and mighty above all things" (4:41; 4:33-41). This famous utterance is usually quoted from the Vulgate—with the present praevallet changed into the future ("will prevail"); Magna est veritas, et praevalebit. As his reward, Zerubbabel requested that Darius rebuild Jerusalem and its temple, and return thither the temple vessels (4:42-46). Darius complied and also allowed the Jewish exiles to return (4:47-57). Zerubbabel praised God (4:58-60) and led back the exiles (4:61-5:6).

The original story (3:1-4:41), manifestly translated from the Aramaic, was a popular Gentile tale. In its earliest form the three strongest things were wine, the king, and women; its tone was humorous if not sarcastic. It was moralized by adding that truth was strongest of all. The story was probably Persian, and as the mention of truth (Avestan Asha, Vedic Rta) may indicate, it was moralized under Zoroastrian influence. By identifying the third youth with Zerubbabel (note the gloss in 4:13), and connecting the tale with the return of the exiles and the rebuilding of the temple (4:42-5:6), Jewish editors incorporated it into the work of the Chronicler. It seems probable that the authors of Daniel and Esther were acquainted with the Aramaic original, and the author of the Wisdom of Solomon with the Greek version (which was probably made in the second or first century B.C.). The date of the original Persian tale may go back to the fifth century and the Aramaic version may have been made in the fourth; the Jewish edition was probably added to the Chronicler's work about 200 B.C. or soon after. The excellent style, the irony, and the vivid scenes from actual life give to the three speeches a strong sense of reality. The praise of Truth is really eloquent. All in all, this is one of the best surviving ancient tales. The high quality of the style and thought may be illustrated through the following extracts from the three speeches of the youths.

O ye men, how exceeding strong is wine! it causeth all men to err that drink it; . . . it turneth also every thought into jollity and mirth, so that a man remembereth neither sorrow nor debt. . . . And when they are in their cups, they forget their love both to friends and brethren, and a little after draw out swords. . . . O ye men, is not wine the strongest, that enforceth to do thus? (3:18-24.)

O ye men, do not men excel in strength, that bear rule over sea and land, and all things in them? But yet the king is more mighty. . . . If he bid them make war the one against the other, they do it. . . . They slay and are slain, and transgress not the king's commandment. . . . Likewise for those that are no soldiers, . . . but use husbandry, when they have reaped again that which they had sown, they bring it to the king (4:2-6).

Women have borne the king and all the people that bear rule by sea and land. Even of them came they: and they nourished them up that planted the vineyards, from whence wine cometh. . . . Yea, and if men have gathered together gold and silver, or any other goodly thing, do they not love a woman which is comely in favour and beauty? And letting all those things go, do they not gape, and even with open mouth fix their eyes fast on her . . . ? Do ye not labour and toil, and give and bring all to the woman? (4:15-22.)

Wine is wicked, the king is wicked, woman are wicked, all the children of men are wicked, . . . and there is no truth in them. . . . As for the truth, it endureth, and is always strong. . . . Neither in her judgment is any unrighteousness; and she is the strength, kingdom, power, and majesty, of all ages. Blessed be the God of truth (4:37-40).

B. II Esdras.—The gloomy Ezra Apocalypse (II Esdras in English; IV Esdras in Latin) reflects the tragic aftermath of the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70 and was written about twenty years later. The Latin text in the Vulgate (the Greek is lost except for two or three verses) and its translation in the King James Version and the English Revised Version contain, besides the Jewish apocalypse (II Esdras 3-14), four additional chapters (1-2; 15-16) of Christian origin which are missing in the Syriac, Ethiopic, Arabic, and Armenian versions; they are sometimes called V or V-VI Esdras. Chs. 1-2 are a Christian apocalypse (ca. A.D. 150) culminating in a vision of the Son of God and his martyrs (ch. 2 seems to have been used in the Roman breviary and missal); chs. 15-16 (ca. A.D. 250) are a dismal description of future woes in the vein of certain Old Testament prophecies and the apocalypses in the Gospels: not only the wicked and the heathen, but also the believers will be robbed and sorely afflicted by strangers before their final deliverance. "For yet a little, and iniquity shall be taken away out of the earth, and righteousness shall reign among you" (16:52). "The days of trouble are at hand, but I will deliver you from the same. Be ye not afraid, neither doubt, for God is your guide" (16:74-75). The seven visions of II Esdras 3-14, of which the first six (3:1-13:53a, 57-58, omitting the references to Ezra in 3:1; 6:10; 7:2, 25; 8:2, and "there I sat three days" in 13:58) are revelations to Salatiel (Hebrew, Shealtiel; cf. Ezra 3:2; 5:2; Neh. 12:1) and the seventh (ch. 14) is a report of the rewriting of the Scriptures through a revelation to Ezra, may be summarized as follows:

(a) The first vision (3:1-5:20). Thirty years after Nebuchadrezzar destroyed Jerusalem, Shealtiel complains in Babylon over the misery of the Jews. God did not remove the evil impulse resulting from Adam's sin, so that his descendants might observe the law revealed to Moses (3:4-22); as a punishment for its sins, Jerusalem was delivered into the hands of God's enemies (3:23-36). The angel Uriel replies that man cannot understand God (4:1-11). Shealtiel objects that it would have been better for man never to have been created (4:12). Uriel says that nature's laws cannot be defied and what lies outside of one's experience cannot be understood (4:13-21). Israel is ruined because an evil seed produces an evil fruit (4:22-32). The evil age will come to an end when the abode of the righteous dead is completely filled (4:33-43). The time that is past is longer than the time to come (4:44-50). Cosmic upheavals will indicate the imminence of the end (4:51-5:13). Shealtiel, awakening from his trance, weeps and mourns (5:14-20).

(b) The second vision (5:21-6:34). Why was Israel delivered up? Man is incapable of comprehending God (5:21-40). Why could not all generations have lived when the new age will begin? Because they must follow one another (5:41-49). Generations now living on this aged mother earth are inferior to the first ones (5:50-55). Alone God created, alone God will dissolve the world (5:56-6:6): the age to come will follow the present one without an interval (6:7-10), after the signs of the end (6:11-24; cf. 4:51-5:13) and the time of salvation (6:25-34).

(c) The third vision (6:35-9:25). Since God created the world in six days for the benefit of Israel, should not the Jews be masters of the earth (6:35-59)? Owing to Adam's sin, the Jews must reach the future world, which belongs to them, through narrow and difficult paths; then they will leave the corruptible world to the heathen (7:1-16). Is the future bliss only for the Jews? Yes, despite their sins (7:17-25). At the end of this world the Messiah ("My Son," omitting "Jesus" in the Vulgate) will rule four hundred years; then he and all living will die and silence will reign during seven days (7:26-

30). The age to come begins with the resurrection, the final judgment, and the revelation of Paradise and Gehenna (7:31-44).² The seer laments the fact that only a few among all men will be saved (7:45-74): the wicked after death will wander about and be tortured, while the righteous are happy in their chambers (7:75-101). The righteous cannot intercede for the wicked (7:102-115). Through his sin Adam brought perdition to the human race; nevertheless, says the angel, everyone is responsible for his eternal lot (7:116-131) and consequently few are saved (7:132-8:3). Why should God create men, and especially his people, in order to destroy them (8:4-19a)? Like God, the seer should rejoice with the saved and forget the wicked (8:19b-62). The vision closes with another description of the signs of the end (8:63-9:13) and another explanation of the paucity of the saved (9:14-25).

(d) The fourth vision (9:26-10:60). While the seer complains that Israel must perish though his divine law is eternal (9:26-37), he sees a woman (i.e., Zion) mourning for her son and preparing to fast unto death (9:38-10:4). When the seer rebukes her for not mourning for Zion (10:5-24), she vanishes and a city appears (10:25-28). The angel explains that the woman is Zion, her son is Jerusalem in ruins, and the city is the New Jerusalem (10:29-60).

(e) The fifth vision (11:1-12:51). In a dream an eagle rises from the sea. It has twelve wings, three heads, and eight winglets with contrary feathers. The twelve wings and two winglets rule in succession; two winglets remain under the head on the right, two are devoured by the heads; the latter rule next; finally two winglets rule (11:1-35). A lion announces the end of the eagle (11:36-46), which is then burned (12:1-3a). As the angel explains, the eagle is the fourth of Daniel's kingdoms (Dan. 7:7-8, 23), now understood to be the Roman Empire (not the Seleucid Kingdom, as in Daniel); heads and wings are twenty-three Roman rulers (the first and second wings are Caesar and Augustus; the three heads are Vespasian, Titus, and Domitian; the book was written in the reign of Domitian [81-96]). The lion is the Messiah (12:3b-51).

(f) The sixth vision (13:1-58). In a dream a man (i.e., the Messiah) rises from the depths of the stormy sea and flies with the clouds of heaven (cf. Dan. 7:13); he annihilates his foes and gathers a harmless throng (13:1-13), that is, the ten tribes of Israel and the remnants of Judah in Palestine (13:14-58).

(g) Ezra dictates the text of the Scriptures (14:1-48). Before Ezra is to be taken into the invisible world (14:1-17), he withdraws from Israel with five scribes for forty days (14:18-26), admonishes his people (14:27-36), and dictates ninety-four books to his scribes: twenty-four (the Hebrew Bible) he is to publish, seventy (the apocalypses) are esoteric (14:37-48). Then he ascends to heaven (14:49-50).

It is clear from this synopsis that the seventh section (ch. 14), explaining in imaginary fashion the restoration of the Scriptures, is an appendix loosely attached to the book and presumably the work of another author. The six preceding visions are an apocalyptic drama in two acts: the "tying of the knot," in the present age (visions 1-3 [3:1-9:25]); and the "denouement" in the world to come (visions 4-6 [9:26-13:58]). The first part is an impassioned discussion of the problem of God's love and justice in this world filled with sin and woe; the second is a solution of the problem, on the basis of faith and hope, in the world to come. But the solution fails to satisfy the disheartened and pessimistic author, writing about A.D. 90, during the tragic years following the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (A.D. 70).

The problem of theodicy, or how to prove the justice and love of God in a world where there seems to be no relationship between man's behavior and man's lot, is treated both in its national and in its personal aspects.

The misery of Israel after A.D. 70 (bitterly contrasted to the prosperity of Babylon [i.e., Rome], 3:2, 29) is tearfully described: "Our sanctuary is laid waste, our altar broken down, our temple destroyed ["our cult is abolished"—Syriac version], our psaltery is laid on the ground, our song is put to silence" (10:21-22). Does God no longer care for his beloved chosen people (5:23-30), for whom he created the world and to whom he promised the dominion of the earth (6:55-59)? True, sinfulness is universal: "What is man, that thou shouldst take displeasure at him? Or what is a corruptible generation, that thou shouldst be so bitter toward it? For in truth there is no man among them that be born, but he hath dealt wickedly; and among the faithful [Jews] there is none which hath not done amiss" (8:34-35; cf. 3:35; 7:46, 68 [missing fragment]; contrast 3:36). The sorrow and travail in the world is the result of this sinfulness, which had its origin in Adam's sin (7:11-12): as a result of this fall the world has been filled with iniquity, death, and misery (3:7-18; cf. Rom. 5:12). "Alas, Adam, what have you done! When you sinned, the fall was not yours alone, but ours likewise, who are your descendants" (7:48 [118]). The root of all evil is the cor malignum, the wicked mind or evil impulse which passed from Adam to the human race (3:21-22, 26). "A grain of evil seed was sown in the heart of Adam from the beginning, and how much ungodliness has it produced and will yet produce until the threshing floor comes!" (4:30; cf. 4:31-32; 7:92 [missing fragment].) Since God alone created the world and Adam (3:4-6), whence comes the evil impulse (4:4)? The author reverently refrained from giving the obvious answer—namely, that the evil impulse was created in Adam by God, who "left him in the power of his impulse" (Ecclus. 15:14). Early rabbinical sources not only answered the question, but cited biblical proof texts in support of this doctrine.³ The author could merely recognize the inability of man to understand God's ways (4:2-21 [containing a fable]; 5:36-40) and look forward to the coming of the future world (4:26-50).

But the realization that very few will participate in the bliss of the world to come (7:49-61; 8:1, 3; cf. Matt. 22:14; Luke 13:23-24; etc.) raises the problem of theodicy—in its individual aspect—to a tragic pitch. For the mass of mankind and even of Israel is doomed to eternal perdition after death, following the tribulations and trials of this life: how can this dreadful lot of the creature be harmonized with the justice and love of the Creator (chs. 7-8)? Why did not God take away from men the evil impulse (3:20)? Would it not have been better for God not to create man at all (4:12)? Neither the author nor any thinker since his day has been able to answer such questions rationally.

The eschatology of II (IV) Esdras resembles that of contemporary apocalypses (Syriac Baruch Revelation). The coming of the future age will be proclaimed by the signs of the end of the world, cosmic and national upheavals (4:51-5:13; 6:11-24; 8:63-9:13; cf. Matt. 24:6-8, 29-30; Mark 13:7-8, 12, 24-25; Luke 21:9-11, 25-26). After the end of the world, following the reign of the Messiah and his death (7:26-29), and seven days of silence (7:30), the new world will appear (7:31), the dead shall rise (7:32) when the trumpet is blown (6:23; cf. Matt. 24:31; I Cor. 15:52; I Thess. 4:16; etc.) and the Lord (6:6; 7:87, missing fragment) will sit in the final judgment (7:33-35). Already after death and before the Last Judgment the souls of the wicked are tormented in seven ways and those of the righteous enjoy seven kinds of bliss (7:75-99, missing fragment). On the day of the Last Judgment (described in 7:39-42, missing fragment) the books will be opened (6:20): there will be no mercy for the wicked (7:33), but only justice (7:34); for intercession in their behalf is futile (7:102-115, missing fragment). The pit of torment, the furnace of Gehenna (where the wicked suffer pain, thirst [8:59] and burning [7:38, missing fragment]) will be manifested over against the place of refreshment, the paradise of delight (7:36, missing fragment); according to 7:92 (missing fragment) and 8:38, death and destruction are the fate of at least some of the wicked. After the judgment, creation will be renewed (7:75, missing fragment) and changed (6:16; cf. II Pet. 3:13; Rev. 21:1): evil and sin will be abolished (6:27-28; 7:113-114 [43-44]), death will be gone and forgotten (8:53). Paradise (7:36, missing fragment; 8:52) and the New Jerusalem (7:26; 8:52; 10:54-55; 13:36) have been prepared in heaven by God from the beginning of time (3:6; cf. 6:2). Beautiful flowers (6:3) are in the paradise, and the tree of life (7:52), whose incorruptible fruit produces delight and healing (7:123, missing fragment). Hell is near paradise (7:36, 38, missing fragment) so that the saved might enjoy the spectacle of the torments of the damned (7:36, 38, missing fragment; on this proximity cf. Luke 16:22-26).

We thus see that in II (IV) Esdras (as also in Syriac Baruch and in the Jewish substratum of Rev. 19:11-21:8) the messianic age is no longer the final culmination of world history, as in earlier apocalypses, but a limited period (four hundred years in II Esdras; a thousand, or the millennium, in Rev. 20:2, 7) preceding the manifestation of the new heavens and the new earth, the pit of torment and the paradise of delight, which will endure for all eternity.

For the first Adam bearing a wicked heart transgressed, and was overcome; and so be all they that are born of him (3:21).

A city is builded, and set upon a broad field, and is full of all good things: the entrance thereof is narrow, and is set in a dangerous place to fall, like as if there were a fire on the right hand, and on the left a deep water: and one only path between them both, even between the fire and the water, so small that there could but one man go there at once (7:6-8).

O thou earth, wherefore hast thou brought forth. if the mind is made out of dust, like as all other created things? For it were better that the dust itself had been unborn, so that the mind might not have been made therefrom. But now the mind groweth with us, and by reason of this we are tormented, because we perish and know it (7:62-64, missing fragment).

For in this, O Lord, thy righteousness and thy goodness shall be declared, if thou be merciful unto them which have not the confidence of good works (8:36).

For unto you is paradise opened, the tree of life is planted, the time to come is prepared, plenteousness is made ready, a city is builded, and rest is allowed, yea, perfect goodness and wisdom. The root of evil is sealed up from you, weakness and the moth is hid from you, and corruption is fled into hell to be forgotten: sorrows are passed, and in the end is shewed the treasure of immortality (8:52-54).

C. Tobit.—The book of Tobit was written in Aramaic soon after 200 B.C. (probably 190-170 B.C.). The original text is lost, as is that of all the Palestinian Apocrypha except parts of Ecclesiasticus; but the three extant Greek translations, and their versions in other languages, testify of its great popularity among the Jews until the first century of our era, and among the Christians thereafter. The first (and best) text is that of Codex Sinaiticus (S) of about A.D. 400, and of the Old Latin, Armenian, Vulgate, and Hebrew translations. The second is the Codex Vaticanus (B) of the fourth century, and the Alexandrinus (A) of the fifth: this is found in the ordinary editions of the Septuagint (but Rahlfs gives also the text of the Sinaiticus), in the King James Version and the English Revised Version, and in some Oriental versions (Syriac, Ethiopic, Sahidic, and Armenian). The third text is partially preserved in some Greek manuscripts, and is later than the others. The content of the book, in brief, is as follows:

(a) The misfortunes of Tobit (1:1-3:17). Tobit, of the tribe of Naphtali, observed punctiliously the prescriptions of the law of Moses in Nineveh, where he had been exiled, even though he was the purchasing agent of Shalmaneser (1:1-14). He incurred the wrath of Sennacherib by burying the bodies of executed Jews (1:15-20), but returned to Nineveh under Essarhaddon (1:21-22). One night, after the burial of a corpse, he slept outdoors on account of his impurity, and was blinded by birds' dung (2:1-10). A quarrel with his wife so increased his misery (2:11-14) that he begged God to end his life (3:1-6).

(b) The misfortunes of Sara (3:7-15). At the same moment in distant Ecbatana (Hamadan, Media) Sara, daughter of Raguel, also begged God to release her from this life; for not only had the demon Asmodeus killed her seven husbands on successive wedding nights, but she was even accused of murdering them (3:7-15).

(c) Divine intervention (3:16-17). God, hearing both, sent Raphael to help Tobit and Sara (3:16-17).

(d) Tobias sent to Rages (4:1-5:22). Tobit told his son Tobias that he had deposited with Gabael in Rages (Media) ten talents of silver, or more than $20,000 (4:1-2; cf. 1:14). Then he gave him moral counsel (4:3-21). Raphael, under the guise of Azarias, was hired to accompany Tobias to Media (5:1-16a), and so they took their leave and departed (5:16b-22).

(e) The journey to Media (6:1-9:6). Tobias caught a fish in the Tigris and, upon the advice of Raphael, took along its gall, heart, and liver (6:1-8). Raphael told Tobias the story of Sara and predicted that he would marry her after driving away Asmodeus (6:9-17). And so it happened: Asmodeus, nauseated by the "fishy fume" (Milton, Paradise Lost, Bk. IV) produced when Tobias burned the liver and heart of the fish, fled and was bound by Raphael in Upper Egypt (7:1-8:3). So the wedding was celebrated with festivities lasting two weeks (8:4-21), while Raphael brought the ten talents, and even Gabael himself, from Rages (9:1-6).

(f) The return to Nineveh (10:1-11:19). Tobit and Anna in Nineveh awaited anxiously the arrival of their son Tobias (10:1-7a), who refused to delay his departure from Ecbatana, in the company of Sara and Azarias (10:7b-11:1). Near Nineveh, Azarias and Tobias went ahead of the rest, bearing the gall of the fish, with which they restored Tobit's sight (11:2-13). The wedding celebration was then repeated (11:14-19).

(g) Raphael's departure (12:1-22). Offered a large sum, Azarias made himself known as Raphael (12:1-15), and ascended unto heaven (12:16-22).

(h) Tobit sang a psalm of thanksgiving (13:1-18).

(j) Epilogue (14:1-15). Before his death Tobit predicted to Tobias the destruction of Nineveh (14:1-7), and advised him to leave the doomed city and to observe the law of Moses (14:8-11a). Before Tobias died in Ecbatana he heard the glad tidings of Nineveh's destruction (14:11b-15).

Few scholars now defend the historical reality of the story of Tobit, which is generally regarded as an excellent example of ancient Aramaic fiction. The supernatural elements would alone class it as such:

Raphael, the sociable spirit, that deigned
To travel with Tobias, and secured
His marriage with the seven-times-wedded maid

* Milton, Paradise Lost, Bk. V.

The author knew the Law, the Prophets, and some of the Hagiographa (at least Psalms, Proverbs, and Job). He refers specifically to the story of Ahikar (1:21-22; 2:10; 11:18; 14:10); he utilizes folkloric motifs (the healing power of the entrails of the fish) and plots (the "grateful dead" and the "dangerous bride" cycles are here combined). It is possible that the glaring anachronisms and historical errors in the tale (the tribe of Naphtali was exiled by Tiglath-pileser, not by Shalmaneser [1:2], whose successor was Sargon, not Sennacherib [1:15]; Nineveh was not captured by Nebuchadrezzar and Ahasuerus [14:15]; etc.) were made deliberately to warn the alert reader that the story was pure fiction, although the pedantically official title (1:1-2) and the use of the first person, after the manner of Nehemiah's autobiography, in 1:3-3:6 (where, however, the Vulgate uses the third person), seem to give the book a genuinely historical tone.

Like other Jewish short stories in the Old Testament, and in the Apocrypha, Tobit inculcates the principles of Judaism both by example and by precept. The national aspect of Judaism appears in the pilgrimages to Jerusalem and the payment of tithes to the temple (1:6-8; 5:13; the Codex Sinaiticus gives the earlier practice), which is the object of the deepest reverence (1:4) and toward which one turned in prayer (3:11-12; cf. Dan. 6:10). Negatively, nationalistic religion stresses the utter separation of the Jews in the Dispersion from the heathen, particularly in regard to food (1:10-12) and marriage (1:9; 3:15; 4:12-13; 6:11; 7:12-13), although without the bitterness noticeable in books (Daniel, Judith, Esther) written after the persecutions of Antiochus Epiphanes in 168-165. Tobit still expects the future conversion of the heathen (13:11; 14:6), not their extermination.

Personal religion and morality (as in Ecclesiasticus) are, however, more prominent than national institutions. "My son, be mindful of the Lord our God all thy days, . . . and follow not the ways of unrighteousness" (4:5). Prayer of petition (3:1-6, 11-15) ascended to God (3:16; 12:12) and was answered; after deliverance from trouble, hymns of praise were sung in God's honor (8:15-17; 11:14-15; 12:6-7, 22; ch. 13).

The negative precepts of morality are summarized thus: "Do that to no man which thou hatest" (4:15; for the positive form of the Golden Rule see Matt. 7:12). Among the active duties, summarized in 12:7 ("Do that which is good and no evil shall touch you"), the burial of the pious dead and almsgiving are especially stressed (1:17-18). "Give alms of thy substance; and when thou givest alms, let not thine eye be envious, neither turn thy face from any poor [but: "give nothing to the wicked" (4:17)], and the face of God shall not be turned away from thee. If thou hast abundance, give alms accordingly: if thou have but a little, be not afraid to give according to that little: for thou layest up a good treasure for thyself against the day of necessity" (4:7-9).

Bless God, praise him, and magnify him, and praise him for the things which he hath done unto you in the sight of all that live. It is good to praise God, and exalt his name, and honourably to shew forth the works of God; therefore be not slack to praise him. It is good to keep close the secret of a king, but it is honourable to reveal the works of God. Do that which is good, and no evil shall touch you. Prayer is good with fasting and alms and righteousness. A little with righteousness is better than much with unrighteousness. It is better to give alms than to lay up gold: for alms doth deliver from death, and shall purge away all sin. Those that exercise alms and righteousness shall be filled with life: but they that sin are enemies to their own life (12:6-10).

Although there is still no trace of Daniel's doctrine of the resurrection (Dan. 12:2; cf. Tob. 3:6), the book of Tobit (like Ecclesiasticus) is a good record of the life and faith of those pious Jews out of whom were eventually developed the Pharisees and the rabbis of the Talmud.

D. Judith.—The story of Judith (the Greek form of the Hebrew word meaning "Jewess") has been celebrated in painting and verse.

Judith, a woman, as he lay upright
Sleeping, his hed of smote, and fro his tente
Ful prively she stale from every wight,
And with his hed unto here town she wente.⁵

The original book, now lost, was written in Hebrew somewhere in Palestine about 150 B.C., after the victories of Judas Maccabaeus (168-161) and before the patriotic fervor of the Maccabean rebellion had abated. We have a good Greek translation of the book in the Septuagint; all extant versions render the Greek text.

The Book of Judith is divided into two parts describing Holofernes' war against the Jews (chs. 1-7) and Judith's deliverance of her people (chs. 8-16). It may be summarized as follows:

(a) The victory of Nebuchadrezzar [Nabuchodonosor] over Arphaxad (1:1-16). In the twelfth year of his reign Nebuchadrezzar, "who ruled over the Assyrians at Nineveh" (sic!), attacked Arphaxad (cf. Gen. 10:22) king of Media (1:1-5) and summoned the troops of the various parts of his empire, but some refused to come (1:7-11). After his complete victory five years later, Nebuchadrezzar feasted 120 days (1:12-16).

(b) Holofernes subjected the western nations, but not the Jews (2:1-3:10). Nebuchadrezzar sent Holofernes to destroy the nations which had not furnished troops (2:1-13). At the head of an immense army (2:14-20), Holofernes won victory after victory (2:21-27); the cities of the Mediterranean coast quickly surrendered (2:28-3:6). Henceforth Nebuchadrezzar alone was to be worshiped as god (3:7-9).

(c) The Jews alone defied Holofernes (4:1-7:32). The Jews who had returned from the exile and had rebuilt the temple (in the time of Nebuchadrezzar!) prepared to bar the Assyrian advance from the north against Jerusalem (4:1-8), and invoked God's intervention (4:9-15). When Holofernes asked information about the Jews from the chieftains of neighboring nations (5:1-4), the Ammonite Achior, after summarizing the history of Israel (5:5-19), declared that the Jews were invincible unless their God was wroth at them (5:20-21). After declaring that only Nebuchadrezzar was god (6:1-4), Holofernes, instead of killing Achior (5:22-24), had him brought bound to the Jews besieged in Bethulia (6:5-13). Achior reported to Ozias and the other Jewish leaders what had happened and was welcomed by them (6:14-21). Holofernes cut off the food and water supplies of Bethulia (7:1-18). After thirty-four days the besieged Jews began to lose heart, but reluctantly agreed with Ozias to resist five more days before surrendering (7:19-32).

(d) Judith's reproach of the Jewish leaders (8:1-36). Judith, still mourning her husband Manasses after more than three years (8:1-6), was comely and pious (8:7-8). She declared to the elders of Bethulia that they had tempted God by promising surrender in five days unless he intervened (8:9-16); God might nevertheless deliver them (8:17-24), after testing them through affliction (8:25-27). Ozias said that he would keep the promise made to the people (8:28-31). Judith assured him that God would save the city (8:32-36).

(e) Judith's prayer (9:1-14). She begged the God of justice and power to prevent the Assyrians from defiling his temple (9:1-8), and to enable her to destroy their might through deceit (9:9-13), thus proving himself the defender of Israel (9:14).

(f) Judith's preparations (10:1-11:23). Removing her mourning garments, Judith dressed alluringly (10:1-4), and with a maid went to the Assyrian camp (10:5-10). She was taken to Holofernes (10:11-19), who assured her that she had nothing to fear (10:20-11:4). Judith promised Holofernes her help (11:5-8): although Achior's words (cf. 5:5-21) were true (11:9-10), Holofernes would triumph because the Jews had incensed their God by their decision to eat the animals and vegetable offerings which had been sanctified for the temple (11:11-16). She would pray in the valley every night until Bethulia's transgression was revealed to her; then she would guide Holofernes to victory (11:17-19). Holofernes agreed, and assured her of Nebuchadrezzar's appreciation (11:20-23).

(g) Judith's deed (12:1-13:10). Obedient to the law of Moses, Judith ate only of her own victuals (12:1-4), and for three days went into the valley at the morning watch for ablutions and prayer (12:5-9). On the fourth day Holofernes invited Judith to a private banquet (12:10-14). Attired in her finery, Judith attended it, but partook of her own food (12:15-19). Holofernes was so charmed by her that he drank to excess (12:20). Alone with him, Judith prayed (13:1-5), cut off his head while he was asleep, gave it to her maid, and with her walked to Bethulia (13:6-10).

(h) Judith's triumph (13:11-15:13). After entering Bethulia (13:11-13), Judith showed the elders and the people the head of Holofernes and his canopy, for which they praised God (13:14-20). Judith arranged for an attack on the morrow (14:1-4), and summoned Achior, who at once became a proselyte (14:5-10). In the morning the Assyrians fled in panic as far as Damascus (14:11-15:5), and their camp was sacked (15:6-17). Joakim, the high priest, and the Sanhedrin came to bless Judith (15:8-10), to whom the people donated the tent of Holofernes (15:11). She led the maidens in a dance (15:12-13).

(j) Judith's praise of the Lord (16:1-17). God destroyed the Assyrians through the charms of Judith (16:1-12); the almighty Creator is merciful and demands piety rather than offerings (16:13-16); he dooms eternally nations attacking Israel (16:17).

(k) Judith lived quietly ever after (16:18-25). While the people worshiped in Jerusalem, Judith dedicated to God the tent and canopy of Holofernes (16:18-19), and returned to Bethulia after three months of festivities (16:20-21). She refused to remarry (16:22), freed her maid, and was mourned at her death. She bequeathed her estate to her own and her husband's relatives (cf. Num. 27:11). No enemy troubled Israel until long after her death (16:23-25).

The story of Judith is no longer regarded as a record of actual happenings, at least among Protestants, although the supernatural is not the factor bringing about a happy ending, as in Tobit. Already Martin Luther regarded the story as an allegory of God's help to the Jews, and acutely observed that the false chronology and names were used to warn the reader that this is a holy parable. The anachronisms are even more glaring than in Tobit: Nebuchadrezzar (605-561 B.C.) ruled after the Assyrian Empire and Nineveh had ceased to exist (contrast 1:1; 2:1, 4, 14, 21; etc.) in 612 B.C., but long before the return of the Babylonian exiles and the rebuilding of the temple (contrast 4:2-3; 5:19; cf. 11:13; 16:18-20). The high priest Joakim (4:6, 8, 14; 15:8) presumably belongs to the time of Nehemiah (Neh. 12:10, 26), unless Baruch 1:7 is regarded as historical; and the Persian names of Bagoas (12:11; 13:1, 3; 14:14) and Holofernes are known only at an even later period. Moreover, it seems probable that, as in Daniel, Nebuchadrezzar is merely the symbol of the detested Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.), who actually proscribed Judaism and persecuted the Jews. The passionate hatred of the heathen; the beginnings of Pharisaic Judaism, evidenced in the punctilious observance of the law (4:9-14; 8:5-6; 10:5; 11:10-15; 12:2, 5-9; 16:16-17), in the rise of the "tradition of the ancients" or oral law (8:6), in the doctrine of the final judgment and eternal punishments (16:17); and the authority of the high priest and the Sanhedrin (4:6-8, 11, 14; 15:8) over the Palestinian Jews, all preclude a date earlier than the third or second centuries for the historical background and consequently exclude the historicity of the events narrated. It is hardly necessary to adduce other evidence, such as impossible occurrences (a troop movement of three hundred miles in three days, 2:21), and confused geography (2:23-27) abounding with unknown localities, such as Bethulia (which C. C. Torrey, however, identifies with Shechem).

The value of this edifying short story is not to be found in elusive historical information about a Jewish victory, but rather in its literary and religious qualities. The working out of the details of a well-known plot (suggested, for instance, by Judg. 5:24-27), the sharp delineation of the situations and the characters, and the fairly good style (in spite of occasional prolixity and ostentation not to be found in Esther, apparently written a few years later), testify to the skill of the author. From the religious and ethical point of view, Judith and Esther reflect, not the highest ideals of the prophets, but the intense nationalism during the wars for independence, when deceit, falsehood, and assassination seemed justified if advantageous to the nation. In this milieu God is conceived primarily as the champion of Israel (as generally before Amos), the almighty Creator able to destroy the mightiest empires of this world, the God who determines all events in advance:

For thou [O God] hast wrought not only those things, but also the things which fell out before, and which ensued after; thou hast thought upon the things which are now, and which are to come. Yea, what things thou didst determine were ready at hand, and said, Lo, we are here: for all thy ways are prepared, and thy judgments are in thy foreknowledge (9:5-6).

He is, however, also a god of justice and mercy with respect to Israel, testing and warning his people through minor misfortunes (8:25-27) and defending it only if it avoids wickedness (5:21). Trust in God's immense power and infinite mercy is expressed in the following verses:

For thy power standeth not in multitude, nor thy might in strong men: for thou art a God of the afflicted, an helper of the oppressed, an upholder of the weak, a protector of the forlorn, a saviour of them that are without hope (9:11).

I will sing unto the Lord a new song: O Lord, thou art great and glorious, wonderful in strength, and invincible. Let all creatures serve thee: for thou speakest, and they were made, thou didst send forth thy spirit, and it created them, and there is none that can resist thy voice. For the mountains shall be moved from their foundations with the waters, the rocks shall melt as wax at thy presence: yet thou art merciful to them that fear thee. For all sacrifice is too little for a sweet savour unto thee, and all the fat is not sufficient for thy burnt offering: but he that feareth the Lord is great at all times (16:13-16).

We have thus side by side in Judith some of the noblest tenets of Judaism and some of the chauvinistic attitudes which are often brought to the surface in times of national emergency.

E. The Rest of the Chapters of the Book of Esther.—The popularity of the Book of Esther among the Jews forced its admission into the canon of scriptures in spite of the misgivings of some ancient rabbis. They were presumably disturbed by the lack of any allusion to Judaism in the book, and by the rather boisterous and convivial celebration of Purim, which moreover was not ordained by Moses—although eventually, through subtle and ingenious exegesis, allusions to Purim were discovered in all three divisions of the Hebrew canonical scriptures.

It was inevitable that such a well-liked book would eventually be edited with the addition of pious edifying matter. This is the usual explanation of the expanded editions in Greek (containing 270 verses, while the canonical Hebrew has only 163), and in Aramaic (two Targums, dated about A.D. 700 and 800). C. C.

Torrey,⁶ however, claims that sections A, C, D, and F (omitting the colophon) were part of the Aramaic book which was translated in 114 (cf. the colophon), while B and E were written in Greek, presumably by the translator. These supplements were paraphrased by Josephus, with the exception of A and F, but were not in the Hebrew Bible in the time of Origen. In the Septuagint these supplements are located in their right context as follows: A (before 1:1), B (after 3:13), C (after 4:17), D (after C), E (after 8:12), F (at the end). But Jerome removed them in toto outside of the canonical book (leaving F where it was), with the result that, following Jerome's Vulgate, the English Apocrypha not only gives six disconnected sections but places the last one (F) first (including the final colophon in the Greek!), so that the interpretation of Mordecai's dream (F) precedes the account of the dream itself (A). In their proper order, and with the chapter and verse references of the Vulgate, which are printed in the English Apocrypha, these sections may be summarized as follows:

(a) Sec. A. Mordecai's dream (11:2-12:6; cf. F). Mordecai, in the second year of Artaxerxes, saw two dragons ready to fight, nations preparing for war, the Jewish nation threatened until a spring became a river, the sun came up, and the humble Jews triumphed over the mighty. While pondering the prophetic meaning of the dream, Mordecai heard Gabatha and Tharra plotting to assassinate Artaxerxes; he informed the king, who had them executed. Haman sought to avenge the two eunuchs.

(b) Sec. B. The edict against the Jews (13:1-7). Artaxerxes wrote to the governors of his 127 provinces that, in behalf of his subjects, the Jews should be exterminated on the fourteenth of Adar because they were opposed to all other men.

(c) Sec. C. The prayers of Mordecai (13:8-18) and Esther (14:1-19). God knows that Mordecai did not bow down before Haman because he prostrates himself before God alone; the Lord should now save his people from destruction. Queen Esther, dressed in mourning, prayed to God, her only help; he chose Israel, and exiled his people. Let God now prevent the abolition of Judaism in behalf of idolatry, let him save the Jews through Esther, who dislikes being married to a heathen and being a queen, and whose only joy is to serve the Lord.

(d) Sec. D. Esther's appearance before the king (15:1-16). In fine attire but filled with fears, Esther came to the king, and at his angry look fainted. God changed the king's disposition, but Esther fainted again in speaking of her terror.

⁶ "The Older Book of Esther," Harvard Theological Review, XXXVII (1944), 1-40.

(e) Sec. E. The edict in favor of the Jews (16:1-24). Some men seek to hurt their benefactors, and kings may be misled by deceitful ministers. Kings must rely on justice. Haman, for instance, taking advantage of the king's favor, plotted against the king and the queen (together with her people), with the intention of furthering the Macedonian conquest of the Persian Empire [Alexander's!]. The Jews, sons of the living God, observe just laws. The late Haman's decree is abrogated, and the Jews should be helped to take vengeance against their foes on the thirteenth of Adar—a future annual festival. Cities violating this decree will be destroyed.

(f) Sec. F. Interpretation of Mordecai's dream (10:4-13; cf. A) and colophon (11:1). Mordecai recognized God's hand in the Jewish triumph because it fulfilled his dream, which is thus interpreted: the spring is Esther; the two dragons are Mordecai and Haman; the nations are the enemies of the divinely rescued Jews. God's lots for the Jews and the Gentiles were both fulfilled, and the fourteenth and fifteenth of Adar were joyfully celebrated (10:4-13). The Epistle of Phurrai (Purim), or Greek Esther, was brought to Egypt by Dositheus in the fourth year of Ptolemy and Cleopatra (probably 114 B.C.), after being translated by Lysimachus (11:1).⁷

The Greek version containing these additions was thus made either in 114 or in 78 B.C., not long after the writing of the Hebrew book (probably about 125; cf. Intro. to the book of Esther, Vol. III of this Commentary). While Jewish hostility to the Gentiles is apparent in both the Hebrew and in the Greek texts, the first bases it primarily on intrigues and personal dislikes at the Persian court, while the Greek Esther seems to regard the conflict between Jews and Gentiles as eternal and divinely approved, for God made two lots (10:10). Anti-Semitism was strong at Alexandria about 100 B.C., and our Greek book (prepared by an Alexandrian Jew who settled in Jerusalem and became a citizen of that city) was welcomed there as an anti-Gentile tract in which the partiality of the universal Creator for the Jews and his hostility against the Gentiles was not in the least questioned.

The following passages from the prayers of Mordecai and Esther illustrate this religious attitude:

O Lord, Lord, the King Almighty: for the whole world is in thy power, and if thou hast appointed to save Israel, there is no man that can gainsay thee: for thou hast made heaven and earth, and all the wondrous things under the heaven (13:9-10).

And now, O Lord God and King, spare thy people: for their eyes are upon us to bring us to nought; yea, they desire to destroy the inheritance, that hath been thine from the beginning (13:15).

Hear my prayer, and be merciful unto thine inheritance: turn our sorrow into joy, that we may live, O Lord, and praise thy name (13:17).

Remember, O Lord, make thyself known in time of our affliction, and give me boldness, O King of the nations, and Lord of all power (14:12).

O thou mighty God above all, hear the voice of the forlorn, and deliver us out of the hands of the mischievous, and deliver me out of my fear (14:19).

F. The Wisdom of Solomon.—The Wisdom of Solomon resembles a Greek diatribe, or popular ("soapbox") address on some philosophical or religious theme. It was placed into the mouth of Solomon, but composed in Alexandria, in Greek, during the period 100-50 B.C. The imaginary audience of the author includes Jews (good and bad, rich and poor) and Gentiles. The "evangelistic" preacher strives to bring back into the fold the worldly and apostate Jews (chs. 1-5), to strengthen the faith and loyalty of the pious Jews (chs. 10-12; 16-19), and to prove to the heathen both the truth of Judaism (chs. 6-9) and the folly of idolatry (chs. 13-15). The contents of this important and original book may be summarized as follows:

(a) How wisdom determines the destiny of pious and wicked Jews (1:1-5:23). Wisdom is attained through righteousness (1:1-5). God created man for immortality, but blasphemy brings death (1:6-15). The ungodly Jews devote their lives to worldly pleasures and to oppression of the humble and pious Jews (1:16-2:20). The latter's hope "is full of immortality": for God "created man to be immortal," but "through envy of the devil came death into the world" (2:21-24). After death "the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God" (3:1-9); and in this life, in spite of afflictions, childlessness, and premature death, the lot of the righteous is preferable to that of the wicked (3:10-4:19). In the final judgment, seeing the bliss of the righteous, the wicked will repent and admit their folly (4:20-5:16). Eventually God will put on his "panoply," using the whole creation as his weapons, and destroy the ungodly (5:17-23; cf. Eph. 6:11-17).

(b) The nature of wisdom and how it is attained (chs. 6-9). Heathen kings need wisdom (6:1-11), which is accessible (6:12-16). Those who gain wisdom reign over a kingdom (6:17-21). Solomon will share the mysteries of wisdom with the other kings for the good of mankind (6:22-25). Solomon attained wisdom from God through prayer (7:1-7; cf. ch. 9; I Kings 3:9-12), preferring wisdom to worldly goods, but obtaining both (7:8-12). Wisdom confers on man not only friendship with God, but also the knowledge of all sciences (7:13-21). Wisdom, which has twenty-one qualities (7:22-23), is "more moving than any motion"; she is "the breath of the power of God," an emanation of his glory (7:24-26; cf. Heb. 1:3; 4:12-13); she renews all things, inspires the prophets, and rules the world (7:27-8:1). Solomon loved wisdom for what she is and for what she gives (8:2-8; the four Stoic cardinal virtues are listed in 8:7; cf. IV Macc. 1:2-4, 18; 5:23-24). So Solomon wished to have wisdom as his life companion (8:9-16), and sought to win her for himself (8:17-18) through the following prayer (8:19-21): May God grant wisdom to Solomon (9:1-4), for he needs her to reign and to build the temple (9:5-12). Men's "corruptible body presseth down the soul, and the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind that museth upon many things" (9:15); consequently, they can hardly understand visible things—and much less God—unless he gives them wisdom (9:13-18).

(c) Wisdom's activity in Israel's history (10:1-12:27). The heroes of wisdom from Adam to Moses are contrasted with the wicked in their days (10:1-11:1). The Israelites are contrasted with the Egyptians (11:2-14, continued in 16:1-19:22) at the time of the plagues and of the Exodus, "For by what things their enemies were punished, by the same they in their need were benefited" (11:5). God's punishment is mild, "Wherewithal a man sinneth, by the same also shall he be punished" (11:16), as in the case of the Egyptians (11:15-12:2) and the Canaanites (12:3-11). God is particularly just and merciful in dealing with Israel (12:12-22). The heathen have disregarded God's minor warning afflictions, "therefore came extreme damnation upon them" (12:23-27).

(d) The folly of idolatry (13:1-15:19). The foolishness of paganism appears in the adoration of the phenomena of nature or of the heavenly bodies instead of their Creator (13:1-9); in the worship of idols (13:10-14:11); in the divinization of human beings, such as a young son after his death on the part of his father (14:12-16), or of an inaccessible living king on the part of his remote subjects (14:17-21; Euhemerus, who died ca. 290 B.C., had previously regarded the Greek gods as divinized rulers). Idolatry produces moral decay (14:22-31; cf. Rom. 1:19-32), while knowledge of the true God keeps Israel from gross sins (15:1-5). Makers and worshipers of idols are guilty, notably the potter who makes cheap reproductions of expensive idols (15:6-14), and the Egyptians who, besides foreign images (15:15-17), worship the most horrible beasts (15:18-19; cf. 11:15; 12:24).

(e) Contrasts between the Israelites and the Egyptians (16:1-19:22, concluding 11:2-14 after two intervening digressions; introduced by 11:15; 15:18-19). While the Egyptians were plagued by small beasts (frogs?), the Israelites enjoyed well-cooked quails in the desert (16:1-4). While the Egyptians were killed by locusts and flies, the Israelites were reminded of the observance of the Law by the bites of snakes (16:5-14; cf. Num. 21:6-9). While the Egyptians were vexed by terrific rain and hail and wondrous thunderbolts, God rained on the Israelites heavenly manna which tasted like every kind of delicious food (16:15-29). While total darkness and dreadful apparitions frightened the Egyptians (17:1-21), the Israelites enjoyed brilliant light in Egypt and were guided by the pillar of fire in the desert (18:1-4). While the Egyptians, determined to slay the Israelite infants, had their own firstborn slain and perished in the Red Sea, the Israelites in Egypt celebrated the Passover and in the desert were saved from the plague (18:5-25; cf. Num. 16:41-50). While the Egyptians drowned in the Red Sea, the Israelites crossed it safely (19:1-9). Thus does nature, under God's control, punish the wicked and reward the pious: the Egyptians were plagued while the Israelites were saved; the Sodomites were punished for being unfriendly to strangers; and miracles transformed the natural elements at the time of the Exodus (19:10-21). "For in all things, O Lord, thou didst magnify thy people" (19:22).

While it is clear that the various parts of the book present great differences in style and thought, it does not seem necessary to suppose, as some modern critics do, that part of the book was translated from the Hebrew, and part written in Greek; or that more than one author was responsible for the composition of separate parts. It seems preferable to follow Jerome and to regard the book as a unit entirely composed in Greek, for "the very style gives forth the aroma of Greek eloquence."

The author is a precursor of Philo of Alexandria (a contemporary of Paul) in combining the Jewish religion with Greek philosophy. His knowledge of the teaching of Plato and the Stoics (echoed in 7:22, 24, 26-27; 8:7, 19-20; 9:15; 11:17; 14:3; 16:21; 17:2; 19:17) is however much more superficial than Philo's (on the Logos see 18:15-16; 16:12), and is derived more from dwelling in a Hellenistic center like Alexandria than from actual study of Greek philosophical texts.

It is particularly in the author's notions about eschatology that his attempt to amalgamate Jewish and Greek ideas is manifest, and that his originality and influence are perhaps the greatest. From the Hebrew Bible he derives: the hope of the messianic kingdom (3:8; without a Messiah); the doctrine of divine retribution of human deeds in this life, either for the nation (10:17-11:14; chs. 16-19) or the individual (10:1-16); the notion of the underworld or Sheol (called Hades, following the Septuagint), which the ungodly regarded as the eternal abode of all the dead (2:1; cf. 2:5), but which was exclusively reserved, in the author's opinion, for the wicked (16:13; 17:14); and the Lord's future onslaught against the heathen (5:17-23). Incongruously the author connects this Armageddon with the Last Judgment (cf. ch. 5). The Judgment, however, is not merely the prelude of the triumph of Israel over the Gentiles, as in Joel and in 5:17-23, but primarily a final verdict on individual Jews, pious or wicked (4:20-5:16).

The teaching about the retribution of individual Jews after death is more Greek than Hebrew. Logically—but (alas!) not generally— notions about the future life should be based on the ideas of the elements constituting a human being, as in Eccl. 12:7, which refers to Gen. 2:7. In attempting to combine this Hebrew notion of man (body and spirit, Gen. 2:7) with the Greek notion (body, soul, and spirit; cf. I Thess. 5:23), the author on the one hand asserted that man consists of a physical and a spiritual element (1:4; 2:3; 15:8), but on the other used indiscriminately the Greek terms pneuma, psychē, and nous (mind) which presupposed the Greek anthropology. Moreover, he recognized with Plato that the souls are pre-existent (8:20) and pressed down by the corruptible body (9:15). In principle souls are immortal (1:13; in 2:23 the Platonic notion is derived from Gen. 1:26-27!), and death came into the world through the envy of the devil: in 2:24, for the first time, the serpent of Gen. 3 is identified with Satan (as later in III Baruch 9:7; Rev. 20:2)—unless Satan merely used the serpent. This excludes the Pharisaic doctrine of bodily resurrection (cf. Dan. 12:2), which was absurd in the eyes of the Greeks (Acts 17:32)—at least for the pious. The soul's return some time after death into the "earthly tabernacle" (9:15; cf. II Cor. 5:1, 4; the figure is common in Greek writings) would have been the worst of punishments. On the contrary, "the souls of the righteous" (3:1) without their bodies abide with God after death (3:9). Of course there is no way of reconciling logically (as the author attempts to do in chs. 1-5) the Jewish doctrine of the Last Judgment with the Greek idea that souls are rewarded or punished immediately after death. This inconsistency concerning the end of this life corresponds to an inconsistency about the beginning of this world. If the world (13:1-5), man's soul (2:23), and wisdom (i.e., the cosmic soul [7:26]), were created in the image of God, whence come evil and death? Either, according to Judaism, they are the result of the envy of the devil (2:24), or, according to Plato, of the base and corruptible quality of matter (9:15).

The author is particularly effective in describing the opposite fates of the righteous and of the wicked after their death. The following passages are among the most beautiful in the Apocrypha:

But the souls of the righteous are in the hand of God, and there shall no torment touch them. In the sight of the unwise they seemed to die: and their departure is taken for misery, and their going from us to be utter destruction: but they are in peace. For though they be punished in the sight of men, yet is their hope full of immortality. And having been a little chastised, they shall be greatly rewarded: for God proved them, and found them worthy of himself. As gold in the furnace hath he tried them, and received them as a burnt offering. And in the time of their visitation they shall shine, and run to and fro like sparks among the stubble. They shall judge the nations, and have dominion over the people, and their Lord shall reign forever (3:1-8).

We wearied ourselves in the way of wickedness and destruction: yea, we have gone through deserts, where there lay no way: but as for the way of the Lord, we have not known it. What hath pride profited us? or what good hath riches with our vaunting brought us? All those things are passed away like a shadow, and as a post that hasteth by; and as a ship that passeth over the waves of the water, which when it is gone by, the trace thereof cannot be found, neither the pathway of the keel in the waves; or as when a bird hath flown through the air, there is no token of her way to be found, but the light air being beaten with the stroke of her wings, and parted with the violent noise and motion of them, is passed through, and therein afterwards no sign where she went is to be found; or like as when an arrow is shot at a mark, it parteth the air, which immediately cometh together again, so that a man cannot know where it went through: even so we in like manner, as soon as we were born, began to draw to our end, and had no sign of virtue to shew; but were consumed in our own wickedness. For the hope of the ungodly is like dust that is blown away with the wind; like a thin froth that is driven away with the storm, like as the smoke which is dispersed here and there with a tempest, and passeth away as the remembrance of a guest that tarrieth but a day. But the righteous live for evermore; their reward also is with the Lord, and the care of them is with the most High. Therefore shall they receive a glorious kingdom, and a beautiful crown from the Lord's hand: for with his right hand shall he cover them, and with his arm shall he protect them (5:7-16).

The Wisdom of Solomon, one of the earliest extant witnesses to Hellenistic Judaism, did not exert a lasting influence on Judaism; but it is one of the sources of the Greek (and especially Platonic) strain in Christian theology, which begins with Paul and the Epistle to the Hebrews.

G. The Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus).—Aside from the prophetic books and Nehemiah, Ecclesiasticus is the only book in the Septuagint whose real author is named (50:27). Jesus the son of Sirach had a school in Jerusalem (51:23, 29, Hebrew text). He was one of the early scribes (cf. 38:24-39:11). About 180 B.C. he turned his classroom lectures into Hebrew verse and collected them in two books (chs. 1-23 and 24-50). Almost two thirds of the original Hebrew text have been published from manuscripts of the eleventh and twelfth centuries, found in a genizah (storage room for worn-out books) at Old Cairo in Egypt in 1896 and the following years. Although some scholars have suggested that this Hebrew text is a translation from the Syriac or Greek, its authenticity is generally admitted in spite of its many textual errors. The Hebrew book was translated into Greek soon after 132 B.C. by a grandson of the author, who wrote a prologue to the Greek version (the second prologue in the English version). The only other version made from the Hebrew is the Syriac. These three basic texts (from which all other versions are derived) differ occasionally in a very drastic way; none of them reproduces in all details the original Hebrew text, which as early as 132 must have been circulating in several recensions.

In general, Ecclesiasticus resembles the book of Proverbs, although longer sections are more numerous in it. The chief topics treated by Ben Sirach are the following:

(a) Part I (1:1-23:27). Introduction (1:1-30). Wisdom comes from God (1:1-10) and is identical with the fear of the Lord (1:11-21). Wisdom is attained through self-control (1:22-25) and obedience to God's commandments (1:26-30).

(i) On patience in affliction (2:1-18), respect for parents (3:1-16), humility (3:17-31), and courtesy in helping the poor (4:1-10).

(ii) On wisdom's tests and rewards (4:11-19), false shame (4:20-28), arrogance (4:29-30), cupidity (4:31-5:8), wrong talk (5:9-6:4), friendship (6:5-17).

(iii) On the search after wisdom (6:18-37). "Do no evil" of any sort (7:1-17), but be just and kind with all (7:18-34); avoid association with certain people (8:1-4), but be considerate and sympathetic (8:5-7).

(iv) On discrimination in social intercourse (8:8-9:16).

(v) Advice for rulers and men of wealth (9:17-14:19).

(vi) The blessing of wisdom (14:20-15:10). God is not responsible for human sin (15:11-20). On godlessness and its disastrous results (16:1-10). On God's just rule (16:11-23); and on his creation of the world (16:24-30) and of man (17:1-24). A psalm on divine mercy and forgiveness (17:25-18:14).

(vii) Miscellaneous counsel on kindness (18:15-18), on foresight (18:19-29), and self-control (18:30-20:26).

(viii) Contrast between the wise and the fool (20:27-22:18). On sins of speech and of lust (22:19-23:27).

(b) Part II (24:1-50:29). Introduction (24:1-34). Wisdom personified introduces herself (24:1-22), and is identified by the author with the Pentateuch (24:23-29), from which he has drawn so much instruction that, since it overflowed the first volume (1:1-23:27), he has prepared a second (24:30-34).

(i) A contrast between good and bad wives (25:1-26:27).

(ii) On the risks and sins besetting men of wealth and prominence (26:28-27:10); on the various kinds of sins of the tongue (27:11-28:26); on financial assistance to neighbors (29:1-20); on the vexations of travel abroad: "it is a miserable life to go from house to house" (29:21-28).

(iii) On strict discipline in bringing up children (30:1-13). Health is better than wealth (30:14-31:2);⁸ the worship of mammon (so the Hebrew text in 31:8; cf. Matt. 6:24; Luke 16:9, 11, 13) is fatal to the soul (31:3-11). On table manners, moderation in drinking, and the correct behavior of dinner guests (31:12-32:13).

(iv) On good and bad teachers (32:14-33:6). God has exalted some men (Israel) and debased others (33:7-15). The author has labored for all those that seek learning (33:16-18).

(v) On the authority of the head of the family (33:19-31); on true and false dreams (34:1-8). Practical experience and travel increase wisdom, as the author can testify (34:9-17). True piety does not consist in ritual acts, but in righteousness and mercy (34:18-35:3), although offerings must be presented in obedience to the law (35:4-11), remembering however that God cannot be bribed through offerings obtained dishonestly (35:12-20). A psalm of petition in behalf of Israel's deliverance from foreign oppressors (36:1-17).

(vi) On helpful persons: the wife (36:18-26), the friend (37:1-6), the counselor (37:7-18), the wise (37:19-26), the physician (37:27-38:15). On moderation in mourning (38:16-23).

(vii) On the value of a good education and on the unsurpassed position of the scribe (or scholar) in the community (38:24-39:15). A hymn to God the creator (39:16-35).

(viii) Suffering and death are the lot of all men, but there are compensations for the pious (40:1-41:13).

(ix) Concealed wisdom is useless (41:14-15; identical with 20:30-31). "Instruction Concerning Shame," as the Hebrew heading reads (41:16-42:8). Daughters occasion much worry to their fathers (42:9-14).

(x) A hymn praising God for the magnificence of his creation (42:15-43:33); "Praise of the Fathers of Old" (Hebrew title) or "Hymn of the Fathers" (Greek title), extolling biblical characters from Adam to Nehemiah (44:1-49:16; cf. Heb. 11); praise of the high priest Simon (50:1-24). Three hateful peoples: Edomites, Philistines, and Samaritans (50:25-26). Colophon (50:27-29).

(c) Appendix. A hymn praising God for his help in trouble (51:1-12); a liturgy with the refrain, "Give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good; for his mercy endureth forever" (in the Hebrew, after 51:12; cf. Ps. 136); alphabetic acrostic poem on how the author gained and passes on wisdom (51:13-30). Final doxology and colophon (in the Hebrew and Syriac only, following 51:30).

In depicting the ideal scribe (38:24-39:11) Sirach has given us an insight into his varied experiences and into his life's goal. He summed up what he sought and what he taught in one word, wisdom, the summum bonum which combined practical matters (ranging all the way from etiquette to ethical and religious standards of conduct ordained in the law of Moses), as also learned research in the Scriptures and in the sciences.

Sirach occasionally stressed the national aspects of Judaism, notably the temple services (50:4-24)—for there is only a vague allusion to the synagogue service (39:6)—as a reaction against the tendency of the aristocracy in Jerusalem to adopt Greek manners and customs. But he believed that sacrifices and offerings should be presented merely because the law prescribed them (35:4-5), and, like Amos, he condemned offerings unaccompanied by honesty and mercy for the poor (34:18-26). Religion consists in observing the law, almsgiving, and avoiding wickedness: these practices are the equivalent of sacrifices and offerings (35:1-3). Sirach's ideas on personal piety are inspired by the Prophets and by the Psalms (stressing morals and prayer), but also by the Pentateuch (stressing righteousness, or obedience to God's law). He was convinced that God rewarded piety on this earth (for he still believed that at death men's ghosts gathered in Sheol: 14:16; 17:27-28; 41:4); but in view of the misery of many pious people he concluded that the highest rewards were of the spirit, such as communion with God (2:7-11; 34:13-17), and, after death, continued remembrance (44:8, 13-15).

⁸ On account of the accidental transposition of two leaves in the prototype from which the Greek version and translations thereof (except the Old Slav) were made, in Greek manuscripts (and most printed editions of the LXX) the section 30:25-33:16a (33:13b-36:16a in the Greek) follows 33:16b-36:13a (Greek: 30:25-33:13a).

The most original and interesting parts of Ecclesiasticus deal with practical matters: observations on human life and counsels for attaining happiness and success. Man's life is a mixture of woes and joys. Sirach is both a pessimist and an optimist. Man is endowed with freedom of choice (15:11-20), but what happens to him is determined inexorably by God (11:2-28; 18:6; 42:21). Men were created in God's image (17:3), but all are sinful (8:5; 17:31-32) since Eve's fall (25:24); all are dust (33:10) and return thereto (17:1). Notably vivid are Sirach's sketches of family life (educating sons, worrying about daughters, good and bad wives and servants); and his reflections about social intercourse with friends (good and bad), dinner parties, conversation (as in James, much attention is given to the sins of the tongue), professional activities, the advantages and dangers of wealth and poverty, and the like. It is in dealing with these subjects that Sirach is at his best as a writer and pens his wittiest and most striking aphorisms, such as the following:

Water will quench a flaming fire;
And alms maketh an atonement for sins (3:30).

Let not thine hand be stretched out to receive,
And shut when thou shouldest repay (4:31).

Be in peace with many;
Nevertheless have but one counsellor of a thousand (6:6).

Strive not with a man that is full of tongue,
And heap not wood upon his fire (8:3).

A new friend is as new wine;
When it is old, thou shalt drink it with pleasure (9:10b).

As the wild ass is the lion's prey in the wilderness:
So the rich eat up the poor (13:19).

Like a drop of water in the sea or a grain of sand,
So are [man's] years in eternal time (18:10, Hebrew).

As the climbing up a sandy way is to the feet of the aged,
So is a wife full of words to a quiet man (25:20).

The stroke of the whip maketh marks in the flesh:
But the stroke of the tongue breaketh the bones (28:17).

Better is the life of a poor man in a mean cottage,
Than delicate fare in another man's house (29:22).

Where no hedge is, there the possession is spoiled:
And he that hath no wife will wander up and down mourning (36:25).

Neither consult with a woman touching her of whom she is jealous:
Neither with a coward in matters of war (37:11).

All that are of the earth shall turn to earth again:
So the ungodly shall go from a curse to destruction (41:10).

A good life hath but few days:
But a good name endureth forever (41:13).

The longer sections which follow illustrate the more profound views of Sirach concerning God, and man's right attitude toward his Maker:

For the Lord is full of compassion and mercy, long-suffering, and very pitiful, and forgiveth sins, and saveth in time of affliction. Woe be to fearful hearts, and faint hands, and the sinner that goeth two ways! Woe unto him that is fainthearted! for he believeth not; therefore shall he not be defended. Woe unto you that have lost patience! and what will ye do when the Lord shall visit you? (2:11-14.)

Say not thou, It is through the Lord that I fell away: for thou oughtest not to do the things that he hateth. Say not thou, He hath caused me to err: for he hath no need of the sinful man. The Lord hateth all abomination and they that fear God love it not. He himself made man from the beginning, and left him in the hand of his counsel; if thou wilt, thou canst keep the commandments and perform acceptable faithfulness. He hath set fire and water before thee: stretch forth thy hand unto whether thou wilt. Before man is life and death; and whether him liketh shall be given him. For the wisdom of the Lord is great, and he is mighty in power, and beholdeth all things: and his eyes are upon them that fear him, and he knoweth every work of man. He hath commanded no man to do wickedly, neither hath he given any man licence to sin (15:11-20).

The number of a man's days at the most are an hundred years. As a drop of water unto the sea, and a gravelstone in comparison of the sand; so are a thousand years to the days of eternity. Therefore is God patient with them, and poureth forth his mercy upon them. He saw and perceived their end to be evil; therefore he multiplied his compassion. The mercy of man is toward his neighbour; but the mercy of the Lord is upon all flesh: he reproveth, and nurtureth, and teacheth, and bringeth again, as a shepherd his flock (18:9-13).

The most High is not pleased with the offerings of the wicked; neither is he pacified for sin by the multitude of sacrifices. Whoso bringeth an offering of the goods of the poor doeth as one that killeth the son before his father's eyes. The bread of the needy is their life: he that defraudeth him thereof is a man of blood. He that taketh away his neighbour's living slayeth him and he that defraudeth the labourer of his hire is a bloodshedder (34:19-22).

H. Baruch.—Of several books attributed to Jeremiah's secretary, Baruch son of Neriah, this one alone was included in the Septuagint and in the Vulgate. In the King James Version (following the Vulgate) the Epistle of Jeremy is attached to it as the sixth chapter. The book, though brief, is generally attributed to more than one author: one writer composed 1:1-3:8 in prose; one or two other writers are held responsible for the two poetic sections, 3:9-4:4 and 4:5-5:9. We may summarize Baruch (sometimes referred to as "I Baruch") as follows:

(a) Repentance after the fall of Jerusalem (1:1-3:8). Baruch is said to have written and publicly read the book in Babylonia, in the fifth year (after 586?); his audience fasted and prayed, and sent a collection to Joakim, the high priest in Jerusalem (1:1-7), together with silver temple vessels (1:8-9). The priests should pray for Nebuchadrezzar and his son (an error reproduced from Dan. 5:2, 13, 18, 22) Balthasar (i.e., Belshazzar son of Nabonidus) for the benefit of the exiles (1:10-12); they should also pray for the forgiveness of the exiles (1:13) and read Baruch's book on feast days (1:14).

The Jewish community in Jerusalem confesses its sins since the Exodus, notably the service of other gods, which have brought upon it the threats of Deut. 28:15-68; nevertheless, the Jews have not observed the Lord's commandments (1:15-2:10). The exiles implore the divine mercy on Israel (2:11-13) for the sake of his honor (2:14-19). Despite God's warnings, Judah rebelled against Nebuchadrezzar and was savagely punished (2:20-26). In accordance with Deut. 28:62 the Lord exiled his stiff-necked people, but in their captivity they will repent and will be brought back to Zion (2:27-35). Praying for their salvation, the exiles beg for divine mercy because, having repented, they are now punished for the sins of their fathers (3:1-8).

(b) A poem on wisdom (3:9-4:4). "Hear, Israel, the commandments of life: give ear to understand wisdom" (3:9), for Israel was exiled for failing to do so (3:10-12). Life and peace are with wisdom (3:13-14), which neither ancient and modern kings, nor the sages of Edom were able to find (3:15-23). In God's immense house, the universe (3:24-25), primeval giants "were destroyed because they had no wisdom" (3:26-28). God alone has found wisdom, and he gave it to Israel (3:29-37): it is the law of Moses (4:1), in whose light Israel should walk (4:2-4).

(c) "Be of good cheer, my people" (4:5-5:9; cf. Isa. 40-55). Jerusalem in her desolation weeps (4:5-8) over her children in Judea (4:9-16) and in exile (4:17-20). Before long the Lord will bring back the exiles (4:21-26), who should now seek their God (4:27-29).

Babylon's "pride shall be turned into mourning" (4:30-34). "O Jerusalem, . . . Lo, thy sons come, whom thou sentest away" (4:35-36). "Put off, O Jerusalem, the garment of thy mourning" (5:1), for thou shalt be called "The peace of righteousness" (5:2-4). Stand on the mountain to behold thy returning children (5:5) brought back by God (5:6-9).

Few, if any, Protestant critics would now attribute the book, or any of its parts, to Baruch, the secretary of Jeremiah. Neither of them, as far as we know, ever was in Babylonia (as 1:1 and some Jewish writings assert; in the Septuagint, for instance, Ps. 137 is attributed to Jeremiah). The book is considerably later than "the Exile." The first part (1:1-3:8) may date from 150-100 B.C. and was obviously written in Hebrew (as the extant Greek version clearly indicates).

The poem on wisdom (3:9-4:4) discloses echoes of Jer. 49:7; Obad. 8; Job 28; Prov. 8 (all passages of uncertain date) and like Ecclus. 24, identifies wisdom with the law of Moses; Wisd. Sol. 7:1-8:1 was however unknown to the author. We may therefore infer that this poem was composed in the period 180-100 B.C., possibly to counteract the heresies of Ecclesiastes; the Palestinian character of the teaching indicates that its author wrote it in Hebrew (hardly in Aramaic).

Another poet wrote 4:5-5:9 in order to counteract the despairing mood of 1:1-3:8, drawing his inspiration from the Second Isaiah (and also from Isa. 56-66). This passage was likewise originally penned in Hebrew, presumably about 100 B.C., although some critics have detected in it the aftermath of the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus in A.D. 70.

The religious teaching of the poem on wisdom (3:9-4:4) differs from that of the rest of the book, although the presumably secondary introduction (3:9-13) and conclusion (4:2-4) strive to harmonize this poem with the rest of the book, and with the destruction of Jerusalem in 586. Here God is primarily the universal creator, whose attribute is wisdom (not justice and mercy, as elsewhere in the book). Wisdom is conceived as the mysterious plan of creation (cf. Job 28), as the counselor of man (as in Prov. 8), and as the law of Moses (cf. Ecclus. 24):

Who hath gone up into heaven, and taken her [Wisdom], and brought her down from the clouds? Who hath gone over the sea, and found her, and will bring her for pure gold? No man knoweth her way, nor thinketh of her path. But he that knoweth all things knoweth her, and hath found her out with his understanding: he that prepared the earth for evermore hath filled it with fourfooted beasts: he that sendeth forth light, and it goeth, calleth it again, and it obeyeth him with fear. The stars shined in their watches, and rejoiced: when he calleth them, they say, Here we be; and so with cheerfulness they shewed light unto him that made them. This is our God, and there shall none other be accounted of in comparison of him. He hath found out all the way of knowledge, and hath given it unto Jacob his servant, and to Israel his beloved (3:29-36).

The rest of the book pictures the Lord's people in exile and in misery on account of its rebellion against its God, imploring divine forgiveness and salvation, not on account of Israel's merits, but to safeguard God's covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (2:34), and his honor among the Gentiles (2:14; 3:5). The usual messianic and eschatological comforts for the despairing Jews (the Messiah and his kingdom, the resurrection, etc.) are entirely lacking; the two future blessings are those promised by the Second Isaiah: the return of the exiles, and the destruction of Babylon.

J. The Epistle of Jeremy.—This little tract against idolatry is found in the Vulgate and in the King James Version as ch. 6 of Baruch. It is said to be (vs. 1) a copy of Jeremiah's epistle to the exiles (cf. Jer. 29). During seven generations or about 280 years (not seventy years, Jer. 25:11; 29:10; nor seventy weeks of years, Dan. 9:2, 24-27) the exiles will remain in Babylonia: in those days they must refrain from worshipping Babylonian idols (vss. 2-7). The sarcastic attack on the folly of idolatry (vss. 8-73) following this introduction may be summarized thus:

Ornaments do not save idols from rust, moths, and dust (vss. 8-14); scepters and swords do not turn them into living judges and warriors (vss. 15-16). Insensitive to dust in the eyes, helpless against thieves, idols cannot see the lamps that illuminate them; they cannot prevent worms from devouring them, nor smoke from blackening them, nor animals from alighting on them (vss. 17-23); they are inactive, must be shined, were once molten into shape and felt nothing, have no breath, and cannot move by themselves; offerings placed before them benefit only the priests (vss. 24-29). Even priestesses minister in temples, as also priests in mourning garb moaning as in a funeral; priests take the idols' garments; idols cannot reward nor punish, crown nor set aside a king, grant wealth, demand payment of a vow, save a life, protect the oppressed, restore human sight, help the needy (vss. 30-40a). Chaldeans deal disrespectfully with idols; the dumb are brought before Bel (Marduk), as if he could make them talk; women wait by the road to be seduced by men passing by (vss. 40b-44; cf. Herodotus History I. 199). Being the work of men's hands, fashioned in accordance with a sculptor's whim, they perish with their makers; in time of war they must be hidden (vss. 45-52). Being helpless, idols cannot produce rain, judge, redress wrongs, save themselves in a fire or in a battle (vss. 53-56). They are useless: they are less capable than a king, less useful than a vessel, a door, a pillar, less impressive than heavenly bodies and atmospheric phenomena, less alive than beasts (vss. 57-69). Idols are like a scarecrow, a thorn, a corpse; not being gods, they will rot away, bringing shame to their country; therefore the righteous, having no idols, will not be put to shame (vss. 70-73).

This polemic tract, denouncing heathen religions after the sarcastic manner of Isa. 40:18-20; 44:9-20; Jer. 10:2-5, 9, 14-15; etc. neither is an epistle, nor was it written by Jeremiah (as Jerome recognized). Composed as a warning of Jeremiah to the Babylonian exiles, it is really an attack against paganism, penned originally in Aramaic, although only a Greek version is extant, in the Hellenistic period (presumably 300-100 B.C.) to strengthen the faith of the Jews and their horror for paganism. Beholding the multitudes worshipping idols, the Jews should say in their hearts, "O Lord, we must worship thee [alone]" (vss. 5-6). The author wished perhaps to convey this message to the Gentiles even more than to the Jews.

K. The Song of the Three Holy Children.—The superscription in the King James Version reads as follows: "The Song of the Three Holy Children, which followeth in the third Chapter of DANIEL after this place,—fell down bound into the midst of the burning fiery furnace,—verse 23. That which followeth is not in the Hebrew, to wit,—And they walked—unto these words,—Then Nebuchadnezzar,—verse 24."

This is the first of the additions to Daniel in the Septuagint and the Vulgate. All of them have come down to us in two Greek recensions: the Septuagint text (in the Codex Chisianus alone), and Theodotion's revision of the Septuagint, which became standard in the Christian Bibles (Greek, Latin, Syriac, Coptic, Ethiopic, Arabic, Armenian, King James Version, English Revised Version, etc.). The other additions to

Daniel are the stories of Susanna, Bel and the Dragon. The Song of the Three Children comprises three parts, summarized as follows:

(a) The Prayer of Azarias (vss. 1-22; LXX and Vulg.=Dan. 3:24-45). Ananias, Misael, and Azarias praised God in the fiery furnace, and Azarias offered the following prayer (vss. 1-2). Even when the Lord brought calamity on the Jews by destroying Jerusalem, he was just (vss. 3-10); but for his name's sake, and on account of his covenant and his love for the patriarchs, he should not annihilate his people (vss. 11-13). Having no state and temple like other nations, the Jews beg God for deliverance (vss. 14-22).

(b) The heating of the fiery furnace (vss. 23-28; LXX and Vulg.=Dan. 3:46-51). The abundance of fuel sent the flames forty-nine cubits above the furnace and destroyed the Chaldeans near it (vss. 23-25). An angel removed the flames from inside the furnace, substituting a cooling breeze; * so the three youths were unharmed (vss. 26-27) and sang the following hymn (vs. 28):

(c) The Song of the Three Children (vss. 29-68; LXX and Vulg.=Dan. 3:52-90). "Blessed art thou, O Lord God of our fathers: and to be praised and exalted above all for ever" (vss. 29-34). All creation should bless the Lord, notably the heavens and their contents, the earth with what is on it—inanimate things, animals, mankind, and primarily Israel (vss. 35-65, the Benedicite [Bless ye!] of the Prayer Book). Ananias, Azarias, and Misael should bless the Lord, as also all pious Jews (vss. 66-68).

Azarias (vss. 1-22) did not request his deliverance from the fiery furnace—the three youths had already been saved from the flames—but (like Baruch 1:15-3:1-8, which our author may have known) he confessed Israel's sins and begged God's forgiveness. Like the Song of the Three Children, the Prayer of Azarias was written in Hebrew, the language of hymns and prayers. Like the rest of Dan. 3, the narrative section (vss. 23-28) was presumably in Aramaic, and may well have been written by the editor who inserted the two poems in Dan. 3, adding an introductory verse to each (vss. 2, 28), and the conclusion of the second (vss. 66-68), in order to adapt these poems to the story of the fiery furnace. The poems could very well have been quoted from an anthology or a hymnal (as I Sam. 2:1-10; Isa. 38:9-20; Jonah 2:1-9). These texts were added to Daniel soon after it was written in 164 B.C., and before the so-called Septuagint version of Daniel was made. These two poems, Susanna, Bel and the Dragon, were therefore composed in Hebrew and translated into Greek ("Septuagint" text) between 160 and 100 B.C.

The second poem is a liturgy in praise of God like Ps. 148 (cf. Ps. 150), in which the second half of the line is an identical refrain: "and to be praised and exalted above all for ever" (vss. 29-34); "praise and exalt him above all for ever" (vss. 35-65); a similar repetition of a refrain occurs in Ps. 136 ("for his mercy endureth for ever"). In antiphonal singing the congregation may have sung the refrain. The similarity between this song and Ps. 148 is such that one hymn was probably derived from the other (our song, being much longer, may be the later one of the two), and both may have been inspired by Ecclus. 43. Although the Benedicite is thus far from original, it achieved a place in Christian liturgy.

Blessed art thou, O Lord God of our fathers: thy name is worthy to be praised and glorified for evermore: for thou art righteous in all the things that thou hast done to us: yea, true are all thy works, thy ways are right, and all thy judgments truth. In all the things that thou hast brought upon us, and upon the holy city of our fathers, even Jerusalem, thou hast executed true judgment: for according to truth and judgment didst thou bring all these things upon us because of our sins (vss. 3-5).

And now we follow thee with all our heart, we fear thee, and seek thy face. Put us not to shame: but deal with us after thy lovingkindness, and according to the multitude of thy mercies (vss. 18-19).

Blessed art thou, O Lord God of our fathers: and to be praised and exalted above all for ever. And blessed is thy glorious and holy name: and to be praised and exalted above all for ever (vss. 29-30).

O all ye works of the Lord, bless ye the Lord: praise and exalt him above all for ever (vs. 35).

L. Susanna.—This short story—fictitious, of course—is one of the earliest detective stories known (cf. the following story of Bel), although much later than the other one in I Kings 3:16-27. The superscription in the King James Version reads, "The History of Susanna, Set apart from the beginning of Daniel, because it is not in the Hebrew, as neither the Narration of Bel and the Dragon." The following summary (like those of Bel and the Dragon) is based on the Greek text of Theodotion, the Vulgate, and the King James Version (as also the English Revised Version and E. J. Goodspeed, Apocrypha); but the text of the Septuagint, which differs from Theodotion here and there, is older and better (parallel English versions of the Septuagint and of Theodotion are printed in R. H. Charles, Apocrypha). Susanna is placed at the beginning of Daniel in the Septuagint and appears as Dan. 13 in the Vulgate.

Susanna was the beautiful and pious wife of Joakim, a wealthy Babylonian Jew (vss. 1-3). Among the visitors to their home, which was surrounded by a park, were two aged judges, of whom the Scriptures (cf. Jer. 29:21-23?) spoke saying "that wickedness came from Babylon from ancient judges" (vss. 4-6). They saw Susanna walking in her park and they became inflamed for her (vss. 7-9). They hid their passion from each other (vss. 10-12), but one day they returned separately in secret and thus discovered one another's infatuation (vss. 13-14). One day while they were hidden in the park Susanna prepared to bathe in the garden pool (vss. 15-17). The elders demanded that she lie with them or they would accuse her of adultery with a young man (vss. 18-21); but she preferred a false accusation to sin (vss. 22-23), and shouted for help; the elders charged her with adultery when servants came from the house (vss. 24-27). On the following day, in the presence of the visitors in Joakim's house, the elders asserted that they had surprised Susanna with a young man who escaped (vss. 28-40). The assembly condemned Susanna to death (vs. 41), but God heard Susanna's appeal (vss. 42-44). While Susanna was being led to execution, Daniel was inspired by God and accused the elders of false testimony (vss. 45-49). In the new trial Daniel questioned the elders separately (vss. 50-51): the first declared that Susanna had committed adultery under a mastic tree (vss. 52-55), while the second said it was a holm oak (vss. 56-59).¹⁰ In accordance with Deut. 19:18-19 (which, in 105-79 B.C., the Pharisees interpreted as requiring the death sentence for false witnesses, even if the defendant was still alive), the two elders were executed (vss. 60-62). Susanna's family praised God (vs. 63), while the people praised Daniel (vs. 64).

The tale of Susanna (the name means "lily" in Hebrew) may well have been pagan in origin and have been rewritten by a Jew to glorify the prophet Daniel. Two folkloric motifs are combined in its plot: the "Genoveva" motif of a chaste wife accused by a rejected suitor; and the motif of the young judge or friend who delivers a person falsely accused from death. The motif of trees giving testimony in trials is known in Oriental fiction. By adding the Jewish background and religious teaching (which is similar to that in Tobit and Judith), and by slight retouching, an editor changed a detective tale into an edifying instance of God's vindication of innocence falsely accused, and gave us the proverbial figure of "a Daniel come to judgment," "a second Daniel."¹¹

The religious lesson of the book is expressed in the following verses:

Then Susanna cried out with a loud voice, and said, O everlasting God, that knowest the secrets, and knowest all things before they be: thou knowest that they have borne false witness against me, and, behold, I must die. . . . And the Lord heard her voice (vss. 42-44).

M. Bel and the Dragon.—These two stories are placed at the end of Daniel in the Septuagint and in the Vulgate (ch. 14, Vulg.). They not only exhibit Daniel's detective brilliance, as does the story of Susanna, but also ridicule Babylonian paganism. They may be summarized as follows, according to Theodotion's version (the text used in Christian Bibles):

(a) The Story of Bel (vss. 1-22). Cyrus followed Astyages on the throne and honored Daniel greatly (vss. 1-2). The Babylonians offered daily to the idol of Bel (Marduk) twelve measures of flour, forty sheep, and six vessels of wine (vs. 3). Daniel refused to worship Bel, a hand-made idol, and assured Cyrus that it never did eat or drink anything (vss. 4-7). The king summoned Bel's seventy priests: unless they proved that Bel consumed the food they would be put to death; but if they did so, Daniel would be executed (vss. 8-10). The priests had no fear when the king placed the food before Bel and sealed all the temple's doors, for they could enter through a trap door under the table (vss. 11-13). But on Daniel's instructions ashes had been secretly scattered over the floor of the temple (vs. 14). In the night the priests and their families came to eat the food (vs. 15), and in the morning the king praised Bel—for the seals were intact and the food was gone (vss. 16-18). But Daniel showed him the footprints in the ashes (vs. 19); the priests were forced to disclose the trap door and were slain with their families (vss. 20-21). Daniel destroyed the idol and the temple (vs. 22).

(b) The Story of the Dragon (vss. 23-42). When the king asked Daniel to worship the Babylonian dragon, which was alive and really ate, Daniel refused (vss. 23-25). He received permission to slay the dragon without sword or staff (vs. 26). The dragon burst asunder when he ate a concoction of pitch, fat, and hair which Daniel had prepared (vs. 27). The Babylonians accused the king of having become a Jew (vss. 28-29); Daniel was cast into the den of hungry lions (vss. 30-32). In Judea, Habakkuk was instructed by an angel to bring to Daniel the food intended for the reapers (vss. 33-34), and was carried to the lions' den by an angel (vss. 35-36). Daniel praised the Lord for this dinner, and Habakkuk was instantly brought back (vss. 37-39). On the seventh day the king found Daniel alive and, having praised God, cast Daniel's enemies to the lions (vss. 40-42).

Jerome called these two stories "fables," and few would regard them as history. Bel's story is a sample of Jewish polemic against idolatry (inaugurated by the Second Isaiah; cf. the Epistle of Jeremy, above) in narrative form. The great temple of Marduk (Bel), built by Nebuchadrezzar—one of the seven wonders of the ancient world—was found in ruins by Alexander (332 B.C.), and our author attributed its destruction to Daniel.

While the Bel story has thus a meager historical background, the Story of the Dragon is purely mythical, for no living dragon (and probably not even a living serpent) was ever worshiped by the Babylonians. The author may have been inspired by the Babylonian myth of Marduk's slaying of the dragon Tiamat (as Hermann Gunkel asserted), but if so, changed it entirely. Both tales, dating from 150-100 B.C., lack religious significance, and merely illustrate the popular Jewish literature of the time, which is almost completely lost.

N. The Prayer of Manasses.—This penitential psalm, composed with reference to II Chr. 33:11-13, is placed among the Odes or Cantica which follow the Psalms in some manuscripts of the Septuagint, and after the New Testament in the printed editions of the Vulgate (late manuscripts of the Vulgate place it after II Chronicles). In brief, its contents are as follows:

The almighty Creator in his infinite mercy has appointed repentance for sinners like Manasses, not for the righteous. Having committed numberless transgressions, the King is bound in fetters, oppressed by his sins, and he humbly confesses them, begging for forgiveness. After God in his mercy has saved him—unworthy as he is—he will praise the Lord as long as he lives; for, as the angels proclaim, his is the glory forever.

Although there is no reference to this prayer before the third century of our era, when its Syriac text is included in the Didascalia, there is no reason for regarding it as a Christian work, nor for doubting that it was composed in Hebrew, shortly before the beginning of our era, and accidentally escaped oblivion.

As is usually the case in Babylonian penitential psalms, both the awareness of sin and the agonizing cry for forgiveness result from sudden illness or other calamity: "I am bowed down with many iron bands, that I cannot lift up mine head, neither have I any release." Although Ps. 51 is on a higher spiritual level, the note of repentance rings true here also:

Now therefore I bow the knee of mine heart, beseeching thee of grace. I have sinned, O Lord, I have sinned, and I acknowledge mine iniquities: wherefore, I humbly beseech thee, forgive me, O Lord, forgive me, and destroy me not with mine iniquities.

O. I Maccabees.—Of the four books entitled "Maccabees"—from the title given to Judas Maccabaeus, usually interpreted as "the Hammerer"—the first is historically the most valuable, giving us the best account of Jewish history from 175 to 135 B.C. Its contents may be summarized as follows:

(a) Introduction. After the death of Alexander (323 B.C.), his empire was divided among his successors (1:5-9).

(b) The causes of the Maccabean rebellion (1:10-64). Early in the reign of Antiochus IV Epiphanes (175-164 B.C.), some Jews, eager to imitate the Greeks, built a gymnasium in Jerusalem and "submitted to uncircumcision" (1:10-15). After Antiochus returned from his victorious campaign in Egypt (171), he plundered the temple in Jerusalem (1:16-24). The Jews lamented and mourned (1:25-28, in verse). In 168, Antiochus sent a tax collector to Jerusalem; he plundered part of the city (1:29-32), and placed a garrison on Zion (1:33-36). New indignities were suffered by Jerusalem (1:37-40, in verse). Antiochus prescribed Greek cults for his subjects and forbade the practice of Judaism; but the faithful Jews went into hiding (1:41-53). On the twenty-fifth of Chislew (about December) of 168, the "abomination of desolation" (i.e., an altar dedicated to the Olympian Zeus) was placed upon the altar in Zion, books of the law were burned, circumcision was forbidden, and faithful Jews (Hasidim) were put to death (1:54-64).

(c) The beginnings of the Maccabean rebellion (2:1-70). Mattathias (the father of John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan; 2:1-5) lamented the pollution of the sanctuary (2:6-14; vss. 8-13 are in verse) and started the rebellion at Modin by slaying an apostate Jew and the king's officer (2:15-28). Some of the Hasidim refused to fight on the sabbath and were slaughtered (2:29-38). Mattathias and the Hasidim decided to fight defensively on the sabbath (2:39-41), and having collected an army proceeded to enforce the law of Moses (2:42-48). On his deathbed Mattathias urged his sons to observe the law and fight the heathen under the leadership of Judas (2:49-70).

(e) Judas' wars for religious liberty (3:10-4:61). Judas defeated and slew Apollonius (3:10-12), and forced the retreat of Seron (3:13-26). Antiochus Epiphanes went on a campaign in Persia, and placed Lysias in command (3:27-37). Judas defeated Gorgias (3:38-4:25) and Lysias (4:26-35). He then rededicated the desecrated temple on the twenty-fifth of Chislew, 165 B.C., which became an annual holiday (Hanukkah or Dedication, cf. Ps. 30 and John 10:22), and fortified Bethsura (4:36-61).

(f) Judas' wars against the pagan enemies of the Jews (5:1-68). Stirred by pogroms (5:1-2), Judas defeated the Idumeans (5:3), the "children of Bean" (5:4-5), and the Ammonites (5:6-8). Appeals for help came from Jews in Gilead and in Galilee (5:9-15). Judas sent Simon to Galilee, and went to Gilead with Jonathan (5:16-17); he instructed Joseph and Azarias, whom he left in charge of Judea, not to wage war (5:18-19). Simon brought the Galilean Jews to Judea (5:20-23). East of the Jordan, Judas reassured the Nabataeans (5:24-27), and after some victories slew Timotheus at Karnaim (5:28-44). On the way back he destroyed Ephron (5:45-51), and returned to Jerusalem by way of Bethshean (5:52-54). But meanwhile Joseph and Azarias (cf. 5:18-19) were routed by Gorgias when they attacked Jamnia, for they were not "of the seed of those [the Hasmonaeans], by whose hand deliverance was given unto Israel" (5:55-64). Judas fought successfully against Hebron in Idumea (5:65), was checked at Marisa (Samaria in KJV; 5:66-67), and destroyed the idols of Azotus (5:68).

(g) The death of Antiochus Epiphanes and the campaign of Lysias against the Jews (6:1-63). Ill after his failure to plunder a temple in Persia and after hearing of the success of Judas, Antiochus died after having appointed Philip as regent; but Lysias set up Antiochus V Eupator as king (6:1-17). When Judas besieged the Syrian garrison in the Acra on Zion (6:18-27), Lysias marched against him from the south, besieging Bethsura (6:28-31). Judas was defeated at Beth Zacharias (6:32-47), Bethsura fell (6:48-50), and the garrison in the temple was unable to resist (6:51-54). Lysias and Antiochus V signed a peace treaty with Judas, allowing the Jews full religious freedom (6:55-61), and defeated Philip (6:62-63; cf. 6:14).

(h) The wars against Demetrius I, and the death of Judas (7:1-9:22). Demetrius I Soter slew Lysias and Antiochus V in 161 (7:1-7), and sent Bacchides against Judas in order to support the Hellenists in Jerusalem, headed by Alkimus (7:8-20). Judas defeated Nicanor at Adasa, a victory celebrated annually on the thirteenth of Adar (7:21-50). Judas signed a treaty of friendship with Rome (8:1-32), but fell at Elasa (in 161), fighting against Bacchides (9:1-22).

(j) Jonathan and Bacchides (9:23-73). Acclaimed as the successor of his brother Judas (9:23-31), Jonathan withdrew east of the Jordan (9:32-34), where he met Arabian hostility (9:35-42). Defeated at the mouth of the Jordan by Bacchides (9:43-49), Jonathan, after the death of Alkimus (9:50-56), signed a peace treaty with Bacchides (9:57-73).

(k) Jonathan and Alexander Balas (10:1-11:19). Alexander Balas, a pretender, forced Demetrius I to make concessions to Jonathan (10:1-14), but gained the latter's support by appointing him high priest (10:15-21). In vain did Demetrius promise the Jews virtual independence (10:22-45): Jonathan luckily supported Balas (10:46-47), for Demetrius fell in battle (10:48-50). Jonathan attended the wedding of Balas with Cleopatra, the daughter of Ptolemy VI (10:51-66). Demetrius II Nicator sent Apollonius against Jonathan (10:67-73), but Jonathan defeated him at Azotus (10:74-89). But when Ptolemy VI allied himself with Demetrius II, Alexander Balas was doomed (11:1-19).

(l) Jonathan and Demetrius II (11:20-12:53). Demetrius, having become king, confirmed and increased the territory and authority of Jonathan (11:20-37). Jonathan helped Demetrius fight against Tryphon, who set up Antiochus VI, son of Balas, as king (11:38-51); but Demetrius failed to keep his promises to Jonathan (11:52-53). So Jonathan gave his support to Antiochus VI and Tryphon, fighting against the forces of Demetrius (11:54-74); he made alliances with the Romans and the Spartans (12:1-23), and continued his successful campaigns (12:24-38). But Tryphon deceitfully captured Jonathan (12:39-53).

(m) Simon's support of Demetrius II (13:1-14:3). Elected leader in place of Jonathan (13:1-11), Simon sent tribute and hostages to Tryphon for the liberation of Jonathan, but Tryphon attacked him, executed Jonathan (13:12-30), and made himself king (13:31-32). Demetrius II granted political independence to the Jews in 141 (13:33-42). Simon conquered Gazara (13:43-48) and the Acra on Zion (13:49-53). Demetrius, however, was captured by the Parthians (14:1-3).

(n) Simon's rule (14:4-49). Simon is praised in prose (14:4-5) and poetry (14:6-15). Romans and Spartans renewed their treaties with him (14:16-24; cf. ch. 8; 12:1-23; 15:15-24). On the eighteenth of Elul, 140 B.C., a grateful nation appointed Simon and his descendants as high priests and rulers in perpetuity (14:25-49).

(o) Simon and Antiochus VII Sidetes (15:1-16:24). Antiochus VII, brother of Demetrius II, confirmed Simon's authority (15:1-9), and in 138 besieged Tryphon in Dor (15:10-14). The Romans wrote to various rulers reaffirming their friendship for the Jews (15:15-24). Antiochus VII, not needing Simon's help, sent him an ultimatum imposing conditions that Simon refused (15:25-37). Cendebeus, on orders of Antiochus, attacked Simon, but was defeated (15:38-16:10). Together with two sons, Simon was assassinated by his son-in-law Ptolemy (16:11-18), but Simon's son John Hyrcanus escaped death (16:19-22) and succeeded his father: his deeds are recorded in the (lost) chronicles of his rule (16:23-24).

While I Maccabees deals with the period 175-135 B.C., II Maccabees begins one year earlier, but closes with the death of Nicanor in 161. There are however great differences in the treatment of the period 175-161, which they have in common, quite apart from the fact that I Maccabees was written in Hebrew, in a style patterned after Samuel and Kings, while II Maccabees was written in Greek and exhibits the ornate rhetorical style of romantic Hellenistic prose. The two books differ in contents (each having some exclusive material), in the order of the stories (the death of Antiochus IV in I Macc. 6:1-16 correctly follows the first campaign of Lysias in 4:26-35, but in II Macc. 9 precedes this campaign; see ch. 11), and in many details. The two books were written independently of one another. The first book on the whole is better history, but in some matters may be advantageously supplemented by the second. Many events are dated in I Maccabees (1:10, 20, 54; 2:70; 3:37; 4:52; etc.) in accordance with the Seleucid era, which in Palestine probably began in March-April, 311 B.C.

I Maccabees was certainly written after 135 B.C. (16:14) and, if 16:23-24 is genuine, soon after 104 B.C. (when John Hyrcanus died): presumably about 100 B.C. The author admired the Maccabean leaders, notably Judas and Simon, regarding them as God's instruments for the deliverance of Israel (5:62), which is not merely the nation but also God's holy congregation. Israel's enemies are God's enemies, and therefore doomed (7:41-42). The ideal Israelite is Mattathias, whose motto is, "Yet will I and my sons and my brethren walk in the covenant of our fathers. God forbid that we should forsake the law and the ordinances" (2:20-21). Although the author reverently avoids naming God (he uses the substitute "heaven"; cf. "the kingdom of heaven" in Matthew), he detects God's hand in the historical events, even the most tragic (1:64; 2:49), and in prayers and speeches from his pen expresses his indomitable faith in God's help for Israel in distress (2:19-22, 27, 34, 37; 3:18-22; 4:8-11, 30-33; 7:37-38, 40-42; 16:3). This faith may be shown in the following:

Then said Judas to the men that were with him, Fear ye not their multitude, neither be ye afraid of their assault. Remember how our fathers were delivered in the Red sea, when Pharaoh pursued them with an army. Now therefore let us cry unto heaven, if peradventure the Lord will have mercy upon us, and remember the covenant of our fathers, and destroy this host before our face this day: that so all the heathen may know that there is one who delivereth and saveth Israel (4:8-11).

P. II Maccabees.—According to II Macc. 2:23, this book is the summary of a history in five volumes written (in Greek) by Jason of Cyrene. All we know of the contents of this work is what the epitomist tells us in 2:19-22. In all probability the letters in 1:1-2:18 (translated from the Aramaic) were neither in the book of Jason nor in the first edition of II Maccabees (in which 2:19-32 and 15:37-39 were contributed by the epitomist). This book, written in Greek in Alexandria about 50 B.C., may be summarized as follows:

(a) Two letters to the Egyptian Jews (1:1-2:18). (i) The first letter (1:1-10a), allegedly written in 123 B.C. (1:10a). After the salutation (1:1-6), the Palestinian writers recall a letter written in 142 about the tribulation which began in Judea with the persecutions of Jason (cf. 4:7-22), and report that now the temple worship has been restored and the Egyptian Jews should therefore celebrate the feast of Dedication (1:7-9).

(ii) The second letter (1:10b-2:18). It was allegedly written in 164, before the rededication of the temple, to Aristobulus and the Egyptian Jews. Antiochus IV was killed in Persia (1:10b-17); the rededication is imminent and should be celebrated in Egypt (1:18a). When Nehemiah inaugurated anew the temple service, he searched for the sacred fire hidden by the priests of Jerusalem (1:18b-20a), and found a black liquid which the sun ignited (1:20b-22) so that the sacrifices were consumed while the priests prayed (1:23-30). Some of the liquid burned on stones (1:31-32). The place where the liquid was found was sanctified (1:33-35). Nehemiah called the liquid νεφθαρ (cleansing [?]), the people, νεφθα, that is, naphtha (1:36). Jeremiah not only had given instructions for hiding the sacred fire, but urged the exiles to keep the law which he gave them (2:1-3); he hid the tabernacle, the ark, and the altar of incense on Mount Nebo (2:4-5); they would remain concealed until "God gather his people again together" (2:6-8). As in the days of Moses, so when Solomon dedicated the temple, fire from heaven consumed the sacrifices (2:9-12). Nehemiah founded a library, and Judas collected books (2:13-15). Let the Egyptian Jews celebrate the dedication of the temple, for God has delivered the Jews and may soon gather them together again (2:16-18).

(b) The epitomist's preface (2:19-32). The five books of Jason of Cyrene have been condensed into one book for the general reader (2:19-32).

(c) Intrigues in the temple (3:1-4:50). Simon's accusations against Onias III under Seleucus IV (187-175 B.C.) brought Heliodorus to Jerusalem to seize the funds in the temple (3:1-21), but heavenly beings assailed him and almost killed him (3:22-40). When Onias went to Seleucus to exculpate himself (4:1-6), his brother Jason displaced him and became high priest (4:7-10), introducing Greek customs and institutions into Jerusalem (4:11-22). But Menelaus took Jason's place (4:23-26) and gained the favor of Andronicus (4:27-32), inducing him to kill Onias (4:33-38). The Jews protested in vain against the plunder of the temple (4:39-50).

(d) Antiochus Epiphanes persecutes the Jews (5:1-7:42). During the second Egyptian campaign of Antiochus (5:1-4), Jason occupied Jerusalem for a while (5:5-10). Antiochus plundered the temple, oppressed the Jews (5:11-27), and forbade the practice of Judaism on penalty of death (6:1-17). The aged Eleazar (6:18-31) and a mother with her seven sons (7:1-42) preferred to be tortured unto death rather than partake of swine's meat.

(e) The first victories of Judas Maccabaeus (8:1-36). With an army of six thousand Judas defeated Nicanor (8:1-29), and slew twenty thousand of the men of Timotheus and Bacchides (8:30-36).

(f) The death of Antiochus Epiphanes (9:1-29). After attempting to rob a temple in Persopolis, Antiochus was stricken in Ecbatana (9:1-10). He vowed to become a Jew (9:11-17), urged the Jews to be loyal to Antiochus V (9:18-27), and was buried in Antioch (9:28-29).

(g) The rededication of the temple (10:1-9). The temple was cleansed (10:1-5) and the feast of Dedication was celebrated (10:6-9).

(h) Judas' first victory over Lysias (10:10-11:38). After the appointment of Lysias (10:10-13), Judas attacked the Idumeans (10:14-23), routed Timotheus (10:24-38), and through his victory forced Lysias to offer favorable terms (11:1-15), stated in various official documents (11:16-33) and approved by the Romans (11:34-38).

(j) Various campaigns of Judas (12:1-45). Judas fought the heathen at Joppa (12:1-9), and the Arabs in its vicinity (12:10-12); he conquered Kaspis (12:13-16), Charax, Karnaim, and Ephron (12:17-28), but spared Bethshean (12:29-31). Gorgias was routed at Jamnia (12:32-37), where local idols were discovered on the corpses of wicked Jews (12:38-45).

(k) Judas' second victory over Lysias (13:1-26). Menelaus was executed (13:1-8). Judas attacked Lysias at Modin (13:9-17). Antiochus V was defeated at Bethsura and forced to accept the peace terms dictated by the Jews (13:18-26).

(l) Judas' victory over Nicanor (14:1-15:36). Demetrius I appointed Alkimus as high priest and Nicanor as governor (14:1-13). Nicanor made peace with Judas (14:16-25), but upon the accusations of Alkimus was ordered to send Judas to Antioch (14:26-30). In spite of his threats against the priests, Nicanor could not lay hands on Judas (14:31-36). Razis disemboweled himself to escape arrest (14:37-46). Nicanor was unable to attack Judas in Samaria on a sabbath (15:1-5). Judas encouraged his men by relating a dream (15:6-21), and after a prayer (15:22-25) defeated Nicanor, exhibiting his head on the citadel (15:26-35); then he proclaimed an annual festival on the day preceding Purim (15:36).

(m) Epilogue (15:37-39). Jerusalem was thus permanently freed from the heathen after Nicanor's death in 161 (15:37). To please his readers the epitomist has blended actual facts and fanciful style (15:38-39).

The temple is the focus of interest in II Maccabees (and presumably in the five lost books of Jason of Cyrene), while the congregation is of paramount significance in I Maccabees. The epitomist deals with his subject dramatically: the temple is desecrated or threatened twice—first by Antiochus Epiphanes, then by Nicanor—but is twice saved by God through Judas Maccabaeus (3:1-10:9; 10:10-15:36); an annual festival (Dedication, Day of Nicanor) is instituted to celebrate each deliverance. Thus the book's theme is expressed, with apt poetic justice, by Heliodorus who failed to desecrate the temple: "He that dwelleth in heaven hath his eye on that place [the temple], and defendeth it; and he beateth and destroyeth them that come to hurt it [like Heliodorus, Epiphanes, and Nicanor]" (3:39). The actual desecration by Epiphanes receives theological explanations (5:17-20; 6:12-17; 7:18, 32-33).

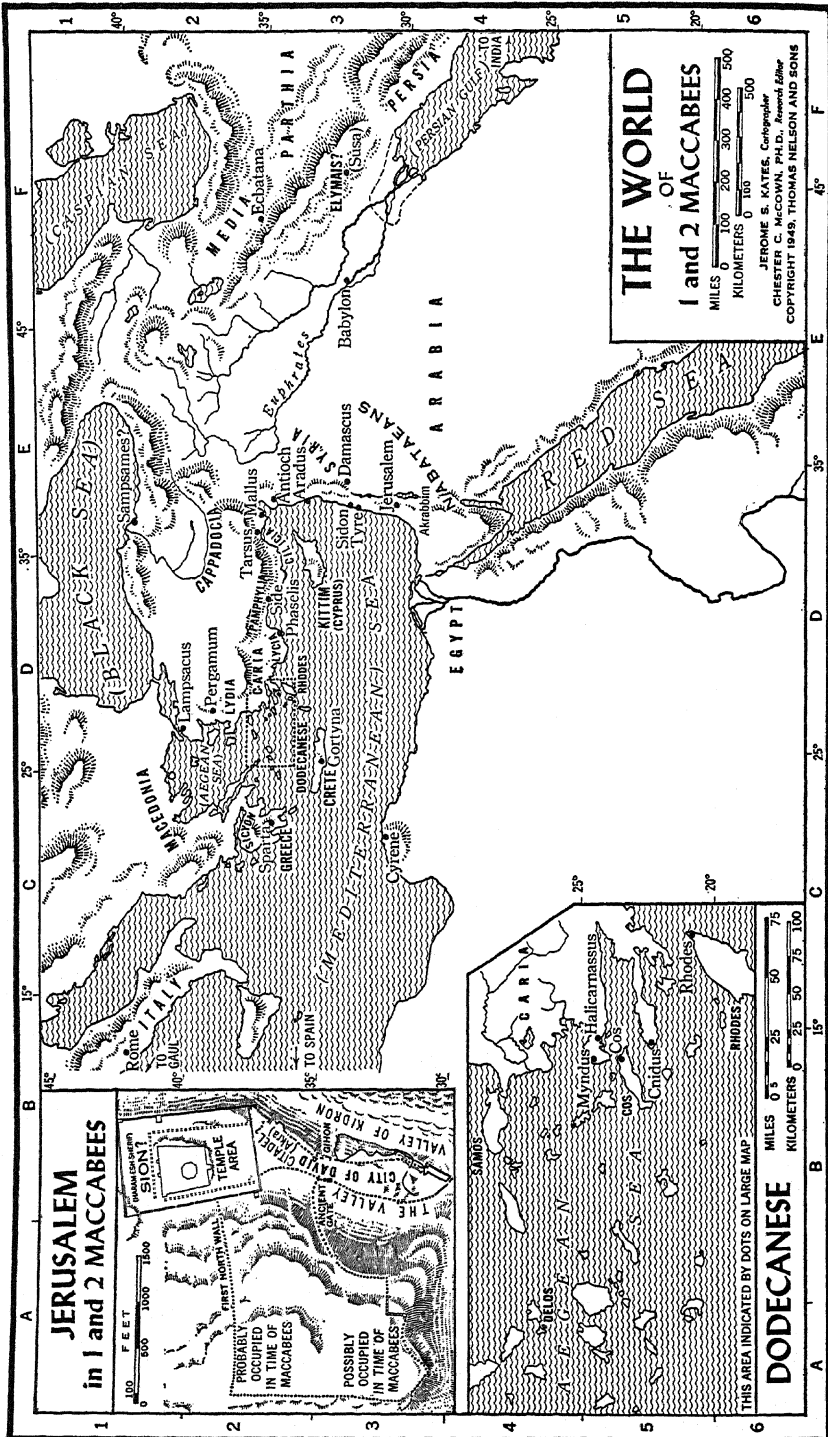

This passionate interest in the earthly abode of the sole God in existence (14:35), which is characteristic of the Diaspora Jews like Jason of Cyrene, explains the far greater religious and theological contents of II Maccabees, as compared to the simple faith in the background of

I Maccabees. Among characteristic doctrines in II Maccabees may be mentioned the poetic justice in God's punishments, which are made to conform with the transgression (4:38, 42; 5:9-10; 8:33; 9:8-10, 28; 13:5-8; 15:31-35); miraculous interventions (14:15) in behalf of the temple (3:25-26, 33-34, 38-39) and of Israel (10:29-30; 11:8; 13:17; cf. 5:2-4) on the part of God, "the wonder worker" (15:21); the reward of Jewish martyrs through their bodily (7:11; 14:46) resurrection (7:9, 14, 23, 29, 36; 12:43-45); nothing is said, as in Dan. 12:2, of a resurrection of the apostate Jews unto everlasting contempt. This Pharisaic doctrine contrasts sharply with the Platonic doctrine of the immortality of the spirit in Wisdom of Solomon and IV Maccabees. The book has left its mark on Christian literature: the stories about the martyrs (6:18-7:42; 14:37-46), beginning with Heb. 11:35-38, furnished encouragement and example to Christians in times of persecution; it has also provided proof texts for the creation ex nihilo (7:28), the intercession of the saints (15:14), eternal death of the wicked (7:9, 14), resurrection of the flesh (7:11; 14:46), intercession for the dead (12:43), deliverance of the dead from purgatory (12:43-45, possibly annotated), and the doctrine of angels (3:24-28; 10:29-30; 11:8).

III. Selected Bibliography

The term "pseudepigrapha" means literally writings attributed to fictitious authors, and in this sense would apply to some books in the canonical Old Testament and in the Apocrypha, as for instance, all the books attributed to Solomon. But in a technical—originally Protestant—sense the term is applied to Jewish writings of the period from 200 B.C. to A.D. 200, outside of the Old Testament and the Apocrypha (excluding, however, most of the Alexandrian-Jewish writings, and the works of Philo and Josephus), which were for a time popular in certain branches, notably Oriental, of the ancient Christian church. There is consequently no recognized fixed limit to the Pseudepigrapha. Thus, for instance, R. H. Charles¹ has added to the standard list some writings entirely unknown to the ancient Christians (The Sayings of the Fathers, The Story of Ahikar, and the Fragments of a Zadokite Work); while Charles Cutler Torrey² omits these three works, but adds the Lives of the Prophets and the Testament of Job. Moreover, the extant Pseudepigrapha are merely a few among similar books now lost (or almost so), but mentioned in patristic literature, for which the reader is referred to M. R. James, The Lost Apocrypha

*of the Old Testament: Their Titles and Fragments.*³

Since there is no standard order in the arrangement of the Pseudepigrapha, as for the Apocrypha, they will be grouped here as Palestinian (originally in Hebrew or Aramaic) and Alexandrian (originally in Greek) and subdivided according to their literary genre.

I. Palestinian Pseudepigrapha

A. Legends About Biblical Characters. 1.

The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs.—This work was written in Hebrew about 140-110 B.C., probably late in the time of John Hyrcanus (135-104). The whole work is extant in a Greek translation (and versions thereof). In addition to Jewish interpolations (notably those attacking the high priesthood of the late, worldly Hasmoneans; see Judah 21:6-23:5; Levi 14:5-16:5; etc.; cf. the Psalms of Solomon), the Greek text contains Christian glosses (some missing in the Greek book from which the Armenian text was translated) announcing the Incarnation: "Honor Levi and Judah; for from them shall arise [unto you the Lamb of God who takes away the sins of the world, the one who saves all the Gentiles and Israel]" (Joseph 19:11; the Armenian instead of the Christian words in brackets reads, "the salvation of Israel!"; see also Benjamin 3:8; 9:3-5; 10:7-10; in 11:1-5 there are allusions to Paul). Reuben 2:3-3:2 is a Hellenistic (Stoic) interpolation.

The author was inspired by Gen. 49 and Deut. 33 to write the spiritual testament of the twelve sons of Jacob. Each patriarch recalls first of all his life, and in particular the sin or sins which he had committed and the consequences thereof; then, drawing lessons from his experience, he warns his descendants against such sins and urges them to practice the virtues and avoid temptations; and at last he predicts the future vicissitudes of his tribe. Reuben naturally deals with unchastity (cf. Gen 35:22; 49:4); Simeon with his jealousy of Joseph and his wrath against Judah, for which he was detained in Egypt (Simeon 2; cf. Gen. 42:24). Levi (6:4; cf. Gen. 34:25-27) had been a cut-throat, but as ancestor of the high priests stands at the head of his brothers, whose descendants are repeatedly urged to revere Levi and Judah, the priesthood and the kingdom; but God "set the kingdom beneath the priesthood" (Judah 23:3). On the basis of legendary embellishments to the Genesis stories, Judah warns against wine, women, and greed; but he also predicts the coming of the Messiah from his seed. Issachar (chs. 3-5; cf. Gen 49:15 [LXX], "he became a husbandman") is the type of the honest and hard-working farmer. Zebulun was the first sailor (6:1-3; cf. Gen. 49:13). Dan warns against anger and almost like Jesus (Matt. 22:37-39) sums up the law in these words, "Love the Lord throughout your life, and one another with a true heart" (Dan 5:3). Naphtali is as swift as a hind (2:1; cf. Gen. 49:21) and studies the divine order in the human organism and in nature. Gad hates Joseph and warns against hatred. Asher notes the two ways, the two inclinations, the two issues—good and bad; he warns against duplicity. Joseph dwells at length on his refusal to yield to Potiphar's wife and urges mutual love which hides one another's faults. Benjamin's counsel is to have "a good mind," such as Joseph's when he forgave his brothers.

Throughout the book the moral law is stressed, rather than the ceremonial, and the ethical teaching is consistently noble (comparable to that of Ecclesiasticus). Sin results from the "evil impulse" in man, which is personified in Beliar, the prince of evil, and his seven false spirits (evil tendencies rather than demons): lust, greed, hostility, hypocrisy, arrogance, falsehood, and injustice (Reuben 3:3-6). Repentance receives considerable attention: sinners impose upon themselves a penance in the form of long abstinence from meat and wine (Reuben 1:9-10; Judah 15:4), and fasting (Simeon 3:4); "For true, godlike, repentance drives away the darkness, illuminates the eyes, gives knowledge to the soul, and leads the mind to salvation" (Gad 5:7; cf. II Cor. 7:10).

2. The Book of Jubilees.—This enlarged Targum or Midrash of Gen. 1:1-Exod. 12:47 was probably composed in Aramaic (although many critics regard Hebrew as the original language) near the end of the reign of John Hyrcanus (135-104), shortly after the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs. The Greek translation is lost except for a few quotations in Christian writings, but the full text of the Ethiopic version made from the Greek is extant, and over one fourth has come to light in a Latin translation.

The book is named after its exact, but fictitious, system of dating events (from the Creation to the eve of the Exodus) by forty-nine-year "jubilee" periods (cf. Lev. 25:8-12), and their subdivision into seven weeks of years. For instance, "And in the first year of the first week of the forty-fifth jubilee [for the year 2157 ($44 \times 49 = 2156 + 1 = 2157$) since the Creation] Rebecca called Jacob . . ." (35:1). The book purports to be a revelation made to Moses by the angel of the presence, holding the tables of the divisions of the years in his hand (1:29-2:1).

In dealing with the canonical text of Genesis and Exod. 1-12 the author uses three different procedures: he follows the text very closely (e.g., 3:1-7, cf. Gen. 2:18-25; Jubilees 7:6-12, cf. Gen. 9:21-27 [LXX]), or he adds to it many legendary details, or he omits entirely the stories (but not all; see 33:1-9, cf. Gen. 35:21-22; etc.) which are not to the credit of the patriarchs or are otherwise objectionable to the author, as those in Gen. 30:14-16, 31, 33-38, 40-42; 31:5-9, 14-18, 25-42. The most important part of the book consists of the additions which are of two kinds, narrative and juristic (in technical language, haggadic and halakic).

The author supplies much information, genealogical and historical, lacking in Genesis. Adam and Eve gave birth not only to nine sons (4:19), but also to daughters, so that Cain could marry his sister Awam (4:9) and Seth his sister Azura (4:11). In general the names of the wives of the patriarchs are supplied whenever they are not given, and their ancestry is given; for example, "Methuselah took unto himself a wife, Edna the daughter of Azirai" (4:27). Geographical names are also supplied: the ark rested on "Lubar, one of the mountains of Ararat" (5:28; 7:1, 17; 10:15); see also the remote localities named in 8:12-29 (including the Urals, the Don, Africa, the Atlantic [?], Cadiz, the Celts, Phrygia). The author explains puzzling features of the canonical narratives: the angels loaded the animals into Noah's ark

THE LITERATURE AND RELIGION OF THE PSEUDEPIGRAPHA

(5:23); the apparently unfulfilled threat of death in Gen. 2:17^b was realized literally (4:30); Rebecca loved Jacob more than Esau on the advice of Abraham (19:16-31). Like the Jewish apologists at Alexandria, the author attributes to the patriarchs some technical inventions and cultural contributions: Enoch invented the art of writing (4:17) and wrote the book of Enoch (4:18-20); Kainam, son of Arpachshad, was the first archaeologist and paleographer (8:3); the angels taught Noah medicine, and he wrote the first medical treatise (10:10-13); Abraham invented a plow having a deep seeder attached to it (11:19-24), and learned Hebrew (12:26-27). The books of Enoch and Noah were transmitted to their descendants (21:10), down to Levi (45:16).

This tendency to carry back to Israel's early ancestors the institutions of culture is also apparent in the juristic parts of the book. Antediluvian patriarchs are said to have observed the law of Moses in all its details, including the prescriptions of the oral law. For the law was written on heavenly tablets and observed in heaven (cf. 2:18; 3:10; 4:5; 6:17; etc.); angels were created circumcised (15:27) long before the creation of Adam. Accordingly, the festivals (except for the Passover; 49:1-23) were observed long before Moses, whereas in the Pentateuch only the sabbath is traced back to Adam (cf. 2:17-21; 50:6-13). The feast of Weeks was instituted by Noah (6:17-22); that of Tabernacles by Abraham (16:20-31; 18:18-19)—and Jacob, who added an eighth day (32:27); the day of Atonement by Jacob (34:17-19). The sacrificial ritual in all its details is performed in the time of Noah (7:3-5; cf. Num. 29:2, 5), although the priesthood was unknown before Levi's solemn ordination (32:1-15). The legal prescriptions about the various kinds of sacrifices which Abraham ordained to Isaac (21:7-25; cf. Test. Levi 9) include some rules unknown before the Hellenistic period, like the list of the trees whose wood may be used for fuel on the altar (21:12-15)—a list which is stricter than the regulation in the Mishnah (Tamid 2:3)—allowing any kind of wood except the olive and the vine. Other examples of early halakah indicate a notable development of the oral law: the recipe for incense (16:24), regulations about tithes and offerings (7:36; 32:15 [cf. Tob. 1:6, Codex Sinaiticus]), the dating of the feast of Weeks on the fifteenth of Sivan, the third month (15:1; 16:13; 44:4-5). Other laws given in some detail, in accordance with their text "on the heavenly tablets," are: purification after childbirth (3:8-14), cursing a murderer (4:5; cf. Deut. 27:24), circumcision (15:11-34), the older daughter to be married before the younger (28:6), intermarriage between Israel and heathen forbidden (30:7-17), incest forbidden (33:10-20). Even the most radical innovation proposed in the book, the substitution of a solar year of fifty-two weeks (364 days), divided into four quarters of thirteen weeks each (6:29-38; cf. Enoch 72-75; 78), was allegedly inscribed on the heavenly tablets.

The reform of the calendar and many of the laws have the purpose of separating Israel from the heathen. The nations are ruled by angels, Israel by God (15:31-32). The Jews should avoid eating with Gentiles (22:16-18), intermarriage (22:20; 25:9; 30:7-17), idolatry (11:4; 20:7-9; 21:3-5), pagan funeral rites (22:17). Philistines (24:28-33; cf. Ecclus. 50:26; hated in the Maccabean wars: I Macc. 5:68; 10:84; 16:10), Edomites or Idumeans (26:34; chs. 37-38; John Hyrcanus forced the Idumeans to be circumcised; see Josephus Antiquities XIII. 9. 1; Jewish War I. 2. 6), and the Amorites (34:1-9, possibly an echo of Maccabean campaigns) are particularly detested.

Some doctrines in the book have parallels in the New Testament. Human sinfulness is traced to demonic inducement to sin (7:27; 10:1-15; 11:4-5; 12:20); Beliar (from Belial) also ensnares men (1:20; cf. 15:33; the Testament of the Twelve Patriarchs; II Cor. 6:15). The chief of the demons is called Mastema (Aramaic, "the enmity," "the enemy"; cf. Satan), "the chief of the spirits" (10:8-9; cf. Mark 3:22). "And prince Mastema . . . sent forth other spirits, those which were put under his hand, to do all manner of wrong and sin, and all manner of transgression, to corrupt and to destroy, and to shed blood upon the earth" (11:5). He sent ravens and birds to eat the seed (11:11), and suggested to God (as Satan did in Job's case) to test the faith of Abraham (17:16; similarly, in I Chr. 21:1 Satan, not God as in II Sam. 24:1, induced David to take a census), but was put to shame by God (18:12); likewise Mastema, and not God (Exod. 4:24), sought to kill Moses (48:2), hardened the heart of the Egyptians (48:16-17; contrast Exod. 14:17; etc.), and slew the first-born of the Egyptians (49:2). Men sacrifice to demons as if these were gods (22:17; cf. I Cor. 10:20). But in the messianic age, following the Last Judgment (23:11), men will live one thousand years without becoming old and "there shall be no Satan nor evil destroyer" (23:27-30; 50:5; cf. Rev. 20:2-3). The spirits of the righteous will then rejoice while their bones rest in the earth (23:31: immortality apparently without resurrection).

3. The Martyrdom of Isaiah.—The Martyrdom of Isaiah is the first part of the Ascension of Isaiah, which according to R. H. Charles was put together by a Christian editor out of three separate works, the Martyrdom, the Testament of Hezekiah, and the Vision of Isaiah; the Martyrdom (1:1-2a, 6b-13a; 2:1-3:12; 5:1b-14; omitting 2:9) was Jewish in origin; the Testament (3:13b-4:18) and the Vision (6:1-11:40) were written by Christians. The contents, according to the Ethiopic version which alone preserves the whole text of the Ascension (the two Latin versions contain 2:14-3:18; 7:1-19, and 6:1-11:19 respectively), may be summarized as follows:

(a) The Martyrdom of Isaiah. The prophet Isaiah predicted to Hezekiah that Manasseh would serve Beliar instead of God and would saw Isaiah asunder (ch. 1; cf. Heb. 11:37). After Hezekiah's death, the devil (Sammael or Beliar) entered into Manasseh, who introduced every abomination into Jerusalem including the worship of Satan; so Isaiah and the true believers withdrew to the wilderness (2:1-11). A man of Samaria (a Samaritan) named Belchira, Bechira, or Melchira (a name of the devil in 1:8), accused Isaiah of prophesying against king and nation, so Manasseh had him arrested (2:12-3:12). [Christian section: Beliar detested Isaiah because he had predicted the redemption through Jesus Christ, the growth of the church until the Neronian persecution, and the final judgment (3.13-5:1a)]. Then Manasseh ordered Isaiah to be sawed asunder with a "wooden saw"—a mistranslation of "wood saw" (5:1b-14).

(b) The Vision of Isaiah (Christian). In the twentieth year of Hezekiah, Isaiah had a vision and related it to the king and his courtiers (ch. 6). An angel led Isaiah in spirit through the firmament and six heavens up to the seventh heaven (chs. 7-8), where Isaiah saw the deceased saints from Adam and Abel on, and God himself (ch. 9). Having heard that God would send his son down to earth, Isaiah returned to the firmament (ch. 10), where he saw in a vision the birth of Jesus Christ, his life and passion, his resurrection, and his return to the seventh heaven. While the angel ascended to heaven, Isaiah's spirit returned to his earthly body; it was on account of this vision that Satan had Isaiah sawed asunder by Manasseh (ch. 11).

The Christian parts of the book probably date from the second century of our era. In 4:2-5:1a the Antichrist, the incarnation of Beliar, is clearly identified with Nero (A.D. 54-68): his sway is to last three years, seven months, and twenty-seven days or, with a slight correction, 1,335 days as in Dan. 12:12.⁴

If, as is generally supposed, there is a Jewish "Martyrdom" in the first part of the Ascension, we may conjecture that it was written originally in Aramaic in the last century B.C., perhaps in its second half. C. C. Torrey,⁵ however, regards the Ascension in its entirety as a Christian work.

4. Paralipomena of Jeremiah.—These "remaining words of Jeremiah" (or "of Baruch"), like the preceding work, may well be Christian in toto, although the Paralipomena stress the duty of Jews to keep apart from the heathen, particularly from pagan women (6:13-14; 8:2), in contrast with the New Testament, which opposes divorces even when one of the parties is heathen (I Cor. 7:12-13; I Pet. 3:1). The last chapter is manifestly Christian; the rest may contain a Jewish kernel. The contents, in brief, are as follows:

The Lord announced to Jeremiah the destruction of Jerusalem through the Chaldeans, and ordered him to bury the sacred vessels of the temple and to go to Babylonia in exile, leaving Baruch in Jerusalem; and so it happened (chs. 1-4). Before the disaster, Jeremiah had sent the eunuch Abimelech to pick figs in the orchard of Agrippa: Abimelech fell asleep there and awoke sixty-six years later; an old man informed him of what had happened (ch. 5). Baruch was ordered by God to write to Jeremiah that he should remove all foreigners from the midst of Israel; only then would God bring the people back to Zion. This letter of Baruch, together with some of the figs still fresh after sixty-six years, was brought to Babylonia by an eagle (ch. 6). The eagle raised a dead man to life and persuaded Jeremiah to bring the people back; the prophet refused to let the men who would not divorce their Babylonian wives enter Jerusalem; since Babylonia would not admit them, they founded the city of Samaria and thus organized the Samaritan sect (chs. 7-8). [Jeremiah fainted while offering sacrifice in Jerusalem, and coming back to life after three days he praised God for the redemption through Jesus Christ. The Jews were able to stone the prophet to death only after he gave his permission (ch. 9).]

The Greek text has been edited by James Rendel Harris.⁶ The reference to Agrippa (Agrippa I died in A.D. 44; Agrippa II in A.D. 100) dates the book after A.D. 50; it was probably written in the second century. If chs. 1-8 are of Jewish origin, they were probably written in Aramaic and translated into Greek. Ethiopic,

5. The Lives of the Prophets.—This series of biographical sketches was probably written in Hebrew in the first century of our era. It is preserved in Greek among the writings of Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus (ca. 315-403), in a longer and briefer recension; among the writings of Dorotheus of Tyre; and in the Codex Marchalianus or Q of the Prophets. We also have Syriac, Latin, and Ethiopic versions of the work which is now available in a critical edition of the Greek text with an English translation.⁷

The biographies of the four major and of the twelve minor prophets are followed by those of Nathan, Ahijah of Shiloh (I Kings 14:1-18), Joed (Neh. 11:7; identified with Jedo of II Chr. 9:29 and the anonymous prophet of I Kings 13:23-32), Azariah (II Chr. 15:1-15), Zachariah son of Jehoiada (II Chr. 24:20-22; his assassination seems to be referred to in Matt. 23:35; Luke 11:51), Elijah, and Elisha. The biblical data on these prophets are condensed very briefly, and legendary stories are added, notably in the lives of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Jonah, Habakkuk; the other lives are brief, but usually supply some information not found in the Bible.

The life of Jeremiah, according to Torrey, was furnished to the Palestinian author by a man from Egypt. He had been told this story by "the children of Antigonus and Ptolemy, aged men." This story is the only one in the original form of the Lives which contained Christian elements (Christian additions are found in the main Epiphanius recension). Jeremiah told the Egyptian priests that "their idols would be shaken and their gods made with hands would all collapse, when a virgin bearing a child of divine appearance [Jesus] would arrive in Egypt. Therefore even to this day they honor a virgin mother, and placing a babe in a manger they bow down to it" (Lives of the Prophets, Jeremiah §§ 7-8). The prophet had hidden the ark of the covenant in a sealed cave (cf. II Macc. 2:5) until the coming of the Lord "when all nations worship a piece of wood [i.e., the cross]." The rest of the Jeremiah legend is Jewish: he destroyed the poisonous snakes in Egypt (ἔφῶθ, Hebrew "vipers") through the snake-killing argolai (Hebrew hargól, locust [Lev. 11:22], a term used by the Egyptian Jews for the ichneumon or mongoose [cf. Lev. 11:22, LXX: "snake killer"]).⁸

A few details from some of the other lives may be mentioned here. Isaiah, immediately before Manasseh had him sawed asunder, received water from the spring (Greek: "oak," reading 'ēs [tree] instead of 'én [spring]) of Rogel, which was therefore called Siloah, "sent" (cf. John 9:7). He had formerly caused the waters of Siloah to flow only for the Hebrews. Ezekiel was killed in Babylonia by a Jewish exile. In time of famine Ezekiel had saved the people through fish from the Kebar canal which on another occasion miraculously dried up for the Jews but drowned the Chaldeans pursuing them. Daniel interceded for Nebuchadrezzar, who had been changed into an animal having the fore parts of a bull and the hind parts of a lion. Amos was killed with a cudgel by a son of Amaziah, the priest of Bethel. Jonah was the son of the widow of Zarephath (I Kings 17:8-24). Habakkuk fed Daniel in the den of lions (cf. Bel and the Dragon). When Elisha was born "the golden calf bellowed so loudly that the shrill sound was heard in Jerusalem."

6. The Testament of Job.—This Aramaic midrash to the book of Job, written probably in the last century B.C., is extant in a Greek translation first published by Angelo Cardinal Mai in 1833 and republished, with an English translation by Kaufmann Kohler;⁹ a slightly different Greek text was published, with a critical introduction, by M. R. James.¹⁰ See also the accounts of the book by Kohler¹¹ and C. C. Torrey.¹² Some of the material of the book has found its way into the Septuagint of the canonical Job (following 2:9), the long colophon of which (42:18), translated from the Aramaic, could have stood in a variant recension of the Testament of Job.

Job's first wife, Sitidos (from Ausitidos, the woman of Ausitis [Uz], Job's land), defends her husband, though harassed by Satan, who is finally driven away by Job. She witnesses Job's vindication and dies comforted after seeing her dead children in heaven. Job marries Dinah after his restoration to health and riches, and she is the mother of his seven sons (whose curious Greek and Egyptian names were supplied by the Greek translator) and three daughters. Job's spirit was taken up by a heavenly chariot.

parently composed in Aramaic in the first century of our era, before the destruction of Jerusalem in A.D. 70. It has been reworked by Christian hands and has been reconstructed with fair probability out of remnants and recensions in various versions, primarily the Greek (erroneously entitled "Apocalypse of Moses") and Latin texts. In the English version of L. S. A. Wells¹³ the two texts (and occasionally the Slavonic) supplement one another. The story, in brief, runs as follows:

Adam and Eve repented and did penance after their expulsion from the Garden of Eden (Latin text, §§ 1-5). Adam stood forty days in the Jordan up to his neck in the water (§§ 6-8), while Eve, after standing in the Tigris eighteen days, was tempted by Satan, in the guise of an angel, to come to Adam (§§ 9-11). Satan related the story of his fall (§§ 12-17). Eve gave birth to Cain (§§ 18-21). After the birth of Abel, Eve had a premonition of Cain's murder in a dream, and gave birth to Seth after Abel's death (Latin, §§ 22-24; Greek, §§ 1-4). Adam told Seth his vision: he was translated to paradise, where God granted his seed the privilege of serving God; then Michael froze the waters around paradise and led Adam back to earth, where Adam predicted to Seth the history of the Jews to the Last Judgment (Latin, §§ 25-29). Adam was in great pains, so Eve and Seth went to the gate of Eden to entreat God, but a wild beast bit Seth; Michael announced the future resurrection and golden age (Latin, §§ 30-44; Greek, §§ 5-14). Eve related in great detail the story of her fall (Greek, §§ 15-34). Adam died (Latin, §§ 45-48; Greek, §§ 35-41), and Eve, knowing that her life was near its end, gave instructions about preserving a record on stone tablets of Adam's and her lives (Latin, §§ 49-50), and after her death Michael told Seth to mourn six days but to rejoice on the seventh (Latin, § 51; Greek, §§ 42-43).

B. Hymns and Psalms. 1. The Cantica.—The canonical book of Psalms did not include all Hebrew hymns in existence when it was finally limited to 150 compositions about 100 B.C. The Hebrew psalms in Ecclesiasticus (39:12-35; 42:15-43:33; 51:1-12; and the liturgy which appears in the Hebrew text between 51:12 and 51:13), Tobit (ch. 13; in Aramaic), Judith (ch. 16), and Baruch (4:5-5:9), as also the hymns and prayers in Exodus, Deuteronomy, Samuel, Jonah, Habakkuk, Chronicles, Nehemiah, Daniel, etc., were in existence but were excluded. In some Greek manuscripts a collection of hymns (Cantica or Odes) follows the Psalter, supplementing it. The Codex Alexandrinus, for instance, contains the Cantica in the following chapters: Exod. 15; Deut. 32; I Sam. 2; Isa. 26; Jonah 2; Hab. 3; Isa. 38; the Prayer of Manasses; Dan. 3 (LXX); Luke 1:46-55; 2:29-32; 1:68-79; and the Morning Hymn.

2. The Psalms of Solomon.—Aside from the Cantica prepared for the Christians, the church has preserved the Greek translation (and a Syriac version from the Greek) of eighteen Hebrew psalms of the Pharisees, known as the Psalms of Solomon, not to be confused with the five Christian Odes of Solomon included in the gnostic book entitled Pistis Sophia. The Greek and English text of these psalms was published by H. E. Ryle and H. R. James.¹⁴

In contrast with the Psalms of David, which express timeless religious emotions and therefore cannot be dated, some of the Psalms of Solomon indicate by clear historical allusions the time of their composition in the first century B.C. The seventeenth of these psalms expresses the violent hostility of the Pharisees against the Hasmonaean rulers, which began in the time of Alexander Jannaeus (103-76 B.C.): they illegally usurped the throne of David, until God cast them down through an alien (Pompey; he placed the Jews under Roman rule in 63 B.C.) who carried Aristobulus and his sons to Rome (17:1-15). When God brought a mighty one [Pompey] from the ends of the earth, the princes of the land foolishly welcomed him and opened the gates of Jerusalem to him (8:15-20). So Gentiles trod on God's altar [Pompey in 63 B.C.], but before long (48 B.C.) the conqueror was slain in Egypt and left unburied (2:2, 29-31). If all the Psalms of Solomon are the work of a single author, as the uniformity of style and thought seems to indicate, they were composed after 48 B.C., and presumably before the beginning of our era. Ps. Sol. 11 bears a close resemblance to Baruch 4:36-5:9 and was manifestly influenced by it.

The religious teaching of these psalms is typically Pharisaic. Israel, as already in the Psalter, is divided between the righteous poor who fear the Lord, and the sinners or transgressors, who are chiefly the Hasmonaean and the priestly or Sadducean aristocracy—wealthy and arrogant hypocrites (especially Ps. Sol. 4). The pious, or Hasidim, are humble and poor (16:12-15), quiet souls seeking peace (12:6), enduring patiently the chastisement of the present distress (14:1; 16:11). They look forward to a reward after death (13:9-11; 14:3; 15:15; 16:1-3), and to the coming of the messianic Son of David (17:23-51; 18:6-10). The following

Our works are subject to our own choice and power

To do right or wrong by the works of our hands;
And in thy righteousness thou visitest human beings.
He who does righteousness lays up life for himself with the Lord;

And he who does wrongly forfeits his life to destruction (9:7-9).

Thus human freedom and responsibility are maintained, in spite of the fact that man's fate is determined by God (5:4-6).

C. Apocalypses.—A number of Jewish revelations of future events, reaching to the end of the present age and the coming of God's kingdom on earth, were written in the period intervening between the Jewish and the Christian canonical apocalypses—Daniel (164 B.C.) and Revelation (ca. A.D. 90). All of them are attributed to prophets living before divine inspiration was said to have ceased in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah. The latest of these fictitious authors was Ezra. Such revelations are often visions which an angel interprets for the seer and for us; at times the seer is taken through the recondite and remote parts of the universe, notably through the seven heavens. In the predictions, the point at which the author ceases to be historically accurate and explicit, becoming vague and either fanciful or historically wrong, marks the date of the work. While the following works written in Palestine between 164 B.C. and A.D. 100 are grouped here as "apocalypses," it should always be remembered that apocalyptic sections occur in other writings (cf. above, the Life of Adam and Eve, and the Psalms of Solomon, for instance) and that these writings contain parts which have nothing to do with eschatology.

1. The Book of Enoch.—This book is sometimes called Ethiopic Enoch or I Enoch, to distinguish it from other books ascribed to the imaginary pen of the intriguing patriarch who, after walking with God a mere 365 years, "was not; for God took him" (Gen. 5:23-24). I Enoch is a vast encyclopedic work comprising a number of separate books of various dates and authorships, written in Aramaic during the period 163-80 B.C. The whole work has survived only in an Ethiopic version based on the Greek translation, which is lost except for 1:1-32:6; and chs. 97-104; 106-107. R. H. Charles, who has published the text and translation of Enoch,¹⁵ has detected interpolations from a book of Noah (indicated below by brackets) in chs. 6-11; 54:7-55:2; 60; 65:1-69:25; 106-107 (as also in Jubilees 7:20-39; 10:1-15).

The book may be divided in its various parts as follows:

(a) Introduction (chs. 1-5; ca. 150-100 B.C.). The angels reveal to Enoch God's imminent appearance in judgment.

(b) The fall of the angels (chs. 6-16), and Enoch's two remote journeys (chs. 17-20; 21-36; ca. 100 B.C.). The fallen angels taught to the giants their sons (cf. Gen. 6:1-4) the impious arts of civilization (chs. 6-8), but soon they will be punished and then the Golden Age will come (chs. 9-11). Enoch is not allowed to intercede for the fallen angels, but must announce their ruin (chs. 12-16). In his first journey Enoch visits the angels' place of punishment (chs. 17-20); in the second, he sees the underworld, the tree of life, the holy mountain, and the four ends of the earth (chs. 21-36).

(c) The three parables or similitudes of Enoch (chs. 37-71; ca. 100-80 B.C.). Introduction (ch. 37). (i) The judgment of the wicked (ch. 38), the abode of the righteous (ch. 39), the angels and the four archangels (ch. 40), the mysteries of astronomy (chs. 41-44).

(ii) The fate of the unbelievers (ch. 45), the Son of man (or the Elect One) and his wisdom (chs. 46-49; cf. Dan. 7:13), the glory of the elect manifested to induce others to repent (ch. 50). Finally,

The earth will restore what was committed to it
And Sheol what it has received

And hell will surrender what it owes.

And [God] will select the righteous and holy in their midst,

For the day in which they shall be saved is at hand.
The Elect One in those days shall sit upon my throne,

And all secrets of wisdom will pour forth from the counsels of his mouth,

For the Lord of Spirits has given them to him and has glorified him (51:1-3).

Then the whole earth, and particularly the righteous, will rejoice (51:4-5). The seven metal mountains (symbolizing the heathen empires; cf. Dan. 2) shall melt in the presence of the Elect One (ch. 52). Vision of the valley of judgment (ch. 53), the valley of fire for the punishment of kings, and the chains for the fallen angels (54:1-6; cf. Rev. 20:1-2); [the Flood was the first judgment, 54:7-55:2]; the judgment of the fallen angels (55:3-56:4). Then the heathen powers (Parthians and Medes) will attack Israel but will be devoured by the underworld (56:5-8; cf. Ezek. 38-39; Rev. 20:7-9); the dispersed Jews will come back (ch. 57).

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

(iii) The bliss of the saints (ch. 58), the mysteries of lightning and thunder (ch. 59), [Behemoth and Leviathan, other mysteries; ch. 60], preparations for the judgment of the righteous by the Elect One (ch. 61); he will triumph over the kings of the earth (ch. 62), whose repentance avails nothing (ch. 63). The place of punishment of the fallen angels (ch. 64) [the flood and Noah's rescue, 65:1-67:3] in the burning valley (67:4-7; cf. 54:1-6) where the kings will be tormented (67:8-13); the final judgment (chs. 68-69). Enoch's translation (chs. 70-71).

(d) The astronomical book (chs. 72-82). The sun (ch. 72), the moon (ch. 73), the lunar and solar years; the substitution of a solar year of 364 days for a lunar year of twelve months amounting to 354 days and an intercalary month, totaling 384 days (chs. 74-75, cf. ch. 78 and Jubilees 6:29-38). The twelve winds (ch. 76), and four quarters of the world (ch. 77), the solar and lunar calendars (ch. 78), summary (79:1-80:1). Cosmic disturbances resulting from human sin (80:2-8), the heavenly tablets (81:1-4), Enoch's return (81:5-10), the new calendar (ch. 82).

(e) Two visions (chs. 83-90; ca. 163-130 B.C.). (i) The vision of the Flood (chs. 83-84). (ii) Sketch of the history of Israel under the figure of oxen, sheep, shepherds, and wild beasts (chs. 85-90): Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel, Seth (ch. 85); the fall of the angels (ch. 86), and their punishment through the seven archangels (chs. 87-88); Noah (89:1-9) and the history until the Exodus (89:10-27); Moses and Joshua (89:28-40); the judges and the kings down to the building of the temple (89:41-50); the decay of the kingdoms to the destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (89:51-67). Four periods of foreign rule over Israel: twelve shepherds: the Exile (89:68-71); twenty-three shepherds: from Cyrus to Alexander (89:72-77); twenty-three shepherds: from Alexander to Antiochus Epiphanes (90:1-5); twelve shepherds: the Maccabean rebellion and the rule of the Hasmonæans to the Last Judgment (90:6-19). The condemnation of the wicked rulers and of the fallen angels (90:20-27); the New Jerusalem, the resurrection, and the messianic age (90:28-42).

(f) Enoch's book of exhortation (92:1-5; 91:1-11, 18-19; ca. 100-80 B.C.).

(g) The Apocalypse of Weeks (93:1-10; 91:12-17; ca. 163 B.C.; [93:11-14]). These are the ten weeks of human history: Enoch (93:3), Noah (93:4), Abraham (93:5), Moses (93:6), the building of the temple (93:7), Elijah and the destruction of the temple (93:8), an apostate generation (93:9-10); [who can understand God and the universe? (93:11-14)]; the righteous will prevail over the wicked and the temple will be built (91:12-13); judgment will be revealed (91:14); the Last Judgment and the age to come (91:15-17).

(h) The Last Judgment (chs. 94-105; ca. 100-80 B.C.). Let the righteous avoid the paths of wickedness (94:1-5), for the Lord will destroy the sinners (94:6-95:7). "Be hopeful, ye righteous, for the sinners will suddenly perish before you!" (Ch. 96.) Woe to sinners and to those who acquire wealth dishonestly (ch. 97)! Man himself is responsible for sin, such as the self-indulgence of the wealthy (98:1-4); sins are recorded in heaven (98:5-8); woe to fools and sinners (98:9-16), to the godless and lawless (ch. 99). At the end of this age the sinners will destroy one another (100:1-3); then the Lord will sit in judgment against the fallen angels and the sinners (100:4-13). Fear God, for he is the Lord of all creation (ch. 101). The horrors preceding the Day of Judgment should not terrify the righteous (ch. 102); for "all goodness, joy, and glory are prepared for them," while the souls of the sinners "will be wretched in their great tribulation" (chs. 103-105).

(j) Appendixes (chs. 106-108; ca. 100-80 B.C.). The birth of Noah (chs. 106-107). The final fate of the sinners and of the righteous (ch. 108).

This meager summary indicates that there is no uniform teaching about the events at the end of this age and in the future world: we must therefore sketch the eschatological teaching of the several parts, in their chronological order, omitting those parts like the astronomical book (chs. 72-82) which do not touch upon eschatology.

The Apocalypse of Weeks (93:1-10; 91:12-17) was written soon after Daniel (164 B.C.), and under its influence. Like Daniel, it combines the ancient hope of national restoration (without a Messiah) with the newer expectation of individual rewards or punishments after the end of this age, although the resurrection (Dan. 12:2) is not specifically mentioned. Purely national is the expectation that in the eighth week, following the seven weeks of history which were completed by the time of the author (who lived in the time of the seventh week's Hellenizing apostasy, 180-168 B.C.), the hosts of the heathen would attack the Jews (91:12; cf. 90:13-19; Joel 3:1-3; Ezek. 38-39; Obad. 15; Mic. 4:11; Zeph. 3:8; Zech. 12:2-3, 9; 14:1-2) and be defeated and destroyed (Zech. 12:4; 14:12-15; Mic. 7:16-17; Ezek. 38-39; Rev. 20:8-9; etc.). With the rebuilding of the temple and the piety and prosperity which follow (91:13) the national goal is fully attained, but there are two more weeks. In the ninth and tenth weeks attention is focused on the individual: the final judgment, revealed in the ninth week and fulfilled in the tenth (91:14-17), will eliminate the wicked from the new heavens and new earth (cf. Rev. 21:1-5).

Of the two visions in chs. 83-90 only the second (chs. 85-90) concerns us here. Again, as in the Apocalypse of Weeks, we note the influence of Daniel, and we see the panorama of world history unrolling before our eyes, from Adam and Eve to the Hasmonaeans, but under the allegory of animals. Here also the national and individual aspects of the final events are both presented and are separated by the final judgment, and here also the righteous live forever without having been specifically raised from the dead (90:33 is usually interpreted as a reference to the resurrection, but without sufficient reasons). In Palestine the Lord sits in judgment, the books are opened; the fallen angels, the seventy shepherds, and the renegade Jews ("the blinded sheep") are found guilty and are cast into the fiery abyss (90:20-27). To the New Jerusalem and its temple the scattered Jews and the converted Gentiles will come together (90:28-33). But here, in contrast with Daniel and the Apocalypse of Weeks, the Messiah appears. Indeed, according to C. C. Torrey¹⁹ the wild ox or buffalo (emending the text of 90:38, where the Ethiopic "word" is meaningless) with great black horns (cf. Deut. 33:17) is the Messiah son of Ephraim or of Joseph; all admit that the white bull (90:37) is the Messiah, son of David.

In the Introduction to the book (chs. 1-5), the final judgment is a cosmic upheaval rather than a court scene (ch. 1): the resurrection is not mentioned, the ungodly are destroyed by God (1:9), and their names become an eternal execration (5:6); "and there shall be bestowed upon the elect wisdom, and they shall all live and never again sin" (5:8).

In the first of his two journeys to the ends of the earth (chs. 17-20; 21-36) Enoch sees the four Hades rivers of Greek mythology (Pyriphlegethon, Styx, Acheron, and Cocytus, 17:5-6) the mountain of God in the north (18:8), the fiery abyss (18:11), the seven stars which transgressed God's orders and are to be punished ten thousand years (18:12-16), and the future place of punishment of the angels who seduced women (Gen. 6:1-4)—these women become evil spirits, that is, sirens (ch. 19). In the second journey (chs. 21-36) he sees again the seven stars and the fiery abyss in which the fallen angels are to be imprisoned forever (ch. 21), the deep smooth hollows in a great mountain in the west (22:1), where the souls of the dead

Jews are imprisoned until the final judgment: one, for the righteous, is bright and has a fountain (22:2, 9); the three others are dark and house spirits of sinners: those who have not been judged in their lifetime (22:10) and are now in torment until they will be bound forever in the Last Judgment (22:11); those who like Abel were unjustly slain in the days of the sinners (22:5-7, 12); and the godless sinners who consorted with the heathen, who will not be punished nor be raised in the Day of Judgment, but are apparently to be left eternally in their present condition (22:13). The final fate of the heathen is not considered here: the righteous Jews and some of the sinners, it would seem, will be raised from the dead at the time of the final judgment.

Continuing on his journey westward, Enoch reached a river of fire (23:2, cf. 17:4-6), and a fiery mountain range (24:1), seven beautiful mountains (24:2), the seventh of which is the seat of God's throne in the north and contains the tree of life (24:3-25:7). Passing through Jerusalem and the valley of Jehoshaphat, where the Lord will judge the wicked (chs. 26-27), Enoch went eastward to the lands of aromatic and fragrant trees (28:1-32:1), passed over the Erythraean Sea (32:2), coming to the Garden of Righteousness, the earthly paradise with the tree of wisdom (32:3-6), strange animals, and the heavenly gates of the stars (ch. 33). Going northward, he saw the three northern heavenly gates (chs. 34-35), and then three southern ones in the extreme southern end of the world (ch. 36). It will be noted that national features are completely missing in these accounts of Enoch's journeys: there is no Messiah, no attack of the heathen on the Jews, no Jewish kingdom; but only the final separation, even before the Last Judgment, between individual Jews, the saved and the damned. Of the latter there are three categories destined to suffer different eternal punishments. For the first time in a Jewish writing we have here a classification of the damned, as also the Greek names of the rivers of Hades: has our author been influenced by Hellenistic notions? The fate of the saved may remind us likewise of the Elysian fields, although the author utilized biblical materials for his description. The tree of life will be placed next to the temple, far from its present location on the inaccessible mountain; the saved will partake of its fruit and live long lives on the earth, like Methuselah; "and in their days shall no sorrow or plague or torment or calamity touch them" (25:4-6). Perhaps even the fruit of the tree of knowledge or wisdom may then be granted to the saved (cf. 32:3-6).

The so-called parables or similitudes of Enoch (chs. 37-71), and the end of the book (chs. 91-108, omitting the much earlier Apocalypse of Weeks [93:1-10; 92:12-17]), are the latest sections of Enoch. The second of the similitudes (chs. 45-57) is of particular interest to New Testament students for its messianic teaching. The expression "his Messiah" (God's anointed) occurs only in 48:10 (cf. Ps. 22:2) and 52:4 (cf. Ps. 72); Messiah is usually called "that Son of man" or "the Elect"; only once "Son of woman" (62:5). The author takes not only the term "Son of man" but also the person itself from Dan. 7:13-14. The expression "son of man" in its literal meanings of "gentleman" and "minor" occurs in Hammurabi's Code; later, in Hebrew (ben-'ādhām, common in Ezekiel) and Aramaic (bar 'enāsh, "a son of man"; bar nāshā', "the son of man"), it means "a human being," a member of the human race, as the expression "sons of the prophets" means members of the prophetic fraternity, and "sons of God," divine beings. As in Dan. 7:9-14, the Son of man in 46:1-6 appears in the presence of "the Ancient of days [God]"; "And there I saw One who had a head of days [i.e., an aged head], and his head was white as wool, and with him was another being whose countenance was like the appearance of a man, and his face was full of graciousness, like that of one of the holy angels" (46:1). In later passages this being is referred to as "that [or "this"] Son of man" (except in 62:7; 69:27, "the Son of man"): this is the natural Ethiopic rendering of the Greek "the Son of man" (as in the Gospels). Daniel's human figure, symbolizing "the people of the saints of the Most High" (Dan. 7:27)—God's saints ruling over his kingdom, in contrast with the heathen empires [the beasts]—becomes here a messianic ruler. The congregation of Daniel becomes an individual in Enoch, where the beasts have disappeared. This messianic interpretation of Daniel's "Son of man" may well be older than the similitudes; we find it in Sibylline Oracles Bk. V, l. 414 (cf. Bk. III, ll. 46-50, 652), and later, about A.D. 90, in II (IV) Esdras 13:3. In any case such an interpretation was current in the time of Jesus (Mark 13:26; 14:61-62; Matt. 24:30; 26:63-64; Luke 22:67-68; cf. Acts 7:56; Rev. 1:13).

Unlike the Messiah son of David of earlier days, still presented in Pss. Sol. 17, Enoch's Son of man is not a human being: he appears with God in the Last Judgment (46:1-6; 48:8-9; 49:2-4) and sits on God's throne (51:3; cf. 45:3; 61:8), ruling on this earth over the righteous (cf. 62:13-16). Moreover, long before his revelation to the elect, the Son of man had been hidden by God: he had existed before the creation of the world (48:3, 6; 62:7), "his dwelling place [was] under the wings of the Lord of Spirits" (39:7). In contrast with the bliss of the saved, Enoch contemplated the valley of fire into which the evil rulers are cast, and the enormous chains prepared for Azazel and his hosts on the Day of Judgment (54:1-6; 55:3-4; 56:1-4). The onslaught of the heathen hordes and their end (56:5-8), and the return of the scattered Jews (ch. 57), complete the picture of the future events. In the two other similitudes (chs. 38-44 and 58-71) we have likewise a vision of the judgment and of the places of bliss or torment. Similar descriptions are found in chs. 94-108, except for the greater attention given to the signs of the end and the condemnation of the fallen angels.

2. The Assumption of Moses.—This book was written in Aramaic during the lifetime of Jesus (a few years after the death of Herod the Great in 4 B.C. and not later than A.D. 28), but survives only partially in a Latin version, made from the Greek rendering of the original, which is quoted in Jude 9. Its contents may be summarized as follows:

In the year 2500 after the Creation, Moses, perceiving that his end was near, appointed Joshua as his successor and gave him his final instructions (1:1-9). Moses had been appointed before the creation of the world to be the mediator of God's covenant; now he entrusts the holy books to Joshua (1:10-18). Moses predicts briefly the history of Israel from the invasion into Canaan to the end of the kingdoms of Israel and Judah (ch. 2). Nebuchadrezzar will destroy Jerusalem and exile two tribes (586 B.C.), while the other ten will mourn for them; all of them will remember that Moses had predicted this calamity, which will last seventy-seven years (ch. 3). Through the intercession of Daniel, God will induce Cyrus to let the Jewish exiles go back; the two tribes will hold fast to their faith, but will be unable to offer sacrifice (ch. 4). Punishment on the Jews will come through their Seleucid kings (198-141 B.C.); Hellenizing priests will pollute the altar, scribes and judges will pervert justice (ch. 5). Then Hasmonaean kings (141-37 B.C.) will call themselves priests of the Most High while working iniquity in the holy of holies, but Herod the Great (37-4 B.C.), "an insolent king," will destroy them, punishing the Jews for thirty-four years; his children shall rule for shorter periods [Archelaus, 4 B.C.—A.D. 6; Antipas, 4 B.C.—A.D. 39; Philip, 4 B.C.—A.D. 34; the author wrote before it became clear that Antipas and Philip would rule longer than Herod]; the cohorts of Varus (4 B.C.) will crucify some (about two thousand) insurgent Jews (ch. 6). Then the end of time will come: certain impious men, claiming to be just (probably the hypocritical Pharisees), will rule—treacherous, gluttons, despoilers of the poor in the name of piety, who being unclean say, “Do not touch me lest you pollute me” (ch. 7). In a second visitation the king of kings (Antiochus IV Epiphanes, 175-164 B.C.) will crucify the Jews who confess their circumcision, will force their boys to conceal it, and oblige them to wear heathen idols (ch. 8). But when this edict will be proclaimed, a man of the tribe of Levi named Taxo (presumably Mattathias, as suggested by C. C. Torrey; cf. I Macc. 2) will exhort his seven sons (only five sons of Mattathias are known) to die rather than transgress the commandments of the Lord (ch. 9). Then the kingdoms of God will be revealed and “Satan shall be no more”; the Lord will come to avenge the Jews, while the earth trembles, the sun is darkened, and the horns of the moon are broken. God will punish the heathen and Israel will rejoice. Joshua is to keep this book (ch. 10). Joshua lamented and Moses comforted him (ch. 11). Moses urged Joshua never to doubt the future of Israel; for God would punish the sinners, but never root out the people (ch. 12; the manuscript breaks off in the middle of a sentence).

In the Latin manuscript, which alone preserves the first part of this book (the “assumption” of Moses to heaven, in the second part, quoted in Jude 9, is lost), chs. 8-9 have accidentally been displaced, and should be restored to their right context, between chs. 5 and 6. The chronological order will then be correct, as follows: 1200-586 B.C. (ch. 2); 586-538 B.C. (ch. 3); 538-444 B.C. (ch. 4); 332-170 B.C. (ch. 5; cf. II Macc. 4:7-20); 170-164 B.C. (ch. 8); 168 (ch. 9); 164-4 B.C. (ch. 6); after 4 B.C. (ch. 7).

Like Daniel, the book attributes to God alone the establishment of his kingdom on earth, in which Israel will be glorified and the Gentiles humbled (ch. 10); human participation in the struggle is not mentioned. The vindication of Israel takes place on this earth (unless 10:9 is understood literally); no Messiah appears; there is no heathen onslaught; the advent is dated 250 “times” (or 1,750 years if a “time” is a week of years) after the death of Moses (10:12). The future hope seems to be nationalistic rather than personal: there is no resurrection. Even if the future world consists merely of Paradise and Gehenna (as some interpreters believe on the basis of 10:8-10), the first is the abode of Israel, the second of the Gentiles, without any moral discrimination. The attack on Pharisaic hypocrisy in ch. 7 may be compared with the indictment of Jesus (Matt. 23; Mark 12:38-40; Luke 11:39-52; etc.).

3. The Apocalypse of Baruch.—This book was written in Aramaic shortly after II (IV) Esdras, between A.D. 90 and 100, and shows the influence of that apocalypse. It is extant only in a Syriac version made from the Greek translation of the original. Only parts of chs. 12-14 survive in Greek. Both Syriac Baruch (or II Baruch) and II Esdras raise the question of God's justice, in view of Israel's misery and Babylon's prosperity (i.e., the distress of the Jews after Titus destroyed Jerusalem in A.D. 70, and Rome's prosperity and invincible power); both fail to find a sufficient explanation in Adam's fall and its repercussions through the generations of men. Since II (IV) Esdras is the work of a man of genius, and II Baruch the product of a clever imitator, the priority of Esdras (confirmed by numerous comparisons of parallel passages) is manifest. Baruch may be summarized as follows:

(a) The destruction of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. (1:1-12:4). The Lord announces to Baruch the imminent fall of Jerusalem on account of the people's sins (chs. 1-5). On the morrow the Chaldeans besiege the city, but it is destroyed by four angels after they have buried the holy vessels of the temple; then the Chaldeans take possession of the ruined city (chs. 6-8). While Jeremiah goes into exile, Baruch remains in Jerusalem and sings a lamentation (9:1-12:4).

(b) Divine answers to Baruch's doubts (12:5-20:6). After a fast, Baruch receives a divine revelation (12:5-13:12). Baruch cannot understand why the righteous in Jerusalem are not spared since the world was made for them (ch. 14). God answers that men sin deliberately; the future world belongs to the righteous (chs. 15-17); men are free to choose light or darkness (chs. 18-19); Zion's destruction will hasten the coming of the future world (ch. 20).

(c) The final woes (chs. 21-34). In reply to Baruch's disconsolate prayer (ch. 21) the Lord assures him that the divine promises will be fulfilled in due time (ch. 22), after all souls have been born (ch. 23). Before the Last Judgment (chs. 24-26), twelve woes are to come (ch. 27), but Palestine will be spared (chs. 28-29); then will come the Messiah and the resurrection (ch. 30). Baruch urges the people to prepare for future woes (chs. 31-34).

(d) The allegory of the cedar (chs. 35-46). After another lament for Zion (ch. 35), Baruch sees in a vision a vine growing over a spring in front of a forest; the spring roots out the forest except for one cedar, which is finally consumed by flames; but the vine flourishes (chs. 36-37). The forest is the Roman Empire (the fourth world kingdom after the Chaldean, the Persian, and the Hellenistic), the cedar is its last king, executed by “My Messiah” (the vine), whose dominion is symbolized by the spring (chs. 38-40). Baruch, in obedience to God's command, warns and comforts the people (chs. 41-46).

(e) The future world (chs. 47-52). After Baruch fasts (ch. 47) and prays (48:1-24), God announces new afflictions (48:25-50), reveals the character of the resurrection bodies, and the final fate of the righteous and the wicked (chs. 49-52).

(f) The vision of the cloud (chs. 53-76). A great cloud rises from the sea and covers the earth; twelve outpourings of alternately black and clear waters; after an additional outpouring of black waters, lightning illuminates the earth (ch. 53). In answer to Baruch's prayer (chs. 54-55) the following interpretation of the vision is given: the cloud is the present age, the twelve outpourings are alternating evil and good periods of history, namely: Adam (ch. 56); Abraham (ch. 57); the Egyptians (ch. 58); Moses, Aaron, and Joshua (ch. 59); the Amorites (ch. 60); David and Solomon (ch. 61); Jeroboam I and Jezebel (ch. 62); Hezekiah (ch. 63); Manasseh (chs. 64-65); Josiah (ch. 66); destruction of the temple (ch. 67); rebuilding of the temple (ch. 68). The additional black outpour represents the woes at the end of the world (chs. 69-71), and the lightning is "My Messiah" (chs. 72-74). Baruch praises the Lord (ch. 75) and is ordered to teach the people and to be ready to be translated from this earth (ch. 76).

(g) Baruch's letters to the nine-and-a-half and to the two-and-a-half tribes of Israel (chs. 77-87). After addressing his final admonitions to the people in Judea (77:1-16), Baruch writes to the Judean exiles in Babylonia and to the northern Israelites in exile (77:17-26). Only the text of the second letter, which is sent through an eagle (ch. 87), is given in full (chs. 78-86).

Both II (IV) Esdras and II Baruch are concerned with the misfortunes of Israel as a whole, and of individuals, and they seek to find comfort in visions of the world to come; but the national aspect is stressed more in Baruch, where little or no prominence is given to what seems to trouble Esdras most: Why are so few human beings destined to be saved? This question is still unanswered.

II. Alexandrian Pseudepigrapha

A. Jewish Propaganda Attributed to Gentiles.

1. The Letter of Aristeas.—The unknown Jewish author of this book pretends to be Aristeas, an official of Ptolemy II Philadelphus of Egypt (285-245 B.C.), writing to his brother Philocrates an account of the origin of the Greek version of the Pentateuch (the Septuagint [LXX] in its original sense, before the term included the whole Old Testament). The story is merely a pretext for the glorification of the Jews and their religion; the events narrated are legendary or fictitious, although there is no reason to doubt that the Pentateuch was translated into Greek about 250 B.C. The book, written in Greek at Alexandria about 100 B.C., may be summarized as follows:

(a) Introduction on the purpose of this epistle (vss. 1-8).

(b) Preparations for the translation of the Pentateuch (vss. 9-50). When Demetrius of Phalerum induces Ptolemy II to have the Jewish law translated (vss. 9-11), Aristeas obtains a royal decree emancipating the Jewish slaves in Egypt (vss. 12-27). After Demetrius prepares a memorandum (vss. 28-32), the king requests the high priest Eleazar to send from Jerusalem seventy-two translators, six from each tribe (vss. 33-40). Eleazar answers favorably (vss. 41-50).

(c) The royal gifts to Eleazar (vss. 51-82): a sacred table (vss. 51-72), gold and silver bowls (vss. 73-78), and golden vials (vss. 79-82).

(d) Jerusalem (vss. 83-106) and Palestine (vss. 107-20). Aristeas describes the temple and its water supply (vss. 83-91), the priestly (vss. 92-95) and high priestly (vss. 96-99) rites, the citadel (vss. 100-4), the city of Jerusalem (vss. 105-6), and the rest of Palestine (vss. 107-20).

(e) The translators prepare to leave for Egypt (vss. 121-27), and Eleazar eloquently extols the nobility and reasonableness of the Jewish law (vss. 128-71).

(f) Ptolemy receives the translators with unusual deference (vss. 172-86) and, at banquets on seven successive days, is delighted with their replies to his seventy-two questions (vss. 187-300).

(g) On the island of Pharos the seventy-two translators finish the translation in seventy-two days (vss. 301-7). The Jewish population (vss. 308-11) and the king (vss. 312-17) approve the translation, and the translators return to Jerusalem with costly gifts (vss. 318-22).

The apologetic purpose of the work is clear from the eulogy of the Jewish law (vss. 128-69), in which puzzling ordinances are interpreted allegorically (vss. 146-62); from the plea for the emancipation of the Jews, who are said to worship Zeus under another name (vss. 15-16, 19); from the admiration for the temple services (vs. 99); and particularly from the soundness of the answers given by the translators to the king's questions (vss. 187-294).

2. The Sibylline Oracles.—The sibyls were the pagan counterpart of the Hebrew prophets: like the prophets they pronounced and supposedly wrote down divine oracles. The Sibylline Oracles enjoyed great prestige in the Greco-Roman world, and were even consulted officially by the government of the Roman Republic. The official collection of oracles in Rome was destroyed by fire in 82 B.C., but a new collection was prepared. These oracles were generally in Greek hexameter verses, imitating the meter of the Iliad and Odyssey.

The popularity of such oracles induced a Jew in Alexandria to fake sibylline verses for purposes of propaganda among the heathen: about 140 B.C. he composed the bulk of Bk. III of the extant collection. This series of Greek oracles in fifteen books (of which Bks. IX, X, and XV are lost) is in a state of chaotic confusion. The Jewish oracles are contained in Bks. III, IV, and V; the rest of the books are mostly of Christian origin: the Jewish oracles date from about 140 B.C. to about A.D. 125; the Christian parts come down to the fifth century; the final edition was prepared in the sixth century. The Jewish oracles at times incorporate purely pagan material, with or without slight retouches (as Bk. III, ll. 110-154), and have passed through the hands of Christian editors, who have generally refrained from introducing specifically Christian ideas.

The main topics in the Jewish parts of the Sibylline Oracles are the following:

Bk. III (ca. 140 B.C.). Introduction (preserved by Theophilus of Antioch) on the superiority of Jewish monotheism over pagan idolatry and animal worship. Bk. III, ll. 1-92 (which may belong to Bk. II) deals with monotheism, idolatry, the Last Judgment, the ruin of Beliar from Samaria (Simon Magus?), and the world conflagration during the rule of a widow. In Bk. III, ll. 93-96 a Christian (?) longs for the coming of the Savior. Bk. III, ll. 97-294 outlines the history of the world from the Tower of Babel, and the rule of Cronos, Titan, and Japetus, down to Ptolemy VII, who ruled alone from 145 to 116. In Bk. III, ll. 295-572, the sibyl predicts woes for Babylon, Egypt, Gog and Magog, and Lybia; a comet will presage the travails at the end of this age, to be followed by the messianic age; Alexander, and later Antiochus IV Epiphanes, will devastate Asia; Homer plagiarized the sibyl in the Iliad and the Odyssey; many cities and countries are doomed. In Bk. III, ll. 573-651, Israel is praised and the heathen are denounced. The messianic age (Bk. III, ll. 652-808) will bring peace and wealth to the Jews, but judgment against the heathen. In the colophon (Bk. III, ll. 809-29), the sibyl identifies herself as having come from Babylon, although the Greeks call her the Erythraean; she is the daughter-in-law and blood relation of Noah.

Bk. IV was composed about A.D. 80, for it refers to the eruption of Vesuvius in A.D. 79 (Bk. IV, ll. 130-36). The sibyl utters the oracles of the true God (Bk. IV, ll. 1-23). The Jews will not go to hell like the heathen (Bk. IV, ll. 35-46). The summary of world history in Bk. IV, ll. 47-139 begins with the Assyrian, Medic, and Persian kingdoms, and comes down to the mythical return of Nero redivivus (soon after his death in A.D. 68) from Parthia and the destruction of Pompeii in A.D. 79. The book concludes with a series of woes against various localities (Bk. IV, ll. 140-61), an exhortation to repentance lest fire consume the world (Bk. IV, ll. 162-78), and the Last Judgment (Bk. IV, ll. 179-195).

Bk. V dates from about A.D. 125, since it refers favorably to Hadrian (A.D. 76-138; see Bk. V, ll. 46-50) before his war against the Jews in 132-35 (the reference to his successor Marcus Aurelius in Bk. V, l. 51 is probably spurious). The book opens with a history of Rome, in which the emperors from Julius Caesar to Marcus Aurelius are cryptically mentioned (Bk. V, ll. 1-51). A series of woes against Egypt, Asia, India, Ethiopia, Greece, etc. (Bk. V, ll. 52-227) is followed by a curse on hybris or violence (Bk. V, ll. 228-46), and a eulogy of the Jews (Bk. V, ll. 247-85, in which ll. 256-59 are a Christian interpolation). The woes against nations are resumed (ll. 286-343). Cosmic upheavals, the return of Nero redivivus, the resurrection, and war are the signs of the end of the world, followed by the golden age for the Jews only (Bk. V, ll. 344-85). Roman immorality (Bk. V, ll. 386-93; cf. Rom. 1:24-31) and the destruction of Jerusalem by Titus (ll. 394-413) are denounced. The Messiah will exterminate the heathen and make Jerusalem more radiant than the sun (Bk. V, ll. 414-33). A denunciation of Babylonia (Bk. V, ll. 434-46), cosmic upheavals in the eastern Mediterranean (Bk. V, ll. 447-57), the peaceful rule of Octavian Augustus (Bk. V, ll. 458-63), the invasion of the Gauls into Asia Minor (Bk. V, ll. 464-75), a total darkness for the heathen but not for the Jews (Bk. V, ll. 476-83). Egypt will forget Isis and Serapis; it will worship instead the Lord in the temple built by Onias at Leontopolis (Bk. V, ll. 484-503; cf. Isa. 19:18-21). Egypt will eventually be destroyed (Bk. V, ll. 504-11). Stars and constellations will fight until the heavens will cast them into the ocean and they will kindle the earth (Bk. V, ll. 512-30).

B. Legendary History. III Maccabees.—This book, written in Greek by an Alexandrian Jew shortly before or after the beginning of our era, has nothing to do with the Maccabees and was placed in the group of the books dealing with the Maccabean rebellion merely because it is a story—entirely fictitious—of an unsuccessful persecution of the Jews, like that of Antiochus Epiphanes. As in II Maccabees, Esther, and Judith, the triumph of the Jews is celebrated by a festival. The author was influenced by these books, particularly II Maccabees, and also by the Greek Daniel with its additions (6:6); his pseudoclassical Greek style is rhetorical and bombastic. In Against Apion II. 5, Josephus relates a similar tale, manifestly without direct knowledge of III Maccabees: placing it in the time of Ptolemy VII [IX] Physkon (145-116 B.C.), instead of Ptolemy IV Philopator (221-203 B.C.): in both cases drunken elephants, instead of trampling the Jews, turn against their enemies. In addition to the annual celebration of the day there are other parallels. Since neither story has the slightest historical foundation, it is unprofitable to attempt to determine whether both versions are derived from an earlier one, or whether Josephus merely reproduced an incorrect echo of III Maccabees. The tale of the latter book runs as follows:

Ptolemy IV Philopator was saved by Dositheus (a converted Jew) from a deadly plot (1:1-3) and defeated Antiochus III the Great (223-187 B.C.) at Raphia in 217 (1:4-5); he then visited neighboring shrines (1:6-7). After sacrificing to the Lord in Jerusalem, Ptolemy decided to enter the holy of holies in spite of the warnings of all Jews (1:8-29). But in answer to the ardent prayer of the high priest Simon (2:1-20), God smote Ptolemy senseless to the ground (2:21-23). Returning to Egypt unrepentant (2:24), the king had slanders against the Jews spread by his friends (2:25-26); he degraded them to serfs (2:27-28) and had them branded with an ivy leaf as worshipers of Dionysus (2:29); only those few who were initiated into the Dionysiac mysteries would retain civic rights (2:30). The king then ordered that provincial Jews be brought to the capital to be put to death (3:1), in spite of the fact that the Jews were faithful to the king and had many friends among the Greeks (3:2-10). Ptolemy issued a royal decree as follows: the peoples of Coele Syria and Phoenicia welcomed the king (3:11-15), except the Jews who prevented him from entering their temple (3:16-20); forgiving the Jews, he offered them Alexandrian citizenship and participation in the worship (3:21), but they contemptuously refused (3:22-23); convinced that they were traitors, he ordered that all be brought to Alexandria for execution (3:24-30). This decree provoked the jubilation of the heathen and the wailing of the Jews (4:1-3), who were carried away without mercy (4:4-10) to Schedia and imprisoned in the hippodrome (4:11); soon the Alexandrian Jews were added to their number (4:12-13). The listing of this multitude of Jews by name was interrupted on account of the lack of writing material (4:14-21). Then the king ordered Hermon to intoxicate his five hundred elephants and let them kill the Jews (5:1-5). But in answer to the prayer of the Jews the king overslept, and the massacre was postponed to the next day (5:6-22). But on the morrow the king, having forgotten his instructions (through divine intervention), ordered that the Jews be freed (5:23-35). During the banquet, however, having reprimanded Hermon for not having killed the Jews, the king again gave orders for their execution on the morrow (5:36-42) and decided to destroy the temple in Jerusalem (5:43). At dawn heathen throngs, the king, and the elephants proceeded to the hippodrome for the Jewish massacre (5:44-47), while the Jews appealed to God (5:48-51). The aged priest Eleazar reminded God of his former deliverance in the Exodus from Egypt, and begged for help (6:1-15). As the king arrived, the Jews cried out loudly (6:16-17), and two angels filled king and troops with terror (6:18-20). The elephants destroyed the armed men (6:21). The king's anger now turned against the heathen, and he set free the Jews (6:22-29), giving them a seven-day banquet (6:30-31). The Jews praised God (6:32), and the king celebrated with a feast (6:33). The enemies of the Jews were put to shame (6:34), while the Jews made the day an annual festival (6:35-37). The king allowed the Jews to return to their homes (6:38-41), and published a decree in their behalf (7:1-9). Before their departure the Jews asked and obtained permission to execute their apostate brethren (7:10-14), and perpetrated the killing of three hundred of them (7:15); then they returned home (7:16). In Ptolemais they again celebrated with a banquet (7:17-18), erected there an inscribed stele and a shrine (7:19-21), and recovered all their property without trouble (7:22-23).

C. Popular Philosophy: IV Maccabees.—This book has more or less the form of a diatribe, or popular speech on philosophical and religious matters, after the manner of the Cynics and the Stoics. The author was an Alexandrian Jew who wrote the book in Greek two or three decades before or after the beginning of our era: he thus lived not long before Philo of Alexandria. This sermon is addressed to Jews (18:1) and has for its theme the supremacy of devout reason (ὁ εὐσεβῆς λογισμὸς) over the passions (a Stoic principle): "whether devout reason is supreme ruler over the passions" (1:1); the stories of the Maccabean martyrs in II Macc. 6:18-7:41 are used as evidence to prove his thesis. We may summarize the book as follows:

(a) The introduction (1:1-12) gives a synopsis of the theme and the plan of the book.

(b) The philosophical exposition (1:13-3:18). Reason is the mind's choice for the life of wisdom; wisdom (according to the Stoic definition) is the knowledge of human and divine things, as well as of their causes, and (according to Judaism) is acquired through the law of Moses (1:13-17), manifesting itself in the four (Stoic) cardinal virtues: prudence, justice, courage, temperance (1:18). The several passions or emotions spring from pleasure and pain. Regular sequences are to be observed in the passions: desire precedes, and satisfaction follows, pleasure (1:19-27). Reason, through prudence and temperance, is the guide of virtues and the master of passions (1:28-35): it controls covetous desires, passions opposed to justice, and the more aggressive or violent impulses (2:1-24); all passions, in fact, with the exception of forgetfulness and ignorance, are restrained, but not extirpated, by reason (3:1-18).

(c) The demonstration of the thesis (1:1) through historical evidence (3:19-17:24). Historical introduction (3:19-4:26). The events preceding the Maccabean rebellion, notably the attempt of Apollonius [Heliodorus in II Macc. 3] to enter the temple (3:19-4:14), and the efforts of Antiochus Epiphanes to abolish Judaism (4:15-26; cf. II Macc. 4-6). The martyrdom of Eleazar, and its philosophical and religious lessons (chs. 5-7; cf. II Macc. 3:18-31). The martyrdom of the seven brothers (chs. 8-12; cf. II Macc. 7). Edifying reflections suggested by the same (13:1-14:10). Considerations about the fortitude of the mother (14:11-16:25) and her death (17:1-7). Closing reflections on the martyrs (17:8-24): text of a fitting epitaph for these heroic figures (17:8-10) who fought a holy war in the arena as athletes of the law and were amply rewarded (17:11-24).

(d) Peroration (ch. 18). The Israelites should follow the example of the martyrs (18:1-2), who won the admiration of mankind, obtained eternal bliss with God, national restoration, and triumph over the tyrant Antiochus (18:3-5). Exhortation to the mother to her seven sons (18:6-19); contrast between the tyrant and the Jews (18:20-24).

As a writer and a thinker, the author of this book is superior to the author of II Maccabees, and notably better than the pretentious Atticist who wrote III Maccabees. He is an ardent and orthodox Jew, in spite of the fact that he does not teach the Pharisaic doctrine of the resurrection of the body (II Macc. 6:26; 7:9, 11, 14, 23, 29, 31, 36; 12:43-45), but the Platonic doctrine of the immortality of every human soul (5:37; 9:8; 10:11; 12:12; 13:15; 14:5-6; 16:13, 25; 17:5, 12, 18, 18:3, 23; cf. Wisd. Sol. 3-5). As in Wisd. Sol. 2:24, the serpent in Eden (Gen. 3) is identified with Satan (18:8; cf. Rev. 12:9; 20:2). Another characteristic doctrine is found in 6:28 and 17:21-22: the martyrs' punishment is to be a satisfaction in behalf of Israel; their lives a ransom for their souls; their blood the people's purification; their death a propitiation; here the author (perhaps under the influence of Isa. 53) goes beyond II Macc. 7:18, 32-33, 37-38, where the torments of the martyrs are a punishment for their own sins, a confession that the Lord is the only God, and the means for bringing to an end God's just wrath against Israel.

D. Apocalypses. I. Slavonic Enoch.—This book, also called II Enoch, or The Book of the Secrets of Enoch, was written at Alexandria in Greek during the first half of the first century of our era, but is extant only in Slavic versions. That the book was written in Greek is shown, for example, by the author's discovery that the initials of the Greek words which designate the four points of the compass spell out the four letters of the name ADAM (30:13; cf. Sibylline Oracles Bk. III, ll. 24-26); the initials of the corresponding English words would spell NEWS. The contents, briefly, are as follows:

(a) Introduction (chs. 1-2). In his 365th year Enoch announced to his sons his impending assumption into heaven.

(b) Enoch's ascension through the seven heavens (chs. 3-21); the mention of the eighth, ninth, and tenth heavens (20:3; 21:6; 22:1) is secondary. In the first heaven he saw the angels ruling over the stars (chs. 3-4), and the storehouses of snow and dew (chs. 5-6). In the second he saw the angels who sinned through ambition, chained in total darkness (ch. 7). In the third was paradise (cf. II Cor. 12:2-4) prepared for the righteous (chs. 8-9), and a hell of fire and ice (ch. 10). In the fourth Enoch saw the sun and its elements (Phoenixes and Chalkydri), and the moon (chs. 11-17). In the fifth are the Grigori or Watchers, and their prince, Satanail, who rebelled against God; their brothers are chained in the second heaven (ch. 18; cf. ch. 7). The archangels, the angels of nature, and others are in the sixth heaven (ch. 19). Archangels, forces, dominions, orders and governments, cherubim and seraphim, thrones, and many-eyed ones are in the seventh heaven, where the Lord is enthroned in the distance (chs. 20-21).

(c) God's revelations to Enoch (chs. 22-38). Clad in heavenly garments, Enoch stood before God (ch. 22), and under Pravuil's (or Vretil's) dictation, wrote 366 books (ch. 23). The Lord himself revealed to Enoch how he planned a visible creation (ch. 24), and created the world from pre-existing elements (ch. 25; cf. Wisd. Sol. 11:17) in six days (chs. 26-30; cf. Gen. 1). Adam and Eve were placed in the Garden of Eden until the devil seduced Eve (chs. 31-32). God also revealed to Enoch the history of the world down to his own time (ch. 33): the deluge to punish the idolaters (ch. 34), the survival of one family (ch. 35), the return of Enoch to earth for thirty days to tell them everything (chs. 36-38).

(d) Enoch's admonitions to his sons (chs. 39-66). In his books Enoch has described the secret things of nature (chs. 39-40); he has seen the forefathers beginning with Adam (ch. 41), the key holders of the gates of hell (ch. 42); he has discovered that nothing is greater than he who fears God (ch. 43). Man is God's creature, and should never be reviled (ch. 44). God requires pure hearts, not sacrifices (chs. 45-46). Enoch's books describe the Lord's works (ch. 47), including the sun's passage through the seven circles (ch. 48). Enoch's sons should not swear (ch. 49), nor take vengeance (ch. 50); they should give alms (ch. 51), glorify the Lord and be merciful (ch. 52), and not believe in the intercession of the saints (ch. 53). The books should be handed on to others (ch. 54). Enoch must now return to heaven (ch. 55), and he refuses food (ch. 56). Having summoned the whole household (ch. 57), he warns them not to harm beasts (chs. 58-59), not to injure any man (ch. 60), but to help the needy (chs. 61-63). Then two thousand people come to kiss Enoch (ch. 64); he describes God's creative work, the Last Judgment, and paradise (chs. 65-66). In total darkness he is translated to the highest heaven (chs. 67-68).

2. Greek Baruch.—This book, also called III Baruch, is preserved in a Greek condensation, and a Slavic abridgment of the original book written in Greek early in the second century of our era and known to Origen. Our extant book has been edited by a Christian who added 4:9-15, and extensively revised chs. 11-17. The contents of the book, in brief, are as follows:

(a) Introduction (ch. 1). While Baruch was weeping over the ruin of Jerusalem, an angel came to reveal to him the mysteries of God.

(b) The five heavens (chs. 2-16). The first heaven (ch. 2) houses the builders of the Tower of Babel. The second heaven (ch. 3) houses those who directed the building of the Tower of Babel. In the third heaven (chs. 4-9) Baruch saw a great dragon who devoured the bodies of the wicked (4:1-7), and the vine which Adam was forbidden to touch, but whose fruit the devil (cf. Gen. 3; Wisd. Sol. 2:24; II Enoch 31:3; IV Macc. 18:8; Rev. 20:2) tempted him to eat (4:8); God changed the bitterness of the vine into sweetness through Jesus Christ's redemption (4:9-15; wine being used in the Eucharist: Christian interpolation). As Adam was condemned through the vine, so are drunkards (4:16-17). Hades is the belly of the dragon (ch. 5). Baruch then saw the phoenix, a bird which flies with the sun (chs. 6-8), and the chariot of the moon (ch. 9). In the fourth heaven the souls of the righteous in the shape of birds sang the praises of God (ch. 10). In the fifth heaven Michael received the prayers of men and the merits of the righteous brought by angels (chs. 11-12). The angels assigned to the wicked, having brought no good works, wished to be transferred to others (ch. 13; the reference to the church in 13:4 is Christian). Michael distributed rewards for men in proportion to their good works (chs. 14-16; 15:4 quotes Matt. 25:21 and is Christian).

(c) Conclusion (ch. 17). Without ascending to the sixth and seventh heavens, Baruch is brought back to earth (ch. 17; the original ending has probably been omitted by the editor).

Of interest for the study of Christian doctrines are the Jewish views about the seven heavens (five of which are described in the extant book), the mediation of angels bearing human merits to Michael and returning with appropriate rewards (chs. 11-16; cf. Enoch, the Testament of Levi, and the Testament of Abraham; Rev. 8:3; contrast II [IV] Esdras 7:102-15, where intercession is excluded), and the notions about Adam's fall (4:8, 16-17).

Genesis means "beginning." The title comes through the Vulgate from the Septuagint, where it is dependent on the Hebrew superscription—simply the first word of the text, beré'shith, "In the beginning."

I. Composition and Authorship

Genesis is the first book of the Pentateuch. The Pentateuch, ending with the death of Moses (Deut. 34), is, in turn, the first part of a continuous history extending from the creation of the world (Gen. 1) to the middle of the Babylonian exile (II Kings 25:30). At what point in the literary development this first part of the history was divided into five books it is impossible to say; but since the division appears in the Septuagint, it was before its translation into Greek, ca. 250 B.C. As has been shown in the article "The Growth of the Hexateuch" (pp. 185-200), the book is the result of a conflation, first of two originally separate documents, J and E, to form a narrative, JE, which some centuries later was itself conflated with a third document, P. Neither the J nor the E document was in its original form when the two were combined; each had been subjected to elaboration of various kinds; and the P document had received similar though less extensive treatment before being conflated with JE. That is, the tradition underlying each of the documents remained a living tradition, and so capable of adaptation to changing conditions and responsive to new needs, until it was crystallized by deliberate fusion with another tradition.

It is thus impossible to speak in any strict sense of the author of Genesis. The redactor—RP—who conflated JE and P has the best claim to be so regarded, for he determined the form of the book. Yet even his work received certain additions, for it was not until the Pentateuch was canonized, that is, recognized as scripture, that the process of elaboration and adaptation came to an end.

II. Purpose

Underlying and finding expression in this variegated narrative is Israel's consciousness of standing in a unique relationship to God, the creator, the controller of history, the source of all righteousness, the foundation of all meaning. The purpose of the book is to account for this sense of uniqueness, to establish its validity, to show that it originated not in what today would be called wishful thinking, but in God's free act of choice.

A. Relationship Between Yahweh and Israel.

1. Beginning of Israel's Faith.—Historically this unique relationship began not with the response of one man, Abraham, to an explicit divine call, but in a collective response by the group, then or later known as the sons of Israel, to external reality manifesting itself in the thunderstorm and in the volcano [?] of Sinai. These phenomena the Israelites attributed to the activity of a god to whom they or others had long since given the name of Yahweh. The significance of their response lay in the fact that it was characterized not by a self-regarding fear of the appalling destructiveness of the storm and the volcano, but by a self-surrendering acceptance of that destructiveness as the strange, majestic manifestation of a power apprehended, however inarticulately, as a part of the nature of things, existing independently of them, but to which they must relate themselves if they were to discern the meaning of life and realize its potentialities.¹

2. Growth of Israel's Faith.—This response, emotional rather than volitional, was first made in the desert, long before Israel's movement into Palestine. It resulted in a heightened awareness of the nature of the reality which was making its impact upon them, and drew their imagination outward from preoccupation with self to a recognition of the rights and the independence of the other-than-self. And this awareness, thus heightened, grew richer and more acute as they maintained and deepened their response. By the time of the settlement they had already come to feel that they stood in a unique relationship to Yahweh the God of the storm. He had become the God of Israel, as is clear from the song now preserved in Judg. 5, generally recognized as having been composed within a few years of the Conquest.

B. The Call of Abraham.—According to Genesis, however, the unique relationship between Yahweh and Israel began with the call of Abraham. What is the reason for this?

1. Desire for Concreteness.—It would have been difficult for an Israelite at any period in biblical times to have depicted concretely and convincingly the experience from which the national consciousness of having been chosen by Yahweh had arisen. It would have been difficult for him to give a reasoned account of why his people were convinced that Yahweh had singled them out, and had moved toward them in the storm to evoke from them the response which had intensified their relationship to him. It would have been difficult for him to show how this intensification quickened his people's perceptions so that they were able to apprehend ever more adequately the character of Yahweh and heightened their powers so that they were able to make an ever more adequate response to him; it would have been difficult for him to explain how they had, with each successive response, reached a new vantage point from which a further advance in the knowledge of God had been made. The Israelite thought in the terms of what Abraham Kuenen has called the law of religious historiography:

In ancient time and specifically in Israel, the sense of historical continuity could only be preserved by the constant compliance on the part of the past with the requirements of the present, that is to say its constant renovation and transformation. This may be called the law of religious historiography. At any rate it dominates the historical writings alike of the Israelites and of the early Christians.²

² "The Critical Method," The Modern Review, I (1880), 705, quoted by Stanley A. Cook, "Notes on Old Testament History," Jewish Quarterly Review, XVIII (1906), 739.

2. Influence of the Traditions of Palestine.—The native tendency to this kind of thinking was, however, but one of the factors that determined the form in which Israel's religious history is written in Genesis and, indeed, in the Hexateuch as a whole. Equally if not more decisive was the need for relating the religious traditions of Palestine, with which Israel first came into contact following the settlement, to the historical tradition which they had brought with them from the desert.

C. Component Documents.—It was J¹ who made the first systematic attempt to meet this need.⁸ His work was later expanded by J², and J²'s narrative was in turn revised and rewritten by E. In the course of time the J² and E documents were conflated, and the resultant narrative was eventually fused, after the Exile, with the P document. Therefore, for any clear understanding of the purpose of the book, there must be an examination of the purposes and methods of the authors of these its component documents.

III. The J¹ Document

A. The Elements of J¹. 1. Origins.—Interest in origins is a mark of J¹ and furnishes a convenient starting point for the analysis of the original J material in chs. 2-4. This narrative tells of how man was expelled from the garden, in which he had lived a carefree life, "to till the ground from which he was taken" (3:23), of his subsequent reduction, following the crime of Cain—in the mind of the author the sole representative of the human race as it was then constituted—to the cultureless life of "a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth" (4:12), and of the origins of nomadism, music, and metalworking (cf. 4:20-22), the beginning of civilization.

Furthermore (see Exeg.), underlying the not too clear statement in 9:20 is a notice that "Noah was the first tiller of the soil," that is, agriculture originated with him.

In marked contrast to the extraordinary skill with which the garden story is told and the concise simplicity of the account of the rise of nomadism, music, and metalworking (4:20-22), is the awkwardness of the movement of man here depicted, from the garden, through agriculture, to the cultureless life of a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth, through nomadism to agriculture again—an awkwardness which suggests the presence of the work of more than one hand.

It will be noted in the Exegesis (a) that the Cain story is from the same hand as the story of man's life in, and expulsion from, the garden, and (b) that the account of the rise of nomadism, and so forth, knows nothing of the Flood. The story of the Flood contains certain stylistic indications that it is from the same hand as the garden story. The inference to be drawn is that the garden story, and so the story of Cain and Abel, are from another hand than the account of the rise of nomadism. When these two stories are placed to one side a very simple narrative is left, telling of the birth of the first child, Seth (4:25), and of his son Enosh, who originated the cult of Yahweh (4:26); of the birth of his son Cain (4:1), and of five succeeding generations to Lamech (4:17-18), whose three sons originated, respectively, nomadism, music, and metalworking (4:20-22). And the possibility has been suggested that Lamech's daughter Naamah (4:22b) was represented as the mother of Noah, the originator of agriculture (cf. 5:29b as emended, and 9:20).

This simple narrative—allowing for the possibility of some expansion, e.g., 4:18—is from J¹.

The reference to "the man"—to be read for "Adam" in 4:25 (see Exeg.)—in the opening sentence of the extant J¹ material suggests that this narrative began with an account of the creation of man, if not of the universe as a whole—an account which, if it ever existed, was dropped by J² in favor of his more elaborate myth. J¹ then told of the origins of Yahwism (4:26b); of nomadic civilization (4:20-22); of agriculture (5:28b-29abc); of viticulture (9:20)—attaching to this a tale intended to account for the superiority of Israel over the Canaanites (9:21-25); of the mighty ones (10:8); of the Nephilim (6:2); and of diverse peoples and languages (11:4-6, 8a).

2. Contact of Yahwism with the Religion of Canaan.—For this, the introduction to his history of Israel, J¹ for the most part had drawn upon the traditions of the seminomadic society on the edge of Palestine, between the desert and the sown. He now turned his attention to the legends of Canaan proper. His methods can best be discerned and appreciated through a consideration of the situation which confronted Yahwism in Hebron. The Israelites who settled there quite naturally began to worship the local deity from whom the fertility of the land and of the flocks was believed to derive. At first the question as to the relationship of this deity to Yahweh would scarcely be raised, but it soon became pressing. For the felt relationship between Israel and Yahweh was, because of its character, inimical to polytheism, as the so-called Song of Deborah shows (Judg. 5). This hymn of thanksgiving to Yahweh for his victory in battle is remarkable in many ways, not least because it speaks of his defeat of the Canaanites but never mentions their gods. It might have been expected that the author would have sought to enhance Yahweh's prestige by claiming for him a triumph over beings of his own rank, yet he makes no such claim. The meaning of this strange silence is suggested by the ecstatic character of the song. The exclusion of the gods of Canaan was the spontaneous expression of an immediate awareness of the sole deity of Yahweh.

That is to say, in those moments when Yahweh was apprehended as immediately and catastrophically present—when he was manifesting himself in the raging storm or, as the God of war, had seized upon his people to use them as the agents of his wrath against his enemies—Israel's experience was one of possession, so intense that all thought of other deities faded out in a momentary, emotional monotheism. Because of this experience there was implicit in Yahwism almost from the first a tendency, indeed a drive, toward monotheism.

3. The God of Hebron Identified with Yahweh.—When therefore the question as to the relationship of Yahweh to the god of Hebron became pressing, it was all but inevitable that the local deity should come to be identified with Yahweh, and this is what happened. The local sanctuary was taken over. The primary legend of the sanctuary, telling of the theophany which had occasioned its founding (18:1-8), was incorporated into the Yahwist tradition. The values which its religion enshrined were related to the values of Yahwism.

4. The Abraham Tradition.—The central human figure in the tradition of Hebron was Abraham, venerated as the founder of the sanctuary and as the father of the community. Entering into the life of the community, the Israelites who settled there came to claim him as their father too. But Israel had come from the desert, and the memory of their desert origin could not be ignored. Nor did they wish to ignore it, for it marked them off from the Canaanite element in the population, from whose immoral behavior they recoiled in horror (see Exeg. on 9:20-27; 19:30-38). The contradiction was resolved by having Abraham come from the desert (see Exeg. on 12:1-4a; 13:18; 29:1-14).

5. Lot and the Legend of Sodom.—With him came Lot, his nephew, who was identified with the man who, according to another legend current in the vicinity of Hebron, had been delivered from the overthrow of Sodom (13:2, 5, 7, 11a, 13; 19:1-28), and also with the somewhat dubious character who, a third legend related, had entered into an incestuous union with his daughters in a certain cave in the mountains of Moab (19:30-38).

6. Isaac of Beer-sheba Made the Son of Abraham.—To these three originally independent legends of Hebron, Sodom, and the cave, J¹ now related the tradition of the sanctuary of Beer-sheba. There Isaac had filled much the same role as that filled by Abraham at Hebron. So long as the communities of Hebron and Beer-sheba had remained separate and distinct, with no consciousness of a common past, the fact that they had different fathers would cause no difficulty. But once Isaac came to be venerated as father by the Israelites who settled in the vicinity of Beer-sheba, the question of his relationship to the father of the Israelite community at Hebron was bound to be raised. This question J¹ answered by making Isaac the son promised to Abraham as a reward for his hospitality to Yahweh when he visited Hebron incognito (18:1-9; 21:1a, 2a, 6b).

7. The Isaac Tradition.—But the tradition also connected Isaac with Beer-lahai-roi. J¹ accordingly represented his birth as occurring there (see Exeg. on 20:1a), told of his living there upon attaining manhood (25:11b), and then described his movement northward to Beer-sheba, incorporating into the narrative at this point a derisive tale concerning the Philistines (26:1-11), and some material dealing with the origin and ownership of certain wells in the desert (26:12-33).

8. Primacy of Abraham.—It is significant that in this process of unification of the traditions of the two sanctuaries Abraham of Hebron emerged as the father of Isaac of Beer-sheba. Doubtless the custodians of the latter shrine would have preferred to have their hero made the father of his rival. That the articulated tradition took the form it did can be due only to the power and prestige of the priesthood of Hebron, to which J¹ may well have belonged, and which could maintain the position of its patron against all claimants.

9. The East-Jordan Tradition.—The legends of Abraham, Isaac, and the destruction of Sodom are all rooted in the south. That of the man and his daughters living in the cave in the mountains of Moab, on the other hand, belongs to the land east of the Jordan. So, too, does the figure of Jacob (see Exeg. on 25:21-26), whom J¹ now linked with the southern tradition.

The fact that J¹ not only included in his narrative legends which had taken their rise across the Jordan, but gave them a marked prominence, is of considerable significance. His primary interest was certainly in the south, and indeed, as has been seen, in Hebron. The southern clans had been under the immediate influence of Moses, and had entered Palestine by a movement northward from Kadesh, bringing with them the concept of Yahweh as the transcendent God of righteousness. Yet J¹, articuling the local legends of the south with the tradition which the clans had brought from the desert, felt it necessary to relate the legends of the land east of the Jordan to this unified tradition. This indicates not only that there must have been considerable coming and going between the south and the east,⁴ but also that the east had been influenced by Mosaism to such an extent that it was, in the mind of J¹, of equal importance with the south with which, indeed, it formed practically one religious community.⁵

10. The Jacob Tradition.—It was therefore necessary for Jacob, who had already come to be known as the father of the east-Jordan Israelite community (see Exeg. on 29:31-30:24), to be made the son of Isaac. But according to the legend (25:21-26) Jacob was not the first-born of his father; that role was filled by Esau, his twin; and Esau was traditionally the father of the Edomites. To account for the fact that not Esau but Jacob had inherited the divine promise to Abraham, J¹ adapted a folk tale to make it an account of how Esau sold his birthright to Jacob (25:27, 29-34).

11. Tribal Traditions.—The way was now clear for the linking with Jacob of the eponymous ancestors of such Israelite tribes as were known to J¹. But two of these eponyms, Simeon and Levi, had long been regarded as the sons of one Leah (see Exeg. on 29:16), and a third, Joseph, was already known as the son of Rachel (see Exeg. on 29:1-14). Furthermore, Jacob was already associated, in the east-Jordan legend, with Laban the Aramaean (see Exeg. on 31:44-55). To unify these diverse traditions J¹ made Leah and Rachel the daughters of Laban, whom Jacob married (29:9-12, 26) when visiting the land of the people of the east in the North Arabian desert (29:1).

The narrative then recorded the birth of four sons to Leah: Reuben, the eponym of the east-Jordan tribe of that name, and Simeon, Levi, and Judah, the eponyms of three southern groups (29:31-35). Dinah, who played a leading role in a Simeon-Levi tradition (see Exeg. on ch. 34), was made Leah's daughter. By making Joseph, the Shechemite figure from whom the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh had come to trace their descent (see Exeg. on 47:27-48:22), ⁴ In this connection it may be noted that of the stories belonging to the J² stratum in the book of Judges, two record events occurring east of the Jordan (Judg. 8:4-21; 11:30-40), and a third is located at the Jordan near Jericho (the basic material in Judg. 3:12-30). J² also records Saul's deliverance of Jabesh-gilead (I Sam. 11:1-11).

the son of Rachel, J¹ both preserved a tradition which had already taken form in the north, and at the same time accounted for the fact that these tribes, though Yahwist, were, in his time, in many ways still alien to the southern confederacy.

12. Folklore.—Before recording Jacob's return to Palestine J¹ incorporated into his narrative a humorous tale of one shepherd overreaching another, adapting it so that it would show the cleverness of the Israelites in comparison with the dull-witted, though grasping, Aramaeans (30:27-43)—the dubious morality of Jacob's conduct does not appear to have troubled him (cf. Exeg. on 26:1-11; 25:29-34). The account of Jacob's departure was also enlivened by the inclusion of the incident of the stolen teraphim—another example of Israelite cleverness and of Aramaean stupidity (see Exeg. on 31:17-43). This led up to the traditional material of the covenant by which Mount Gilead had been fixed as the boundary line between the east-Jordan Israelites and the desert Aramaeans (see Exeg. on 31:44-55).

13. Jacob Identified with Israel.—At this point in his narrative J¹ found a place for what may well have been the primary legend of Jacob—his wrestling with the numen of the river Jabbok (32:24-31). To this he added the incident of the change of Jacob's name to Israel (32:27-28). In this way he furnished an explanation of the fact that the Yahwist tribes whose varied traditions he was articulating were known not as the sons of Jacob but as the sons of Israel.

14. Rise of Judah.—J¹'s representation of the eponym of the unimportant tribe of Reuben as Jacob's first-born was in all probability due to the fact that this east-Jordan tribe was the first Israelite group to claim Jacob as an ancestor. Similarly Simeon and Levi were represented as the second and third sons respectively because they alone were traditionally the sons of Leah (see Exeg. on 29:31-30:24). Historically, leadership among the clans with which J¹ was concerned was exercised by none of these three, but by Judah, whom J¹ had placed as the fourth of Jacob's sons. To account for this J¹ made use of two tribal legends: that of Reuben's violation of his father's concubine (35:22a), and that of the treachery of Simeon and Levi (the Horite story in ch. 34). Whatever the original significance of these tales may have been, for J¹ they explained how Reuben had lost the privilege and prestige belonging to the first-born, which then devolved upon Simeon. But Simeon and Levi also disgraced themselves, and the rights of leadership passed to Judah.

15. Joseph and the Descent into Egypt.—With the story of Tamar, accounting for the presence of a Canaanite element in the tribe of Judah (see Exeg. on ch. 38), J¹ completed his articulation of the various local legends of Palestine. This material had now to be linked with the historic Israelite tradition of the Exodus. This was accomplished by means of the story of Joseph, Jacob's fifth son. While J¹ may have been aware of some tradition associating the Shechemite hero Joseph with Egypt, he for the most part depended in this section of his narrative upon his own imagination. He told how Joseph was sold into slavery by his brothers (37:26-27, 28 α), and was taken to Egypt (39.1), where he rose to a position of power which enabled him to bring his father and his family to Egypt in a time of famine (46:1 α). Their descendants remained there even after Joseph's death (50:24 $\alpha\beta$, 26 α), and the stage was set for the Exodus.

B. Religion and Theology of J¹. 1. Uniqueness of Yahweh.—The J¹ narrative was thus composed of legends of diverse origin which the author brought together and ordered in such a way as to relate them to the desert tradition of Yahwism and to make them a vehicle for the preservation both of the ancient values of that tradition and of the values with which it had been enriched through its understanding and generous contact with the religion of Canaan. That is, his accomplishment was much more than a literary tour de force. The narrative he produced has a note of authenticity which bears witness to the fact that he really believed the events he recorded were due to the activity of Yahweh, not to the activity of some other god or gods whom he had, by a kind of literary device, identified with Yahweh. In other words, J¹ was religiously a monotheist. Whatever he may have thought of other gods—there is, it should be noted, no mention of them in his narrative—he certainly did not take them seriously. Yahweh was the only supernatural being who counted for anything, and he counted for everything. He was the sole source of power, the arbiter of man's destiny, the fountain of justice. For this reason J¹ was aware of a unity underlying all life and making for order. To the realization of this order, which had its source in Yahweh's will, he dedicated himself, and because of this self-dedication he was able to discern the often hidden meaning of the material lying before him and to weld it into an ordered and meaningful unity.

2. Significance of Human Activity.—And yet in this narrative Yahweh is rarely represented as intervening directly in human affairs. He does so at the dispersal of peoples (11:8), and at the destruction of Sodom (19:1-28), but in both of these stories J¹ was dependent upon previously existing legends which he was adapting to Yahwism. In his representation that the conception of Isaac was miraculous he was probably dependent upon the inaugural legend of the sanctuary of Hebron (see Exeg. on 18:1-33), for tales of this kind not infrequently ended with the miraculous birth of a son to the couple who had showed hospitality to the visiting stranger.⁶ In three other passages (25:21; 29:31; 30:22) dealing with the rise of the second and third generations of Abraham's descendants, he simply follows the pattern laid down in the notice of the conception of Isaac.

The only other case of direct divine intervention is in the call of Abraham (12:1-4 α). Here there is no dependence upon an earlier source. The author, as has already been suggested, is giving expression in simple, concrete form to the conviction of his people that they had been chosen by Yahweh. His representation thus rests upon an actual historical experience of divine action.

It may therefore be maintained that J¹ where he is writing freely, not under the necessity of preserving a salient point in an already existing legend, keeps his narrative on a very human level. His consciousness of the will of God as a decisive force in history has not led him to underestimate the importance of human action. Israel is superior to Edom because Jacob, however unscrupulous, was more provident than Esau (25:27, 29-34). Jacob increased his flocks and herds not through a special blessing, but because he was clever enough to outwit Laban (30:29-43). Judah rose to a position of leadership not by divine appointment, but because his three older brothers, Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, in turn forfeited their privileges through lack of respect for another's rights (35:22 α ; ch. 34; cf. Exeg. on 49:3-8).

The history of Reuben, Simeon, and Levi shows that J¹ did not simply subscribe to the dictum that God helps those who help themselves. On the other hand, he did not believe that divine protection released a man from the necessity of protecting himself and his own interests. It was in these terms, inadequate though they were, that he apprehended the truth that the supernatural does not in its operation displace or destroy the natural, but heightens its capacity.

3. Uniqueness of Israel.—This throws light upon another characteristic of his narrative—an apparently naïve sense of the superiority of Israel to all foreigners. Two of the stories just cited—Jacob's outwitting of Esau (25:27, 29-34) and his successful overreaching of Laban (30:29-43)—illustrate this. In these tales the cleverness of the Israelite Jacob is contrasted with the stupidity of the Edomite Esau and the Aramaean Laban. Other instances of this attitude are the story of Isaac's hoaxing of the Philistines (see Exeg. on 26:1-11), the derisive tale of the stolen teraphim (see Exeg. on 31:17-43),⁷ and the account of Jacob's encounter with the shepherds at the well (29:1-12) with its implicit contrast between the hard-working, careful Israelite and the shiftless Aramaean. This however represents something more than a kind of childish, nonmilitary jingoism. Rather, it voices the conviction of J¹ that Israel's prosperity and sense of security were due to a heightening of a native shrewdness through supernatural illumination and endowment. Doubtless his illustrations were not altogether happy. But it should be remembered that he was here making use of folk material. He was aware of what his public wanted, and may well have felt that the inclusion of these stories in his narrative would help toward the popular acceptance of the great truths he was presenting. However that may be, he was on firmer ground when he contrasted Israelite with Canaanite in the tale of Noah's drunkenness (9:20-25) and—though possibly unfairly—Israelite with Moabite and Ammonite in the story of Lot's daughters (19:30-38). Yahwism did make for morality.

4. Definitive Character of Work of J¹.—J¹'s work was definitive. It is indeed probable that the diverse material contained in his narrative had already been reduced to some kind of order by the priesthood of Hebron before he wrote. If so, then his story when it appeared will have been to some extent a familiar one. Yet the very process of writing it down inevitably involved a considerable degree of editing to provide a smooth transition from one legend to another and to weld them more firmly into a unity. It is, of course, impossible to distinguish J¹'s own contributions to the unification of the tradition from the work, unwritten, of his predecessors. Nor is there any need here to attempt to do so. What is important is the fact that his narrative both preserved the tradition of the community to which he belonged and, at the same time, established its form and determined the lines of its future development. He secured for all time the position of Abraham as the father of the faithful. Hebron was already in decline when he produced his history, but the prestige of its patron saint remained undiminished because the legend had been reduced to writing, and had been made the legend not of one locality only, but of the community as a whole.

⁷ With these may be compared the earliest stratum of the Samson cycle (Judg. 13-16).

So Abraham of Hebron came to be accepted by the north which had known nothing of him. So Isaac of Beer-sheba—a shadowy figure at best—remained as the second member in the hierarchy of the nation's ancestors. So Jacob retained his role as the father of Joseph of Shechem, despite the latter's commanding position in the tradition of the powerful tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. The scheme of relationships devised by J¹ became the pattern for all future historians of Israel's beginnings until modern times.

IV. The J² Document

A. Purpose and Methods of J².—J¹ had been prompted to write his history by the crisis in the fortunes of Hebron occasioned by David's move to his new capital, Jerusalem. It was another and more serious crisis which was responsible for the literary activity of J²—the disruption of the kingdom of David and Solomon. J² was concerned to counter the blow which this event had administered to the unity of Israel. He set about providing a history which would show that this unity inhered not in the political framework in which it had for a time found partial expression, but in the relationship of the people to Yahweh. He took as the foundation of his new narrative the work of J¹, adding to it myths and legends of various kinds of which J¹ had known nothing, probably because they formed no part of the pastoral tradition of the south.

1. Babylonian Myths.—The first of these tales was, it seems probable,⁸ a Canaanite version of the Babylonian creation myth, Enuma eliš. The second was the saga of Eden, the garden of God (see Exeg. on ch. 3), also current in Palestine, presumably in Jerusalem and its vicinity. Both of these, it will be seen, J² drastically revised to render them more compatible with Yahwism. The revision was carried through with consummate artistry. When the secondary material has been excised from 2:4b-3:24, the narrative which remains is all but flawless. It concludes with the expulsion of the man and his wife from the garden to wrest a living from the ground. Thus, according to J², man's first occupation was agriculture. This representation was inconsistent with the scheme of J¹, according to whom man had risen from a cultureless existence first to nomadism (4:20) and only later to agriculture (see Exeg. on 5:29). To resolve this contradiction J² made use of the story of Cain and Abel, according to which Cain—in the J² context the sole representative of the human race—had been condemned to live the life of "a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth" (4:12), that is, to a life without security and without culture.

At this point J² caught up the narrative of his predecessor and told of man's rise through nomadism to agriculture again. The material added by J² to his predecessor's simple narrative is then the nucleus of 2:4b-3:23; 4:2-12, 16; and possibly some of the names in 4:18, 26. J² also inserted a third myth of Babylonian origin, the story of the Flood, purging it of all suggestion of polytheism and divine caprice, and representing the catastrophe as sent by Yahweh to punish human wickedness (see Exeg. on 6:5-9:19). To tie this in with the earlier narrative he identified the hero of the Flood with Noah, the discoverer of agriculture and viticulture in the J¹ tradition. Then, following the tale of Canaan's impiety (9:20-25) taken over from the document of his predecessor, he gave a brief list of the descendants of the three sons of Noah (see Exeg. on 10:1-32)—thus revealing an interest in the world outside of Israel considerably greater and more objective than that of J¹. This was followed by the stories of the dispersal of peoples (11:2-8), and of the origin of the Nephilim (6:1-4), both taken over with some elaboration from the earlier narrative.

2. Literary Skill of J²—Up to this point J² has simply expanded the J¹ narrative by adding to it material chiefly of Babylonian origin. His treatment of the history of the patriarchs is more varied. First of all may be noted the passages by which the transition from legend to legend was made more smooth and the narrative as a whole more carefully articulated. The outstanding instance is the tale of Jacob's deception of Isaac (the earlier strand of 27:1-45), with which belongs the story of his meeting and reconciliation with Esau (the earlier strand of 32:3-23; 33:1-15). To bring Jacob into contact with Laban, J¹ had simply stated that he went to the land of the people of the east (29:1). J² provided a motive for his journey—his fear of his brother whom he had defrauded—being careful later, artist that he was, to tell how the feud between them was resolved. At the same time he elaborated the tale of Jacob's meeting with Rachel so as to explain how Jacob had recognized her as his cousin (29:3-6)—a point which J¹ had left unexplained.

Again, J¹ had linked the legend of Hebron and Sodom by making the man saved from the overthrow of the city Abraham's nephew, and by identifying the strangers whom he had protected with the three visitors to Hebron, who had gone from there directly to Sodom. J², by inserting 18:16, 20-21, 33b, tightened this connection: the Lord and his companions had been on their way to Sodom when they stopped at Hebron.

Once more J¹, to identify the son promised to Abraham with Isaac, had simply recorded Abraham's journey to Beer-lahai-roi (see Exeg. on 20:1a) and Sarah's words at the child's birth, "every one who hears will laugh over me" (21:6b). J² added the story of Sarah's incredulous laughter when she overheard the promise made to Abraham by his as yet unrecognized guest (18:10-15).

3. Activity of Yahweh in History.—This little story provides an instance also of J²'s care to stress the often hidden activity of the Lord which J¹ had been content to take for granted. For it is to be noted that in 18:10-15 it is explicitly stated that the Lord himself is the speaker. In contrast to this is the consistent use of the plural in vs. 2, 4-9. That is, J¹, after prefixing vs. 1a to the old Hebron saga, had made no distinction between the three visitors and had preserved the traditional representation that Abraham had not had the slightest idea that they were divine, let alone that one of them was the Lord. J², concerned lest the point of the J¹ story should be missed—that the birth of the heir to the promise had been made possible only by the intervention of the Lord himself—cast 18:10-15 in the singular. At the same time he added to Abraham's greeting of his guests the words in vs. 3—the use of the singular distinguishes between the Lord and his companions—to underline the fact of the Lord's presence.

Another instance of J²'s concern that the will of God should be recognized as the determining factor in life is provided by his treatment of the story of the birth of Esau and Jacob (25:21-26a). J¹ had explained the fact that Israel, not Edom, had inherited the divine promise by the tale of Esau's selling his birthright (25:29-34). His explanation was thus on a purely human level, to say nothing of its dubious morality. J², by inserting 25:22-23, represented the relative positions of the two peoples as having been determined and divinely revealed before the birth of their respective ancestors. Esau's surrender of his rights at Jacob's heartless insistence was thus emptied of any significance. So, too, was the story of the deception of Isaac (27:1-40), which J² was to include for reasons already noted, and which ascribed Israel's favored position to a father's blessing, however fraudulently obtained.

This desire to stress the part played by the Lord in human affairs underlies the occasional, smaller additions which J² made to the earlier narrative. Examples of this kind of material are: the words "the LORD being merciful to him" in 19:16; "and the LORD has blessed you wherever I turned" (30:30), explicitly ascribing the increase of Laban's wealth not to Jacob's work, but primarily to divine favor; and 31:3, representing Jacob's decision to return home as being due not to his realization that he would be safer out of Laban's reach, but to God's command.

4. Moral Sensitivity of J².—Of a character similar to this theological editing are the additions which J² made to five of J¹'s stories which he found morally disturbing. In three of these—the story of Jacob's outwitting of Laban (30:27-43), that of Rachel's theft of the teraphim (31:19-35), and that of Judah and Tamar (ch. 38)—his purpose is to mitigate the very dubious conduct of the two patriarchs. In the fourth—that of the seduction of Dinah (the earlier strand of ch. 34)—his concern is to correct what appeared to him to be the too lenient judgment of J¹ as to the seriousness of the sexual offense. This he does by justifying to some extent the conduct of Simeon and Levi. In the fifth—the story of Joseph's rejection of the advances of his master's wife (ch. 39)—he emphasizes the virtue of his hero. Allied with these additions is the revision to which J² subjected the tale of Jacob's wrestling at the Jabbok (32:24-31).

5. Uniqueness of Israel.—Another notable addition by J² to the document lying before him was the story of Isaac's marriage (the earlier strand of 24:2-67; note also the implications of 22:20; 24:1; 25:5). Its significance lies in the fact that it bears witness to an increased concern, over that shown by J¹, for the purity of Israelite blood. It may indeed be questioned whether J¹ had been concerned with this at all. True, he tells of Jacob going to the land of the people of the east, where he falls in with his kinsfolk and takes as his wives the two daughters of Laban. But, as has been suggested above, his primary reason for having Jacob make this journey was to bring him into contact with Laban so that the east-Jordan tradition of the covenant of Gilead (the earlier strand of 31:44-55) might be recorded. His identification of Leah and Rachel as Laban's daughters appears to have been made for the purpose of unifying his narrative; at any rate, he nowhere stresses the fact that they were Aramaean, not Canaanite, as he would presumably have done had he attached any importance to this supposed fact.

But though J¹'s representation of Jacob's wives as of nomad origin thus seems to have been merely an accidental result of the necessity he was under to unify the diverse material he was using, it appears to have taken on a significance of its own as time passed: Jacob's wives were not Canaanites; they were of the same stock as Abraham. This gave rise to a self-conscious concern to maintain the purity of that stock, and from this developed the tale in ch. 24, which is thus dependent on that in 29:1-14, 26—a dependence which manifests itself further in the motif of the meeting at the well (a prominent feature in both tales).

6. The Tradition of Beer-sheba.—In the J² narrative this account of the marriage of Isaac is immediately preceded by a story which ascribes to Abraham the founding of Beer-sheba (the earlier strand of 21:22-33, with which belongs the secondary harmonizing material in 26:12-33). J¹ had not associated Abraham with that sanctuary. According to him Beer-sheba was founded by Isaac (26:31-33). In assigning this role to Abraham (21:33), J² was presumably dependent upon a development in the local tradition which had occurred in the course of the century intervening between J¹ and himself. This development was, it may be assumed, due to the activity of the priesthood of Hebron in its endeavor to preserve and to establish the unity of Yahwism. This, as has been seen, had led to the representation of Abraham as the father of Isaac. Apparently such a representation had not accomplished its purpose, so a further modification was introduced: Abraham himself was made the founder of Beer-sheba. This was in effect to claim that Beer-sheba—and its priesthood—stemmed from, and so was subject to the control of, Hebron. How far the priesthood of Hebron succeeded in implementing the claim it is impossible to say. The fact that J² included in his narrative another, less creditable, story which had been carried over from Isaac to Abraham—that of his representing his wife as his sister (12:10-13:1; cf. 26:1-12)—is significant in this connection. It is in the highest degree improbable that J² would have tolerated this very questionable tale. He can only have included it because of popular pressure. That such pressure was brought to bear at this point would seem to indicate that the claim of the priesthood of Hebron had been effective to this extent, that Abraham had supplanted Isaac in the popular mind as the hero of Beer-sheba.

It would thus appear that J², concerned to have the J¹ tradition of the south accepted in the north, found himself compelled to take full account of the tradition then current at Beer-sheba. The reason for this can only be surmised. It is possible that the claim of Hebron to ecclesiastical pre-eminence (see Exeg. on 12:6-8) was offensive to the northerners. If so, the unique position of that sanctuary in the J¹ narrative will have militated against their acceptance of that tradition. By representing Beer-sheba as of equal rank with Hebron, J² deprived the latter sanctuary of its uniqueness and undercut its claims. At the same time he enlisted Beer-sheba on his side. Now Beer-sheba at a later date had some special connection with the north: witness the statement in I Kings 19:3—in itself quite unnecessary to the narrative as a whole—that Elijah stopped there on his way to Horeb; the mention of the sanctuary along with Bethel, Gilgal, Samaria, and Dar in Amos 5:5; 8:14; and the references to Isaac in Amos 7:9, 16. It is impossible to say whether at the time J² wrote Beer-sheba was already held in special reverence in the north. If it was, then J²'s respect for its tradition is explained.

7. Ishmael.—Another story added by J² to the work of his predecessor was that of the birth of Ishmael (16:1b-2, 4-8, 11-12). This tale obviously originated among the Ishmaelites. The facts (a) that J² included it in his narrative, (b) that in so doing he associated Ishmael with Abraham—no feature of the tale in its primary form (see Exeg. on 16:11-16)—and so with Isaac, and (c) that the Ishmaelites lived in the desert to the south of Palestine in which Beer-sheba was situated, suggest that the story formed part of the tradition of that sanctuary. If so, then its preservation by J² provides further evidence of the weight he attached to that tradition. It is also an additional indication of his interest in the non-Israelite world, already revealed by his listing of the descendants of Noah.

8. The Tradition of the North.—The remaining material which J² added to the patriarchal narrative was inserted to bring it into closer agreement with the traditions of the north. His story of Jacob at Bethel (28:13-16, 19) reflects the legendary association of the patriarch with that sanctuary. His additions to the chronicle of the birth of Jacob's children (the earlier strand of 30:1-30) account for certain Israelite tribes of which J¹ had known nothing. So, too, does his story of the birth of Benjamin. Only a fragment (35:17) of this survives, but it may safely be assumed—in view of the parallel E narrative (35:16, 18-20), and of the reference to Rachel's grave in a later part of the J document (I Sam. 10:2)—that J² here told of Rachel's death in childbirth and of her burial. The story thus not only accounts for the tribe of Benjamin; it also preserves the local tradition of Ephrath.

9. Joseph and the Tradition of Shechem.—One of the sacred places of Shechem was the grave of Joseph. Of this J¹ appears to have known nothing, tacitly assuming that he was buried in Egypt. J², having recorded Jacob's purchase of a piece of ground at Shechem (33:19), tells of the dying Joseph's directions as to the ultimate disposal of his body (50:25, 26b), and later records their fulfillment (Exod. 13:19; Josh. 24:32).

The Shechemite tradition of Joseph appears to have placed the misadventure which had brought him to Egypt at Dothan (see Exeg. on ch. 37). Of this also J¹ seems to have been ignorant, for he located the event in the south. J² therefore corrected the apparent error (37:15-17). At the same time he greatly elaborated his predecessor's account of Joseph's dealings with his brothers. In this he was motivated by his concern that his narrative should be accepted by the great tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (cf. especially the earlier strand of ch. 48). He was also availing himself of an opportunity to allow his literary powers full expression; for here, scarcely hampered by already existing traditions, he could at last write freely.

B. Additions to the J² Document.—Except for the material in ch. 15 and the poem in ch. 49, only minor additions were made to that part of the J² document now preserved in Genesis before it was conflated with a new history which was written in the north some two hundred years later, early in the seventh century, the E document (see article "The Growth of the Hexateuch," pp. 196-97).

V. The E Document

A. Purpose and Methods of E.—There is no trace of E in chs. 1-11. Since it is unlikely that R^{J^E} would have thus completely ignored his treatment of the prepatriarchal period had such existed, it may safely be assumed that this part of the J narrative created no difficulty in the north, and so was tacitly accepted. It was only with the story of Abraham that difficulties first made themselves felt; and it was with Abraham that the E narrative began.

1. The Horeb Tradition.—Its most notable divergence from the J tradition is its consistent use of "Elohim" instead of "Yahweh" in the stories of the patriarchs and up to the point of the explicit revelation of the divine name to Moses (Exod. 3:13-15). What the author here had in mind it is difficult to say. The fact that in the narrative of the Exodus he designates Horeb, not Sinai, as the mount of God, suggests that he is depending in part upon the traditions of a group in the north of another origin than the tribes which had come from Sinai.

It is of course possible that Yahweh, the storm god, had come to be identified with the deity of Horeb while the ancestors of this group were still ranging the desert in the vicinity of that mountain—that is, that the identification made at Sinai was duplicated at Horeb. It is also possible that the god of Horeb was identified not directly with the storm god but with the god of Sinai—that is, that one mountain deity was identified with another. But the acceptance of either of these possible explanations would demand the further acceptance of a somewhat remarkable coincidence. For it would mean that the identification of the god of Horeb with the god of Sinai, whether directly or indirectly, had been followed by the movement, quite independently, of the worshipers of both deities to Palestine. It seems therefore more probable that the god of Horeb was first identified with Yahweh the God of Sinai subsequent to the settlement of his devotees in Palestine. If this is the case, then Exod. 3:13-15 will have been E's justification of the identification, and his use of "Elohim" up to this point will have been merely incidental.

2. Yahweh and the Deities of Canaan.—There is another possibility: that E was aware of and wished to stress the fact that many of the legends concerning the patriarchs had once been associated with deities other than Yahweh. The memory of this fact may have lingered longer in the north than in the south, where it had grown dim—if it had not, indeed, completely disappeared—as a result of the literary activity of J¹ and J², whose tacit identification of these deities with Yahweh had been thoroughly accepted. In the north, where the J document was not well known, the popular mind may well have been still in the same uncertainty as to the relationships between Yahweh and the ancient local deities as the southern mind had presumably been before J¹ wrote. A third consideration may have influenced E, namely his realization that the work of Moses had so profoundly affected Yahwism as to make it almost a new religion. E, it seems likely, would have been more acutely aware of this fact than J² had been. For J² was presumably a southerner, and the Yahwist tradition of the south had been, not only since but even before the entry into Palestine, a Mosaic tradition. That is, for J² Mosaic Yahwism was normal Yahwism. E's background was different. He was a northerner, and for some hundreds of years after the Conquest the Yahwism of the north had remained, predominantly at least, crisis Yahwism, and had not been enriched by the ideas of Mosaism until the time of David.

3. Importance of Beer-sheba.—E's most notable departure from J² in the Abraham stories is his omission of all reference to Hebron. Beer-sheba was the patriarch's only dwelling place in Palestine. While this omission may have been polemic in its intent, it seems more likely that E was simply recording the Abraham tradition as it was current in the north. The connection between Beer-sheba and the north has already been noted. It will have been through Beersheba that Abraham had come to be known in the north at all: the legends regarding him had been carried back there by pilgrims returning from the southern sanctuary. Thus, E's silence may reflect a certain rivalry between Hebron and Beer-sheba as well as northern hostility to Hebron.

E followed J² in associating Isaac, and through him Abraham, with Beer-lahai-roi (see Exeg. on 16:13-14), and in recording Abraham's imperiling of his wife (20:1b-16). This event he located not in Egypt, as J² had done (12:10-20), but, following the parallel story of Isaac (26:1-11), in Gerar. This change appears to have only a literary significance in that it is the result of a fusing of the two stories, both of which E found in the J narrative lying before him.

4. Concern for the Reputation of the Patriarchs.—Much more significant is his attempt to provide some justification for Abraham by his representation that Sarah was indeed his half sister (20:12). This is the first instance of E's consistent endeavor to rehabilitate the moral reputation of the patriarchs, whose conduct at certain points still remained somewhat dubious in J²'s narrative despite his efforts, noted above, to mitigate the effects of J¹'s earthy appreciation of a good story told at a foreigner's expense. Other instances of this kind of revision on the part of E are his attributing to Rebekah the major role in the deception of Isaac (see Exeg. on 27:1-40); his drastic rewriting of the Jacob-Laban story so that it no longer told of one rogue trying to outwit another but depicted Jacob as the innocent victim of Laban's duplicity, from the full consequences of which he was protected only by divine intervention (see Exeg. on 29:15-31:55); his representation that Joseph was kidnapped by a passing caravan of traders, not deliberately sold by his brothers (37:28aαβ); and his omission of what seemed to him to be the needlessly cruel incident of the placing of Joseph's cup in Benjamin's sack.

5. Dislike of the Sex Motif.—Similarly motivated was his omission of the stories of the destruction of Sodom (19:1-28), of Lot and his daughters (19:30-38), of Reuben's impiety (35:22a), of the seduction of Dinah (the earlier strand of ch. 34), of Judah and Tamar (ch. 38), and of the temptation of Joseph by his master's wife (39:1-20), in all of which sex provided the dominant motif. The tale of Jacob's wrestling at the Jabbok was dropped, doubtless because of the theological difficulties it occasioned.

6. Humanism.—The only story of Abraham peculiar to E is that of the testing of his faith when he was commanded by God to sacrifice Isaac (22:1-14, 19). It will be argued in the Exegesis on the passage that E was here making use of the inaugural legend of the sanctuary of the oak of Moreh near Shechem. He has, however, told it in such a way that his own awareness of the place of human relationships in religion shines through it. The love of a father for his son was not a matter of no concern to God. So, too, into his version of the Hagar-Ishmael story (21:8-21) he has introduced a note of tenderness which was lacking in the more rugged narrative of J². Both these tales thus reflect the sense of the humane, of the value of the natural virtues, the claim of which could not be ignored. Such other minor changes as E introduced into the narrative were designed either to bring it more into accord with the popular thinking of the north or to underline certain of the theological ideas to which J² had given expression.

B. Conflation of the J and E Documents.—Very few additions were made to the E patriarchal narrative—the more important of them are noted in the Exegesis—before it was combined with the J document. As to the work of the redactor R^{J^E}, responsible for this conflation, little need be added to what has been said in the article "The Growth of the Hexateuch" (see p. 197). His method was, clearly, to preserve the salient points of both narratives so as to secure the acceptance of his composition by both the south and the north, upon whose traditions J and E respectively depended.

VI. The P Document

A. Purpose and Methods of P.—That the P document was a rewriting of the tradition of the south is indicated by the fact that it associates Abraham exclusively with Hebron, and that in the Exodus narrative it places the great revelation to Moses at Sinai, not at Horeb.

1. Creation and Flood Stories.—The author drastically revised the J story of Creation, purging it of certain mythological elements which J² had apparently found it necessary to retain. The result—whether immediately or after some further redaction (see Exeg. on 1:1-2:3)—was the narrative, austere in its grandeur, with which the book opens.

That the story in 1:1-2:3 is in some way dependent upon the Babylonian creation myth *Enuma eliš*⁹ becomes apparent when a comparison is made of the two documents.

The Babylonian tale begins with a description of primeval chaos, personalized as Apsu and Tiamat, and of the evolution therefrom of several generations of deities, culminating in the supreme triad of the Babylonian pantheon, Anu, Bel, and Ea, and the sun-god Marduk. The powers of chaos attempting to destroy the heavenly deities, Apsu is subdued, and Tiamat, renewing the struggle, is slain by Marduk, who splits her carcass in two, making one half into a covering for the heavens and the other half the earth. He then creates the stars to regulate time, and the moon to rule the night. Finally, after declaring his intention to Ea, he creates man, taking for this purpose his own blood. In the hymn of praise to Marduk with which this recension closes the creation of vegetation is ascribed to him, but it is impossible to say at what point in the process this occurred owing to the illegibility of some parts of the tablets upon which the epic is preserved.

The points at which the narrative of 1:1-2:3 most clearly echoes this epic may be briefly noted. (a) The notion of a primeval watery chaos as the substance of which the earth was made (cf. 1:2), and the etymological equivalence of the Babylonian ti'āmat and the Hebrew word tehom—"the deep." There is in Genesis, however, no reference to Apsu, perhaps because of the relative insignificance of the role played by him in the parent myth. On the other hand, it is possible that the representation of "the Spirit of God . . . moving over the face of the waters" (1:2) may be dependent upon the reference to Apsu's mingling his waters with those of Tiamat to beget heaven and earth.¹⁰ (b) The representation that the firmament—the covering for the heavens—is a solid substance (cf. 1:6-7). (c) The purpose of the heavenly bodies—to regulate time and, in the case of the moon, to rule the night (cf. 1:14-18). (d) The representation that Marduk before making man, using his own blood, took counsel with Ea, which finds an echo in "Let us make man in our image" (1:26).

In view of the fact that the P Code was written in Babylonia during, and in the years immediately succeeding, the Exile,¹¹ it is difficult to believe that an author as Jewish as its author was would deliberately have made use of foreign material derived from the polytheistic environment in which he was living. It would seem, therefore, that the Babylonian epic which echoes throughout his story of Creation must earlier have become a part of Israel's cultural and religious heritage.

Now it is significant that 2:4b, derived from J, simply assumes, without describing, the making of "earth and heaven"—so the Hebrew, literally, not "the earth and the heavens"

⁹ See Skinner, Genesis, p. 43.

¹¹ See article "The Growth of the Hexateuch," pp. 198-200.

(KJV, RSV)—an expression which, it may be noted, indicates that the half verse is from another source than 1:1-2:3, in which "the heavens and the earth" (1:1, RSV; 2.1) is used.

Since this can scarcely be all that J had to say about the origin of the universe, it may reasonably be assumed that 2:4b was preceded in his narrative by a saga of Creation—which has been completely suppressed by RP in favor of the P story now under consideration. What the content of J's saga was can only be conjectured, but Karl Marti,¹² commenting on Isa. 51:9, has argued cogently that, in view of Deutero-Isaiah's use of J,¹³ it was a version of the Babylonian myth and told of God's destruction of the chaos monster, personalized, it would appear, as Rahab.¹⁴

Since the J document was written in the tenth or the ninth century B.C., before Israel had had any direct contact with Babylonia, it must be assumed that the myth had earlier found its way to Palestine and formed part of the culture of the land into which Israel entered at the Conquest. J, writing in the interest of Israelite monotheism, was compelled to take account of it and to relate it to Yahwism.

Consideration will be given to J's adaptation and revision of the myth in the Exegesis on 2:4b-25. Before this is undertaken, however, some further attention must be given to P's use of the story, now lost, which it is assumed he found at the beginning of the J narrative.

It is probable that 1:2 is not from P's hand (see Exeg.). That is, he seems to have carefully omitted any explicit reference to a primeval chaos from which the world was created and to have limited himself to an extremely cryptic allusion to it in 1:1, 4, 6, 9. The fact that 1:2 was later inserted indicates that the older form of the tale died hard.¹⁵

¹⁴ References to the monster Rahab in the O.T. are Job 26:12; Ps. 89:10; Isa. 51:9; possibly also Job 9:13; the name is used referring to Egypt in Ps. 87:4, and cryptically in Isa. 30:7.

¹⁵ That the myth of the conquest of chaos had a remarkable hold upon the Israelite mind is evidenced by (a) the allusions to Yahweh's subjection of the monster in Ps. 74:13-15—according to Isa. 27:1, a feat which will be repeated at the time of the end; (b) the references to the monster in Job 3:8; 7:12; 41:1-8; Ps. 104:26; Amos 9:3; (c) the use of the motif in Ezek. 29:3-7; 32:2-10; (d) the references to God's ordering of the waters in Job 38:10-11; Pss. 18:15; 33:6-7; 65:7; 104:5-9; Prov. 8:29; Jer 5:22; Nah. 1:4; Hab. 3:10; Ecclus. 43:23; Prayer of Manasse; (e) the representation of the time of the end as a resurgence of chaos in Ps. 46 (cf. Isa. 27:1); and (f) the similar depiction of the last unrest

But not only did P omit any reference to chaos; by his representation that the world was created by simple fiat—"And God said 'Let there be. . . . And it was so'" (1:3, 6, 7b, 9, 11, 14a, 15b, 20, 24)—he eliminated any suggestion of physical activity on the part of God. That this austere record of command and realization was for the average reader too far removed from the colorful myth is suggested by the fact that into it a later writer intruded vs. 7a, 12a, 16a, 17a, 18a, 21ab_a (without "the great sea monsters and"), 25a—a significant reminder of the need for anthropomorphism in religion. Certainly the material with which the account of the making of the heavenly bodies—vs. 14b, 15a, 16b, 17b—was subsequently elaborated is drawn from the earlier form of the myth, as is the mention of "the great sea monsters" in vs. 21.

A further point to be noted is the compression of eight creative acts into six days.¹⁶ This, of course, was to make possible the representation that God rested on the seventh day, hallowing it as the sabbath, which is thus presented as his final creative act.

Finally the notice in 1:29-30, the evidence for the secondary character of which is noted in the Exegesis, was added to the P narrative, possibly, as is there suggested, to supply a reference, however faint, to the J story of man's blissful life in the garden.

Omitting the story of the Fall, P revised and elaborated the J genealogical list of the descendants of the first man to fill in the period extending from the Creation to the Flood (5:1-28a, 30-32). The account of the Flood he likewise revised, heightening the element of the miraculous and reducing the role of Noah to one of little more than automatic obedience to a succession of divine commands (see Exeg. on 6:5-9:19). He then listed the descendants of Noah (the late strand of ch. 10) and traced the line through the first-born in each generation from Shem, Noah's eldest son, to Terah, the father of Abram.

2. The Patriarchs.—In his account of the patriarchs P omitted all reference to sanctuaries and their altars. According to his schematization of the history of Israel, no sacrifice was offered to Yahweh until Moses received directions of the nations in Isa. 5:30; 17:12-14; on these passages see Hermann Gunkel, Genesis (5th ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1922; "Göttinger Handkommentar"), pp. 121-22.

thereto at Sinai. He did not argue the case for a single sanctuary, much less fulminate against those who opposed it. His polemic took the form of the implied assertion that the patriarchs could not have erected altars—and that therefore the claim of any sanctuary to have been founded by one of the fathers was false. He also omitted all stories reflecting unfavorably upon the moral character of his heroes as well as other legends and folk tales which had been included in the J document because of their popular appeal. P was not interested in this kind of thing. Consequently he reduced the rich and varied narrative of the J document to a bare skeleton outline, expanding it only to provide divine sanction for the custom of circumcision (ch. 17), and to assert the people's claim to the sepulcher of their ancestors at Hebron (ch. 23). Except at these two points his narrative is dry as dust. Everything that happened happened by plan. His characters are little more than lay figures making certain necessary motions in preparation for the great revelation to come at Sinai. Abraham comes to Palestine, begets two sons, and dies. Ishmael is retired from the scene, and Isaac begets two sons and dies. Esau moves to Edom, and Jacob begets twelve sons and in course of time goes down into Egypt, where he dies. The Exodus follows.

The only additions of importance made to this narrative before its conflation with JE were the story of the covenant with the Shechemites (see Exeg. on ch. 34) and the notices stating the ages of the patriarchs at certain points in their respective careers. The former seems to have been in the nature of an overture to the leaders of the still embryonic Samaritan schism. The notices reveal an interest in chronology which possibly developed in compensation for the lack of the interest in places—the sanctuaries—which had characterized the earlier documents.

B. Completion of the Book.—The P document is the framework of the present narrative of Genesis. Into it the redactor R^P fitted the older JE history, making occasional adaptations to reconcile his sources. Subsequently the story of the war of the kings (ch. 14) was added, and the book as it now exists was substantially completed. It stands as a monument to the piety, the wisdom, and the ability of a long line of writers, unknown to us by name, who in successive generations accepted the task of bearing witness to, and explaining, the unshakable conviction of Israel that she had, by a divine act of choice, been brought into a unique relationship with the God whom she had come to apprehend as the one and only God, the creator, the redeemer, the ultimate controller of history, just, righteous, and loving, ever working to make men just, righteous, and loving in all their dealings, and to bring them to offer themselves to him in worship. Only through the worshipful acknowledgment of God's majesty and love could men be freed from pride and self-concern and receive the "power to become children of God" (John 1:12).

VII. Importance of Documentary Analysis

In the Exegesis considerable attention is paid to the sources from which the stories in their present form have been built up. The purpose of this is not merely to satisfy the academic interest of the commentator. It is to show how the religious and moral conscience of Israel developed in response to her deepening apprehension of the being and character of God. This development has been to some extent obscured by the redactors who combined the source documents, with the result that at certain points in the present narrative the impression is conveyed that the sometimes extremely dubious conduct of the patriarchs has been accepted without misgivings. But as the Exegesis of the Jacob-Esau and Jacob-Laban stories, for example, shows (25:21-33:16), both J² and E were often gravely disturbed at the moral implications of the traditions with which they were dealing.

Had the three documents, J¹, J², and E, been preserved intact, it would have been much less difficult to detect the concern of J² as regards certain of the details in the J¹ tradition, and to discern the drastic character of the measures taken by E to free the patriarchs from the charge of moral laxity. The method adopted here of breaking the narrative down into its component sources will, it is hoped, make more clear the way in which the religious and moral insight of the leaders of Israel deepened as they grew in the knowledge of God.

It need not be supposed that the moral sensitivity of the redactors was less than that of J², E, and P. R^{JE} was faced with the necessity of combining two documents, J and E, in such a way as to secure the acceptance of his work by the two groups whose traditions they respectively embodied. This demanded the construction of a unified narrative in which, nevertheless, the salient points of each tradition would be preserved. That is, R^{JE} conceived of the task as primarily a literary one, and he accomplished it with extraordinary skill. It may be doubted whether, engrossed as he was in reconciling the contradictions and inconsistencies presented by the two documents lying before him, he was aware of the occasionally unfortunate ethical implications of his own narrative. However that may be, the limitations imposed upon him by the historical situation in which he was working made it impossible for him entirely to avoid this consequence of the method he necessarily employed. And the same thing is true, mutatis mutandis, of RP.

VIII. Theological Significance of Genesis

In what sense can it be claimed that the authors who contributed to the building up of the present book of Genesis were inspired?

In the search for an answer to this question—and it is a question of fundamental importance—this fact must be borne in mind: that it is only in the Bible as a whole, not in any part of it, let alone in any one of its books, that we find the Word of God in its fullness. That word came “at sundry times and in divers manners” (Heb. 1:1) to a long succession of men. It came with power—with power to deal with certain concrete, historical situations, to judge them and to shape them so that they would contribute to the fulfillment of God’s purpose. That purpose was not clear for centuries. To each of the biblical writers was revealed just so much as he needed to know to achieve the work God was calling him to do. Indeed, it may be doubted whether with fuller knowledge he could have accomplished his work.

That is to say, inspiration was historically conditioned. Consequently, to answer the question stated above, “In what sense can it be claimed that the authors who contributed to the building up of the present book of Genesis were inspired?” full account must be taken of the historical situation in which each of them worked, and with which he was called to deal.

A. Work of J¹.—J¹ was called to relate the Yahwism of the desert, with its drive toward monotheism, to the life of Palestine. He was inspired to recognize the values of that life and the insights of its religion. He was inspired to draw out the implications of his own inarticulate monotheism, and to identify the deities worshiped at the local sanctuaries with Yahweh. He was inspired to see that Yahwism was something greater than a wilderness religion, that it was the religion which alone could give meaning to the new life into which Israel had entered. He was inspired to lead Yahwism to take the first of the steps by which it ceased to be the religion of one people and became a religion for all men. He was inspired to begin the fashioning of the national community of Israel into a world-wide community in which all nations would find their true meaning.

It is clear from the Bible as a whole that the fashioning of such a community was necessary to the process of man’s redemption. The individual is to be redeemed from the self-centeredness which issues in sin, through membership in a saving community. And a saving community is a community which finds its meaning not in itself but in God, and which recognizes that the reason for which it exists is not its own aggrandizement but the furthering of God’s purpose of redemption. J¹, by his recognition of the values of Canaanite religion and culture, and by his simple, unaffected appropriation of those values for Yahwism, fructified the tough desert mentality of the community of Israel and helped to create that attitude of receptivity to new ideas without which it could never have transcended the limitations of its origins to become a community of world-wide significance. There can be no doubt that the work of J¹ furthered the process of redemption.

B. Work of J².—So, too, did the work of J². His concern, as has been seen, was for the spiritual unity of Israel, and he did much to preserve, strengthen, and deepen it. In his taking over of the Babylonian myths current in Palestine and his adaptation of them to Yahwism, he carried further the work begun by J¹ when he had identified the local deities of Canaan with Yahweh: Yahweh was active not only in the desert and in Palestine, but also far to the east in Mesopotamia.

Little need be added here to what has already been said regarding J²’s insistence upon the activity of Yahweh in history, his moral sensitivity, and his conviction as to the uniqueness of Israel.¹⁷ In all this he was underlining and clarifying the meaning, vocation, and experience of the saving community to which he belonged. Outside the Bible inspiration need not have been claimed for him. Within the Bible the fact of his inspiration is so obvious that it need only be mentioned. Even his literary skill noted above is relevant in this connection. The fact that writing of this kind is found nowhere in ancient literature outside the literature of the Hebrews warrants the claim that J²’s artistry derived from his religion—that is, that it was the fruit of inspiration—for it was its religion and only its religion which distinguished the culture of Israel from that of the surrounding peoples. This being so, the skill of J² reveals something of the meaning of life and the meaning of redemption. The redeemed life must be an ordered life, sensitive to beauty. Oafishness and ugliness are not attributes of redemption.

¹⁷ By his use later in his document (Exod. 34:10) of the idea of the covenant, he gave concrete expression to the faith of the religious leaders of the community that the significance of Israel was to be found in its relationship to God, and that it was not simply one national community among many, but that from its beginning it had had a supranational vocation.

C. Work of E.—The same considerations apply to E as applied to J¹ and J², especially if, as is suggested in the article "The Growth of the Hexateuch" (see pp. 196-97), E wrote for the benefit of the northern community during the period of its reconstruction following the fall of Samaria.

D. Work of RJE.—The redactor RJE, who conflated the J and the E documents, was, as has been noted in the article just mentioned, concerned with building into a unity the northern and southern groups in Palestine during the Exile. His aim was to remove the hazard to unity presented by variant traditions. How great the hazard was, how tenaciously the two groups clung to their respective traditions, is shown by the fact that RJE found it necessary to preserve certain features of the J document which must have been morally repugnant to him. This reveals in turn how crucially important he believed a unified community to be. To claim inspiration for him, therefore—and the claim must be made in view of the place of the community in the biblical scheme of salvation—is to recognize by implication the evil of schism. For RJE the unity of the people of God must be maintained, even at the cost of the formal retention of dubious traditions. It might be hoped that these could later be corrected; in the meantime, the tares must be allowed to grow with the wheat.

E. Work of P.—The concern of the writer of the P document for the community needs no stressing. In this he stands in line with his predecessors. In his tacit insistence upon the sole legality of one sanctuary—by implication, Jerusalem—he affirms the need for unity. A world-wide community could have only one center. Doubtless he was influenced by his concern for the prestige of Jerusalem and its priesthood. Nevertheless, it would be doing him an injustice to assert that it was nothing more than ecclesiastical jealousy that prompted him to reject the traditions which ascribed to the patriarchs the founding of certain ancient sanctuaries outside of Jerusalem. He may well have believed that these traditions must be false; in any case, he regarded them as harmful. And unlike RJE he felt that the time had come to root out the tares from the wheat.

But there is another aspect to this part of his work. So long as the ancient traditions associating the patriarchs with the local sanctuaries remained living traditions, just so long the tendency to regard Israel as primarily a national community would persist. For P, however, Israel was a world-wide community, and it had come into being not as the result of historical circumstance but by an act of God. The Palestinian community of the fifth century B.C. was informed by the spirit of Deuteronomy.¹⁸ And Deuteronomy, for all its recognition of the mighty acts of God in the founding of the community, is far more nationalist in its overtones than is P. The leaders of the Deuteronomist school, never having lived in a foreign land, were far less sensitive to the problem of Israel's relationship and mission to the Gentiles than was P. It was to fit Israel to deal with this problem, and eventually to accept its mission to the Gentiles, that P entered the lists against localism and nationalism, even the sanctified nationalism of Deuteronomy. His meticulous insistence upon the proper performance of the cult—not found, of course, in Genesis—was no mere expression of an arid ritualism. It was his way of driving home to his contemporaries the fact that Israel was a worshipping community, a holy community, a community standing in a unique relationship to God. It could discern and implement its own meaning and mission only when it recognized its uniqueness, and accepted its unique responsibilities.

Again, in view of the total biblical attitude toward the Gentiles, and as regards the nature and purpose of the community of Israel—both the Old Israel and the New—it is possible to deny inspiration to P only if the concept of inspiration is rejected on a priori grounds. It is true that this inspiration was historically conditioned, but this, as has been argued above, is always so. P was inspired to deal with a concrete crisis in the life of the community. The action he advocated was what was required at the moment to bring Israel to a deeper consciousness of its vocation. When that goal had been achieved it would be time enough to raise the question whether his drastic treatment of the ancient traditions might not be modified.

F. Work of RP.—It was such a modification that was in effect accomplished by RP. There can be little doubt that the conflation of the P document with the composite document JED was undertaken in response to popular pressure. The members of the community showed themselves unwilling to accept P's relentless proscription of the old stories of the patriarchs. Nor can this be dismissed as mere hidebound conservatism. It was rather that the people came to realize, however inarticulately, that these stories embodied a truth of fundamental importance—namely, that the holy community had been fashioned out of the natural community of Israel. In this fashioning the natural community had not been destroyed. Natural interests and natural ties had not been cut away as irrelevant. On the contrary those interests and ties had been sanctified and their true meaning had been revealed. The holy community was not composed of professional ecclesiastics. It was composed of human beings with human affections, living in the world, who were called to establish a pattern of natural relationships within the community which would inform their relationships outside the community, to the ultimate transformation—not the elimination—of all human relationships. Israel could be a supranational community only in a world of nations with local interests. It must be sympathetic with those interests, recognize their values, discern their possibilities for good as well as their possibilities for evil. This it could not do if its religion treated them by implication as irrelevant.

To say all this is not to suggest that the community reasoned articulately along these lines. Such a suggestion would be absurd. What is postulated is a kind of restless misgiving on the part of the more sensitive members of the community as regards P's lack of concern for human values. To this group RP belonged, and he was inspired to deal with the situation. This he did, employing the well-tried¹⁹ method of conflation. In this way he maintained almost intact the ancient patriarchal tradition as it had been embodied in JE, and P's drastic revision of it. He thus preserved the values of both his documents and at the same time related them in such a way that each set of values interpreted and enriched the other.

To break down Genesis into its component parts is accordingly not to deny inspiration. On the contrary, the use of the method of documentary analysis—reversing as it does the process by which the book was laboriously built up—makes possible a clearer apprehension of the way in which the Word of God came to Israel. It came in the context of successive historical situations, judging them and interpreting them, indicating the action required from the community to deal with them, so that its vocation might be fulfilled.

G. The Book as a Whole.—It was to the Word of God thus mediated that the authors of the component documents, each in his own age, responded. The book they have given us presents in summary form the Old Testament doctrine of God and man. Whether 1:1 is a sentence complete in itself or, as is suggested in the Exegesis, is the protasis of vs. 3, it implies that God himself is the uncreated, transcendent source of all being and all existence (cf. Isa. 44:6b; 45:5a, 7). Nevertheless, his relationship with the world he has created is close and personal, for the austere grandeur of the narrative of ch. 1 is balanced and enriched by the more homely story in ch. 2, according to which God "formed man of the dust of the ground" (vs. 7aα). Originally the meaning of this was that God fashioned man with careful hands, as a potter molds his clay. But the placing of the two chapters in juxtaposition has rendered this meaning forever impossible. In their present context the words speak of the intimacy of the essential relationship between God and man, without in any way weakening the idea of the divine transcendence.

This intimacy is further stressed by the statement that having formed man, God "breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul" (2:7aβb). This was J's account of the mystery of human personality—an account so concrete that it seemed dangerous to P. Nevertheless, there is a warmth to the words which is lacking in the statement in ch. 1 that "God created man in his own image" (vs. 27aα). Each statement is needed to complete the other.

Similarly, the two accounts of the creation of woman, 1:27b and 2:18, 21-24, are complementary. In the former, woman stands beside man as his equal; in the latter, the essential character of their mutual relationship, their dependence each on the other, is movingly depicted. In 1:28a, the man and the woman are commanded to "be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth." In its cold formality this command is far removed from the narrative in chs. 3-4, in which the mystery of sex, its intimacy and its perils, its power for good and for evil, find such poignant expression. Here the family is a society of persons; the author is cruelly aware of the tensions to which relationships within that society are subject. But the tensions are endurable, and must be endured if man is to remain man. The story of Cain is fraught with significance. His demonic individualism (cf. 4:7) had driven him to murder his brother, and thus to threaten the very existence of society. So he is condemned to be "a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth" (4:12), that is, to a life on a subhuman level, without culture and without friends.

The fundamental thesis of chs. 3-4 is that man from the very beginning has been in revolt against God, and Lamech's song (4:23-24) dramatically portrays the social disintegration this has caused, and must cause. Nor can this be corrected by punishment, even by the punishment of the Flood. The malady of sin remained, to break out again in the impiety of one of Noah's own sons (9:20-25). Further, the unchanged, demonic character of man's arrogance was revealed in the attempt to build a tower which should reach to heaven. The sole result of this blasphemy was that human society was broken into fragments, each one unable to understand, and so hostile to, all the others (11:1-9).

¹⁹ Well tried, for it was used not only by the redactor who conflated the J and E documents but by other redactors as well, whose work is to be found, for instance, in II Sam. 9-20, and in Jer. 40:7-41:18.

It was then that the process of redemption began in the call of Abraham, symbolizing God's covenant choice of a people. It was in relation to this people, Israel, and through Israel to God, that the nations of the world would eventually find their true meaning and be saved (cf. 12:1-3). Nevertheless, Abraham and his family remained intensely human, themselves involved in and contributing to the situation which made redemption necessary. The stories of the patriarchs drive this point home. Called though they were to perfection (cf. 17:1), to be the instruments of God's saving power, they were sinful men, feuding, lustful, and lying. But God, ever active in history, made the wrath of man to praise him (cf. Ps. 76:10), overruling his evil designs for good, "to save much people alive" by a great deliverance (cf. 45:5, 7-8; 50:20).

The book thus foreshadows the salvation to be wrought by God, in which, however, man would have his indispensable part to play. This salvation would not involve the negation of the desires and longings divinely planted in man. Rather, it would through suffering illumine them and discipline them, and at last fulfill them.

GENESIS

TEXT, EXEGESIS, AND EXPOSITION

The Book of Genesis.*—In the parlors of houses a generation or two ago, on a center table, one would often find what for a long period became unfamiliar, but later in improved form has come back into use—a stereoscope. Lying beside it was a stack of cardboard mounted photographs. Each photograph was a double one of the same scene or group of figures, one picture having been taken at a slightly different angle from the other. Seen together through the two lenses of the stereoscope, the two pictures coalesce in one impression, with the figures and objects not flat as in the photograph itself, but standing out distinct and three-dimensional as in their actuality.

The method of The Interpreter's Bible is like that of the stereoscope. On the one side is the picture of biblical facts as seen by the exegete; on the other, the picture as seen by the expositor. These are different, but they are not separate. They register the truth from two perspectives, that the ultimate perception may have a depth and vividness greater than either one alone could give.

With such a book as Genesis the synthesis may not be immediately apparent. Exegetical scholarship has explored the problems involved with such extraordinary patience and devotion that an immense number of technical details come into view. But the perspective of critical analysis is not enough. The multitude of people who come to the Bible to seek primarily not exhaustive acquaintance with its minutiae, but an over-all perception of its meaning, will want to see the facts also from another angle. It can be a matter of fascinating interest to trace who wrote this verse and that, but men and women will ask further: "Why did they write as they did? What was the ultimate purpose they had at heart? What have they given us to believe in and to live by?"

Here enters the possible value of the Expos. It must not ignore what the Exeg. has revealed, nor be finally inconsistent with it. But neither will it necessarily highlight the same points. The great events and figures of Genesis—the story of Eden, the Flood, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and the rest—may from one angle be results of legends interwoven by the ancient writers; but from another angle they appear as embodiments of spiritual realities more vital and inescapable than much of our contemporary life. The personalities portrayed in the Bible have lived in the thought of many generations and have powerfully affected the ideals and judgments of innumerable people. Whether or not objective history can validate the details of some of the lives and some of the incidents of which the Bible tells is of secondary importance. The important matter is that these figures are immortal representatives of man. They focus the conceptions of many ages as to what life is in its struggle of good with evil, of courage with cowardice, and of the glory of God entering in through human experience to transform the things of earth.

The conjunction of the Exeg. and the Expos. should give us therefore a sense of having seen truth in the round and a feeling that in the persons of the patriarchs it walks out of the pages of a book to touch our present lives.

The comments should be taken not as ends but as beginnings. They are to be considered not as expositions finished, but as incitements and provocations to larger ones that should be developed. It will be noted that frequently there is mention of a book or a poem or some prose passage recommended to be read. It is not meant that these should be incorporated bodily into what may be said by the preacher or teacher or leader of a Bible study group. They are to be the deeper and wider ground for the foundation thinking that may not expressly appear in the finished exposition, but upon which that exposition may securely rest.

The Beauty of the Book of Genesis.—The Expos. will deal of course with particular passages and particular words; but before going forward chapter by chapter, it is well to think of certain aspects of Genesis as a whole.

The first and plainest of these is its sheer beauty of expression. Genesis, like so much of the rest of the Bible, belongs among the supreme works of human literature. Of course it is more than that, for a Spirit higher than human is speaking through it. But considered at the outset only in comparison with other writings which have come by way of human hands, this book has a nobility all its own.¹

What is the reason for the literary power of Genesis? There is, to begin with, the sublimity of its theme. It deals with God and man and destiny. It makes our thought confront the fundamental questions, stand in the presence of the ultimate mysteries, look up to the skies of an infinite faith. As Dinsmore has put it:

Religion of itself, because it brings man face to face with the Eternal, and includes life's most significant experiences, is a powerful incentive to elevated and emotional expression. Religion by deepening the soul of man has been the prolific and fostering mother of music, architecture, letters, drama, and all the arts. Atheism writes no hymns; agnosticism does not burst into song; skepticism constructs no institutions. The singing and building eras of the world are periods of stalwart belief.²

Genesis is great literature also because of its realism and its honesty. It does not evade facts. It describes life as it is, people as they are. This realism and truthfulness which the O.T. writers aimed at had its instrument in the extraordinary concreteness of the Hebrew mind. The Hebrew was not instinctively a philosopher. He was not at home in abstract ideas. His thinking was vivid and pictorial, and so put truth into pictures, not into wordy generalizations or nebulous expression. The language itself was fitted for this even by its limitations. Hebrew words and constructions did not readily set forth subtle shadings of cerebration, but Hebrew did have a sinewy directness that was admirably adapted to graphic narrative. And the English language, though of much wider compass than the Hebrew, matches Hebrew in its particular strength. It also has the virility which can express the flesh-and-blood concreteness of action and event. So it results that the translations in which the English-speaking world is accustomed to read the book of Genesis have lost nothing of the force of the original. The company of scholars who finished the King James Version in 1611 had back of them the work of Wycliffe, Tyndale, and Coverdale, whose heroic devotion to the dangerous adventure they dared to undertake gave a moral earnestness and passionate vigor to everything they wrote. The noble English which was the native speech of men who belonged to the age of Shakespeare, and the influence of which is never lost, has made the translated narrative of Genesis as living and powerful as the first writers could ever have desired.

Genesis, as the book has come down to us, is made up of many strands; and as the Exeg. repeatedly points out, those who wove them had their different ways of writing. The divine Spirit does not operate mechanically. It takes men's separate gifts and uses these. There is a dignity of the individual and of that individual's manner of apprehending and expressing truth which inspiration does not destroy but rather heightens. It takes the human ability and gives it wings. So of the writers of the book of Genesis it may be said essentially what George Eliot said of the supreme maker of violins:

'Tis God gives skill,
But not without men's hands: He could not make Antonio Stradivari's violins
Without Antonio.³

Similarly, the Word of God was written through the instrumentality of human hands.

Though the styles of the parts of Genesis vary they represent the handiwork of men who obviously were sensitive to beauty. There is the organ roll of the majestic account of the Creation in the opening chapter; the childlike imagination which lies back of the story of the Garden of Eden, but to which there has been brought also a grave awareness of the willfulness in the soul of man which rebels against God, and of the tragic consequence of that rebellion: the somber tale of Cain and Abel, and the deepening course of human sin that comes to its crisis in the Flood; lovely simplicities of limpid narrative, like the description of Rebekah at the well; never-to-be-forgotten presentments of persons, such as Abraham and Lot and Jacob and Esau; and at the climax the superbly sustained drama of Joseph that began in what seemed disaster and ended on a vice-regal throne.

The Great Portrayals of Character.—Nor is it of course only a general beauty of expression that makes Genesis notable. The book is masterful in substance and particularly in its portrayal of human character in its wide gamut of good and bad and in-between. For evidence one needs call only a partial roll: Abraham, the adventurer; Isaac, the quiet man; Esau, with his lusty appetites; Jacob, so strangely mixed of earthly craft and yet of stubborn would-be consecration; Joseph, the mighty dreamer; Sarah, with her fierce affection; Rebekah and Rachel and the wife of Potiphar. Some of them are heroes, but they are never presented with false heroics. In even the best of them their failures and faults are portrayed as surely as their virtues. It is as though the far-off writers to whom we owe the book of Genesis had obeyed a charge such as Oliver Cromwell gave to the painter of his portrait, "Paint me as I am, wart and all."

Yet there is a question which necessarily will rise—the question as to whether we have a right to treat these figures in Genesis as though they were men and women who actually lived and breathed and struggled in this real world as the stories say they did. Obviously the book begins in that misty region of tradition and transmitted myth in which imagination precedes knowledge. Few will suppose that Adam and Eve and the Garden of Eden belong to factual history. Cain and Abel and Lamech and Nimrod and Methuselah and Noah—these also come down to us as legends rather than as persons identifiable in the literal history of a particular time. And what of even the later figures in the book, Abraham and the three generations following him? Preachers and commentators have long assumed as a matter of course that Abraham and the other patriarchs were clear-cut historical figures. Many would still maintain that in essential outline they were such. But others question whether there was an actual Abraham or Isaac or Jacob, and hold instead that they are heroes of tribal tales and personifications of tribal characteristics (see Exeg. on 11:28).

Between the differing judgments there can be no wholly categorical and dogmatic conclusion. No present knowledge can positively prove or disprove that this or that character in the book of Genesis lived upon our definite human scene. But assuming the most radical possibility, what then? Suppose that many of the great portraits in the book of Genesis are products of imagination. Is their worth thereby diminished, or their long-cherished place in the records of religious inspiration disturbed? Here in these descriptions is the inspired reflection of a people's experience as to what life is and what it ought to be. The great fact is that such descriptions should have been born out of the mind and heart of the Hebrew race. In such forms this people expressed their sense of what the human soul is and of how it is related in good or evil to its world. The truth they saw was truth alive, and it has been alive and will be till the end of time. Therefore the preacher or teacher of the Bible need have no timid hesitancy about drawing lessons for himself and others from the motives and the actions of the characters whom the pages of Genesis make so intimately real. They are real—real with the everlasting certainties of right and wrong, of conscience and character, of human shadows and of the heavenly light.

Here then is material richly to be used, provided one is in earnest to use it rightly. That means, first of all, sincerity. It is not necessary to thrust into a sermon or lesson all the opinions of critical scholarship; but certainly no man, for the cheap purpose of standing in with what is no more than unenlightened traditionalism, ought to say anything that flies in the face of what he genuinely believes to be the established conclusions which a reverently fearless search for truth has reached. It is a poor business, and ultimately a self-defeating one, to enroll among those who are willing to be "orthodox liars for the glory of God."

But the other side of the fact is immediately and equally important. Biblical interpretation is of very little use—and sometimes worse than of no use at all—unless it is constructive. A congregation of people who come to church or to a Bible class to worship and to listen to some word that may help them to live better do not want to hear what an expositor can say to depreciate the importance of some character in the Bible; they want to hear what vital lesson he has learned and can pass on to them, so helpful that the Bible will seem more important than it ever did before.

That sort of interpretation calls for a man's complete alertness. To sleepy minds even the Bible can seem dull; and for the interpreter who reads familiar passages mechanically, as though he were threshing out old straw, nothing new will spring forth. But to the expectant mind the Bible proves itself unendingly productive. The living message of it communicates itself wherever the mind and spirit are alive. Figures that had never been noticed in the background of some story suddenly stand out significant; and some great figures, about whom one supposes that he has already said everything he could think of that would be interesting, show a new relevance to the very problems of behavior which history has pushed into the forefront of contemporary life. So much, indeed, is this true of the figures in Genesis that for the lessons to be learned from them it might well be said of Genesis what William Lyon Phelps said of the Bible as a whole:

Western civilisation is founded upon the Bible; our ideas, our wisdom, our philosophy, our literature, our art, our ideals, come more from the Bible than from all other books put together. . . . I thoroughly believe in a university education for both men and women; but I believe a knowledge of the Bible without a college course is more valuable than a college course without the Bible.⁴

religion, is the more remarkable in that its authorship can be only dimly guessed. "J¹," "J²," "E," and "P"—such are the symbols that the exegetical scholars have made familiar. So the men who wrote can be represented only by signs and labels. What they did remains, but their identities have long since disappeared. Who were "J" and "E" and "P," and where exactly did they live, and what manner of men were they, and what regard, if any, did their contemporaries give to them? Such questions we ask and cannot answer. Whoever they were, they have influenced the thought of many centuries and have affected the lives and characters of men in a way they could not have conceived and that no historian even now can fully measure. Like the nameless soldier who is buried in the nave of Westminster Abbey they are "known only to God."

They are among those whose achievements are more significant than the accident of fame or lack of fame. Nor are they alone in that company of the great unknowns. Who wrote the chapters at the end of the book of Isaiah, and who was it that drew the picture of the suffering servant that found its fulfillment in Christ himself? Who wrote those passionate outpourings of praise and petition, of joy and hope and self-abasement and repentance, of confession of the sins of men and of adoration of the glory of God, which make up the Psalter? Once it was supposed that David wrote them; but if he wrote any at all, it was certainly not by him that most of them were written. Instead, they have come out of the minds and hearts of men whose names may be written in heaven but are inscribed nowhere on the earth.

See the same fact reflected in the N.T. The Gospels of Matthew and Luke are believed to have drawn much of what they have recorded of the teachings of Jesus from the source called "Q." Who first brought those sayings together? Who searched his own memory, or turned with his questioning to others, to recall the accounts of the Master? We may never know. But beyond all measurement is the debt of gratitude which all Christendom owes to him.

Thus J and E and P have given us this scripture. That is a vital fact in the history of Israel, for Judaism has been pre-eminently a religion of the Book. It was not left to shifting standards. In the Scripture, once its writings had come to embody men's sifted and proven convictions about God and his will for human life, there was guidance that seemed as sure as the everlasting stars. The immense tenacity and steadfastness of the people of Israel have been due to the fact that they could turn always to the Scripture and reassure themselves there of the explicit covenant God had made with them. The most sacred object in the synagogue is "the rolls" from which the law is read. To the devout, God has spoken, and what he has said is written there for the ages to understand. And J and E and P were his instruments for the writing.

But what they wrote does not tell the whole story of their importance. The record they set down was life before it was scripture. Their minds were wide open to new truths about God, even when these came to them in partial understandings. When minds are no longer thus open, then even the most sacred scripture can be so used as to smother the spirit rather than to give it life and breath. Revelation considered as comprehended and wholly completed in the Book can make religion rigid. So there have developed the unbending formalities of the orthodox Jew and the literal dogmas of the Christian fundamentalist.

On the contrary, there is needed always what J and E and P actually represented so long ago, "a living tradition . . . capable of adaptation to changing conditions and responsive to new needs." There is truth in the Roman Catholic insistence that the Bible must not stand alone, but must be read and interpreted in the light of the faithful and continuing tradition of the church. But the stultifying error in that has been the claim that pronouncement of what the tradition is must come from a hierarchy that holds itself to be infallible. So the tradition is no longer flexible, but pontifically fixed, and in place of what should be the living truth there is offered again a hardened stereotype. The real tradition is a more vital and inspiring power. It is the consensus fidelium, the expanding consciousness of God's meaning for life, which grows from the insights of innumerable humble and devoted souls; for wherever men in reverent simplicity have tried to understand and to reflect the way and the will of God, God's truth has been—and is—conveyed through them. Here is the holy meaning of the church—the church of Israel and the church of Christ. It is to be the continuing fellowship of worship and experience which transmits all that is most sacred in the past, but at the same time kindles for every generation a clearer understanding by which contemporary life is to be illumined with the light of God.

God's meaning for life—that is the great theme with which Genesis deals. Looked at from one angle, this book might seem to be a mosaic of many traditions fitted together gradually and sometimes also with what appear to be overlappings and inconsistencies. But looked at from another and a higher perspective, it will be seen that this book, as it was ultimately shaped, has a noble unity. In it, perhaps for the first time in any ancient writing, there emerges a conception of history that is lofty and far-seeing and grandly unified. It is history not as the chance actions of men, but as the unfolding will of God. There is no flat monotony in it. It recognizes the shadows as well as the lights in human destiny. Yet through them all and beyond them all it sees the assurance of a heavenly plan. God creates the universe and says it is good. God makes man in innocence and sets before him the open doors of spiritual opportunity. Next come the fact of human perversity and disobedience and the descending story of sin and evil until there has to be the great cleansing of the Flood. Yet over that catastrophe shines the rainbow of promise and hope. Then comes the story of the redeeming acts of God: the call of Abraham, the covenant with him and his descendants, the development, generation by generation, of those who would carry on the great commission of a family and a nation whom the Most High will use for his witness among the peoples of the earth.

Thus far, then, we have thought of the values of Genesis, which are clear and great. But there is another side to the picture.

The Difficulties in the Book.—1. The Account of the Creation. Everyone whose mind is at all open to modern facts has realized some of the perplexities which have beset readers of Genesis. For assumptions which used to be taken for granted have been flatly challenged. The first and most acute focus of those perplexities has been the opening chapter of the book. There stands an account of the Creation which for many centuries men regarded as infallible. According to it, the universe was made by God in six days. The earth was shaped, the sun and the moon and the stars were hung in the heavens, birds and animals appeared, and then a man and a woman were made. Thus, before God rested on the seventh day, which he made into the sabbath, everything was finished. Moreover, it is clear from later pages that the writers of the O.T. thought the earth was the center of everything and over its flat surface the sun and the moon obediently rose and set.

Against that finished picture came the new and disturbing ideas of Copernicus and Galileo, with their assertion that the earth is not the center of the universe but a little satellite that goes round the sun; and of the geologists and the paleontologists, with their evidence that the earth had not been made in six days but slowly formed through almost unimaginable time; and of Darwin with his theory of evolution, which pictured man as emerging slowly out of an ancestry that went back to subhuman life. If one would realize again the shock which these ideas produced when they were new let him read Andrew D. White's A History of the Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom.⁶ Or turn to the account of the denunciation of Darwinism by Samuel Wilberforce, bishop of Oxford, in 1860, as it is vividly described in Leonard Huxley's Life and Letters of Thomas Henry Huxley. In a gathering of which one who was present wrote, "I never saw such a display of fierce party spirit," the bishop, in an "open clash between Science and the Church," first ridiculed the new teachings and then "asserted, in a solemn peroration, that Darwin's views were contrary to the revelation of God in the Scriptures."⁶

That collision between the new teachings and the old tradition seemed at first as shattering as an earthquake. Multitudes of men and women reacted in panic or in defiance, supposing that if their confidence in the literal exactitude of the first verses of Genesis should go, then their whole religious faith would be gone with it.⁷ Yet the new teachings had come not to blight religion but to stimulate it to new growth. If they seemed at first to break up old patterns of belief, the result was to lift men's eyes to mightier perspectives of the majestic works of God.

If this world is not God's world, even the most frenzied arguments could not make it so. But if it is God's world, we do not need to be afraid of anything it actually reveals. All life is growth, and in growth there are often growing pains. But these are profitable. It is not the man of faith but the man of secret doubts, which he is trying to smother, who will be afraid of unfamiliar facts and will try to drown them out with clamor. Whoever really believes that he is moving in God's world will go forward steadily to meet even its dismaying revelations. The right attitude is expressed by William Newton Clarke, who inspired many students. He wrote of his own change of thought from old traditionalism to a wider understanding:

I know that in my case the change has been an honest one, and am equally sure that it has been a legitimate one, which I could not have refused to make without being false to the true light. . . . I shall hope that my experience may lead many a man to commit himself without fear to the journey that I have been led to make, assured that the good hand of his God will be upon him as he moves out into the broader country.⁸

2. The Element of Myth. The noise and tumult of what was called "the warfare between science and theology," so far as they had to do with the account of the Creation, have died down. But there is another and a newer concern that may perhaps have risen for readers of the Intro. and Exeg. to this particular book. Is there danger that the whole of Genesis may seem to lose its substance? Frequently in the analysis and description of its elements one encounters the word "myth," and that word has a disturbing sound, for it is assumed that myth is only an ancient fairy tale, a haunting mirage conjured up in men's imaginations and dissolving into nothing when it collides with actual fact. What becomes of the authority of the Bible if any part of it can be described as myth? These are questions that some cannot refrain from asking. They are fair questions which deserve an answer. And there is an answer—an answer that growingly appears as one studies Genesis and reflects upon the distinction between vehicles of truth and the truth itself. In any age our means of expression are imperfect; we feel realities which cannot with any mathematical rigidity be defined or described. So the poet arises, and the artist, gifted with divine inspiration to suggest by symbolic words and forms the truths which no flat prose or scientific measurement can represent. Shakespeare wrote of the forest of Arden that in it one could find tongues in trees, books in the running brooks, Sermons in stones, and good in every thing.⁹

Is that truth? The literal-minded could say that it is only nonsense. Whoever saw a tongue in a tree, or a sermon in a stone? And what would happen to a book if it did get into a running brook? The pompously dull-witted might argue—as someone has wittily suggested—that somebody printed Shakespeare's words askew, and that what he must have written was "sermons in books, stones in the running brooks," which is where they obviously belong. But he wrote no such utter dullness. He wrote the beautiful lines as we have them. In terms of raw fact they are not true; in terms of the living meaning they convey they are true to the point of inspiration. Similarly, it has been suggested that if anyone should want to know what Venice is like, he could get a Baedeker and read there the exact detail of every point of important interest in the city; but if he should look at one of Turner's paintings, though not a single detail in it might be exact, he would feel the wonder of Venice more certainly than any guidebook could enable him to do. So all imaginative stories, including the element of myth, which form part of the early chapters of the Bible are the efforts of men to put truth into pictures. Some of the creation stories of the Babylonians or of other ancient peoples (influencing, as the Exeg. has shown, the stories in Genesis) are primitive to the point of seeming now fantastic; but even in them a great fact was breaking through into expression. These wondering thinkers were sure of this: that man is not the first or greatest reality in existence. There was and is Something or Someone greater than he. Granted that their ideas of what that Something or Someone was like were crude, nevertheless it was what they thought about and tried to interpret that really counted. And the distinction of the Bible as a whole is this: not that it moved completely away from language that is imaginative and even mythical and put everything into scientific prose, for it did not; but rather that it took the imaginative forms which had come down in traditions, and by a sure instinct purged these of their cruder features and made them more sensitive reflections of spiritual truth. The Something or Someone is seen now to be the God who is known not only in the physical creation, but most of all in what he has put into good men's hearts, the God concerning whom it can be said:

Speak to Him, thou, for He hears, and Spirit with Spirit can meet—
Closer is He than breathing, and nearer than hands and feet.¹⁰

When we have thus learned to judge truth, it is a very subordinate matter that some of the conceptions of how God once worked have long since been outgrown. The important point is that the Bible brings us face to face with One who is at work now, and where it matters most, viz., in human hearts that give themselves to his control. What difference then does it make that old descriptions of his ways were mythical, if the God of whom men in their poor way were trying to tell has been brought to us as a mighty fact?

3. The Conception of "Yahweh." One more matter may disturb. It is not so difficult to see, someone may say, that men in the O.T. times may naturally have reflected some of the naïve ideas of other religions. But what of the origin of Israel's own religion? Doubtless the statement in the Intro. (see p. 440), "Historically this unique relationship began . . . in a collective response by the group, then or later known as the sons of Israel, to external reality manifesting itself in the thunderstorm . . . of Sinai," will seem to many both startling and unwell-come. Could anything so wonderful as the faith of Israel have begun in such a way as that? Was the God of the patriarchs and the prophets first felt as men shrank before a terror in the sky? How could a supreme religion of the inner soul and conscience derive from a primitive fear? Such are the objecting questions which may instinctively arise. But as one begins to meditate, vistas open into a larger meaning.

The first of these is the realization that God does not disdain humble processes. The more we study the history of religions, including the religion of Israel that led up to Christ, the more we see that their roots were in untutored instincts that were simple but very deep. A missionary to Africa at the end of the nineteenth century told of a message that came to a missionary post from a distant African village, asking that the village might have someone to teach its people of the white man's God. For a considerable while no one could go; and when at last a missionary managed the journey through the jungle and arrived, as it chanced, at the edge of the village on a Sunday morning, he was startled to see it apparently deserted. Passing by one hut after another, he found each one empty as though a pestilence had swept the village. But going on until he reached the central space, he halted in a different amazement. For there on this first day of the week, which they had somehow heard was the white man's day of worship, stood all the people silent, lifting up their hands in dumb petition to a God they did not know. If the pathos of ignorance was there, so also was there the dignity of aspiration. Wherever and whenever that aspiration has existed and been expressed the first reality of religion has been present. Men's wordless prayers, their groping ritual, their crudest shrines, must all have been of worth in the eyes of God. Thus of primitive fear he may be saying, as he said to Simon Peter at Joppa, that we must not call any outreach of the soul of man common or unclean.

There is a second reassuring fact. The awareness of God at the mountain bears witness to the predominance of awe in Israel's religion. Perhaps because of revulsion from pagan corruptions like those of Baalism the serene or soft aspects of nature did not attract the Hebrew mind, nor did nature ever seem the "gentle nurse" which long afterward she was to seem to Wordsworth. There was no sense of mystic companionship with her such as one finds in the Romantic poets. Some of the psalms celebrate the natural world by which we are environed, but (except for grateful reference to its production of food) it is its grandeur or its austerity that provokes the song. Ps. 8 ranges from the moon and the stars to "whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas." Ps. 19 imagines the sun as a giant about to run his race. Ps. 97 sees God in clouds and lightnings above the hills that "melted like wax at the presence of the Lord." Ps. 104 celebrates also the beneficent aspects of the earth, the springs in the valleys, the grass for the cattle, the vegetation for the use of men, but only as derived from the majesty of God "who maketh the clouds his chariot: who walketh upon the wings of the wind." The men of Israel were free from the vanity of those who imagine themselves to be self-sufficient. They bowed before a power that held them in the hollow of his hand. This fear in its origin may seem only an abasement before the terrible power of the unknown. But even at Sinai there was more than that. The clouds and lightning and all the other dreadful aspects of creation belonged to the Creator; men themselves belonged to him, and he to them.

So, paradoxically but unmistakably, these men who bowed most before the sublimity of God, instead of being enfeebled, became of heroic moral fiber. Because they feared God altogether, they feared men not at all. That was true in Israel, and the religious heritage which began in Israel made it true for Martin Luther, for the men of Geneva, for the Covenanters in Scotland, for the Pilgrims to New England, and for all the rest of the heroic succession of men who have been bold in their religion because they knew that

A mighty fortress is our God,
A bulwark never failing.

In the words of Isaiah, they could proclaim that there was no reason to be "afraid of a man that shall die, and of the son of man which shall be made as grass" as long as they remembered "the LORD thy Maker, that hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth" (Isa. 51:12-13).

The Spirit of the Interpreter.—So—to summarize—Genesis has in it rich meanings charged with immediate interest and inspiration; and it has also elements that may provoke perplexity and unrest. A brave and true interpretation will make sure that honest questions shall never be evaded. Many persons in every religious group, old and young, will already have been made uneasy by them. They will have heard them raised, often by flippant people who like to disparage the Bible; and if the preacher or teacher is silent, they will wonder whether the reason is that he has no answer. Unmistakably he must show that he recognizes alertly and sympathetically whatever genuine disturbance has been caused. Yet he must show that he himself is not disturbed, because he has something to say that is confident and constructive. Not to be disturbed because he is ignorant and bumptious is one thing; not to be disturbed because he possesses—and shows that he possesses—a larger integrating knowledge is another.

I. THE CREATION (1:1-2:4a)

Chs. 1-2 contain two accounts of the creation of the world by God. According to the first (1:1-2:4a), man was created, male and female (1:26-27), after the creation of plants (1:11-12) and animals (1:20-25); according to the second (2:4b-25), man was created first (2:7), then the trees (2:9), then the animals (2:19), and finally woman (2:21-22). In view of these discrepancies, to say nothing of the differences of style and feeling so obvious as to need no detailed enumeration here, the two stories cannot come from the same hand. The first is basically from P, the second from J²; both of them bear the marks of having been elaborated by writers other than their original authors.

How then shall he shape his message? First, by bringing the facts out fearlessly. If he sees that some of the biblical writers reflected primitive traditions which had come from the naïve thinking of various peoples in the human family, let him say so, and not wait for it to be said first by some snickering detractor of the Bible who thinks he is being devastatingly smart and new. Religious people will feel a great sense of relief if the man they trust, and whose essential reverence for the Word they are sure of, can pick up questions which they thought were deadly serpents and then before their eyes perform what seems to them the miracle of showing that the supposed serpents are not serpents at all, but tendrils of a living vine of fruitful truth. People like to be taught something, and they like it all the more if what they learn is a happy surprise. It may be a happy surprise in the first place to discover that their minister or other church leader is not afraid of new knowledge which they imagined would make orthodox and proper people quake; and it will be more gratifying if he can go on to show why he is not afraid, and why they also need not be.

Always, of course, he must be reverent. That is the heart of the matter. It fundamentally distinguishes the religious man from the mere flippant debater in the arena of ideas. The Bible deals with the profoundest matters and concerns man's most vital hopes and longings. Therefore no study of it should ever be pursued with shallowness or conceit. Biblical criticism is worse than useless if it is an arrogant exhibition of what a man does not believe. It is useful only when it is positive, i.e., when it is bent not only on taking away the broken stones of inadequate conceptions, but on showing where the rock foundations of the sure convictions stand.

Such interpretation, finally, makes faith secure. The reality of God does not need to be bolstered up by us. It vindicates itself. Many particular ideas about the ways of God's working may be changed, but through these changes the consciousness of God as a power to penetrate and inspire living can grow continually more sure. Religion in the end is not a matter of argument, but of experience. One can say: "I know whom I have believed" (II Tim. 1:12). Consider the great souls in all ages whose lives have reflected that confidence. They could not be thrown into a panic merely because they had to reconstruct their conceptions of the ways in which God works. They felt him working in themselves. They saw him working wherever good men went about their duty. Faith is an anvil which has worn out many hammers, and the great faith in the living God which the O.T. proclaims is more enduring than any noise of controversy. To read Genesis is to have one's conscience recognize the revelation which the whole O.T. expands—that there is an eternal Righteousness to which all human souls must be accountable. It is to recognize also that this Righteousness is not something impassive and aloof, but is the quality of him who is equally the God of mercy, and who offers to men in their individual and in their corporate life the covenant of his redemption. So of Genesis there may be said what an old Mohave Indian chief said of all the Bible, "I know this must be the Word of God because it pulls my heart."

1:1a. The Priority of God.—These great words with which the Bible opens, In the beginning God, . . . express the Hebrew faith in the foundation of all life. The universe and everything in

A. IN THE BEGINNING (1:1-2)

1:1. Does this verse speak of creation ex nihilo? Yes, if the rendering of the RSV (cf. KJV) is correct: In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth. But the Hebrew beré'shith seems to mean "in the beginning of" rather than in the beginning, and this requires that vs. 1 should be taken with vs. 3—on vs. 2 see below—and rendered, "In the beginning of God's creating the heavens and the earth, God said, etc." With this rendering the meaning is less clear. Vss. 4, 5, indeed, imply that when God said, "Let there be light" (vs. 3), there was already darkness in existence, and vss. 6, 9 presuppose the existence of waters with land already formed beneath them. But this may be due to the author's dependence upon an earlier myth in which creation consisted in imposing order upon an already existing chaos.

But whence came the chaos? Vs. 1 cannot be taken as an account of its origin, for the heavens and the earth is a description of the organized universe, not of chaos (see Hermann Gunkel, Genesis [5th ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1922; "Göttinger Handkommentar"], p. 102; John Skinner, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Genesis [rev. ed.; New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1925; "International Critical Commentary"], p. 14). Vs. 2, indeed, speaks of a chaos which God began to reduce to order. It must be noted, however, that this verse stands apart from the rest of the chapter in that (a) it represents the Spirit of God, not the uttered word, as the agent of creation; and (b) the reference to the Spirit "brooding upon"—the literal meaning of the word rendered moved upon or was moving over, in the English versions—the chaos has underlying it the idea of a cosmic egg which was hatched by the brooding Spirit, as by a bird, to produce the universe, an idea which is foreign to the story as a it depend upon a divine conception and can be understood only in the light of a divine plan.

Does the universe have a meaning? The Bible is sure it does, and that the meaning is a heavenly one; cf. this account of the Creation with the Babylonian story and with the stories imagined by other peoples. Very crude and mythological some of those cosmogonies are. It is a dark and doubtful welter of forces from which the world and human life emerge. Later philosophies are more intellectual, but they may be equally arid for great hope and faith to grow in. The universe is the product of no guiding will at all, but only of mechanical chance; or, if a will is back of it, it is the will of a blind weaver or the capriciousness of one who is cruelly indifferent to the human fates he deals with in the dark. Read Thomas Hardy's The Dynasts,¹¹ and see the tragic climax of his Tess of the D'Urbervilles. After the black flag goes up over the prison walls to indicate the execution of the girl who was caught in the complex of disaster for which she was not originally to blame, Hardy summarizes thus: "'Justice' was done, and the President of the Immortals (in Æschylean phrase) had ended his sport with Tess. And the D'Urberville knights and dames slept on in their tombs unknowing."¹² Against such bleak and somber fatalism humanity needs continually to turn to the life-giving reassurance of the faith of Genesis. The Hebrew mind, like the Greek mind which Thomas Hardy reflected, was aware of tragedy, as chs. 2-4 profoundly show. Over life there is the shadow of the darkest of all tragedies—that of human sin. But that is not the final word because it was not the first word. Since the universe began in God's beneficent purpose, all existence can be viewed not tragically but with trust: "This is my Father's world."¹³ Essentially all creation is such that a man may look at it rejoicingly and believe that it is framed to let him live and grow. Sun and moon, seedtime and harvest, earth and ocean, beasts and birds, do not belong to hostile demigods, but to the God who makes himself known within the heart and soul of man.

If men can trust that life began in goodness (vs. 31), they can go forward into it with courage and gallant expectation. The evil in the world is not due to some relentless fate; it is a contradiction of the Creator's purpose, and so can be redeemed. Creation is not a finished story. As there was the beginning in God, so there can be new beginnings. In some hymns the hymn that stands first is

New every morning is the love
Our waking and uprising prove.

And it carries the promise

New mercies, each returning day,
Hover around us while we pray.³

whole. Vs. 2 thus appears to be an intrusion into the narrative as it left the hand of P. It was added presumably to supply what seemed to be a lack in P's account, viz., an explicit reference to the primeval chaos, of which without form and void was a traditional description (cf. Jer. 4:23; Isa. 34:11; see Gunkel, Genesis, p. 103). The Hebrew word tehom, rendered the deep, is the philological equivalent of Tiamat, the name borne by the personified chaos monster in the Babylonian creation myth (on the relation between the Babylonian myth and the P story see Intro., p. 450).

The cumulative effect of the considerations just enumerated seems to warrant the conclusion that P was endeavoring to present the idea of a creation ex nihilo, at least in so far as he could conceive of it. But he was not only dependent upon some version of the Babylonian creation myth; he was also—as will be argued below—under the necessity of retaining its representations in a recognizable form. This accounts in part for the idea of an already existing darkness, implicit in vs. 4, and of an already existing chaos, under which lay the land, in vs. 6 and 9. But, to counter any suggestion that the chaos did not derive its existence from God, he prefaced his account with the phrase “in the beginning of God's creating the heavens and the earth.” What P intended to

1b. Our Security in God.—In the one strong word created there throbs the virile Hebrew faith in the unconditioned creatorship of God. The universe did not come into existence by chance. It did not advance by the blind gropings of unconscious energies. It was not some dark welter of lifelessness inexplicably evolving into life. On the contrary, it was the purposeful creation of him who is the fount of life. Therefore in God all things belong to some consistent pattern. The universe was made to fit together and to have meaning.

Without that faith by which the O.T. is illumined the whole framework of existence would not have as much sense as a jigsaw puzzle. The pieces of a puzzle may be scrambled and bewildering, but they were shaped by intelligence, and intelligence can find the clue by which every fragment can be fitted into the intended picture. On the contrary, a universe that had no divine Creator—the universe assumed in the theory of mechanistic evolution—never could make complete sense, because it never would have been designed to have any. One element in the total is the human being, with mind and conscience, with longings and hopes and aspirations, with an instinct of the spirit that makes him say:

Thou wilt not leave us in the dust:
Thou madest man, he knows not why;
He thinks he was not made to die;
And thou hast made him: thou art just.⁴

But this human being is set in an environment that physically is far vaster than himself. Often it would seem that this titanic setting has no concern for him and is indifferent to his notion that “he was not made to die.” Man is an insignificant accident, the willing atheist or the unwilling skeptic may feel compelled to say. He has no necessary relationship to the huge frame of things, nor it to him. He is and whether at any given moment they sustain him or crush him makes no difference to any except himself. But with faith in a divine Creator the entire scene and its suggestion change. Then there is coherence in the whole fabric of existence, and an unfolding purpose in history and in life. For a holy will created it, and supreme intention holds within itself the one far-off divine event,

To which the whole creation moves.⁶

How did the men of the O.T. know that? How do we know it now? Those are questions which wistful folk in every time will ask. In religious understanding there are many who think of themselves as retarded souls. How can other people seem so sure of God when they themselves feel anything but sure? If they could see God at work and speak about him as confidently as the writers of Genesis did, then they would not feel so uncertain and so troubled. But must they just assume that the certainty the Bible voices is different from any conviction that ever can be theirs?

No, that is not true. The faith that is expressed in ch. 1 is not different from the faith that can come to any and every honest and humble soul. The conviction expressed there in the Bible did not come from sight. The men who wrote about the Creation were not standing by when the Creation happened. God is not an object to be perceived like other objects in the imply was that the first step in the creation of the organized universe was the creation of chaos—bārā', "to create," is used in the O.T. exclusively of divine activity—which God then proceeded to reduce to order. In this way P was able to reconcile those features in the myth he was revising which were dualistic in their implications with his conviction, arrived at on religious grounds, that the universe owed its existence to God, a conviction to which, it may be noted, the Second Isaiah had already given utterance, "I [God] form the light, and create darkness" (Isa. 45:7).

B. THE FIRST DAY (1:3-5)

3. And God said: The representation that the divine word was the agent of creation is found in the Babylonian, Egyptian, and Indian cosmogonies; but, as Gunkel points out (ibid., pp. 104-5), in these myths the word is a magic word—the correct formula which, being uttered, released the power to bring order out of the chaos. In Genesis, however, the word is the expression of God's will, "He spake, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast" (Ps. 33:9).

world, and therefore no man ever saw him. But there is a "conviction of things not seen," as the Epistle to the Hebrews puts it; and those who contemplate the ways and works of God are given by him an intuition of who he is and what he must be like. Out of a reverent regard for the facts of life within, and of the world without, arises faith. And if we ask how we may know faith to be something altogether different from wishful fantasy, this is the answer: Faith is validated when it proves to be a key that opens the gates to road after road of freedom and fulfillment. Walking on those roads of actual life to which faith has given entrance, a man knows within himself that this must be the reality which was intended all along. The record that runs through the O.T., and all the religion represented there, rose from the faith that back of everything are the hands of God. If God was the creator then nothing in creation can put a veto on his purposes. Men whom he has fashioned as living souls can be sure that all the forces of this universe are working with them when they are trying to become what the voice of God has told them they are meant to be. The humblest human spirit can say nothing truer, and the most learned philosopher nothing wiser than this: God made me, and God made the world I live in. Therefore, as long as I am faithful, I need have no fear of circumstances. God can make conditions work together to finish whatever is the best that he means to create in me.

2. The Life-Giving Spirit.—In this verse, as in the verse preceding, one feels again the sublimity of thought and expression to which the Hebrew writers have lifted the conception of the Creation. The Babylonian story, with which they must have been familiar, moves on a level that is here transcended. According to the Babylonian myth, the chaos which lay back of the created universe was ruled over by the god Apsu and the goddess Tiamat. Apsu was conquered by the higher gods; but not until Marduk, the highest of all, was called upon could the more dreadful Tiamat be slain. Then it was out of the body of Tiamat that the solid frame of things was shaped. Split in two, one half of her was made into the earth and the other half into the firmament above it. Thus creation emerged out of the dark welter of mythological strife.

But to the biblical writers there are no half-gods. There could be chaos and darkness, but in these were no malignant forces of such kind that God had to use them as materials for his creation. "The high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity" alone is God. Over whatever is waste and void his Spirit moves—moves broodingly and creatively according to a holy purpose which nothing can be strong enough to turn aside. That is good to remember when life seems empty within, or when over the life of the world around us darkness seems to descend. The brooding Spirit has not vanished from our universe. Not only did he bring forth the world from "chaos and old night," but by God's mercy he may yet bring forth a fairer world from new darknesses that beset us.

3-4. Light and Darkness.—The Exeg. has made it plain that this chapter is no scientific treatise. Labored effort to make it appear that and there was light. 4 And God saw that the light was good; and God separated the light

Let there be light; and there was light: The representation that light was the first creation, found also in the Indian, Greek, and Phoenician cosmogonies (ibid., p. 105), may be a somewhat subtle refinement of the Babylonian myth which ascribes the creation of the world to the sun-god Marduk. It also reflects the thought of P that without light there could be no life, no order. Light was therefore created before even the sun—one of the features of the story which renders impossible all attempts to bring it into line with modern scientific knowledge. Indeed, it must be said that where the story does correspond with scientific fact, the correspondence is purely accidental. The author's main purpose was to set forth his conviction and that of his people—a conviction arrived at on religious, not on scientific, grounds—that the universe and all that is in it had its origin solely in the will of God. At the same time he was trying to give an ordered and reasonable account of the way in which it came into being. To this extent he was trying to be "scientific," as were those responsible for the other creation myths of the ancient world.

4. And God saw the light, that it was good, viz., that it was the perfect reflection of his thought. This is not said of the antecedent darkness, for though it had been created by God, it was, so to speak, an incomplete creation, still lacking order and meaning. God now separated the light from the darkness. "To separate" means to put into different places (cf. Job 3:6; 38:19-20). In this act God imposed some degree of order upon the its picture of creation does parallel here and there the conclusions of physical science is misconceived and misdirected. Those who wrote this beginning to the book had none of the long process of detailed discovery slowly and laboriously pursued by which science has pushed its way into the unknown; they had to use the daring of the poet to imagine where they could not see. Like the unborn science which they could not dream, they too wanted an answer to the riddle of the universe, but the kind of answer they were seeking was different from that in which science may be content to rest: Not primarily "How was the universe created?" but "Who created it?" Not "What was the process?" but "What was the purpose?" In such terms they sought to express the one truth which to them was all-important, viz., that before all and in all is God.

So in each aspect of the creation story, as in the whole of it, it is the spiritual insight that matters. As to vs. 3-4, the Exeg. has pointed out that the thought of the one who wrote them had not quite emerged from the shadowlands of ancient and dim ideas. Probably his own conception was not clear as to what existed before the world was made. Was there nothing at all? Or was there a raw chaos which God did not make but found and had to work from? This latter thought is in most of the mythologies of the other Eastern peoples. But if the writers of this prelude to Genesis at first reflected it, as the Exeg. has shown, they moved beyond it.

They said God made the light, and they hesitated at first to say he made the darkness; but gradually they believed that darkness too belongs to him.

Consider the spiritual suggestions in this double fact. God's first creation is the light. Here first occurs the phrase that echoes grandly through all ch. 1. God saw that it was good. Among many peoples the soul of man has instinctively thought of light as the supreme symbol of God, the perfect reflection of his thought. Consider the role of Marduk in the myths of Babylon, which were known to the writers of Genesis; the worship of Re, the sun-god in ancient Egypt, Zoroastrianism, and Ormazd, the lord of light; the sacred fire of the Parsis. It is no wonder that light did thus seem to be the most nearly perfect symbol of the meaning of God.

For light is life. The simplest man knew that. It was the sun that brought forth the harvest after the inundations in the valley of the Nile. So in the great plains by the Tigris and the Euphrates it was when the sun came back from the darkness of winter that the seed sprouted and the flocks and herds brought forth their young. And light is guidance. In the night men grope and stumble. What they think is the path may be only the blind bewilderment of the forest. Till light comes they cannot be sure where they are or which way to go. So therefore light is safety and assurance. The fear of the dark, which is rooted deep in primitive man darkness and gave it meaning—a meaning which finds tender expression in Ps. 104:20, "Thou makest darkness, and it is night: wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth."

5. He also gave it a name, Night. The name is "that by which the thing is summoned into the field of thought" (Skinner, Genesis, p. 20), and is necessary for its full existence; cf. the first line of the Babylonian creation myth, "heaven was not named," i.e., did not yet exist. The thought underlying the statement that God named the darkness is that he thereby endowed it with complete existence, setting in motion the ordered alternation who never knew what dangers might be lurking in the night, is still instinctive. The little child may be afraid to go to bed alone; and what grown man or woman, at some time of illness or acute anxiety, has not felt the darkness lie like a dreadful weight and longed desperately for the breaking of the day? With the dawn the place where they were was the same, yet not the same: no longer haunted, but pervaded by the inexpressible comfort of the light. And finally, the light brings beauty. All color vanishes in the dark, but the day brings back the blue of the sky, the green of trees and meadows, the kaleidoscope of gardens. What light thus brings to the physical earth God brings to the soul: life, guidance, assurance, beauty. So the psalmist sang of God, "Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment" (Ps. 104:2); and so believed that "light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart" (Ps. 97:11).

But observe also the other aspect of the profound truth which in vs. 4 begins to appear. Here, as the Exeg. has said, the author is approximating the position of Isa. 45:6-7: "I am the LORD and there is none else. I form the light, and create darkness." All aspects of the universe belong to God: therefore no aspects of man's experience can be without his presence: "If I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there. . . . If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me; even the night shall be light about me. . . . The darkness and the light are both alike to thee" (Ps. 139:8, 11-12). Consider how noble is the faith which is here emerging. It is not easy to believe that God is near and that he has not forgotten when life walks in the dark. The writers of Genesis could not bring themselves to say that darkness was good. The soul in darkness wants to get out of it. But the O.T. moves on to a more heroic confidence. Hear the instinctive cry of Pss. 88:12; 102:11. Note the awful loneliness of Job. Not only has God at great moments of deliverance brought men out of darkness (Ps. 107:14), he reveals himself in the darkness and robs it of its terror (Ps. 91:5). "Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness" (Ps. 112:4). Thus not only the sunny but also the shadowed side of life is made the realm of faith. The tragic can be transfigured. See this again and again in the Psalms. See it in Jeremiah. See it at last in Jesus. No trial or disaster can be so dark as to eclipse the redeeming presence of God. Through the night as well as through the day the road of his benignant purpose runs. As a great modern Christian wrote to a friend in the darkness of affliction: "You cannot understand, or explain, but you know as well as I, that back of everything is God, and God is light,—we shall see. And God is love—we shall be satisfied. It may be a long while, but it will be worth waiting for."⁷

5. Life's Goings Out and Comings In.—Here is not the order of words our usual thought would frame. Why the evening first? When sunset comes, we do not say that the day begins, but rather that it is drawing to its close. When we think of the day's beginning, we think of dawn.

Yet all through the Bible, and in Jewish reckoning still, the day begins at evening. That conception may have its roots in times far back beyond the Bible, before stable civilization developed, when the earliest tribes were nomads of the desert. In the heat of the desert sun they kept in their tents. In the cool of the evening life could actively begin. Those times had long gone by when the priestly author wrote ch. 1, but he inherited and instinctively expressed the ancient thought. Was there in his mind also a deeper consideration? The night is the time of mystery, and out of the night therefore came the first creative act of God. The primary fact was darkness, and it is against the background of darkness that God appears. Here, at any rate, there is stimulus for our own meditation. The new experience, the moment when the day of life begins, may not be in sudden brightness, of day and night which the author sees as a manifestation of the power of God (cf. 8:22). With the naming of light and darkness the night came, followed by the dawn; the first day was over, the second day had begun.

There can be no question but that by Day the author meant just what we mean—the time required for one revolution of the earth on its axis. Had he meant an aeon he would certainly, in view of his fondness for great numbers, have stated the number of millenniums each period embraced. While this might have made his account of creation less irreconcilable with modern science, it would have involved a lessening of God's greatness, one sign of which was his power to do so much in one day.

much less in the glare of noon. It may come when we are most conscious of the shadows and the silence. It may come in the hushed mystery of the twilight before the stars appear.

But however the beginning and the sequence are conceived, there is the double fact of day and night; and the message of the Bible is that God gave them both. Life has its beautiful and blessed rhythm. There is a time for action and a time for rest. There is a time when all the ways of the world are clear and open, and a time when the shadows fall and we must wait. And the promise is that as the Lord made both day and night, so "the Lord shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in" (Ps. 121:8).

The truly religious life must have its "going out," i.e., it must reflect the spirit of the day in which man "goeth forth . . . to his labor until the evening" (Ps. 104:23). Religion can have no partnership with laziness. "One of the facts most creditable to human nature," as has been wittily said, "is that it gets up in the morning." The steady dependability of human beings in the familiar duties of every day constitutes the moral fiber of the world's affairs. Martin Luther understood this relationship between the responsibility of the day's demands and religion when he declared:

What you do in your house is worth as much as if you did it up in Heaven for our Lord God. . . . It looks like a small thing when a maid cooks, and cleans, and does other housework. But because God's command is there, even such a lowly employment must be praised as a service of God.⁸

And so did George Herbert when he wrote:

A servant with this clause
 Makes drudgery divine;
 Who sweeps a room, as for Thy laws,
 Makes that and th' action fine.⁹

Some of the religions of the Orient have paralyzed the nerve of action by offering a counsel of quiescence which leads to moral passivity and surrender. But the religion of the O.T. and the N.T. has no such inertness. Just because it never forgets that man is the servant of God and subject to him, it can declare that man need never be subject to the forces of this world but can be their sovereign. Each one of us is to say like Jesus, "I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day" (John 9:4), even as we pray, "Thy will be done."

So equally the "coming in" must be part of all true life. Religion is not to be a hectic activism devoid of meditation. Here a dangerous one-sidedness of the West needs to be corrected by the deeper penetration of the East; there must be a time to be quiet and to receive.

The truth in all this may sometimes be perverted. It is perverted when what ought to be refreshment of body and spirit becomes a flabby indolence. Certainly we are not to imitate the subject of a skillful artist's drawing in a current magazine—a drawing of a stout and well-to-do dowager of middle age, lying in a hammock on a lawn, and saying to an equally well-padded caller drinking tea and eating sandwiches: "You would just love my Dr. Baxter. His prescription is rest, rest, rest." John of Damascus' hymn "Those eternal bowers" can make us know that we are not to

 When he bids you labor,
 When he tells you, "Fight."

And the purpose of the night is perverted too when so-called recreation means only jazz music and liquor in a round of night clubs which make a man or woman more spent and jaded than all the activities of the day.

But underneath the falsities this fact remains: God who blessed the day has also blessed the night. He gave it for the kind of rest that genuinely restores—rest of body, rest of mind, and rest of soul. It would be a good thing to learn by heart some of the lovely evening hymns and to learn from those who wrote them that the "coming in" at the end of the day can be a coming in to God.

6 ¶ And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters.

C. THE SECOND DAY (1:6-8)

6. In the conception of the firmament as a solid substance (cf. Job 26:11) there is a distinct reminiscence of the Babylonian myth, according to which the sun-god Marduk split the slain chaos monster in two and used one half of the carcass as a firmament, the other half as the earth. But it is a reminiscence only. For this author the firmament was called into being by divine fiat. Above it was the heavenly sea referred to in Pss. 29:10; 148:4; Rev. 4:6; etc.

7. And it was so, appearing in the Hebrew at the end of this verse, comes in the LXX at the end of vs. 6. This raises the question as to whether vs. 7a may not be an addition to the original narrative. There is nothing corresponding to it after vss. 3 and 9. To be noted further is the absence from vs. 8 of the formula of approval, "and God saw that it was good," found in vss. 10, 12, 18, 21, 25 (cf. vss. 4, 31). If its omission is intentional on the part of the author, it is probably due to the fact that the business of bringing the waters to order was not yet completed. This would seem to suggest that the creative acts of vss. 6 and 9—the separation of the upper waters from the lower, and that of the lower waters from the land—were originally more closely associated than is now the case, and that the representation that they occurred on successive days is simply a feature of the author's ordering of the material with which he was working.

D. THE THIRD DAY (1:9-13)

9. The third day, like the sixth, was marked by two acts of creation. The first—the gathering together of the waters under the heavens—is, as has already been noted, more closely associated with the preceding act than with that which follows it. For place the

6-10. The Loftier Perception.—Here, as at many other points in ch. 1, we may perceive how some of the religious conceptions of Israel could have their roots in primitive ideas and yet lift the flower of their ultimate thought high above that old dark ground. In its fundamental elements this description of the creation of the firmament and the waters above it, of the earth and the waters beneath it, and of the seas upon the earth, is like the creation epic that came from Babylon. The physical picture is the same: a flat earth with mountains round its rim, on which the dome of the firmament rested as on pillars; in the firmament, windows through which the waters above could come down in rain; and in the earth, the hidden channels through which the waters of the underlying deep could flood to make the seas. But to the Hebrew mind the physical picture had a spiritual interpretation which belonged to another level altogether. In the Babylonian epic a palace was built above the firmament for a pantheon of gods; and in the firmament the stars were other gods that men were to worship. In the biblical account all lesser powers that might compel men's superstitious homage and make them afraid have vanished before the transcendent majesty of God. This, then, is the greatness of the prologue to Genesis: not that it has any authoritative word of scientific fact concerning the physical earth men live upon, but rather that it leads men on to faith that the one power was so. 10 God called the dry land Earth, and the waters that were gathered together he called Seas. And God saw that it was good. 11 And God said, "Let the earth put forth vegetation, plants yielding seed, and fruit trees bearing fruit in which is their seed, each according to its kind, upon the LXX reads "mass," probably correctly in view of the occurrence of the same word rendered gathered together in vs. 10. And let the dry land appear implies, as has been noted, that the land was already in existence beneath the waters (cf. Ps. 104:6-9, rendering vs. 6 "the deep covered it [the earth] as with a vesture," with Bernhard Duhm, Die Psalmen [Freiburg: J. C. B. Mohr, 1899; "Kurzer Hand-Commentar zum Alten Testament"] p. 242); on this see Exeg. on vs. 1-2.

10 And God called the dry land Earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he Seas: and God saw that it was good.

10. God called the dry land Earth, and the waters that were gathered together he called Seas. The creation of the organized universe, "the heavens and the earth" (vs. 1), is thus advanced another step; both the dry land and what remains of the primeval chaos are "named" (cf. vs. 5). Seas embraces more than the waters upon the face of the earth; it includes also the (supposed) subterranean waters upon which the earth was believed to rest (cf. Ps. 24:2), to which P refers in 7:11, and the circumfluent ocean (cf. Ps. 139:9), upon which the pillars of the firmament (cf. Job 26:11) stood.

11. A literal rendering of Let the earth put forth vegetation would be "Let the earth vegetate vegetation." The growth is then classified into plants bearing seed, and trees bearing fruit in which the seed is—the same classification is implicit in the distinction between "herbs" and "trees" in Exod. 9:25; 10:15—a curious piece of "science." Of more significance is the emphasis on seed, i.e., on the reproductive activity of nature. This the author sees to be a continuing manifestation of the creative power of God.

under which they live is God in whose sovereignty and sure purpose they can trust (see also Expos. on vs. 2, 14).

11-13. The Good Earth.—There is no act of creation for which it is more instinctive to thank God than for this one. Here is the blessing of the fertile ground, with its productivity of growth—the everlasting miracle of "the good earth." Human existence depends upon the earth's fertility. Bread is rightly called "the staff of life." The cave men did not till the ground or make bread, they ate meat and gnawed bones; but there would have been no meat for the cave men to eat if animals had not fed on the grass the earth produced. And civilization began when men got past the cave, past the life of nomad hunters, and began to settle on the land and plant seed in it and cultivate the grain. Facts so familiar that they are taken casually may be of all facts the most wonderful because they lie at the foundation of life. Consider the miracle of any seed when the earth receives it, the root going down for nourishment in the darkness, the stalk pushing up into the light. Multiply that by all the grainfields of the world and their total harvest, which in one year amounts to billions of bushels, and nearly one billion bushels in the United States alone. The strength of a nation may be closely linked to the soundness of its agriculture.¹ Consider what men's love for the land has meant in the history of England. Her fierce attachment to the earth she had inherited was the one thing admirable in Scarlett O'Hara of Gone with the Wind. Not only economic stability but also social health depend upon the blessings of the land. Where the soil is impoverished the whole level of life is low. Schools, roads, sanitation, medical care, all are poor. The rural church languishes or is abandoned altogether when the people have no roots of ownership in worth-while land and begin to drift.

To sin against the land is to sin against the good life which God has put within the reach of men. The Christian church therefore, and every intelligent individual in it, has a concern for the forces that destroy the land. Greedy

12. The first sentence is unnecessary after and it was so (vs. 11*b*), which records the fulfillment of the command of vs. 11*a*. It may well be part of the systematic elaboration (cf. vss. 7*a*, 16*a*, 21*a*, 25*a*) to which the original narrative of P was subjected, possibly to bring the account of the other acts of creation into line with vss. 26-27.

E. THE FOURTH DAY (1:14-19)

14-15. The purpose of the lights in the firmament, according to vs. 14*a*, is to separate the day from the night, i.e., they are not to give light—for light has existence independent of the sun (cf. vs. 3)—but to determine when day shall give way to night. When the sun rises, then it is day; when it sets, it is night. In vs. 14*b* a further purpose is stated:

exploitation is one. Whole mountainsides of timber in the United States and in other countries have been so ruthlessly and carelessly cut that the possibility of new growth has been destroyed. Oil wells have been drilled in such blind haste of competition that millions of gallons have been wasted. Constantly there must be watchfulness against private interests that try to possess the resources which ought to belong to a whole people.

In addition to deliberate exploitation there is the more widespread fact of ignorance. Great sections of the earth are robbed of their fertility because farmers have not been taught the necessity for rotation of crops and of contour plowing. Precious topsoil is washed away by rains and floods, or blown off in dry years, so that what had been rich farming regions becomes a "dust bowl." The appalling poverty of whole provinces in China, and the continual recurrence of famines, is due in large part to centuries of erosion of the soil. These are not merely technical problems. They have their immense spiritual implications and their social repercussions. As inhabitants of this planet we are stewards of what might be the limitless bounty of God. There could always be an answer to the petition "Give us this day our daily bread." But if public indifference to the waste and destruction of the earth's resources should continue, it can blight God's promise of a fertility that is meant to bring forth abundantly for the needs of men.

Another thought comes from this text. God created not only the trees and the grain for practical necessities. He made the flowers also. Consider the function of beauty for the human soul. Remember Wordsworth's "Daffodils." Unbridled industrialism and commercial money-making can destroy the beauty on which men's souls should feed, and throw away the "things unmerchanted, that cannot be purchased with the finest of fine gold." Note how the borders of the highroads have been defaced and defiled by billboards, and note in any legislative session the lobbies that resist any regulation of the interests that despise public enjoyment where private profit can be made. See on the other hand the slow advance of enlightened policies that create national parks and make sanctuaries of natural beauty. Here is a chance for the aroused activity of a citizenship which is not only socially responsible but also religiously sensitive; for the preservation of the earth's fertility and its beauty is a duty both to man and to God.

14. The Consecration of Time.—The sun and moon have a purpose more august than that of giving light; they set the times and seasons that make up life. The sun and moon are not independent forces, as early mythologies supposed, but they are God's handiwork and belong to him; and as the writer perceived that, so also he was sure that time, which these heavenly instruments mark out, likewise belongs to God.

15 And let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so.

they are to be for signs and for seasons and for days and years. Signs has a certain astrological significance; the luminaries will provide on occasions signs such as those referred to in Isa. 7:11 and II Kings 20:8-11. At the same time, in ascribing this sign-giving power to God's endowment the author seems to be guarding against the kind of thing condemned in Jer. 10:2. With the reference to seasons cf. Ps. 104:19, "He [God] appointed the moon for seasons." For days and years simply repeats and extends the thought of vs. 14a.

Vs. 15a is in direct contradiction to vs. 3. The confused character of this description of the functions of the heavenly luminaries (cf. Heinrich Holzinger, Genesis [Freiburg: J. C. B. Mohr, 1898; "Kurzer Hand-Commentar zum Alten Testament"], pp. 8-9; Gunkel, Genesis, p. 109; Skinner, Genesis, pp. 26-27) suggests that it may be the work of more than one hand. Possibly the narrative as it left the hand of P contained only vss. 14a, 15b; i.e., P was content to affirm that the heavenly bodies were the creation of God and that therefore, by implication, they had no power beyond that with which God had endowed them. So absurd was it to think that they were gods, and so objects of worship, that P

That of course was to him no abstract idea, but a most vital and controlling fact. Perhaps he was remembering specifically what happened when men had no clean and reverent conception that all times and seasons do belong to God—remembering the orgiastic feasts of Baal worship, the pagan celebrations of the nature cycle, and other practices rooted in ancient superstition which were oftentimes corrupt. What he wanted men to understand was that in all the gamut of their experience and their emotions they ought to be directed by those signs that come to them from the hand of God.

Nor is that some distant notion unrelated to ourselves. On the contrary, it is a truth of which we constantly need to be reminded. What gives their actual meaning to our times and seasons? Consider the facts and see. Note how often the days that ought to be sacred are profaned: Sunday secularized, Christmas commercialized, Easter cheapened into an hour's outward show.

And in a larger and more inclusive way men may forget that life with its times and seasons belongs to God. They ignore the fact that there are any such things as heavenly directions which should control what they are and do. Charles Dickens put the truth in his own unforgettable way in the first chapter of Dombey and Son. Mr. Dombey had no doubt whatever that the affairs of the commercial house of which he was the head were more important than anything else imaginable—more important than private affection or public concern.

Dombey and Son. . . . Those three words conveyed the one idea of Mr. Dombey's life. The earth was made for Dombey and Son to trade in, and the sun and moon were made to give them light. Rivers and seas were formed to float their ships; rainbows gave them promise of fair weather; winds blew for or against their enterprises; stars and planets circled in their orbits to preserve inviolate a system of which they were the centre. . . . A.D. had no concern with anno Domini, but stood for anno Dombei—and Son.

That sort of blind arrogance comes sooner or later to its fall. Only if a man is looking to something higher than his own self-interest or his pride and passion for the signs that shall control his seasons and days and years will he know at last truly how to divide the day from the night.

14-19. Sun, Moon, and Stars.—The sun and the moon are such immense and obvious facts in the universal experience of the human race that it is natural that they should have entered often into religion. Solar myths are numerous. In Egypt particularly the worship of the sun was the center of religious thought and spiritual imagination. Among some of the peoples of Asia, especially the desert peoples who because of the heat of daytime did their journeying mostly by night, the moon was the influence to which they gave the more awesome regard. The winter and summer solstices especially were associated with worship and appeal because they represented the withdrawal or the coming again of life-bringing light. Eclipses of the sun struck primitive man with inevitable terror; and the moon also, in some phases, was feared as baleful. Note our words "moonstruck" and "lunatic." Here in these verses of Genesis is one of the many instances in which the Hebrew writer lifted instinctive conceptions of earlier peoples up into

16 And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also.

17 And God set them in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth, would not even deny it. A later commentator, feeling vs. 14a to be an inadequate statement of the functions of the luminaries, will then have added vss. 14b and 15a, though it is possible that vs. 15a, which has no astrological implications, is from another hand than vs. 14b.

16-19. These verses, except for vss. 18b, 19, also seem to be an addition to the primary narrative of P. And God made the two great lights is, strictly speaking, unnecessary after vs. 15b and, like vss. 7a, 12a, may be a part of a systematic elaboration of P's work. With it belongs the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night. . . . And God set them in the firmament of the heavens . . . , to rule over the day and over the night, and to separate the light from the darkness (vss. 16aβγ, 17a, 18a). Indicative a nobler faith. To the Hebrews the sun and moon are no longer independent forces. They also are the handiwork of the one living God whose final work is man.

In an age when there was no such thing as a telescope the sun and the moon seemed, of course, the mightiest creations in the sky. Nevertheless, the seer who wrote this prelude of Genesis did not stop with them. He looked at the innumerable lights that glittered in the heavens, and he said that God had made the stars also. He did not know the immensity he added with that also. He could not have guessed that what seemed to him as little twinkling pin points against the darkness were planets and constellations that witnessed to the glory of God to a degree of wonder inconceivably greater than the witness of the sun and moon. But if he had been able to be aware of all that he was saying, he still would have said it. For the wings of his faith went out to whatever might be the fullness of the universe. All that was belonged to God.

The stars also. The solar system shrinks to a small thing as measured by the majesty of the stars and the fathomless depths of space in which they move. The sun is estimated to be a little less than ninety-three million miles distant from the earth. But the distance to Alpha Centauri, one of the nearest of the stars, is twenty-five million millions of miles. Arcturus, the star to which the handle of the Dipper points, and which shines in the northern sky hardly bigger to human eyes than the golden flicker of a candle, has a diameter of ten million miles. In 1933, through a photo-electric cell which had caught the light of Arcturus through the telescope of the Yerkes Observatory and actuated electric relays, the lights were turned on to open the Chicago World's Fair. It was estimated then (though these calculations have since been slightly revised) that these beams from Arcturus reaching the earth in 1933 had left that star in 1893, when the first Chicago World's Fair was opened. The beams had taken forty years to reach the earth; and the distance traveled by light in one year is six trillion miles.

As we contemplate these facts, what is brought home to our awareness? First, a sense of awe before the majesty and mystery of God. The men of the O.T. felt this (see Pss. 8; 19; 104; 148; Isa. 40). Who can contemplate without a hushed and humbled reverence in mind and soul the universe which modern knowledge has unfolded? If men instinctively recognized the reality of God and bowed down before the grandeur of the Creator as they looked up at the firmament of their contracted thought, what of the compulsion to a more immense religious awe which reaches out from the infinity of the skies as they are now perceived? Recall Joseph Addison's hymn "The spacious firmament on high," and Oliver Wendell Holmes's, "Lord of all being, throned afar."

True, there is a difficulty here. For some there is a frightening bewilderment in the new conceptions of the universe. God seems lost in its immensity. Their faith would feel safer in a smaller framework.² But here is the everlasting necessity for that stretching of the mind which religious maturity requires. Greater understanding can lead through greater wonder to the grown man's faith. Willard L. Sperry has written of an old minister in a New England mill town to whom he was assistant, who once every year preached a sermon on the latest discoveries in astronomy. When Sperry expostulated and of the secondary character of this material is: (a) to rule over day and night is an advance on the thought of vs. 14a, and (b) to separate the light from the darkness differs, in view of vs. 4b, somewhat significantly from vs. 14a. To this was later added vs. 17b, to give light upon the earth, possibly by the same hand as vs. 15a, and vs. 16b, to include the stars with the sun and moon. Vss. 18b-19 are from the hand of P and complete his description of the work of the fourth day.

The elaboration to which the originally simple account of the creation of the heavenly bodies (vss. 14a, 15b, 18b, 19) has been subjected is not only more extensive than that which other parts of the narrative have received, but also differs from it somewhat in character. Elsewhere the secondary material really adds nothing to what has already been said. In this section, however, not only vss. 14b, 15a and 17b, but even the material referred to above as "systematic elaboration" (vss. 16a, 17a, 18a), has a certain didactic intent, which, indeed, it may be noted, characterizes even the primary vs. 14a, for only here does the author state the purpose of what was being created to separate the day from the night. The systematic elaboration adds that the lights are to rule over the day and over the night (vs. 18a), and the later commentators that they are to give light upon the earth (vss. 15a, 17b), and are to be for signs and for seasons and for days and years (vs. 14b). The intent of vss. 15a and 17b is clear enough: they seem to be from the hand of one who realized, as P had not, that light derives from the sun. The other material would seem to be combating current astrological ideas. The intent of vss. 16aβγ, 18a may well be to emphasize that the rule over the day and the night popularly wanted to know what possible use such a sermon preached in such a place could have, the older man answered, "My dear boy, of course it is of no use at all, but it greatly enlarges my idea of God." Then, says Sperry:

That stray remark lighted up a whole area of which I had been until that time utterly unaware. . . . From that day to this I have known that "greatly enlarged ideas of God" are supremely necessary to religion and that in the long run you cannot make good cotton cloth or sell it honestly in want of such ideas.³

And if contemplation of the stars enlarges one's thoughts of God, so it wakes the realization that there is order in the universe which needs to be matched by disciplined order in life. Consider the majestic rhythm of the stars, the unswerving certainties of movement because of which may be foretold the exact path of a star's progression or the exact instant when the shadow of an eclipse begins. Said Immanuel Kant, "Two things fill the mind with ever new and increasing admiration and awe . . . : the starry heavens above me and the moral law within me."⁴ Read Wordsworth's "Ode to Duty," and consider how God, who "dost preserve the stars from wrong," speaks from the example of the heavens this lesson to the human heart: that it is not by license or chaotic so-called freedom, but only by obedience to everlasting laws of righteousness that the great energies of life are swung into their harmonious orbits. That is so within the personality in the control of impulses by ideals. It is so in all relationships: of friendship, of marriage, of the citizenship that sees a community in the light of the kingdom of God.

Thus the stars speak of God. But they speak also of man. What they first seem to say is devastating. "When I consider thy heavens, . . . what is man?" If the psalmist could ask that, how much more crushing might the question seem now? Beside what we know of this majestic and immeasurable universe, what is man but a speck of restless protoplasm, crawling on this little earth? Listen to Theodore Dreiser: "As I see him, the unutterably infinitesimal individual weaves among the mysteries a floss-like and wholly meaningless course—if course it be. In short, I catch no meaning from all I have seen, and pass quite as I came, confused and dismayed."⁵ attributed to the sun and the moon was merely figurative, as they were not gods, not even living beings, but merely lights. And the author of vs. 14b may be saying that if the heavenly bodies did give signs, as was commonly supposed, they did not do so independently, in their own power, but as the agents of God who had created them to reveal his will. But for all their methodical classification of the tasks supposedly performed by the sun, moon, and stars—indeed, perhaps because of such classification—neither P nor his commentators rose to the height attained by the author of Ps. 19:1, "The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork."

20 And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven.

F. THE FIFTH DAY (1:20-23)

20. Like the earth in vs. 11, the waters are now endowed with productive powers. A literal rendering of this verse would be, "And God said, 'Let the waters swarm with

Against the profundities of time and space which astronomy explores, what conceivable significance has man? Well—as has been truly said—the answer is that man is the astronomer. Man has the intellect, the intuition, and the power of ordered thought to master the secrets of the universe. To him has been given to think God's thoughts after him. How much can this fact mean for further mastery of what God intends us to understand? If man has gone so far in intellectual grasp, what of the moral conquests that ought to be possible?

In a time of pessimism and of possible frustration that is the crucial question. Too many influences disparage human possibilities; who will dignify them? Thomas Mann wote:

Who cannot embroider upon the depravity of this strange creature called man, who does not often despair over his future? . . . And yet it is a fact—more true today than ever—that we cannot allow ourselves, because of so much all too well-founded scepticism, to despise humanity. Despite so much ridiculous depravity, we cannot forget the great and the honourable in man, which manifest themselves as art and science, as passion for truth, creation of beauty and the idea of justice; and it is also true that insensitiveness to the great mystery which we touch upon when we say "man" or "humanity" signifies spiritual death.*

Let this emphasis be carried forward to our generation, and in a difficult time. When many representations already confront us with what seems a pitch-dark night, the thing to do is not to splash it with the black paint of added pessimism. Rather, the need is to carry into it the lighted candle of a better faith in human possibilities when these are kindled by the flame of God.

20-21. The Treasures of the Waters.—Thank God for fish! If one should begin with those words he might startle his hearers, but he would be saying something worth their listening to, all the same. In the beautiful old Benedicite, which is sung in many church services, there is the echo of man's gratitude for what the record in Genesis tells that God created on the fifth day—not only fish in general, but the great sea-monsters too. "O ye Whales, and all that move in the waters, bless ye the Lord: praise him, and magnify him for ever."

The whaling ships that went out from the seaports of New England and from other harbors of the world established an industry that in its day was as full of economic profit as it was of romance. Everyone who has read Melville's Moby Dick will understand that, but not everyone may realize the whole immensity of the fisheries of the world. Before the outbreak of World War II, the fisheries were producing thirty-seven billion pounds of fish products annually, valued at almost a billion dollars. Some countries owe their very existence to their fishing fleets, e.g., Japan before 1941 controlled nearly a third of the fishery harvest of the world. As the United States Department of the Interior has stated:

The high nutritive quality and digestibility of fish proteins class fish among the more desirable food products. . . . Much of the yield of the fisheries may be consumed directly as human food, while the remainder may be converted into such essential by-products as vitamin oils, livestock and poultry feeds, fertilizers, and industrial oils.⁷

swarming things, living creatures, and let birds fly, etc.'” Living creatures thus appears to be a gloss, a reflex probably of vs. 21a. The conjunction of fishes and birds in one creative act would seem to be due to P’s schematization of his material to bring the whole work of creation into six days. The LXX and the Vulg. render, “and birds that may fly.” On the basis of this William Henry Bennett (Genesis [Edinburgh: T. C. & E. C. Jack, n.d.; “The New-Century Bible”], p. 81) suggests that the author may have been influenced by some ancient tradition that birds as well as fishes were produced by the water. Against this interpretation is the fact that the verb above rendered “swarm with”

Nor is the supply of fish left to chance. The governments of all progressive countries have their hatcheries that not only stock the streams, but are concerned also with the ocean. A Japanese scientist wrote after 1945: “The ocean and the seas contain inexhaustible treasures; in order to utilize them fully we must be guided by scientific methods of fishing.” And he went on to urge the cultivation of “sea-farms,” in which, “as we fertilize the rice fields, we should fertilize the sea-weeds which are rich in iodine and serve as food both for man and fish.”⁸

But it is not only that fish are caught for food and for innumerable other purposes; the catching of them has made a special breed of men. Among Jesus’ disciples at least the first four, and the leaders of them all, were men straight from the fishing boats. For their occupation, with its rough chance of wind and water, a man must be of virile stuff; and such men can be the mainstays of church and nation. They may look like crude material in the beginning, but so does iron; and like iron, they can be forged and hammered into heroic strength. After he had sailed with the men of the North Sea fishing fleets of England, Wilfred Grenfell wrote: “They . . . never thought of deprivation or danger. . . . In efficiency and for their daring resourcefulness in physical difficulties and dangers, they were absolutely in a class by themselves. . . . Whatever they did, they did hard.”⁹ Men inured like that to the sea have made the greatness of England as they have manned her navies and her fleets of exploration since the days of Raleigh and Drake. And much of the vigor of France would not have belonged to her if she had not had the fishermen of Brittany.

In gentler ways, also, fish have played a part in the widening of human experience and in the development of human character. They have been the lure to lead men to the rivers where they learn much more than the delicate skill of casting with rod and line. They learn to know the spell of silence and the long, slow restfulness of being alone with their own thoughts. The classic description of the fisherman’s pursuits as leading mind and spirit to happy exercise is old Izaak Walton’s The Complete Angler, or the Contemplative Man’s Recreation. Even if the fisherman takes nothing, he says, “Yet he enjoyeth a delightful Walk by pleasant Rivers, in Sweet Pastures, among odoriferous Flowers, which gratifie his Senses and delight his Mind,” all of which “composeth the Soul to that calmness and sincerity which give a man the fullest possession and fruition of himself.”¹ An earlier writer, Gervase Markham, in 1614, had celebrated the spiritual fruits of angling in a still more specific way, and in his quaint listing of what a fisherman learns there is a suggestion as to what all men in all pursuits might well decide to achieve; for the list begins with patience and ends with fortitude, which “inableth the minde to undergoe the travaile and exchange of Weathers with a delightful ease, and not to despair with a little expence of time, but to persevere.”²

For Izaak Walton, however, the fisherman’s contact with the quiet loveliness of the outdoors was more than an incitement to serene philosophy. It was a wide open door through which religious reverence entered into a larger world. Here is a revealing fact for thought to dwell upon: the simple things which in themselves are insignificant may become the avenues to God. The gentle old Walton was one of the first in England to learn to catch from nature a message of the divine. Just by being a fisherman he became a more discerning Christian. He remembered:

When God intended to reveal any future events or high notions to his prophets, he then carried them either to the deserts or the sea-shore, that having so separated them from amidst the press of people and business, and the cares of the world, he might settle their mind in a quiet repose, and there make them fit for revelation.³

And he ends his book thus:

So when I would beget content, and increase confidence in the power, and wisdom, and Providence of Almighty God, I will walk the meadows by some gliding stream, and there contemplate the lilies ment of the heavens." 21 So God created the great sea monsters and every living creature that moves, with which the waters swarm, according to their kinds, and every winged bird according to its kind. And God saw seems to mean not "produce a swarm," but rather "be a place where swarming things abound"; it cannot, therefore, govern birds as an object (Skinner, Genesis, pp. 27-28). It may be noted that there is no suggestion that only a single pair of each kind was produced, but rather that the whole species appeared in considerable numbers. At the end of vs. 20 the LXX has "and it was so," correctly it would seem (cf. vss. 7b, 9b, 12b, 15b).

21. The first sentence is probably secondary (cf. vss. 7a, 12a, 16a, 17a, 18a); not only is it necessary after "and it was so"; it also ascribes the "swarming things" to an immediate creative act of God, not to the productive power with which he had endowed the waters. The sudden introduction of the great sea monsters suggests that these words, with the following and, are still later, an addition by one who was concerned with the thought that take no care, and those very many other various little living creatures, that are not only created, but fed, man knows not how, by the goodness of the God of Nature, and therefore trust in him. This is my purpose; and so "Let every thing that hath breath praise the Lord."⁴

If to any persons it should seem a long way from vs. 20 to the thoughts that culminate in Izaak Walton's words, let it be remembered that indeed they are linked by an everlasting truth. As the ancient writers contemplated the waters and the living things therein, and counted that work of God as good, so those who walk by quiet rivers may behold the goodness of God again. As the unnamed American editor of The Complete Angler wrote:

I trust that I have drunk enough of the old angler's spirit not to let such pastime break in upon better things; but, on the other hand, I have worked the harder from thankfulness to HIM who taught the brook to wind with musical gurglings, as it rolls on to the Great Sea.⁵

21-23. The Wonder of Birds.—Here is a possibility for a meditation or sermon, at least to a particular group and at a special time. God created . . . every winged bird according to its kind. So the Creation had another aspect in its manifold fascination. Looking at the birds, men may well echo the words of Genesis concerning this work of God, that it was good. Granted that not all people are equally enthusiastic about all birds. As Uncle Remus might have said, "Dey comes different." Farmers have no liking for some of them, e.g., crows and hawks. But most birds are the friendly allies of men's pursuits; and in their own lives they give to the universe a fresh element of variety and wonder. They wake the poetry in human minds and souls. Read Shelley's "To a Skylark," Keats's "Ode to a Nightingale," Wordsworth's "To a Skylark" and "To the Cuckoo," and Henry Vaughan's "The Bird."

God may be thanked for birds because they open up an avenue of happy interest to everyone who chooses to pursue it. John James Audubon devoted his life to the study of birds. He wrote of his boyhood:

During all these years there existed within me a tendency to follow Nature in her walks. Perhaps not an hour of leisure was spent elsewhere than in woods and fields, and to examine either the eggs, nest, young, or parents of any species of birds constituted my delight.⁶

To Henry David Thoreau, who withdrew from towns and people and lived alone in his cabin by Walden Pond, the song of the wood thrush was cool bars of melody from the atmosphere of everlasting morning or evening. . . . There is the liquid coolness of things that are just drawn from the bottom of springs. . . . Whenever a man hears it, he is young, and Nature is in her spring. Wherever he hears it, it is a new world and a free country, and the gates of heaven are not shut against him.⁷

Not many people will be lifetime naturalists like Audubon or will live in the woods like Thoreau, but people busy in many ordinary ways can get out of dull ruts and find the expansiveness of a new delight because they look at birds. In his Twenty-five Years 1892- that these mythological beings (cf. Ps. 74:13; Isa. 27:1; 51:9; Job 7:12), the existence of which was doubtless still believed in, derived their being from God.

22. The fishes and birds are now endowed with reproductive powers by a specific creative act (contrast vs. 11). The reason for this would seem to be that, whereas the bearing of seed by the plants was automatic, reproduction of their species by the fishes and the birds demands from them a certain degree of co-operation—this presumably on the analogy of the mammals, unless it is to be supposed that the author was aware, whether by personal observation or otherwise, of the behavior of the fishes and the 1916, Sir Edward Grey, British secretary of state for foreign affairs, has this to tell of Theodore Roosevelt:

While Roosevelt was still President, Bryce had written to me to say that after Roosevelt's term of office was over he intended to travel, and among other places to visit England. He had not heard the songs of British birds, and would time his visit so as to be in England at the time of the singing of birds. He would like it to be arranged that someone, who knew the songs of birds, should spend a day walking with him and naming the songs as they were heard.⁸

Then Lord Grey goes on to recount how Roosevelt, although he had gone first to British East Africa, the Sudan, and Europe, tenaciously held to his purpose, and when he had arrived in England, insisted that a whole day should be set aside from the crowded schedule of public events so that he and Lord Grey might spend it listening to the songs of English birds. It was this sort of vivid interest and enjoyment over and above the engrossment of practical things that made Roosevelt the scintillating person he was.

As the contemplation of birds feeds the sense of beauty, so also it does more. It wakes a spiritual wonder. Consider the instincts which birds follow—instincts which no knowledge of ours can analyze or explain: the skill and adaptation in the building of nests; the unerring certainty of flight over great distances of land and water in migration.

Ponder the analogy which may be offered here concerning the elements of our human guidance: analytical knowledge on the one hand; a more profound instinctive feeling on the other. A brittle intellectualism may argue that nothing should be taken seriously that cannot be rationalized completely; that a religion that reaches into mystery is superstition; that trust in God is nothing but credulity unless the proof of it can be set down in arithmetic as flatly obvious as that two and two make four. But great living goes beyond such squinting calculation. It follows profounder impulses in the soul. As Augustine wrote in his Confessions, "Thou hast made us for thyself, and our hearts are restless till they rest in thee." Birds that did not follow the instinct telling them where to fly would perish. What of human souls? Has God put into us the instinct of spiritual migration that bids us trust the great wings of faith and far obedience by which alone we may fulfill our living and come home?

A final thought: God's providence. Consider the words of Jesus in Matt. 6:26; 10:29; Luke 12:6. We look at life and say that its necessities must be met by forethought. We read Paul's words to the Thessalonians, "Study . . . to do your own business, and to work with your own hands, . . . that ye may have lack of nothing" (I Thess. 4:11-12). It seems obvious that we are not meant to sit down with folded hands and expect the ravens to feed us. Nothing comes to irresponsibility. But when that is seen, there is a deeper fact to which the tension we build up in ourselves may make us blind. It is the fact which Jesus in his great steadiness perceived: that there are fundamental reliances for which we do not have to be responsible. In God's world there are unmeasured resources of strength and a sustenance which he has provided for all those who approach life with a direct expectancy. So comes the assurance which makes a man serene.

One evening when Luther saw a little bird perched on a tree, to roost there for the night, he said, "This little bird has had its supper, and now it is getting ready to go to sleep here, quite secure and content, never troubling itself what its food will be, or where its lodging on the morrow. Like

G. THE SIXTH DAY (1:24-31)

24. The animals, like the plants (cf. vs. 11; also, as regards the production of fishes by the waters, vs. 20), are represented as having been produced by the earth. They are given a threefold classification: cattle—domesticated animals, roughly Herbivora; creeping things—reptiles, insects, and very small quadrupeds; and beasts of the earth—wild beasts, roughly Carnivora.

25. The first half of the verse in which it may be noted there is no mention of "cattle" (which therefore seem to be subsumed under the beasts of the earth) is probably secondary (cf. vss. 7a, etc.).

It has already been noted that there is no blessing of the animals similar to that of the fishes and the birds in vs. 22. Three explanations of this are possible: (a) vs. 22 is even later than vs. 21a, as has been suggested above—and so, later than vs. 25a, from the same hand as vs. 21a; or (b) the author of vs. 25a—and of vs. 21a—did include a blessing of the animals which has disappeared by accident; or (c) he deliberately omitted it because the account of what happened on the sixth day was already rather long. In any case, it seems likely that only man was blessed in the original narrative of P, and that the blessing of the fishes and birds—and of the animals if one was recorded—is a reflex of vs. 28.

26. The creation of man is invested with a special solemnity. God first consults with divine beings other than himself, Let us make man. Let us could indeed be taken simply as a plural of majesty, for the custom of rulers speaking in the plural appeared with the Persians (see Gunkel, Genesis, p. 111; cf. Holzinger, Genesis, p. 10). Although David, it 'abides under the shadow of the Almighty.' It sits on its little twig content, and lets God take care."⁹

Likewise, for every life it may be true as Sidney Lanier wrote in "The Marshes of Glynn":

As the marsh-hen secretly builds on the watery sod, Behold I will build me a nest on the greatness of God.¹⁰ of how the human race got to be upon this earth. There might be a review of what was once the startling conflict between the doctrine of evolution and the ancient faith of creation at the hands of God. That has been touched upon in the Expos., p. 462, and also in the Expos. on 37:24. Here, then, thought may center especially on let them have dominion.

To read the Bible is to know that creation does not remain in the past tense. The Hebrew conviction was of a God who acted, who acts, and who will act. His purposes for life go on enlarging. As Isaiah was to say: "Hast thou not known? hast thou not heard, that the everlasting God, the LORD, the Creator of the ends of the earth, fainteth not, neither is weary?"

have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the birds of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creep-

P nowhere else alludes to angels, it is evident from 3:22; 11:7; I Kings 22:19; Isa. 6:8, all of which passages are earlier than the Persian period, that Hebrew religious thought was familiar with the idea of a heavenly host with whom God took counsel. Reference may also be made to the representation of the Babylonian creation epic that Marduk, before creating man, declared his intention to Ea (see Skinner, Genesis, p. 45).

There is thus an echo of polytheism here, but it is only an echo. What seems to be significant is the idea that for the creation of man it was fitting, if not necessary, that there should be something like co-operation on the part of the whole company of heaven. A further possibility should be considered: whether there is not here an attempt, however inarticulate, to give expression to the feeling that God could not be adequately represented as just a bare unity. At any rate, some such idea as this seems to underlie the apparent hypostatization of the divine attributes in such passages as Pss. 43:3; 89:14; 147:18.

After our likeness, more abstract than in our image, may well be a gloss on the latter phrase, especially in view of the absence of "after his likeness" in vs. 27. For over all the earth should be read, with the Syriac, "over every beast of the earth." God thus gives man dominion over all life as it has been enumerated in its species in vss. 20 and 24.

... He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength." (Isa. 40:28-29.)

How is God's continuing creativity expressed? He raises up new men. Note the stirring repetition of that fact in Hebrew history. Out of Ur of the Chaldeans, from among the miscellaneous and now-forgotten crowd, comes Abraham to be the pioneer of a new civilization of the spirit. Out of a group of ordinary brothers emerges Joseph; and a psalmist, remembering what God wrought in him for the generations following, wrote, "He sent a man before them" (Ps. 105:17). When Israel was in bondage, Moses came to lead the Exodus. When Moses was old, came Joshua; and after him, in hours of crisis, the long line of men of destiny, Gideon and Jephthah, Samuel and Saul, Jonathan and David, Elijah, Amos, Isaiah, Nehemiah—to name no more. To be sure not in the Bible only but all down the course of history the coming of the great leader has changed the current of events. This appearance of the right man at the critical time is often like a miracle. No law of averages produces him. No characteristics of the crowd show what he is to be. The qualities he brings may be unique. He is like a fresh gift from the hands of God.

But God's creativity is not only in raising up the new man. It is in taking a man who is already there and making him over so that his significance is new. Moses would never have led the Exodus unless the spirit of God had first laid hold of him in the vision of the burning bush and challenged and corrected him and compelled him to conquer his own self-distrust. Hosea became the passionate prophet of the love of God because he learned through his suffering. The revolution wrought in Saul of Tarsus, the conversion of Augustine, the transformation of the careless young Francis of Assisi into the saint—all these are examples of the way God creates something different out of what had seemed to be of a fixed mold. Added to those are the uncounted instances, familiar to every generation, of persons who at first seemed altogether ordinary, but who by steady obedience to the moving of the Spirit became great servants of God. To those who of themselves would have had no might, he increased strength.

Futhermore, God's creativity is in the shaping of events. Often in critical issues, even though it is never possible completely to analyze or ascribe the forces which determine history, men do at least begin to realize that the tilting of the balance comes from something other than the human weights that have been thrown into the scales. Victor Hugo in Les Misérables gave the supreme expression of this sense that into the shaping of our human events there comes a power higher than this earth. He was writing of the Battle of Waterloo and the defeat of Napoleon, a defeat which might have seemed to have its immediate explanation in the fact that the reinforcements which might have saved him were misdirected, and did not arrive in time—or in Hugo's words, "Because on the afternoon of a certain summer's day, a shepherd said to a Prussian in the forest, 'Go this way

ing thing that creeps upon the earth." 27 So God created man in his own image, in the image of God he created him; male and

27. To emphasize further the solemnity of the event a specific act of creation is recorded—in metrical form it may be noted, three lines of four beats each; i.e., the author was not content at this point with the representation that God said, "Let there be, etc.," and it was so. Possibly the influence of 2:7 is operating here; nevertheless, it does not seem fanciful to discern in vs. 26-27 the beginnings of that doctrine of man, congruent with the O.T. doctrine of God, which was to be developed in the wisdom literature.

The idea of man being created in the image of God is probably dependent on Babylonian mythology. "Before proceeding to the creation of Ea-bani, Aruru forms a mental image (zikru . . .) of the God Anu . . . ; and similarly, in the Descent of Ištar, Ea forms a zikru in his wise heart before creating Ašūsunamir" (ibid., pp. 31-32). In the mind of P, there can be little doubt, bodily form was to some extent at any rate involved in the idea of the divine image; cf. the numerous references in the O.T. to God's hands, feet, mouth, etc. (e.g., Pss. 119:73; 33:6; Isa. 60:13; Zech. 14:4, to cite only late passages). The incorporeality of God was too abstract a thought for an Israelite even of the fifth century (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, p. 112). Nevertheless, it caused always a certain tension which manifests itself, e.g., in the prophetic polemic against images (cf. Deut. 5:8; Isa.

and not that.' " But the real cause, as Victor Hugo saw it, was more majestic.

27. In the Image of God.—Those religious conceptions which first come into sight at primitive levels may be the root of greater adult faith; and the greatness of developed faith must not be disparaged because its origin was in crude ideas. That is the double truth which emerges from this verse, and from the Exeg. on it. It is a truth which presents itself repeatedly in these first chapters of Genesis, and it is one that needs to be brought home often to our recognition—for we may not readily accept it. Our tendency may be to suppose that high beliefs lose their dignity if their origins are humble.

That is one error; and William James has illumining comments on certain aspects of that error in the first chapter of his famous The Varieties of Religious Experience.² In our individual experience we may recapitulate the experience of the race. The early thinkers about God thought of him as corporeal (cf. Exeg.).

So does the child. There is an instinctive yearning for Someone whom we can see and touch. A little girl whose mother was kissing her good night and about to go downstairs clung to her and did not want to let her go. "But, darling," said her mother, "you have your doll, and God is with you." "Yes," said the little girl, "I know I have my doll and that God is with me, but I want somebody with a skin face."

We are creatures of flesh as well as of spirit, and we want reality to manifest itself in terms of the flesh. As the Exeg. has said, "In Hebrew thought, the body was a part of the whole man and was necessary to his complete being"; and so not only in Hebrew thought but in all humanity there is the feeling that something outside us is made certain to us only when we apprehend it in bodily terms.

But of course there is the equally important fact that we are more than bodies; and the danger is that if we never get beyond the bodily conceptions we forfeit the development of our spirits. All true growth depends upon the gradual lifting of our awareness above the limits of our physical sensations. To the baby nothing is real except what satisfies his elementary and instinctive appetites. Keep him warm and feed him and let him sleep, and he is satisfied. Nothing beyond that matters. What his father and mother may be saying and what they may have in their minds for him are completely outside his recognition. But as he grows, his world enlarges. The time will come—unless morally he still is infantile—when the best that his father and mother are, with their hopes, their princi-

40:19-20; 44:9-20), in the silence of Isaiah as to the appearance of God (Isa. 6:1), and in the insistence that man could not see God's face (Exod. 33:20-23). And in the present passage P does not represent God as saying, "Let us make man in my image," but in our image—the image of us, the divine beings. A sentence of Skinner's may be quoted, "That P retained the idea [of a heavenly council] in spite of his silence as to the existence of angels is due to the fact that it was decidedly less anthropomorphic than the statement that man was made in the image of the one incomparable Deity" (Genesis, p. 31).

In view of the fact, however, that in Hebrew thought the body was a part of the whole man and was necessary to his complete being, and that it was furthermore the outward manifestation of the reality of which it was a part, the representation that man was made in the image of God meant much more than that man looked like God or like the divine beings which formed his retinue. The image included likeness to them in spiritual powers—the power of thought, the power of communication, the power of self-transcendence. No doubt these concepts remained to some extent inarticulate in the author's mind; nevertheless they were there. He was trying to state in concrete terms—the only terms with which he, being a Semite, was familiar—what could only be stated, however inadequately, in abstract terms.

To be noted is the fact that the male and the female are created at the same time, with which the representation of the older J story (2:21-22) should be contrasted. As to whether P believed that a single pair only had been created at this time, or whether he thought of the creation of men and women in numbers, it is difficult to say. Skinner (ibid., p. 33), noting that the great majority of commentators favor the former possibility, points out that there is nothing in the narrative to bear out this view, and cites with approval the opinion of the minority that the analogy of the marine and land animals is, on the whole, against it.

28. The power of procreation is given to man, with a special blessing, immediately upon his creation. With this should be contrasted the motif of the older story—that the man and his wife attained consciousness of sex only as a result of eating the fruit of the ples, and their purposes, will become his heritage. Not only physically, but now in this more important inner way, he is being fashioned in their image.

It is no reproach to religion if it also begins where the infant begins. The only reproach is if it stays there. God is sensed first just as the outside power that controls the things we want. Primitive worship is thus the method of trying to persuade or placate this sort of God. If the worshiper can go away from the shrine believing that he will get the particular favor he has asked for, that is all he wants. There is not much meaning yet in the idea of being made in God's image. Rather, he makes his god according to his own image, as a small child's mind makes his father into a big something moving about that may be useful if he can be made to listen. But here in ch. 1 a greater conception is breaking through. As the Exeg. has pointed out, this Hebrew writer expressed himself in concrete fashion, for the Semitic mind worked instinctively with pictures, not with abstractions. But when he spoke of man as in the image of God, he was considering not so much man's body as his spirit. Man was like God because he had "the power of thought, the power of communication, the power of self-transcendence" (see Exeg.).

If man had lived in the beginning, and had continued to live, on that level, then he would have fulfilled God's purpose in creation. But as ch. 2 goes on to show, a demonic element entered into his history. He turned away from obedience to God to follow his own rebellious impulses. So the image of God in him was blurred and broken and could be restored only by a long process of redemption. But the O.T. never loses sight of the ideal which was there in the beginning. It keeps reminding every man that he is never true to himself, and that he can never really be content, until he is brought back to the great thoughts and the lofty impulses which were planted in him as his heritage from God.

28-30. A Projected Longing.—Man is to have dominion over all other living things on earth, and that dominion has often seemed a merciless forbidden tree. As is noted below, this representation reflects J's melancholy attitude toward sex which, it is suggested, was a result of his contact with Baalism. P's matter-of-fact point of view was possible because by his time Baalism, its values having been assimilated by Yahwism, had ceased to be a threat to its integrity.

29-30. It is now divinely ordained that man shall have for his food every plant yielding seed . . . , and every tree with seed in its fruit; with this may be compared the classification in vs. 11. The wild beasts, the birds and the creeping things (cf. vs. 24), on the other hand, are to subsist on the green herbage (vs. 30). Man is thus to be a vegetarian. This is something of a contradiction to vs. 26, according to which he was to have dominion over all living creatures. Furthermore, there are in the Hebrew certain significant differences of style (for the details see Skinner, Genesis, p. 35) from the preceding section, and no reference is made to the domestic animals which, as in vs. 25, are subsumed under every beast of the earth. To be noted finally is the senseless and it was so at the end of vs. 30, suggesting a somewhat wooden imitation of an existing form. For these reasons vs. 29-30 may well be an addition to P's original narrative (cf. Richard Kraetzschmar, Die Bundesvorstellung im Alten Testament [Marburg: N. G. Elwert, 1896], pp. 193-94, referred to by Gunkel, Genesis, p. 114). Gunkel, however, retains vs. 29-30 as part of P's original narrative, and accounts for the inconsistency between them and vs. 26-28 by holding that P was combining two originally independent traditions—that of the Creation, and that of the peace of the primeval age. The question as to whether this combination was made by P or by some later commentator is not of primary importance.

The point of vs. 29 is not what man may eat, but rather that he may not eat flesh (contrast 9:2-3). It thus echoes the idea—found in Persian and Greco-Roman mythology (see Gunkel, Genesis, p. 113)—of a primitive golden age when men were at peace with the beasts, an idea which had already found expression among the Hebrews in the J story of the Garden of Eden (2:18-20). Vs. 29 may therefore have been added in order to supply some allusion to this—especially in view of Isa. 11:6-8; 65:25; Hos. 2:18, all of one. Fish and fowl and animals have been his food. It would seem that the priestly writer of this account of the Creation had a sensitiveness to all life and a pity for the lower creatures which made him believe that such dominion was not in God's ordaining. His picture here is of men living on fruit and on grain; neither are there any carnivorous animals, but they have instead every green herb for meat. This vision of an idyllic world in which there is no fear and no taking of life appears again in the prophecy of Isaiah. "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together: and a little child shall lead them" (Isa. 11:6).

And Hosea too dreams of a time when all creatures shall "lie down safely" (Hos. 2:18). Later in Genesis the picture presented in this chapter changes. Man may have the other creatures for his food, "even as the green herb have I given you all things" (9:3). But the reluctance to feed on life persists, and so it is enjoined (and the Jewish laws of kosher food keep that injunction to this day) that "flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat" (9:4). And lest the sense of sacredness of human life should be cheapened by the permission to feed on animals, there is added the emphatic warning, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made he man" (9:6).

30 And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so.

31 And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And which reveal an interest in the myth, in that they predict that this idyllic peace between man and beast will be a condition of the restored golden age in the future.

31. God's Good World.—This verse is a gladdening thought on which to meditate whenever life seems drab or shadowed. For times come when men are inclined to pessimism. They have reasons for personal depression; they may look out on their world and see it involved in tragic shadows. Nevertheless this verse exalts the truth that the universe as God made it, and the life which God meant to be lived within it, are beautiful. God looked at everything and saw that it was very good. In the light of that we may well remember the words of Bishop Jeremy Taylor, "He that hath so many causes of joy, and so great, is very much in love with sorrow and peevishness, who loses all these pleasures, and chooses to sit down upon his little handful of thorns."³

Consider some of the aspects of God's creation which can lift and inspire the spirit. There is first the majestic framework of the universe itself. "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained . . ." is the preface to a psalmist's meditation (Ps. 8:3). Because he had been considering those, his thoughts were enlarged with a sense of the glory of God and the wonder of life as in his presence. To stand in silence on a hilltop and watch the sun rise, or to walk out under the immense silence of the stars, is one simple avenue into that mood of awe and wonder which is the forecourt of religion. Read the little book Silex Scintillans of the seventeenth-century poet Henry Vaughan, and among his poems especially "The World," that begins:

I saw Eternity the other night,
Like a great ring of pure and endless light,
All calm as it was bright.

Nor is it only in the great aspects of the universe, but in the beautiful little things, that one may understand why it is written that God looked at all that he had made and found it good. In The Life of Alice Freeman Palmer,⁴ by her husband, George Herbert Palmer, there is the account of a club she had for little girls in one of the dreariest tenement sections of Boston. It was called "The Happiness Club." It had three rules, and one of them was that each child must see something beautiful every day. That, in the drab streets and houses to which they were accustomed, was the hardest rule of all to follow, but with childish eagerness they did live up to it—even when the "something beautiful" they could report they had looked at was nothing more than a sparrow shaking his feathers in the rain gutter, or a glint of sunlight on a baby's hair. What Mrs. Palmer wanted her children to understand was that beauty may be everywhere for those whose eyes and hearts alike are open to perceive it; whereas to one who has gone on his way with a preoccupied mind and unawakened interest

A primrose by a river's brim
A yellow primrose was to him,
And it was nothing more.⁵

A man may so plod through his existence as to see only the dusty road, or he may see also the flower growing there beside it. He may see only the hard street with its noise and clamor, or he may see the blue sky between the canyons of the crowded buildings and the white clouds floating above the city's smoke. He may notice in the life around him only its ugliness and greed, or he may recognize with quick eye the little glimpses of courage and beauty which break like sunlight through the common fog.

Consider, likewise, the world of animate things. Earlier than the creation of man was the creation of the birds and animals. According to Genesis, man is to have dominion over these. But it is not to be a brutal dominion. He can delight in them as God did. To observe and study birds, to mark their comings and goings in spring and fall, to look for them in meadow and wood and to know their songs is endless fascination. The absence of a verb—supplied in the English translations, I have given—from vs. 30 suggests that this verse may be even later than vs. 29, a suggestion which is strengthened by the fact that there is little significant difference between the food allowed to man and that allowed to the beasts. The affinity, already noted, of the verse to vs. 25 makes it likely that the two verses are from the same hand, i.e., that vs. 30 is a part of what has been called above the systematic elaboration of P's narrative.

H. THE SEVENTH DAY: THE SABBATH (2:1-4a)

2:1. All the host of them: Nowhere else in the O.T. is "the host of the earth" referred to, either explicitly or by allusion. The author has thus compressed the statement that the heavens and their host and the earth and all that was in it were finished.

2. The repetition of finished, already used in the passive in vs. 1, is infelicitous. Furthermore, according to the narrative as a whole, God finished the world not on the seventh but on the sixth day. Samar., LXX, and the Syriac, indeed, read here, "on the sixth day," but the harder reading, on the seventh day, is certainly to be preferred.

had with horses and dogs. For those who have a right perception there may be an almost mystical relationship to wild life. Remember Francis of Assisi and the birds. Dhan Gopal Mukerji, who wrote his books in the West but who grew up in India, has told of going into the jungle and sitting perfectly still to watch the great beasts come to the water holes. As long as the human being has no fear, he says, they have no fear or hostility toward him. Read Rudyard Kipling's "My Lord the Elephant."

Again, in the goodness of God's universe there is the goodness of people. The emphasis on the sinfulness of man which has been so dominant after two world wars must not blind us to the virtue and winsomeness of multitudes of actual people. The relationships of life often are determined by what we look for. To a considerable degree people become what we expect them to be. Read William Saroyan's The Human Comedy.⁶ Better still, reread Charles Dickens. When we do, "we are filled," as Gilbert Chesterton wrote, "with the first of all democratic doctrines, that all men are interesting."⁷ That is not only a democratic doctrine. It is a religious one. The man who looks at life with the eyes of God will be finding some worth in even the worst people and some goodness everywhere.

2:1-3. The Lord's Day.—There is need for much thought and reflection concerning the sabbath, which for most Christians is now Sunday. Secularists ignore it; and many supposedly religious people treat it with indifferent forgetfulness of what should be its priceless value.

The origins of the sabbath as it was observed in Israel, as the Exeg. indicates, are not wholly clear. Its roots may go far back to the dimly remembered days of desert life when the Israelites, as nomads, marked the changes of the moon. But whatever may have been the first observance of the seventh day, the nobility of the development of sabbathkeeping is a towering fact in the long history of Judaism. It was set apart as a day of rest, and held to be such not by any human ordinance but by the will of God that was part of the very nature of creation. Here the priestly writer lifts the ordinances of Judaism to a universal validity when he records the sabbath as part of the primal constitution of nature as it comes from the hands of God. Nor was the sabbath rest something to be claimed only by individuals. Great conceptions of mercy and corporate responsibility and social concern and kindness entered into it. "Six days thou shalt do thy work, and on the seventh day thou shalt rest: that thine ox and thine ass may rest, and the son of thy handmaid, and the stranger, may be refreshed" (Exod. 23:12). "The seventh day is the sabbath of the LORD thy God: in it thou shalt not do any done. 3 So God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it, because on it God rested from all his work which he had done in creation.

Skinner (Genesis, p. 37) maintains that the rendering here should be not finished, but "desisted from"; this, however, would not help the stylistic difficulty of the Hebrew. Gunkel (Genesis, p. 114) regards vs. 2a as a variant to vs. 2b. It is more probably a gloss on vs. 2b—with finished meaning "desisted from"—by one to whom the idea of God resting caused a certain difficulty; cf. Isa. 40:28, where it is stated that God is never weary—and so in no need of rest—and Ps. 121:3b, 4. With its omission, "God" must be restored as the explicit subject of rested in vs. 2b.

3. The final clause, lit., "which God had created to make"—note the unnecessary repetition of God—is probably an explanatory gloss on work. The verse, together with vs. 2b, is an etiological myth accounting for the sabbath. It invests the sabbath with all the reality of creation itself, and represents its observance as a fundamental law of the world order.

This exalted idea of the sabbath was one of the results of the Exile. The origin of the observance is still in dispute but it seems reasonable to suppose, in view of the juxtaposition of new moon and sabbath in, e.g., II Kings 4:23; Isa. 1:13, that it stemmed from the feast of the full moon. If this is the case then it may be inferred that in the course of time two subordinate feasts came to be kept between these two major observances, so that there was a moon festival roughly every seven days. We may assume further that when Israel settled down to agriculture and abandoned the worship of the moon-god, which had formed part of their religion when as nomads they had moved about the desert at night, convenience suggested that the occurrence of these holy days be regularized by divorcing them from the changes of the moon, and the sabbath every seven days was the result—the feast of the new moon being retained independently of it. Apparently the sabbath in pre-exilic times called for a minimum of cultic observance, a fact which made possible its continuance in Babylonia. However that may be, it was there that the keeping of the sabbath became one of the three great marks of the Jews—the others being the refusal to eat blood (cf. 9:4) and the practice of circumcision (cf. 17:10)—and its observance took on a new and central significance until it ultimately came to involve abstention from work. It was to provide a rationale for this that P told of God resting on the seventh day and hallowing it.

The fact that P thus connects the origin of the sabbath not with some event in the life of one of the patriarchs—as he connected circumcision in ch. 17—or in the history of Israel, but with Creation itself, is of some significance. For the implication of this passage is that observance of the day—actually a peculiarly Jewish institution—is really binding upon all mankind. P thus claims that Judaism is no merely national religion, but is rather of universal validity, the only religion which is in accordance with the true nature of things.

work, . . . that thy manservant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou" (Deut. 5:14).

With the rise of the synagogue, the sabbath was made pre-eminently a day also of worship, instruction, and meditation upon God and his laws for life. Thus the significance of the sabbath grew to fullness. It was to be the day of rest and refreshment for the bodies and also for the souls of men.

As so often happens with institutions, there grew a danger also. The form could eclipse the spirit. The commandment against work, conceived at first with living imagination, tended to become a harsh and rigid orthodoxy; e.g., see what it had become to the scribes and Pharisees in the days of Jesus. Its prohibitions were so sacrosanct that life was cramped within them. To such a point did the sabbath regulations against work or any kind of physical effort go that, as Emil Schürer describes in his History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ,⁸ rabbis solemnly debated whether a cripp-

The idea of separation, division, is a dominant motif throughout P's story of Creation. Light is separated from darkness (1:4; cf. 1:14), waters are separated from waters (1:6), the waters under the firmament from the land (1:9); and, by implication, species is separated from species in 1:11, 20, 24. Underlying the ordaining of the sabbath is the same motif, in that a distinction is made between times. The significance of this becomes apparent when it is recalled how later P, in accepting the idea of a central sanctuary, distinguishes between place and place and ascribes the distinction to God's command. The universe was for him hierarchical in its structure and thus gave expression to the divine attribute of order. It was a universe of relatedness, in which everything had its place and its purpose. God blessed the seventh day and hallowed it, making it sacred in itself and a constant source of well-being to man. Through blessing it was endowed permanently with beneficial qualities, and through its hallowing placed in a special relationship to God (cf. Skinner, Genesis, p. 38).

4a. This clause is a redactional insertion to bind the foregoing account of Creation with the J narrative following. It seems more probable that it is from the hand of RP, imitating 5:1; etc. (ibid., pp. 40-41), than that it originally stood before 1:1, as some commentators think (e.g., Gunkel, Genesis, p. 101), and so was the opening sentence of P.

That excessive literalism in the keeping of the sabbath came down in some of the streams that influenced Christian history. The Puritans of New England were as inflexible as the first-century Jewish scribes in their conception and enforcement of the sabbath laws. It was this excess that has been one cause of the modern reaction. When the iron pattern of the sabbath laws was clamped upon life in a way that seemed beyond all reason, there was disaffection and gradual disobedience, and at last wide repudiation. So "puritanical" was turned into a word of scorn, and many people have supposed that to get away as far as possible from puritanical ideas, especially about the sabbath, is a mark of emancipation.

Nevertheless, the essential meaning and message of the sabbath are indestructible. Human life can become dwarfed and mean if provision is not constantly made for rest and for worship. The general intelligence of society is beginning to see again at least the first half of that truth. It is realized that monotonous and unbroken toil is killing. There must be a rhythm of work and rest. Hence the rapid growth of laws that protect laborers from week-long exploitation. But that has not kept the sabbath, whether the Jewish seventh day or the Christian Sunday, from being largely secularized. Men have knocked off work, but too often not that they might worship.

Here is the point at which the great truth ought to be proclaimed. Men and women need to get beyond the shallow satisfaction of being free to do on Sunday what the old sabbatarianism once forbade; they need to think of what the sabbath everlastingly is for. Said Jesus, "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath" (Mark 2:27). Yes, and what he said there was that the sabbath is meant for man's free and glad advantage; it is not meant for man to ignore and lose. It is to be a day, as it was for him, when all beautiful aspirations and energies are to find their full expression. He rejoiced to do on the sabbath whatever would help anyone who needed him most; and one of the sources of his strength was that "as his custom was, he went into the synagogue on the sabbath day" (Luke 4:16). In modern words, he went to church.

For the Christian, Sunday should have an even more radiant value than the seventh-day sabbath ever had in Israel. The day of rest and worship has been transferred to the first day of the week to commemorate the rising again on Easter morning of the crucified Christ. So the great conception is that Sunday should be for all Christian men and women a day of resurrection: resurrection from the dust of earthiness, in which life so often may be buried, into the morning sunlight of the soul's awakening consciousness of new life as a child of God.

II. THE CREATION OF MAN (2:4b-25)

Reasons have been advanced in the Intro. (see pp. 450-51) for holding that the J story of Creation in part consisted of an account of the destruction of the chaos monster by Yahweh. The fact, to be established below, that a later writer intruded into the second part of this J creation narrative—the story of the creation of man—vss. 5, 9, and 19, telling of the making of plants and animals, suggests that the first part had contained no explicit notice of their appearance on the earth. If this was the case, there are grounds for holding that the Canaanite version of the Babylonian myth, upon which J was drawing, itself represented a fusing together of two recensions of the original. For in addition to the recension already outlined, there has been discovered another recension, differing from it to a considerable degree (see Skinner, Genesis, pp. 47-48). It tells of a movement in the primeval chaos, designated impersonally tāmtu (cf. and contrast the personalized ti'āmat of the first recension), from which emerged the gods. Then, no reference being made to his conflict with the monster, it records how Marduk made man out of dust, then beasts, rivers, vegetation, and various kinds of animals. If the myth in its Canaanite form thus preserved from the first recension the feature of Marduk's conflict with the chaos monster, and from the second the representation that he made man from the dust, and then the beasts, etc., then J's use of it was economical in the extreme.

It can be taken as certain that he made no use whatever of the representation that the gods had emerged from chaos—he was too firm a monotheist for that. And it may also be assumed that the preservation of the story of the conflict with the chaos monster definition of curiosity in Webster's Dictionary is "disposition to inquire into anything, . . . often implying meddlesomeness." But the first definition is "careful attention." In this sense curiosity is one of the great distinctions that make a man more than an animal. The animal—so far as we can tell—does not wonder and reflect. But a little three-year-old child begins to ask questions. He wants to have an explanation of things he does not understand. He keeps his elders busy with his constant "Why?" Those elders may have no better sense than to grow irritated and try to hush him up. We may do the same with grown people's questions too when they become disturbing. Much conservatism may be just the annoyed resistance of sluggish minds to the questions and challenges that compel supposed knowledge or settled opinion to explain itself. A desire to know is the yeast of life. The human mind and the human spirit ought to ask questions, and the more a person grows, the bigger questions he will ask.

The story of the Garden of Eden grew out of questions. As the Exeg. has pointed out, back of the biblical story are folklore and traditions that were woven out of more primitive imagination. The questions that were earliest asked were elemental ones. Here is this world full of living things. How did they come to be? Who made them? Why do people have to live the way they do? When it would be so pleasant to walk in the shade and have fruit drop into men's hands from the trees, why do men have to go out and sweat in the sun with backbreaking digging of the soil? And what about women? Why do animals have their young so easily, and why must women suffer? And the stealthy, slithering things that men are afraid of—why were they made like that? Especially snakes.

Those ancient questions which the writer of ch. 2 remembered were not profound ones about man's soul. They had to do with men's physical experiences and feelings, and especially their discomforts and unrest. Why was life often so hard? Why was it painful? Why was it dangerous? Men knew it to be so, and the sting of that fact made them wonder and think. Does thinking always come from something in life that stings us out of sleepiness and acquiescence?

But if the first questions were primitive, they had in them the germ of something more profound. Study Rodin's great statue, "The Thinker." That low-browed naked man with the gnarled fist pressed against his lips yet has huge dignity—the dignity of mind awakening. So with the questions that grope toward their answers in the dim period that antedates the writing of Genesis. A great and significant thrust toward knowledge had been made in the fact that struggling human minds had flung out this interrogation: "Why is life not better than it is?"

The greatness of the opening chapters of the Bible is that they take the elemental questions and give them a new dimension. If the primal concern had been with men's bodies—hard work, the travail of women, and the risks was, in part at least, due to his realization that the myth had to be related in a recognizable form to Yahwism, if the truth that Yahweh and Yahweh only—not Marduk—was the creator of earth and heaven was to be secured in Israel. Having recorded the conflict, he presumably passed at once to the making of man and to the account of his life in the garden, leading up to the story now preserved in ch. 3, which explains man's tragic sense of alienation from his Creator.

A. FROM THE DUST OF THE GROUND (2:4b-7)

4b. On the designation of the Deity as "Yahweh-Elohim" see on 4:26. It may, however, be noted here that in Genesis the use of "Yahweh"—rendered the LORD in both the KJV and the RSV, is, except for a few places where it is redactional, an indication of J. J used "Elohim" throughout the story which follows, though there is no doubt whatever that he meant "Yahweh" (see below). As it left the hand of J, the narrative told of God forming man from the ground (vs. 7) in the day he made earth and heaven (vs. 4), and of his placing him in a garden which he had planted (vs. 8). The garden was watered by a mist which rose from the earth (vs. 6), i.e., it did not have to be tended. God then decided to create a companion for the man (vs. 18), which he did by making a woman from one of the man's ribs (vss. 22-24). God then told the man and the woman that they might eat of the fruit of all the trees except one—that growing in the midst of the garden (vss. 16-17). This part of the story then closed with the statement in vs. 25 that "the man and his wife, were both naked, and were not ashamed," i.e., they were without consciousness of sex—leading up to the second part, now contained in ch. 3.

This simple account of the creation of man and woman, of their lack of sex consciousness, and of their happy, carefree life in the garden was later elaborated by the intrusion of vss. 5, 9, 10-14, 15, 19, 20. The grounds for regarding this material as secondary will be made clear as the chapter is considered verse by verse.

men run in the physical world—now in Genesis the concern has shifted. What is the reason for the unrest in man's soul? Why is he troubled and torn within by a sense of estrangement from that to which his life belongs? Even if he could answer all the perplexities about his physical existence and could not answer that ultimate question about his spirit, man would be unsatisfied. Men in the O.T. knew that; men likewise know it now. Alexander Whyte, of Edinburgh, was remembering with gratitude the enlightenment that had come to him from men of science; from the geologists, the paleontologists, the biologists, and the students of evolution who have interpreted the history of the earth and of life upon it. But he wrote:

I always miss in them . . . a matter of more importance to me than all else that they tell me. For, all the time . . . I still feel . . . a disorder and a dislocation that my scientific teachers neither acknowledge nor leave room for its acknowledgment and redress. . . . When I come to the end of my reading—Is that all? I ask. . . . To speak out the whole of my disappointment and complaint in one word, What about SIN? What is SIN? When and where did SIN enter in the evolution of the human race and seize in this deadly way on the human heart? Why do you all so avoid and shut your eyes to SIN? ⁹

Obviously the story of the Garden of Eden does not answer all the questions that the mind and soul of man will ask. Some of these questions which are as old as human thinking may baffle us till the end of time—the reason for human hardships, the origin of evil, the everlasting contradiction of the serpent in the paradise. But the supreme contribution of the Genesis story is that it lifted up the one concern that supremely matters—Why has man lost touch with God? It was not the kind of world that Adam and Eve had around them, but the kind of behavior they showed in it, that was the decisive issue. It is man's soul, not his circumstances, that needs redemption. So there is a sense in which every woman is Eve and every man is Adam, and the cardinal question for every soul is how it can find the grace to keep it from a continual repetition of the Fall.

4-15. The Meaning of a Garden.—The two accounts of the Creation in chs. 1-2 reflect conceptions which have come down from the far-off dawn of human thinking; and they are different because of the different environments in which their life and thought began. According to the account with which Genesis begins, the raw material of the universe was "darkness" and "the deep." Does this picture go back perhaps to the minds of the earliest men in the lands of Babylonia who, wandering southward, gazed

5 And every plant of the field before it was in the earth, and every herb of the field before it grew: for the LORD God had not caused it to rain upon the earth, and there was not a man to till the ground.

5. The statement that no plant of the field was yet in the earth and no herb of the field had yet sprung up demands a subsequent notice of the later appearance of vegetation (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, p. 28; it should be noted, however, that Gunkel's explanation of the inconsistencies of the present narrative differs from that offered here). This notice is missing, since vs. 9 and 3:18, which might be so construed, are as will be seen also secondary.

Similarly the next statement, that the LORD God had not caused it to rain upon the earth, demands a subsequent notice of the eventual appearance of rain, also lacking. The final statement in the verse implies that man's natural occupation was to till the ground—a representation which is inconsistent with 3:23, according to which man's lot as a tiller of the ground was the result of his disobedience.

For these reasons no part of vs. 5 appeared in the original J narrative. The fact that some author was moved to add vs. 5a would seem to suggest that in his now-missing account of the making of "earth and heaven" (cf. vs. 4b) J had, for whatever reason, omitted any reference to the creation of plants; it may have been to supply this lack that the clause was intruded. Vs. 5b α appears to be a gloss on the mist mentioned in vs. 6. Vs. 5b β can only be a gloss by one for whom tilling the ground was man's natural occupation and who therefore was concerned to soften the implication of 3:23.

6. This verse came originally after vs. 8 and read, "and a mist used to go up from the earth and water the garden" (Johannes Meinhold, "Die Erzählung vom Paradies und Sündenfall," in Beiträge zur alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, ed. Karl Marti [Giessen: Alfred Topelmann, 1920; "Beihefte zur Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft"], pp. 122-31; cf. Otto Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1922], p. 255*). This is a statement to the effect that the garden was irrigated supernaturally—the word rendered mist has probably a mythological connotation (see Skinner, Genesis, p. 55)—not by human labor. (On the land watered by the Baal, as against that artificially irrigated, see W. Robertson Smith, Lectures on the Religion of the Semites [3rd ed.; London: A. & C. Black, 1927], p. 97.) The verse was placed here and adapted to its new position by the author who added vss. 10-14.

7. This originally followed immediately on vs. 4b, the sequence being "on the day that the LORD God made earth and heaven he formed, etc." The dust of, spoiling the wordplay in the statement that 'ādhām, man, was formed from 'adhāmāh, ground, is a out first in dread upon the sea, or who somewhere in the low-lying valleys of the Euphrates were caught in a waste of flooding inland waters? Water thus was to them the symbol of primeval chaos; and the real creation began, they thought, when the dry land first appeared.

But for other men, moving through other regions, there were different forces which shaped the imagination out of which arose their ancient myths. Not any dim tradition of a dark abyss of waters, but the constant presence around them of the desert, was the fact that pressed most inescapably upon their consciousness. Nomads whose life was largely bounded by the desert, moving in precarious existence amid the vast aridity of its sands, might well conceive the desert as the primeval emptiness which preceded the habitable earth. For what redeemed gloss dependent on 3:19b. The verb rendered formed is that used in the O.T. (e.g., Isa. 29:16; Jer. 18:4) of a potter molding clay. The word néphesh, rendered soul (KJV) or being (RSV), denotes here "a complete person" (for the rich content of the word néphesh see Johannes Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture I-II [London: Oxford University Press, 1926], pp. 99-181).

B. THE GARDEN OF EDEN (2:8-15)

8. In Eden is an addition to harmonize the story with the fragments of the older Eden saga (cf. 3:22, 24; cf. Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse, pp. 254*-55*), which, it will be seen, had been intruded into it. With the deletion of the words, eastward (KJV) should be rendered in the east (RSV). In the narrative as it left the hand of J this verse, as has been noted above, was followed by vs. 6 in its original form.

9. That this verse is secondary is suggested by: (a) The explicit statement that God caused the trees to grow out of the ground seriously weakens the force of one of the main points (cf. 3:19, 23b) of the original narrative, that man was formed from the ground. (b) The statement that every tree was pleasant to the sight and good for food weakens the force of 3:6, which implies that one reason the woman succumbed to the serpent's temptation was that the tree in the midst of the garden was "good for food" and "a delight to the eyes." (c) The verse refers to the tree of life . . . in the midst of the garden, and follows this with a reference to the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Consideration of ch. 3 will show that J said nothing of the tree of life—3:22 is, as will be seen, secondary. Furthermore, in 3:3 the woman refers to the forbidden tree simply as "the tree which is in the midst of the garden." It is the serpent who says that its fruit will convey knowledge of "good and evil"—falsely, for it brought only awareness of sex.

The cumulative effect of these considerations is compelling and warrants the excision of this verse as an addition by the same hand, and for the same reason, as vs. 5a.

10. The river had its source outside the garden through which it flowed and then divided into four.

the desert for nomadic men was its oases. Here and there oases did exist; and when across the sun-scorched sands their green and living beauty met the eye, men knew that refreshment and life were waiting there for themselves and for their flocks. No wonder then that their conception of creation out of primal nothingness should have taken the form it did. The miracle of miracles, the thing of all things most wonderful, was an oasis. That was the ultimately imagined paradise. So in ch. 2 we see the instinctive picture grow: a great emptiness of sand and dust, then a mist and rain, springs bubbling from the earth, and the wonder of grass and trees growing up under the hand of God. The eager imagination saw it as no little spot of ground, but rather as a region wide and rich enough to be the fertile source of all the rivers of the world, where its green spaces led to vistas of great trees. Such was the Garden of Eden.

The imagination that pictured it and the symbol which it contains of ancient men's religion belong to the childhood of the race; but there are lovely suggestions in it which come down undimmed by time. The Lord God would be "walking in the garden." Taken literally and put in prose, that is childlike and naïve, but as poetry it is immortal. In the miracle of 11 The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold;

12 And the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium and the onyx stone.

13 And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia.

14 And the name of the third river is Hiddekel: that is it which goeth toward the east of Assyria. And the fourth river is Euphrates.

came four rivers. 11 The name of the first is Pishon; it is the one which flows around the whole land of Hav'i-lah, where there is gold; 12 and the gold of that land is good; bdellium and onyx stone are there. 13 The name of the second river is Gihon; it is the one which flows around the whole land of Cush. 14 And the name of the third river is Hid'de-kel, which flows east of Assyria. And the fourth river is the Eu-phra'tes.

11. The Pishon is mentioned in Ecclus. 24:25 as an illustration of abundance, but not elsewhere in the O.T. It is identified here as the one which flows around the whole land of Havilah. Havilah is used in 10:7, 29; 25:18, of a district apparently somewhere in Arabia. Here, the whole land of may indicate a larger region, as is indeed suggested by the note about its gold and the further information in vs. 12, obviously an attempt at identification which would perhaps hardly be necessary if the reference was merely to Arabia. In the mind of the author, whose geographical ideas were not only vague but mythically colored, it may even have included India, conceived as an eastward extension of Arabia. If so, then by the Pishon he may have meant the Ganges; but there can be no certainty (for an excellent summary of the possible identifications of the Pishon and the Gihon, see Skinner, Genesis, pp. 62-66).

13. Cush is used in the O.T. of (a) Ethiopia (e.g., Ezek. 29:10); (b) Midian (e.g., Num. 12:1; cf. Cushan, Hab. 3:7) in Arabia; and (c) Kaššû, the country of the Kassites (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, p. 89). Which of the three is meant here cannot be determined; if it is (a) then the Gihon would seem to be the Nile, the headwaters of which the author thus represented as being near those of the Tigris and the Euphrates; (b) would place the Gihon somewhere near the Pishon, as would (c), Kaššû being conceived of as extending indefinitely eastward from Babylonia.

14. The Hiddekel is the Tigris. This, together with the mention of the Euphrates, indicates that the author located Eden somewhere near the sources of these two rivers, in the vicinity of Armenia—and this regardless of the identity of the Pishon and the Gihon.

Vss. 10-14 contradict vs. 6 and reveal an interest in the locality of Eden which is foreign to the rest of the narrative. The passage is accordingly to be regarded as secondary elaboration (ibid., p. 9), dependent upon another form of the Paradise myth.

nature God always does appear. Man can fashion many things, but only God creates that on which all life depends. In the meadows and the forest he still is walking. Even in the little places of fertility and growth he will appear.

Whether then in the great spaces of the earth or in the familiar spots which men make their own, a garden and the thought of God come close together. For a garden, to begin with, is a place of beauty especially—as that instinctive sense of wonder repeated in the ancient story saw it—"in the cool of the day." Who that has walked in a garden has not had moments when he felt a mightier Presence walking there when sunset fades, and the soft air of evening is sweet with the scent of grass and flowers, and the dew begins to fall, and the stars are born out of the still mystery of the oncoming night? Read Francis Bacon's "Of Gardens." One of the sins which the so-called civilization of our modern cities commits against the souls of people is that in their drab deserts of brick and stone so often there have been no gardens; and one of the signs of our awakening is the increasing movement to make space for parks and to plant trees and flowers there. The best in man's nature cannot live without beauty. At Christmas in a year of widespread unemployment and financial disaster an organization which exists to minister to the poor and the hard-pressed of a certain city printed a letter from a woman on behalf of a family once prosperous and then destitute. In the family, shut now in dreary rooms, was a little girl who once had known 15 And the LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it.

16 And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat:

17 But of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.

15 The LORD God took the man and put him in the garden of Eden to till it and keep it. 16 And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, "You may freely eat of every tree of the garden; 17 but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil you shall not eat, for in the day that you eat of it you shall die."

15. The verse in part repeats vs. 8*b* and, like 5*b* β , contradicts 3:23 in regarding the tilling of the ground as man's natural occupation. It is redactional, and its purpose is to link vss. 10-14 to what follows.

. C. THE FORBIDDEN TREE (2:16-17)

16-17. These verses are neither in their original form nor in their original position.

(a) The forbidden tree is called the tree of the knowledge of good and evil; contrast 3:3 (some commentators, e.g., Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 10-11, emend vs. 17 to agree with 3:3), and see the Exeg. on vs. 9 above. (b) They contain no prohibition against touching the tree; contrast 3:3. (c) The command is given before the making of the woman, who is nevertheless cognizant of it when the serpent speaks to her.

In its original form the command came after vs. 23; i.e., the story in its primary J form told of the man being placed in the garden (vs. 8), and followed this immediately with vss. 18, 21-23, recording the provision of "a helper fit for him" (vs. 18). Then came the command—now preserved in altered form in vss. 16-17—reading probably, "And God commanded them, saying, 'Of every tree of the garden you may freely eat, but of the tree which is in the midst of the garden you shall not eat, neither shall you touch it; for in the day that you eat of it you shall surely die.'" The intrusion of vs. 9, telling of the making of the trees, and of vss. 19-20 (on the secondary character of these see below), telling of the making of the animals, retarded the tempo of the story, and gave rise to the possibility that the man might have eaten of the fruit of the tree before it was forbidden. To meet this difficulty some editor shifted the prohibition to its present position, and at the same time, since the mention of the tree of life in vs. 9 had introduced an element of confusion into the story, made it apply explicitly to the tree, the fruit a home that had a garden. Send her this and that necessity, if you can, the letter pleaded, but, "Oh, above all, send her one red rose."

If in a garden there is beauty, so there also is the miracle of growth. It is good to have something remind us anew and repeatedly of that miracle. Remember how often Jesus was aware of it. "Consider the lilies . . . how they grow" (Matt. 6:28). "The kingdom of heaven is like to a grain of mustard seed" (Matt. 13:31). "Behold, a sower went forth to sow" (Matt. 13:3). One danger in our urban civilization is that men may lose their consciousness of the elemental realities on which life depends and with which it must co-operate if it is to endure. In a garden the everlasting facts are plain; there truth walks and may be heard as the voice of God was heard in Eden when he walked among the trees. Reflect upon what that voice is telling: that what ultimately appears, of beauty or of ugliness, depends upon the seed, and that the heart of man, like the ground, can produce nothing unless it has received from God, and planted in itself, those influences which have in them the miracle of life; that the responsibility of every man is like the gardener's, to know that though he creates nothing he is responsible to cultivate what God has given; that growth cannot be forced by any human haste and that the silent process of the divine unfolding must be trusted; and that those who have grown most in grace, like men who must have their gardens grow in sun and rain and changing seasons, will be most humble in themselves and most reverent before the unfolding mysteries of God.

18 ¶ And the LORD God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him a help meet for him.

18 Then the LORD God said, "It is not good that the man should be alone; I will of which the serpent was to claim would give knowledge of good and evil, but which, in the event, awakened only the knowledge of sex.

A further point in support of this argument, that the prohibition of vss. 16-17 originally came after vs. 23, may be noted here, and that is the resulting juxtaposition with vs. 25; 3:1-7: eating of the fruit of the tree in the midst of the garden is prohibited. No reason is given, but there follows immediately the notice that the man and his wife were without consciousness of sex, and the tragic account of how they acquired it. This, one of the main points of the story, is obscure as the material is now ordered; it is crystal clear if the prohibition immediately precedes vs. 25.

For the implication of the warning on the day that you eat of it you shall die see Exeg. on 3:3.

D. MAN NEEDS A COMPANION (2:18-20)

18-20. The grounds for regarding vss. 19-20 as secondary are: (a) The statement that the beasts were formed out of the ground—see above on vs. 9.

18. The Consecration of Relationships.—Genesis, which starts with the beginning of the universe, goes on to tell of other particular beginnings. Its wide-reaching message is that every aspect of existence finds its right interpretation only when it is related first to God. It is wise enough to know that what ought to be is not accomplished suddenly, and that man's understanding of his life must grow through early ignorance and much blundering; but its great truth is that every relationship must begin with a recognition of God's meaning for it if it is ever to have meaning and worth.

So in ch. 1, and again in the story of the Garden of Eden, there is a spiritual note in the account of the beginning of marriage. "God created man in his own image," and "male and female created he them" (vs. 27). It was God who said, It is not good that the man should be alone, and God who commanded that a man "shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (2:24)—or, as the strong Hebrew words imply, one personality. They shall "be fruitful and multiply." Thus marriage and the conception of children are lifted up above blind instinct and endowed with sacredness; and although the kind of marriages and the kind of family life among the patriarchs which Genesis goes on to portray have the imperfections of a primitive society, there is goodness in them, and that goodness is directly related to the measure of loyalty and faithfulness which religion put there.

And as Genesis sets the beginning of the earth, and the beginnings of man and of marriage and of the family, in the light of God, and thus makes human beings responsible to him for the right development of these, so it brings the same suggestion for society and for civilization. A new nation begins with Abraham, and its glory is that it begins with God (12:1-4). The nation that was to be appeared at first only as a little clan dwelling in tents, heirs of a promise that seemed a long way off. But their greatness was that they "looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God" (Heb. 11:10).

What of modern nations? How far has all that is best in them been due to religious faith and religious purpose in the men who helped to make them? Look at the declared ideals and reflect upon the prayers of some of the great statesmen of England; of Washington and Lincoln and others who helped to make the United States. What deliberate effort is being made by us to share and transmit the high conceptions which only religion can preserve? The future of civilization depends on that. In many regions of the earth civilization had not advanced far in the times portrayed in Genesis, but the qualities of character which undergird it and advance it—honesty, idealism, social-mindedness, imagination, intelligent devotedness—are all suggested in the concluding chapters of this book as it comes to its climax in the story of Joseph.

And the whole sequence of beginnings—for the individual, for the family group, and for the community—which Genesis includes is dependent upon the two other and supreme beginnings which are recorded there: the beginning of conscience and the beginning of communion with God.

19 And out of the ground the LORD God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof.

20 And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every

(b) The loose style of the writing (see Skinner, Genesis, pp. 67-68; cf. the emendations proposed by Holzinger, Genesis, pp. 28-29; Gunkel, Genesis, p. 11; Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse, p. 255*).

(c) The fact that the verses are a non sequitur to vs. 18. Gunkel and others, indeed, hold that J is representing God as making a number of unsuccessful attempts to provide a suitable companion for the man; against this it may be argued either (i) that J would scarcely have tolerated such an implication, even if it had been in the material he was using—in this connection his drastic revision of the Eden saga, considered below, may be noted; or alternatively (ii) that he would have made his meaning more clear than is here the case.

(d) Whereas the naming of the woman in vs. 23 is etiological—explaining, wrongly, the similarity between the Hebrew words for “man” and “woman”—the naming of the animals is without significance, so that vs. 19aββ, 20a seem to be a mere reflex of vs. 23.

(e) The use of the word “made” in 3:1, in contrast to formed (vs. 19), is a further indication, though slight, of diverse authorship.

(f) The narrative in its present form fails to account for the existence of beasts outside the garden, since there is no suggestion that they were driven out with the man. With the deletion of these verses, together with vs. 5 and 9, this difficulty vanishes, for

In the story of the Garden of Eden there is revealed the eternal truth that there is right and wrong, a true choice and a false choice; an obedience to the voice that represents the highest, and a willful disobedience; and that when man has sinned, no matter with what plausible excuse, there is that within him which shrinks away and hides, naked and ashamed before the light. But there is another and redeeming revelation in Genesis, a promise of what can be the way of life. Weak and imperfect though he is, and prone to sin, man can yet “walk with God,” as Enoch did, and Abraham, and others in the Bible’s long succession of aspiring souls. So the book points forward to a gradual fulfillment—and to the ultimate fulfillment that should come in Christ.

19-20a. The Animals.—There is a delightfully childish quality about this picture. God makes all the animals, and they march obediently past Adam in review. It was an earlier and greater Noah’s ark parade. Then, according to engravings in old picture books of the Bible, all these animals, elephants and rhinoceroses and lions and tigers and the rest, walk about or lie down in a sort of purring cheerfulness, a universal happy family.

It is part of an ancient tale which some writer long unknown put here into the scriptural narrative. One might feel hard pressed to find in it a specifically religious message; yet by analogy and imagination there is one. Whatever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. “The name is that by which the thing is summoned into the field of thought, and is necessary for its full existence” (Exeg. on 1:5). That, to the mind of the ancients, was the power of a name. When Adam named the animals he determined what they should be like and how they should behave.

We cannot manage as conveniently as that. Lions and tigers and leopards and wolves do not become tame because we tell them to. Not in the physical world, nor in the moral one either. There are some forces surrounding every man which are like wild beasts that stay wild. We cannot change them by pretending that this is not the way they are. These hearts of ours are not innocent gardens of Eden where nothing dangerous intrudes. There are appetites and passions against which we have to be on watch as actually as a man at night would have to be on watch against a tiger or a wolf. There are qualities in ourselves as undesirable as the boar and the ape. We had better call them by their right names. Someday, by God’s grace, they the story is seen to be an account not of the creation of the world as a whole, but simply of the making of man and of his life in the garden.

(g) Vs. 20b has no connection with vs. 20a, and practically repeats vs. 18b.

Vss. 19-20a are thus an elaboration of the original story, made for the same reason, and probably by the same hand, as vs. 9. The author may, of course, have been dependent on a feature of the earlier saga not preserved by J. Vs. 20b resumes the thread of the story after the intrusion of vss. 19-20a; Adam (KJV) should be read the man (RSV).

E. THE MAKING OF WOMAN (2:21-25)

21-23. These verses are thus the original continuation of vs. 18. In vs. 23 for out of man should be read “out of her man,” following the Samar. and the LXX.

may be different; but in the meantime we had better be sure that we are different, if we have been foolish enough to suppose that they can be idly played with.

20b-24. Man and Woman.—In the minds of those to whom we owe the several elements woven in Genesis, there are different attitudes toward sex (cf. Exeg. on 1:28; 2:16-17, 24; 3:1, 22, 23; 34). There is that which regards it simply and wholesomely as the fundamental of existence. And there is that which looks at it with doubt and distress because of the strange complexities of good and evil which it brings.

This difference need arouse no wonder, for this double appraisal of sex runs through all history. Many of the fiercest human passions and the darkest crimes come out of it. But loyalty and love and the deepest and most enduring human relationships also are rooted in it. The drama of the everlasting conflict between its good and evil has inspired much of the world's immortal poetry, poetry that reflected not only the throbbing impulses of the body, but the inextricable web of power and pathos and pitifulness that makes up human souls. Remember Helen of Troy and Hector and Paris, Ulysses and Penelope, Antony and

Sex is fundamental. It cannot be got rid of or forgotten. It may be sublimated into adorations that are separate from the flesh. There is a kind of desire for saintliness that will deliberately choose celibacy. Sometimes whole groups have attempted this, as the Essenes did in the first century and as other little communities in many lands since have sought to do. But that cannot be normative. There was good reason for the writer of 1:27-28 to say of God's creation of humanity that “male and female created he them,” and to ascribe to God the words, “Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth.”

Therefore, since sex is of divine ordaining, it must be related religiously to life. As the slowly maturing experience of the people of Israel learned, and as the whole Bible expresses, the way in which this becomes possible is through monogamous marriage.

But how may the marriage of one man and one woman be of such a kind that in it the best that God has meant for them may flourish? The answer of course is wider than any few words can cover. It requires devotion and many disciplines. But there is one word that may mean 24 Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh.

24 Therefore a man leaves his father and his mother and cleaves to his wife, and they

24. This verse cannot, in view of the statement in vs. 25, be a continuation of the man's speech recorded in vs. 23. Commentators generally treat it as an explanatory comment by J. In view of the fact, however, that the note obscures one of the main points of the narrative—that the man and the woman were still without consciousness of sex—it may be doubted that such a finished writer as J would have inserted it here. For this reason the verse seems to be an addition by a later writer who, reflecting upon the desire of man for his wife, found an explanation of it in the—supposed—fact that woman by her very origin was bone of man's bones and flesh of his flesh. Because of this he leaves his father and his mother, of whose bone and flesh he was formed, and cleaves to his wife, to become in the marriage act one flesh.

The verse was not originally an affirmation that marriage was from the beginning, by divine intention, monogamous. Such an affirmation would indeed have been impossible at that time. Only when it had come to be recognized, however inarticulately, that woman was a person in her own right was it possible to discern the true meaning of the sexual desire of man which the verse seeks to explain. Nevertheless, its author has said more than he knew. For in his very affirmation that sexual desire is part of the divinely ordered nature of things, he was in effect affirming that its true meaning would unfold with the unfolding of the meaning of the universe as a whole. Consequently his words had in them a meaning which would likewise unfold, so that the interpretation placed upon them in Mark 10:6-9 (cf. Matt. 19:4-6); I Cor. 6:16; Eph. 5:31 is ultimately valid.

more than any other single one. It is companionship: the companionship of two personalities each developing to its fullest and giving and receiving the utmost that both can share. When marriage does not have that mutuality it fails to reach its highest possibility. "It is not good that the man should be alone." That is true in a much larger way than the physical, and the true divine commandment that a man shall cleave unto his wife has to do with far more than the flesh. Nor is it enough that the woman should be a help meet, if that is taken to mean one who is subordinate to the male. In many societies and in many times, including periods of the O.T., woman has been regarded as a chattel, a household drudge, a servant of man's appetites. Influences from that inheritance remain. But true marriage, the marriage on which Christian blessing may be invoked, is a marriage between a man and woman who bring their different gifts in equal honor and in equal exercise. The greater opportunities for women to which Christian civilizations have at last moved forward not automatically will, but can, lift marriage nearer to the divine intention. For then there can be a partnership not only in the body, but of two minds furnished with quickening ideas and of two spirits who both know something of the wider reality of life to which they ought to be adjusted.

G. A. Studdert-Kennedy, a great interpreter of truth in his generation, wrote a book called The Warrior, the Woman, and the Christ. In it he said this:

Love is the joyous conflict of two or more free self-conscious persons who rejoice in one another's individualities and . . . through the clash of mind on mind and will on will work out an ever-increasing but never finally completed unity. . . . And the primary school of this vital and vitalising love is the home.¹

But "the home" as such will not produce and keep that unity. It must be a home which is held together by something larger than itself. The great attraction of the remembrance of God must permeate it and hold its individuals harmoniously together, as the sun holds the planets in their course. Many a home that started with romance has ended in recriminations and wretchedness because neither husband nor wife had a loyalty higher and more controlling than his or her desires. But when they both look up to the beauty of holiness which worship has taught them to behold in God, affections are purified and selfishness is transcended in devotion to ideals that endure.

25. Following vs. 23, as has been argued above, came in its original form the prohibition now preserved in vss. 16-17, to be followed in turn by the statement, implicit in the words the man and his wife were both naked, and were not ashamed, that they were without consciousness of sex.

III. MAN'S ALIENATION FROM GOD (3:1-24)

The story in this chapter of man's disobedience to God's command and of his expulsion from the garden to a life of toil is dependent upon an ancient myth which J drastically revised. A fragment of this myth is now preserved in vs. 22. That this verse is an intrusion into the main narrative of ch. 3 is generally recognized. Here it need only be noted that the reason it gives for man's expulsion from the garden is quite other than that implied in vss. 17, 19, 23.

From this verse it is possible to recover the salient features of the earlier form of the tale. It told not of one only, but of two magic trees in Eden, the garden of God (cf. Ezek. 28:13; 31:8-9, 16), the tree of life and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. Man was forbidden on pain of death to eat of them, the reason for the prohibition being God's fear that man, acquiring knowledge of good and evil, might become like him and, approaching too near his throne, might endanger his supremacy. But the serpent, a demon hostile to God, told man the truth. He was thus no subtle tempter but, in intention at least, a benefactor of the human race. Man, thus enlightened, ate of the tree and became like God, knowing good and evil (vs. 22). The potential threat to God's supremacy had thus become actual, so God, acting decisively and at once, drove him from the garden lest he should put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life, and eat (vs. 22), and so make the threat permanent.

A. TEMPTATION AND SIN (3:1-8)

3:1. Revising the myth, J represented the serpent not as a demon whose origin, whatever it may have been, owed nothing to God, but as a beast of the field which . . .

25. The Innocence that Did Not Last.—Adam and Eve were naked, . . . and were not ashamed. But presently "they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons" (3:7). And later the Lord God made "coats of skins, and clothed them" (3:21). Two strands of thought may be woven into the ideas which these verses express. First may be the recollection of what had actually happened in the long development of human groups. In the dim past people wore no clothes at all. Then came girdles of leaves or grass, as among some primitive tribes today; and then, as the human race moved on toward civilization, the sewing and weaving of clothes. But if these facts were in the minds of the writers of these chapters, their interest was not in the facts as such but in what they symbolized. Once men could stand unembarrassed before the gaze of God. Then when they had sinned they had guilty shame both before God and in the presence of one another. But the flimsy devices they sewed together were not enough. Ultimately God himself must clothe them in that which represented pain and blood and sacrifice.

3:1-24. Changing Theories and Unchanging Truth.—In the entire range of the world's writings it would be difficult to find any passage so brief which has had such immense influence upon human thought as ch. 3. Paul made it a foundation stone of his theology: "By one man sin entered into the world" (Rom. 5:12); "By the offense of one judgment came upon all men to condemnation" (Rom. 5:18); "By one man's

God had made. Nor was he, even in intention, a benefactor of the human race, but a subtle liar. He deliberately misled the woman in telling her that by eating of the forbidden tree she and her husband would be like God, knowing good and evil (vs. 5), disobedience many were made sinners" (Rom. 5:19). What happened in Adam and to Adam was for Paul the awful fact by which all human destiny was originally determined. Augustine enlarged the first structure of the doctrine which Paul had begun to build. Calvin fortified it with his relentless logic. So it has happened that the mind of nearly the whole of Christendom has dwelt for generations within the structure of thought that took its architecture from this one conception of the sin of Adam.

In modern times there have been two contrasting reactions to the whole doctrine of Adam's sin and the condemnation which is said to have fallen on the whole human race through him. The first of these has been repudiation. Christian thinkers here and there began to say that orthodox theology had become a monstrous exaggeration. Biblical criticism dissolved the literal authority of the story of the Fall. Here is an ancient myth, men said, which has been treated as actual history. The whole structure built upon it is illusion; and worse than that, it is an illusion which has done bitter harm to human spirits. The vast walls of thought which Paul and Augustine and Calvin raised above the dark ground of the ancient story, so it is declared, have been the walls of a prison house in which generations have had to dwell among false shadows of fear and guilt and condemnation. Get rid of the phobia which has grown out of a fable that never was a fact, and let the spirit of man go free!

This new representation had wide welcome in the nineteenth century and on into the beginning of the twentieth. The thought of man as fallen was to become a discredited superstition. The intelligent and informed were to cast off the old robes of self-depreciation. The mother of Charles William Eliot, who was to be one of the great presidents of Harvard University and a powerful influence upon all education in his time, exclaimed to a friend who had gone into the Episcopal Church and presumably, therefore, would say the old prayer of the General Confession, "Eliza, do you kneel down in church and call yourself a miserable sinner? . . . Neither I nor any of my family will ever do that!"² The theology of the Unitarians, and of many liberal thinkers in other groups, glorified man's powers and potentialities. He was not fallen; he had only begun to rise. Presently religion tended to change to humanism. God was no longer a sovereign power before whose holiness men stood under judgment; God was the goodness resident in men themselves. Set men free from the belief of the old falsehood and their inherent virtues would be enough to bring in the millennium.

This tendency of thought has been powerfully reinforced by the school of psychoanalysis which began with Freud. The guilt complex has been arraigned as Public Enemy No. 1. G. B. Chisholm, deputy minister of health of Canada, a psychiatrist of wide recognition, delivered in 1945 the William Alanson White Memorial Lectures in Washington. In the first of these lectures he said:

We have been very slow to . . . recognize the unnecessary and artificially imposed inferiority, guilt and fear, commonly known as sin, under which we have almost all labored and which produces so much of the social maladjustment and unhappiness in the world. . . . Misguided by authoritarian dogma, bound by exclusive faith, stunted by inculcated loyalty, . . . bewildered by invented mystery, and loaded down by the weight of guilt and fear . . . , the unfortunate human race, deprived by these incubi of . . . its reasoning power and its natural capacity to enjoy the satisfaction of its natural urges, struggles along under its ghastly self-imposed burden. The results, the inevitable results, are frustration, inferiority, neurosis, and inability to enjoy living, to reason clearly or to make a world fit to live in.³

So the vehement claim is that intelligent people must get free from dogmatic definitions of "good" and "evil," and above all, from obsession with the notion of "sin."

There are those who like to think themselves intelligent and welcome that conclusion. And there are many others who, on a different ground, will join them in repudiating the story of "the fall" of Adam, and the fall of the whole human race in him. They repudiate it not only because they consider it an unsubstantial myth, but also because they hold that the traditional theology which has been built upon it is full of error and distortion. They doubt that anyone can actually believe what the New England Primer taught,

In Adam's fall
We sinned all.

No matter what traditional authority lies back of that, no matter if Paul is claimed for its support! Paul—great though his mind was—worked within the limitations of his inheritance and his times. Taking the Jewish scriptures too literally, he gave to this chapter of Genesis a kind of categorical authority it did not possess. As a Jew he believed instinctively also in the corporate solidarity which was a central conviction in the early religion of Israel, and so it was possible for him to think that if Adam sinned and was condemned, then all his human descendants were condemned because of him. But we recognize no such conclusion, many sincere men today will say; and they go on to say further that the whole story of the fall of Adam leads to such twisted suggestions that it had better be got rid of once for all.

That then is—or has been—one attitude toward what is written in ch. 3—the attitude of repudiation. But the pendulum is swinging. There grows another and more profound perception which turns back to the ancient story with the realization that there are meanings in it which never must be lost. The truth of the wonderful old drama of Eden is not that we are accounted evil because somebody before us did evil. The truth dramatized there is this: Human nature, made to go God's way, has an inveterate tendency to listen to the temptation to go its own way, and this rebellious way must have an evil end—evil not only for the individual who has sinned but, in that solidarity of human nature and human destiny which Paul perceived, evil that may involve many generations in its long entail. For there are laws as old as creation which we are meant to obey; and as sure as creation, if we disobey them, we shall be in trouble. No circumstances outside us can outweigh that inner fact. No blessings of environment or material opportunity can guarantee a happy life, not even though they should be as complete as those of the Garden of Eden. The disobedience of Eve and Adam is the symbol of a fatal truth: We human beings are continually disobeying and rejecting the law of life; only when our wills are kept in accord with the higher will of God can life be blessed. The instant we yield to the rebellious self-importance which establishes our own ungoverned desires as controlling, that instant life breaks up into little egocentric fragments doomed to irrational discord and collision. D. R. Davies, in his book with the wholesomely sardonic title, Down Peacock's Feathers, has put the reality well.

Now in history we have to face the fact . . . that the human race through the individuals composing it, has willed itself out of the subordinate relation to God, with the fatal result that every individual becomes his own centre. . . . Since we are all alike in wanting to be our own centre, we are irrevocably divided from one another. United in Sin, we become disunited in everything else. This is the brilliant mess in which humanity finds itself, especially the progressive civilized humanity of to-day.⁴

It follows naturally therefore that the same author, referring to the General Confession and its abasement of human pride, should say for himself and for many others:

I believe its truth absolutely. Especially do I subscribe to its more offensive clauses—offensive, that is, to the modern, progressive mind [such as, "There is no health in us"]. . . . That is the part which I believe with the utmost conviction. I am for clouting the secularized mind—hard.⁵

How the secularized and self-sufficient mind may be redeemed is not answered in the story of the Fall. But that answer begins in the O.T. record of the covenant which God made with the saving faith of Abraham and reaches forward through the long hope of patriarchs and prophets to the "Second Adam" whose coming the N.T. reveals.

1-5. The Serpent.—When these words were written men told stories simply as children do. They were concerned chiefly not with laborious prose fact but with imagination; and through that imagination they had instinctive intuitions of the truth. They saw great realities of life and saw them in pictures which are more vivid than any careful pedantry. The description of the serpent is a serious reckoning with the fact of sin. Evil enters into the world, and once here it is dangerous and may be deadly. Moreover, as the writer of this Genesis story knew, it may be more deadly than it seems. Observe that in this account the serpent is not at first repulsive. He comes with plausible argument. He comes with a kind of insinuating grace.

At the beginning of the story the man and the woman are content. They have all they

3. Lest you die: God had warned the man and the woman that if they should eat of the fruit of the forbidden tree, the consequence would be death. There can be little doubt that this was a feature of the earlier myth. There it was, it would seem, a mere threat, impossible of fulfillment. In the event, the best that the offended deity could do was to prevent man's access to the tree of life (cf. vs. 22). J could not tolerate the idea that God would threaten what he could not perform, nor could he, without defeating the purpose of his narrative (see Exeg. on vs. 23), have the warning put into effect. At the same time he was under the necessity of preserving the salient points of the original tale (cf. Exeg. on vs. 22), of which the warning of immediate death was one.

It is hardly possible that J intended the sentence in vs. 19, "you are dust, and to dust you shall return," to be taken as the implementation of the warning. For in the first place it is difficult to suppose that he, artist that he was, would have been content to leave unexplained the awkward fact that action had been thus delayed. And secondly there is no suggestion in vs. 19aβb that man's "return to the ground" was a consequence of his disobedience; the implication is rather that this was his natural end.

The inference would seem to be unavoidable that for J not death itself but man's attitude toward death as the final frustration of a frustrated life was the last consequence of the alienation from God which his rebellion had caused. And, as will be shown below (see Exeg. on vs. 7), this attitude was the inevitable result of the radical disordering of human relationships which was the immediate consequence of his act. Thus J has here again revised the original myth. Facing the problem of how to deal with the threat which was not fulfilled, he was brought to a new understanding of man's fear of death—"the king of terrors" (Job 18:14)—in which all other fears are bound up. No magic tree of life could cure this malady, let alone give immortality, so J omitted all mention of it from his narrative.

need, though they do not have everything. God has given them the garden, with the exception of the fruit of one tree. They were told to let that fruit alone, and they did leave it alone, until. . . . Until the suggestion came sliding in with a serpent's subtlety: "Why not have everything? Why not know more about life? Why not take possession of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil? Why not try the taste of sin?" It is thus that the seductions of sin do present themselves: in the glass of liquor to the boy who thinks he will know what it is to be a man, in the temptation of quick gain that makes the gambler, in the short cut that promises success.

Eve knew that the fruit of the one tree was forbidden. Of the fruit of the tree which is in the midst of the garden, God hath said, Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die. But the serpent was quick with a convenient doubt: "Did God really say that? Perhaps you only thought he said so. And if he did say it, why did he? The fruit is good. What sense can there be in not enjoying it? Why listen to unreasonable commands of God that fence you off from full experience?" The serpent suggested that to Eve, and Eve adopted the suggestion after a little manipulation of her conscience. When she had passed the idea on to Adam, he adopted it too.

The serpent that managed such adroit persuasion was not only in the Garden of Eden. It comes plausibly up to every one of us, presenting the idea that we can know better than God. Are there appetites we have been commanded to control? Well, what are they for if not to indulge them? Are there desires just out of our reach that look more inviting than any we have already satisfied? Well, why not find some hook or crook by which to grasp them? Does the moral law put certain "thou shalt nots" in our way? Yes, but the fruit on the other side is not only pleasant to the eyes, but also is something to be desired to make one wise. Why not "see life," and follow the impulse to try everything once? Suppose we do seem to remember that God's word was different? Perhaps that is just a notion that we ought to outgrow. And besides, how can we take seriously anything so extreme as In the day

4 And the serpent said unto the woman, Ye shall not surely die:

5 For God doth know that in the day ye eat thereof, then your eyes shall be opened, and ye shall be as gods, knowing good and evil.

6 And when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was pleasant to the eyes, and a tree to be desired to make one wise, she took of the fruit thereof, and did eat, and gave also unto her husband with her; and he did eat.

you touch it, lest you die.'” 4 But the serpent said to the woman, “You will not die. 5 For God knows that when you eat of it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil.” 6 So when the woman saw that the tree was good for food, and that it was a delight to the eyes, and that the tree was to be desired to make one wise, she took of its fruit and ate; and she also gave some to her husband, and

4-5. The account of the temptation of the woman in vss. 1-6 is written with superlative skill, and reveals further the psychological penetration of the author. The serpent appeals to the human desire to be like God. This is a right and reasonable desire. The later command, “ye shall be holy; for I the LORD your God am holy” (Lev. 19:2; cf. Matt. 5:48), makes it clear that man is possessed of the potentiality to become like God—in character. This likeness is to come through submission to God’s will. The serpent in telling the woman that likeness to God is to be achieved by defiance of his command tacitly suggests that the likeness which is within human reach is likeness not in character but in power. He suggests that man can make himself the equal of God.

6. The woman sees that the tree is good for food and . . . a delight to the eyes. Deceived by the serpent, she is now deceiving herself. All that she wants to do, she tells herself, is to satisfy two legitimate desires, for food and for beauty. By what right has God forbidden their satisfaction? Her real desire, however, is for power. It is difficult to say whether or not this same self-deception is implicit in the next clause, that the tree was to be desired to make one wise. Both the fact that this was not something which could actually be seen and the explicit subject the tree, unnecessary after the preceding clause, suggest that this clause is a gloss (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, p. 17). If this is the case, that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die? If God really said that, either he did not altogether mean it or we can get around it somehow.

But the fact is that we are in a universe which God controls, not we. When he put us here to learn our lessons and to grow up spiritually he did not intend that we should take over the school and change the requirements to suit ourselves. We have to meet conditions and meet them none the less when we are not grown up enough to know the reasons why they have been set. That is hard for human pride to learn, but it must be learned regardless. Psychologically and religiously one mark of maturity is to know that we live in a universe where we must square with facts and not suppose that we can indulge every vagrant fancy. Only incorrigible children think they must cry and complain when they do not get everything they want. There are some things we are not to have, some prizes we shall not win, some ambitions that the wisdom of God will not let us gratify. And when conscience tells us, as it told Eve, that some particular fruit is not for us, we had better not rationalize our curiosity or our appetite into an alleged justification for reaching out to take it.

The temptation that comes to individuals comes also to nations. Reinhold Niebuhr once began a lecture with these words: “Our question is, Does the state belong to God or to the devil? And the answer is that the state belongs to God, but it is in danger of becoming the devil by imagining that it is God.” In the words of the serpent, You will be like God, knowing good and evil; i.e., every nation, in its pride and lust for power, is apt to deify its own interests and make definitions of good and evil that have nothing to do with universal moral law. Stephen Decatur’s toast, “Our country, . . . may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong!” plausible and patriotic though it sounds, can be another echo of the serpent’s suggestion to let our own enlarged selves be God.

6-13. The Emptiness of Excuses.—It would appear that this account represents a man’s idea. Adam and Eve were both involved in the wrongdoing, but it is Eve who is described as

7 And the eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together, and made themselves aprons.	he ate. 7 Then the eyes of both were opened, and they knew that they were naked; and they sewed fig leaves together and made themselves aprons.

the glossator may simply be carrying J's description of the woman's thought a little further: the desire for wisdom, too, is a legitimate desire which God has no right to thwart. On the other hand, his reference may be to a wisdom which is not of God, the wisdom of magic, an instrument of power. If so, it would seem that J in describing the woman's self-deception had been careful to tell only how she had consciously justified her action to herself, thus suggesting that she had refused to admit her real motive. The glossator then, feeling that this was too subtle to be grasped by the ordinary man, added the clause to make explicit what J in his sensitivity had left implicit.

7. The perfidy of the serpent was immediately apparent on the eating of the fruit. Far from becoming like God, knowing good and evil (vs. 5), they knew only that they were naked. The concreteness of the statement is characteristically Semitic. The nakedness of which they hitherto "were not ashamed" (2:25) becomes an intolerable indecency, demanding that it be covered now that the consciousness of sex has sprung to life within them. It must not be supposed that J regarded the sexual relationship as in itself evil. Having been ordained by God (cf. 2:18, 21-23), this could only be good. But it had been infected with evil when man in his desire for power had disobeyed God. This had impaired the relationship between man and God and so had thrown the relationship between the man and his wife into disorder.

Whatever the context of the earlier myth may have been, in the present form of the story the actors, the first man and the first woman, constitute the whole human race. The relationship between them thus symbolized all human relationships. It is difficult to say whether J would have consciously subscribed to the statement that the sexual relationship is the basic human relationship. It is unlikely that he thought in such terms. Nevertheless in view of the psychological penetration which marks the story as a whole there can be little doubt that he was, however inarticulately, aware of the definitive character of this relationship. The representation that the awakening of sex consciousness was accompanied by a consciousness of guilt thus contains a recognition of the fact that all human relationships are disordered. Alienation from God has brought with it alienation from man. Loneliness is the specter which haunts unredeemed humanity.

starting it. It is always convenient to have somebody else to blame when trouble comes. Observe Adam's double excuse. The woman tempted him, and he ate. Eve was responsible, not he; for Eve presented the temptation and all he did was to respond. That was the first excuse: temptation comes, and when it comes, of course it is natural to follow it. Oscar Wilde said once, "I can resist everything except temptation"; and underneath the wry humor of that there is sober fact. Many people act as though no one could reasonably be supposed to resist temptation. But stop the sentence in the middle. The woman tempted me, and. . . And what? There is the crux of human character. Temptation is an element in every life and comes to everybody. But it is always possible to end the sentence another way. This and that tempted me, but I was not persuaded. That is the sort of answer made by souls who are not paper to be scorched by fire but iron to be purified and hardened by it. The fact that evil is possible is no alibi for choosing it.

The second element in Adam's excuse was to throw the blame one stage farther back. The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat. So neither Eve nor Adam was really responsible; God was. If God did not want Adam to sin, why had he given Eve to him, and why had he made Eve the sort of person she was in the first place? If Adam said that, his descendants have often said it too. We did not make our own environment, nor the people with whom we have to live. God created them; and if trouble somehow comes to us through them, God ought to have prevented it. Thus without being offensively personal, we can still satisfy ourselves with the assumption that we have transferred our fault by passing it on to the general scheme of things. No other person may have been worse than we, but then all of us were turned out originally as a poor lot. Our inheritance is poor. Our circumstances are depressing. The world we were born into has made us what we are; and if God expects us to be different, he ought to have made a different world.

8. The idea that God, like a man of substance, strolled in his garden in the evening was presumably derived from the earlier myth. In the statement that the man and his wife hid themselves from God the author, again in concrete terms, records their sense of guilt.

B. DISCOVERY (3:9-13)

10. The economy of the narrative should be noted. Nothing is said of what the culprits thought when God called to them, or of how they emerged from their hiding place and stood guiltily at a distance (ibid., p. 19). And yet there is no loss of effect. The concrete directness of the writing gives the narrative strength and clarity.

Sometimes that general concept is translated into a whole people's philosophy. Consider some aspects of Hinduism. Individual effort is smothered by the heavy pressure of belief that everything is fated. Why should men struggle when indifferent gods have made the handicap too heavy? From another quarter comes "The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám" expressing that same defeatism in its picture of men as shadow-shapes which to the "Master of the Show" are

But helpless Pieces of the Game He plays

Upon this Chequer-board of Nights and Days;

Hither and thither moves, and checks, and slays,
And one by one back in the Closet lays.*

But our Western thought, because it has inherited the virile assumptions of the O.T., has never been able to lull itself into the belief that we can blame the gods for our shortcomings. When all is said and done, we know that the God who means us to grow has put us into a risky world, surrounded by influences both better and worse, and that we cannot shift responsibility but must make our own creative choice. We know as well as Adam did that alibis will not work. The God we must meet at the end of the day will not be put off by references to other people's sins or by complaints about the universe. When he speaks it will not be in terms of they, or it, but you.

8-11. The Reckoning with God.—Self-will and rebelliousness sooner or later confront the sovereign fact. Adam and Eve had Someone bigger than themselves to reckon with. They had to meet God; and they did meet him, walking in the garden in the cool of the day. Childlike as the form of the story is, note how dramatic and spiritually deep is its suggestion. The Eternal Righteousness moves in a great peace and calm; but Adam and Eve, with their guilty consciences, are hot and embarrassed when they meet him. For the first time they are uneasy with one another: "They knew that they were naked."

Thus always the confusion of conscious wrongdoing is confronted by the steady truth that is inescapable. Eat forbidden fruit against our better knowledge, and it turns out to be not the tree of life but the tree that is deadly to self-respect and peace of mind. Try to know better than God, to break the laws of life, to imagine that our cleverness and our clutching after power can say the final word, and we stand at the end of the day dumb before the quietness of God. "The tumult and the shouting dies." The excitement of the short cut we tried to take, the smart evasion we thought we could get away with, look cheap and futile. Then at length we find—in the words again of "Recessional"—that the only thing to save us is a "humble and a contrite heart." So in the end we may attain to the great hope expressed by Paul, that we may "put off the old man with 11 And he said, Who told thee that thou wast naked? Hast thou eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee that thou shouldest not eat?

12 And the man said, The woman whom thou gavest to be with me, she gave me of the tree, and I did eat.

11. The impression conveyed by the record of the questioning which follows is not that God had to make an inquisition to find out what had happened, but rather that he at once knew the cause of man's shame and was compelling him and his wife to convict themselves. This is in agreement with the clear though implicit representation in the account of the sentencing of the serpent, the woman, and the man—that God was in complete and enduring control of the situation which confronted him. With this vs. 22 may again be contrasted: there God fears that man may put himself permanently beyond his control by attaining immortality. Vss. 9-19, 23 thus provide a further example not only of the skill with which J has revised the earlier myth, but also of his unshakable conviction of the omnipotence and omniscience of God and of man's inescapable dependence upon him.

C. THE CURSE (3:14-19)

14-15. The curse pronounced upon the serpent explains etilogically: (a) why serpents have no legs—the myth seems to imply that formerly they had walked like other animals—and (b) why, as was supposed, they ate dust. Thus in vs. 14 two physical characteristics—one real, the other imaginary—of the animal are accounted for. Vs. 15, on the other hand, deals with a psychological characteristic, not only of the serpent but also of man—the ineradicable hostility between them. The verse is accordingly on another level than vs. 14. This may suggest that it is secondary, a suggestion which perhaps receives a certain support from the fact that its meaning is not altogether clear. It is a matter of dispute as to whether the author thinks of the serpent's attack upon man as fatal, causing man's death by striking at his heel as surely as man causes the serpent's death by crushing his head. To this question Gunkel (ibid., p. 21) gives an affirmative his deeds," and "put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him that created him" (Col. 3:9-10).

14-15. When the Nature of Evil Is Disclosed.—After evil has had its way its real nature begins to be revealed. It is not clear what the serpent is supposed to have looked like at first, but evidently its looks were pleasant. Then it turned into something different. Upon thy belly shalt thou go, and dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life. The serpent now is obviously the snake. In our world of physical experience there is nothing from which men have a more natural revulsion than from the snake. It is secret and stealthy. It strikes without warning and its bite has poison in it. Only a fool will walk carelessly where snakes lurk. Many men have come to their senses when God has intervened to show the nature of sin, for then its reality is unmistakably abhorrent.

The evil that somehow is in our world cannot be whistled off. It shall bruise man's heel. A man cannot think he will escape the fact of sin by acting as if it were not there. It will answer, Skinner (Genesis, p. 80) a negative, and with this agrees the messianic interpretation placed upon the verse by Targ. Jonathan, Targ. Jerusalem, the medieval Christian exegetes, and Calvin (see ibid., pp. 80-82, for an outline of this development and for a summary of the allegorical interpretation the verse has received).

There is, furthermore, the difficulty that the Hebrew verb shûph, rendered bruise, adequately describes the effect of man's action against the serpent but scarcely that of the serpent's action against man. It may be, as Gunkel suggests (Genesis, p. 21), that the use of shûph is due to a scribal error, and that shā'aph, which seems to have the required double meaning of "crush" and "aim at," was original (see, however, Skinner, Genesis, pp. 79-80). Finally, it is perhaps not without significance that the verse reveals a certain reflectiveness not unlike that which informs 2:24, the J authorship of which has already been called into question on independent grounds.

16. Thy sorrow and thy conception (KJV) is a more literal rendering of the Hebrew than your pain in childbearing (RSV). Since, however, for a Hebrew woman conception was not a burden but a joy, the word can scarcely be original here. Instead, "thy grief" should be read; cf. the LXX, "thy groaning."

strike at him and wound him. When it does wound him the effect must be dealt with drastically, as with the bite of a snake. There may be need of quick, sharp, moral surgery to keep the poison of sin from spreading. Much contemporary religious thinking has emphasized anew the fact of sin and man's vulnerability to it. See the writings of Karl Barth and Emil Brunner and of most of the continental theologians and others deeply affected by the brutal aspect of our civilization in the twentieth century. Neither life nor civilization is an easy process. A generation ago some churches had on their bulletin boards a statement of belief which included belief in "the progress of man onward and upward forever." We are not so shallow now as to believe in automatic progress. Humanity has a hard struggle if its good hopes are to prevail. There is need of vigilance, courage, and moral combativeness.

But if the first suggestion is of the fact of sin, there is a second great suggestion also. It is the call to the kind of moral conflict which promises victory. The serpent may bruise man's heel, but ultimately man is meant to crush the serpent's head. The religion of the O.T. has in it always a virile optimism. It is not blind to the tragedy of life, but all the while it looks forward to triumph. Men and nations in their struggles against temptation and in their warfare against evil are meant not to surrender but to prevail. Phillips Brooks had a great sermon which he entitled "The Giant with the Wounded Heel." In it he expressed, as all of us ought to express, the essential dignity and greatness of man. Man is subject to the poisonous fangs of sin but he can crush sin if he is so determined.

What every soul needs to learn is that it is in a constant battle, but a battle which ought to be and may be a winning one. As it was written of Thomas Arnold, the great headmaster of Rugby School, he so preached that to every young boy who heard him there was brought home "for the first time, the meaning of his life; that it was no fool's or sluggard's paradise into which he had wandered by chance, but a battlefield ordained from of old, where there are no spectators but the youngest must take his side, and the stakes are life and death." And Charles Kingsley wrote, "O, be at least able to say in that day,—Lord, I am no hero. . . . But a traitor I have never been; a deserter I have never been. . . . I have tried to do the duty which lay nearest me; and to leave whatever Thou didst commit to my charge a little better than I found it." To do that is to stand at last, wounded perhaps, but crushing the head of evil.

tion; in sorrow thou shalt bring forth children; and thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee.

17 And unto Adam he said, Because thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it: cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life;

18 Thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herb of the field:

in pain you shall bring forth children, yet your desire shall be for your husband, and he shall rule over you."

17 And to Adam he said,

"Because you have listened to the voice of your wife, and have eaten of the tree of which I commanded you,

'You shall not eat of it,' cursed is the ground because of you;

in toil you shall eat of it all the days of your life;

18 thorns and thistles it shall bring forth to you; and you shall eat the plants of the field.

The first half of the verse provides an etiological explanation of the pain suffered by women in childbirth, the agony of which is frequently referred to in the O.T. (cf. e.g., Isa. 13:8; Jer. 4:31). It is a question whether the second half, yet your desire shall be for your husband, and he shall rule over you,

speaks of sexual desire in woman, or whether it alludes to her natural desire for children—in which case thy desire shall be to thy husband (KJV) would perhaps be the better rendering. In either case the reference is to the wife's dependence upon her husband and so to the necessity she was under to endure the arbitrary treatment customary in the age in which the story was written. Most significant is the fact that J, far in advance of his time, sees that this domination of woman by man is an evil thing. The implication is that the relationship between husband and wife was intended by God to be a mutual and complementary relationship of love and respect, not a relationship in which one dominates the other. And the further implication is that all human relationships were intended to be mutual relationships—though the expression of this mutuality would necessarily differ with the character of the relationship; i.e., the mutuality between friend and friend differs from that between parent and child, for instance. Thus all attempts at domination, so characteristic of human conduct, are a consequence of the disorder which has infected the relationship of man to man, and at the same time make for further disorder and for the further alienation of man from God.

This being the case, J²'s melancholy attitude as regards sex (in contrast to the matter-of-fact attitude of J¹; see Exeg. on 34:1-31) becomes understandable. On all sides he was confronted by Baalism. This, being a fertility religion, was concerned above all else with the reproductive powers of nature, and this concern had issued in sexual license. To the temptation of this religion the Israelite peasant only too easily succumbed, and this led to further alienation from Yahweh. It is not surprising therefore that J² reveals a tendency to regard the sexual relationship as the focal point of evil, the center of the tragic infection which blasts human hopes and reduces life to dust.

17. The penalty laid upon the man (read "the man" for Adam; in the J narrative 'ādhām, "man," is not elsewhere a proper name; see vss. 9, 12, etc.) is that of expulsion from the garden "to till the ground from which he was taken" (vs. 23). This involved toil—for you shall eat of it should be read "you shall till it," required by vs. 23—as unremitting as it was frustrating—the word rendered toil (RSV) also has the meaning "pain" or sorrow (KJV). The frustration is the result of God's curse, cursed is the ground because of you. Man's relationship with nature, like his relationships with God and with his fellow men, is in disorder.

18. That this verse is not from the same hand as vs. 19a is shown by the awkward double occurrence of eat (cf. Holzinger, Genesis, p. 35; Rudolf Smend, Die Erzählung des Hexateuch [Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1912], p. 19) and by the fact that it breaks the connection between vss. 17 and 19. It is a gloss by one who presumably felt that J's meaning was not sufficiently clear: it might be thought that he was representing the simple necessity of tilling the ground as the punishment for man's disobedience. This was indeed for J part of the punishment; it was not the whole of it. For (as has been pointed out in the Exeg. on vs. 17; see also that on vs. 19) he regarded the sense of frustration which dogged the peasant—and every man—in his work as the more terrible consequence of man's sin. It is this point which the glossator is concerned to stress in vs. 18a. Vs. 18b, noting the contrast between man's present food and the fruit of the garden, may be from a still later hand, as is suggested by Holzinger (Genesis, pp. 35-36), who, however, retains vs. 18a as part of the original narrative.

19 In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return.

19 In the sweat of your face you shall eat bread till you return to the ground, for out of it you were taken; you are dust, and to dust you shall return."

19. Till you return to the ground: The reference is to the burial of the dead. For out of it you were taken refers back to 2:7, and stresses one of the salient points, of the story. You are dust, and to dust you shall return would seem to have been taken

19. Work: a Curse or a Blessing?—Work is represented as the curse laid upon Adam and his descendants. To have to work, instead of getting the fruits of life without working, seemed to the human instinct to be the mark of punishment, a fate from which ideally life should have escaped. It was a natural way of thinking. But is this part of a divine revelation, or is it one of man's misreadings of the heavenly truth? The men who shaped the traditions which have come down in Genesis were here trying to interpret experience and the good and bad they found in it. The necessity of labor was something they did not like; so they regarded it as evil. It felt like punishment, so they concluded that it was punishment. Yet the ideas reflected here, as elsewhere in the early strata of the O.T., may not be infallible. In a green landscape one may come upon outcroppings of rough primeval rock, interrupting the fertile plowland. So in the rich productive ground of the O.T. there may be an outcropping of primitive conceptions in which the seeds of larger life will not take root. It is not necessary to accept and try to make use of everything which far-off men believed when they listened first to the telling of the story of the Garden of Eden.

Is work a curse? Yes and no. No and yes. It depends on circumstances and the kind of work. It is a curse when it is meaningless. Then it becomes an intolerable tedium, deadening the mind and embittering the spirit, like the labor of convicts in a chain gang set to breaking rocks all day. It is a curse when it is done under compulsion for ends which the worker hates and against which he inwardly rebels, like the labor of prisoners of war made to work in the enemy country for the enemy's advantage. It was a curse in the days of slavery (remember the haunting notes of prayer for release and rest in many of the Negro spirituals), and it is a curse now in those places where weaker people like farm workers in some southern parts of the United States are exploited in ways not much short of slavery. Study the facts as to peonage and the practice of keeping share croppers, particularly Negroes, so hopelessly in debt to the owners that they can never get out from under the load that holds them on the land. Consider the poverty and ignorance linked with that in a vicious circle. Similarly, the whole development of the economic and industrial system of the last century has tended to make labor seem a curse by creating conditions that become almost intolerable. Ostensibly the workers in the modern industrial system who are the hired hands of the owners of factories and mills are free to go and come as they please and to live or not live where they choose, but in fact the necessity to earn enough to live on forces them to work in hateful places which they would not willingly have chosen but which they cannot change. (Read the life of Lord Shaftesbury,⁸ and note the almost incredible cruelties which marked the beginnings of mechanized production in England.) Consider in the United States the history of child labor by J from an independent poem, for it says that man was made not from the ground but from dust—which led to the intrusion of "the dust of" in 2:7.

It has already been noted that there is no suggestion here that man would have lived forever had he not eaten of the forbidden fruit (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 22-23, Skinner, Genesis, p. 83). Rather the implication is (see Exeg. on vs. 3) that man would have regarded death not as the last fearful frustration but as his natural end. The fear of death is a consequence of the disorder in man's relationships, as a result of which they are no longer characterized by mutuality but by domination. Man, aware of his need for others, attempts to compel them to fill his need that he may be secure. In this he may even be successful for a time. But he is always haunted by the fear that those whom he dominates will free themselves from him, and he tries to quiet this fear by further aggression. In this, too, he may be temporarily successful. From the fear of death, however, he cannot escape. For in the depths of his soul he knows that the structure of relationships which he has erected to protect himself is fundamentally without in cotton mills, the springing up of the drab and shoddy industrial towns with the crowded tenements to which people were lured from the villages and the wholesome open country; and the danger and degradation of the coal mines and of the huddled shacks which often have been all that wives and children of the miners had for homes. Consider what sort of existence the migratory workers endure. (Read John Steinbeck, The Grapes of Wrath,⁹ and Carey McWilliams, *Factories in the Field*¹⁰ and Ill Fares the Land.¹¹)

Furthermore, even when grosser handicaps have been removed, work may still seem to many people at least in part a curse when it exhausts the energies and leaves the worker too tired to enjoy his life. Observe how many protests and strikes among industrial workers are concerned not primarily with wages but with hours and conditions of work. against "the speed-up," for a shorter working week, for holidays. Let Christian people consider their responsibility as citizens for what industry exacts from millions of the working population. Labor unions have their excesses, and often they are uncritically blamed and their contribution to human well-being ignored. Yet what would have happened to workers in the last hundred years but for the amelioration the unions have brought?

Thus work may be a curse. But it need not be. In the long run men would not be better off for having no work to do. The picture of the Garden of Eden is a childlike picture of human happiness, and in mature people the hidden instinct which turns back with a child's nostalgic longing for irresponsibility and undiscipline still thinks of freedom from work as a kind of paradise. But the human race would never have amounted to much, and parts of it do not amount to much now, in conditions which require no exception. In the tropics men do live in a kind of Garden of Eden on the fruit that drops from trees. But the virile races are not developed there. It is in the other and sterner zones, where men are compelled by nature to win their livelihood by hard effort and in the face of danger, that the great human stocks have been produced. Compare the peoples of Europe with those of Central Africa. Compare the hardihood of the men of New England, wrestling with a rocky soil and developing the courage and initiative that sent the trains of covered wagons to pioneer the West, with the tribes in the green jungles of Brazil. Men who have worked hard are usually the happiest men. Said Le Baron R. Briggs, once the beloved dean of Harvard College, "There is always somebody or something to work for; and while there is, life must be, and shall become, worth living."¹²

What are the factors necessary in order that work may be a blessing? Freedom, so that a man feels that the best in himself has a chance to find expression instead of being frustrated by the compulsion that drives him to uncongenial tasks. It is one of the indictments against a totalitarian system such as that of Soviet Russia that it regiments its workers. But in a so-called free society the pressure of economic dependence may make men equally unfree.

Training and education enough to release his best capacities. Here is a moral responsibility for every individual—for the boy or girl at school, and for the adult, to make intelligent pursuit of further information; and for society to see to it that schools and other influences of enlightenment are actually accessible to all the people.

Something to work for. The pouring out of energy becomes not exhausting but inspiring substance. In the end it will crumble and he will be compelled to face the fact which he had always tried to deny—that he is man and not God. Man's disordered relationships and his fear of death are inextricably bound up together, the consequence of his alienation from God.

D. EXPULSION FROM EDEN (3:20-24)

20. In view of the fact that nowhere in his narrative does J record the naming of man, it is unlikely that this verse is from his hand. In any case it would not belong here, between the sentence passed upon the man and its execution, and before the woman had become the mother of anything living. It is, however, scarcely a casual gloss, for the name "Hawwah" (Eve) seems to be traditional; it is therefore probably an insertion from the Eden saga which thus (cf. also vss. 21, 22, and 24 in part) appears to have remained extant for some time after J had produced his revision of it.

The fact that the verse was intruded here, rather than after the notice of man's expulsion from the garden, would seem to suggest that in this earlier recension of the myth children had been born to the man and his wife while they were still in Eden. If this is so, then the awareness which J reveals of the distortion in human nature, reaching down to its very depths and manifesting itself in all man's relationships, owes little to the original myth. It derives from Yahwism, the religion which Israel had brought from the desert and which threw light upon the religion of Canaan, discerning its values and rejecting its errors, and in the process relating itself to the peasant culture into which Israel had entered.

21. This verse also, scarcely necessary though not impossible after vs. 7, is probably from the Eden story. If, as has been suggested, that recension regarded sex consciousness as a natural attribute of man, the notice in its original context will have followed immediately upon the account of the making of the man and the woman. If the verse is not from J it is not necessary to emend Adam to "the man."

when it is related to some large benefit which it can produce—for those closest to the worker first, but also for everybody. Christian people cannot be content without an ideal for individuals and a growing will and program in society for the kind of creative labor that may make human beings fellow workers with God. When work does not seem to be creative of anything worth while it can become drab to the point of degradation. Too many men and women are forced to earn their living in ways which do not bring benefit to anybody, and there is nothing to give them pride or satisfaction in what they do. On the other hand, all honest work which by its product increases the well-being of society can enable those who do the work to feel that they are carrying out some part of God's good purpose for his world. To organize our actual society so that this shall be true for workers generally is a far goal, but all Christian economists and all men of influence in industry must be aiming at nothing less.

20. Motherhood.—Here for the first time in the Bible occurs the rich word mother. In theological disquisitions Eve has generally been represented as the mother of the woes of mankind. Yet in all motherhood there is a deep and divine wonder. By the woman all life is conceived and transmitted; and to the woman's nurture and her understanding most that is tenderest and best is due. One remembers Hannah, the mother of Samuel; the vicarious motherhood of the daughter of Pharaoh; and the one who has become for so many Christians the reverent symbol of the holiest motherhood, Mary the mother of Jesus. Nor would one forget the lovely reference of Paul when, with his message to one of his fellow Christians, Rufus,

22 ¶ And the LORD God said, Behold, the man is become as one of us, to know good and evil: and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever:

23 Therefore the LORD God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken.

22 Then the LORD God said, "Behold, the man has become like one of us, knowing good and evil; and now, lest he put forth his hand and take also of the tree of life, and eat, and live for ever" — 23 therefore the LORD God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from

22. The reasons for supposing that this verse is an intrusion from the Eden myth upon which J based his story of the garden have already been stated and need not be repeated here. It was presumably inserted in part to supply some reference to the tree of life which J had chosen to ignore, in part because he regarded as intolerable and morally dangerous the implication that immortality could be attained apart from, not to say in spite of, God; and also because he could not permit the suggestion that the disorder in human relationships, springing from man's alienation from God and giving rise to the fear of death, could be healed by external means. But the very fact that the addition was made suggests that J had been more drastic in his revision of the original myth than popular acceptance would allow—a significant, interesting indication of the extent to which he, writing to maintain and strengthen the unity of Israel, was limited in his treatment of non-Yahwist material.

While the verse obscures the thought of J, it is far from being without value. For in its total biblical context it affirms that man, for all his fantastic self-deception, cannot make himself the equal of God; that not knowing good and evil but knowing the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom he has sent (cf. John 17:3) is eternal life; and that the love of God is so great that man cannot make permanent and irremediable the tragic frustration which he has brought upon himself.

But the Eden saga was drawn upon not only to supply the missing reference to the tree of life. The other insertions from this recension (vss. 20, 21, together with 2:24) seem to reveal a certain uneasiness concerning J's tendency noted above (see Exeg. on these verses) to regard the sexual relationship as the focal point of evil. It was to correct this that these verses were inserted by one who had been reflecting upon the great story lying before him, who recognized in its tragic verdict on sex a certain validity but who nevertheless could not accept it without qualification. This was provided, to a slight degree, by vss. 20-21 which by implication reaffirmed the older representation that sex consciousness was a natural human attribute; and, more clearly, by the affirmation of the naturalness and sanctity of the marriage act in 2:24.

Finally, it should be noted that in the creation narrative as a whole (chs. 1-3) the melancholy pessimism of J² as regards sex is qualified by the relatively optimistic attitude of P: "So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it. . . . And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good" (1:27-28a, 31a). And it is the narrative as a whole which has the finality of the Word of God.

23. With the excision of vss. 20-22 this verse is left as the immediate and original continuation of vs. 19. The initial therefore must accordingly be rendered "and," no change being involved in the Hebrew. Of Eden is redactional linking with the Eden fragments which have been inserted into the story.

This verse concludes the original J story. It is a story written to account for man's tragic experience of alienation from God, and neither the fact that it is based upon and is a drastic revision of an older myth, nor the fact that it is one-sided in its judgment as to the meaning of sex, nor the fact that it regards the necessity of work as a result of disobedience should be permitted to obscure this truth. It is not a historical account of "the Fall," nor is the doctrine of original sin based upon it. Indeed, it may be said that which he was taken. 24 He drove out the man; and at the east of the garden of Eden he placed the cherubim, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to guard the way to the tree of life.

without the experience of alienation from God, of which that doctrine is the meta-physical explanation, the story would never have been written. Starting from that experience, the author voices his conviction—a conviction rooted in his knowledge of God—that man’s sense of alienation from God springs from his own act, that it is not natural, that it would never have arisen had man been obedient.

24. This verse has suffered in transmission and must be restored, with the LXX, “And he drove out the man, and caused him to dwell to the east of the garden of Eden; and he stationed the cherubim and a flaming sword [lit., in Hebrew, “the flame of the sword”], which turned every way to guard the way to the tree of life.” The reference to Eden and to the tree of life indicates that the verse is another insertion from the Eden saga—the garden of being redactional harmonization—made at the same time as vs. 22 to explain why it was that the man, being banished, could never get back to the tree of life. The role of the cherubim here is that of guardians of a holy place, as it is in Exod. 37:7-9 and I Kings 6:23-27 (cf. “covering cherub” in Ezek. 28:16; also Exod. 26:31; I Kings 6:29, 32). In II Sam. 6:2; Ps. 18:10; Ezek. 1, they are represented as the supporters of Yahweh’s throne. They were winged beings with two faces (cf. Ezek. 41:18-19)—of a man and of a lion—or with four (cf. Ezek. 1:10)—of a man, he speaks of “his mother and mine” (Rom. 16:13).

24. After Failure.—So the past was to be irrevocable. The man and his wife must turn from all they had known to a future that was unknown. The gate was shut, and the angel with the flaming sword kept them from ever going back. The ancient story has its continually repeated parallels. Many lives have their lost Edens. Knowing the better, men have chosen the worse. Curious to know the taste of evil, they have eaten of its fruit, and from that time on they must face the bitter consequence.

What then? Nothing is suggested in the Scriptures as to what Adam thought and felt. Yet Adam standing outside the Eden to which he could not return is a symbol of what may happen to every man. Some deliberate sin, or some stupid carelessness as of the foolish virgins in the parable of Jesus, has destroyed our finest opportunity; and when we turn too late to that which might have been ours the door is shut. There is bitter finality in that fact. Yet even so the whole story of life is not then finished. What happens to the modern Adam excluded from the Eden of his lost innocence depends upon the attitude he adopts toward that which now he cannot change.

Sometimes that attitude may be only weakly reminiscent. Many a man at some critical turning point of life will not face reality but lets himself be paralyzed by a dull remorse that has in it no brave element of moral renewal. Or he may try to figure out some explanation of his failure that lays the blame on something or somebody else. Fate has been against him, and what is the use then of struggling against fate? Gamaliel Bradford wrote of Henry Adams: “He needed not to think, but to live. But he did not want to live. It was easier to sit back and proclaim life unworthy of Henry Adams than it was to lean forward with the whole soul in a passionate, if inadequate, effort to make Henry Adams worthy of life.”* The modern Adam may try to persuade himself that his world is one which by its very nature gives a man no chance of making good, in which there is nothing left but fatalistic acceptance of moral defeat.

But there can be another and better spirit—the spirit which recognizes the inexorable deprivations which because of its blunders it must suffer and yet has the will not to let these say the last word. The old story does not attempt to tell what, if anything, Adam made up his mind to do, but the whole Bible makes this plain: all that is best in the history of the human race has come from those who did not surrender to defeat but went ahead to try to correct disastrous beginnings and to put something better together out of the pieces of broken hopes and plans. Yet not by themselves! For far above what men can do is what God does in and for them. The Adam in every man that may be standing outside the Eden which a lion, an ox, and an eagle (cf. Rev. 4:7). With them may be compared the sphinx in Egypt and the hybrid figures stationed before Assyrian temples and palaces. "The flame of the sword"—it can scarcely have been conceived as in the hand of one of the cherubim—is an independent symbol, a representation of lightning (Skinner, Genesis, p. 89). It is possible that originally this only was mentioned and that the cherubim, and is a gloss (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 24-25, who, however, derives the cherubim and the flame from parallel sources).

In its present context the verse makes explicit what had been implicit in vs. 23—that man could never redeem himself. Redemption would be possible only when God by his own act once again opened the way to the tree of life.

IV. BEGINNINGS OF CIVILIZATION (4:1-26)

That ch. 4 as a whole is derived from J is indicated by the use of the LORD in vss. 1-16, of which vss. 17-24 are obviously the continuation, and in vs. 26. The material is, however, not in its original order. According to vs. 26, men did not begin to call upon the name of the LORD—i.e., to worship the Lord—until the time of Enosh; yet Cain and Abel are represented as offering sacrifice to him.

This inconsistency is the result of the redactional activity of RP. Other solutions of the difficulties presented by chs. 4-5 are proposed by, e.g., Gunkel (Genesis, pp. 40-41), who postulates two independent strands in J, as does Skinner (Genesis, pp. 98-101). On the solution offered here cf. Bernhard Stade, "Beiträge zur Pentateuchkritik (1) Das Kainszeichen," Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XIV (1894), 264-65. According to this solution, RP had before him two genealogies beginning with the first man: (a) That of P, now preserved in 5:1-28a, 30-32—vss. 28b-29 are from J and have been substituted for P's simple statement, "he became the father of Noah." The first names in this genealogy were Adam (=the Man), Seth, and Enosh (cf. 5:3-6). (b) That of J, the first three names of which were likewise the Man (=Adam), Seth, and Enosh (cf. 4:25-26a). From that point, however, the two lists diverged, P continuing with the names Kenan, Mahalalel, etc., to Lamech, the father of Noah (cf. 5:9-31); J with Cain—another, and in Hebrew, very similar form of the Kenan of P—Enoch, Irad, etc., to Lamech the father of Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal-cain (cf. 4:17-22).

RP, seeking not only to preserve but to unify the traditions of J and P, could not because of these divergences simply place these genealogies in juxtaposition unaltered. At the same time he was unwilling to omit either list of names; concrete detail attached to those in J (vss. 2-16, 17-24) demanded the preservation of that material, and P's highly schematized list would not stand mutilation.

RP accordingly changed the order of J. He made Cain, whom J had listed as the son of Enosh, the son of the first man and then, following the story of the murder of Abel (vss. 3-16), continued with the J genealogy from Cain to Lamech and his sons his sin has forfeited can learn that there is a Second Adam through whose new nature his past can be redeemed. Knowing now good and evil, but having chosen the evil in some disastrous disobedience, he cannot yet know the full meaning of the tree of life. But the Bible which begins with Genesis goes on to Revelation, with its promise of "that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God" (Rev. 21:10), in the midst of which shall be "the tree of life," the leaves of which are for "the healing of the nations" (Rev. 22:2).

4:1-8. The Murderer.—The instant the name of Cain is spoken one association follows it as inescapably as a man's shadow follows a man. That name has become proverbial as the name of the first murderer. Yet everyone who reads the whole narrative must note this fact: there is no indication that Cain intended to commit murder. Thus far in the narrative of Genesis

2 And she again bare his brother Abel. And Abel was a keeper of sheep, but Cain was a tiller of the ground.

(vss. 17-24). Then, reverting to the beginning of the J genealogy, Man, Seth, Enosh (vss. 25-26) and adding a few harmonizing words to vs. 25, he placed this immediately before the P material with which it agreed, so that it had the effect of being a brief anticipation of P's elaborate scheme.

The order of the J material in ch. 4 as it lay before RP was vss. 25 (in its original form, see below), 26, 1-24.

A. CAIN AND ABEL (4:1-16)

4:1. In this verse, therefore, "Enosh" originally stood in place of Adam, and Eve is an intrusion of RP. The use of knew—frequent in the O.T.—referring to the marriage act is a significant indication of the character of the relation between the knower and the known in the Hebrew mind; it involved always a surrender of the self, though the degree of that surrender and the action it demanded necessarily varied with the object or the person known. The implications of this for the prophets, especially Hosea's, concept of the knowledge of God are far reaching in their importance.

Cain seems originally to have been the ancestor of the Kenites. The implications of his appearance in this tale will be considered below. The meaning of the name is "metalworker" or "smith"; here, however, it is represented as a derivation of a word meaning "acquire," "get"—one of the popular etymologies frequent in Genesis—hence the mother's words I have gotten a man. From the LORD (KJV) is a rendering, following the LXX and the Vulg., of 'eth Yahweh, which is lit., "with Yahweh," and so unintelligible here (the help of [RSV] is not in the Hebrew). It seems probable that 'eth should be 'oth—so, "the mark of Yahweh"—and that the words are a gloss referring either to the new Yahweh cult mentioned in vs. 26b, which immediately preceded this verse in J, or to the mark set on Cain (vs. 15).

2. And again, she bore his brother Abel may indicate that the brothers were twins, as is further suggested by the repeated my brother, your brother, throughout the narrative.

The secondary character of vs. 2b, which attempts to explain why the brothers offered different kinds of sacrifice, is indicated by (a) the mention of Abel before Cain; (b) the statement that Cain was a tiller of the ground, unnecessary for the reason that according to J (cf. 3:23) this was at the time the common occupation of all men; and (c) the fact that it breaks the close connection between vss. 2a and 3.

there has been no such thing as death, and therefore no way by which anyone could clearly imagine what death might be. Cain strikes Abel in the instinctive reflex of his anger, but who can say that he had any deliberate purpose to end his brother's life? When Abel fell, Cain may have been astonished that he lay so long, so still. Why did he not get up again? Only little by little, and incredulously, did Cain grow conscious that something had happened beyond the framework of his previous imagining. This motionless body on the ground that did not speak or stir—what did that mean? He may have seen a sheep die, but never a man. Was it really possible that he had killed his brother?

The tragedy of that first murder lay in a fact which may be repeated in every unguided sin. The result outruns what the will intended. How often do we hear the cry, "But I didn't mean to do it!" Anger gets loose and before we know it has gone beyond all bounds. We may commit murder before we have fully grasped what murder is.

Not physical murder, perhaps, though there is an appalling amount of that. But that is not the whole story, nor is it for most of us the crucial part of it. We may commit murder in subtler ways than physical. We retail some poisonous gossip, not out of direct malice, but for the relish of saying something that will be exciting; and then are startled to read in the newspapers that the man we helped to slander has committed suicide, or that the husband and wife we smeared have been divorced. But the moral murder of which we may be guilty may begin nearer home. Oscar Wilde, who in spite

3 And in process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the LORD.

4 And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof. And the LORD had respect unto Abel and to his offering:

5 But unto Cain and to his offering he had not respect. And Cain was very wroth, and his countenance fell.

6 And the LORD said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen?

7 If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door: and unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him.

Cain a tiller of the ground. 3 In the course of time Cain brought to the LORD an offering of the fruit of the ground, 4 and Abel brought of the firstlings of his flock and of their fat portions. And the LORD had regard for Abel and his offering, 5 but for Cain and his offering he had no regard. So Cain was very angry, and his countenance fell. 6 The LORD said to Cain, "Why are you angry, and why has your countenance fallen? 7 If you do well, will you not be accepted? And if you do not do well, sin is couching at the door; its desire is for you, but you must master it."

5. It is not stated why the Lord had no regard for Cain and his offering. The same silence may have marked the legend in its original form before it was adapted by J to its present context. It is possible, however, that a reason was there given, and that its omission by J was a piece of polemic against the peasant custom of bringing the fruit of the ground as an offering to the Lord (vs. 3), instead of the time-honored nomad offering of an animal.

7. The text is corrupt; if its meaning is, as Skinner (Genesis, pp. 106-7) suggests, that the cause of Cain's dissatisfaction lies within himself, the verse, together with vs. 6, may be an addition seeking to answer the question left unanswered in vs. 5a.

of his spotted record had often a piercing discernment of the truth, wrote in his Ballad of Reading Gaol:

Yet each man kills the thing he loves,
By each let this be heard,
Some do it with a bitter look,
Some with a flattering word,
The coward does it with a kiss,
The brave man with a sword! 4

Those mordant lines may go beyond the facts, but they are close enough to reality to stab attention wide awake. Who can be sure that he may not give mortal wounds by cold unconcern, kill joy by sullenness, and gradually destroy devotion by gestures of affection which have become perfunctory?

Damage goes back beyond any obvious deed. A famous criminal lawyer is reported to have said in a newspaper interview: "Everybody is a potential murderer. I have not killed anyone, but I frequently get satisfaction out of the obituary notices." Trouble begins with a twisted thought in the mind and a grudge hidden in the heart. Jesus made that plain in the Sermon on the Mount. It is not clear why Cain hated Abel: perhaps not for anything that Abel did, but perhaps because of what he was. All Cain thought of was what Cain himself was not. He had the idea that Abel was preferred to him and he resented that. Similarly, many of us today may nurse some dark feeling of inferiority which can burst out one day in cruel disparagement or violent injury toward the one who seems to us to have gotten a better break from life than we have.

It was a strange contradiction that the first murder came with an act of worship. It was while he was approaching God that Cain knew how much he hated his brother. He felt frustrated because he felt somehow that God's truth ranked Abel higher than himself; and if he knew within himself that this was what he deserved, he struck out all the more blindly and bitterly against the superiority that shamed him. This is the explanation of the vindictive hostility that men may express toward those whose achievements they envy—the hostility of the citizen to a great political leader or the dislike which a minister may feel for a more honored brother minister.

But when Cain had done his worst to Abel he could not get away from God. To a guilty conscience came the question: Where is Abel thy brother? And the bravado of his answer, Am I my brother's keeper, could not hide the truth that this was exactly what he must be.

4 Part I, st. vii.

8 And Cain talked with Abel his brother: and it came to pass, when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him.

9 ¶ And the LORD said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know not: Am I my brother's keeper?

8 Cain said to Abel his brother, "Let us go out to the field."^b And when they were in the field, Cain rose up against his brother Abel, and killed him. 9 Then the LORD said to Cain, "Where is Abel your brother?" He said, "I do not know; am I my brother's

^b Sam Gk Syr Compare Vg: Heb lacks Let us go out to the field

8. The Hebrew of the first half of the verse is truncated: Cain said to Abel his brother. As is noted in the RSV mg., Let us go out to the field has been supplied from the versions. This is, however, a not particularly happy anticipation of when they were in the field. Possibly the Hebrew wayyō'mer, "and [he] said," is a corruption of wayyishmōr, "and [he] eyed," or "lay in wait for" (Holzinger, Genesis, p. 48)—a change of one letter only in the consonantal text—and that the sentence originally read "And Cain eyed Abel his brother." If so, there is a subtle wordplay in Cain's defiant Am I my brother's keeper [watcher]? (vs. 9), for the verb shāmar means not only "to eye" or "to lie in wait for" (cf. I Sam. 19:11), but also "to watch," and so "to keep."

The field means the open country, where Cain thought he would be safe from observation.

9-10. But the Lord saw him and the damning inquisition (vss. 9-12, 16) follows—reminiscent of, and from the same hand as, 3:9-19, 23; note, "What is this that you have done?" (3:13) and What have you done? (vs. 10), the use of the word ground (3:17, 19, 23; and vss. 10, 11, 12), and of the word "till" (3:17—as emended—3:23; and vs. 12).

Nor is blood brotherhood the only authoritative bond. Sooner or later men must recognize that any cruelty to any human being, yes, any careless or flippant unkindness, brings them face to face with the judgment of God. When the large-hearted William H. Taft was governor of the Philippine Islands, he made public reference to "our Filipino brothers," and was answered in a derisive song by somebody who thought himself better than any Filipino:

He may be a brother of William H. Taft,
But he ain't no brother of mine.⁵

All the same, he is; and whoever looks at the Orient in the aftermath of World War II is bound to see that whenever brotherhood is violated the blood of the victims will cry out from whatever ground the victor treads.

9. Acknowledgment of Guilt.—Where is . . . thy brother? That was the question that Cain wanted to evade. The unrepentant guilty always will try to evade it. But the need of souls is to face it squarely and to accept deliberately the consequences of confession and repentance. Who is there that has not hurt some other human being, if not with such a mortal stroke as that which Cain gave to Abel, yet in some way that has left some part of that other one's happiness and well-being lying dead? It may have been through hot passion: through lust that has defiled another life, through sudden anger that has lashed out against some supposed offense, through violence of word or act that satisfied revenge. It may have been through a colder cruelty: a sneer, a contemptuous look, a sinister disparagement that struck home like a poisoned arrow. Where are they now, those victims of the evil that we did? To what grave of undeserved suffering or sorrow have we brought them down? Or suppose that we never deliberately intended evil: are there no hurts we have given just because we were too stupid to understand? Read Edward Rowland Sill's "The Fool's Prayer." Remember that it is not only by malicious wrong but by our blundering folly that we can give to others, and especially to those we love, wounds that may be too deep for healing. The clumsy word, the careless indifference, the self-absorption that can treat a soul hungering for affection as though it were no more than a thing for our convenience, are enough to make us guilty. We recoil from admitting that, but the voice of God cannot be escaped. Where is . . . thy brother? it asks; and "Where are you, and why is your back turned to him? What will you do now? In deep contrition go to him and see whether by God's mercy that which you struck down can be restored?"

It may be also that God's voice will ask what seems a more drastic question than he asked of 10 And he said, What hast thou done? the voice of thy brother's blood crieth unto me from the ground.

11 And now art thou cursed from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand.

12 When thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.

keeper?" 10 And the LORD said, "What have you done? The voice of your brother's blood is crying to me from the ground.

11 And now you are cursed from the ground, which has opened its mouth to receive your brother's blood from your hand. 12 When you till the ground, it shall no longer yield to you its strength; you shall be a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth."

13 Cain said to the LORD, "My punishment is greater

Vss. 9-10 imply that a man is indeed his brother's keeper; this statement of a moral principle is probably J's contribution to the legend which in its original popular form is not likely to have risen to this height.

11. "The idea cannot be that the earth is a monster greedy of blood; it seems rather akin to the primitive superstition of a physical infection or poisoning of the soil, and through it of the murderer, by the shed blood" (Skinner, Genesis, p. 108; cf. Deut. 21:1-9).

12-15. Cain, hitherto like his father a tiller of the ground, is now condemned to be a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth. This is not a description of nomadism, for the nomad was no fugitive or aimless wanderer (cf. Theodor Nöldeke, "Amalek" in Encyclopaedia Biblica, ed. T. K. Cheyne and J. Sutherland Black [New York: The Macmillan Co., 1899], I, 130). Rather, it describes a completely cultureless existence from which Cain's descendants began to rise again only some generations later in the time of Jabal (vs. 20). Vss. 19-22 embody, however, as will be shown below, a tradition quite independent of this tale; i.e., in its origin the story of the crime of Cain was told with reference to the existence of some subnomad group, regarded—whether correctly or not—as so squalid that it was understood as being the result only of some heinous crime committed by one of their ancestors. The fact that this ancestor bears the name of Cain suggests that the group was of Kenite extraction. Eduard Meyer (Die Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme [Halle: M. Niemeyer, 1906], pp. 389-99) has cogently argued that the Kenites were in origin a clan of Israel's hated enemies, the Amalekites, and suggests, it would seem fairly, that the story in vss. 3-12 reflects Israel's opinion of them.

The mark which the Lord put on Cain (vs. 15) is, however, a protective mark, not the mark of a murderer, as the popular phrase, "the mark of Cain," implies. In vss. 13-15, therefore, Cain appears as the representative ancestor of a group under special divine protection and known for its custom of exacting sevenfold vengeance upon an aggressor. J would scarcely have dignified in this way the group against which he was directing his polemic. This suggests that vss. 13-15 are secondary, a suggestion which is supported by the facts: (a) The face of the ground in vs. 14 obviously means a certain

Cain, particularly of those who have responsibility in and for the fellowship of the Christian church: he may ask not only concerning those we may have hurt, but concerning those also whom we have neglected. Where are they whom we ought to have shepherded? Into what harm have they fallen because we were not diligent to keep them safe? Before that challenge, who will not need to bow down and confess his fault?

10-17. The Entail of Evil.—These verses are perplexing. According to the narrative up to this point, Adam and Eve and Cain and Abel were the only human beings on the earth. Abel now is dead, and so the population would seem to be reduced to three. Yet suddenly the picture changes to a world in which Cain is apprehensive that at any moment he may encounter other persons who will try to kill him, in which he finds a wife and marries, and presently builds a city. It would appear that here is a separate old story of Cain, perhaps a legend connected with the tribe of Kenites, which originally had nothing to do with the 14 Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me.

15 And the LORD said unto him, Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold. And the LORD set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him.

16 ¶ And Cain went out from the presence of the LORD, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the east of Eden.

17 And Cain knew his wife; and she conceived, and bare Enoch: and he builded a city, and called the name of the city, after the name of his son, Enoch.

than I can bear. 14 Behold, thou hast driven me this day away from the ground; and from thy face I shall be hidden; and I shall be a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth, and whoever finds me will slay me." 15 Then the LORD said to him, "Not so!ⁱ If any one slays Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold." And the LORD put a mark on Cain, lest any who came upon him should kill him. 16 Then Cain went away from the presence of the LORD, and dwelt in the land of Nod,^j east of Eden.

17 Cain knew his wife, and she conceived and bore Enoch; and he built a city, and called the name of the city after the name tract of territory—possibly Palestine—whereas the ground in vss. 10-12 means the ground and nothing else. (b) An inconsistency is involved in the representation that there were at the time hostile strangers in existence of whom Cain stood in fear. (c) The passage breaks the close connection between vs. 12, in which Cain is condemned to be a wanderer, and vs. 16, which states that Cain dwelt in the land of Nod, i.e., the land of Wandering. Vss. 13-15 thus being secondary, they may well have been added under pressure from the Kenite element in the tribe of Judah (cf. I Sam. 27:10; 30:29). Taking exception to the treatment of their eponymous ancestor in the original story, they secured the inclusion of this passage in mitigation. The tradition it embodies, that the descendants of Cain bore a special "mark"—cf. "the mark of Yahweh," vs. 1 as emended above—may well have originated among the Kenites subsequent to their adoption of Yahwism and their incorporation into the tribe of Judah. And the reference to the custom of sevenfold vengeance may well be authentic and so an indication that the Kenites were not—all of them at any rate—so depressed a group as vs. 12*b* implies.

16. This verse was thus in its original context the immediate continuation of vs. 12, and concluded the story of Cain. East of Eden is a gloss, possibly from the hand of the redactor who inserted the fragments of the Eden saga in ch. 3, certainly in dependence on those fragments.

B. CAIN'S DESCENDANTS (4:17-19)

17. This section continues the J genealogy begun in vss. 25-26, which had been interrupted by the story of Cain and Abel. The second half of the verse, depicting Cain as the originator of urban civilization, is obviously an intrusion, for J would never have represented city life as anterior to the rise of nomadism (vs. 20). Furthermore, the story of Adam and Eve but was linked by a later compiler with the narrative that began with the Garden of Eden. In that case, the chief purpose seems to have been to bring accumulating emphasis to the tragedy of human sin and its consequences. The disobedience of Adam and Eve in regard to the forbidden fruit is followed by the more deadly sin of Cain in the murder of his brother; and as the sin was worse, so was the punishment. Adam and Eve are expelled from Eden; Cain is driven from all the land that he had known, and doomed—as he himself sees his fate—to be a fugitive and a vagabond . . . in the earth. But the last part of vs. 14 and vs. 15 strike another note. Perhaps there is here an echo from dim old days of tribal feuds and vengeance, when one tribe let it be known that any killing of one of its members would have multiple retaliation. And conceivably there is the beginning of the instinct which led later to the establishment among the Israelites of the "cities of refuge," the purpose notice itself presents a certain difficulty in that Cain does not call the city after his own name, as would be expected, but after the name of his son. Thus, while the half verse echoes a tradition of the origin of city life independent of the tradition of the rise of nomadism, it is impossible to say whether it was primarily associated with Cain or with Enoch.

18. The figures listed here were presumably of some importance in the tradition upon which J was depending, but the role they played apparently had no bearing upon the origin and development of civilization, with which he is here concerned. He accordingly includes their names without comment.

19. He is similarly silent as to the original significance of Adah, Zillah, and Lamech—mentioned in the ancient poem preserved in vss. 23-24.

C. RISE OF NOMADISM (4:20-24)

20. According to this verse, nomadism—the life of those who dwell in tents and have cattle—was the first step in the development of civilization from the cultureless of which was to prevent the hasty and passionate putting to death of even the suspected criminal.

18-24. The Spirit of Lamech.—It is a curious fact that in this narrative the progress of the race from primitivism toward civilization is attributed to the descendants of Cain. Jabal is said to have been the father of those who dwell in tents. So begins the free movement of the nomad peoples. Jubal is the father of all those who play the lyre and pipe. So the arts begin with music. And Tubal-cain was the forger of all instruments of bronze and iron, and thus opened the way for the mastery of man over his environment. All this is described as done by men who were alienated from God, as though "the children of this world are in their generation wiser than the children of light" (Luke 16:8). And the accomplishments of Lamech's sons lead to the arrogant and boastful self-sufficiency of Lamech himself. As Marcus Dods puts it:

Lamech has no need of God for any purpose; what his sons can make and his own right hand do is enough for him. This is what comes of finding enough in the world without God—a . . . man . . . dangerous to society, the incarnation of the pride of life. In the long run separation from God becomes isolation from man and cruel self-sufficiency.⁶

⁶ The Book of Genesis (New York: A. C. Armstrong & Son, 1895; "The Expositor's Bible"), pp. 50-51.

It seems that to the mind of the Yahwist from whom this part of Genesis comes the whole course of history lay under the shadow of the evil that began in the Garden of Eden and that grew to more deadly expression in the sin of Cain. After the period of original innocence the progress of what might have been called civilization appeared to him as a moral declension that went on deepening until it was checked by the crisis and cleansing of the Flood. Cain was a murderer, but at least he had remorse; Lamech, his descendant, not only could kill but could celebrate the killing in the fierce triumph of his taunting song. It would be a gloomy conclusion if it had to be believed that all the development of man's material life as the race "spread itself abroad, made itself now more at home on the earth, and was able in its way to ease life of its burdens and to beautify it by advance in discoveries and accomplishments" ⁷ had to be associated with godlessness. Yet there is ground for serious meditation on the fact that the great resources of human knowledge and ability can be perverted by passion and pride. The freedom of the nomad can be turned into the warfare of predatory peoples long after the nomad stage has passed; and arts and scientific skill can be destructive forces in existence of the human race since the time of Cain. Since historically nomadism was not anterior to agriculture, this account of the origins of human culture comes from a nomadic group.

21. Jubal is represented as the originator of music. There is no suggestion here that his supposed descendants, the musicians, were in any way inferior to the full-blooded Bedouin that have cattle (vs. 20), or that they formed a separate "caste"; i.e., J is simply recording the origin of one of the skills which seemed to him to be important.

22. This verse should be emended, with Gunkel (Genesis, p. 53), to agree in form with vs. 20, 21, "He was the father of all forgers of bronze and iron," i.e., he was the originator of metalworking. Again, there is no suggestion that metalworkers formed a separate caste, such as is formed by the Solubby (Charles M. Doughty, Travels in Arabia Deserta [new and definitive ed., New York: Random House, 1946], I, 324-27)—a group who lived "partly by hunting, partly by coarse smith-work and other gipsy labor in the Arab encampments; they are forbidden by their patriarch to be cattle-keepers, and have no property save a few asses; they are excluded from fellowship and intermarriage with the regular Bedouin, though on friendly terms with them" (Skinner, Genesis, p. 113). If, however, as is suggested by Otto Procksch (Die Genesis [2nd and 3rd ed.; Leipzig: A. Deichert, 1924; "Kommentar zum Alten Testament"], p. 55), -cain is taken as a gloss on Tubal—its omission restores the name of Lamech's third son to the same form as the other two—by one who knew Cain (=smith) as the ancestor of the smiths, then in view of vs. 12*b* it may have been intended as a suggestion of their low-caste status.

The verse is silent as to the role filled by Naamah. In view of this, and of the fact that in the extant J material nothing is said of Noah's parentage—it is P who makes the hands of any human group that has lost its obedience to God.

One can remember that music has often been used to let the passions loose. The most primitive tribes had their tom-toms, and their hypnotic rhythms were devised to arouse the instincts of fear and retaliation and revenge that lurk in the jungles of the human heart. To read Vachel Lindsay's "The Congo," or to remember the terrible weird beating of the voodoo drums in Eugene O'Neill's Emperor Jones is to feel again the aboriginal savagery that music can express. Nor have the old appeals lost their power to evoke response. In times of mass excitement, is it not true that peaceful men and women may feel themselves moved to an irrational war hysteria by the marching music of brass bands?

To say that and to say no more would be of course to libel the meaning of music. It is written that "the morning stars sang together," as though in God's music of creation. The psalms are the singing of the human heart, sometimes—it is true—in bitterness and anger, but also in confession, praise, and adoration. And from the time of Palestrina on, who can measure the purifying and ennobling influence of great music in orchestras and choirs, in symphonies and chorales?

But all the same, does not the old shadow of Cain still represent an influence that we need to be aware of? Whether or not Cain's children started music, they seem too often to get hold of it. The primitive creeps back and seizes again what the higher genius of man has been trying to perfect. The blaring of jazz, the horrible croonings of advertisements on the radio, the reversion of "civilized" dances to the rhythms of African bushmen, have outdone Macbeth, who "murdered sleep." They are in the way of doing to death the higher appreciation, which prefers great music to miscellaneous noise.

And what of man's use of metals? The long story of human inventiveness is a thrilling record. The mastery of man over his physical him the son of Lamech (5:28)—it is not impossible that she was traditionally Noah's mother.

It may be noted here that the implication of vss. 20-22a is that Jabal, Jubal, and Tubal (-cain) were the "fathers" of the nomads, musicians, and metalworkers existing at the time of writing; i.e., that the author of this account of the origins of civilization knew nothing of the Flood.

23-24. These verses are, as Stade ("Beiträge zur Pentateuchkritik," pp. 295-96) and Eissfeldt (Hexateuch-Synopse, p. 255*) have argued, a secondary addition to the J narrative: (a) They are irrelevant to the purpose of that narrative, which is to describe the beginnings of civilization. (b) They are inconsistent with vss. 1-22, in which Cain is represented as an individual and an ancestor of Lamech; here he stands for a people and is a contemporary and rival of Lamech. (c) They refer to the Cain not of vs. 12b, but of vss. 13-15 already seen to be secondary. (d) The reappearance of Lamech after the mention of his sons is awkward in the extreme.

The poem, of great antiquity and so valuable for the reconstruction of cultural development, comes from a Cain-Lamech tradition. It may have been inserted as polemic against the secondary vss. 13-15.

24. Probably for is avenged should be read, with Gunkel (Genesis, p. 53, following Karl Budde, Die biblische Urgeschichte [Giessen: J. Ricker, 1883], p. 133), "avenges himself." This involves only a change in the vocalization of the Hebrew, which is in any case suspicious here (cf. E. F. Kautzsch, Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, tr. A. E. Cowley [2nd English ed.; Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1910], sec. 29 g).

environment has come through his use of tools. We tend to take for granted what we have inherited, but the amazing facts of our mechanized civilization are due to the nameless men who ages ago first conceived the wheel, forged instruments of bronze and then of iron, and thus laid the groundwork for all that inventive human genius has since accomplished (see Lewis Mumford, *Technics and Civilization*⁸). The O.T. was right when it thought of craftsmanship as one of the gifts of the Spirit of God (Exod. 31:2-3), for it has lifted the level of human life from a brutish struggle for existence to the possibility of abundance and beauty.

But here again there is the shadow of Cain. The prophet Isaiah dreamed of a day when men should "beat their swords into plowshares" (Isa. 2:4), but our world is in danger of reversing that process and beating its plowshares into swords. If mounting tensions between the nations continue, most of the fruits of human productivity will be sucked into military preparedness or into the immeasurable ruin of another world war for which we will have been so frenziedly prepared.

"I will give thee two thousand horses, if thou be able on thy part to set riders upon them" (Isa. 36:8). That was the taunt of Rabshakeh the Assyrian to the officers of Hezekiah king of Judah. The same ironic challenge is being given to the human race by destiny. We have already that which makes two thousand horses insignificant—the gigantic energy of machines which represent horsepower not by the thousands but by the billions. What riders can we set upon these horses? Can we train sufficient intelligence and enlist enough good will to master and direct their fearful forces? Or will our positive controls, being too feeble or too late, be shoved aside by other horsemen—the four horsemen of the Apocalypse, war and famine and pestilence and death? There is fateful need that Christian teachers and preachers shall make all people they can reach consider that!

D. WORSHIP OF THE LORD (4:25-26)

25. As has been argued above, this verse was in its original form the immediate continuation of 3:23. For Adam there stood in J "the man." Again, another, and instead of Abel, for Cain slew him are redactional harmonization by RP. Thus in the J tradition, as in that of P (5:3), Seth was the first child born into the world.

God has appointed for me, the first of the usually fanciful etymologies of the names of the heroes provided by J, derives Seth—lit., Shēth—from shith, appoint. Its real etymology is unknown. In this connection it may be noted that in Num. 24:17 "the sons of Sheth" refers to the Moabites, which indicates the existence of another tradition concerning Shēth, apparently familiar to J² since the words occur in the oracle he puts in the mouth of Balaam. However, the Balaam oracle seems to be an adaptation of an independent poem which J² has incorporated into his narrative at that point. It has been argued in the Intro. that vs. 25, now under consideration, is from J¹.

25-26. To God Through Children.—What is the meaning of then? It is not possible to know exactly what was in the mind of the one who wrote the clause beginning with that word, but there is room for much meditation here. It is after the reference to children being born that we come upon this: then began men to call upon the name of the Lord. It was a right time to do so. It always is and will be.

People who have not been much conscious of God before may well seek him when their children come. It is instinctive then to feel grateful to a Goodness which has given the miracle of life. "For this child I prayed," said Hannah (I Sam. 1:27). "My soul doth magnify the Lord," sang Mary (Luke 1:46). In every generation parents have felt that way. God has seemed more real; and suddenly they have known that he was more needed. It is one thing to manage—or suppose to manage—one's own life. It is another thing to face the responsibility for guiding the life of a little child. Every person worth speaking of would like to have then more wisdom and a purer will than he or she possesses. So a father and mother may call upon God—at least in seeming. Perhaps in seeming only. The child may be taught a prayer or two, though their own praying falls back into perfunctoriness or is forgotten altogether. Presently the child may be sent to Sunday school, for somebody else to teach him, while they stay at home. That sort of calling on God is hollowness, if not hypocrisy. But what if their calling is not that sort? What if they really want God? Then because of a child they can be led a long way.

Thoughtful parenthood can give a new sense of the nature of God. It is through the heart that God may be most surely faced and known. Many adults have grown up with nothing warmer than ideas about God; they have never been aware of him in any deep perception. But the coming of a little child may awaken an instinct that lies at a profounder level, for the best there is in a man and woman comes to expression when they take a baby in their arms. Then, if ever, they have a love that is outgoing and unselfish; and because they do have that they may find unfolding in themselves a new faith in a love that is greater than their own. For this truth expressed with the beauty of the poet's insight, read George MacDonald's lines beginning, "O Lord, I sit in Thy wide space," and Coventry Patmore's "The Toys."

When the thought of God is thus brought into parenthood, wide-reaching influences come with it. The first is the feeling that life is bigger than it ever seemed before. Whether a man or woman is religious or not, there may be a kind of biological exultancy in parenthood, but the one whose thoughts have turned to God has much more than that. This much more is the realization that one has been entrusted by the Creator of souls with a child's soul, not just with a child's body. Women often realize that more wonderingly than men, and that is the reason why mothers have again and again achieved the immense joy of walking in companionship with a child on an advancing road of consecration. Read the lives of John Wesley and of Phillips Brooks and see what their mothers meant to them. A father may have him." 26 To Seth also a son was born, and he called his name Enosh. At that time men began to call upon the name of the LORD.

26. The second half of the verse should read, following the LXX, "He was the man who began to call upon the name of the LORD." J thus reveals for the first time his interest in origins, here the origin of the cult of Yahweh. In vss. 20-22, as has been seen, he tells of the origins of nomadism, music, and metalworking; 6:2 is a fragment of his account of the origin of the Nephilim; 9:20, in its original form, told of the origin of viticulture, and back of it, as will be seen, is a lost passage ascribing the origin of agriculture also to Noah; 10:8 tells of the first of the Gibborim; and the nucleus of 11:1-9 is J's account of the origin of diverse languages.

J's narrative thus began with a story of some length in which, unlike the rest of the document, the name of Yahweh, the Lord, was not used; for J²—in this probably following J¹; cf. the use of "God" in the J¹ verse, 4:25—had refrained from employing it until after the notice now contained in 4:26b (cf. Budde, Biblische Urgeschichte, pp. 232-33), thus leaving open the possibility of the misconception that some deity other than Yahweh was the creator. It was to obviate this that some redactor inserted "the LORD"—Yahweh—before "God" wherever it occurred in the narrative. When, however, "God" occurred in a speech (3:1b, 3, 5; 4:25b) he did not insert "the LORD," in order to avoid contradicting the implication of 4:26b that the name of the Lord was unknown to man until the time of Enosh. It should be noted that Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 1-4 (where other proposed solutions are noted; cf. Skinner, Genesis, pp. 52-53), accounts for the double name "the LORD God" as resulting from the combination of two independent strands in the J material, one of which used "the LORD," the other, "God." Sigmund Mowinckel, The Two Sources of the Predeuteronomiac Primeval History (JE) in Gen. 1-11 (Oslo: J. Dybwad, 1937), pp. 44-61, maintains that there is an E strand in chs. 1-11, and ascribes the form to RJE.

this experience too. Every father might well write in his heart a prayer like this:

O God, who art our Father, take my human fatherhood and bless it with thy Spirit. Let me not fail this little son of mine. Help me to know what thou wouldst make of him, and use me to help and bless him. Make me loving and understanding, cheerful and patient and sensitive to all his needs, so that he may trust me enough to come close to me and let me come very close to him. Make me ashamed to demand of him what I do not demand of myself; but help me more and more to try to be the kind of man that he might pattern after. And this I ask in the name, and by the grace, of Christ. Amen.⁹

The thought of God when children come can create also self-discipline and self-sacrifice. There is enough of the divine innate in parenthood to create that on some level at least. At the end of World War II some of the illustrated magazines had a vivid article describing the American prisoners of the Japanese in Manila after they were released by MacArthur's armies from their long and bitter imprisonment. The men and women were emaciated, but they had managed to keep their children fed. A similar article describing German families two years after Germany's defeat and occupation showed how parents had lost weight and strength, but the rations which they denied themselves had kept the children relatively well. In ordinary times and places also there is an inspiring amount of everyday and unheralded nobility of sacrifice among the poor. Look at the innumerable men and women working for small wages who give to their children better clothes, more amusements, more small luxuries than they themselves ever have.

That is on the physical plane; but there is another level of life which religiously sensitive men and women will remember. Influenced by the thought of God, a father and mother can achieve a further and more constant kind of discipline and self-mastery. Careless habits of indulgence, dissipations that adults might take for granted but would be disillusioning to a child, begin to look ugly when a parent whose religious conscience has been awakened asks himself what these would do to his child's

V. DESCENDANTS OF ADAM (5:1-28)

This chapter is derived from P, with the exception of vss. 28b-29 which, taken from the J document, have been substituted by RP for "he became the father of Noah." In constructing the genealogy P seems to have been dependent on that of J (cf. 4:1, 17-18, 25-26), from which he has however departed, for reasons now irrecoverable, by transposing Mehujael=Mahalalel and Enoch. The ages assigned to each figure may depend upon some Babylonian tradition, though it should be noted that the figures given differ markedly in the M.T., Samar., and LXX. With this genealogy P bridged the period from the Creation to the Flood.

standards and his child's ideals. "These things have not hurt me too much," a parent might argue, and so keep on in habits which he knows are questionable; but when the coming of his child has made him think of God and ask himself whether these things will do hurt to God's possibilities in him, then many a man has called upon the name of the Lord for a new personal reformation, and has got it.

From the same source may come a larger wisdom. Most decent men and women would like to do what is advantageous for their children, but often they have a poor idea of what advantageous means. They may take the easy road of giving their children what they want, or what will cause least trouble, or what the general fashion says. If they have not faced life's great realities in the light of God they will not have learned that "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom" (Ps. 111:10), and the love of the Lord is the fulfillment of it.

That kind of shallow worldliness leads to nothing that is great. It is only when the thought of God is brought to bear upon the facts and the choices of life that one sees what things are mean and cheap, and what things are worth desiring. Love for a child can lead a man and woman to understand that only that which is true to the spirit of God is completely blessed, and that only God can make their devotion wise.

5:1-32. The Lineage of the Chosen People.—In this long chapter there is indicated the ruling purpose of the priestly writers to whose influence is due so much of the ultimate structure of Genesis. They desired to show that the history of Israel was no human accident, but that from the beginning it had been shaped by the sure and sovereign will of God. Out of humanity in general God had been sifting a particular people who should embody his plan, with whom he would make his covenant, and through whom he would give his special revelation. That is why the genealogies are set forth in such meticulous detail. To the modern reader they may seem to be a dull catalogue; but to those who wrote them, and to those who understood their purpose, they were the cardinal guarantee of Israel's divine preferment. The line which begins with Adam is channeled through Seth and his descendants down to the righteous Noah (vss. 30-32), through Noah's son Shem to Abraham (11:10-26), through Abraham to Isaac and Jacob. The overruling directness of God's choice is emphasized by the fact that repeatedly the elder son is set aside in favor of the younger one whom God had chosen. So Ishmael must give place to Isaac (17:18-21), and Esau is supplanted by Jacob; and Joseph, next to the youngest among twelve brothers, becomes the greatest among Jacob's sons.

Thus the priestly writers, both in direct expression and by incorporating the older narratives of J and E into their pattern, held to their unswerving aim of maintaining that the one controlling purpose which has given meaning to history from the moment of the Creation is God's shaping of a people fit to become a theocracy. The great prophets, beginning with Amos, had exalted the conception of God from that of the jealous deity of one people to that of the Lord of impartial justice and of universal sway. At the height of the prophetic vision the little bounds of race and particularity were transcended. But the priestly writers had a more intense and specialized concern. As R. H. Pfeiffer has described it:

The aim of the Priestly Code is to show how the only God in existence became the invisible sovereign of the Jewish community. From the moment when God created heaven and earth, his one purpose, according to P, was to separate Israel from the other nations, reveal his Law, give his covenant, and provide a country for it.¹

Ten times occurs the introductory phrase, or its equivalent, "These are the generations of" (vs. 1; 2:4; 6:9; 11:10, 27; 25:12, 19; 36:1; 37:2; 35:22b); and as Pfeiffer puts it:

The racial history of Israel in P is like a funnel comprising ten rings of decreasing size, down to the extremely small but all-important tube at its bottom—the theocratic community. This racial history is purely genealogical and chronological—nothing else matters in vital statistics.²

This was a lofty belief. For any people to hold the faith that God has given it an immortal destiny is to lift its life up above the common considerations of this earth. Such a people can rise superior to delays and disappointments because they trust in him with whom a day is as a thousand years and a thousand years as one day. They have that within their soul which can sing, in the words of a modern hymn:

O beautiful for patriot dream
That sees, beyond the years,
Thine alabaster cities gleam, Undimmed by human tears! *

Through their conviction that the future, like its present, would be held in the hands of God,

Israel has had the unconquerable fortitude which has enabled it to outlast persecution and disaster; and it was in large part the priestly writers who gave that conviction. Similarly, for any people today, it is only as men arise who can give to their nation a comparable sense of religious meaning and religious mission that the nation's flame of life will burn so bright that the winds of time cannot extinguish it.

Yet it must also be said that there is a reverse side to the picture of what the priestly writers did for Israel—and what men of the same intensity of purpose may do for any people. The danger was that they could make the thought of Israel hard and narrow. It is a glorious thing to believe in a great destiny, but only when that destiny is conceived with generous imagination. To think of destiny in terms of a nation's own exaltation, and of that alone, is to bring abasement. That was the risk which Israel would run—and which every nation runs when its pride supposes that it has conscripted God to be its exclusive ally, instead of committing itself to be the instrument of God's grace for all mankind.

5. Death.—Eight times in this chapter the words and he died occur. They represent that recognition of the inevitability of death which sounds through all history like the strokes of an iron bell. There is a double element in human nature which makes the fact of death so tragic. Man is akin to all animal existence in that every individual dies. He is different from the animal in that he is conscious of dying, foresees it, and feels its contradiction of his insatiable hunger for life. Nor does the universality of death dull its poignancy:

That loss is common would not make
My own less bitter, rather more.
Too common! Never morning wore
To evening, but some heart did break.⁴

How have men tried to deal with death in their efforts to overcome it? There is the belief that existence here may somehow be prolonged. The stories of the patriarchs with their immense longevity are a sort of wistful reflection of what men have liked to believe might be. But later in the O.T. the imaginary hope has faded. "The days of our years are three score years and ten" (Ps. 90:10). In the twentieth century there has actually been a new prolongation of life. In the United States at the halfway mark of the century there were six million persons over seventy years of age, and the expectancy is that this will increase to ten million in fifteen years and to fifteen million not long afterward. The average age is lengthening. Nevertheless there comes the inescapable end. "Though men be so strong that they come to fourscore years, yet is their strength then but labour and sorrow; so soon passeth it away, and we are gone" (Book of Common Prayer, Ps. 90:10).

Or men may attempt to ignore the coming of death by steeping themselves in material satisfactions. Optimism imagines a life and an age so comfortable and rich that its transiency can be forgotten. Consider Jesus' parable of the rich man and his stored-up barns, who thought he had "much goods laid up for many years" (Luke 12:19). Compare with that the weary cynicism of the book of Ecclesiastes.

Or men have tried to drown death in dissipation. The emptiness of that effort also is reflected in Ecclesiastes. As a parable of the failure of men thus to drown the fear of death, read Edgar Allan Poe's "The Masque of the Red Death."

Again, men may grasp the hope that though they themselves die they somehow live on in the lives of their children or their nation. This was the hope that grew up in Israel. Its negative aspect is seen from the time of the patriarchs onward in the dread of being childless. Its positive side appears in the noble devotion to the future of Israel which the prophets represent.

But in the end there is the longing of the individual soul for life which cannot be put off with any substitute. It is not a mere selfish wish for continued existence. It represents the instinctive faith that the highest values we know of in this universe, the life and loving loyalty which are expressed in particular human souls, ought not to be extinguished.

Consider what this faith rests upon and how it may be strengthened and assured. The finer a life is in moral purpose, the more it keeps its spirit sensitive to goodness and to truth, the more its faith in the indestructibility of a soul will grow. Remember the lines of In Memoriam:

A warmth within the breast would melt
The freezing reason's colder part.⁵

So the fire of brave and generous emotions can burn away the fog and chill of doubt.

The more one is related to some great cause, the more one feels that life has too great a dignity to be destroyed by death. See the last pages of Wilfred Grenfell, What Life Means to Me.⁶

Companionship with lovely persons is the highest human fortification to faith. Looking at ourselves, we might doubt our worthiness to go on living. Looking at some others whom we love, we know that death could not destroy them unless the whole universe were irrational. See the last chapter in George Herbert Palmer, Life of Alice Freeman Palmer, his wife. Read the chapter "Bereavement" in W. R. Inge, Personal Religion and the Life of Devotion.⁷

Finally, there is the fact of Jesus. The nearer one comes to him in thought and spiritual companionship the stronger is the faith that the cross and the grave could not and did not conquer him, and that we can trust his promise, "Because I live, ye shall live also" (John 14:19).

22-24. The Man Who Walked with God.—Is there a re-enforcement of the thought suggested by 4:26 (see Expos.) in the statement that Enoch walked with God after he begat Methuselah? Whether or not the ancient writer explicitly meant to say so, certainly it is true that often the first real turning of a man's heart toward God comes as the result of some deep experience that awakens in him new emotions: a great joy, a blessed responsibility, a sorrow, a relationship that stirs the profundities of his soul. The description of Enoch shines like a single brilliant star above the earthy record of this chapter. The significance of many men may perish with their bodies. Their achievements have to do only with material things. They may sew their tents, raise their cattle, make their musical instruments, and work in brass and iron (4:20-22). But the man who towers in meaning above all the others is the man who walks with God.

Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him. Note, as the Exeg. has stated, that this chapter comes from P. Therefore it is much later than the parts of the book which have come from J and E and may reflect conceptions not existing in their day. In the early history of Israel there seems to have been no expectation of personal immortality. The only way in which a man's spirit might survive would be in his children or in the clan and nation. Or if he did survive, it would be only as a shadowy wraith in Sheol. But gradually there grew the increasing sense of the dignity and enduring worth of the individual human soul. Life on earth might be so linked with Spirit that it would go on beyond the gates of death. That belief seems to be shining here.

What a haunting phrase it is: He was not; for God took him! There is no effort to elaborate upon the mystery of death or to presume in human terms to define what lies beyond it. Only the one great conception: when the good man dies God takes him and he goes to be with God. He goes to be with God because he has learned to be with God already. See what limitless suggestions there are in the brief and simple words, he walked with God. Hubert L. Simpson has a lovely paragraph concerning Enoch:

One day Enoch's place upon earth was empty, and the people who had known him drew their own conclusions. He had been known as the inti-

VI. BEGINNING OF AGRICULTURE (5:29-32)

29. For bring us relief the LXX reads "cause us to rest"—a translation of the Hebrew yenihēnū—a reading which is to be accepted as providing a more satisfactory etymology for Noah than does the M.T. Now yenihēnū can also bear the meaning "cause us to settle down" (cf. Deut. 3:20). In view of J¹'s representation of Noah as the first husbandman, it seems likely that "this one shall cause us to settle down" was the explanation given of the name Noah in that document. For J² the first man, not Noah, was the originator—however unwilling—of agriculture. He accordingly added from our work and from the toil of our hands, thus taking yenihēnū to mean "cause us to rest." In the Hebrew the clause rendered out of the ground which the LORD has cursed comes after from the toil of our hands; furthermore there is a certain awkwardness in the use of the preposition min with different meanings—out of and from—in the two parts of the sentence. These facts may indicate that the clause, clearly dependent on 3:17, was added by a later hand (Holzinger, Genesis, p. 60) to relate the notice more closely mate of God; and what more natural than that, when night fell, he should have gone home with his Friend? A little girl was telling the story of Enoch in her own way. "Enoch and God," she said, "used to take long walks together. And one day they walked further than usual; and God said, 'Enoch, you must be tired; come into My house and rest.'" ^s

Thought may dwell further upon the analogy of walking together, for it has much to say concerning the life of prayer and communion which must be the prelude to the immortal hope. To walk together with a human friend has clear meanings which have their reverent expansions in what it means to walk with God. It is to have the same goal and so to be moving in the same direction. It is to have the serene and happy sense of companionship upon the way. And it is to have unforced, spontaneous conversation as one goes along: sometimes to keep silence and just feel the other's presence, sometimes to speak out what is in one's mind and heart, sometimes to listen to what the greater Friend will tell us of the road, what to look for on it, and the goal to which we go.

27. The Dimensions of Life.—Everybody who has read the Bible or studied the old catechisms remembers Methuselah as the oldest man. "Old as Methuselah" has become a byword. Yet a physician, commenting humorously, once said that even Methuselah might have lived longer. Consider the dates in chs. 5 and 7: Methuselah, 187 years old when Lamech was born; Lamech, 182 years when Noah was born; Noah, 600 years when the Flood came. Add together 187, 182, and 600, and the total is 969. And Methuselah was 969 when he died. So, asks the physician, was he drowned in the Flood? Did even Methuselah die prematurely? But for the Flood, might he have been living yet? At any rate, according to the story, he lived longer than anybody else. He has become the symbol of longevity.

There is beauty and blessing in long life. One of the promises in the psalms is "with long life will I satisfy him" (Ps. 91:16). All normal people want to live long. This earth is not "a to the tragic story in ch. 3. The reading of the M.T., bring us relief, is thus a further change in the same direction.

It may be noted that the verse in the form it held in J² implies that the speaker is eventually to share in the blessings of the new life to be inaugurated by Noah. This suggests that J² may have included Noah's parents in his "house" (7:1) which went with him into the ark.

vale of tears," but a place of interest, activity, rich experience. Good reason, therefore, to preach and teach the kind of thoughtful common sense and consideration that makes for physical health and vigorous life. Dissipation shortens life. Carelessness shortens it. The gift of long life which God has intended can be thrown away by those who let their bodies become so flabby that they have no physical resistance. The toll of automobile smash-ups and needless accidents also is terrific. (What is the actual number of them in whatever year these words are read?) Nor is this only an individual problem. It is a social one. What about the multitudes with substandard incomes who cannot afford medical care? What about workers inadequately insured against maiming and crippling in industries? There is a social duty to assure a man that he shall not be robbed of God's gift of life and soundness. But longevity is not all. All the days of Methuselah were nine hundred sixty and nine years: and he died. That is all that could be said of him. His life was long, but thin as a string.

There is another dimension which life needs. It must have not only length but breadth. Though, in Robert Louis Stevenson's words, "the world is so full of a number of things," some people let their minds sink into narrow grooves. Preoccupied with petty things, they do not cultivate new interests. Therefore life grows unnecessarily cramped and drab. William Lyon Phelps wrote, "The happiest man is the man who has the most interesting thoughts." In our actual world, with its newspapers, its periodicals and magazines in reach of everybody, its libraries, its museums, its crowding opportunities for new ideas and new interests, there is no reason why any life should lack intelligent breadth. Some of the men who have most intense and exacting responsibilities are those whose interests range out with happiest spontaneity. Broadening one's interests is not primarily dependent upon having more time—or less—than somebody else. It is a matter of being alert and alive. Consider the value of hobbies: Franklin D. Roosevelt collecting and studying stamps, Winston Churchill painting. See Arnold Bennett, How to Live on 24 Hours a Day.⁹

If the range of thought can broaden, so also can the range of sympathy. The man who makes many friends has breadth. The man who looks out on the world with generous human understanding can create the public mood which will keep nations from falling into grooves of jealous self-interest and instead will make their policies broaden toward world co-operation and peace.

Length and breadth—but there is a third dimension needed. It is the vertical one. In some aspects that may be called depth, in others, height. The shallow lake, no matter how long or wide it is, may stagnate. It needs the depth of new inflowing water to keep it vital. A landscape that is all flat plain may be depressing. Men who have ever known the mountains want to see them again. There is an instinct in human souls that needs to reach down to great convictions and to reach up to great hopes and faiths. A horrible punishment in some of the medieval dungeons was to put men in cells where they could not stand erect. Yet some of us condemn ourselves spiritually to an existence like that. We live confined in ideas and insights so low-ceilinged that the soul cannot stand up. We must get out under the open skies and stars.

A life may be great without great length. It may still be significant even if it has not had a

6 And it came to pass, when men began to multiply on the face of the earth, and daughters were born unto them,

2 That the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all which they chose.

6 When men began to multiply on the face of the ground, and daughters were born to them, 2 the sons of God saw that the daughters of men were fair; and they took to wife such of them as they chose.

VII. SONS OF GOD AND DAUGHTERS OF MEN (6:1-4)

The nucleus of this tale is a brief notice of the origin of the Nephilim, a mythical race of giants referred to again in Num. 13:33. It is preserved in part in vs. 2, which originally concluded with some such sentence as "and they conceived and bare the Nephilim" (cf. Budde, Biblische Urgeschichte, p. 38; Skinner, Genesis, p. 146). The Nephilim were thus represented as semidivine, the offspring of the sons of God and the daughters of men.

The interest in origins (cf. 4:20-22) suggests that the notice is from the hand of J¹, in whose narrative it probably occurred immediately before the account of the origin of diverse peoples (11:4-8; cf. Julius Wellhausen, Die Composition des Hexateuchs [2nd ed.; Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1889], p. 14).

Having inserted, as will be seen, the story of the Flood into the narrative of his predecessor, J² placed this notice after the account of how the Lord had "scattered [the descendants of Noah] abroad . . . over the face of all the earth" (11:8), prefixing to it vs. 1, in which the face of the ground (cf. vs. 7; 7:4, 23; 8:8, 13) is an indication of his hand; "the face of all the earth" in 11:8 is, as will be seen, from J¹.

It is to be noted that there is in vss. 1-2 no suggestion of reprobation of the conduct of the sons of God and the daughters of men; the passage is simply a "scientific" notice of origins, an objective statement of "fact."

The beliefs that among the early inhabitants of the earth were men of great stature and that marriages of the gods with mortals frequently occurred are found in other ancient literatures (see Skinner, Genesis, p. 140, for references). And in the O.T. there are numerous references to the one-time existence of giants (e.g., Num. 13:33, already cited; cf. Josh. 15:14; Deut. 1:28; 2:10, 11, 21; 9:2; Amos 2:9).

For RP this marriage of divine and human beings was infamous and demanded punishment. He accordingly placed the story in its present position, omitted the sentence with which the notice in vs. 2 had originally concluded, and added the groundwork of vss. 3-4, later expanded. The episode thus became in his composition—the Pentateuch, practically in its present form—the culminating act of human wickedness before the Flood.

6:2. The sons of God—not, be it noted, "the sons of Yahweh"—is the designation of the heavenly host in Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7 (cf. also Pss. 29:1; 89:6; see ASV mg.).

chance to broaden much. But it cannot be true life unless it has depth and height. Against a life like that of Methuselah stand the infinite dimensions of the life of Christ. By the world's calendar, it was only some thirty years long. But it was wide as the needs of man, and deep and high as the love of God.

6:1-3, 4b. Out of the Past.—No one can say surely what these verses mean. They come from some period of primitive thought which is dim to our perception. Were the sons of God rebellious and fallen angels, as Milton conceived them in Paradise Lost? Were they deities like the Greek gods who came down from Mount Olympus to consort with the daughters of men? In either case there is the projection here of an ancient fantasy that is inconsistent with the higher faith of Genesis. Apparently the compilers included this fragment of an ancient myth because it was too familiar to be ignored. But though it has a likeness to the traditions of other lands, there is a difference. In the Homeric epics the love-making of the gods is simply a dramatic tale that is unconcerned with any moral judgments; but here in the biblical account there is the judgment of the Lord. Be-

3. The first half of the verse is from RP. Its secondary character (cf. Smend, Erzählung des Hexateuch, p. 26; Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse, pp. 255*-56*) is indicated by the abruptness of its beginning and by the fact that it is a non sequitur, since there is no indication in vss. 1-2 that the Lord's Spirit was in any way involved in the action of the sons of God. But his days shall be a hundred and twenty years is a gloss either to the effect that the Flood would occur in a hundred and twenty years' time, thus placing the action of the sons of God before the birth of Noah's sons (cf. 5:32; 7:6), or perhaps making some cryptic reference to the age of Moses.

4. In the statement that there were giants in the earth in those days RP denies that the Nephilim were a semidivine race wiped out by the Flood; they were simply cause of the sin of the daughters of men the life span of human beings is reduced.

Yet if there is value in these verses it is not in anything they directly say, but in something which by contrast they suggest. In the old mythology, when the gods came down to earth, they came for their own gratification. They used human beings for their transient purposes and left them behind when they went back to their Olympus. The story of the Bible comes to its climax in the record of One "who, though he was in the form of God, did not count equality with God a thing to be grasped, but . . . taking the form of a servant, . . . humbled himself and became obedient unto death, even death on a cross" (Phil. 2:6-8); and who, when he went home to his Father, said to those on earth to whom he had brought his redeeming love, "In my Father's house are many mansions. . . . I go to prepare a place for you" (John 14:2).

4a. The Twisted Judgments of Fear.—To imagination there always are giants. Distant facts grow legendary and larger, like mountains capped with clouds. With men of the time of Genesis, belief in giants was entirely literal. They listened to stories about them with the same unquestioning and fascinated wonder that children have when they hear of a giant in their fairy tales. They were not thinking merely of men larger than ordinary men but still somewhere within the reach of normal measurements, not merely of huge persons like Goliath, who was said to have been more than nine feet tall. They meant giants as the credulous and unspoiled imagination sees them—huge portentous creatures beside whom the human being is like a midget.

In later and more sophisticated times the conception of giants is no longer literal, but it may be no less significant. Men hear of forces which they do not yet know, or begin to describe them dimly in the distance, and their imagination makes them look tremendous. They are not quite delivered from the shadow of the ancient fear—fear of the unknown which seems to them gigantic. Men in the time of Caleb still were haunted by it, and their blood could chill at what somebody else told them had been seen. Read the vivid story of the spies in Num. 13-14. Moses sends them out to scout the land in advance of the people of Israel, to see what the opportunities are and also what obstacles may have to be encountered. Ten out of the twelve men come back in panicky excitement, "All the people that we saw . . . are men of a great stature. And there we saw the giants, . . . and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight" (Num. 13:32-33). That is what they thought, or thought they thought, and the more they told their tale the more it was magnified. But the proof that what they said they saw was no such thing is in the fact that two other better-balanced men who saw exactly what they saw came back completely cool and undismayed. They had seen no giants. Instead, what they saw was a delectable land they ought to occupy, with no difficulties too great for them to overcome.

The old facts can be a modern parable. In moral and spiritual matters men may move in the old shadowland of fearful apprehension where they will think that they are seeing giants. Or they may look instead at reality with steady eyes, seeing it for what it is, neither less nor more, and going out to meet it as brave was in no way due to their parentage. And men should. Reflect upon the examples in history and the instances in everyday experience of those who see giants where no real giants exist. Scan the whole record of the people of Israel in the march through the wilderness toward the Promised Land as recorded in Exodus and Numbers. They were continually magnifying difficulties, hesitating, balking, and complaining. Note Num. 14:1. See John Mark turning back at Perga (Acts 13:13). Consider in the history of the War Between the States the failure of McClellan through overcaution and apprehensive exaggeration of the strength of the forces arrayed against him. Read in D. S. Freeman's *R. E. Lee*¹⁰ of the similar failure of Longstreet at Gettysburg. Think of men and women now whose first impulse in the face of a hard assignment is to tell themselves that it cannot be carried through. Think also of those who discourage every program for social advance and betterment, seeing all the old evils in successive generations, slavery, peonage, economic exploitation, degrading poverty, imperialism, war, as giants which there is no sense trying to cope with.

What produces that defeatist spirit? A clinging to the past, its habits of thought and its associations; a self-indulgent craving for former satisfactions and the unwillingness to leave these as part of the price for the greater possibilities that lie ahead; halfheartedness in a task which requires men wholeheartedly committed; and out of these emotional faults and failures, a rationalization of the entire fact which creates alleged good reasons for doubting and avoiding what there is not will to do. On the other hand, who are the men that, like Caleb and Joshua, will face the untried confidently, appraise difficulties without distortion, and scorn the superstitious fear that dangers a little greater than the usual may prove to be gigantic? What makes this kind of men? A purpose that fills their minds and masters positively their imaginations; the courage that comes from complete commitment; and, in all religious men, the dominating faith in the divine assistance which makes them sure that there can be no insuperable obstacles in their way. In the war for the liberation of the Netherlands, after the dreadful siege and fall of Haarlem, the Prince of Orange wrote in 1573 to Diedrich Sonoy, lieutenant governor of the province of North Holland:

You ask if I have entered into a firm treaty with any great king or potentate, to which I answer, that before I ever took up the cause of the oppressed Christians in these provinces, I had entered into a close alliance with the King of kings; and I am firmly convinced that all who put their trust in Him shall be saved by his almighty hand.¹

4b. The Glamour of Yesterday.—If the thought of giants (see Expos. on vs. 4a) carried an aura of dread, here in the mighty men, . . . men of renown there is a note of human pride; yet it is pride in reverse, as though the writer of the words turned from contemplation of contemporary life, as small and common, to imagination of a time when it was great. The mighty men . . . were of old. How familiar that sounds! Again and again we hear the suggestion that in other times there were men of lofty stature in mind and morals, whereas now there are no great men, but only such as are ordinary and inadequate. That may sound like reverence for the past, but actually it may be a weak pretext by which an indolent cynicism avoids the responsibility which the recognition of present greatness would impose upon choice and action. To complain that there are no commanding leaders is a convenient excuse for not arousing oneself to any positive allegiance. But it is a poor self-deception. Seldom in any generation have the majority of the people acknowledged the greatness of the great. Martin Luther was treated with contempt by most of those who might have seen his immense significance; so were John Wesley, and Lord Shaftesbury, and Wilberforce. Washington was vilified, so was Lincoln, so was Franklin Roosevelt. It is easier and more comfortable to build the tombs of dead prophets than to recognize the challenging authority of present greatness. But to let imagination be sluggish and the will contemptuous can prevent the appearance in any era of the mighty men . . . of renown who might bring their magnificent contribution, and can leave

VIII. THE FLOOD (6:5-9:19)

This section is from the hand of RP, who conflated the J recension of the flood story with that of P, using the latter, which he has preserved intact, as the groundwork of his narrative and fitting into it, with certain omissions and with some dislocation, the material of J. RP's narrative has been subjected to some slight elaboration, but the additions are for the most part of little importance.

The J Recension.—Contradicting as it does the implications of 4:20-22, noted above, the J recension is from J². It told of the Lord's distress at the wickedness of man (cf. 6:5-7) and of his decision to blot out [all life] from the face of the ground (6:7)—the face of the ground is a characteristic expression of J in this story (cf. 7:4, 23; 8:8, 13)—saving only Noah (6:8) and his household. He therefore commanded Noah to build an ark; the account of this and of Noah's fulfillment of the command has been dropped by RP in favor of the elaborate version of P (6:14-22). Only when the ark had been finished did the Lord tell Noah of his intention to cause forty days' rain upon the earth which would begin in seven days' time, and command Noah and his household to enter the ark with seven of each kind of clean animal—i.e., of each kind of animal used in sacrifice—and one pair of each kind of unclean (cf. 7:1-5). Thus, according to J², Noah built the ark in faith, not knowing its purpose but simply obeying the Lord's command. During the seven days intervening between the announcement of the coming rain and its beginning he was busy, it is implied, assembling the animals.

The next section of the J narrative has been broken up by RP to make it fit into the representation of P. In its original order it seems to have told how at the end of seven days the Flood began (7:10). Noah and his household thereupon entered the ark (7:7), and the LORD shut him in (7:16*b*). The rain lasted forty days and forty nights (7:12) and floated the ark (7:17*b*), and every living thing died except Noah and those with him in the ark (7:22). The waters then began to disappear (8:3*a*), and the ark came to rest—the J notice of this is now missing, having been dropped in favor of 8:4 (P). Following the threefold sending out of the dove (8:6, 8-12) Noah left the ark—the J notice of this is also missing—and offered a sacrifice to the Lord, who resolved—said in his heart—never again to destroy all life (8:20-22).

The Babylonian Flood Story.—It is generally recognized that this story is ultimately based upon the Babylonian myth preserved in the Gilgamesh Epic (see Skinner, Genesis, pp. 175-76). According to this, the gods decided to send a flood upon the earth. One of them, Ea, resolved to save his favorite, the mortal Utnapishtim and, without divulging the gods' capricious intention, commanded him to build a ship of definite dimensions to preserve his life. Utnapishtim, discerning the reason for this command, complied—the field open to the imagined giants of fatalistic evil. Which type of men shall religious people believe in and thus help create?

5-13. When Man Revolts Against God.—God who created man for goodness, but evil rampant on the earth: that is the contradiction recognized in the ancient narrative and still recurring. In the play *The Green Pastures*² one may read a graphic suggestion of the kinds of evil God had to contemplate as he regarded his world; and what with the general rowdiness and miscellaneous irresponsibility, it was no wonder that impatient Gabriel was always begging the Lord that he might blow his trumpet for the Judgment. What would Gabriel say now? The wickedness of man was great in the earth, and . . . every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually; . . . and the earth was filled with violence. If that was true in the days of Noah what of the century which has seen the brutal violence of two world wars, the extermination camps of Buchenwald and Belsen and Oswiecim, the massacre of millions of Jews, murder, starvation, mass cruelty beyond imagination? "What is the compare the representation of J that Noah built the ark in faith, not knowing its purpose (cf. 7:4-5)—and entered the ship with his family and dependents, taking with him a number of animals. The storm raged for six days and all mankind was destroyed. On the seventh day Utnapishtim sent out three birds in succession (cf. 8:8-12). The first two, a dove and a swallow, returned to him, but the third, a raven, did not. Whereupon Utnapishtim released the animals and, leaving the ship, offered sacrifices, and “the gods smelt the goodly savor” (cf. 8:21).

Legends of a universal flood are found in almost every part of the world (see Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 74-76; Skinner, Genesis, pp. 174-75). There can be little doubt that where they have not been borrowed from alien traditions they go back to some natural event, local in its extent. A universal flood such as J² describes, to say nothing of P's account, would of course be a physical impossibility. The Babylonian myth is presumably based upon a particularly devastating inundation of the Euphrates Valley (cf. Harold Peake, The Flood [New York: R. M. McBride & Co., 1930]).

J's Revision.—The myth of the Flood, it may be assumed, was, like the creation myth, ultimately carried to Palestine—the Babylonian element in the civilization of Palestine before the Israelite conquest is witnessed to by the Amarna letters which are written in cuneiform. There it became a part of the cultural tradition into which the Israelites entered when they settled in the land. This J², writing in the interests of Israelite monotheism, related to Yahwism. The most significant feature of his adaptation of it is, of course, his representation that the Flood was not the result of malicious divine caprice—an impossible idea for him, holding as he did the Mosaic concept of the Lord as the God of righteousness—but was sent by the Lord in punishment for man's wickedness (6:5-8). Congruent with this is the reason given for the saving of Noah. He found favor in the eyes of the LORD (6:8), not through capricious choice, such as governed Ea's favoring of Utnapishtim, but because he was righteous (7:1).

This adaptation, it may be noted, was not too skillfully made, for in J²'s narrative 6:5 followed immediately upon 5:29 which seems to have been, with 5:28*b*, the continuation of 4:20-22; i.e., he nowhere suggested before 6:5 that wickedness was increasing on the earth—the crime of Cain was several generations back. This is a significant indication of J²'s hierarchy of values. Artist though he was and a master of style, literary values were for him always subordinate to moral considerations. There could be no tampering with the idea of the righteousness of God.

The P Recension.—It has been argued above that P in writing his creation story was dependent on J's revision of the Babylonian myth Enuma eliš. It seems probable shape of the earth?” asked a schoolteacher, and one small pupil replied, “My Daddy says the shape of the earth is a mess.”

A world revolting not only against God's ideals but against the most elemental decencies: that has been the fact. And the root of it? One phrase suggests it: Every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. What men are and what the world is depend upon the conceptions they set up for their inward eyes to see and obey. As a man “thinketh in his heart, so is he” (Prov. 23:7). Imagination creates its images, and images may become idols that take the place of God. The surest way to keep them out is to be sure that God comes in. The guarantee against corrupting thoughts is to fill the mind and heart with wholesome ones. Remember Jesus' parable of the house swept and garnished and left empty, and invaded then by seven devils worse than the one that had been driven out (Luke 11:24-26). Psychology reinforces what religion had always instinctively perceived, that evil cannot be overcome by argument; evil must be overcome by good. Consider the critical significance for the individual of prayer, since prayer at its purest is not words of ours, but waiting—the waiting of the open soul for God to enter. Consider the immense social problem and opportunity of right programs of public education, in order that accepted ideals of the sacredness of human personality, of justice, generosity, and brotherhood, may be strong enough to block the entrance or re-entrance of perversions such as fascism or a Marxism that is wholly materialistic; that the kind of democracy which has been the British ideal of liberty and “the American dream” may have its own antitoxin to dictatorship; that the religion which the fathers followed may keep the loyalty of their therefore that here again he was drawing not immediately on the Gilgamesh Epic but on J²'s adaptation of it. The reason for the Flood, of course, remained the same—human wickedness (6:9-22). There is a departure however from J in the representation that Noah, when commanded to build the ark, was at the same time apprised of the disaster which was coming (6:13, 17). Whether, in the mention of pitch—bitumen—(6:14) and in the representation that God, in giving the command, specified the dimensions of the ark (6:14-17), P was drawing on the earlier myth, or whether, as seems more probable—compare the reference to the window of the ark in 8:6 (J²)—these details were in some form included by J² it is impossible to say, since the J parallel is lacking. J²'s distinction between clean and unclean animals he ignored, for in his theory this distinction was first made by divine precept at Sinai (Lev. 11:1-30), and two only of each kind were taken into the ark (6:19). For J² the Flood was the result of forty days' rain. P, perhaps realizing that this could not account for such a catastrophe as the tale depicted, told of the unleashing of the subterranean waters and of the opening of the windows of heaven so that the waters above the firmament (cf. 1:6) poured down (7:11) for one hundred and fifty days (7:24). Then the waters began to subside, and the ark came to rest upon the mountains of Ararat (8:1, 2a, 3b, 4), but it was not until a year and ten days had elapsed since the beginning of the Flood that the earth was dried (8:5, 13a, 14) and Noah was commanded to leave the ark (8:15-19). The sending out of the dove was omitted—for according to P Noah did nothing without explicit divine command. J²'s representation of him as acting independently is thus more in accordance with the Babylonian original in which Utnapishtim is designated the "superlatively clever one" (Skinner, Genesis, p. 176). All reference to Noah's sacrifice was also omitted in accordance with P's theory that no sacrifice was ever offered until God commanded it at Sinai (Lev. 1). Instead it is recorded that God now made a covenant with Noah never again to destroy all flesh by the waters of a flood (9:8-11) and made the rainbow the sign of the covenant (9:12-17; on 9:1-7 see Exeg.).

A. MAKING OF THE ARK (6:5-22)

5. The word rendered imagination is yēçer. Although it is used with this meaning in only five other places in the O.T. (8:21; Deut. 31:21; I Chr. 28:9; 29:18; Isa. 26:3), the word came to be of extraordinary significance in Jewish thought. It is used in Eccles. 15:14, "He [God] himself made man from the beginning, and left him in the hand of his counsel [yēçer]." This verse is part of Ben Sirach's explanation of the presence of moral evil in God's creation. Its origin is within man—a thought to which the author gives further sardonic expression in Eccles. 21:27, "When the ungodly curseth Satan, he curseth his own soul." Sin is the result of man's fixing his imagination on himself, or on some other person or thing short of God. With this thought may be compared that of Isa. 26:3, "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace [i.e., unharmed, or in welfare], whose mind [yēçer] is stayed on thee; because he trusteth in thee" (see George Buchanan Gray, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Isaiah I-XXXIX [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1912; "International Critical Commentary"], p. 439). In rabbinical literature yēçer is used with the meaning of "impulse," the (good or evil) "tendency" in man (A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament, ed. Francis Brown, S. R. Driver and C. A. Briggs [Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1906], p. 428).

sons. It is when imagination ceases to dwell upon the great convictions that debasing paganism overcome us.

A second truth: The world in revolt against God brings retribution. The ancient story of the Flood is partly myth; yet it is also a parable of what is no myth but terrible reality. There can be a point in the disintegration due to evil when something has to break. Then the forces of decency left on earth are not strong enough to hold back the pressure of moral consequence. It will rain upon the earth not only for forty days, as in the story of Noah, but for four years as in World War I, and more than four years, as in World War II; and the wash and welter of it may prevail not only "a hundred and fifty days," but through dragging decades in which the aftermath of war still

In vs. 5, J² to a certain degree anticipates the thought of Ben Sirach by some seven hundred years. In his recognition of the deep-rooted tendency to evil in the human heart, however, he shows himself to be much more realistic in his estimate of man than was Ben Sirach, for J² could scarcely have written Ecclus. 15:15.

7. Whom I have created is a gloss; J does not elsewhere use the word rendered "create." Man and beast and creeping things and birds of the air is a pedantic gloss in the style of P. Consequently in the original "made him" was read for made them.

spreads its slime of bitterness and suffering. And the flood is not of water only; it is, and in every recurring judgment it must be, of blood and tears.

8-13. Noah and His Neighbors.—The old story which here begins of Noah setting to work to build his ark is much more than a story. It has actual modern parallels. There are more arks needing to be built than Noah's. Noah is described as building that ark of his because a crisis was at hand. Most people around him did not know it; and if Noah or anybody else warned them they only shrugged their shoulders and passed on. This is what the majority generally will do. "In the days that were before the flood," said Jesus, "they were eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage, . . . until the flood came, and took them all away" (Matt. 24:38-39). "Woe to them that are at ease in Zion," cried the prophet (Amos 6:1) to the arrogant civilization of Israel which did not believe that its destruction by Assyria was coming—as it actually was coming—in less than a generation. "I set watchmen over you," Jeremiah declared in the name of God, "saying, Harken to the sound of the trumpet. But they said, We will not hearken" (Jer. 6:17)—no, not even when the Babylonian terror was at their gates. "My people are destroyed for lack of knowledge," cried Hosea (4:6). They lacked the knowledge because they were too grossly satisfied to want to know.

So in many times there are men who stare so hard at what they want to see that the critical realities are not seen. They can tell all about the way the winds blow in their little world, but they are oblivious of the forces that may be breaking in to smash their world to bits. "You know how to interpret the appearance of the sky," said Jesus, "but you cannot interpret the signs of the times" (Matt. 16:3). Noah's neighbors looked at the ordinary skies that seemed to promise ordinary weather; they did not see in the skies of moral facts the signs that betokened imminent disaster. At the half-way point of the twentieth century there was 14 ¶ Make thee an ark of gopher wood; rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch.

15 And this is the fashion which thou shalt make it of: The length of the ark shall be three hundred cubits, the breadth of it fifty cubits, and the height of it thirty cubits.

16 A window shalt thou make to the ark, and in a cubit shalt thou finish it above; and the door of the ark shalt thou set in the side thereof; with lower, second, and third stories shalt thou make it.

danger that peoples of the Western world, especially in the United States, who suffered comparatively little from the first and second world wars, might be—and still may be—more like Noah's neighbors than like Noah. They could eat and drink and rise up to play (I Cor. 10:7) while the portents gathered.

In the arresting suggestion of the biblical story, how did Noah perceive what others were blind to? God said unto Noah, The end of all flesh is come before me. The dramatic simplicity of the old narrative presents the truth concretely, as though God stood face to face with Noah and spoke to him alone. As a matter of fact, God was speaking through the unmistakable signs of the times to everybody. But Noah was the one who could hear, because he was a just man and walked with God. How many leaders of the nations in the critical present century have walked with God? How many of us, the people, are keeping alive within ourselves those conceptions of justice and judgment which will help us see the evils of godless pride and power, and make us know that if they keep building up they will bring some new flood of dreadful retribution?

14, 22. Knowing Plus Doing.—Remembering Noah again, we observe that he not only foresaw the crisis; he also did something about it, and he did it ahead of time. He began to build his ark before there was any obvious evidence that it would be needed. The fateful developments of history often come about because men's imaginations are lazy, as in Pilgrim's Progress, Presumption says, "I see no danger"; and Sloth says, "A little more sleep." Winston Churchill, in the somber retrospect of The Gathering Storm, wrote, with reference to the careless failure in the 1930's of England and the other democratic countries of Europe to see the fateful portents of the times: "Counsels of prudence and restraint may become the prime agents of mortal danger."³

The dull apathy which has made great people stupid in matters of national safety can have even more deadly consequences in regard to world safety. For the time is past when there can be any such thing as national safety, or any continuingly decent human existence whatever, without a means of rescue for the whole world's peace. How clearly do God's people see this, and as citizens and creators of public opinion and action, what are we setting to work to do? Longfellow in his "Ship of State" set forth an ideal for the nations so fervent that Franklin D. Roosevelt quoted it in one of his messages when the issue of World War II was still hanging in the uncertain balances.

Sail on, O Ship of State!

Humanity with all its fears,
With all the hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on thy fate!

But it is more than a ship of state that must be built now. Rather it is the ark of a new hope, big enough to shelter all humanity.

14-22. The Divine Specifications.—Noah built the ark according to the specifications which God gave him. In the quaint picture as Genesis presents it, that ark must have seemed to the onlookers fantastically big. It was none too big for what had to go into it if life on the earth was to be saved from destruction and to get a fresh start. In the ultimate suggestion for us

17 And, behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; and every thing that is in the earth shall die.

18 But with thee will I establish my covenant; and thou shalt come into the ark, thou, and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons' wives with thee.

19 And of every living thing of all flesh, two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, to keep them alive with thee; they shall be male and female.

20 Of fowls after their kind, and of cattle after their kind, of every creeping thing of the earth after his kind; two of every sort shall come unto thee, to keep them alive.

21 And take thou unto thee of all food that is eaten, and thou shalt gather it to thee; and it shall be for food for thee, and for them.

22 Thus did Noah; according to all that God commanded him, so did he.

7 And the LORD said unto Noah, Come thou and all thy house into the ark; for thee have I seen righteous before me in this generation.

7 Then the LORD said to Noah, "Go into the ark, you and all your household, for I have seen that you are righteous before me in this generation. 2 Take with you seven pairs of all clean animals, the male and his mate; and a pair of the animals that it was not big enough. Nearly all through the O.T. there is the tendency to think that a particular group could claim special favor with God and preference in his salvation. But that particularism disappears in the limitless pity which was revealed in Christ. The ark of the greater society which men must set themselves to build now must have its heavenly specifications, as Noah had his: but they will be such specifications as are received from the heaven that arches over the N.T., not only over the O.T. The wideness of God's mercy will be in them. The ark will be not for one family or blood or nation, not for descendants of Noah only, but—as in Jesus' parable of the good Samaritan—for the neighbors too who are in need.

7:1-24. The Saved and Saving Remnant.—According to the story, it was upon Noah and his family that the continuation of life on the earth should depend. Everybody else was drowned, and they alone were left. One may find here the foretoking of a great theme which comes into clear light later in the O.T., viz., the saving significance of the remnant. The physical flood and the physical drowning pictured here do not recur, but there is a kind of spiritual drowning that does. Repeatedly it is as though the great mass of people were caught in the disastrous consequences of an evil life so that they must lose their place in God's enduring plans. In the story of the Exodus most of those who first started out

3 Of fowls also of the air by sevens, the male and the female; to keep seed alive upon the face of all the earth.

4 For yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights; and every living substance that I have made will I destroy from off the face of the earth.

5 And Noah did according unto all that the LORD commanded him.

6 And Noah was six hundred years old when the flood of waters was upon the earth.

7 ¶ And Noah went in, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him, into the ark, because of the waters of the flood.

8 Of clean beasts, and of beasts that are not clean, and of fowls, and of every thing that creepeth upon the earth,

9 There went in two and two unto Noah into the ark, the male and the female, as God had commanded Noah.

10 And it came to pass after seven days, that the waters of the flood were upon the earth.

11 ¶ In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened.

12 And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights.

13 In the selfsame day entered Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his sons with them, into the ark;

14 They, and every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and are not clean, the male and his mate; 3 and seven pairs of the birds of the air also, male and female, to keep their kind alive upon the face of all the earth. 4 For in seven days I will send rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights; and every living thing that I have made I will blot out from the face of the ground." 5 And Noah did all that the LORD had commanded him.

6 Noah was six hundred years old when the flood of waters came upon the earth. 7 And Noah and his sons and his wife and his sons' wives with him went into the ark, to escape the waters of the flood. 8 Of clean animals, and of animals that are not clean, and of birds, and of everything that creeps on the ground, 9 two and two, male and female, went into the ark with Noah, as God had commanded Noah. 10 And after seven days the waters of the flood came upon the earth.

11 In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, on the seventeenth day of the month, on that day all the fountains of the great deep burst forth, and the windows of the heavens were opened. 12 And rain fell upon the earth forty days and forty nights. 13 On the very same day Noah and his sons, Shem and Ham and Japheth, and Noah's wife and the three wives of his sons with them entered the ark, 14 they and every beast according to its kind, and all the cattle according to kind of clean animal were taken into the ark—possibly three pairs, and an extra male intended for sacrifice.

3. To keep their kind alive is the only authentic part of this verse. The preceding sentence is redactional harmonization. Upon the face of all the earth is a gloss; J in this narrative consistently uses "upon the face of the ground."

of Egypt died in the wilderness. In the days of Elijah the apostates from God seemed to be so overwhelmingly in the majority that Elijah could cry out, "I, even I only, am left" (I Kings 19:10). Eager though he was to see the whole nation redeemed, the prophet Isaiah was forced to conclude that only a few would be found fit to be the seed of the future. Later still there had to be the winnowing of the captivity and the Exile before Jerusalem that had been destroyed should be built again.

So the ark has become the symbol of the church. The family of Noah had at least enough consciousness of God to become the nucleus of his mercy and his redeeming purpose. Granted that the church is still most lamentably human and, like the ark, in its human aspects still a crude and unlovely thing. William Warburton, bishop of Gloucester in eighteenth-century England, put the truth in blunt words when under date of June 13, 1751, he wrote to a friend:

The Church, like the Ark of Noah, is worth saving; not for the sake of the unclean beasts and vermin that almost filled it, and probably made most noise and clamour in it, but for the little corner of rationality, that was as much distressed by the stink within, as by the tempest without.⁴

If the church is to be a saving remnant, it needs continual inside cleansing; and that cleansing must begin not with general complaint and with miscellaneous raising of dust, but with individual consecration: "O Lord, reform thy church, beginning with me." The church is purified by individuals (think of Francis of Assisi, Martin Luther, John Wesley); and individuals are given power to become their best selves by the fellowship of the church. The company in the ark might well have become discouraged if they had not had one another to depend on; and men and women who morally and spiritually may be near discouragement are often kept steady by the fact that there are other would-be Christians-in-the-making who face up every day to the same difficulties they face.

O And God remembered Noah, and every living thing, and all the cattle that was with him in the ark: and God made a wind to pass over the earth, and the waters assuaged.

2 The fountains also of the deep and the windows of heaven were stopped, and the rain from heaven was restrained.

3 And the waters returned from off the earth continually: and after the end of the hundred and fifty days the waters were abated.

4 And the ark rested in the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat.

5 And the waters decreased continually until the tenth month: in the tenth month, on the first day of the month, were the tops of the mountains seen.

6 ¶ And it came to pass at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark which he had made:

C. THE WATERS RECEDE (8:1-12)

8:6. In J at the end of forty days preceded vs. 2b, 3a; the present position of the clause is of course due to RP. Before the notice of Noah opening the window of the ark, J must have told of him waiting seven days, as is indicated by another seven days in vs. 10.

8:1-5. The Faithfulness of God.—And God remembered Noah. Few words and simple ones, yet a world of meaning for the souls of men is in them. Even when we seem lost to everything else we are not lost to God. Visualizing the story of the ark as the graphic pages of Genesis set it forth, one might well suppose that Noah may have thought himself forgotten. Though he could tell himself that God had once spoken to him and given him his promise of protection, nevertheless, where was God now—now when the gray days and black nights went by and wherever he looked there were only the empty waters and the sky that seemed to hold no hope?

So, many men in many times have found themselves cut loose from all moorings, with the familiar landmarks gone, adrift in a world from which God himself, so far as they can see, has vanished. The flood which has carried them away is sorrow, or loneliness, or moral perplexity, or the sense that some great adventure to which they were committed has meant only long disappointment which will end perhaps in despair. Then they will be saying, like the psalmist, "I am so troubled that I cannot speak," and "Is his mercy clean gone for ever? doth his promise fail for evermore?" (Ps. 77:4, 8.)

But the noble story in Genesis does not end on a note of hopelessness. The Flood did at last abate. The mountaintop of hope appeared, and then one day the earth was habitable. Similarly, religious men in every generation have discovered at last that God did remember and that his purposes would not fail. They have sung with Whittier:

I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care.⁵

Or in William Cowper's hymn, "Hark, my soul! it is the Lord," they take comfort in the verse that tells how even though a mother toward the child she bare may forgetful be,

Yet will [He] remember thee.

The reasons for that faith may not appear when the days are dark; but even then the heart may have its intuition that somehow God's Providence is there; and as life goes on to its unfolding, it justifies that faith.

6-12. Encouragement in Little Things.—After the Flood had begun to abate there were still days when Noah had to continue to be

7 And he sent forth a raven, which went forth to and fro, until the waters were dried up from off the earth.

8 Also he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground.

9 But the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned unto him into the ark; for the waters were on the face of the whole earth. Then he put forth his hand, and took her, and pulled her in unto him into the ark.

10 And he stayed yet other seven days; and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark.

7 and sent forth a raven; and it went to and fro until the waters were dried up from the earth. 8 Then he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters had subsided from the face of the ground; 9 but the dove found no place to set her foot, and she returned to him to the ark, for the waters were still on the face of the whole earth. So he put forth his hand and took her and brought her into the ark with him. 10 He waited another seven days, and again he sent forth patient; and the last days of waiting may be the hardest. Noah opened the window and sent out a raven and a dove, but at first there was only disappointment. The raven vanished; and when the dove came back to shelter in the ark he knew that it meant the waters were too deep for her to find rest for the sole of her foot. More waiting, and more weariness of postponed hope. Seven days went by and he sent the dove out again. This time the dove came in to him in the evening, and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf plucked off.

One leaf might not have seemed of much significance, but it meant a lot to Noah. He could not eat it and he could not do anything else with it that was useful; but it made the whole world look different. It was a sign that the waters were abated from the earth and that out of death and destruction life was again emerging. That is a good thing to remember in times of crisis. For instance, in the crisis—like that through which Noah had passed—of human sin and God's judgment upon it. There are times when everything that is familiar seems to have come to an end. When the Flood was at its height, Noah might well have wondered whether God's endurance was exhausted, the final doom pronounced, and the very basis of man's existence upon the earth forever gone. To some of the peoples in Europe after World War II that might well have seemed to be true. More than two years after the war had ended an experienced observer wrote from Germany: "All Germans are completely pessimistic. At best, they are fatalists whose only care is to get through the day. They have lost . . . will and hope." If there should be another war, and with atomic weapons, the impression would be still more overwhelming. Is human civilization to be not only devastated but wiped out altogether? In the face of such a possibility men may well thank God for one leaf, for one small but certain sign that there are living and re-creative forces which God has not allowed wholly to be swept away. When the contrary signs seem so much more prevailing it takes courageous faith to believe in the little signs of promise—the little new shoots of youth and energy and budding effort that may push out from roots that had seemed to disappear. But in the strength of these humanity, like Noah, must take heart and ride out the rest of the storm.

The description of the dove coming back with the one leaf may be linked with vs. 1, which begins, "And God remembered Noah." Perhaps it was hard for Noah to think so. With the wild emptiness of the waters around him, shut in by the gray curtains of the pitiless rain, waiting day after day while nothing happened, it might well have seemed to him that God had forgotten. So men are often tempted to think. They suppose that they are left to face impossible conditions which God created and about which—and about them—God no longer seems to care. So Moses in the midst of the Exodus cried out, "Wherefore hast thou afflicted thy servant? . . . I am not able to bear all this people alone" (Num. 11:11, 14). "O Lord, how long shall I cry, and thou wilt not hear!" exclaimed Habakkuk (1:2). And from the Psalms comes this, "Wherefore hidest thou thy face, and forgettest our affliction?" (44:24). But the ultimate message of the Bible, of the prophets, the psalmists, and all the great figures of its history, is that God does not forget. "God remembered Noah," and the hand of his ultimate deliverance would not be slack. Here

11 And the dove came in to him in the evening, and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf plucked off: so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth.

12 And he stayed yet other seven days, and sent forth the dove, which returned not again unto him any more.

13 ¶ And it came to pass in the six hundredth and first year, in the first month, the first day of the month, the waters were dried up from off the earth: and Noah removed the covering of the ark, and looked, and, behold, the face of the ground was dry.

13 In the six hundred and first year, in the first month, the first day of the month, the waters were dried from off the earth; and Noah removed the covering of the ark, and looked, and behold, the face of the is the message of reliance through grim times for every man who has once had the conviction that God had a purpose for him. A great Christian wrote once to a friend who was undergoing tragic suffering: "Trust God now in the dark, when it means something." The floods of danger and delay and disappointment may seem dismaying, but There's a wideness in God's mercy,

Like the wideness of the sea.⁶

The symbol of the leaf may suggest another thought which is not directly related to the Noah story but does belong in the wide inconclusiveness of life. Not only in circumstances of sin and judgment but in circumstances of moral victory there may be great meaning in a single leaf. When Charles William Eliot, president of Harvard University and one of the great personalities of his time, was being honored at the climax of an illustrious career he referred to various tributes that had been paid him, and he said that one message which had come to him had meant more than all the rest. It was from a beloved citizen of Boston, a lifelong friend. "When I opened the envelope addressed to me," he said, "I found in it no written word, not one. Instead, there was a single leaf. But that leaf was a laurel."

It was the symbol of a victorious life; and such a symbol may well be prized more than many tangible rewards. To some it may come late; but it is worth waiting for. Here is a woman who as wife and mother waits long and wistfully for those she loves best to want what she wants for them. Her husband may be interested only in making money, while she knows how much deeper and finer the values are that go into the making of life. Her sons may wander recklessly, uninfluenced by her religion. She does not grudge anything she does for them, and certainly she is not looking for any material gift. What she does yearn for is the sign that her long faith has been justified, that the ark of the hopes she has cherished can see ahead of it the promise of a world restored. It is enough for her when the one new leaf appears—the one first word or token that those she has lived for are ready to rise up and call her blessed. Or here is a man whose character and career have been involved in a community which resisted and at first perhaps even laughed at his ideals. With clear prevision he may have seen the forces of moral retribution gather, and yet not have been able to persuade his contemporaries that they were coming. But he has gone on unswervingly to fulfill the duties laid on him. He has believed in life's ultimate promise and kept his faith in God. Then at length from the quarters he cares for most there comes the recognition that goes closest to his heart. He has the sign which vindicates at last what he had trusted. The full unveiling of his world is not yet before him, but he has the evidence of what has certainly begun. The one leaf brought to him is like Noah's, the olive leaf of peace; but it is also the laurel leaf of victory.

13-19. Every Living Thing.—The Flood was over, and the hour of release from the ark had arrived. Noah and his wife and his sons and his sons' wives come out to start life on the earth anew. But it is not these alone that God has in mind. Bring forth with thee, he says to 17 Bring forth with thee every living thing that is with thee, of all flesh, both of fowl, and of cattle, and of every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth; that they may breed abundantly in the earth, and be fruitful, and multiply upon the earth.

18 And Noah went forth, and his sons, and his wife, and his sons' wives with him:

19 Every beast, every creeping thing, and every fowl, and whatsoever creepeth upon the earth, after their kinds, went forth out of the ark.

20 ¶ And Noah builded an altar unto the LORD; and took of every clean beast, and of every clean fowl, and offered burnt offerings on the altar.

21 And the LORD smelled a sweet savor; and the LORD said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth: neither will I again smite any more every thing living, as I have done.

21. I will never again curse the ground because of man, for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth is a reversal of the sentence found in 3:17 and can only be an addition by the hand of one who misunderstood the significance of the garden story. It may be noted that in the Hebrew another word is used for curse than that in 3:17; and further, that the second clause is strictly a non sequitur to the first. With the sentence belongs the initial and—included in neither—of vs. 21b, which therefore read in J, continuing said in his heart, "I will never again destroy, etc."

Noah, every living thing that is with thee—creeping things and fowl and cattle and animals of every kind. Recollection goes back to the account of the sixth day of the Creation, on which God made all living creatures, as well as man, and then "saw that it was good." So in this story of life renewed imagination awakens to consider what gratitude is owing to God for all his handiwork—for the fowl of the barnyard, for the cattle on the farm, for sheep and shepherd dogs and horses and all patient beasts of burden, for the birds of the air, and all the magnificent wild things of the forest and the plain. Rightly may we sing, in the words of Mrs. C. F. Alexander's hymn,

All things bright and beautiful,
All creatures great and small,
All things wise and wonderful:
The Lord God made them all.

20-21. God's Long-Suffering.—Few sentences in Genesis reflect thought so naïve as this. God is pleased with the smoke of sacrifice, and he begins to feel more warmly disposed. Like "de Lawd" in The Green Pastures, he resigns himself to recognize that the heart of man is just 22 While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease.

ture as I have done. 22 While the earth remains, seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night, shall not cease."

22. J² here gives fine expression to the truth he has apprehended—there is nothing similar to this in the Babylonian epic—that the orderly processes of nature are no less a manifestation of the power of God than is the catastrophic, destructive event. An indication of the not-too-happy effect of Baalism on J²'s thinking has been discerned in his melancholy attitude toward sex revealed in the garden story. In this verse such an attitude is to some extent balanced. The sequence of seedtime and harvest at least had long been attributed to the baal. Now it is claimed for the Lord, together with the ordered alternation of cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night. The Mosaic concept of Yahweh as a God of order has been enriched through contact with Baalism, as has the primitive concept of him as the God of those forces of nature which are about hopeless. It has been evil from his youth. So the only thing to do is to accept the situation and not put any dependence upon the possibility of correcting matters by another flood. There is something to the credit of humanity in the person of Noah, and that perhaps is all God can expect.

As theology, that is childlike; yet there is a strange instinctive wisdom in it, just as there is sometimes in the pictures that children draw. There is the recognition that human sin is incredibly stubborn, that only a patient God could put up with it, that in spite of everything he will not visit upon us our deserts. The vision of what God's infinite compassion actually went out to do in Christ is a long way off, but even so the window of instinctive trust is open in that direction.

22. The Dependableness of the Seasons.—Rightly these alternations of nature are reckoned as the beneficent gifts of God. The great aspects of nature are not monotonous, but neither are they capricious. One can know what is coming next. The longest day will be followed by the restful quiet of the dark, and every night can look forward to another dawn. When winter comes the spring and summer will be not far behind. If there is seedtime, there will be harvest too. There are beauty and stimulus in this unfailing rhythm. Life must respond in different ways to the ebb and flow of light and darkness, cold and heat. Robert Louis Stevenson knew the exhilaration of it when he wrote:

To make this earth, our hermitage,
A cheerful and a changeful page,
God's bright and intricate device
Of days and seasons doth suffice.⁷

Thank God, then, that his creation is so various and yet in its essential forces so dependable.

But a larger thought emerges than that which has to do only with the earth. For human life, in its moral and spiritual aspects, there needs likewise to be a rhythm that swings from one fact toward another and different fact necessary to its fulfillment. Men need to have the double experience of darkness and light, the wintry chill of difficulty and the expansive summer of life released, the sowing of seed on barren ground and the reaping of the harvest. Especially these last. For the dependable rhythm of seedtime and harvest is one of God's supreme gifts to human life, as it obviously is to the earth. The trouble is that the value of the first part is not so easy to recognize. If the farmer went by appearances, he might never sow. The earth at the end of winter is empty and barren. To buy seed costs money, and plowing and harrowing, digging, and weeding, are heavy work. Suppose nothing should come of it. The sowing of intellectual and moral seed may also be uninviting. The boy in school and college may be bent on something that gives quicker enjoyment and so waste the springtime of his opportunity in idleness or in frivolous amusement. The seed of vital interest sown then can grow up into rich results: the sowing neglected then can never wholly be recovered. Many who have wasted the early chance will never try to make it up, for the ground of their minds has been left too resistant for seeds of later curiosity to get in.

On the other hand, seedtime for the intellectually alert does not depend on the calendar. Some part of a man's mind can always be ready for new planting. Consider the immense increase of knowledge possible in adult years for men who have the continuing will for the deep plowing of hard study and determined thought. Read the description of Charles Evans Hughes in Bruce Barton, The Man Nobody Knows.⁸ Recall Thomas Edison, Charles P. Steinmetz, Ernest Bevin, Alfred E. Smith (see

9 And God blessed Noah and his sons, and said to them, "Be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth. 2 The fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every bird of the air, upon everything that creeps on the ground and all the fish of the sea; into your hand destructive in their effect, the storm and the volcano. In those days it was perhaps easier for men to see the hand of God in the catastrophic and the sudden than it was in the ordered quiet of the succession of the seasons. Nor can it be claimed that man's realization of God's activity is generally more adequate even in this age. For the tendency is still to take for granted the ordered, stable elements in life, and to say "Thy will be done" only in the face of the catastrophic.

E. THE NOACHIAN LAWS (9:1-7)

9:1-7. It has been seen that 1:29-30, prescribing a vegetarian diet for man, is a secondary addition to the creation story—whether from the hand of P making use of an earlier version of the story, or from a redactor working on P's narrative. Vss. 1-7, presupposing 1:29-30 as a background, are from the same hand; to be noted is the fact that obedience to the command here given—not to eat blood nor to shed the blood of man—is not made a condition of the covenant following (vss. 8-17). The passage is intended to bring out both the cultural and the religious significance of the Flood in the mind of the priestly writers:

(a) It marked the end of the golden age (see Exeg. on 1:29-30) in which men lived in harmony with the beasts.

(b) It was the occasion of the prohibition of eating blood, a prohibition which, it is implied, is binding not only on Israel but on all mankind; hence the requirement that it be observed by "proselytes of the gate"; cf. also Acts 15:20; 21:25 where, according his biography by Henry F. Pringle⁹). And if the blessing of springtime should be captured for the mind, so it must be also for the moral nature. "Keep thy heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of life" (Prov. 4:23). The responsibility of parents is critical here. The seeds of early suggestion will take root in a child and produce the good grain of sound impulses or the weeds of worse than useless ones. Note here the problem and opportunity of schools and churches for the moral and spiritual education imperatively called for if democracy is to endure. Without right principles individuals grow up irresponsible, and public policy is ignorant and corrupt. What are Christian citizens doing to safeguard our society in this crucial respect? What ways are there of making sure that clean thoughts and wholesome purposes are implanted in boys and girls before the springtime has gone by?

For the harvest inevitably follows the sowing. That is one of the facts of God that is full of blessing, but which, like all blessings abused, can be dark with judgment. The process of development cannot be reversed and is not likely to be interrupted.

Sow a Thought, and you reap an Act;
Sow an Act, and you reap a Habit;
Sow a Habit, and you reap a Character;
Sow a Character, and you reap a Destiny.¹⁰

If we sow weeds, we get weeds; and if we want to get something better we must do more than want it. We must follow in the inner life the discipline which the farmer follows in his dealing with the earth: faith in the possibilities of empty ground, courage to risk good seed even though it is costly, intelligent labor, and the willingness to keep on weeding and working until the harvest is secure. Through it all there shines the truth of God's proclamation that life's processes will be dependable. If unfaithfulness ends in sterility, with equal sureness faithfulness will be blessed. Sobering therefore, but still more inspiring is that promise that While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest . . . shall not cease.

3 Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things.

4 But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof, shall ye not eat.

5 And surely your blood of your lives will I require: at the hand of every beast will I require it, and at the hand of man; at the hand of every man's brother will I require the life of man.

6 Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man.

7 And you, be ye fruitful, and multiply; bring forth abundantly in the earth, and multiply therein.

8 ¶ And God spake unto Noah, and to his sons with him, saying,

9 And I, behold, I establish my covenant with you, and with your seed after you;

they are delivered. 3 Every moving thing that lives shall be food for you; and as I gave you the green plants, I give you everything. 4 Only you shall not eat flesh with its life, that is, its blood. 5 For your lifeblood I will surely require a reckoning; of every beast I will require it and of man; of every man's brother I will require the life of man. 6 Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed; for God made man in his own image. 7 And you, be fruitful and multiply, bring forth abundantly on the earth and multiply in it."

8 Then God said to Noah and to his sons with him, 9 "Behold, I establish my covenant with you and your descendants to the present context, it is imposed upon all Gentile converts to Christianity. The prohibition is found again in Lev. 7:27; 17:10, 14; 19:26, though it antedates the priestly legislation (cf. Deut. 12:16, 23; 15:23; also Ezek. 33:25). Originally it may have been directed, in part at least, against the superstition that by eating the blood in which is the life of the totem animal the worshiper appropriated the life of the god (for an example of this practice see W. Robertson Smith, Religion of Semites, p. 338). In any case the ancient narrative in I Sam. 14:31-34 indicates that the practice was abhorrent and forbidden by Yahwism as early as the rise of the monarchy.

(c) It was the occasion of the divine prohibition of the taking of human life (vs. 5); for human life was sacred since man was made in the image of God (vs. 6). The poetic form of vs. 6 suggests that the author has here incorporated into his narrative an ancient judicial formula which had become proverbial—especially since nothing is said as to who had the power and the responsibility to take vengeance for murder.

The three provisions of these so-called Noachian laws are in a way interdependent. The writer developing here his theory of the end of the golden age (a) was led by association of ideas to the prohibitions of (b) and (c): animals could be killed for food, but the blood must not be eaten; though the life of animals might be taken, human life was sacred.

F. THE COVENANT WITH NOAH (9:8-19)

The covenant is unconditional: no requirement is laid upon man. This raises the question whether, since the Noachian laws are in some sense secondary, the original narrative did not pass from vss. 1, 2a—the command to "be fruitful and multiply, and fill the earth" (vs. 2a)—to vss. 9, 11-17. In this case, the fulfillment of the command of vs. 2a would be the implicit condition of the covenant; vs. 8 will thus be the redactional resumption of the main narrative following the intrusion of vss. 2b-7, and vs. 10 will be an addition by the same hand.

8-11. The Enduring Universe.—Here, as in 8:22, there is the promise of God's mercy undergirding the life of men. In primitive times there were recurrent hours of dread. The tremor of an earthquake, a flooding river, a volcano, the darkness of an eclipse, seemed more than dangers that would pass; rather, they were terrifying portents that threatened an end to everything. Men might grovel hopeless in what appeared to be a hostile earth. But here is the Hebrew faith that God the creator is also God the sustainer. Notwithstanding the ignorance

13. The symbolism of the bow—the Hebrew word is always used of a weapon, never of an arc—goes back to the idea that the lightnings are the Lord's arrows (cf. Pss. 7:13; 18:14; Hab. 3:11), shot from his bow (cf. Ps. 7:12; Hab. 3:9), which is laid aside when his wrath is sated. (The idea of the rainbow as a divine weapon is found in many mythologies; see Skinner, Genesis, p. 173.) For P, however, the lightnings are no longer God's arrows shot from the bow. The bow is permanently in the cloud, a perpetual reminder to God of his promise. Presumably P, knowing nothing of the laws of refraction and reflection of light, thought that the rainbow had never appeared before the Flood. A possible source of his imagery is the representation of the Babylonian creation myth—and folly of men—a demonic folly which in an age of atomic power might itself unloose destruction—God's great patience will not destroy.

12-17. The Rainbow of Hope.—In the well-known painting by G. F. Watts, Hope is depicted as a woman with a bandage over her eyes, sitting bowed in what looks like an empty universe, trying to make music on one string of a broken lyre. But there is a better and a braver symbol here in Genesis: at the end of catastrophe, a rainbow shining in the sky.

The times come when there is great need of a rainbow. In the twentieth century, with two world wars, civilization has passed through crises almost as dreadful as the Flood. In the aftermath many people, including theologians, are shadowed by black memories and fearful of the clouds that still hang in the sky. If there is any rainbow, they do not see it. But it is only when people do see a rainbow, or something like it, that they can, like Noah, take up life again. Noah lived a long time before the world had ever heard of Christianity, but the old story about him nevertheless can have its parable for Christians.

"To hope" is defined by Webster as "to cherish a desire with expectation," i.e., it is more than a blind and feeble wish. To desire is joined a creative expectation—expectation that can arouse the energy of the will. To reach what is desired may be difficult, and the trouble is that in dark times men may see nothing but the difficulties until these grow paralyzing. But belief in what lies beyond the barrier of difficulty is the rainbow. In the great old story Noah did not make the rainbow. God put it there. So the ground for hope always is in God; and the man who will most certainly have hope in God for the future is the man who has been conscious of God in the past. Furthermore, the man who is conscious of God, and who therefore can face the present and the future bravely, is the man who has been doing the duty in which he could feel God's help. That was true of Noah. He might not have seen the rainbow or trusted what it meant unless he had learned through obedience that God was carrying him on.

The moral theologians have pointed out that there are two great enemies to a right Christian hope.¹ One enemy is presumption. That is the sin of the man who lightly or impudently assumes that he is good enough as he is, or that if perhaps he might desirably be a little better he can make himself so by his own ability whenever he gets ready. He is blind to 14 And it shall come to pass, when I bring a cloud over the earth, that the bow shall be seen in the cloud:

15 And I will remember my covenant, which is between me and you and every living creature of all flesh; and the waters shall no more become a flood to destroy all flesh.

16 And the bow shall be in the cloud; and I will look upon it, that I may remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth.

17 And God said unto Noah, This is the token of the covenant, which I have established between me and all flesh that is upon the earth.

and the earth. 14 When I bring clouds over the earth and the bow is seen in the clouds, 15 I will remember my covenant which is between me and you and every living creature of all flesh; and the waters shall never again become a flood to destroy all flesh. 16 When the bow is in the clouds, I will look upon it and remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is upon the earth." 17 God said to Noah, "This is the sign of the covenant which I have established between me and all flesh that is upon the earth."

which may even have been preserved in some form in the creation story of J2—that Marduk's bow which he had used against Tiamat was set in the heavens as a constellation.

18-19. These verses are redactional (RP) linking—note especially vs. 18b and cf. vs. 22—the foregoing story of the Flood with the tale following.

the weakness or corruption in his own nature and to his absolute need of God. It is the menace of this sort of presumption which has made Christian theology so fearful of Pelagianism, and which makes contemporary theology denounce so vehemently the sin of pride and emphasize the tragic frustration of all mere human strength. There is the kind of presumption also which thinks it can take every advantage of the goodness of God; which shrugs its shoulders in the face of moral distinctions, and says, "I may as well be hanged for a sheep as for a lamb"; or, having sinned, postpones amendment because it supposes that there is plenty of time before God's patience will come to an end.

The other and the opposite enemy of hope is despair. Modern theologians who sound so continually the note of tragedy, as though it must be the dominant chord in Christian orthodoxy, may well remember that Thomas Aquinas declared despair to be the deadliest of all sins because it sinks a life in moral torpor. Once begin to doubt that God wills good, or that future good is possible, and the nerve of moral effort may be cut. The medieval theologians wrote much of the sin they called "acedia," the kind of creeping and gradual despair which has been described as a "sad dejection of spirit, in which a man feels out of sorts with God, the world, and himself. It is an acute and universal boredom. Nothing is any good. Nothing gives any pleasure."² The children of Israel complaining in the wilderness (Exod. 17:3) showed what acedia could do; and so does the Christian who "laden with the gifts of God and brought on his way to the promised land of eternal happiness cries in disgust, 'My soul loatheth the means of grace and is sick of this hard and stony pilgrimage.'"³

But the great souls are those who yield neither to presumption nor despair, who know that the good they aim at is too difficult for complacent human strength, but not beyond the divine attainment, and who therefore believe in the rainbow because the rainbow has been given by God. That rainbow is not an accident or a fleeting hope. It is a sign of the covenant made by God's eternal goodness that will not fail.

18-27. The Drunkenness of Noah.—Drunkenness is as old as history, and as unpredictable. Noah was a good man; but as the blunt unvarnished truthfulness of the O.T. admits, Noah got drunk. Conceivably he might have got drunk earlier. In the childlike naïvete of the picture in *The Green Pastures*⁴ Noah is presented as pleading with "de Lawd" to be allowed to take some whisky with him on the ark—two kegs of it. Why two kegs? According to Noah, to put one keg on each side to balance the boat. He is told he can take only one keg and put it in the middle. But a keg of whisky, whether on the side or in the middle, will not keep either an ark or a man on an even keel, and it is certain that if Noah had had a keg of whisky on board, the inhabitants of the ark, man and beast, would have had reason to regret it.

Why did Noah get drunk? Suppose he had done his duty on the ark; why did he act so differently on land? The answer introduces us to one of the deepest reasons for drunkenness. There are many reasons; some of them real and some of them rationalizations of actual reasons which men would rather not admit. But with Noah—and with many since his time whose drunkenness is not only of the body but of the mind and spirit—the root of the matter may be a desire for escape. Noah wanted to escape from what he remembered, and he wanted to escape from what he realized he had to do.

Noah might have pleaded some excuse for the first half of that desire. The weeks in the ark were something a man might well want to forget. To be shut up inside it with a whole menagerie of animals to take care of may have been too much for Noah's nerves. Noah had got out of drab surroundings in body; he wanted to get out of them in mind. That is a natural impulse, but it can take degrading forms of satisfaction. When the Allied troops first entered Paris in 1944 after the occupying Germans had retreated, there were wild orgies in the streets. So were there also in other capitals on the days of the ending of the war. People wanted to wash out the taste of ugly years, and for many of them liquor seemed the quickest way to do it.

But the desire for escape is not only from the past but from the future. Memories of the ark were bad enough, but after all, they were only memories. The more troublesome matter was to make a new adjustment when the ark was left behind. Even hated things can become a habit which a man cannot let go. Remember Dr. Manette, in The Tale of Two Cities, clinging to his prison room. Men have hated war, but it has had a sort of concentrated simplicity, like Noah's existence in the ark; and the complexities of peace and of reconstruction may seem to them worse than war. The size of their new opportunity dismays them. In their sober minds they are bound to feel responsible; but they do not want to feel responsible, and their escape is to get drunk.

Individual drunkenness is bad enough, but drunkenness of society is worse. Consider the situation of the victorious nations in World War II. Immediate danger was over. The ark had ridden out the Flood. Tension could be relaxed and discipline let down. The first delusion was to think that everything would be easy; but the long business of rebuilding a civilization emerging from a flood, not of water but of blood, is far from easy. Yet if the hard fact is there, perhaps it can be forgotten. Why not everybody get pleasantly drunk on other ideas and interests?

There is the wine of feeling prosperous. Noah had to get to work and plant his vineyard, but the vineyard grew with gratifying promptness. Some of the peoples in the mid-twentieth-century world have been as Noah would have been if he had come back from the Flood to find his little pet corner of the earth undamaged and his vineyards richer than before. The United States was like that; and the first thing the nation tended to do was to get drunk on indulgence: scrap wartime controls, spend more money, eat more food, buy more luxuries.

There is also the wine of power. Military victory always is intoxicating. To drink of that may inflame pride, breed a false sense of permanent security, dull the mind to the harder tests which no military strength but only moral strength can meet. Danger is ahead

If, drunk with sight of power, we loose

Wild tongues that have not Thee in awe.⁵

Fumes from this heady wine of power may fog a nation's estimate of the picture it presents to others, making it feel, as the man who is drinking feels, so pleased with itself and so important that it is sure it must be universally pleasing and popular. But that drunkenness of power, which at first may be good natured, may have malignant influences poured into its wine so that presently it may become truculent and cruel. Poisoned editorials and news distortions in the "gutter press" have frequently been designed—and in moments of decision will be designed again—to intoxicate the mind of a nation with self-sufficiency.

IX. LAST DAYS OF NOAH (9:20-29)

A. FARMER AND VINEGROWER (9:20)

20. The present Hebrew text of this verse, best rendered "And Noah the husbandman was the first to plant a vineyard" (Gunkel, Genesis, p. 78; Skinner, Genesis, p. 182), is the result of J²'s treatment of a J¹ notice that Noah began to be a husbandman (cf. 4:26b [LXX]; 10:8b). This recorded the fulfillment of the prediction made at Noah's birth, "this one shall cause us to settle down" (see Exeg. on 5:29). For J¹ Noah was thus the originator of agriculture as the sons of Lamech had been the originators of nomadism, etc. (4:20-22). Presumably J¹ had then continued with the present vs. 20b, and he planted a vineyard—so the Hebrew literally. The rendering of both KJV and RSV is thus the translation of the J¹ form of the verse—reached by ignoring the definite article prefixed to 'adhāmāh.

J² found it impossible to retain the notice that Noah was the first husbandman because of his garden story, which represented husbandry as man's occupation from the time of his expulsion from the garden until his degradation when Cain was made a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth (cf. 4:12). He therefore dropped it, and in compensation prefixed to J¹'s statement, he planted a vineyard, the present vs. 20a, "and Noah the husbandman began"; this demanded that J¹'s and he planted be taken as meaning "to plant" (for the construction see Kautzsch, Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar, sec. 120 d). J² thus made explicit what had been implicit in J¹: that Noah, the first husbandman, was also the first vinegrower.

Or again, there is the drugged wine of an idle optimism. Why worry with effort if things may somehow work out themselves? After the first explosion of the atomic bomb and the announcement of its terrific meaning the popular mood was shocked into a new realization of the desperate need of safeguarding the world against another war; but the slow disintegration of this impulse has been called by one of the atomic experts a tragedy of errors for which the world may have to pay a heavy price unless measures are taken in time to counteract them. It is no time to be drunk with indulgence, or with the pride of power, or with foolish optimism. The word for our time is "Be sober, be vigilant" (I Pet. 5:8).

20-23. The Man Who Sins, and Those Who Judge Him.—There is another way of considering this incident, which has in it a double suggestion: one is as to a man's lapse, the second is as to the attitude of others toward it.

Noah is described originally as a righteous man, and not without cause. He stood out conspicuous for integrity in a corrupt generation. Moreover, his virtue was not merely in avoidance of prevailing sins but in positive act. In the scene, as the old story paints it, it took stubborn courage to start building the ark and to keep on building it when everybody else thought it was nonsense; and it took resolution to manage that ark and what was in it through the dark weeks of the Flood. Noah had to be dead in earnest in those days, a man of purpose and a man of prayer. One would have expected that he would prove always admirable. Actually he did not—a fact which has something to say about human life in general. Moral self-mastery is never something that can be taken for granted. Because the fight has gone successfully up to a point is no guarantee against sudden humiliation if a man leaves himself unguarded.

Duly, daily, needs provision be
For keeping the soul's prowess possible.*

Moreover, the worst defeats may take place in the area which the man may think is relatively unimportant. When Noah was engrossed in conspicuous responsibilities, with everybody's eyes upon him, there was plenty of stimulus to do his best. To be the one on whom depended in a time of crisis the lives and safety of all those he cared for most called out heroic qualities. But when the immediate danger was over it did not seem to matter so much what he did. Having coped with the immense fact of the Flood outside him, why should he bother much with what might happen from an insignificant thing like a feeling inside? If suddenly he wanted to drink, what business was that of anybody else, and what harm could it do? This inner arena of a man's personal actions,

B. THE CURSE ON CANAAN (9:21-25)

The nucleus of vss. 21-25 is a tale which would seem to have taken its rise among the newly settled nomadic Israelites. It reflects their recoil from the drunkenness, sexual perversion, and filial impiety which confronted them in Palestine, and by implication attributes their own success in subduing the inhabitants of the land to the social disintegration resulting from these practices. It is thus not necessarily a story of the first vinegrower, but rather of any vinegrower who had partaken too freely of the fruits of his labors. This tale J¹, with some expurgation as will be seen, attached to the figure of Noah.

This story of the cursing of Canaan is, like the record of the rise of nomadism (4:20-22), fundamentally irreconcilable with the story of the Flood. Here Noah's sons, since they are living with their father, are represented as still unmarried; although the J flood material nowhere mentions them explicitly—its reference is consistently to Noah's "household" (7:1; the enumeration in 7:7, basically J, is as has been seen redactional)—it may reasonably be assumed in the light of P that "household" included the sons and their wives. If it is suggested that in the J document the story came before the Flood, and was shifted to its present position by RP—for no apparent reason—then the difficulty arises that among those present with Noah in the ark was a man under a curse. It may therefore be assumed that this tale is from J¹ and, as has already been argued, the flood story from J².

The primary role of Noah in the J tradition was thus that of the first husbandman and, by implication, the first vinegrower. J², in his adaptation of the Babylonian Gilgamesh epic to Yahwism, simply identified the hero of the Flood with Noah, the first husbandman. It may be noted that the alternative to such an identification would have been the postponement of the event recorded in 9:21-25 to a much later date, after the earth had been repopulated. This, however, would have made the relative positions of Israel and the Canaanites less fundamental in the nature of things. It would also have involved the necessity of somehow relating the hero of the Flood to the basic genealogical structure which J² had taken over from J¹.

22. Since the curse in vs. 25 is laid not on Ham but on Canaan, Ham, the father of is redactional harmonization by RP; i.e., in the J narrative Noah's sons were named Shem, Japheth, and Canaan. In P they were Shem, Ham, and Japheth (5:32; 7:13).

where his own impulses and appetites move, does often seem thus unimportant; and the same man who has been magnificent in public affairs may fall into ignominy in his private life. Samson was invincible against the Philistines, but he had no defense against Delilah. Antony had an empire in his grasp, but he lost it in the snares of Cleopatra. As Marcus Dods has put it, "Noah is not the only man who has walked uprightly and kept his garment unspotted from the world so long as the eye of man was on him, but who has lain uncovered on his own tent-floor."⁷

Also, the tendency of a man to regard some areas of moral decision as unimportant may be due to the complacent assumption that resistance there is unnecessary, because he imagines he is safe at that point anyway. There is no suggestion in the story that Noah had ever been drunk before. He might have thought therefore that whatever might happen to somebody else, nothing of consequence was going to happen to him. A dangerous assumption always! There is a virile self-respect and self-confidence which may rightly belong to a man because of the honor of his previous record, but it can be justified only when he uses it as a shield held to guard him. When Nehemiah said, "Should such a man as I flee?" (Neh. 6:11), he was 23 And Shem and Japheth took a garment, and laid it upon both their shoulders, and went backward, and covered the nakedness of their father; and their faces were backward, and they saw not their father's nakedness.

24 And Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him.

and told his two brothers outside. 23 Then Shem and Japheth took a garment, laid it upon both their shoulders, and walked backward and covered the nakedness of their father; their faces were turned away, and they did not see their father's nakedness. 24 When Noah awoke from his wine and knew what his youngest son had done

The reason for this change would seem to have been P's desire to bring the genealogical material of J² in ch. 10, in which Mizraim (Egypt) had been represented as a son of Japheth, into accord with another scheme which made Egypt a descendant of Ham (cf. "the tents of Ham," referring to Egypt, in Ps. 78:51; "the land of Ham," Pss. 105:23, 27; 106:22). R^P, having accepted P as definitive in this connection (cf. vs. 18), harmonized the two narratives by the insertion of Ham, the father of here.

In the primary, popular form of the story there probably occurred here—as shown by the reference in vs. 24 to what his youngest son had done to him—an account of an indecent attack by Canaan on his father. This J¹ omitted from motives of delicacy.

23. If the names of the other two sons of Noah had been given in J¹'s version of the tale, they would presumably have occurred at the first mention of his two brothers (vs. 22). Shem and Japheth are accordingly secondary here—from a hand even later than that of J² who, as will be seen, mentions them as for the first time in ch. 10; i.e., this story for J¹ was primarily a story of Canaan and he did not name these two subordinate characters.

24. Noah is part of J¹'s adaptation of the popular story in which the drunken father had probably been nameless.

using his proven and conscious integrity exactly as it ought to be used, viz., as a fact that held him inflexible against temptation. When Noah said—as in effect he did—"Should such a man as I fall?" he was using his self-assurance recklessly as an alibi for letting in temptation.

A man's worst lapses may come exactly at the point where, after he has put forth great effort, he wants recognition and reward which he thinks he has deserved. Noah may have let himself get plain tired of having everybody assume that it was easy for him to keep on being heroic. Why didn't they all see how much he had borne, and that he had a right to relax? That kind of reaction is dangerously apt to come. Many a man and woman, long conspicuous in the service of others, may begin to be irritated because the family or the community seems to take it all for granted. So they begin to claim for themselves with silent indignation the indulgence that others—so they think—do not have the decency to give. They may nourish the germ of self-pity. Irascibly they are inclined to show that they have the right to do what they choose, and the melancholy result is that they may spoil a great record by conduct not much better than that of the common crowd. It takes a great soul to keep on being his best when the incentives to a brave life have for the moment lost their old intensity.

Now as to the conclusion of the story which has to do not with Noah but with Noah's sons. Their actions were diametrically different. When one of them came upon Noah in the ignominy of his drunkenness all he did was to go out and spread the tale. But the other two took a garment, . . . and went backward, and covered the nakedness of their father. Not only would they prevent others from seeing him at the moment of his discredit; they would try to make it possible for him to think they had not seen it themselves.

So always there are two kinds of attitudes to the failures of those who need to be protected. One is the crude and cruel impulse that snickers at the disclosed weakness in one supposed to be strong, the gossiping satisfaction in knowing and telling that somebody else is no better than ourselves. Or it is the impudent pleasure in belittling and discrediting what had formerly been authority, the quick exploiting of the chance to announce that what had commanded respect in an older generation is really not entitled to any respect at all. But loyalty and truth know better. They see and judge what may be a single failure in the light of the whole long affirmative fact. They understand, forgive, and forget. “Charity shall cover the multitude of sins” (I Pet. 4:8).

25. The words purport to explain the success of Israel in subduing the Canaanites, whose eponymous ancestor had been cursed for an act of filial impiety. They may also reflect the free nomad's contempt for what seemed to him to be their subservient acceptance of a social organization necessarily more hierarchical than that which obtained in the desert. Vs. 25—containing the point of the matter—concluded the story as it left the hand of J1.

C. BLESSING OF SHEM AND JAPHETH (9:26-27)

26. This verse, the secondary character of which is indicated by the unnecessary introduction, he also said, was added by a later writer who felt not only that some recognition should be made of the piety of Shem but also that there should be some positive accounting for the success of Israel, his supposed descendants (cf. 10:21, 25 J2), represented in vs. 25 as a mere consequence of Canaanite viciousness.

From Genesis one's thought widens out to consider the message of the whole Bible concerning the forgiveness of sin. The first reaction to another's fault ought to be not cruel condemnation but self-examination and humility; “considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted” (Gal. 6:1).

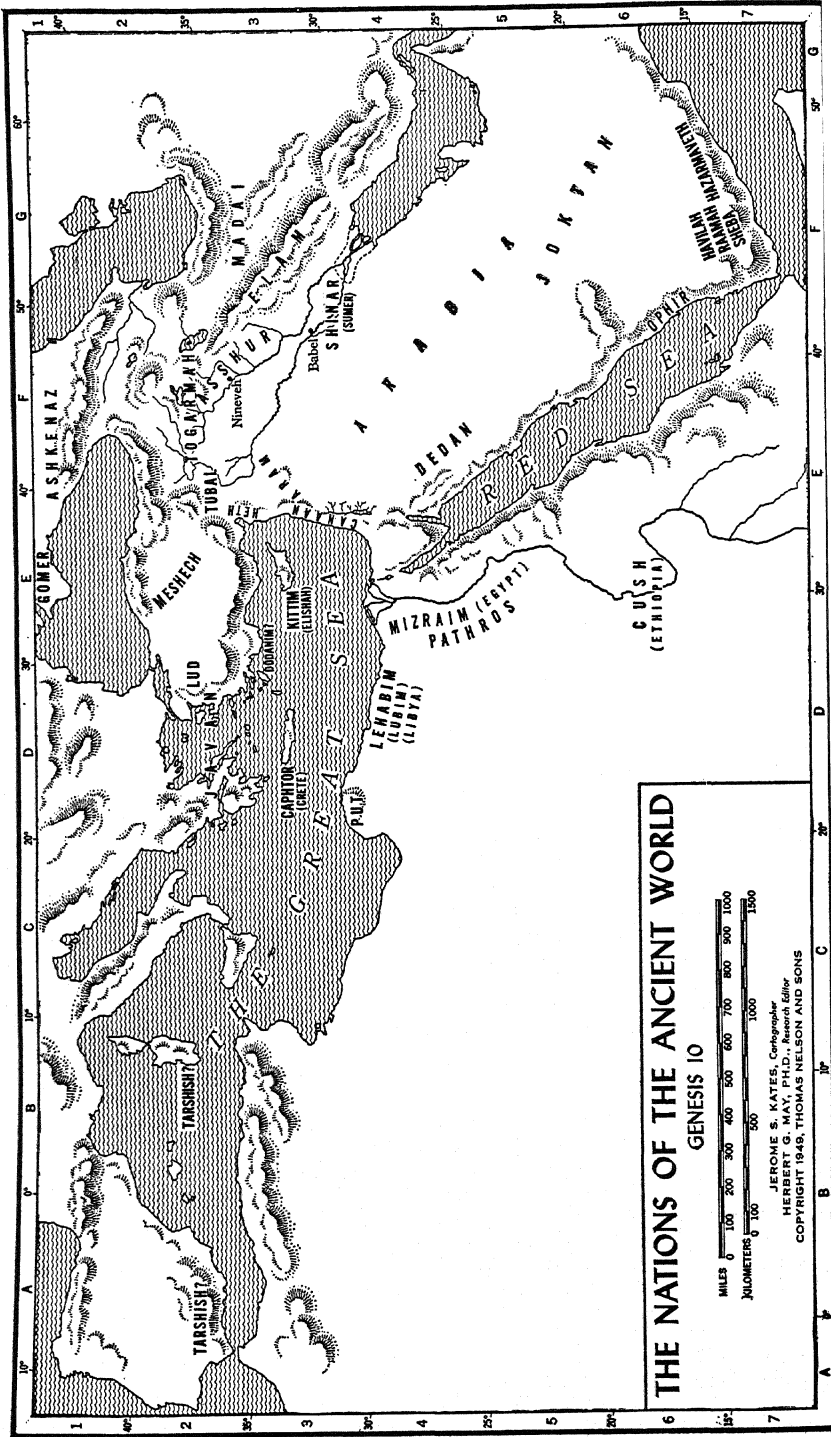

The good man will not consider only his own possible weakness; he will identify himself with the weakness he sees, and try to help. Remember Barnabas, “the son of consolation.” Reflect upon the compassion to which Paul was moved. “My heart's desire and prayer to God for Israel is, that they might be saved. . . . I could wish that myself were accursed . . . for my brethren” (Rom. 10:1; 9:3). Only that sort of sympathy which goes and makes itself at one with the guilty can be redeeming. Among the prophets the greatest were those who did more than condemn. See the faces in Sargent's frieze in the Boston Public Library. Some of the prophets there depicted stood at a distance to pronounce their woes; others of them drew near with the yearning that could melt men's hearts. That is why Hosea was greater than Amos, and the message of Isaiah of the Exile more eternal than the denunciations of Elijah.

So one is led to contemplate the divine forgiveness. It does not blunt the edge of truth. The evil of sin is never evaded or palliated. It is made all the more shameful as it is set against the purity of God's purpose which the sinner has defiled; but through it all there is his everlasting pity. That pity, and God's ultimate forgiveness, are summed up in the inexhaustible meaning of the Cross. “While we were yet sinners”—and because we were sinners, and to keep us from remaining sinners—“Christ died for us” (Rom. 5:8).

25. Race Prejudice.—Here is an early expression of race prejudice. Through a long period of history the people of Israel hated the Canaanites. In this story of Noah and his sons is an explanation devised to justify it. But the fact was older and deeper than the story. Popular tradition is rationalizing here what was instinctive and not always rational. It is an ironic fact that this Jewish expression of hatred for another people has been reversed in later centuries, so that the Jews themselves have been the victims of race prejudice and persecution. Unregenerate human impulses may have calamitous conclusions.

What are the reasons for race prejudice? On the first level of instinct there is the dislike of difference. The animal herd is suspicious of any individual who does not have the herd traits. The human herd is suspicious of the stranger. To be different is to be suspect. We often feel toward one another as the old Quaker said to his friend, “All the world is peculiar except thee and me, and sometimes I think thee is a little peculiar.” Race prejudice is accentuated by a feeling of superiority. The race that plumes itself on its own excellence, 10 Now these are the generations of the sons of Noah; Shem, Ham, and Japheth: and unto them were sons born after the flood.

27 God enlarge Japheth, and let him dwell in the tents of Shem; and let Canaan be his slave."

28 After the flood Noah lived three hundred and fifty years. 29 All the days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years; and he died.

10 These are the generations of the sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth; sons were born to them after the flood.

27. The continuation of vs. 26, also secondary. Japheth in the J² tradition (see below on ch. 10) was the ancestor, and so the representative of Cush and Mizraim; Cush here meaning not Ethiopia, but Kaššû, the Kassites who were from the seventeenth to the middle of the twelfth century the overlords of Babylonia (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, p. 89). Just as Israel continued to be known to the Assyrians as the land of the house of Omri long after the fall of the Omri dynasty, so Cush may well have continued to be the popular designation in Israel of the great power to the east for some time after its fall. So Japheth here represents the empires flanking Israel on either side; and the words let him dwell in the tents of Shem are perhaps best understood as reflecting the—doubtless negative—friendship shown by them to Israel before Assyria renewed its march westward in the ninth century.

D. NOAH'S DEATH (9:28-29)

28-29. These verses are the conclusion of the P story of Noah.

X. DESCENDANTS OF NOAH (10:1-32)

The material in this chapter is the result of the conflation of the tables of the descendants of Noah as they appeared in the final forms of the J and P documents real or supposed, is apt to despise others. Superiority in opportunity and privilege may lead to the unconscious hypocrisy of believing that one has been born to dominate. Kipling's "Take Up the White Man's Burden" became a cloak of self-satisfied imperialism. Note the Nazi philosophy of- the master race. Race prejudice may be at its worst when religion enters into it, for fanaticism can become "sanctified." Consider the campaigns of Islam with the alternative of conversion or the sword. Consider the religious wars in Europe, and particularly in France, with the Massacre of St. Bartholomew and the expulsion of the Huguenots. Note how hostility toward Russia has been inflamed by the interests of the Vatican.

The O.T. describes people as they actually are, including the Jewish people. In Judges and I Samuel we can see the kind of race passion of which the Jews, like other peoples, can be guilty. But the great significance of the O.T. is the reverse of this. Its glory is not in the alloy of human passions but in the gold of a divine perception. Its ultimate message is of the universal purpose of God which destroys race pride and passion. Hitler recognized the con-tradition the O.T. presented to his new paganism of race and blood and soil, so he banned the O.T. and tried to destroy Judaism.

The supreme message of the whole Bible, O.T. and N.T., is the universality of human destiny. It may be outlined and considered as follows: the recognition of the rights of strangers, and mercy and compassion to the weak, as expressed in Deuteronomy; the accountability of all nations equally to the one moral judgment of God as expressed in the prophets and summed up in such passages as Amos 1:1-3:2; the recognition of Israel's responsibility to the Gentiles and to the kinship of all humanity as expressed in parts of the book of Isaiah, in the book of Ruth, and in the book of Jonah; finally, the culmination in the teaching of Jesus as represented in his parable of the good Samaritan, in his declaration that men should come from the east, the west, the north, and the south and sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob in the kingdom of God, and in his death as a sacrifice for the sins of all men and his risen life as redemption offered to all.

respectively. Because of the disagreement of the two documents as to the names of the sons of Noah—Shem, Japheth, and Canaan in J; Shem, Ham, and Japheth in P—the redactor, R^P, who conflated the traditions was compelled to make certain adaptations. The P material is contained with some later additions in vss. 1a, 2-7, 20, 22-23, 31-32.

The primary form of the J tradition appears to have been: "And Canaan became the father of Sidon his first-born, and Heth. And to Japheth, the elder brother of Canaan, to him also were born Cush and Mizraim. And Cush became the father of Nimrod; he began to be a mighty one in the earth. The beginning of his kingdom was Babel. And to Shem, the elder brother of Japheth, to him also was born Eber. To Eber were born two sons: the name of one was Peleg (for in his days the earth was divided), and his brother's name was Joktan." (For details of the analysis see Cuthbert A. Simpson, The Early Traditions of Israel [Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1948], pp. 65-67.)

The identification of Japheth as the elder brother of Canaan and of Shem as the elder brother of Japheth indicates that this was the first mention of them by name in the J document (cf. Exeg. on 9:23).

The table is from J². It may be noted that it traces back to the sons of Noah the origin not only of the Hebrews, the descendants of Eber, but that of the nonnomadic peoples affecting the fortunes of Palestine. The nomad Aramaeans were, according to the J document, of the same stock as Abraham, Laban being his nephew.

The interest underlying vs. 8, which tells of the origin of the gibbôrîm, the tyrants, suggests that for this verse J² was dependent on J¹. As to how far he was dependent on other traditions for the rest of the material it is impossible to say. In any case the scheme is obviously artificial since the Sidonians and the Hittites were certainly not offshoots of the Canaanites (cf. vs. 15), nor were the Babylonians (see Exeg. on 9:27) and the Egyptians derived immediately from a common stock.

J² used this material to provide a background of world history, however rudimentary, for the history of Israel, which was to begin with Abraham; i.e., he saw that Israel made no sense in isolation. The tables are thus evidence of an incipient universalism which was to develop in the succeeding centuries until it issued in the statement of Israel's vocation as a light to lighten the Gentiles (cf. Isa. 49:6).

J²'s simple table of nations was expanded and elaborated in the years that followed, to make it a supposedly more inclusive record of the origins of the various nations with which Israel came into contact. It was thoroughly revised by P, and finally the two lists were conflated by R^P to produce the present tables.

10:9. Nimrod is one of the two figures in the lists of which anything concrete is recorded. The notice that he was the first tyrant (vs. 8) is, as has been seen, from J¹. To this J² added the statement (vs. 10), based perhaps on some floating tradition, that he was the founder of Babel, viz., Babylon. The rest of vs. 10 is later than J². A subsequent hand recorded that he was a mighty hunter before the LORD. Skinner, referring to Delitzsch, remarks that "the union of a passion for the chase with warlike prowess makes

XI. THE CONFUSION OF TONGUES (11:1-9)

The nucleus of this story is a tale by J¹, telling how the children of men (vs. 5), still undivided into peoples, decided to build a tower with its top in the heavens, to make a name for themselves (vs. 4). For this act of arrogance the LORD scattered them abroad . . . over the face of all the earth (vs. 8). Gunkel (Genesis, pp. 92-94; cf. Skinner, Genesis, pp. 223-24) accounts for the unevennesses in the present form of the story by postulating, here as elsewhere, two independent strands in the J narrative.

The interest in origins—here the origin of diverse peoples and by implication of diverse languages—suggests that the author is J¹. Support for this suggestion is furnished by the fact that J², having already accounted for the diversity of peoples in the genealogical material in ch. 10, would have no need of this tale. He retained it simply because it was already in the document lying before him.

With this story J¹ brought the introductory part of his narrative to a close, to take up, with Abraham, the history of Israel—one of the diverse peoples whose origin he had accounted for.

11:1-9. The Sin of Pride.—Men may fail to find the right answer to some question that intrigues their minds, and yet in this process be led unwittingly into the presence of some great truth that concerns their souls. The early Hebrews, like all other early peoples and like children in every generation, have wanted to know how the world began. Genesis opened with such questions: how were the heavens made, and the earth and the sea, and who made them; and who made man, and if he was made to be good, why then is he so often evil? Here in ch. 11 is another reflection of old wondering. How did it happen that there are so many languages that peoples cannot understand each other? The account of the Tower of Babel is the story-answer.

It is a naïve answer. The facts were not so simple. Differences of language developed over long periods of time as various groups of the human race went through the separate phases of their existence. They did not come all in a moment by God's descending from the sky to confound them by his immediate rebuke. But back of the ancient story there is a profound insight. Differences of language are a source of

This J¹ material is now preserved in vss. 4a, 5 (omitting in both a city, and), 6, 8a. Vs. 4a is obviously not the original beginning of the tale. This has been dropped by J² who, having prepared for the tale by the note regarding Peleg in 10:25 that "in his days the earth was divided," substituted for it vs. 2, making the actors the early descendants of Noah and locating the tower in a plain in the land of Shinar which they had reached as they "migrated" from the east—from the east (KJV) is at least as valid a rendering as in the east (RSV), if indeed it is not preferable (cf. Skinner, Genesis, p. 225).

This, it may be noted, presupposes that J² had recorded that Noah's ark had come to rest on a mountain in the east (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 95-96). This part of the J flood story was, as has been seen, suppressed by RP in favor of the P representation that "the ark came to rest upon the mountains of Ararat" (8:4), which are not east but north of Palestine.

Whence J¹ derived the tale it is difficult to say. It would seem, however, that the problem of diverse peoples and languages would have been of more interest to the inhabitants of Palestine than to the nomad, whom it affected more remotely. It may accordingly be inferred that J¹ found the myth current in Palestine and incorporated it, possibly in a shortened form (see below), into his narrative, changing the name of the deity originally appearing therein to the Lord.

It is unlikely however that a myth representing the building of a ziggurat—undoubtedly the original of the tower—as a defiance of God took its rise among the Babylonians themselves. It is more probable that some ruined or never-finished tower was explained as the result of divine action against human arrogance, perhaps by nomads who later moved to Palestine, where over the years they came to associate it with the confusion of tongues, possibly because of the similarity between Babel, the site of the ruin, and bālal, "to confuse."

If this is the case, then some light is thrown upon the later elaboration which the J story received, making it the account of not only the building of a tower but also of a city (cf. vss. 4-5) which was then called Babel because of the babble of tongues which had broken out there when the Lord confused men's speech (vs. 9). This may be dependent on certain features of the still-current myth which J¹—who would have had no particular interest in Babylon—and J² after him had ignored; cf. the intrusion into the J² garden story of fragments from the Eden saga (3:20-22) which, it may be noted, contains the same motif of divine action against human arrogance.

11:1. This is from RP, linking the tale following to the material in ch. 10.

2. Men (RSV) is not in the Hebrew, but they (KJV), i.e., the descendants of Noah listed in the J² material in ch. 10. The land of Shinar is Babylonia; the plain is the trouble, the symbol and accentuation of division, strangeness, suspicions, and hostility. And by profound insight, again, this fact was linked with the overweening spirit by which men are always trying to make themselves bigger than they are. In other words, one of the primary roots of trouble in human history is human pride. The nomads had seen the ziggurats of great Babylon. They had seen also ruined towers. Hence came the symbolism of the story of Babel, where men said, Let us build us a city, and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven; and they began to build out of bricks and slime. That is a picture of what people have always been trying to do. They have thought that by their own devices they could reach the pinnacle of coveted importance and sit triumphantly on top of their world.

The Egyptian Pharaohs thought they could do that. They were thirsty for everlasting fame and so they carved gigantic statues of themselves, raised the obelisks which were chiseled with the record of their honors, and harnessed innumerable slaves to the task of building the colossal pyramids that should preserve their bodies forever and lift their glory to the stars. But the tombs are long since rifled, and the pyramids stand among the empty sands of a civilization that slowly drifted to decay.

Greece sought to achieve its eminence with building blocks of a different kind. It would make an earthly heaven out of knowledge. If men knew enough and had a taste for beauty sufficiently exalted, then that would be all that was required to make life complete; and the gods could be relegated to the world of pretty myths. But "the glory that was Greece" is a memory now, not a potent fact.

3 And they said one to another, Go to, let us make brick, and burn them thoroughly. And they had brick for stone, and slime had they for mortar.

4 And they said, Go to, let us build us a city, and a tower, whose top may reach unto heaven; and let us make us a name, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth.

5 And the LORD came down to see the city and the tower, which the children of men builded.

6 And the LORD said, Behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; and this they begin to do: and now nothing will be restrained from them, which they have imagined to do.

And they had brick for stone, and bitumen for mortar. 4 Then they said, "Come, let us build ourselves a city, and a tower with its top in the heavens, and let us make a name for ourselves, lest we be scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth." 5 And the LORD came down to see the city and the tower, which the sons of men had built. 6 And the LORD said, "Behold, they are one people, and they have all one language; and this is only the beginning of what they will do; and nothing that they propose to do will now be impossible for them. 7 Come, let us go down, and there confuse their language, that they may not understand

Tigris-Euphrates Valley. In the J narrative it was to the east of this that the ark had come to rest.

3. The representation that the men first made bricks and then cast about for a use to put them to is naïve in the extreme—too naïve for J2, who in any case would not have been guilty of placing the notice here. It is probable that the narrative was first glossed with vs. 3*b*—a learned note by one who knew there was no building stone in Babylonia—and when this found its way into the text vs. 3*a* was prefixed to it.

4. A city, and—here and in vs. 5—is an intrusion from the hand of the writer who added to the tale the etymology of Babylon in vs. 9. The ziggurat, the most conspicuous feature of a Babylonian sanctuary, is described by Skinner as "a huge pyramidal tower rising, often in 7 terraces, from the centre of the temple-area, and crowned with a shrine at the top. . . . These structures appear to have embodied a half-cosmical, half-religious symbolism: the 7 stories represented the 7 planetary deities as mediators between heaven and earth; the ascent of the tower was a meritorious approach to the gods; and the summit was regarded as the entrance to heaven." (Genesis, p. 226.)

The military empires all down the ages have built with ruder and more defiant stuff. Their bricks were veined with iron. Assyria, Babylon, Persia, Rome, all set themselves in the pride of power to build on earth a structure that would match whatever authority there might be in the sky. If there was a throne of God, they would climb up and occupy it. Other peoples of the modern world have followed, and will yet be tempted to follow, their example. Immense material resources, scientific inventiveness, the mobilization of unprecedented military might, economic mastery, the control of atomic energy—are not these at last the bricks out of which the tower may be built that will enable a nation to supplant the sovereignty of God? "The Third Reich will last for a thousand years"; "There will always be an England"; "America, God's country"—is there not in all of these an element of that same blind pride of power which became obsessed with building the tower that ultimately must be confounded? The picture of the Tower of Babel still confronts us with its prophecy.

Crude in form as the legend is, it embodies a truth of permanent validity—the futility and emptiness of human effort divorced from the acknowledgment and service of God: hæc perpetua mundi dementia est, neglecto cælo immortalitatem quærerè in terra, ubi nihil est non caducum et evanidum (Calv.).⁷

According to the story in Genesis, the punishment for the attempted building of the tower was the destruction of human solidarity. Therefore is the name of it called Babel; because the LORD did there confound the language of all the earth: and from thence did the LORD scatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth. Never mind if that is only a childlike explanation of the physical differences in languages and in racial life. More important is the fact that here is a true suggestion of the reason for that moral and spiritual confusion of tongues which now afflicts the earth. "They do not speak our language" is a saying that implies something much more critical than difference in syntax and vocabulary; it implies a sense of alienation in thought, a gulf cut across the whole area of instinctive feelings on which men and nations need to stand on common ground.

9. The name Babel=Babylon—a transliteration of the Hebrew rendering of Bāb-ili, "gate of God"—is here fancifully derived from the polpal of bālal, "to mix," "to confuse," a form not found in Hebrew but occurring in Aramaic and Arabic. The verse, together with vs. 8*b*, is from a hand later than J²; the fact that the concluding sentence repeats vs. 8*a* indicates its secondary character.

Consider the need in our imperiled world for understanding: through the spread of accurate and sympathetic knowledge in each nation of the human needs and aspirations in another; through suppression of the half-truths or whole lies by which other peoples and governments are misrepresented in irresponsible newspapers by columnists or commentators; through increase in the international co-operation which prevents epidemic diseases and promotes universal health, encourages economic development and unhindered trade, and builds up gradually the mutual confidence which is the only effective antidote to war. Above all, reflect upon the fact that our world can be brought from its confusion into closer and more confident life only by a spiritual humility which will stop men from trusting in their towers of Babel. God's truth and God's judgment are still on high, and no human pride or power can climb above them or bring them down. There are eternal moral principles which cannot be defied. That is what all nations alike must learn if there is to be a human family instead of a planetary failure. There is a common language of the human spirit that will be recovered only when men trust less in the bricks of their own building and turn more toward God. And if that hope seems distant because some nations in theory are atheistic, then there is the more need that those nations which claim to be Christian should show what better life a reverence for God can in fact create.

10-26. The Generations of Shem.—From the story of Babel, with its picture of the folly and blunder of men, the compilers of Genesis have recourse again to the record of the priestly writers and their genealogy of a part of the human family which God had destined for better things (see Expos. on 5:1-32).

his descendants through eight generations to Terah, Abraham's father. Whence P derived these names it is impossible to say; some are geographical. The figures in the Samar., LXX, and the Book of Jubilees are not the same as those in the M.T.

26. The Character of Abraham.—Terah . . . begat Abram. Thus into a long list of inconsequential names there is slipped, as it were indifferently, the name of one who was destined to be great. So it may often be. In the endless succession of human births one birth may seem at first not to be distinguished from another. In circumstance and appearance it is like the rest. But the mysterious and initially hidden qualities of the spirit will presently lift the one personality above the crowd. Abraham (for the two forms of the name, Abram and Abraham, see Exeg. on 11:29; 17:5) would become one of the supreme figures in religious history. The people of Israel regarded him as the father of their race, and the more proudly because of the manner of man he was described as having been.

He was not perfect. None of those portrayed in Genesis were. Once, at least, Abraham was skeptical of God (17:17). Also there is told of him a discreditable incident (12:11-20). But these facts did not lessen the inspiration that men drew from Abraham; they made his total example seem more real and relevant because not separated from ordinary human nature by some unbridgeable gulf. The significance of this was expressed in unusual fashion by a great-hearted Christian who has been a city missionary of his church. With a happy devotion he goes

XIII. GENEALOGY OF ABRAHAM (11:27-32)

This section is a conflation of P and J. The P material, vss. 27, 31-32, is the conclusion of the genealogy in vss. 10-26. The J material, vss. 28-30, is the conclusion of a genealogy, the beginning of which has been suppressed by R^P in favor of vss. 10-26. It may be assumed that the J genealogy began with Peleg, in whose days "the earth was divided" (10:25), and came after the account of how the Lord had "scattered [the human race] abroad . . . over the face of all the earth" (11:8a). The abrupt mention of Lot in 12:4a (J) indicates that his name, not found in the previous extant J material, was mentioned in this genealogy, presumably as Abraham's nephew, since it is unlikely that P would, without the pressure of existing tradition, have dignified the supposed ancestor of Moab and Ammon by making him a close relative of the father of the faithful.

28. Ur of the Chaldeans is the city of Uru in southern Babylonia, the remains of which have been discovered in the mounds of 'el-Muḳayyar on the right bank of the Euphrates, 125 miles from Babylon (C. Leonard Woolley, Ur of the Chaldees [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1930], pp. 13-14).

The J¹ material in 29:1-14 represents Abraham's kinsfolk as living in "the land of the people of the east" (29:1). This was presumably the earliest written form of the Israelite tradition of Abraham's "country" (12:1). According to J², Abraham's people lived in Haran (24:10; cf. 29:4-6)—the reason for this change of representation will be considered in connection with ch. 24. In the meantime, it may be noted that neither J¹ nor J² ascribe a Mesopotamian origin to Abraham. As to whether or not the J document in its final form represented him as coming from Ur of the Chaldeans it is impossible to say; 15:7, coming from the late sixth or early fifth century B.C. (see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 73-75), gives this as the place of his origin, but it may be a substitution by R^P for a less definite original (cf. Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse, p. 20). However that may be, in Ur of the Chaldeans here is an addition to the notice as it left the hand of J², as is indeed suggested by the phraseology of the verse. Had in Ur of the Chaldeans been authentic, it would have come before in the land of his birth.

The representation that Abraham came from Mesopotamia, whether it first appeared in a later stratum of the J document or in P, is a concrete embodiment of an authentic about his ministry to orphanages, old people's homes, hospitals, and jails. His sure and cheerful faith caught from the Bible is so much a part of his nature that he can express it altogether naturally. One day when he was preaching to the convicts in the state penitentiary, he put his message in a way that might have startled the conventional—if any conventional hearers had been there. He said that, what with polygamy and slavery and occasional lying and deception, even the patriarchs, if they were living today, might have been in the penitentiary. But God, he said, regards a man's times and circumstances and his opportunity or lack of opportunity for full knowledge. The important thing is that a man's face should be turned in the right direction—toward goodness when he sees what that is, and away from sin when he knows what that is. The convicts understood what he was telling them—that the mercy of God reaches out not only to the good man but to the man who is trying to be better.

Indeed, with regard to Abraham, the first great fact about him is that he constantly suggests the future. Here is correction for a blunder into which thought too often falls. Religion is sometimes interpreted as though it were tied up with the past—a satisfaction with something achieved, a life without risk. Preachers have frequently represented goodness as negative and dull, and they have made belief a tame and passive matter. They have urged people "to guard the faith," warned them against too much questioning, proclaimed strict memory of a migration from Mesopotamia preserved by some group of non-Israelite origin in Palestine. This group had, in the course of time, come to form a part of the Israelite community and to accept Abraham as its father, and a place was thus found for its tradition, which included no doubt the myths underlying chs. 1-3, in the national history (cf. Exeg. on ch. 24).

Ur of the Chal'deans. 29 And Abram and Nahor took wives; the name of Abram's wife was Sar'ai, and the name of Nahor's wife, Milcah, the daughter of Haran the father of Milcah and Iscah. 30 Now Sar'ai was barren; she had no child.

29. Abram and Sarai are the forms in which P introduced the father of the faithful (cf. vs. 27) and his wife. He records the change of their names to Abraham and Sarah in 17:5, 15. There is no parallel in the extant J material. This is, of course, not in itself an indication that J¹ and J² knew nothing of such a change, for their account of it might have been completely suppressed by RP in favor of ch. 17. Nevertheless, the fact that there is nothing in the J narrative which seems to presuppose or to demand it rather suggests that the forms Abraham and Sarah were used in this tradition from the beginning.

In its present context the statement that Nahor married Milcah, the daughter of Haran represents him as marrying his niece. As to whether or not this was the representation of the J document, it is difficult to say. J, as has been seen, appears to have regarded Lot as Abraham's nephew, and so presumably as the son of Haran. But was this Haran of J supposed to be the same as the father of Nahor's wife? The explanatory the father of Milcah and Iscah is possibly an indication that he was not. Nothing further is known of Iscah. Milcah appears again in 22:20 and ch. 24.

Sarai seems to be an archaic form of sārāh, meaning "princess." Milcah means "queen." In the Babylonian the relations are reversed, sharratu being the queen and malkatu the princess. In the pantheon of Haran (cf. vs. 32) Sharratu was the title of dogmas lest all religion should be swept away. They have regarded religion as a sort of title deed to be locked up in a safe of cautious orthodoxy. Such conceptions fossilize faith. Faith is essentially an adventure. See Moffatt's translation of Heb. 11:1, "Now faith means that we are confident of what we hope for, convinced of what we do not see." Faith is not the anchor but the hoisted sail. It is not the ship in the harbor but the ship that puts out to sea. It is not holding on to something that already is but exploration and adventure toward something vaster that lies ahead. This kind of faith Abraham typifies, and this is the life of all great religion.

Observe also that Abraham went on believing in God's purpose, even when doors were shut in his face. He would try to go down into Egypt, which was a natural thing to do. It was the rich land, the land apparently of abundant opportunity; but he was turned back to the relatively barren land of Canaan, which nevertheless was to be the way of his life's fulfillment. In Egypt he would have been lost among a people whom he could not have affected; in Canaan he became the founder of a nation. The empty ground of unsought opportunity became a new world of significance for the history of men. See the same truth in the career of Moses, who left his place of privilege in Pharaoh's house to lead his people through a desert.

Note that the justification of a man's life is not in any immediately disclosed accomplishment but in the fact that he has followed his vision until his trust in God is vindicated. Consider the example of Columbus. He set out to discover a new way across the ocean to the Indies. He hoped, and the old world coveted, that he should bring back the Orient's spices and gold. He never got to the Indies, and all that he brought back were a few curiosities and a tale of strange people in almost empty lands. But in Columbus' seeming failure was the way of colossal success. He had found a new continent more important to the future of the world than all the treasures of the East. So Abraham opened new continents of spiritual possibility for all the generations afterward to enter and 31 And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there.

32 And the days of Terah were two hundred and five years: and Terah died in Haran.

31 Terah took Abram his son and Lot the son of Haran, his grandson, and Sar'ai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife, and they went forth together from Ur of the Chal'deans to go into the land of Canaan; but when they came to Haran, they settled there. 32 The days of Terah were two hundred and five years; and Terah died in Haran.

the moon-goddess, the consort of Sin, and Malkatu a title of Ishtar, also worshiped there. This would certainly seem to indicate that the tradition of Hebron, centering on Abraham, was in some way related to, if not dependent on, that of Haran and explains in part the J² representation of Haran as the place of Abraham's origin. Needless to say, neither J¹ nor J² were aware that Sarah was in any way associated with the moon-goddess or Milcah with Ishtar.

In view of the information as to the parentage of Milcah, a less important figure than Sarah, it is probable that the J document also gave the name of Sarah's father. If so, it was dropped, presumably by RJE, because it contradicted the statement of Abraham in 20:12 (E) that Sarah was his half sister, the daughter of his father, but not the daughter of his mother.

31. Haran—in Hebrew a different form from "Haran," Abraham's brother—was located in northwest Mesopotamia, some sixty miles east of Carchemish. It was one of the great centers of the worship of the moon-god and, at the time the J² document was explore. Let men remember that when they are apt to grow boastful about what they have done or discouraged about what they have not done. It is not what man does that exalts him, but what man would do (see Robert Browning's "Saul"). The man who is ultimately vindicated in God's eyes is the man who has followed his best light and has kept on believing in it, whatever the temporary results might or might not be.

31-32. When Old Age Is Gallant.—A brilliant American preacher, using the second of these verses as a text, once preached an arresting sermon on the idea that the only good thing Terah did was to die. He was represented as a type of the stodgy, complacent person who sits down short of achievement and holds everybody else back. Only when Terah died, and Abraham had him off his hands, could Abraham go ahead to the Promised Land. Yet that seems doubtful exegesis and less than fair to Terah. Note that Terah took Abram his son, . . . and they went forth . . . from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan. Apparently, then, the original impulse came from Terah. Here was an old man who had a vision of the future. Age does not have to be complacent or backward-looking. Terah had his eyes toward a new country, just as Moses had, up to his dying moment. New ideals and inspirations may often come from men of ripe years. Walter B.

Pitkin wrote a book entitled Life Begins at Forty.⁸ It is possible to maintain the elan of youth long after the physically youthful years. An elderly man, making a speech at a public gathering, began by saying: "According to the calendar I am an oldish man, but a few days ago I played baseball with some boys and I made a two-base hit. When I got to second, my breath was on first, but my heart was on third." Bishop William Lawrence of Massachusetts, who lived to be over ninety, wrote at seventy-six in his Memories of a Happy Life: "To me the surprising feature of life is that it becomes more interesting as one grows older. And a lifelong Christian faith suffuses the later years with serenity and hope."⁹

It is true that Terah died in Haran, a long way short of the goal of Canaan, but there is no evidence that Terah deliberately settled down there to die. He had got that far even if he could get no farther. Partial achievements are not wasted. They represent an impulse in the world that has its permanent effect. Read Robert Louis Stevenson's "Aes Triplex," with its message that all who have begun a worthwhile work have done good work, even if they have not lived to sign it. Read Browning's "Rabbi Ben Ezra" and "A Grammarian's Funeral."

written, a center of Aramaean culture (cf. Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, p. 248; Gunkel, Genesis, p. 168; Skinner, Genesis, p. 334). In representing Abraham as settling in Haran on his journey from Ur of the Chaldeans to Palestine, P would seem to be attempting to reconcile the J² tradition of Haran as his place of origin with the later tradition which brought him from Ur of the Chaldeans.

XIV. THE CALL OF ABRAHAM (12:1-8)

The section is a conflation of J and P. The P material is vss. 4b-5, the immediate continuation of 11:32. Vs. 4b, giving Abraham's age at the time, may be, with the other notices of ages in the history of the patriarchs, an addition to the original P narrative as Smend suggests (Erzählung des Hexateuch, p. 12); certainly the notice would better follow than precede vs. 5, but the present order may be due to RP, fusing P with J. It may be noted that P simply records without comment Abraham's journey from Haran to Canaan.

The J material is from J¹, with some elaboration from J². This narrative is more detailed. The Lord commands Abraham to leave his country to go to an as yet undesignated land, promising him that he will make of him a great nation and a blessing to all peoples, and Abraham goes in faith (vss. 1-4a). Since vs. 1 is from J¹, his country was "the land of the people of the east" (29:1), in the north Arabian desert. Now, in the primary, pre-Israelite form of the tradition concerning him Abraham was (see Intro., p. 442) a purely Hebron figure, the patron saint, so to speak, of the sanctuary there and the father of the community. Following the settlement in Hebron the Israelite clans made the sanctuary a sanctuary of the Lord. This was no mere appropriation of a place of sacrifice or the expulsion of one god and the enthronement of another. The Israelites took over the traditions cherished at the sanctuary, in which its religion found concrete Furthermore, not all of Terah died and was buried in Haran. It was he who first stirred Abraham to start with him from Ur of the Chaldeans, and in a real sense Terah went on with Abraham and in Abraham the rest of the way. Life, as the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews pointed out, is like a relay race. The impulse of struggle and partial success goes through all the way from the beginning to the end; and the runners who are not physically present at the finish line nevertheless have part in the victory if they have helped to speed the one who runs the final lap.

12:1. The Greatness of the Adventurer.—The glory of human history is in its pioneers. Webster defines a pioneer as "one who goes before, as into the wilderness, preparing the way for others to follow." The pioneer may be moved by one of many motives: inner restlessness, ambition, a thirst for the new and undiscovered. Whatever it is that sends him forward, he is often a creative force in the destiny of mankind. Think of Columbus sailing from Spain over untraveled oceans to find a new world. Think of the explorers of this Western continent, of the colonists at Jamestown and the Pilgrims in New England; and of those in many regions who have blazed new paths over land and sea. In every case stodgy men thought the adventures foolish. But the great man goes out ahead to follow that which claims him, in the lonely heroism of a conviction that had not been expressed before. Many of us contract, as William James expressed it, "the habit of inferiority to our full self," and as a result, "the human individual thus lives usually far within his limits; he possesses powers of various sorts which he habitually fails to use. He energizes below his maximum, and he behaves below his optimum."¹⁰ But the pioneer, whether in the physical or the mental realm, shows what a life's optimum can be.

In this sense Abraham was a pioneer, but more than a pioneer. He belonged to the company of the daring; but his daring came from a higher force and with a more inspired consciousness than most of the adventurers have known. Let it be recognized, indeed, that in expression, and made them their own, entered into them in such a way that that religion became an integral part of Yahwism.

In this way Yahwism, instead of remaining an alien religion thrust into but scarcely related to a new setting, became the religion of the community at Hebron, preserving its own values and insights of which Abraham was the symbol. Both sets of values thus took on a new meaning: those of Hebron by being brought into the context of the living awareness of the transcendence and the centrality of God which characterized desert Yahwism; those of Yahwism by being related to the soil and to a community which, having its roots in the soil and being conscious of itself as belonging to a certain place, was more aware than the nomad could ever be of the continuity of history and of life as a process, and so more able to apprehend the fact of the divine purpose.

Abraham, the father of the community of Hebron, thus became the father of the Israelite clans which had entered into and transformed that community. But the Israelites could not forget their desert origin and sought to preserve, and to give expression to, the memory of it in the national tradition which was taking form. It was for this reason that J¹ represented Abraham as having come from the desert to Palestine and eventually as having settled at Hebron.

Thus in vss. 1-4 Abraham is less an individual than a symbol or personification of the Israelite clans which had moved from the desert into Palestine and had settled at Hebron.

Now this migration of the nomad clans from the desert to the sown land had been historically the result of various forces such as pressure by other desert groups and the need for more abundant pasturage. It certainly was not undertaken, at least consciously, every great advance in history the divine will, whether known or unknown, has been moving; yet not always has that completely transcended human impulse and human act. With Abraham, as he stands in the mighty record of O.T. faith, it did so. God's purpose laid hold of him and sent him forth. If we could imagine Abraham being asked how he knew that God had called him, doubtless he could hardly have put the answer into words. No great soul completely can; but he knows and obeys his urge, whereas the little man may never know that such an urge exists but sits in his Ur of the Chaldeans safe and comfortable.

Always the pioneer will have discouragements. The way of any man who goes out ahead is not easy. Abraham must have had his wistful moments when he looked back and wondered why he had ever come to Canaan. He was seeking the Promised Land. But often the land seemed more full of disappointments than of promise. The Epistle to the Hebrews says that he sojourned there "as in a foreign land, living in tents" (11:9). A tent is an unstable thing. It is pitched here today; tomorrow it may have to be moved on. So it often is with the spiritual pioneers. They may seem never to reach their journey's end or have any proof of hopes fulfilled. Think of William Tyndale translating the Bible into English, persecuted and killed before he knew its immense effect; John Bunyan, writing The Pilgrim's Progress, and having as his reward twelve years in jail;

Woodrow Wilson giving his life to create the League of Nations but watching his ideal flung aside. Yet the greatness of the pioneer is that he goes on in spite of uncertainty and unfulfillment. He does not need assurance of quick results, if only he is satisfied that his direction is right. He does not have to perceive the end from the beginning, for he is confident that beside and above him is the reality of God who sees what he cannot see.

And the results? The dour eyes of immediate calculation might not see any. The Epistle to the Hebrews says that Abraham "looked for a city which hath foundations, whose builder and maker is God" (11:10). But where was any such city in Abraham's so-called Land of Promise when he died? Apparently nowhere. But the fact was mightier than the appearance. Spiritually Abraham had built a city, a dwelling place for new hope, new purpose, new ideals, for history, and for the human race. Every great pioneer has done that. Every ordinary man who thinks he is not great but who follows as best he can the spiritual light and leading that takes him out from Ur of the Chaldeans, out from the stodginess of accepted habit, out from laziness and complacency of soul, into some difficult obedience at the call of God—he too is helping to create the spiritual city in which human life can find a larger home.

1-5. The Cost of Obedience.—To follow a call from God may be a costly matter, particularly when it leads on a lonely road. Get thee in response to a specific divine command, however mediated. To say this is not to deny that it was in accordance with God's unfolding purpose and contributed to its fulfillment. Rather, it may reasonably be maintained that the movement at this time into Palestine, the crossroads of the ancient world, of a people whose religion was already characterized by a drive toward monotheism, was a necessary step toward the redemption of mankind through Christ, and so was divinely planned. But it does not follow from the recognition of this fact post eventum that the Israelite clans, as they made this move, had any conception of its cosmic significance. To all outward appearances it was just another of the many migrations of peoples which occurred in the ancient world, and was so regarded by the Israelites, in the unlikely event that they gave the matter any thought whatever.

But the settlement of the clans in Palestine resulted, as has been noted above, in an extraordinary deepening and enrichment of Yahwism, the religion they had brought with them from the desert. The more sensitive minds among them, reflecting on this at a later date, reasoned that the movement which had made this possible must have been divinely out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house. Those prepositions have the sharpness of a sword. It is no longer to be in and with, but out and from. Abraham must turn his back on what had been the familiar and the friendly and go out to the unwelcome and unknown. That contradiction may often recur. There are human relationships so instinctively dear that they seem surely God-given; yet a voice that also surely comes from God may cut across them. When is this true, and why should it be so?

Note the rightness of the instinct that holds relationships dear. God has set men in families. Every human individual owes his life to some sort of family nurture and protection. Not only his physical, but his mental and moral self also, is largely shaped by the influence of others. No man can lightly tear himself from the web of social thoughts and feelings into which he has been woven. He belongs to its pattern; separated from it, he seems to himself like a torn strip with raw edges and loose threads. All through the O.T. runs the conviction of family solidarity. In every household there was a group responsibility. Virtue in one person might bring blessedness to all; crime in one, punishment upon all. The whole nation also was thought of as a single family—the family of the sons of Israel. Observe the passionate devotion to the people of Israel and to the homeland expressed in present-day Zionism. For both ancient and modern Jewry, to hold together has been exalted as a supreme end.

Consider the Fifth Commandment. Consider also the need of modern life for the ideal there set up: for loyalty as against individualistic license, for reverent defense of proven standards as against the moral recklessness which despises and destroys. Does not the modern picture seem to point to exactly the opposite conclusion from that in this story of Abraham? When so many men lightly forsake their inherited loyalties, when families disintegrate and parental authority is a shadow and there are fewer and fewer bonds of continuing homes, when communities lose their accepted standards, when old codes of morals disappear and individuals become a law to themselves and the prevailing tendency is to cast adrift from old moorings, it might well be said that there is urgent need for a voice whose word is not "from" but "with," that says not "Go out," but "Stay in."

What then is the other truth? It is this: that often the group can move forward only as the individual breaks the path ahead. On every level of life there must be the pioneer. Reflect upon the facts of evolution. Individuals are born who differ from the average of the species. They have the qualities that are fit for the new environment of an expanding life, and they reach upward to possess it. So in moral and spiritual advance. The lonely adventure may be the only way to higher life. Kipling wrote, "The race is run by one and one and never by two and two."¹ Joseph had to dream dreams that went beyond what his brothers wanted. Jesus had to go out to a greatness of conceptions which all his former friends in Nazareth would hate. Remember the sternness of his words: "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple" (Luke 14:26). Read the first pages of The Pilgrim's Progress and see there the realization that sometimes the imperative quest of the soul for God requires that all who refuse to answer it may have to be left behind. Albert Schweitzer in *Out of My Life and Thought*² wrote of those who could not or would not understand the compulsion he felt to dedicate his life to an unheard-of new service in French Equatorial Africa. So in ways less conspicuous but essentially as real, other willed, and this story of Abraham's coming to Palestine is but one of the many passages in the O.T. in which this conviction has found expression. It has, moreover, been told with extraordinary skill.

The representation that Abraham left his own country "not knowing whither he went" (Heb. 11:8) preserves something of the element of contingency in the actual movement of the clans. The faith ascribed to him is not only a reflection of the developed faith of the author—the result of his experience and the experience of his people—in men and women, and particularly the young, may have to pay the price of estrangement from those most near if they are to follow the choices which they know are highest: the young man whose aims cannot be satisfied by the easy and profitable position in the family fortune to which his father wants him to succeed; the girl who must resist a worldly-minded mother who urges her to a marriage for social prestige and wealth; the mature man in community affairs or in public life who refuses to "play the game" when he sees that the playing of it is crooked, and must endure the cynical hostility of the crowd that considers him an alien. That sort of loneliness may be inevitable for all great spirits. Read Frederick W. Robertson's sermon on "The Loneliness of Christ." * Reflect upon the beautiful story of the magi who came from their distant land to look for Christ, yet in the eyes of the world found nothing significant at all. How scornful must their neighbors have been concerning so fantastic a quest! But they were right, as Abraham was right. Only when men are brave enough to rise above the crowd opinion do they follow the roads of freedom for their souls.

Yet the two truths do not stand permanently separated. The instinct of relation, the terrible compulsion to be true to one's own soul—these two may meet at last. Loyalty to the highest in one's self is loyalty to the highest that ought to be and the highest which someday may come to pass in the family and the group. The bonds which Abraham broke may have been renewed on a higher level (cf. 24:4); for it is to his own kindred that he turns again when he seeks a wife for Isaac. One at least of the brothers of Jesus became a leader in his church. In the second part of The Pilgrim's Progress Christian's family sets out to follow him on the road which in such desperate devotion he had first walked alone. As was said of Thomas Arnold, so it may be said at last of every man of unreckoning consecration, that he comes to the end of what was at first a lonely road not alone, but as one to whom it is given

2. False and True Desires.—What is most worth a life's desiring? There are many possible answers among which men actually make choices.

Some want more than anything else to be left alone. What they emphatically do not want is to be provoked to anything effortful or difficult. They may be belligerent in that avoidance or they may be merely irresolute and procrastinating, but the ultimate fact is largely the same. They prefer to stay where they are and as they are rather than to try hard to arrive at something different. Men of this type appear all through the Bible—men who might have made their lives significant but never wanted to put their energies in motion as much as they wanted to stand still and take things easy. Think of Lot, of Esau, of the rich young ruler, of Nicodemus. Their failure was not generally in aiming at anything bad; it was in the fact that they did not aim strongly enough at anything. They and their successors in every time would rather sit comfortably on the grass than to be called up to pull a bowstring taut and to speed an arrow to its mark.

Others are not so indifferent or indolent, but they have positive desires of a kind. They want to live luxuriously. Read in Exodus what most of the Israelites were thinking about in the long march through the wilderness. To get to the Promised Land was what they were supposed to want, but what they did want and what they vociferously clamored for was to get back to the good food of Egypt, Demas forsook Paul because he "loved this present world" (II Tim. 4:10), i.e., he had a hankering after its relative comforts and conveniences. Sometimes that rul-

the wisdom and power of God. It is also an indication of the way in which Israel's response to the divine initiative, in its beginning emotional to the point of a frenzied ing desire for food and drink and the pleasurable indulgence of fastidious appetite is unashamedly expressed, as in The Rubáiyát of Omar Khayyám. More often it is not so avowed, but may be none the less controlling. Among members of churches which actually comes out ahead—an appeal for some vital opportunity in the church's missions and for relief of some desperate human need, or the pull of habitual self-interest that sees to it that our own tastes are not disturbed?

Some are not so concerned with self-indulgence; what they want is self-aggrandizement. In their eyes the one thing most desirable is power. Saul was consumed by that ambition; so was Jezebel; so was Herod. But the desire for power is not confined to exemplars so fanatical. Consider in the modern world how many there are who in ways quite legal and often quite polite pursue their appetite for power: in public office; in positions of control in industry, whether among employers or among those who can dominate a union; in the church. Such men and women may get what they want. Their lives may seem rich with many benefits. But that does not mean that they are among the blessed.

For a life that is blessed and that feels blessed must come to its blessedness by another way. That may include some of the same satisfactions which ordinary lives have, yet not as main interests but rather as secondary accompaniments. Every human life, including the blessed ones, is lived in this world and is subject to this world's necessities. Therefore it legitimately seeks its livelihood and a reasonable provision for its material wants. Part of God's favor to Abraham was that his flocks and herds increased. Jesus included in his prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread." No social order or economic system can claim justification unless it makes available to all men the physical basis of decent living. The possession of power may also be wholesome if there is honest recognition that a life has influence and that the right exercise of it must not be shirked. But no life wins blessedness by seeking possessions or power for their own sake. Neither does it win blessedness by wanting to be left alone.

What therefore is blessedness? It is first the recognition of a divine relationship. Abraham's inner strength and happiness never came from worldly things; they came from his sense of a purpose above this world that was controlling. The last thing he wanted was to be left to his own devices; instead, he wanted to know his God-appointed destiny. Consequently, he was a man of prayer, which is the antithesis of a man who wants to be let alone. True prayer becomes a benediction precisely because it lifts a soul out of itself.

A spark disturbs our clod;
Nearer we hold of God.⁵

Blessedness is also a sense of sufficiency for whatever life may bring. Some suppose that the most blessed good fortune they could think of would be to have life made smooth. But that is a false notion. Complacency may come that way, but never the kind of completeness of life which makes the soul exultant. Beginning with Abraham and going on through the long succession of great souls—like Joseph, Moses, Joshua, the prophets, Stephen, and Paul—the Bible makes clear that a man knows himself to be blessed not when he has managed to get rid of dangers and risks and burdens but when he has been given great and gallant strength to bear them.

Finally, blessedness is in the knowledge that one may be a blessing. That is not an easy truth at first for either individuals or nations to believe in. Jacob at Bethel tried to make a bargain with God as to benefits which might surely come to him—that was his idea of being blessed—but Jesus prayed for his disciples that they might be blessed through him, "For their sakes I sanctify myself" (John 17:19). The Jewish people often had a narrow and selfish concern for their own interests; but the highest vision of the prophets was of a suffering servant of mankind. Whatever the selfishness of men might prefer to think, in God's universe blessedness comes no other way.

3. Nationalism and the Larger Outlook.—As one reads this promise, one has a sense of curious contrast between its two halves. Its climax is that the lineage of Abraham will bring fanaticism, had deepened into a response which involved the intellect and the will, i.e. a response of the whole being.

Finally, in the statement in vs. 3b that by you all the families of the earth will bless themselves, the author has voiced his conviction as to the significance of Israel for mankind and has thus given further expression to the incipient universalism which, it has been seen, informs however rudimentarily the J material in ch. 10.

12:4. In mentioning Lot, J¹ prepares for the story in 13:5-13, which in turn not only sets the stage for the originally independent legends of the destruction of Sodom and of a blessing to the whole earth; but its beginning seems to reflect an unregenerate nationalism. This was what some in early Israel thought that God would promise to those who felt themselves to be his chosen people—a blessing for their friends and a curse upon their enemies. The family consciousness within the nation was an extraordinarily close and vital fact and altogether concrete in what it represented. "For the Israelite it is a matter of course that common flesh makes common character. Therefore family, mishpāhā, is the designation of those who are of the same kind, have the same essential features."⁶ There is a kind of herd instinct which makes a people hostile to all those who are not "of the same kind" and do not have "the same essential features." Many Israelites did not want a God who would be equally the God of all the nations of the earth. They did not want one who would be impartial Holiness. They wanted a God who would be partial to them. So we read in Deuteronomy of demands for a complete extermination of all the non-Israelitish peoples of Palestine: "And when the LORD thy God shall deliver them before thee; thou shalt smite them, and utterly destroy them; thou shalt make no covenant with them, nor show mercy unto them" (Deut. 7:2). And as to the carrying out of that injunction, read the harsh sentences of Deut. 20:10-17. In the twentieth century millions of Jews were exterminated by the savage fanaticism of Hitler. It is one of the tragic ironies of history that the motive for that slaughter could be expressed in terms like those which Israel itself in ancient times did not scruple to proclaim: the right of the preferred people to life and victory, the will-to-power of the master race.

In basic instincts Israel was intensely human, and its history might have been no better than the rest of human history except for one immeasurable fact. This people had the tremendous consciousness that they had been laid hold upon by God. They belonged to him, and his invincible purposes would be worked out through them. That conceivably might have added only a religious fanaticism to their fierce tribal self-assertion. But as a matter of fact it did what was far greater and more wonderful: it led them on from nationalism toward universalism. It made the great souls among them understand that "the glory of thy people Israel" must be to become "a light to lighten the Gentiles." The inspired prophets looked forward to a day when "many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, to the house of the God of Jacob" (Isa. 2:3); in that day it could indeed be said of the seed of Abraham, in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.

That ideal was never fully grasped even by the prophets. Certainly it has never yet been fulfilled. The emergence of a universal family in God still waits to come true in history. But the power that may someday establish it did come into clear and final light in Christ, who lived and died not to be the Savior of one nation only, but by his sacrifice to make "of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth" (Acts 17:26). It is this family of mankind, become obedient to a sovereignty which is mightier than the decrees of dictators or of any other rulers of this earth, which in spite of war and tragedy and destruction must ultimately emerge out of the travailing experience of our human race.

4-5. Vision and Deed.—As a small surface of still water can mirror the immensity of the sky, so these few words reflect a truth that overarches all life and time. It is the truth that the great idea must lead to action. Spiritual opportunity is spiritual obligation. Religion must be obedience. But though that is true, men do not always accept the truth.

So it might have been with Abraham. Instead of responding to the voice in his conscience,

5 And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother's son, and all their sub-which he felt to be the voice of God, he might have refused to heed it for various reasons which were so plausible that they well might have seemed convincing. How did he know that the disturbing and difficult new urging was the voice of God? What practical sense was in it? What proof was there that what it suggested would work out right? Why should any sensible man pay such a price as the breaking up of the whole basis of his life just because of something uncomfortable in his soul? "There is no sense in it," Abraham might have said, just as many men have said. The rich young ruler heard a voice that called him to a complete new commitment, and he refused. So did Nicodemus. So, less conspicuously but not less actually, men and women are doing every day: smothering the voice that speaks of some new movement of the will, of moral courage, of uncalculating loyalty to a far ideal. What has happened, or is happening, in our own souls?

Or the voice may not be refused, but insincerely responded to. Abraham might have accepted the divine message with the momentary enthusiasm of the man who is proud to feel that he has been singled out for special notice, but whose enthusiasm quickly cools when he finds where he must go. Consider the son in Jesus' parable who, when his father bade him go into the vineyard, said, "I go, sir; and went not" (Matt. 21:30). It is one thing to have religious emotion; it is another thing to set the whole life actually in motion on the roads of God. What of church members who can be "just thrilled" by a beautiful service or a sermon, who like to think they are much affected, who will say the Creed and sing the hymns with fervor, but who, as soon as they get outside the church's atmosphere, let their spiritual temperature drop to exactly what it was before.

Again, the voice may be responded to sincerely, but with a sincerity that has shallow roots, i.e., the soul may really mean to obey the heavenly voice, and may begin to do so; it makes a new commitment, starts on some road of honest progress. But the road proves longer and harder than was thought. There are interruptions which stop the first impetus and make it that much more of an effort to start again. Think of what Abraham might have said to himself. The voice had come to him first in Ur of the Chaldeans. He had listened to it, accepted it, started on his way. But through circumstances beyond his control he had had to stop in Haran. He was there long enough to get accustomed to it. He had set out for Canaan, but Canaan was still a long way off and the original impulse could have cooled. Now that he was in Haran, why not stay? Why not let that much of a new venture be enough? Thus many might have asked; thus many might have concluded. Most failures in relation to the road of the ideal are not because of complete unfaithfulness but because faithfulness is not complete. Men who have put their hand to the plow look back, get tired, sit down, and go to sleep.

But Abraham represents a different example. He had the quality of desire, in the first place, which kept him from being disobedient to the heavenly voice; and that kind of desire is not produced in a moment but is present with effective strength at the critical hour if and because a man in the long course of routine days has been cultivating the kind of thoughts and the kind of emotion that make high desires controlling. How did he know the voice was the voice of God? Because there had been developed in himself the kind of responsive conscience which alone can recognize the reality of that voice. So he understood through experience what he repeated in action: that the proof of religious intuition runs not through speculation but through action. The way to be sure whether or not a moving in the soul is the voice of God is to answer it, and see. Jesus said, "If any man will do his will, he shall know" (John 7:17). Read Frederick W. Robertson's sermon on "Obedience as the Organ of Spiritual Knowledge."⁷ James Strachan wrote:

True religion is a willing, cheerful obedience to God. It is only when the will, the controlling faculty, is called into play that religion is actualised. Thomas Fuller more than two centuries ago divided mankind into three classes, intenders, endeavourers, and performers, these making an ascending scale. . . . If we bravely advance through the darkness, we shall have the whole way of life illumined.⁸

So, though Abraham could not foresee the end of his adventure, he had the ready courage to begin. Like Newman, he did not ask to see "the distant scene—one step enough." How many a life needs to learn this truth, that what God asks of any soul is not self-assurance that it can go a long way, but only the humble obedience that makes a start in the right direction. The man who has begun courageously in his heart is no failure.

Moreover, the right spirit in beginning can produce, as in Abraham, the resolution to carry through. He did not stop in Haran because his purpose was too clear and strong for that. The vision of the Promised Land in Canaan neither faded out nor was destroyed by delay; on the contrary, the energy he had put into following it made it dominant. He and those he took with him went forth to go into the land of Canaan; and into . . . Canaan they came. What a challenge is in those words for those whose temptation is to let their best ambitions stop short in moral compromise. How great a thing it would be to say at last like Abraham, like Paul, "I have finished my course" (II Tim. 4:7).

6-8. When Men Worship.—It is told of Abraham not once but repeatedly that he builded an altar unto the LORD. Wherever he was, he worshiped. With his altars he was a representative of man's deepest instinct, the instinct to draw near to God. Worship is independent of time and place. There has been no age and no race in which worship has not appeared. Skeptics, it is true, may deny the value of this fact. Even if worship seems universal, has it not often expressed ideas so primitive and crude as to repel intelligence? But imperfect expressions of a great reality do not destroy the reality itself. It would be stupid to conclude that there is no such thing as medical science because a century and a half ago the search for medical truth had arrived at no better idea than to bleed George Washington to death because he had a cold. It would be stupid to conclude that art has no true validity in its quest for beauty because sometimes it has turned out chromos. It would be stupid likewise to conclude that there is no reality in man's eternal approach to God because men have sought him in forms and rituals which we would not practice now. In religion, as in other areas of experience, the race moves from partial conceptions toward larger fulfillments of the truth which it has felt.

If the search for God is thus instinctive, what does communion with God result in? First, it gives to life a sense of meaning. If existence were only a maze, devoid of any intelligible clue, sooner or later it would become intolerable. Life cannot be lived with any satisfaction unless it falls into patterns which we can understand. The deepest need of every living being is to discover the relationship between himself and the universe in which he moves. Consider a child's growth into awareness and adjustment. Not to make right adjustments is to be forever immature. One person may become a crabbed introvert; another may be interested in other persons, but interested in them only as they serve his selfish interests and ends. But a full development of personality in its human relationships comes only when one discovers the meaning of life in friendship and in love. Without great loyalties and deep emotions life is cramped and mean. But the human spirit cannot stop with mortal satisfactions. Are we only unaided human beings, lighting here under indifferent skies a little flame which tomorrow will be extinguished? If so, then there might be justification of what was written by the father of a brilliant young student in an American university who killed himself. "My son saw no reason in life and so none for it. We do not understand life, and so, not understanding life, we say, some of us, let's end it." That may be the tragic consequence when existence has no meaning and life is

7. At Shechem the Lord appeared to Abraham and told him that he had reached the land which, it was now promised, was to be given to his descendants. This promise is the first rudimentary expression of the idea of the covenant between the Lord and Israel. The fact that J¹, from whom this verse comes, locates this at Shechem suggests that even he, who as will be seen was not familiar with the details of the tradition of Shechem, was aware of the covenant idea which dominated that tradition (see article "The Growth of the Hexateuch," p. 195).

In recording that Abraham built there an altar to the LORD, who had appeared to him, J¹ ascribes to Abraham, the patron of Hebron, the founding of the sanctuary of the oak of Moreh. This was in effect a claim on the part of the Israelite priesthood of Hebron to primacy over the great shrine of the north. This claim should not be dismissed offhand as merely an overt expression of the lust for power and prestige, often supposed, not entirely without justification, to be a dominant characteristic of organized priesthoods. No doubt this element entered into it. But it was also a manifestation of the drive in Yahwism toward a unification of life. Historically, it is probable that there was in this case some ground for the claim, for the sanctuary of Hebron in the time of J¹ would seem to have been controlled by the Levites, the priesthood of Kadesh, which had for whatever reason accompanied the Israelite clans when they moved thence to Palestine. Hebron would thus be the center from which that priesthood infiltrated through Palestine to take over sanctuary after sanctuary for Yahweh, whether by expelling the local priesthood or by incorporating it by a kind of legal fiction into the Levitical caste. If this is the case, then the Israelite priesthood of the oak of Moreh—undoubtedly Levitical when Deut. 27 received its present form—presumably stemmed from Hebron, though having established themselves in Shechem they may well have been unwilling to acknowledge the continued primacy of the parent center which is claimed here.

8. Here the same claim is made as regards Bethel. If the sanctuary referred to was the Aaronite sanctuary of the golden calf, the claim was made with less historical justification than had been the case as regards Shechem, for the Aaronite priesthood of Bethel

But the witness of Abraham is part of the eternal witness that life does signify something. Life had a meaning for him because the divine voice spoke in his conscience and a divine purpose directed him from day to day.

As it is only God who can give life sufficient meaning, so it is only God who can give a happiness which is dependable. Consider the unhappiness of so much contemporary life: with everything to amuse it, not amused; with everything to distract, yet never fully distracted from a sense of hollowness at its heart; with the feet of men and women dancing to jazz, but their souls not dancing, rather moving heavily, knowing that there is nothing adequate to which they could be in tune. Read The Story of My Life, by Clarence Darrow, the brilliant lawyer who called himself an atheist. "Emotionally," he wrote, "I shall no doubt act as others do to the last moment of my existence. With my last breath I shall probably try to draw another, but, intellectually, I am satisfied that life is a serious burden, which no thinking human person would wantonly inflict on some one else."¹ Contrast with that drab disillusionment the highhearted courage of the great men of the O.T. Listen also to Paul's words to the elders of Ephesus, "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so seem to have remained outside of, and indeed opposed to, the Levitical caste (see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 625-26, 631, 635-36). It is possible, however, that the detailed location of the altar is intended to distinguish it from the more famous shrine.

Ai refers to the ruin of a city, burned to the ground between 2200 and 2000 and remaining unoccupied until about 1200 B.C. (see W. F. Albright [describing Mme. Judith Krause-Marquet's excavations at Ai, 1933-35], "Archaeological Exploration and Excavation in Palestine and Syria, 1935," American Journal of Archaeology, XL [1936] 157-58).

It may be noted that in contrast to vs. 7 no theophany is here recorded, so that no reason is provided for Abraham's building of an altar there. This silence is probably the result of the work of J² who, as is indicated by the story in 28:13, 15-16, 19, represented Jacob as the real founder of the sanctuary at Bethel. Unwilling, however, to ignore altogether the linking by J¹ of the shrine with Abraham, he simply struck out here the reference to the theophany.

XV. ABRAHAM IN EGYPT (12:9-13:1)

There are two other recensions of this story in Genesis: one in ch. 20, telling how Abraham represented Sarah as his sister to Abimelech, king of Gerar; the other in 26:1-11, in which Isaac makes the same representation as regards his wife, also to Abimelech. That in ch. 26 is from J¹; that in ch. 20 is from E; the recension in this chapter is accordingly from J², as is further indicated by the fact that Lot is not mentioned in the tale, suggesting an author other than the writer responsible for the groundwork of vss. 1-8.

The story in its earliest Israelite form (J¹) was thus told concerning Isaac. In the development of the southern (J) tradition it was carried over to Abraham—an instance of the tendency to make him, not Isaac, the hero of the legends preserved at Beer-sheba. This tendency, it may be noted, reflects the prestige of the priests of Hebron, that I might finish my course with joy" (Acts 20:24). Watch Francis of Assisi making riches out of deprivation and glory out of loss, so winsome that the very birds would cluster around his hands, so joyous that men honored him as the troubadour of God.

Moreover, it is only through finding God that a life is saved from wavering between skepticism on one side and superstition on the other. It has often been supposed that skepticism would give a satisfying sense of freedom. Get rid of all beliefs and enjoy the irresponsibility of being bound by no convictions! Shrug off all loyalties and devotions! Believe in nothing definite and be bound to nothing! But the terse fact is that though men may think they like this, they do not like it long. When the mind is homeless it grows as unhappy as a homeless body. It must find some sort of shelter in which to rest. Deprived of ancient and august loyalties, men begin instinctively to create new ones which they will adopt. Deprived of one temple, they make another and set up new gods, even in the moment when they think that all gods have been denied. Mark the veneration of the tomb of Lenin in the midst of Soviet Russia, which theoretically has no use for God or for religion. Note the tragic result in Germany when the inherited religion of Christendom was repudiated and in its place came the barbaric new superstitions of race and blood and soil.

Abraham building his altars is back in the dawn of the Bible's history of man's approach to God. But he had his face toward the true light. He was seeking him whom afterward the prophets interpreted and Jesus revealed—God in whom alone life finds meaning and happiness and assurance.

9-10. Egypt and Israel.—Abraham and Egypt—a suggestive contrast emerges. How insignificant Abraham and all he represented appeared to be as compared with Egypt! On the one hand, an unimportant wanderer; on the other hand, a proud civilization, ancient and deep-rooted. At the time when Abraham conjecturally came within its borders the history of its life already went back more than two thousand years. From the rich valley of the Nile and from their conquests beyond it the Pharaohs drew the wealth to build the magnificence of Memphis and Thebes and the colossal temples at Karnak; and the pyramids were even then cenwho were thus able to associate with their patron saint the traditions of other sanctuaries which originally had known nothing of him.

Not only has Abraham been substituted for Isaac in this recension, but the scene has been changed from Gerar to Egypt. This again magnified the importance of Abraham who is thus represented as having had contacts not merely with the Philistines and other neighboring peoples, but even on one occasion with Egypt, where he was received as an equal by the Pharaoh himself.

There may also be here a reminiscence of the exodus tradition, as though the story of how Jacob went down into Egypt, where his descendants ultimately triumphed over the Pharaoh, was thought not to be sufficient. Popular legend weaving therefore evolved this tale—basing it on the story now preserved in 26:1-11—that Abraham himself had anticipated all this. Because of famine he had gone down to Egypt (vs. 10; cf. chs. 41-45), where he was deprived of his wife (vs. 15; cf. the persecution of Exod. 1:11-22); nevertheless he grew wealthy (vs. 16; cf. Exod. 1:9), the Pharaoh was plagued (vs. 17; cf.

tures old. What did it matter to Egypt or to history that this Hebrew should exist? To Egypt, nothing; to history, more than Egypt itself would ultimately mean. Egypt represented material pride and power and possessions, and all these would crumble. Abraham represented a new spiritual impulse, and this would be creative long after Egypt should have ceased to count. A lesson is here in the relative values which history reveals; a lesson, too, specifically for those who forget or belittle the contribution to history of the Jews. Abraham is the symbol and the foreshadowing of something immeasurable that was to come: a nation that should influence the world to a degree that outstripped every seeming probability. Ponder the mystery of the forces that may emerge through some great personality or from some limited human group. Thus God enters and re-enters history, not by outward acts, but by the new dynamic he has put within human instruments.

So much for the general fact. What specifically are the contributions that have come to human life through the family of Abraham, and what therefore is the debt that humanity owes to the Jews? First, the imprint of the moral law. Every people has had its codes of conduct, but the Jewish perception of what the right life ought to be attained a singular loftiness and dignity. It was crystallized in the Ten Commandments. Consider the immense influence which the Ten Commandments have exerted through centuries of history. They have reflected the absolute distinction which exists between the basic rights and wrongs—an absoluteness which needs to be continually reasserted against the relativism of morals by which individuals and nations may be corrupted. Family disloyalty, adultery, stealing, lying, killing, are outrages against an eternal order which men disobey only at their peril and can never with impunity defy: that is the truth which the Jewish people through the Ten Commandments have handed down. As Henry C. Link, psychologist, has written in The Rediscovery of Morals: "Times and customs may change, but the basic moral laws are just as changeless as the law of gravity or the axioms of mathematics."²

Outrages against an eternal order—let the mind linger upon the significance of those words. In the Ten Commandments the standards held up for human conduct are not shifting calculation and expediency; they are the recognition of the higher Will to which the human conscience must be sensitive if it is to steer straight. The six commandments which have to do with "our duty to our neighbor" are not the first six, but the second; they follow the four commandments which have to do with "our duty to God." Thus, morality must be grounded in religion. It is only when men hold themselves accountable to an everlasting Righteousness that they will keep on dealing rightly with one another. Consider what happened to Germany when Nazi leaders, in the insolence of their imagined power, thought they could get rid of the God of the Ten Commandments. Consider the nemesis that certainly lurks in any other atheistic system which makes the end justify the means and holds traditional morality in contempt. The conscience which Judaism has put into so much of our civilization knows better. "Sin is a reproach to any people" (Prov. 14:34); and, in the end, it is ruin too.

As the Jews gave to humanity its clearest recognition of the moral law, so they gave the enlarging interpretation of law and of life which was voiced by the prophets. Law may become fossilized. It has its codes of duty which may be sufficient for one age but may be too narrow for the needs of the next. Religion may become identified with a conservative priestcraft which is obsessed with ritual and regularity and has no vision for new ways of Exod. 7-10). At this point, however, the parallel breaks down, for the implication of vs. 19b-20 is that Abraham was expelled from the country in disgrace (contrast Exod. 14:8b). It is not impossible that this, together with the Pharaoh's stern rebuke, is due to a revision to which the story was subjected by J² who, compelled by the popularity of the tale—evidenced by the fact of its three recensions—to include it in his narrative, was nevertheless not too happy about it.

Gunkel maintains that the story implies that the Pharaoh actually entered into marital relations with Sarah (Genesis, pp. 173, 225). However, had J² intended such a representation he would have stated the fact explicitly by saying, e.g., at the end of vs. 15, that Pharaoh lay with her. Furthermore, it is impossible to suppose that in adapting the original Isaac legend to Abraham, popular imagination—to say nothing of J²—would have gratuitously (26:10 is specific in its statement that Rebekah had escaped the possible consequences of Isaac's deception) represented the wife of Abraham as having suffered such an indignity. Rather, all three recensions imply that the woman involved was divinely protected from this.

The moral implications of the story will be considered in the Exeg. on ch. 26.

obedience into which God means a people to move forward. There was priestcraft in Israel, just as there has been everywhere (remember Amaziah at Bethel); but the unique contribution of Israel was that it produced the prophets. No such inspired succession of clear-seeing men has appeared in any other nation. They simplified religion and at the same time expanded it. "What doth the LORD require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" asked Micah (6:8); "I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts," said Jeremiah (31:33) in the name of God. Religion thus simplified as the contact of the human heart with the living God has the endless expansiveness of an overflowing fountain. What God wanted in men was not little pools of segregated piety; he wanted them to be the channels through which his redeeming purpose would flow to every area of life. "Let judgment run down as waters, and righteousness as a mighty stream" (Amos 5:24). So wherever the heritage of Judaism has entered into it, religion can never stagnate. It will always be prophetic for the higher and better life that ought to be.

Again, the gift of Judaism is the note of promise. Even in the darkest times it had indomitable hope. Men should yet see "the Sun of righteousness arise with healing in his wings" (Mal. 4:2). Messiah would come. And from the Jewish race and out of a Jewish home he did come.

10-20. The Supremacy of God.—In this unvarnished story there are several points that are significant. Conspicuous—to begin with—is the fact that here, as elsewhere, the O.T. is written with an unhesitating realism. The faults of even its greatest figures are not disguised. What Abraham is described as having done when he went into Egypt would throw discredit on any man. Being afraid that the Egyptians would covet Sarah, and thinking that if they knew she was tied to him as her husband they would kill him to get possession of her, he persuaded Sarah to pose as his unmarried sister; and as such she was taken to the house of Pharaoh. In the climax of the story the Egyptian stands in a much better light than Abraham, the man of the covenant; for he denounced indignantly the lie that Abraham had told him, gave Sarah back to him, and let him go out of the country with the rich possessions which had been bestowed upon him when Sarah was first taken. What is this that thou hast done unto me? he demanded of Abraham when he learned of Abraham's deception. So, as Frederick W. Robertson has written:

The man of God was rebuked by the man of the world: a thing singularly humiliating. It is common to find men of the world whose honor and integrity is a shame to every Christian; and common enough to find men of religious feeling and aspiration, of whom that same world is compelled to say that whenever they are tried in business there is always a something found wanting. . . . Morality is not religion; but unless religion is grafted on morality, religion is worth nothing.*

* Notes on Genesis (New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 1877), p. 53.

11 And it came to pass, when he was come near to enter into Egypt, that he said unto Sarai his wife, Behold now, I know that thou art a fair woman to look upon:

12 Therefore it shall come to pass, when the Egyptians shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife: and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive.

13 Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister: that it may be well with me for thy sake; and my soul shall live because of thee.

14 ¶ And it came to pass, that, when Abram was come into Egypt, the Egyptians beheld the woman that she was very fair.

15 The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and commended her before Pharaoh: and the woman was taken into Pharaoh's house.

16 And he entreated Abram well for her sake: and he had sheep, and oxen, and he asses, and menservants, and maidservants, and she asses, and camels.

17 And the LORD plagued Pharaoh and his house with great plagues, because of Sarai, Abram's wife.

18 And Pharaoh called Abram, and said, What is this that thou hast done unto me? why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife?

19 Why saidst thou, She is my sister? so I might have taken her to me to wife: now therefore behold thy wife, take her, and go thy way.

20 And Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him: and they sent him away, and his wife, and all that he had.

11 When he was about to enter Egypt, he said to Sar'ai his wife, "I know that you are a woman beautiful to behold; 12 and when the Egyptians see you, they will say, 'This is his wife'; then they will kill me, but they will let you live. 13 Say you are my sister, that it may go well with me because of you, and that my life may be spared on your account." 14 When Abram entered Egypt the Egyptians saw that the woman was very beautiful. 15 And when the princes of Pharaoh saw her, they praised her to Pharaoh. And the woman was taken into Pharaoh's house. 16 And for her sake he dealt well with Abram; and he had sheep, oxen, he-asses, menservants, maidservants, she-asses, and camels.

17 But the LORD afflicted Pharaoh and his house with great plagues because of Sar'ai, Abram's wife. 18 So Pharaoh called Abram, and said, "What is this you have done to me? Why did you not tell me that she was your wife? 19 Why did you say, 'She is my sister,' so that I took her for my wife? Now then, here is your wife, take her, and be gone." 20 And Pharaoh gave men orders concerning him; and they set him on the way, with his wife and all that he had.

11. The representation that Sarah was a beautiful woman and still physically desirable is of course at variance with vs. 4*b*, according to which Abraham was at the time seventy-five years old, and Sarah therefore (cf. 17:17) sixty-five, and is an outstanding indication of the use of different source documents.

That this story, so unflattering to Abraham, should have a place in Genesis is one of many evidences that for those who compiled the book the supreme focus of interest was not any man, however great, but God. Though the pages are full of vivid human characters the essential drama is not human but divine. We see what Abraham did when he went down into Egypt, but that was not the decisive factor. The natural consequence of his acts would have been disaster, but God prevented that disaster. Even in the times when Abraham failed, God's purpose for him would not fail. That is the mighty faith which is here expressed, and that same faith shines like a great shaft of light down all O.T. history. In the confidence it gave, the people of Israel went ahead on their eternal road, unshakably convinced that behind the dim unknown, Standeth God within the shadow keeping watch

When a people believes thus in a divine will that shapes its destiny, it will have—as Israel has had through all its generations—incredible tenacity to face the future, no matter what it may be.

13:1. And Lot with him is an incorrect gloss, as the absence of mention of Lot in 12:9-20 indicates. J² represented him as having remained at Bethel during Abraham's absence.

The section 12:9-10a implies that Abraham had remained for some time in the Negeb before entering Egypt. This verse brings him back to the Negeb again, thus suggesting that the J² document included here a story connected with some southern sanctuary. This story is now found in ch. 16, and the sanctuary was, in the original form of the tradition, probably Beer-sheba. The present position of the tale is due to RP who, influenced by the P representation that Abraham's only dwelling place in Palestine was Kiriath-arba, i.e., Hebron (23:2), placed it after the notice of his arrival there (13:18).

XVI. ABRAHAM AND LOT (13:2-18)

2-18. Vs. 2 was the original continuation in J¹ of 12:8 and was followed by vs. 5. Vss. 3-4 are from J²—with some glossing—to bring Abraham back to Bethel where he had left Lot. Vss. 5-18 are a conflation of J and P, the P material being vss. 6, 11b, 12abc—probably the immediate continuation of 12:5. P thus omitted the notices that Abraham built altars at Shechem and Bethel, for on his theory there were no sacrifices and so no altars until the law had been given at Sinai. He also omitted all reference to Abraham's sojourn in Egypt and, in accordance with his usual practice in the history of the patriarchs, reduced the detailed narrative of vss. 7-11a to the bare notice of vs. 6.

The J story sets the stage for the tale of the destruction of Sodom (19:1-28) which was originally quite independent of that in 18:1-16, the nucleus of the Abraham cycle.

So in the accounts of individuals in the O.T. the emphasis is always on a level different from ordinary biographies. On the stage of the vast O.T. story no mortal persons, not even the most important, determine its action and its meaning. The cosmic drama centers not in what they do but in what Another does. Abraham or some other human figure may be for the moment in the foreground; but always back of him and above him, as here particularly in Abraham's undeserved deliverance, is the majesty of God. Within the framework of O.T. faith, therefore, the final significance of the story of Abraham in Egypt is not that Abraham failed to be a hero; rather, it is in the fact that God's will is in control, whether those who are his instruments are for the moment worthy or unworthy. As in Christian doctrines of the sacraments, faith believes that God's grace comes to the worshiper even though the ministrant is not free from sin, so long ago the men of the O.T. saw God's grace unflinching at work according to his covenant. A man like Abraham might fall into dishonor. That was a shadow upon the course of history; but no shadow of human dereliction could obscure the light of the heavenly purpose that was building a road of redemption which went on through every obstacle, undefeated by any sin.

13:1-4. Dedication Renewed.—In 12:8 there was the first mention of the name that was to be sacred in the history of Israel henceforth—the name of Bethel. At Bethel Abraham set up his first altar in the Land of Promise, to which by God's moving he had come from Ur. Since then he had been down into Egypt, where through a lapse in courage and in honesty he ran into a danger which, except for God's saving mercy, might have been disastrous. He was coming back now with the rewards which, without deserving them, he had had from Pharaoh, very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold. That might have turned his head and made him imagine that his own cleverness and good luck could get him all he wanted. But what he did was to go back to the altar of his

4 Unto the place of the altar, which he had made there at the first: and there Abram called on the name of the LORD.

5 ¶ And Lot also, which went with Abram, had flocks, and herds, and tents.

6 And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together: for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together.

7 And there was a strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle and the herdmen of Lot's cattle: and the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelt then in the land.

ning, between Bethel and Ai, 4 to the place where he had made an altar at the first; and there Abram called on the name of the LORD. 5 And Lot, who went with Abram, also had flocks and herds and tents, 6 so that the land could not support both of them dwelling together; for their possessions were so great that they could not dwell together, 7 and there was strife between the herdsmen of Abram's cattle and the herdsmen of Lot's cattle. At that time the Canaanites and the Perizzites dwelt in the land.

To give unity to his narrative, J¹ first identified the hero of the Sodom saga with the father of Moab and Ammon, and then made him the nephew of Abraham who had come with him from the desert. This story explains how he came to be living in Sodom instead first dedication, and there again he called on the name of the LORD. What was symbolized here in the case of Abraham can be a saving fact in every life. Suppose at the beginning of each chapter of new experience a man sets up the altar of a new consciousness of God, his own Bethel where he perceives and acknowledges his need of heavenly light and guidance. Suppose then that like Abraham he moves on to something that outwardly may seem to have been successful but which inwardly he knows he should be ashamed of. It is well for him that he has that first altar to which he can go back in humility and penitence for renewal of his dedication.

5-8. The Good and the Bad in Strife.—The words Let there be no strife . . . between me and thee have to do with a personal relationship. Abraham and Lot were kinsmen, and between them there was the further bond of a long-shared experience. It is easy to understand that Abraham, being the sort of man he was, wanted to prevent any strife with Lot and would go a long way to avoid it. But the words suggest a larger thought. To what extent is it a desirable and possible ideal that there should be no strife between human beings?

On the one hand, peace seems unrealistic. Life appears to be largely a process of strife. Through the long course of biological evolution the unfit have had to give way to the fit. Organisms capable of adapting themselves to environment have survived; those incapable have perished. Stronger types thus have developed. On the human level, as well as on lower ones, the creative results of struggle can be seen. The more energetic and resourceful individuals, families, and nations have outstripped inferior ones, and in so doing have been the pioneers of advancing civilization. And within civilization an element of strife seems still to be necessary if life and character are not to deteriorate. The individual who is relieved from any necessity to strive grows flabby. "Rich folk's children," said Martin Luther, "seldom turn out well. They are complacent, arrogant, and conceited, and think they need to learn nothing because they have enough to live on anyway."⁵

It is a familiar maxim that "competition is the life of trade." Unless men are pitted against one another in some way that excites their efforts and stimulates their wits the whole possibility of accomplishment is apt to stagnate. Consider the ultimate failure of utopian experiments—like Brook Farm and the Oneida Community—where people were segregated from the provocative currents of the general life, and competition was renounced in a little society where everybody was to take care of everybody else. All the eager idealism invested there could not make what was supposed to be a strifeless society endure.

Still more surely do human arrangements seem to stagnate when competition is removed for other and less worthy reasons. All vested interests which stifle competition become inefficient and frequently also corrupt. Consider the sections where there is some dominant economic power, or only one political party, or organs of opinion such as newspapers which have bought out all opposition. One of the worst features of the United States Congress is the flabby principle of seniority, which automatically gives powerful committee chairmanships to the old men. The stodgy rule of precedence is substituted for the test of excellence. Totalitarian governments set themselves to destroy domestic strife altogether by clamping down an iron uniformity, but the forces of life will either revolt or be paralyzed. There would be peril in world government if it fell into the control of one or two of the great powers. Inequities within a nation and injustices between nations seem to require for their correction some sort of strife. Can the component parts of any society ever successfully therefore say to one another, Let there be no strife . . . between me and thee?

Yet on the other hand, the evils that may come from strife are plain: the devil-take-the-hindmost principle in business competition, ruthless inequalities of rewards, international trade rivalries with exploitation of weak people and the weapons of tariffs and embargoes used against one another by the strong, growing antagonisms which break out at last into war.

Thus, though the element of strife cannot and perhaps ought not to be eliminated from the general life, there is sharp necessity to correct the evils associated with it. The problem is to adjust it and to make it wholesome.

Steps toward that end may begin with the elimination, by private conscience and by public control, of unfairness. In too many human relationships there are intolerable handicaps laid upon many for the advantage of the few. A century ago the farm laborer or tenant in the country and the worker in the industrial towns were at the mercy of landlords and employers. Some still are. Minority races, such as the Negro in the United States, meet barriers put across the road of their advancement. Children of the poor, no matter how great may be their inherent abilities, are condemned to menial opportunities if they grow up under conditions which leave them physically undernourished and intellectually untrained. In the necessary competition for livelihood there is always struggle, but struggle in which every individual has a fair start and a square deal is different from the crooked fight which is decided by a foul. In every civilized country there is progress in the public opinion, crystallized in law and public policy, which requires a decent chance for health and education for all children, protection of weak groups from exploitation, the right of working people to organize collectively—in short, provision everywhere for making competition fair.

The criterion of excellence is the positive side of the removal of unfairness. Wherever advantage is gained by favor and pull individuals are corrupted and social good retarded. The kind of competition in which men advance according to demonstrated character and ability brings benefit all around. An example of its perversion is the cheap political patronage on which the government of many American cities is built.

And excellence should be in service. The International Rotary Club has the motto "He profits most who serves best." That might be piety commercialized, but it may be instead a genuine glimpse of a great truth: that in the long run society, and the individual members of it, can prosper only as men honestly strive to produce what is for the general good.

The next step away from unhealthy strife is co-operation. If natural selection governed the early stages of evolution, mutual aid may govern the climactic stages. Note the vital importance of the commissions of the United Nations which are trying to promote for universal benefit, world-wide agreements on access to raw materials, unhampered commerce, the safeguarding of public health, economic and social progress—a kind of co-operation which may remove the tensions that otherwise build up to the insane strife of war.

Finally, through such educative processes of mutual benefit the peoples of the world may learn on the great scale of humanity what Abraham remembered in his relationship with Lot: the bond of kinship. For in the supreme desires all men are akin: in the desire for a decent existence, for freedom from fear and freedom from want, for the chance for themselves and their children to pursue their various ways in peace. And to the extent that the Christian message is not only preached but believed in and put increasingly into practice, we may approach that religious kinship in which men everywhere will be quicker to recognize their own sins and more magnanimous to others who with them are of the one family of "Our Father."

If you take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if you take the right hand, then I will go to the left." 10 And Lot lifted up his eyes, and saw that the Jordan valley was well watered everywhere like the garden of the LORD, like the land of Egypt in the direction of Zo'ar; this was before the LORD de-

A. ABRAHAM'S MAGNANIMITY (13:2-9)

9. The magnanimity of Abraham should be noted; Lot is given first choice.

B. LOT MOVES TO SODOM (13:10-13)

10. By the plain of Jordan (KJV) is meant the lower part of the Jordan valley (RSV), beginning about twenty-five miles north of the Dead Sea and including apparently the basin of the Dead Sea itself, i.e., the author believed that the Dead Sea had come into existence at the time of the destruction of Sodom (cf. 14:3). This was of course quite erroneous. "Geological evidence proves that that amazing depression in the earth's surface had existed for ages before the advent of man on the earth, and formed, from the first, part of a great inland lake whose waters stood originally several hundred feet higher than the present level of the Dead Sea" (Skinner, Genesis, p. 273).

9-13. The Mean Man's Folly.—Lot was a man who made what seemed to be a clever choice but which turned out to be a wrong one. He set the example which has been followed by innumerable people since his time who have reached out for what they thought was easy gain and instead have got disaster. The story of Lot is the more arresting because it might have been so different. When we first see him, everything is optimistic. He is disposed to be a good man, at least to the extent of Mr. By-ends in The Pilgrim's Progress, who said:

It is true we somewhat differ in religion from those of the stricter sort, yet but in two small points: first, we never strive against wind and tide; secondly, we are always most zealous when Religion goes in his silver slippers; we love much to walk with him in the street, if the sun shines, and the people applaud him.*

Lot had associations of the kind that can keep a man up to what he ought to be. He was Abraham's nephew and Abraham's friend; and even when he did not deserve it Abraham stood by him and never let him down. If he had stayed with Abraham he would have kept out of trouble. But when their interests split, he thought he saw a chance to get the better of a deal, and he went off to live in Sodom, even though any man of sense would have known that Sodom was a place to be avoided like the plague.

Note how the facts develop. Abraham and Lot with their respective families and retainers are moving here and there through Canaan, according to where they find pasture for their flocks. The herdsmen of the two begin to quarrel. That distresses Abraham, though it does not seem to have troubled Lot. The one thing Abraham is most bent upon is that friendship should not be embittered; personal loss is to him a secondary matter. So when it seems necessary to separate he offers the advantage wholeheartedly to Lot. Let Lot say whichever part of the land he wants for his own flocks. He can have first choice and Abraham will take what he has left. A right-spirited man would have refused an offer so one-sided, but this man snapped it up. Lot's only concern was to make sure that he used his advantage to the limit. That was his first step in the wrong direction.

The next one followed naturally. The man who had the essential meanness that made him interested only in himself had therefore a moral nearsightedness that kept him from intelligently estimating his own interest. He looked about the land and chose what pleased the eye. All the country in the valley of the Jordan was green and well watered; it was as inviting as a garden but in its human aspect it was no 11 Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east: and they separated themselves the one from the other.

12 Abram dwelt in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelt in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom.

13 But the men of Sodom were wicked and sinners before the LORD exceedingly.

stroyed Sodom and Gomor'rah. 11 So Lot chose for himself all the Jordan valley, and Lot journeyed east; thus they separated from each other. 12 Abram dwelt in the land of Canaan, while Lot dwelt among the cities of the valley and moved his tent as far as Sodom. 13 Now the men of Sodom were wicked, great sinners against the LORD.

The verse has been extensively glossed; in the direction of Zoar (cf. 19:22) is connected with everywhere; all that intervenes is secondary. Like the garden of the LORD refers to 2:10; the land of Egypt is also irrigated by a river.

12. Moved his tent as far as Sodom seems to imply that Lot did not at this time take up residence in Sodom but continued to live as a nomad or seminomad in the plain outside the city. On the other hand, in ch. 19 he is living in Sodom and there is no notice in the extant intervening J material of his having changed his mode of life.

13. The verse is not in condemnation of Lot's indifference, but simply part of J1's preparation for ch. 19. With this verse may be contrasted 18:20-21 (J2).

garden. It was the territory adjacent to Sodom, and the men of Sodom were wicked and sinners before the LORD exceedingly. A fine country to make fat sheep, but a poor place for a man to risk his fate. Once he got to Sodom, Lot had an unhappy conscience. He did not like the corrupt things that went on there but his dislike was never virile enough to make him get up and leave. Instead, he stayed in Sodom, complaining but also compromising (cf. ch. 19) until the wickedness of Sodom led to its destruction and he lost all his possessions and barely got away with his life.

Abraham, meanwhile, who had given generously when Lot was concerned only to grab, had gone into paths that God could bless. When Lot took the low road because it was the easy one, he took the high road. And he had gone where Lot had no steady will to go, viz., through the choices day by day which a man makes by asking not "Will it pay?" but "Is it right?"

Note that there are always two classes of men; and regarding them, every man needs to consider which one he is tending to belong to: the men like Lot or the men like Abraham. It is a distinction that confronts every young man who first surveys his world and determines what kind of "success" he will aim at. It confronts every mature person in the recurring decisions where conscience would go one way and the temptation to experiment in Sodom points another. The danger of becoming like Lot is in the fact that a man gets there by degrees. Lot began as a decent person; yet he ended not only in disaster, but caught in a debacle which the environment he had chosen for his family and the influences he had thus created for them brought about (read ch. 19). It is not only the risks a man runs directly but the risks that indirectly he produces which may be decisive. The steps by which Lot came to the end he reached have been well suggested by James Strachan in Hebrew Ideals:⁷

First, Lot looked toward Sodom (vs. 10). That was partly accident. He was looking all about to make what he thought would be a shrewd decision, and Sodom happened to be among the possibilities. He was not responsible for its existence; what he was responsible for was the appeal he let its existence make to him. Second, he pitched his tent toward Sodom (vs. 12). He had not decided yet to go into it, but he was led closer to its attraction because the prosperity he wanted seemed to lie in its environment. When later he had been sucked into the life of Sodom he might have offered the excuse that he had not originally intended that. But the answer he got might have been like the answer of a father to his son who was caught in an act he should have been ashamed of. Said the boy, "But I didn't mean to." "That is not enough," was the reply. "You should have meant not to." Lot did not positively mean not to.

And so—third—he "dwelt in Sodom" (14:12). Having got that far in his descending choices, it is not surprising that when the critical hour came and the society he shared was ripe for judgment he could not bring himself to break with Sodom. "He lingered" there (19:16). In the same gradual fashion many a life may lose the chance to take the high road with Abraham, and instead will take the low road with Lot.

C. ABRAHAM SETTLES IN HEBRON (13:14-18)

14-17. The Fallacy of Bigness.—There is an almost invincible human tendency to think that greatness is a matter of size. A small boy brags that he is taller than another boy or, if the other boy has something, that he has something bigger and better than that. Chambers of commerce advertise their cities' populations or the amount of bank clearings and commercial profits. Nations embark on policies of expansion. In its interpretation of the promise that God made to Abraham and to the nation whose father he should be even Genesis partially reflects the idea that to be bigger is to be better. That nation should possess unbounded lands. It should grow to infinite numbers.

But greatness is not a matter of size. Bulk and bigness are not decisive. The huge reptiles which once dominated the earth, the dinosaurs and the brontosaurus, were enormous. So was the mammoth. But they have all become extinct. Notwithstanding their size and seeming strength they could not adapt themselves to a changing world. Similarly, great empires have perished in spite of their physical dimensions. Ponder the history of Assyria, of the kingdoms of Alexander the Great, of the Roman Empire, of sixteenth-century Spain. Remember the lines in Kipling's "Recessional,"

Lo, all our pomp of yesterday
Is one with Nineveh and Tyre!^a

Mussolini might well have reflected upon that before he proclaimed, as he did again and again in flamboyant speeches, that the power of a nation is rooted in its ability to expand, and that unless Italy embarked on the adventures of expansion she was living a useless national existence; and Hitler likewise might well have paused before he launched Nazi Germany upon its program of ruthless conquests and boasted that the Third Reich would "last for a thousand years."

So there is a fallacy of bigness. Wherein does this fallacy lie? To begin with, bigness arouses fear. In all life there is instinctive resistance to physical domination. In the measure that a nation appears able to impose its will the antagonism of others begins to be organized against it. At the same time, while bigness is provoking opposition without, it may be producing inefficiency within. That was the trouble with the Roman Empire. It spread so far that there was not sufficient intelligence and clear purpose at the center to maintain it. Bigness not only in a military but in an economic and industrial sense is subject to the same dangers. In the United States the very vastness of the nation's resources raises the question as to whether sufficient intelligence and moral force can be mobilized to prevent huge energies from passing through domestic conflict into chaos. The more dominant one class becomes within a nation, or the more dominant one nation becomes upon the earth, the greater may be its danger. As Lord Acton wrote, "All power corrupts. Absolute power corrupts absolutely." Finally, the fact of bigness and the boastful satisfaction which it brings may make a nation as well as an individual blind to the day of crisis. Consider Jesus' parable of the man who built his greater barns and was sure that he had an unlimited time in which to eat, drink, and be merry. Yet that night his soul was required of him. The life of a nation, like the life of every man, stands ultimately accountable to the judgments of God. No amount of material possessions can save it unless it maintains its soul.

14-17. What Makes a Nation Great?—There is, as we have seen, a fallacy of bigness. It is true that in the case of a nation this does not mean that material elements have no importance. The nation with the large population and with great resources can play an additionally powerful role in history, but great power misused can no less surely provoke disintegration and doom. The ultimate determinant is not in mass but quality. Athens was great, though physically she was small; so was medieval Florence; so has been the Jewish nation. Like other nations, it has had its sins

15 For all the land which thou seest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever.

16 And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered.

17 Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee.

by one who presumably felt that Abraham's magnanimity should receive some immediate recognition.

18. For oaks should be read with the LXX and Syriac, "oak"; cf. the reference to "the tree"—singular—in 18:4, 8; also "the oak of Moreh," in 12:6. The statement that Abraham immediately upon his arrival at Hebron built an altar to the LORD divorces his founding of the sanctuary there from the theophany recorded in 18:1-8, with which it was originally connected. In both J¹ and J² the story in ch. 18 followed at once upon this verse, but the altar had already been built, and by implication the cult was inaugurated by Abraham before "the LORD appeared to him" (18:1).

and blunders, but it has also pointed the way to realities which in God's eyes make a nation great.

What are these elements of greatness? First, a sense of spiritual destiny. Israel always had that. Read the farewell address attributed to Moses in Deut. 8. Consider the hope of the great prophets, such as appears in Isa. 11. In the times when any nation has had claim to moral and spiritual greatness, it has been because that nation had a sense of destiny infused with a religious passion. Reflect upon the struggles of the Netherlands for freedom against Spain. Think of the best elements in the British Empire as it develops into a commonwealth of nations, inspired by a common ideal of democracy. As concerns the United States, read James Truslow Adams, The Epic of America,¹ and Ralph Barton Perry, Puritanism and Democracy.²

A nation's greatness may be tested by the quality of the men it exalts and honors. See in the O.T. how the great figures are chiefly those not of military conquerors but of men whose conquests were in the arena of the soul: Abraham, Joseph, Moses, Elijah, and all the prophets. The hero David, it is true, was in some measure a conqueror, but even he was exalted mostly because he was believed to have been chosen by God as "a man after his own heart" (I Sam.

13:14). The souls of nations will be tested today by the type of men they really honor.

The greatness of a nation depends also upon its ability to endure. A notable pageant which dramatized Jewish history was entitled The Eternal Road, and it showed through the centuries Israel's loyalty and devotion moving on in spite of persecution and disaster. No nation can last if it has not suffered. Consider the immense patience and courage of China's people through World War II. Read the speeches of Winston Churchill when he said in the House of Commons on June 18, 1940, the most desperate moment of England's danger, that the nation must so bear itself that "if the British Commonwealth and Empire last for a thousand years, men will still say 'This was their finest hour.'"

The great nation looks forward and not backward. There comes a time in many so-called patriotic organizations when they lose the spirit which they claim to represent and become mere stubborn guardians of a fossilized past. The message of the prophets in Israel was something greater that was always beckoning, a messianic purpose for the nation and the world. The great nation must have a consciousness of "the living God," and so must know that its conception of its own destiny is to be continued and renewed and extended.

XVII. THE WAR OF THE KINGS (14:1-24)

This narrative is an isolated unit belonging to none of the main documents of the Hexateuch (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 288-90; Skinner, Genesis, pp. 271-76), and comes from an age which "admires military glory all the more because it can conduct no wars itself; . . . an age in which, in spite of a certain historical erudition, the historic sense of Judaism had sunk almost to zero" (Skinner, Genesis, p. 274, quoting from the second edition [p. 255] of Gunkel's commentary). It is thus of much the same character as the book of Judith and the Chronicler's accounts of military exploits.

The tale itself provides evidence of its unhistorical character: (a) The representation that four great rulers of the east themselves moved westward to curb the revolt of five petty kings in Palestine (vss. 5-9) and that they came by the circuitous route outlined in vss. 5-7. (b) The representation that Abraham with 318 retainers defeated the combined armies of the eastern kings (vss. 14-15). In this connection it may be noted that nowhere else in the tradition is Abraham represented as living in such state. In ch. 23 (P), for instance, he is a lone stranger among the Hittite inhabitants of Kiriath-arba. (c) The representation that the Dead Sea was not yet in existence (cf. 13:10). It should be said, however, that the words in vs. 3, that is, the Salt Sea, may be a gloss, and so may not reflect accurately the thought of the original author.

Nevertheless, the author may have been, and probably was, piecing together fragments of different historical traditions. The names of the four kings in vs. 1 may be historical, though it does not follow that they acted together as the narrative depicts, or even that they were contemporaries. Vss. 5-7 may preserve an authentic though distorted tradition of an Elamite subjugation of southern Palestine—not of a punitive raid upon recalcitrant vassal kings. And the story of Abraham's pursuit and defeat of the kings may echo an actual event, such as a surprise attack by a band of Palestinians upon a raiding force which would, however, have been much smaller than is represented here.

A. THE WAR (14:1-16)

14:1. On the identification of the kings see Skinner, Genesis, ad loc., who notes the attempt which has been made to identify Amraphel with the well-known Hammurabi

14:1-16. The Ancient Evil: War.—Here in the Bible we come upon its first glorification of war. It will be followed by many chronicles of the same spirit: in Exodus, in Joshua, in Judges, and so through a long line. The proudest literature of other peoples, from Homer's Iliad on, is full of the sound of war. The reason for this is plain enough. Human existence has always been a struggle. Man fought first for survival against the beasts, then for hunting grounds and food. Individual fighting expanded into the mutual ferocity of tribes. The deep primal instinct of self-preservation was at the root of it. In part of his nature man expressed, and still expresses, the inheritance of the jungle and a demonic element that is in his humanity itself.

That would make him take war for granted. But it was something more that made him glorify it. War has been the most vivid expression of qualities that he held as noble. It represented physical hardihood, discipline, and uncalculating courage. It involved the willingness of the individual to risk his life, and if necessary to lose it, for the sake of the group. In its romantic development war was clothed with the mantle of chivalry and provided a symbol of gallantry and heroic greatness. Because war thus embodied so many of humanity's ideals it became almost identified with the supreme ideal. It grew to seem synonymous not only with romance but with religion. The wars of the O.T. are the wars of the Lord. Christian civilizations—or those that think themselves to be such—like to call their wars "crusades."

So it is true that this story of Abraham the warrior has been a welcome passage for many preachers. So have the many other accounts of 2 That these made war with Bera king of Sodom, and with Birsha king of Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admah, and Shemeber king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela, which is Zoar.

3 All these were joined together in the vale of Siddim, which is the salt sea.

4 Twelve years they served Chedorlaomer, and in the thirteenth year they rebelled.

5 And in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, and the kings that were with him, and smote the Rephaim in Ashteroth Karnaim, and the Zuzim in Ham, and the Emim in Shaveh Kiriathaim,

6 And the Horites in their mount Seir, unto El-paran, which is by the wilderness.

7 And they returned, and came to Enmishpat, which is Kadesh, and smote all the country of the Amalekites, and also the Amorites, that dwelt in Hazezon-tamar.

Goi'im, 2 these kings made war with Bera king of Sodom, Birsha king of Gomor'rah, Shinab king of Admah, Sheme'ber king of Zeboi'im, and the king of Bela (that is, Zo'ar). 3 All these joined forces in the Valley of Siddim (that is, the Salt Sea).

4 Twelve years they had served Chedorlao'mer, but in the thirteenth year they rebelled. 5 In the fourteenth year Chedorlao'mer and the kings who were with him came and subdued the Reph'aim in Ash'teroth-kar-na'im, the Zuzim in Ham, the Emim in Sha'veh-kir-iatha'im, 6 and the Horites in their Mount Se'ir as far as El-paran on the border of the wilderness; 7 then they turned back and came to Enmish'pat (that is, Kadesh), and subdued all the country of the Amal'ekites, and also the Amorites who fighting under the banner of "the God of the armies of Israel." There is much satisfaction when what old instincts press upon us can be linked with piety and the stirring of our blood can be indulged as a fulfillment for our souls.

But the arresting fact is that in this twentieth century there has been a break in the ancient thinking. Always of course a minority of seers and prophets have recognized war to be a thing of darkness and evil, and have proclaimed it so; but the great chorus of human voices glorified it. Now that chorus begins to stammer, especially among the preachers. To be sure, there is not in religious circles, as there is not in the general world, any majority of pacifists. Most people as they read history maintain that wars have sometimes been the only means by which great principles could be defended and that the same may be true today. But the tone is different. War may be justified as a grim necessity, but there is reluctance to try to make it seem religious. It is not God, but the long complex of human sin in its revolt from God, that compels us to devote reason and science and culture to the service of death and stupidity. . . . Can anything be more utterly idiotic, e.g., than civilised communities depriving themselves of food in order to utilise the materials and energies saved in this way to blow one another to hell? *

* Davies, Down Peacock's Feathers, pp. 10-11.

Most Christian interpreters today would be embarrassed to say what good men said a generation ago with robust good conscience. James Strachan of the Church of Scotland published in 1906 his Hebrew Ideals, and through it his sturdy faith and his religious insight have given rich meaning to much of Genesis. But in it, as he dealt expansively with the story of Abraham's defeat of the five kings, he wrote: "Abram the Hebrew left his people an ideal of noble warfare and high chivalry. He is the type of all . . . heroes of faith, mighty men of valour animated by the spirit of God. . . . The appropriate limits of the Holy Land—Dan and Beersheba—were a battlefield and a shrine." 4 And later, referring to Melchizedek as he met Abraham fresh from his fighting, he wrote: "He blessed the hero whose good sword was wet with the blood of tyrants. Before the dulcet notes of peace there must often be heard the trumpet tones of war for righteousness." 5

How many now would write or think in quite those terms? We are not so much at ease in equating "the trumpet tones of war" with righteousness and battlefields with shrines. We recognize that war may be a good way to worship Moloch but that it is a poor way to worship the God of the prophets and of Jesus Christ. War may employ many of the ideals of the human spirit, but it also prostitutes them. If it calls men to be brave, it also deforms them into killers. It breeds hatreds which spread like poison everywhere. In the long run no people can win in war, but everyone can lose. And the evils that war is supposed to destroy are like the heads of the Hydra. Cut off one and a hundred grow in its place. Consider the malignant forces that multiplied after 1918, when "the war to end war" was supposed to have been won, and look at those which were released in the late 30's and 40's. With the fatal secret of atomic energy now as an instrument for men's passions, another war would have no room for "high chivalry" in its beastly and indiscriminate annihilation. General Omar Bradley spoke on Armistice Day, 1948, to the Boston Chamber of Commerce and said:

With the monstrous weapons man already has, humanity is in danger of being trapped in this world by its moral adolescents. Our knowledge of science has clearly outstripped our capacity to control it. We have many men of science; too few men of God. We have grasped the mystery of the atom, and rejected the Sermon on the Mount. Man is stumbling blindly through a spiritual darkness while toying with the precarious secrets of life and death. The world has achieved brilliance without wisdom, power without conscience. Ours is a world of nuclear giants and ethical infants. We know more about war than we know about peace, more about killing than we know about living. This is our twentieth century's claim to distinction and progress.

So the true interpreter today will not be disposed to consider that Abraham gave the "ideal of noble warfare" most signally in the glamorously remembered battle with the kings. He gave it more eternally in the other warfare that he waged prevailingly in his own soul, the warfare exemplified in his relationship with Lot: the warfare whose victory was of magnanimity over mean interest, of patience over irritation, of greatness in service over narrow self-regard.

13. Life's Great Decisions.—The name Hebrew, as the Exeg. has pointed out, may mean "the crosser." In any case, the thought of the Hebrew people was steeped in the tradition that back in their history was a momentous crossing. Their fathers had come from beyond the river.

Rivers are one of the chief aspects of geography and one of the most formative in the history of the human race. Civilization

14 And when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive, he armed his trained servants, born in his own house, three hundred and eighteen, and pursued them unto Dan.

Abram. 14 When Abram heard that his kinsman had been taken captive, he led forth his trained men, born in his house, three hundred and eighteen of them, and went in began in the river valleys, as in the valley of the Nile.⁶ For the civilization that spread to Europe, north of the Mediterranean, the rivers of Mesopotamia had supreme importance. There in the valleys of the Tigris and the Euphrates developed the society from which Abraham came. In the fertile lands which the rivers watered, men could comfortably live. To leave the river and go out into the untamed regions that lay beyond was a hazardous adventure.

A river is a natural boundary. To cross a river, or some other dividing water, or to turn one's back upon the region determined by it, may be a decisive event in the affairs of men: Abraham leaving the valley of the Euphrates; the Israelites, led by Moses out of Egypt, crossing the Jordan; Caesar crossing the Rubicon; Paul, the torch-bearer of a new gospel, crossing the Hellespont into Greece. To stand irresolute on the near side of the dividing water and flinch from crossing over may be to stop the march of destiny. Only beyond the accustomed and long accepted barrier may lie the greatness of life.

The physical waters over which the adventurers have passed are parables of the barriers which must be crossed in the world of the mind and of the spirit. There are rivers of complacency and prejudice so wide and staggering that to most men it seems unthinkable that there could be anything on the other side that belongs to them. What rivers of self-satisfaction, of pride of race and color, of stubborn selfishness of class or nation, must we cross if life is to go forward?

Are we great enough of mind and spirit, furthermore, to launch out upon those currents of the unpredictable to the edge of which the fateful hours of history bring us? In the twentieth century we have arrived at such a place and hour. The splitting of the atom and the awful possibilities which that unfolds have brought us to the end of one world and to the brink of an unexplored ocean beyond which lies another; for atomic fission, as scientists who know it most have reiterated, is "not just another weapon against which our military minds will find a defense, but the greatest cataclysmic force ever released on earth." The Emergency Committee of Atomic Scientists, headed by Albert Einstein, has declared: "If war breaks out, atomic bombs will be used, and they will surely destroy our civilization. There is no solution to this problem except international control of atomic energy and, ultimately, the elimination of war."⁷

To all but the ignorant and the shallow it will be plain that those words are not rhetoric but terrible reality. Mankind has been pushed to the edge of its old continent of ideas and of existence. It has got to take possession of a new one or perish. Both individuals and nations must be ready to be crossers—crossers from the constriction of complacency and imagined local immunity to the moral and spiritual advances which humanity must make together if it would survive. The human race must lay hold upon the Hebrew heritage. The dividing waters can be crossed.

But the great crossings cannot be made by the careless. The seizing of the Remagen Bridge and the crossing of the Rhine to end the war against Nazi Germany in 1945 was not made by accident. Such a crossing had been imagined, the possibility of it foreseen and prepared for. General Dwight D. Eisenhower had ordered every one of his commanders to look for it. He sent his forces instantly ahead when the opportunity came. So it must be with the moral and spiritual crossings. The one thing that would be fatal would be indifference or fumbling irresolution at the critical hour. Public opinion and public action cannot halt at the banks of the Rhine of universal destiny and think that there is no necessity to make a critical advance. The issue for civilization is life or death. Or let us turn the two words to put the greater at the climax and say that the issue is death or life. Atomic energy does not have to spell doom. On the contrary it can give into human hands the power to create a more abundantly furnished and happier society than the earth has ever known.

Here is where the force of Christian ideals and Christian faith can enter. David E. Lilienthal, chairman of the United States Atomic Energy Commission, in an address at the University of Rochester, voiced the conviction which needs to be echoed everywhere: "The foundation of our strength and amazing vitality is not in material things at all but . . . in the faiths we cherish. . . . If we live with faith I deeply believe that these great discoveries of pursuit as far as Dan. 15 And he divided his forces against them by night, he and his servants, and routed them and pursued them to Hobah, north of Damascus.

our time can be made to better the lot of mankind and further the kingdom of God." Christian people and the Christian church may be able to cast into the scales the weight which will bring about that vast result; for in order that humanity may now cross the river on the way to the Promised Land there will be needed supremely what Christianity can give—reverence for life, belief in a divine destiny, inspired imagination, and the courageous practical dedication that comes from faith in God.

13. The Better Possibilities.—Consider further the qualities suggested above that make possible advance of the general human life:

Reverence for life itself. The savage has no compunction against killing, whether he is the savage of prehistoric times or the savage emerging again under the veneer of civilization. But wherever there is a developing conscience there is an enlarging respect for life, including sub-human life. See the relationship of a man to his horse or his dog. Note the rise and spread of such organizations as the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and the enactment of laws for the protection of wild life. Formerly there was miscellaneous slaughter of whatever hunters chose to kill or people could be found to buy. Women wore stuffed songbirds as ornaments on their hats; and the beautiful egret was almost exterminated in the United States to satisfy the greedy vanity that wanted the plumes made from its feathers. The Audubon societies represented the conscience which has brought that particular cruelty to its end.

As society has become more sensitive to the worth of life in its subhuman forms, so it has become more sensitive in its treatment of human life even in its subnormal aspects. Witness the changing conscience as to the treatment of criminals, of the insane, of the feeble-minded, and the revulsion of the general conscience against the "removal of the unfit" which went on in Nazi Germany. All these are signs of the central recognition that any society emerges from brutishness in direct proportion to its sense of a sacredness in life and its gradual enlightenment as to those values by which life must be estimated. All life is of worth, yet not of equal worth. The pantheism of India, with its sacred cows and cobras, can sink into ethical stagnation. The highest life, as reason and revelation agree in telling, is the life of the human soul that is conceived as a child of God. Reverence for personality therefore is the main-spring of social progress. Without that, the relationship of employer and employee, of landlord and tenant, of banker and borrower, can be nothing but a wolfish struggle in which nothing matters but money. Without that, the relationship of nations will sink inevitably through insensate rivalry, suspicion, and hostility to "the next war." How great therefore is the responsibility of Christian churches and Christian citizens to try to create so deep an understanding and appreciation of human souls as such, whatever their class or color or nation, that the binding social forces may be stronger than the disruptive ones.

Belief in a divine destiny. It is true that this belief is subject to perversion. Classes and nations may falsely assume a kind of divine prerogative and privilege. "Economic royalists" have sometimes asserted a supposed right to dictate the conditions under which lesser men must live and work for them. Nations have set up their philosophies of "the master race" (see the writings of Nietzsche). Note the brutal self-assertion of Nazism, which in its repudiation of real religion went back to an atavistic religion of pagan gods which gave license to a blind worship of race and blood and soil; yet note more importantly that this is no unparalleled phenomenon, but only the ultimate expression of a cruel arrogance which may be in part in every people. See the smug use of such a phrase as "God's country," and the tendency of every country in a crisis to think that God must properly be on its side. Hebrew history was not free from this. But there is a great belief which is not only positive but also pure and redeeming. It is the belief that a group or a nation is meant to be and may be an instrument in the hands of God, so that "the glory of Israel" is also in moral quality "a light to lighten the Gentiles" (Luke 2:32). The great liberal statesmen of England have seen that ideal. So did the men who lighted the burning convictions of American democracy. What is our thought of destiny today, and in that thought are the convictions that come from God made dominant?

Inspired imagination. Both words are important. Social advance does not come from dull and dead adherence to tradition. "It was said of old time" is not enough. There must be the explosive power of new ideas, as the prophets of Israel understood, and as Jesus supremely exemplified. Neither can the great power be unloosed by any plodding arithmetic which assumes that in the world of moral creativity, as in mathematics, two and two can never make more than four, nor the whole ever be greater than its parts. In the life of the spirit, when old men and young men alike see visions and dream dreams, there are mighty emergent possibilities. The supreme movements in social advances, the breakup of the gladiatorial shows, the abolition of slavery, the humanizing of prisons, the protection of children, the lifting of the status of women, have come to pass because men of imagination looked away from dead precedent and beyond demonstrable probability to the hopes they saw on the horizon and dared believe could be attained. Only imagination has given—and for the critical human needs of today and tomorrow can give—substance to things hoped for and create its own antecedent evidence of things not seen. And such imagination must be inspired. The fire does not kindle from any dull combustion of ordinary calculations. It comes as something given by God, the coal from off the altar, which can be communicated only to those who have drawn near enough to the altar to receive it.

A courageous practical dedication. It is only those who are dedicated who can be completely courageous. Human strength and confidence waver, but the dedicated man knows he is not alone. The cause he is pledged to is his reinforcement; God’s strength is at his back. Over and beyond the ranks of the enemy he sees the chariots of the hosts of God (read II Kings 6; see A. H. Clough’s poem “It fortifies my soul to know”). And the right sort of dedication is not a mystical absorption; it is the application of the ideal to practical and pressing needs. Consider the striving toward a Christian conviction made relevant to the real world, as in the program of the World Council of Churches. Faith without works is dead; faith with works is like a fire that renews itself with its own spreading power.

13. The Final River.—The great progressions of life are made by those who, like Abraham, cross over the rivers. Past the dividing lines and barriers that bind the old, they go forward to new adventure. If that is true in life, it is true also at the end of life. With this difference:

there is a final river which everyone must cross, whether he will or no. On the banks of that river there can be no refusal. It is not a question of crossing or not crossing; it is a question of how one regards the river, and of the spirit in which he goes over. For that river is death.

The fact of it is sure. But the recognition of it is not. One of the marks of modern times is its effort to obscure and forget the fact of death and to hide all signs that the years move on toward it. Women with dyed hair and fantastic make-up try pathetically to look young. Neither women nor men like to talk of death or to have it talked about. How many sermons deal directly with it? Yet all this is a complete reversal of the attitude of earlier generations. In St. Paul’s Cathedral, London, as the only monument saved from the burning of the older cathedral, is a statue of John Donne, the famous dean, made by his direction while he was living, but made of him dressed in his shroud. See his “Hymn to God My God, in My Sickness” and “A Hymn to God the Father.” The old graveyards of New England are full of unflinching proclamations of the imminence of death. On numberless tombstones is cut the same inscription to arrest whoever passes by:

As you are now, so once was I;
As I am now, you soon will be;
Prepare to die and follow me.

The literature of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries in England and the United States had the remembrance of death ringing through it like a solemn bell. So with the great preaching. Observe the sermons of John Donne, of Jonathan Edwards, of George Whitefield, and John Wesley. That was morbid? The sharp reaction from it is the mark of our more normal and more wholesome age? We like to think so. But the truth may be different. Is our age better balanced, or is it only unbalanced, toward a shallow carelessness instead of the forefathers’ grave concern? Is the taboo we have put on talk of death a mark of fearlessness, or is it only evasion and a nervous mechanized means of escape? Certainly we do not dispose of death by disregarding it. Whether we want to face it or not, it faces us. The fact is there.

What is the nature of that fact? There have been many answers in the course of human 17 After his return from the defeat of Chedor-lao'mer and the kings who were with him, the king of Sodom went out to meet him at the Valley of Shaveh (that is, the King's Valley). 18 And Mel-chiz'edek king of Salem brought out bread and wine;

B. MELCHIZEDEK (14:17-20)

17-20. The Melchizedek section, although it may be secondary as Gunkel suggests (Genesis, pp. 284-85), is probably the more significant part of the story. Melchizedek is introduced as the priest-king of Salem, i.e., Jerusalem (cf. Ps. 76:2). That his name is traditional is suggested by its occurrence in Ps. 110:4 and by the fact that the root cdq—usually transliterated zdk—"righteousness," is found repeatedly in the O.T. in connection thought. Death may be conceived of as extinction. But the human spirit is seldom able to believe that for long. Wrote Browning:

Just when we are safest, there's a sunset-touch,
A fancy from a flower-bell, some one's death,
A chorus-ending from Euripides,—
And that's enough for fifty hopes and fears
As old and new at once as nature's self,
To rap and knock and enter in our soul,
Take hands and dance there, a fantastic ring,
Round the ancient idol, on his base again,—
The grand Perhaps! ⁹

The river of death has been conceived as the river Styx, where a grim ferryman takes the traveler over into a land of shades. Has the modern mind drifted back to an unconscious paganism which looks at death therefore instinctively in that drab pagan way—the obsession with material realities being so masterful that the immaterial, the invisible, the spiritual, can seem nothing but unsatisfying shades? Let the individual reflect upon what may be the involvement of his own thoughts and affections. Some are carnal; some are careless; many lie only in the things of sense and time. How can the realities beyond the river seem real if the heart has never been fastened upon those interests in life which can be carried over there?

But in the great thought of the Hebrew-Christian heritage death has been regarded as the river Jordan, beyond which lies the Promised Land. To pass over it is not a thing of fear but the achievement of the ends of faith. Some of the early Negro spirituals are the naïve but beautiful expression of an everlasting vision. But a vision which is only a dream of undeveloped human children? No. For the same conception of death as the boundary beyond which lies all the best that this life has been reaching for is reflected in men and women whose minds and wills are most mature. Read Browning's "Prospice." It is a delusion to suppose that the so-called realism which satisfies only a material appetite is practical. Seen in the final light, "realism" may be as infantile as the play of children who think that castles in the sand will last. But the growing soul can leave its sand castles for something better. With a great expectancy it can pass over Jordan.

How is this expectancy created? By a lengthening perspective of those whose spirits have reached on and up toward God, who has reached down to them. "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also" (Matt. 6:21). An otherworldliness that makes a person unrelated and irresponsible to the duties of every day is wrong; but there is an otherworldliness which introduces the meaning of the beyond into the here and now. Some attachments are so rooted in the flesh that they are bound to die when the body dies, but the great loyalties lead on. Stonewall Jackson, wounded at Chancellorsville, said in his last words, "Let us cross over the river and rest in the shade of the trees." That was in the moment of dying. Peace was there, but beyond the peace is progress for such souls as his. Those who have learned to live for causes greater than themselves, and in the spiritual comradeship of the good and great, know the immortality of that with which their life is linked. "So faith, hope, love abide" (I Cor. 13:13). Read also Paul's letter to the Philippians. To him, because of what he had learned of Christ, there was a high calling to which death is the open door.

17-24. Melchizedek.—In the picture dimly outlined here the figures move against a background of immense and mystical remoteness. The king of Sodom belonged to the city that would be doomed. And Melchizedek—who was he? In Ps. 110:4 it is declared of the hoped-for Deliverer, "The Lord hath sworn, and will not with Jerusalem: e.g., (a) Isa. 1:21, 26; Jer. 33:16; (b) Josh. 10:1, 3, where the king of Jerusalem bears the name Adoni-zedek; (c) II Sam. 8:17—“the son of Ahitub” is secondary—the first mention of the priest Zadok, significantly just after David’s capture of Jerusalem; cf. II Sam. 15:24; (d) Hag. 1:1, where the name of the father of Joshua the high-priest is Jehozadak; (e) Ezek. 40:46. In this connection it is significant that in Ezek. 40:46; 44:15 (cf. 43:19) the Jerusalem priests are designated “the sons of Zadok,” who are contrasted with “the Levites” in Ezek. 48:11, indicating that “from among the sons of Levi” in Ezek. 40:46 (ASV) and “the Levites” in Ezek. 44:15 are secondary. The Zadokite priesthood were thus not of Levitical origin but seem rather to have been the ancient priesthood of Jerusalem which accepted Yahwism when David captured the city and were, through their great prestige, able to maintain themselves as the custodians of its sanctuary up to the Exile and to refuse to have dealings with the Levitical priesthood, the custodians par excellence of the Mosaic tradition; cf. Ezek. 48:11, noted above, and the feud between Zadok and Abiathar ending in the latter’s expulsion (I Kings 1:7-8; 2:27, 35). Following the Exile they were forced to come to terms with the Aaronite priesthood of Bethel which had, presumably, established itself in Jerusalem during the enforced absence of the Zadokites in Babylonia (cf. R. H. Kennett, “The Origin of the Aaronite Priesthood,” Journal of Theological Studies, VI [1905], 161-86; VII [1906], 620-24).

It was in connection with this settlement that the fiction of Zadok’s descent from Aaron (I Chr. 6:1-8) was devised. This was to base the exclusive claims of the Jerusalem priesthood, thus reconstituted through a fusion of Aaronites and Zadokites, upon the fiction that Aaron had been divinely chosen at Sinai as the first high priest—one of the major themes of the P code—and to ignore the historical fact of the age-old prestige of Jerusalem and its sanctuary.

The sudden appearance of Melchizedek in Ps. 110:4 and in the passage now under consideration suggests that in the course of time this Jerusalem tradition began to reassert itself. This suggestion receives further support from the title ’ēl ‘elyōn, rendered God Most High in vss. 18, 19, 20, 22, by implication ascribed to Yahweh. ’ēl is the component rendered “God” in the compound names “God Almighty” (17:1), “the repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.” In the Epistle to the Hebrews that phrase is repeated of Christ, except that he is called high priest as well as priest (5:6, 10; 6:20). And in Heb. 7:1-3, the name of “this Melchisedec, king of Salem, priest of the most high God” is interpreted as “King of righteousness, and after that also King of Salem, which is, King of peace; without father, without mother, without descent, having neither beginning of days, nor end of life.”

With the king of Sodom Abraham deals majestically. He recognizes no right of that king to offer him anything, and he will take no gain from his deliverance of Sodom. Neither that city nor its representative shall be allowed the opportunity to say, I have made Abram rich. But from Melchizedek Abraham accepted blessing. The significance of this was that Salem meant Jerusalem, and so Abraham is linked already with what was to be the Holy City that should become the center of his people’s life. The naked fact that no mention is made of Melchizedek’s ancestry or origin is transformed by the writer to the Hebrews into superhuman mystery. That is fanciful; but there is great suggestion in his thought that this prototype of the ideal priest and ruler is both king of righteousness and king of peace. Often in history there has been the tragic perversion of attempts not by the righteous but by the self-righteous to enforce what they chose to 21 And the king of Sodom said unto Abram, Give me the persons, and take the goods to thyself.

22 And Abram said to the king of Sodom, I have lifted up mine hand unto the LORD, the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth,

23 That I will not take from a thread even to a shoe-latchet, and that I will not take any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich:

24 Save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre; let them take their portion.

15 After these things the word of the LORD came unto Abram in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward.

And Abram gave him a tenth of everything. 21 And the king of Sodom said to Abram, "Give me the persons, but take the goods for yourself." 22 But Abram said to the king of Sodom, "I have sworn to the LORD God Most High, maker of heaven and earth, 23 that I would not take a thread or a sandal-thong or anything that is yours, lest you should say, 'I have made Abram rich.' 24 I will take nothing but what the young men have eaten, and the share of the men who went with me; let Aner, Eschol, and Mamre take their share."

15 After these things the word of the LORD came to Abram in a vision, "Fear not, Abram, I am your shield; your Everlasting God" (21:33), "God, the God of Israel" (33:20), and "God of Bethel" (35:7), and is the oldest Semitic appellation for God. 'Elyón is used frequently in the O.T. of the Lord (with 'ēl in Ps. 78:35), notably in psalms referring clearly to Jerusalem and its temple—Pss. 9:2; 21:7; 46:4; 50:14; 87:5. A possible inference is that 'ēl 'elyón was the ancient name of the deity of the sanctuary at Jerusalem, which was later carried over to Yahweh; and in this connection it is significant that the Maccabees are called "priests of the Most High God" in the Assumption of Moses 6:1 (cf. Carl Siegfried, reviewing Gesenius' Hebräisches und aramisches Handwörterbuch, in Theologische Literaturzeitung, XX [1895], 304).

C. ABRAHAM'S DISINTERESTEDNESS (14:21-24)

21-24. Abraham's refusal to accept a reward from the king of Sodom may be a protest against a postexilic concern for material wealth. Abraham, the author implies, was more high-minded than his descendants.

XVIII. THE COVENANT WITH ABRAHAM (15:1-21)

The use of the LORD throughout this chapter indicates that it is derived from the J document. Gunkel (Genesis, pp. 177-78) regards it as a conflation of J and E. Skinner (Genesis, pp. 276-77) is dubious as to the validity of Gunkel's analysis, and inclines to the hypothesis that the groundwork is from E and that it has been recast by a J or a D redactor. (The analysis outlined here is argued in detail in Simpson, Early Traditions think was peace. Arrogance of power can cloak itself in a "holy war." Not in that way can the ends of God be reached. Peace can be achieved only through that righteousness which begins in every heart and cleanses it of pride, self-assertion, and whatever deliberately sets itself against the love of God.

15:1. Our Strength in God.—Set with this verse the words in Ps. 71:3, "Be thou my strong habitation, whereunto I may continually resort." That prayer is answered by God's promise. To Abraham and to others life in God will be both strength and hope.

Considered more specifically, God can be to human lives as a strength beneath us. Willa Cather describes the great mesa on which the Ácoma Indians live. "The Ácomas, who must share the universal yearning for something permanent, enduring, without shadow of change, . . . had their idea in substance. They actually lived upon their Rock; were born upon it, and died upon it." ¹(For human souls there can be rocklike certainties at their backs.) "O thou, who changest not, abide with me." Read of Israel, pp. 73-75.) The chapter falls into two parts: (a) vs. 1-6, promising an heir to Abraham; (b) vs. 8-21, promising him the land of Palestine, connected with vs. 1-6 by vs. 7.

2 And Abram said, Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus?

Of these two parts, vs. 8-21 is the earlier, and once followed upon 13:17 which, it has been noted above, is secondary elaboration of the J² narrative; i.e., Abraham, having been promised the land in 13:17, is now made to ask, How am I to know that I shall possess it? (Vs. 8.) In response the Lord makes a covenant with him (vs. 9-12, 17-18). Vss. 13-16 are a later intrusion maintaining, possibly against those who claimed that Jewish title to the land—or certain parts of it—had been forfeited through absence during the Exile, that temporary absence from the land had been permitted in the original deed of gift and therefore could not affect the title. Vss. 19-21 are a gloss.

To this covenant narrative another writer prefixed vs. 1-6 together with vs. 7 to effect a transition to vs. 8, insisting that Abraham's heir shall be his own son. This may well be further polemic against claims by non-Israelite groups after the Exile.

Neither J² nor E use the word "covenant" to describe the relationship of Israel to God before the inauguration of the covenant at Sinai (J), or Horeb (E). In this late J passage the covenant idea is carried back to the time of Abraham.

15:1. Fear not, . . . I am your shield, implying that Abraham is in need of protection, possibly alludes to the danger he faced in obeying God's command to "walk through the length and the breadth of the land" (13:17). The reward is presumably for his magnanimity toward Lot.

2. Of Damascus is a gloss on the Hebrew word rendered here heir, with Procksch (Genesis, p. 295); it is itself probably corrupt.

in The Life, Letters, Lectures and Addresses of Frederick W. Robertson his description of the crisis through which he passed in his struggle for faith. In his darkest moments he knew that some great principles at least must be certain. "It is better to be generous than selfish, better to be chaste than licentious, better to be true than false, better to be brave than to be a coward." 2 The convictions which the thought of God can build as the foundations beneath a life give it a stronghold to which it may resort. Collapse of faith which represents itself as intellectual doubt is often really something different from that. It is lack of will to build life resolutely upon those sure realities, even if they are partial ones, which God has revealed to conscience.

God is not only a strength beneath us. He is a meaning above us. Life without meaning would be like walking on an eternal prairie, with never a landmark anywhere. With nothing to which the eyes can be lifted up, existence is indeed "flat, stale, and unprofitable." The visitor to London sees the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral rising dominant out of the city's center, and the cross surmounting it suggests that in which life finds its focus and its meaning. Read at the end of H. G. Wells's novel, Mr. Britling Sees It Through, the letter of Mr. Britling beginning, "Religion is the first thing and the last thing, and until a man has found God and been found by God, he begins at no beginning, he works to no end." 3 It is necessary to have some beginning and some clearly desired end to give life happy unity. This kind of meaning does not depend upon clever thoughts. It depends upon the clean heart that is trying to be loyal to the highest it can be aware of.

As the thought of God gives a strength be-your heir." 5 And he brought him outside and said, "Look toward heaven, and number the stars, if you are able to number them." Then he said to him, "So shall your descendants be." 6 And he believed the LORD; and he reckoned it to him as righteousness.

6. Skinner (Genesis, ad loc.) rightly refers to this verse as a "remarkable anticipation of the Pauline doctrine of justification by faith" (Rom. 4:3, 9, 22; Gal. 3:6). Righteousness is here a right relationship to God, and it was conferred by the divine sentence of approval in response to Abraham's trust in God's character. In Deut. 6:25; 24:13 this righteousness is attained by obedience to the law. Here Abraham, who had no law to neath us and a meaning above us, so it gives a sense of the majesty of life beyond us. The religious man knows that he is not an isolated individual. He belongs to the past and he belongs to the future. The little moment can have a great significance because of the inheritance from which it can draw and the heritage to which it can contribute. With God a day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day. Remembrance of the past, of the long line of witness-bearers for the faith, of the communion of saints, can strengthen life and hold it steady in the face of temporary discouragement. Thought of the life ahead to which we can contribute can give inspiration to efforts which if bounded by their immediate effect might seem trivial. As the Epistle to the Hebrews suggests, the course of religion is like a relay race. The energy which any one of us puts into the running of his own lap of the relay speeds those who take up the race where we leave off.

6. The Power of Faith.—It is this passage that lies back of one of the great proclamations of the N.T.—the infinite power of faith: "By faith Abraham, when he was called . . . went out" (Heb. 11:8). We must "walk in the steps of that faith of our father Abraham," wrote Paul (Rom. 4:12). The heart of the whole gospel that Paul preached is beating here, the gospel that it is not what a man is but what a man trusts God to do that saves him.

Note the fact that in the life of Abraham it was when he trusted most that he was strongest and when he stopped trusting that he was weak. He trusted the voice of God that called him out of Ur and out of Haran, and he went forward on the road that was to open up a new world in spiritual history. He trusted the heavenly voice that told him he could find a blessing in the barren lands when he gave up the richer lands to Lot (ch. 13). He trusted that the purpose of God which had begun to work through him would be carried on through a son whom God would give him (ch. 15). He trusted that between his soul and the Almighty there was a covenant which God would never break (ch. 17); and remembering that, he was capable of great physical daring (ch. 14) and heroic sacrifice (see Expos. on ch. 22). When sometimes he forgot that covenant and looked at facts which faced him as if he had to deal with these by himself, then he could lapse into timidity and weakness as ignominious as other men's (read 12:10-20). But if Abraham had in himself the same alloy of moral limitations that all human nature has, he had also something else: he had the fire of a faith in God which, when he kept it burning, could separate the dross and make his whole thought and will pure metal for God's use. Thus a man becomes good not because he is born so or because he lifts himself to goodness, but because he lets the goodness of God take hold of him and have its way. He believed and it was counted . . . to him for righteousness: the inspired intuition of Genesis saw that profound truth. The spiritual genius of Paul caught hold of it and put it at the forefront of his preaching of salvation.

It is a gospel that begins in humility. The first necessity for any soul's progress is to see how far it is from where it wants to go. Abraham had no illusion of self-importance. He knew well enough that left alone he would fall into sin. Before the glory of God he saw himself as "dust and ashes" (18:27). The only thing that can block God's purpose of redemption is the stubbornness of pride. Consider the terrible condemnation of the Pharisees by Jesus: "Now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth" (John 9:41). Note, by contrast, Jesus' exaltation of a little child as the symbol of the kingdom of heaven. A child has no illusions of grandeur and no hard shell of satisfied pretense. It will often do wrong, but its heart is soft, and before the face of love it can be ashamed and sorry. Only from that sort of sorrow before the face

7 And he said unto him, I am the LORD that brought thee out of Ur of the Chaldees, to give thee this land to inherit it.

8 And he said Lord God, whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?

9 And he said unto him, Take me a heifer of three years old, and a she goat of three years old, and a ram of three years old, and a turtledove, and a young pigeon.

10 And he took unto him all these, and divided them in the midst, and laid each piece one against another: but the birds divided he not.

11 And when the fowls came down upon the carcasses, Abram drove them away.

7 And he said to him, "I am the LORD who brought you from Ur of the Chaldeans, to give you this land to possess."

8 But he said, "O Lord God, how am I to know that I shall possess it?" 9 He said to him, "Bring me a heifer three years old, a she-goat three years old, a ram three years old, a turtledove, and a young pigeon."

10 And he brought him all these, cut them in two, and laid each half over against the other; but he did not cut the birds in two.

11 And when birds of prey came down upon the carcasses, Abram drove them away.

fulfill, was nevertheless made righteous because of his inner attitude, a position which is approximated in Ps. 24:5 and to a lesser degree in Ps. 106:31.

of God do souls, like seeds watered by the rain, begin to grow.

It is a gospel of hope. As long as a man relies upon himself he is doomed to bitter moral disappointment. Read in Romans Paul's self-disclosure of his own unavailing struggle to win a sense of righteousness. Ponder what he meant by the impossibility of being saved by works or by any mechanical process of the law. Read also the passionate confession of Martin Luther concerning the early period of his personal efforts and his impotence and near despair. But hope comes when the man turns from looking in to looking up. "That I may apprehend that for which also I am apprehended," cried Paul (Phil. 3:12). "A mighty fortress is our God," sang Luther when his soul caught the eternal truth that he did not stand unaided. "The submission of man's nothing-perfect to God's all-complete"⁴ is the way out of weakness into strength. Look at the ship lying stranded in the estuary when the tide is low. What human strength could push it out to sea? But the man who trusts to the certainty of the incoming tide will see his ship lifted and set free. So he who throws himself on God, and unperplexed

Seeking shall find him.⁵

Then, out of the great leadings of the hope which is kindled as the soul looks up to God, comes happiness. Observe how the men whose virtue has been that they had great beliefs and were brave enough to follow them have been radiant men—not always, it is true, for no earthly experience is perfect, but prevailingly. They have known that "the joy of the LORD is your strength" (Neh. 8:10). Mark how often the letters of Paul are starred with "joy" and "rejoice." Read the life of John Wesley, and note how he passed from shadow into sunlight when he learned to find his righteousness not in anything he could achieve but in the grace that God through Christ had freely given. In a world beset by many fears and frustrations and often at the verge of cynical unfaith in the attainment of any general righteousness, consider the need for the kind of inner glow that belongs to souls in whom God's assurance shines. Their strength is not primarily in what they do. It is in the happy courage they reflect, because a long faithfulness in following their best beliefs has given them an unlimited confidence in what God can do. That sort of faith can wipe out many human failings. It is not only reckoned as righteousness; more than anything else it can bring righteousness to pass in an unrighteous world.

7-21. The Retrospect of Faith.—In this chapter, drawn from the E document, the historian of probably the eighth century is thinking back to the long story of Israel's guidance by God. He sees all that has happened as no succession of chance events nor the result of human choices; it has been due from the first to God's ordaining. He is so sure that what has come to pass was enfolded in the covenant made with Abraham that he thinks of it as foretold in explicit words to Abraham himself. The captivity in Egypt (vs. 13) and the Exodus (vs. 14) of course were centuries later than the time when Abraham lived and died. Still more time

12 And when the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram; and, lo, a horror of great darkness fell upon him.

13 And he said unto Abram, Know of a surety that thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs, and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years;

14 And also that nation, whom they shall serve, will I judge: and afterward shall they come out with great substance.

15 And thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age.

16 But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full.

17 And it came to pass, that, when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces.

12 As the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell on Abram; and lo, a dread and great darkness fell upon him. 13 Then the LORD said to Abram, "Know of a surety that your descendants will be sojourners in a land that is not theirs, and will be slaves there, and they will be oppressed for four hundred years; 14 but I will bring judgment on the nation which they serve, and afterward they shall come out with great possessions. 15 As for yourself, you shall go to your fathers in peace; you shall be buried in a good old age. 16 And they shall come back here in the fourth generation; for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet complete."

17 When the sun had gone down and it was dark, behold, a smoking fire pot and a flaming torch passed between these pieces.

17. A smoking fire pot and a flaming torch is symbolic of the God of fire (cf. Exod. 3:2; 13:21; 19:18). On the ceremony of passing between the pieces cf. Jer. 34:18-19, the only other allusion to it in the O.T.

would intervene before the conquest of Canaan (the Amorites of vs. 16); and not until the reign of Solomon would it be possible to say that the descendants of Abraham possessed the land from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates (cf. I Kings 4:21, 24). But the historian who looked back and saw these things as facts beheld them as the fulfillment of what God had let Abraham foresee. The way in which Abraham is described as having sought a revelation from God, and the way in which that revelation came, is remote from modern thought, but as late as the time of Jeremiah it was familiar (Jer. 34:18). Animals and birds were slain in sacrifice and their bodies divided; then between the pieces the two parties to a covenant advanced and met and sealed agreement. Here in the midst of the sacrifice which Abraham had made, as the wondering awe of the eighth-century historian imagines it, God's presence came in the darkness after sundown, like a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp—a light that shone, and yet was veiled in cloud and mystery. Did Abraham have an experience such as that, and did he hear the voice of God telling him what would be in centuries unborn? Literalism answers "No"; but none the less there is spiritual suggestion in the picture through which the historian of Israel projected his exalted faith. The way by which Israel had been led was the way God had chosen from the beginning. Its achievements and successes were part of the blessing that God had promised Abraham. But so were its tribulations. Seen in the retrospect of faith even the captivity in Egypt was not a calamity. It too was part of God's redeeming plan. When the seeming disasters of the past could be viewed in that light the future also, whatever it might hold, could be faced with steady confidence.

12. Through Darkness to Light.—Dreams often seem so illogical as to be fantastically irrelevant. Why should Abraham, the good man, have had a horror of great darkness? One might have supposed that what came up out of his unconscious would have been serene and bright. Instead, this description shows what may sometimes be the fact, no matter how little the surface indications hint of it. Under the career which outwardly appears to be altogether prosperous there may be deeper levels of apprehension and unrest. When we begin to reflect we can see that Abraham had had his heavy disappointments. The sorest of them was expressed in his cry to God, "Behold, to me thou hast given no seed: and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir" (vs. 3). The years were passing by, and he was childless. And now and then forebodings of a different kind may have come to him. It is not necessary to take literally the words of vs. 13. Abraham could hardly have had explicit foreknowledge of the captivity in 18 In that same day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, Unto thy seed have I given this land, from the river of Egypt unto the great river, the river Euphrates:

19 The Kenites, and the Kenizzites, and the Kadmonites,

20 And the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Rephaim, 21 And the Amorites, and the Canaanites, and the Girgashites, and the Jebusites.

18 On that day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, "To your descendants I give this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Eu-phra'tes, 19 the land of the Kenites, the Ken'izzites, the Kad'monites, 20 the Hittites, the Per'izzites, the Reph'aim, 21 the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Gir'gashites and the Jeb'usites."

18. Covenant: It has been argued in the article, "The Growth of the Hexateuch" (p. 195), that the covenant idea was derived by Israel from the cult of Baal-berith at Shechem. Whatever may have been the supposed relative standing of the two parties to the covenant in this cult, in the Israelite tradition it was no agreement between equals. The terms of the covenant were not the result of negotiation; they were imposed by the Lord (cf. Exod. 34:10-11; 24:7); and the covenant was inaugurated at the foot of the flaming mountain (cf. Exod. 19:18). Israel in taking over the covenant idea from the cult of Shechem made it the vehicle of their faith in the dependability of God. He was no capricious despot but a God of righteousness and order who respected human personality. He would not change; his favor was sure. But Israel would benefit by that favor only in so far as they were obedient to the divine will.

In this passage, stating God's promise to Abraham in covenant terms, no conditions are imposed. But the implication of the narrative in its present and final form would seem to be that the covenant would stand so long as Abraham's descendants continued to follow the example set by him when he believed the LORD (vs. 6). Originally, before vs. 1-6 had been prefixed to this section of the story, the reference would have been to the faith shown by Abraham when "he went out [from his own country], not knowing whither he went" (Heb. 11:8), and to the magnanimity with which he had treated Lot.

In the J document as it lay before RJE—the redactor who combined it with E—the order of the material in chs. 13–16 was: 13:1; the story in ch. 16 (see below); 13:2-17; 15; 13:18. RJE preserved this order, inserting only two verses from E in ch. 16. RP, who combined the JE narrative with P, placed the Hagar story (ch. 16) in its present position to bring Abraham to Hebron before the birth of Ishmael. The writer who inserted ch. 14, which represents Abraham as living at Hebron, necessarily moved the notice now preserved in 13:18 to its present position to record Abraham's arrival there before the war of the kings.

Egypt and of how long it would last. But Abraham's descendants did learn what was symbolized here in Abraham's dream, viz., the double truth that life which is guided by God may nevertheless have its times of darkness and delay, but that the end result will be not worse but better because of these. It may be that "we must through much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God" (Acts 14:22).

Therefore we must not be in a hurry to define the significance and worth of any part of life. One's estimate may be impatient and unseeing. Abraham Lincoln, when he was defeated for the senate by Stephen Douglas, could not have known that in the process of that defeat he was learning lessons which would make him fit for a far greater role in his country's service. Phillips Brooks, who was to become one of the greatest preachers of his age, could not have known that it was the hand of God that shut a lesser door for him when he found himself in his first choice of a career marked an ignominious failure as a teacher. Those who look back upon any life may see in it great moments of overruling destiny which the man himself at the moment could not see. Therefore it is worth while to take the long look ahead. The climax of the book is not written in the first chapter.

As one needs to look farther, so he needs to look deeper. The value of any experience or of any period in life is not represented by what is obvious. If one's ambitions are selfish and 16 Now Sarai, Abram's wife, bare him no children: and she had a handmaid, an Egyptian, whose name was Hagar.

2 And Sarai said unto Abram, Behold now, the LORD hath restrained me from bearing: I pray thee, go in unto my maid; it may be that I may obtain children by her. And Abram hearkened to the voice of Sarai.

3 And Sarai, Abram's wife, took Hagar her maid the Egyptian, after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan, and gave her to her husband Abram to be his wife.

16 Now Sar'ai, Abram's wife, bore him no children. She had an Egyptian maid whose name was Hagar; 2 and Sar'ai said to Abram, "Behold now, the LORD has prevented me from bearing children; go in to my maid; it may be that I shall obtain children by her." And Abram hearkened to the voice of Sar'ai. 3 So, after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan, Sar'ai, Abram's wife, took Hagar the Egyptian her maid, and gave her to Abram her

XIX. ABRAHAM AND HAGAR (16:1-16)

Vss. 1a, 3, 15-16, are from P and presumably followed upon a notice of Abraham's arrival at Kiriath-arba (=Hebron, cf. 23:2), dropped by RP in favor of 13:18.

The rest of the chapter, except for some redactional material noted below, is from J² who inserted the story, together with that of Abraham in Egypt, into the J¹ narrative, placing it after the notice now preserved in 13:1. Abraham was thus, according to J², in the Negeb at the time of Ishmael's birth, the notice of which was dropped by RP in favor of vss. 15-16.

A. SARAH'S JEALOUSY (16:1-6)

16:1. It is probable that an Egyptian is an insertion by RP to harmonize the J story with the representation of P (vs. 3); in J, Hagar is characteristically a woman of the desert, not an Egyptian.

2. The custom of a barren wife giving her handmaid to her husband in order that she might obtain children by her is further attested by 30:3, according to which the childless Rachel gave her maid Bilhah to Jacob; and by 30:9 where Leah, who had shallow, so that the satisfactions he wants are those which are most easily and quickly picked up, he will never be possessed by the unfolding purposes of God. In George Eliot's Romola the boy Lillo says:

I should like to be something that would make me a great man, and very happy besides—something that would not hinder me from having a good deal of pleasure.

And Romola, remembering the great-souled Savonarola, who has just gone to his martyrdom, replies:

That is not easy, my Lillo. It is only a poor sort of happiness that could ever come by caring very much about our own narrow pleasures. We can only have the highest happiness, such as goes along with being a great man, by having wide thoughts, and much feeling for the rest of the world as well as ourselves; and this sort of happiness often brings so much pain with it, that we can only tell it from pain by its being what we would choose before everything else, because our souls see it is good.*

* Epilogue.

Finally—yet also first and continuingly—there is the fact that those who are to fulfill God's purposes must trust that a divine purpose does exist, and that if we are faithful to the best we know in the plain duties of every day we shall find that purpose—or in deeper truth be found by it.

16:1-16. Hagar and Ishmael.—The story in this chapter has close resemblances to the one which is to follow in ch. 21 (see Expos.), but they are not identical. In both stories Hagar is driven out from Abraham's tent by Sarah's angry jealousy. In both the angel of the Lord comes to Hagar in her desolation and sends her back to Abraham. But in this first story Ishmael has not yet been born; whereas in the second he is a lad old enough to arouse Sarah's indignation because she thinks he is "mocking" Isaac, who is himself old enough to be weaned. The inclusion in Genesis of both stories, so nearly alike and yet sufficiently different to be inconsistent, is one of the many instances of the reluctance of the compilers to sacrifice any of the traditions which had become established in Israel.

4 ¶ And he went in unto Hagar, and she conceived: and when she saw that she had conceived, her mistress was despised in her eyes.

5 And Sarai said unto Abram, My wrong be upon thee: I have given my maid into thy bosom; and when she saw that she had conceived, I was despised in her eyes: the LORD judge between me and thee.

6 But Abram said unto Sarai, Behold, thy maid is in thy hand; do to her as it pleaseth thee. And when Sarai dealt hardly with her, she fled from her face.

7 ¶ And the angel of the LORD found her by a fountain of water in the wilderness, by the fountain in the way to Shur.

8 And he said, Hagar, Sarai's maid, whence camest thou? and whither wilt thou go? And she said, I flee from the face of my mistress Sarai.

husband as a wife. 4 And he went in to Hagar, and she conceived; and when she saw that she had conceived, she looked with contempt on her mistress. 5 And Sar'ai said to Abram, "May the wrong done to me be on you! I gave my maid to your embrace, and when she saw that she had conceived, she looked on me with contempt. May the LORD judge between you and me!" 6 But Abram said to Sar'ai, "Behold, your maid is in your power; do to her as you please." Then Sar'ai dealt harshly with her, and she fled from her.

7 The angel of the LORD found her by a spring of water in the wilderness, the spring on the way to Shur. 8 And he said, "Hagar, maid of Sar'ai, where have you come from and where are you going?" She said, "I am

"ceased bearing," gave him Zilpah. The children born of such a union were thus reckoned as the children not of the handmaid, but of the wife, by adoption, the slave girl being delivered on the knees of her mistress (cf. 30:3).

5. Sarah, however, is unable to go through with this arrangement, Hagar's contempt for her childlessness (vs. 4) being more than she can stand. Unreasonably she blames Abraham. The verse throws a significant light upon the tensions inevitable in a polygamous household.

6. She fled from her: Hagar is here depicted as the sturdy independent Bedouin woman who will brook no restraint. With this may be contrasted the tender tone of the E recension of her expulsion in 21:9-21.

B. HAGAR IN THE DESERT (16:7-10)

7. The spring on the way to Shur identifies the spring just named with Beer-lahai-roi. In J (25:11*b*; cf. 20:1*a*) this spring is associated with Isaac; it is probable, therefore, that this phrase, associating it with Ishmael, is from RJE (see Exeg. on vs. 13-14).

In the story as it is here recounted there is a double interest. The first has to do with the relationship of Israel to the Ishmaelite tribes of the desert. Manifestly there was a kinship of blood. In the thought of Israel that was something to be acknowledged and yet qualified. Granted that there was a common ancestry, nevertheless it was not to be admitted that there was equality; and in the story of Hagar both these emphases appear. Ishmael, like Isaac, is a descendant of Abraham; but Isaac is the child of ultimate promise, born of Sarah the true wife, while Ishmael is born of the slave girl. According to the customs of the time it was right and generous of Sarah to be willing—since she seemed to be barren herself—to allow her maidservant to bear a child to her husband; and it was fully within her rights to send that servant off when it seemed to Sarah that the servant had become arrogant and overweening, so that Sarah was despised in her eyes. Thus the status of Hagar's son is made plain. Though he came of the stock of Abraham, yet it was right that he should be separated from the legitimate son. So the partial bond between Israelites and Ishmaelites, and yet their deeper alienation, was accounted for. From the story of the way Ishmael was born it followed naturally that he should be "as a wild ass among men" (ASV), and that his hand should be against every man, and every man's hand against him.

That emphasis in the story is the expression of a human instinct which is as old as history. Every tribe and every nation has liked to believe 9 And the angel of the LORD said unto her, Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands.

10 And the angel of the LORD said unto her, I will multiply thy seed exceedingly, that it shall not be numbered for multitude.

11 And the angel of the LORD said unto her, Behold, thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael; because the LORD hath heard thy affliction.

12 And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him: and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren.

fleeing from my mistress Sar'ai." 9 The angel of the LORD said to her, "Return to your mistress, and submit to her." 10 The angel of the LORD also said to her, "I will so greatly multiply your descendants that they cannot be numbered for multitude." 11 And the angel of the LORD said to her, "Behold, you are with child, and shall bear a son; you shall call his name Ish'mael;† because the LORD has given heed to your affliction. 12 He shall be a wild ass of a man, his hand against every man and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell over against

† That is God hears

9. There can be no doubt that J represented Ishmael's birth as occurring in the wilderness by the spring referred to in vs. 7a, and said nothing of Hagar's returning to Abraham's encampment. This verse is accordingly secondary, an insertion by RJE to prepare for the E recension of the tale. It may be noted that the command is inconsistent with "the LORD has given heed to your affliction" in vs. 11.

10. This is also secondary, as is indicated both by the angel of the LORD also said to her, unnecessary after vs. 9—also is a rendering of a simple "and" in the Hebrew—and by the fact that the promise it contains, if an original part of the narrative, would have followed the promise of a son.

C. BIRTH OF ISHMAEL (16:11-16)

There can be no doubt that the story was first told of their eponymous ancestor by the Ishmaelites, a group of Bedouin tribes which ranged the desert to the south of Palestine (cf. 25:18). The historical event reflected here in their association with the Hagarenes (cf. Ps. 83:6) is irrecoverable. That the tale had originally nothing to do with Abraham, the hero of Hebron, is suggested by Behold, you are with child, unnecessary after vs. 4, and indicating that the oracle to which it belongs is independent of its present context. J², incorporating the tale into his narrative, identified the deity concerned with the Lord.

It is likely that in the development of the tradition Ishmael was first associated with Isaac, the hero of Beer-sheba, and that it was because of this association that J² made him the son of Abraham.

11. This verse is thus the original continuation of vs. 8. To be noted is the fact that the second component of Ishmael is 'ēl, indicating that the deity in the original saga was not Yahweh but the numen of the spring of vs. 7a.

12. This verse describes and accounts for the intractable isolationism of the Ishmaelites. It was followed in J² by a notice of the naming of the spring, dropped by RJE in favor of vss. 13-14, and an account of the birth and naming of Hagar's son, dropped by RP in favor of vss. 15-16.

itself superior to some rival tribe or nation and in its traditions has sought to dramatize that belief. So there is an element in the story of Hagar which is narrow and exclusive. But woven in with that there is another and more beautiful conception. Though Hagar has been driven out by Sarah, with Abraham's consent, yet the angel of God follows her. She is to go back again to Sarah's tent. Her child will be born, and from him shall spring those who shall not be numbered for multitude. Through the tangled human relationships the divine mercy does not fail. And as so often happens with the inspired language of the Bible, the words with 13 And she called the name of the LORD that spake unto her, Thou God seest me: for she said, Have I also here looked after him that seeth me?

14 Wherefore the well was called Beer-lahai-roi: behold, it is between Kadesh and Bered.

15 ¶ And Hagar bare Abram a son: and Abram called his son's name, which Hagar bare, Ishmael.

16 And Abram was fourscore and six years old, when Hagar bare Ishmael to Abram.

all his kinsmen." 13 So she called the name of the LORD who spoke to her, "Thou art a God of seeing"; for she said, "Have I really seen God and remained alive after seeing him?"^u 14 Therefore the well was called Beer-la'hai-roi;^v it lies between Kadesh and Bered.

15 And Hagar bore Abram a son; and Abram called the name of his son, whom Hagar bore, Ish'mael. 16 Abram was eighty-six years old when Hagar bore Ish'mael to Abram.

^u Gn. Heb have I even here seen after him who sees me?
^v That is the well of one who sees and lives

13. That this verse, together with vs. 14, is not the original continuation of vss. 7-12 is suggested by the fact that its dominant idea is seeing, whereas the story up to this point has stressed the fact of the Lord's hearing Hagar; and by its association of Ishmael with Beer-lahai-roi, suggesting a source other than 25:11b (J). LORD is here impossible, and can only be a redactional substitution for an original "God." Thou art a God of seeing is awkward because of the occurrence of thou in the name; furthermore, it does not explain Beer-lahai-roi of vs. 14. What is required is "the living God of seeing."

The second half of the verse is unintelligible. Wellhausen (Prolegomena to the History of Israel, tr. J. Sutherland Black and Allan Menzies [Edinburgh: A. & C. Black, 1885], p. 326) suggests an emendation which would give, "Have I actually seen God and lived after my vision?" (see RSV)—an allusion to the belief that seeing God is followed by death (cf. Exod. 33:20; Judg. 6:23; 13:22).

14. The etymology of Beer-lahai-roi is fanciful. Probably its real meaning is "The Well of the Antelope's Jawbone" (ibid., p. 326).

In view of the fact that RJE has attached vss. 13-14 to the J² story of an event occurring during Abraham's first sojourn in Negeb, it may reasonably be assumed that the E story, of which they were the conclusion, also came near the beginning of the Abraham cycle. It is, however, unlikely that the tale had anything to do with Ishmael, since E would scarcely have considered him of sufficient importance to warrant the inclusion of a story concerning him in addition to that now preserved in 21:9-21.

The fact that it is Isaac who is traditionally associated with Beer-lahai-roi suggests that the verses may be the conclusion of the E story of the promise of a son to Sarah, who would then be the speaker in vs. 13. In this case the tale would be the E parallel to the J² narrative in 18:10-15, and E accounted for the traditional association of Isaac with both Beer-lahai-roi and Beer-sheba by representing the former as the place where his mother received the divine promise of a son and the latter as the place of his birth (cf. 21:31, which originally preceded the E narrative of Isaac's birth of which 21:6a was the conclusion).

which Hagar responded to that mercy have come down across the centuries with a length and profundity of suggestion which the ancient writer could not have foreseen: Thou God seest me. In old houses of the stern Puritan tradition those words embroidered could be seen framed upon the wall, and usually they were taken to mean the watchful eye of God's unceasing judgment. But that is not their meaning in the story of Hagar. Rather, they are the glad acknowledgment of the heavenly grace that beholds our human needs. As the psalmist sang, "He that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep" (Ps. 121:4); and many a lonely soul for whom the world seemed desolate, as it seemed to Hagar, has been able to take comfort in the

XX. THE COVENANT OF CIRCUMCISION (17:1-27)

This chapter, derived from the P document, falls into four parts: (a) the covenant with Abraham, vss. 1-8; (b) circumcision the sign of the covenant, vss. 9-14; (c) the promise of a son, vss. 15-22; and (d) the fulfillment of the divine command, vss. 23-27.

A. THE COVENANT (17:1-8)

The covenant with Abraham is the P parallel to 12:2-3, 7a (J²; cf. ch. 15).

17:1. This is the only occasion on which the LORD appeared to Abram, according to P, who is very sparing of theophanies. The LORD is a redactional substitution for the original "God" (cf. vs. 4 and throughout the chapter). El Shaddai (RSV mg.) was probably the name of a Canaanite deity, like 'ēl 'ēlyōn (14:18), ultimately identified with the Lord. The meaning of Shaddai is uncertain (see Skinner, Genesis, pp. 290-91). On the significance of the verse for the critical analysis of the Hexateuch, see article "The Growth of the Hexateuch," pp. 189-90.

faith that there was One who saw its sorrow and would come with compassion and with help.

17:1. A Man Bound to God.—Abraham is an example of a man whose life had an inner unity. He had something stronger than himself that gave him certainty and strength. The most characteristic element of modern life is that it is at loose ends. People are at loose ends in their own personalities. Observe the realization of this in the immense contemporary interest in psychology and psychoanalysis. Men and women know that they are full of inner friction and dislocations, with jangled and discordant energies. They cannot tie themselves together in one effective whole.⁷ People are at loose ends in their most intimate relationships. Marriage is ideally the full union of a man and woman, body and soul; yet often there is no union, but instead only a superficial meeting of appetite and physical attachment. Note the appalling modern divorce rate, and note that the proportion of divorces for couples who have no strong background of religious interests is far greater than for those who have. For a happy and enduring marriage there is needed a loyalty to something big enough to produce a bond of union that can overcome the temporary irritations of individual selfishness.

We are at loose ends in industrial relationships. During the period of World War II the immense energies within each of the warring nations were tied together by the pressure of danger. After the war they began to fall apart.

⁷ See C. G. Jung, Modern Man in Search of a Soul (New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co., 1933).

Reflect upon the postwar industrial strife in many countries, the waste of productivity, the bitter collisions of class with class. The world is at loose ends in its international relationships. The United Nations was launched as an effort to tie the interests of the world together, but by itself it cannot be enough. The full cooperation which is needed for human welfare can be achieved only as men recognize a divine imperative and obey it.

As against life at loose ends it is necessary to find a great faith. Without God, life flies apart. With God, its elements are held together like the stars in the immense harmony of the heavens. A soul's response to the will of God is like the spiritual gravitation that keeps the different parts of us from flying off at tangents. So the inner life of great exemplars of religion reveals an otherwise unattainable stability and strength. Religious sensitiveness can save marriages from destruction. The kind of conscience which is created in men aware of God can give them understanding justice which is necessary for the solution of industrial disputes. And only this conscience in statesmen and the public opinion of common men can ultimately create world cooperation and world peace. Education integrated around the sought meanings of God can give wisdom instead of disjointed bits of information, and produce a personality "profoundly integrated and profoundly energized."

This faith is fortified by a great fellowship. For the individual at any moment the problem of life may seem overwhelming, but the Bible

2 And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly.

3 And Abram fell on his face: and God talked with him, saying,

4 As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations.

5 Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; for a father of many nations have I made thee.

walk before me, and be blameless. 2 And I will make my covenant between me and you, and will multiply you exceedingly."

3 Then Abram fell on his face; and God said to him, 4 "Behold, my covenant is with you, and you shall be the father of a multitude of nations. 5 No longer shall your name be Abram,* but your name shall be Abraham;† for I have made you the father

* That is exalted father

† Here taken to mean father of a multitude

4. God's first promise is that Abraham shall be the father of a multitude of nations. The reference is not only to Israel but also to the Ishmaelites, the Edomites, and the nations whose eponymous ancestors are listed in 25:2-4, all of whom the J document had claimed as descendants of Abraham.

5. The change of name from Abram to Abraham—the two forms seem to have the same meaning despite the fanciful etymology provided here—may be a reflex of the Jewish custom of naming a child at circumcision, when he was brought into the covenant of which circumcision was the sign. If so, then it would seem that the use of the form can widen our perspective. God has made a covenant with many souls, and those souls have not been disappointed. There is a communion of the saints, living and dead. When any man tries to be worthy of that, his life is lifted up into a spiritual companionship which gives it dignity. He can no longer be at loose ends.

2-6. The Covenant of God.—Here is the ultimate guarantee of a life that shall be significant. The profound Hebrew understanding knew well the limitations and frailties of man, but it had been gripped by the amazing faith that man in his weakness can yet have behind him the infinite strength of God. A man is not to be made more confident in himself; he can be confident because he has a covenant with Another.

Note how this thought of the covenant runs through all the O.T. Here it begins with Abraham. It comes again with Moses (Exod. 34:27). It echoes in the words of the great prophets. In its whole instinctive recognition the religion of the Hebrew race was objective. The Hebrew mind and heart reached up to a transcendent Reality, and knew that the springs of life were not in the shallowness of human souls but in the illimitableness of God.

Mark the contrast with some of our diluted modern thinking as exemplified by the Ethical Culture Society. Earnest people of good will belong to it; its purposes are all beneficent. But how thin and substanceless it sounds, a skeleton of religion, dry bones of behavior, all rightly held in place but with no heart of heavenly certainty beating in its midst. By mechanical processes men can carry on the habitual attitudes of inherited character, but the O.T. seers knew that character was first created, and can be long sustained, only through a life-giving consciousness of God. That God is, that he enters into relationship with human souls, that all worth-while inspiration comes from him—this was the Hebrew faith. The glory of that inheritance should not be lost.

Note a second fact. The covenant with God is initiated by God. Religion is not a human notion, a pathetic projection of human wishes which may or may not find a divine response. On the contrary, it is God moving toward man and giving to the bond between them therefore the eternal assurance of his own purpose. God spoke first to Abraham, not Abraham first to God. So to Moses, to Isaiah, to Jeremiah, to all the inspired souls. Great religious experience always rests in the certainty that the soul has not gone out into an empty universe where all that it would hear would be the echo of its own cry, but that the Lord of the universe has come into the soul itself and spoken there. That is the eternal truth which was trying to voice itself in the doctrine of predestination: the truth of the priority of God. The aspirations of human hearts are not just the pathetic smoke of a self-kindled fire; they are the answering flame that has been lighted by the fire that has come down from on high. Consider the difference this makes for moral and spiritual courage. To say "I want God and I am willing to try to draw near to him if only he will let me" is

6 And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee.

7 And I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee of a multitude of nations. 6 I will make you exceedingly fruitful; and I will make nations of you, and kings shall come forth from you. 7 And I will establish my covenant between me and you and your de-

Abram was a device of P's, and its occurrence in the J material up to this point in the narrative will have been due to RP, as has already been suggested (cf. 11:29).

7. God's second promise is to be God to you and to your descendants after you. It is to be noted that the correlative "and they shall be to me a people" (cf. Jer. 7:23; 11:4; etc.) is missing here as always in P (Exod. 6:7 is secondary, and Lev. 26:12 is H).

one thing; and there is only feeble influence in it. To hear it promised that God himself draws near is something else, and in it there is assurance that nothing can upset.

A third fact. As the covenant comes from God, so it must be remembered that it is in him and not in our unenlightened selves that we must look for its interpretation. Men who started out to be religious can go wrong if they begin to think they know where north is better than the North Star knows; or if they reason that God's covenant means that he has agreed to be a passenger on the ship of which we are the pilot. Reflect upon how often this distorting pride may take possession of individuals and institutions: the men and women who want God to bless designs which they choose to think are most desirable; the churches which salute God with elaborate aesthetic worship and then expect to be prospered in a narrow parochialism that does not relate religion to the great needs of the general life; the statesmen who invoke God's name in patriotic eloquence but do not bow before the ultimate question of what his will is for a nation's highest mission in the world. The true ideal is expressed in the words attributed to Abraham Lincoln when a self-confident delegation waited upon him, presented their case, said they had prayed about it, and felt sure that God was on their side. Said Lincoln: "I am not so much concerned to ask whether God is on my side. What I am concerned with is to try to be sure that I am on God's side." A very different and much more important matter.

A fourth fact. The covenant with God makes some other covenants unthinkable and all other covenants subordinate. Through O.T. history the people of Israel are revealed as constantly tempted to make degrading covenants—with pagan practices in Canaan, with the gods of Tyre, with the plausible power of Assyria or Egypt. They were always thinking that in a shifting world smart stratagems would most help them to survive, instead of believing that the true necessity was to hold hard to that integrity of life which God had taught them and which could make them deserve survival. "In quietness and in confidence shall be your strength," said Isaiah (30:15). In every age those who have kept faith with the best they have believed have found that the covenant did not fail, but that in ways they could not have predicted God proved to be their final strength. It is still given to religious faith not to make a covenant with any lesser reliance, but to accept the covenant which God himself offers and in which alone there is the promise of triumphant life.

7-9. The Consecration of the Family.—The covenant was made by God with Abraham, but not with Abraham alone. I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations. . . . Thou shalt keep my covenant, therefore thou, and thy seed. In Hebrew thought a man and his children were no casual aggregation. They were bound together under God by a spirit stronger than individual caprice. Family consciousness, family constancy, family cohesiveness, built on loyalty to something in itself but larger than itself—that stands out through all the O.T., and it stands out likewise in the entire story of the Jewish people down to this day. (Nor is that truth set aside—indeed, the inspiration of it is thrown into stronger light—by the fact that the "acids of modernity" have partly disintegrated the old sacredness of the family among those Jews who have drifted into secularism and lost the holding power of a great religion.) Characteristically, Jewish marriages have been faithful, Jewish divorces exceedingly few. The sense of family solidarity has been strong enough to reach out beyond the intimate household group and make the whole people in actual ways a family. Note the extraordinary efficiency of organized Jewish charities, the immense response of Jews to needs of their persecuted peoples in Europe during World War II and its aftermath, the passionate persistence of the Zionist move-in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee.

8 And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a scendants after you throughout their generations for an everlasting covenant, to be God to you and to your descendants after you. 8 And I will give to you, and to your descendants after you, the land of your

Skinner remarks that the covenant is thus "conceived as a self-determination of God to be to one particular race all that the word God implies." His further statement, "a reciprocal act of choice on man's part being no essential feature of the relation" (Genesis, p. 293), needs modification, for the imposition of the condition of circumcision certainly implies that some response is demanded from Israel.

8. God's third promise is that Abraham and his offspring will possess all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession. With this cf. Ps. 105:44-45, where the possession of the land is regarded as necessary if Israel is to keep God's statutes and observe his laws. The chosen people was no abstract idea. Israel was a concrete reality, a people, however unique, among the peoples of the earth. To be itself and to achieve its destiny it needed its own land, in which would be the center of its religion—the temple—and within which it could freely order its life in accordance with the divine law.

ment to make a homeland again in Palestine. If the Jews have been called "the eternal people," enduring through such a succession of bitter trial, exile, and cruelty as few races have ever known, it is their family solidarity that has kept the flame of mutual confidence and courage burning in spite of every wind that blew.

What has been true pre-eminently in Jewish history is corroborated among other peoples. The strength of Rome in the great times of the republic was in the strength and integrity of its family ideals; it was when these were corrupted that Rome sank to its decline and fall. Consider the example of China, outlasting other civilizations because in spite of huge general upheavals the tough core of family cohesion was never penetrated. The Jewish witness to the importance of the family is thus unparalleled, but in its conception of what makes and keeps the family it is supreme. Religion of some sort has been woven into the loyalty of family in every nation where that loyalty was great. It was so in Rome, in China. But back of the O.T. idea of which all Christian faith is the heir there lay the surpassing religious consciousness and unequalled revelation which were given to the Jewish people. The God of Abraham is he whom the highest instincts of the human race are led to acknowledge as the Lord of life. Therefore from the Bible come the surest suggestions of the truth for life.

Note then, in the text, the elements out of which family integrity, and therefore all sound community relationships, are made.

First, personal example. It was not what Abraham knew, nor what he had, that made him fit to be the creator of a great inheritance. His possessions at the most were simple: a tent, a few flocks and herds. By modern reckoning he had no conspicuous education. But he had moral earnestness, a sense of high responsibility, and the will to be obedient to the best he knew. There is a description by old Ephraim Peabody of the insights of the man who is technically unlearned, but is schooled by character in the ways of God.

A good conscience sometimes seems almost identical with wisdom. Who has not seen ignorant men, quite incompetent to defend their opinions, possessing an almost fatal certainty of judgment, especially in regard to the moral character both of ends and men? The secret of it was that they were seeking only what was right, and in seeking what was right they have taken the shortest road to what is wise.⁹

What the head of a family talks about and tells his children because he theoretically thinks it advisable or convenient is gone with the wind. What he actually is will be impressed upon them unforgettably: "What you are speaks so loud that I cannot hear what you say." The good man sets up a living ideal of goodness that is powerful forever. Normally it will make his children follow it. When they do not follow it, it still persists as an inward protest against their own rebellious way.

Second, the transmission of ideals. Teaching alone will not get far. It must be certified by the substance of what a man is. Yet given character, the parent not only can but ought to make his convictions articulate. The strength stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God.

sojournings, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God."

9 And God said to Abraham, "As for you, you shall keep my covenant, you and your descendants after you throughout

This insistence on the part of P was in part an expression of the natural love of a people for its home. It was in part a consequence of the fact that Israel had as yet no adequate belief in life after death, so that God's promise had to be realized, if at all, here and now on this earth. Nevertheless, in insisting upon the importance of the natural community he was on sure ground for, without this insistence, belief in the supernatural becomes little more than a world-escaping piety.

of the religious tradition of the O.T. was linked directly with the explicit charge to teach it. "These words, which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart" (Deut. 6:6). "In thine heart" first. But not to be hidden there in silence. "Thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children" (Deut. 6:7). When? In some formal and occasional fashion, like a father perfunctorily showing his child the lesson he is supposed to learn for Sunday school? No, but in all the familiar conversation and the loving watchful counsel of the home in which religious ideals are made familiar. "Thou . . . shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up" (Deut. 6:7). That parental duty expressed in Deuteronomy is echoed in the Psalms, in the Proverbs, in the Prophets; not as precept only but as something greatly practiced. When Jesus was born to be the little boy entrusted to a home in Nazareth, that fact was still true. How much of the influence that under God shaped the growing consciousness of Jesus was due to the education in the Scriptures that the father of a Jewish family was explicitly responsible to give, and which Joseph gave? Was it because of the warmth and loveliness of the first conceptions of God which came to him that way that Jesus so instinctively thought of God always as "my Father"?

Third, authority. There is an authority that is arbitrary. There is another authority that is right. A parent may be moved by nothing more than the irritable whim of his own selfishness and yet impose his will because he has the power. That authority is degrading both to the one who asserts it and to the one who suffers from it. But the authority that comes from character and from ripened knowledge is the rich gift that makes for human progress. Read John Fiske, The Destiny of Man,¹ on the significance of human infancy. Ponder the danger in modern educational theories of letting children wait to learn and choose until they do it on their own motion. Those theories have inspiring value in so far as they encourage initiative and spontaneity, but often they accompany and are used to rationalize a flabby evasion of the constructive task to give children solid foundations for knowledge and character. Teachers in schools, directors and counselors in summer camps for boys and girls, are increasingly confronted with the problem of children who have come from homes where parents have let them grow up undisciplined and intractable and who therefore are disruptive influences in any group. The real cause of that is parental feebleness, or the moral indolence of men and women more interested in cocktail parties and night clubs than in their children's nurture; but the salve to conscience may be some formula such as, "It is better for children not to be repressed."

There was a man who had the same idea, that convictions should not be implanted in children until they came to years of discretion. A friend of his recounted: "I showed him my garden, and told him it was my botanical garden. 'How so?' said he; 'it is covered with weeds.' 'Oh,' I replied, 'that is only because it has not yet come to its age of discretion. The weeds you see have taken the liberty to grow, and I thought it unfair in me to prejudice the soil toward roses and strawberries.'" But the great harvests in human life, like the harvests of the earth, come, as was thus well understood, from those who have sense enough to "prejudice the soil" by right planting. That is the creative wisdom of all true authority: the authority of the sower, the authority of the teacher who makes it plain that two and two do make four, the authority of the guide who knows the right way up the mountain, the authority of the parent who humbly but certainly can say to his children of

B. THE SIGN (17:9-14)

10. Circumcision was widely practiced in primitive religion. It was a custom of the western Semites and the Egyptians, among others. In this connection the epithet "uncircumcised" applied to the non-Semitic Philistines is significant (cf. I Sam. 17:26, 36; II Sam. 1:20; also I Sam. 18:25-27). Originally the rite was performed at puberty as a ceremony of initiation into the full religious and civil status of manhood. In the J a great truth God has given him, "This is the way, walk ye in it" (Isa. 30:21).

10-14. Circumcision.—Thus is described the beginning of the rite which was to play an immense part in the history of Israel and in the life and thought of the early Christian church that grew out of it. As the Exeg. points out, circumcision may go back to older and more general origins which now can be traced only dimly; but there is no doubt of the way in which Israel conceived it. It was linked with the direct and definite ordaining of God. This was his own sign and seal that Israel was a chosen people.

For a people to regard itself as chosen by heaven, and marked thus for a superior destiny, may be dangerous. It was dangerous for Israel when it meant a fierce separateness and fanatical intolerance. Yet it put at the core of the people's life a sureness and tenacity of conviction which could be magnificent strength—strength that continually needed to be chastened and corrected and led toward higher understanding of why God had chosen this people and what he had chosen it for—but strength, all the same. And the rite of circumcision made that strength corporate. It was the mark which made a man belong to the whole body of the nation whose dignity and consequence he thereby shared. Since Israel was chosen and called of God, so was he. Since God's promises had been given to Israel, he himself was a child of promise. Therefore the rite of circumcision, like every sacrament, was more than an external act. It conveyed something vital to the man within. As the catechism of the Book of Common Prayer defines a sacrament, it is "an outward and visible sign of an inward and spiritual grace." Circumcision was in that true sense a sacrament to all believing Jews. Through it a man's life was linked with a great fellowship whose dignity was its high consciousness that it must fulfill the purposes of God.

Thus a rite like that of circumcision can be a vast power for good. It brings the individual into the magnetic field of suggestions and influences greater and more significant than his lonely self. So with the sacraments of all religions. But the trouble is that the rite may lose its inspiration. It may become only a traditional form from which the meaning has evaporated. Or its supposed meaning may become so hard and self-assured that it paralyzes all growth and expansion of the spirit. That is what tended to happen in later Judaism. Men assumed that because they had been circumcised, therefore ipso facto they were saved. That was the reason for the blazing words of John the Baptist, "Do not presume to say to yourselves, 'We have Abraham as our father'; for I tell you, God is able from these stones to raise up children to Abraham" (Matt. 3:9).

The problem and the opportunity of religion always meet in this, viz., in the need so to interpret and to use the rite and sacrament that they shall minister to a growing life. The outward form cannot be discarded as though it had no use. That is to forfeit the corporate power of religion and to take away from individuals what can be their steadying strength. But the old form must forever be charged with living meaning, or sometimes a new form must unfold 13 He that is born in thy house, and he that is bought with thy money, must needs be circumcised: and my covenant shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant.

14 And the uncircumcised man child whose flesh of his foreskin is not circumcised, that soul shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken my covenant.

strand of ch. 34 it is taken for granted as an Israelite practice. The basic E material in Josh. 5:2-3, 8b-9 represents it as having been instituted in Israel by Joshua. The fact is that the origin of the rite is lost in the mists of antiquity. The curious story in Exod. 4:24-26 (J¹) suggests that the circumcising of infants was a custom that obtained at Kadesh, whence Israel adopted it.

Deut. 10:16; 30:6, neither of which is dependent on P, show that circumcision had, quite apart from the P tradition, come to be regarded as a sign of allegiance to the Lord, but the idea is found in germ in the J narrative of ch. 34, and more clearly in Exod. 4:24-26, where the implication of "and touched Moses' feet" (Exod. 4:25)—"feet" being a euphemism for "genitals"—is that Moses was saved from the wrath of the Lord by vicarious circumcision. This tale is of Kadesh provenance, and would seem to indicate that an uncircumcised man was thought to be in grave danger from the numen of that sanctuary. When the Israelites took over the sanctuary they adopted many of its beliefs and legends, attaching them to Yahweh, so that it is by no means impossible that the origin of the developed Israelite theory of circumcision as the mark of the covenant is to be found there.

However that may be, there is no doubt that during the Exile the rite took on a new importance and became, with the keeping of the sabbath and abstention from blood, one of the marks of the Jew. Just as in 2:2-3 P had claimed divine authority for the sabbath and in 9:4 for the practice of abstaining from blood, so here he ascribes circumcision to God's explicit command. It is indeed "placed above the Mosaic ritual, and second in dignity only to the Sabbath" (Skinner, Genesis, p. 297).

C. PROMISE OF A SON (17:15-22)

15. The change of name from Sarai to Sarah probably reflects the change from Abram to Abraham.

out of the chrysalis of the old. That was what the experience of Paul had taught him, and what he proclaimed with passionate conviction in his letters to the Romans and to the Galatians. "In Christ Jesus neither circumcision availeth any thing, nor uncircumcision; but faith which worketh by love" (Gal. 5:6). Christian baptism meant to Paul, and must mean to us, the sacrament of initiation into the new Israel which, like circumcision of old, should create in the soul the conviction that it is chosen and sealed by God's own grace to be one of those through whom his purpose in life shall be revealed. When baptism is allowed to become a perfunctory fashion, or at the other extreme regarded as a kind of automatic magic of salvation, its meaning is degraded; but truly sought, it can become the mystical gateway into the fellowship of the redeemed. The right prayer is that which is contained in the Prayer Book's ancient collect for the feast of the Circumcision of Christ: "Almighty God, who madest thy blessed Son to be circumcised, and obedient to the law for man; Grant us the true circumcision of the Spirit; that, our hearts, and all our members, being mortified from all worldly and carnal lusts, we may in all things obey thy blessed will."

16. The P parallel to 18:10 (J²), and possibly to the E story of which the fragmentary 16:13-14 was the conclusion.

17. Laughed purports to explain the name Isaac—meaning he laughs—(cf. vs. 19), and is a parallel to 21:6b (J¹); 18:12 (J²); 21:6a (E). The origin of the Isaac tradition will be discussed below.

In vss. 18, 20-21 Ishmael is set aside as the inheritor of the covenant. The fact that the (supposed) elder son of Abraham did not become the heir to the divine promise is accounted for in J² by Hagar's flight before the child's birth (ch. 16), and in E by her expulsion with the child (21:9-21), a simple variant to the J² story in ch. 16. P, having discarded this story, was compelled to provide another explanation.

history of Genesis no degree of emphasis could be too great for the conviction that God had chosen Israel for his people. In vss. 1-21 the word covenant occurs thirteen times, and every sentence reinforces it. Sarai's name is changed to Sarah, which means "princess"; she should be a mother of nations; kings of people shall be of her. In this more stately and formal priestly narrative there is no rebuke to Abraham for the fact that he fell upon his face, and laughed when he heard the promise that a son should be born to Sarah—though in the more dramatic narrative of J, which follows in the next chapter, Sarah is rebuked when she laughs. Here the whole light is turned upon the astonishing greatness of the promise itself, so that it need not seem strange that Abraham should laugh at its incredible wonder. The special covenant centering in Isaac and God's sovereign action in it are accentuated by Abraham's instinctive plea for Ishmael, O that Ishmael might live before thee! There is the cry of affection from the father's heart for his son who is already born. In answer to that, God does promise blessing to Ishmael, Twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation. But the people of Israel who would be the descendants of Isaac should be greater than the Ishmaelites. My covenant will I establish with Isaac.

23 ¶ And Abraham took Ishmael his son, and all that were born in his house, and all that were bought with his money, every male among the men of Abraham's house; and circumcised the flesh of their foreskin in the selfsame day, as God had said unto him.

24 And Abraham was ninety years old and nine, when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin.

25 And Ishmael his son was thirteen years old, when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin.

26 In the selfsame day was Abraham circumcised, and Ishmael his son.

27 And all the men of his house, born in the house, and bought with money of the stranger, were circumcised with him.

18 And the LORD appeared unto him in the plains of Mamre: and he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day;

him, God went up from Abraham. 23 Then Abraham took Ish'mael his son and all the slaves born in his house or bought with his money, every male among the men of Abraham's house, and he circumcised the flesh of their foreskins that very day, as God had said to him. 24 Abraham was ninety-nine years old when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin; 25 and Ish'mael his son was thirteen years old when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin. 26 That very day Abraham and his son Ish'mael were circumcised; 27 and all the men of his house, those born in the house and those bought with money from a foreigner, were circumcised with him.

23-27. It is impossible to say what P had in mind in recording the circumcision of Ishmael. He may have regarded the Ishmaelites—and presumably the Edomites and other supposed descendants of Abraham—as somehow participating in the Abrahamic covenant; or he may simply have been accounting for the fact that these groups practiced circumcision.

XXI. THE LORD'S VISIT TO HEBRON (18:1-33)

This chapter is from the J document. The story was included by J¹ in his narrative, elaborated by J², and added to by a late J editor. Its nucleus is contained in vss. 1b-3a, 4-8, telling of the appearance of three men, divine beings incognito, to Abraham and of his hospitality to them.

This was the description of the theophany which inaugurated the pre-Yahwist cult of Hebron. The motif of a man entertaining strangers, unaware that they were divine, is a common one in ancient literature (see Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 193-94; Skinner, Genesis, pp. 302-3). The hospitality usually, if not always, resulted in a blessing. As to whether 23-27. See Expos. on vss. 10-14.

18:1-15. The Unrecognized Visitation.—This passage manifestly must come from a very early and ingenuous stage of thought. One remembers the vivid picture in the story of the Garden of Eden of "the LORD God walking in the garden in the cool of the day" (3:8). Here the conception that underlies the narrative is still more primitive. Not only one but three divine beings appear to Abraham, and in the form of men. Then, in the story as the compilers have left its interwoven strands, one of the three is revealed as the Lord himself, who talks directly with Abraham and tells him what he plans to do.

Here therefore, as often in Genesis, one recognizes that the framework of a story belongs to a far-off time. Yet there are values in it which do not disappear. There is the opening picture of the hospitality of Abraham. From the door of his tent he sees three figures coming toward him through the heat of the day—figures whom he has no reason to believe are other than ordinary men who have chanced to come his way. Instantly he goes out to meet them and to offer to them his utmost hospitality; and the men, thus welcomed, bring to Abraham a reward of which he had not dreamed. It was not the last time that a generous spirit has found that he has "entertained angels unaware" (Heb. 13:2). When anyone receives another human being with warm-

2 And he lifted up his eyes and looked, and, lo, three men stood by him: and when he saw them, he ran to meet them from the tent door, and bowed himself toward the ground, door of his tent in the heat of the day. 2 He lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, three men stood in front of him. When he saw them, he ran from the tent door to meet them, and bowed himself to the earth, this was a feature of the original Hebron form of the tale it is impossible to say, or whether, if it was, the blessing was the promise of a son. It may be assumed, however, that the story ended with an account of how Abraham ultimately realized that his visitors were divine beings and offered sacrifice—cf. the realization of Gideon (Judg. 6:22), and of Manoah and his wife (Judg. 13:20-21), that they had seen the angel of the Lord; also Jacob's response to the theophany at Bethel (28:18).

This legend was probably current at Hebron when the Israelites appeared upon the scene, and when they took over the sanctuary for the Lord, they necessarily took over the legend. J¹, incorporating it into his history, prefixed to it the opening words of vs. 1, "and the LORD appeared to him by the oak of Mamre" (reading "oak" for "oaks" with the LXX and Syriac; cf. 13:18). He did not, however, distinguish the Lord as one of the three visitors; i.e., having said it was a theophany of the Lord, he was content to tell the tale presumably as it was told in Hebron, preserving the plural throughout vss. 4-6. The speech in vs. 3, in which Abraham addresses one of the visitors only, is an addition by J², implying that they were the Lord and two attendants; see further on vss. 10-15 below.

A. ABRAHAM'S HOSPITALITY (18:1-8)

18:2. The implication of and behold, three men stood in front of him is that they suddenly appeared; they had not been seen approaching. Abraham does not at once realize the significance of this. The statement that he bowed himself to the earth does not mean that he recognized his visitors as divine beings. The act was an expression of the self-deprecating courtesy of the Orient (cf. 23:7; I Sam. 24:8; II Sam. 14:4, 22; I Kings 1:31).

hearted kindness he may be nearer than he knows to a divine experience. Although it is a long way from Genesis to the Gospels, in the story of Abraham there is at least a foregleam of the promise of Christ, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me" (Matt. 25:40).

From the visit to Abraham comes the promise to him and to Sarah that Isaac shall be born. To both Abraham and Sarah that seemed almost unthinkable (as to Sarah's incredulous laughter, see Expos. on vs. 12). But the divine voice spoke to them, Is anything too hard for the LORD? To that question the faith of the O.T. answered "No." It was sure that always a heavenly purpose was at work and that those who trusted it would not be disappointed.

12. Laughter.—There are various kinds of laughter. There is a happy laughter like that of carefree children in their play. Zechariah's vision of the redeemed society was of a city "full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof" (Zech. 8:5). Was that also one of the reasons why Jesus made little children the symbol of the kingdom of God? There is a beauty in God's creation and an exhilaration in existence which can give to all life an essential joyousness. A lovely, simple hymn in the Church of England's Songs of Praise begins, "Glad that I live am I." In the good world which God has made we ought to be able to say with the psalmist, "Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing" (Ps. 126:2). Too often religion is supposed to be represented by severity and somberness and a dour face. It is better represented by a Francis of Assisi, who was called the "troubadour of God"; or by such a gay and gallant modern saint as "Dick" Sheppard, the beloved vicar of St. Martin-in-the-Fields, London. There is the laughter that comes from seeing the little absurdities of life, including especially our own. That also is a laughter that goes hand in hand with real religion. The egocentric man who must act as though he were a focus of creation looks at everything with a kind of suspicious grimness. He is too self-important to recognize that life may be ridiculous, and especially he can never take a joke on himself.

3 And said, My Lord, if now I have found favor in thy sight, pass not away, I pray thee, from thy servant:

4 Let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree:

5 And I will fetch a morsel of bread, and comfort ye your hearts; after that ye shall pass on: for therefore are ye come to your servant. And they said, So do, as thou hast said.

6 And Abraham hastened into the tent unto Sarah, and said, Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth.

7 And Abraham ran unto the herd, and fetched a calf tender and good, and gave it unto a young man; and he hastened to dress it.

8 And he took butter, and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set it before them; and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat.

3 and said, "My lord, if I have found favor in your sight, do not pass by your servant.

4 Let a little water be brought, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree, 5 while I fetch a morsel of bread, that you may refresh yourselves, and after that you may pass on — since you have come to your servant." So they said, "Do as you have said." 6 And Abraham hastened into the tent to Sarah, and said, "Make ready quickly three measures^b of fine meal, knead it, and make cakes." 7 And Abraham ran to the herd, and took a calf, tender and good, and gave it to the servant, who hastened to prepare it. 8 Then he took curds, and milk, and the calf which he had prepared, and set it before them; and he stood by them under the tree while they ate.

3. The verse, except for the introductory and said, is, as has been noted, from J².

4. The tree is the sacred oak of Mamre.

5. The length of Abraham's speech, suggesting a certain nervousness, is to be noted, especially in contrast to the dignified Do as you have said. In these ancient tales the greater person is always succinct in utterance, the lesser person inclined to garrulousness; cf. the meeting of Obadiah with Elijah (I Kings 18:7-15). Since you have come to your servant implies that to be thus entertained is only to be expected by those who come to his tent. J¹ thus unobtrusively stresses once more Abraham's generosity and magnanimity (cf. 13:9).

6. Three measures of fine meal—about four pecks—not only indicates Abraham's prodigal generosity but, in the telling of the story in its original form, would be the first subtle suggestion to the hearers that the visitors were divine beings.

8. In view of the fact that Hebron was the center of a grape-growing country (cf. 49:11-12) it seems likely that the tale in its pre-Yahwist form included wine in the repast. If so, its absence here will be due to J¹ who, being aware of its abuses (cf. 9:21-25), was unwilling to represent the Lord as partaking of it.

But men who are conscious of the greatness of God can be simplehearted enough to laugh at what might be the exaggerated pretensions of their own littleness. It is a sign of a wholesome spirit when any individual or nation is capable of that kind of laughter. Shakespeare and Milton reveal the strength of England, and so does Punch. When a nation can laugh at itself it is saved from delusions of grandeur and is ready to face the challenge of each new time with the stripped sincerity of truth and the courage of good humor. This does not depend upon some accidental racial quality. It can have a deeper and surer root. In one part of himself the Anglo-Saxon has plenty of instinctive arrogance; but in another part of him he has his long-inherited Christian consciousness which makes him see himself as measured against the majesty of God and so keeps him ultimately from being an unregulated fool.

But there are other kinds of laughter which are not wholesome. There is the laughter which, the more it is careless, the less it is carefree—the loud, coarse laughter of men and women whose feverish efforts to amuse themselves still leave them miserable. They are looking for escape from thinking, escape from themselves. If they can laugh loud enough, perhaps they can drown out the inner voice which tells them that their life can have some satisfying purpose and that 9 ¶ And they said unto him, Where is Sarah thy wife? And he said, Behold, in the tent.

10 And he said, I will certainly return unto thee according to the time of life; and, lo, Sarah thy wife shall have a son. And Sarah heard it in the tent door, which was behind him.

11 Now Abraham and Sarah were old and well stricken in age; and it ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women.

12 Therefore Sarah laughed within herself, saying, After I am waxed old shall I have pleasure, my lord being old also?

9 They said to him, "Where is Sarah your wife?" And he said, "She is in the tent." 10 He said, "I will surely return to you in the spring, and Sarah your wife shall have a son." And Sarah was listening at the tent door behind him. 11 Now Abraham and Sarah were old, advanced in age; it had ceased to be with Sarah after the manner of women. 12 So Sarah laughed to herself, saying, "After I have grown old, and my hus-

B. SARAH LAUGHS (18:9-15)

9. This is the conclusion of the extant J¹ material, since the change to the singular (cf. vs. 3) in the following verses indicates J². The sudden revelation by the strangers that they knew the name of the host's wife is one of the finer points of the story. It was designed to quicken the interest of the listeners: "How did they know this? They must be divine." And the unspoken suggestion is that Abraham himself was startled by this strange display of knowledge.

The question and its answer were, it may be assumed, followed by a simpler form of a promise of a son to Sarah. Whether or not J¹ continued this by recording that Abraham then offered sacrifice—presumably the conclusion of the story in its pre-Yahwist form—it is impossible to say. If he did, the incident was dropped by J², who in this case will be responsible for the statement in 13:18 that Abraham immediately upon his arrival at Hebron "built an altar to the LORD."

10-15. These verses are, as the use of the singular suggests, from J², who here identifies the son promised to Sarah with Isaac, the patron of Beer-sheba (see Exeg. on 21:1-7). J¹ had, in view of 21:6b, apparently postponed this identification until he recorded the child's birth. J² may himself be responsible for the incident here recorded, or he may have been dependent upon a tradition which had taken form at Hebron subsequent to the time of J¹. In either case the little narrative is superbly told as it describes Sarah listening, laughing, and lying.

11. The implication is that some considerable period had elapsed since Abraham had taken Sarah to Egypt.

12-15. Sarah had laughed to herself (vs. 12), i.e., silently. Yet the stranger—whom she and her husband had not yet recognized as the Lord—cf. his reference to himself in the third person in his next speech in vs. 14—at once knew that she had done so. This was another indication of his supernatural character. Its effect upon Sarah is brought out in for she was afraid (vs. 15).

they should be finding it. For the moment, it is easier and seems less painful to let everything be covered up by the kind of laughter that can be got out of a bottle of gin or out of the coarse humor of a night club show; but that laughter has nothing in it to warm the heart. In the words of Eccl. 7:6, it is like "the crackling of thorns under a pot."

There is the laughter of disbelief. Such was Sarah's laughter. And indeed, Abraham had once been guilty of this same disbelieving laughter also (17:17). The promise that was supposed to be from God seemed to her to be absurd. To have a general pious belief in God's existence was one thing; to trust that his power and grace could come directly into her life with a wonderful blessing was another. Why should she be simple-minded enough to believe that? Why should people in any time believe? The worldly wise will always be around to say that faith is nothing but credulity; and inside ourselves there is a vanity which is deathly afraid

13 And the LORD said unto Abraham, Wherefore did Sarah laugh, saying, Shall I of a surety bear a child, which am old?

14 Is any thing too hard for the LORD? At the time appointed I will return unto thee, according to the time of life, and Sarah shall have a son.

15 Then Sarah denied, saying, I laughed not; for she was afraid. And he said, Nay; but thou didst laugh.

band is old, shall I have pleasure?" 13 The LORD said to Abraham, "Why did Sarah laugh, and say, 'Shall I indeed bear a child, now that I am old?' 14 Is anything too hard^c for the LORD? At the appointed time I will return to you, in the spring, and Sarah shall have a son." 15 But Sarah denied, saying, "I did not laugh"; for she was afraid. He said, "No, but you did laugh."

^c Or wonderful

The idea of God reflected in this kindly Hebron story is very different from the primitive idea of the Lord as the God who manifested himself in the destructive forces of nature—the storm (cf. Pss. 18:7-15; 29), the fire (cf. Exod. 19:18), the earthquake (cf. I Kings 19:11)—and whose activity in human relationships was that of the God of war (cf. Exod. 15:3; Judg. 5). This primitive idea had been enriched through the work of Moses at Kadesh before the southern clans settled in and about Hebron, and the Lord had come to be known to them as the God of righteousness and justice, concerned with the ordinary, everyday relationships between man and man. Nevertheless, at Kadesh the people were still nomads and the Lord was still a desert deity, as austere as the hard land through which they ranged.

At Hebron the Israelite clans came into contact with another kind of religion—the religion symbolized by Abraham and finding partial expression in the story now under consideration. This religion was rooted in a locality; it cherished the values of a settled community, a community which was more stable and more aware of the beneficence and kindness of nature than a nomad community could be. The identification of the god of Hebron with the Lord meant that these values came to be associated with him and with the values and beliefs which the clans had brought from the desert. This resulted in an increased unification of life as it came to be seen that the creative power of nature—the power which made things grow, which gave increase to the flocks and herds, which even quickened the barren womb—and the destructive power of nature—the power which reminded men of their littleness and dependence—came from the same transcendent source. At Hebron the process begun at Kadesh was advanced. The Lord took over the functions of a tribal god without being regarded as himself a member of the tribe and, as such, committed to the protection of its material interests regardless of the moral problems involved.

of being laughed at. So like Sarah, we may try to hide our most eager longings behind a laugh that tries to say, "You cannot fool me."

In the story as it developed, God's promise was fulfilled in spite of her derisive skepticism, and Sarah herself could cry out in a great and wonderful happiness, "God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me" (21:6). But it is not always so. Those who would like to trust in God may be overawed by those who sit in the seat of the scornful. They meet fresh opportunities for their souls with an embarrassed smirk instead of with independent courage. Or they surrender to the thought that great hopes which God has kindled in them are too good to be true. That way lies frustration and the soul's defeat.

Once more: There is the laughter of deliberate evil when it has won malignant victory over what is better than itself. Remember the picture of the laughing Hitler, dancing his demonic jig in the Forest of Compiègne on the day of the surrender of France. Evil laughter does not have to be as dramatic as it was in him to be a fact. Each one of us may sometimes exhibit it: in a cruelly triumphant satisfaction in a rival's failure; in the discrediting of someone we do not like; in the reversal of Paul's great appeal to love, by which we rejoice in evil instead of rejoicing in the truth. That may wake the most awful laughter of which the Bible speaks. God's infinite holiness looks in annihilating judgment upon our petty human rancors. "He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh: the Lord shall have them in derision" (Ps. 2:4).

16 ¶ And the men rose up from thence, and looked toward Sodom: and Abraham went with them to bring them on the way.

17 And the LORD said, Shall I hide from Abraham that thing which I do;

18 Seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him?

19 For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the LORD, to do justice and judgment; that the LORD may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him.

C. DEPARTURE FOR SODOM (18:16-22)

16-22. These verses effect a transition from the legend of Hebron to the originally independent saga of the destruction of Sodom. To the simple statement of J¹, preserved in vs. 22a, J² added vss. 16, 20-21, together with vs. 33b, and into this narrative vss. 17-19 were later intruded.

The text of vss. 20-21 is in disorder (Wellhausen, Composition, pp. 27-28; Gunkel, Genesis, p. 202; Skinner, Genesis, p. 304). Its primary form would seem to have been: "And the LORD said, 'An outcry against Sodom and Gomorrah is come to me, that their sin is great; I will go down now and see whether they have done altogether according to

The blessed laughter is that of the man who rejoices in the goodness of God's world, who keeps his spirit humble and his heart sensitive to whatever is lovely and of good report, and of whom it can be said at the end that

E'en as he trod that day to God so walked he from his birth,
In simpleness and gentleness and honour and clean mirth.²

19. Handing on the Faith.—To meditate upon the O.T. is to live in two worlds—the ancient, yet also the contemporary. The customs and the ways of speech of Abraham could not be ours; but the central values of life reflected from his relationship to God are independent of time. The words of the Lord to him were that he should command his children and his household after him, in order that they might keep the way of the LORD, to do justice and judgment. There is a charge that belongs to every parent for every family as surely in the twentieth century as in Abraham's far-off age. Abraham would have to fulfill it according to the knowledge of his time. The vital question for us is how we can best fulfill it now. If therefore we ask what are the principles of understanding which today should guide those who look upon their children as a trust from God, answers may be such as these:

Intelligent sympathy. Note both words. Sympathy is a matter of emotion and imagination. In all normal parents there is an instinctive tenderness and brooding love for a baby. The baby begins to grow into the little child who has characteristics of his own, and that is where the need for sympathy begins; for sympathy means imaginative understanding by the adult of what the child thinks and feels. That sort of sympathy is not easy. On the contrary, it takes a warm purpose and an outgoing spirit. When Jesus set a child in the midst of the disciples and said that men must become as children to enter the kingdom of God, that was and is in some ways a hard saying. For a child is a biological primitive, self-centered and mostly self-assertive. In some of his outbreaks he may seem less a type of the kingdom of heaven than a proof of original sin. Why then did Jesus say what he did? Because a child is infinitely expectant, trustful, forgiving, innocent in impulse even when he is most blundering in act. Unpredictable possibilities are there in the sensitive nature that has not yet been hurt or disillusioned. Remembrance of that will warm the hearts of every right-minded

20 And the LORD said, Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous, 21 I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know.

22 And the men turned their faces from thence, and went toward Sodom: but Abraham stood yet before the LORD.

him." 20 Then the LORD said, "Because the outcry against Sodom and Gomorrah is great and their sin is very grave, 21 I will go down to see whether they have done altogether according to the outcry which has come to me; and if not, I will know."

22 So the men turned from there, and went toward Sodom; but Abraham still the outcry concerning them or not; I must know.'" Thus J² represents the Lord as going to investigate conditions at Sodom and Gomorrah (contrast 13:13 J¹). The reason for this addition was presumably to avoid any possible suggestion of divine caprice in the coming catastrophe.

It may be noted further that Gomorrah is here mentioned for the first time. The actual story has to do only with Sodom, though the tradition upon which J¹ depended seems, in view of the references elsewhere in the O.T. (see below), to have bracketed Gomorrah with it. Possibly Gomorrah was added to the J¹ recension by J² for this reason.

father and mother. They will want to be compassionate and to be sensitive to understand. Read Coventry Patmore's "The Toys." But they will need to have an intelligent understanding and an intelligent sympathy. Hardness can hurt a child, as one can see in the irritable uncontrol of selfish and callous people; but the softness of haphazard indulgence can hurt him equally. A child's nature can be helped to its right development only by those who take much thought, inform themselves, and so have not only a right will but also an effective wisdom.

A purposeful ideal. The tragedy with many people is that they have no clear aim and no fixed standards for themselves, and so none for their children. They drift here and there in ideas and notions, according to the shifting winds of casual or convenient impulse, like ships with no compass and no chart. The result is that their children are never given the moral and spiritual certainties that would make them sure of themselves and of their direction. "The way of man is not in himself: it is not in man that walketh to direct his steps" (Jer. 10:23). It is the way of God that needs to be made inviting and made plain.

Patience. It is reverence for human souls that makes patience possible. Consider the example of Jesus. The disciples thought that he and they had much too important matters on hand to be bothered with children, but Jesus said, "Let the children come to me, do not hinder them" (Mark 10:14). Mothers instinctively knew that he would welcome them: and the same Jesus who "steadfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem" (Luke 9:51) was the Jesus who stopped to take children up into his arms. Observe likewise his patience with all the lonely or distressed people who, like children, needed someone who cared and took time to understand (read Matt. 8:17; Mark 10:46-52; Luke 8:41-56; 19:1-10; John 4:5-29; 9:1-38).

Then last—yet also first, for it is the beginning and end of all—a continuing trust and faith of the father himself that is directed where he would have his son look. George MacDonald has expressed it in four lines:

Lo! Lord, I sit in thy wide space,
My child upon my knee;
She looketh up into my face,
And I look up to thee.*

20-33. The Great Soul's Mercy.—In Genesis the wickedness of Sodom is set forth so emphatically that its name has become proverbial—"a very Sodom." Yet here is Abraham interceding for Sodom. The good man pleads for mercy for the wicked.

Who is most likely to come to the help of the wicked? Can bad men in trouble expect help more certainly from other bad men? No. Men who are thoroughly bad are as merciless to others of their kind as a wolf pack is merciless to the wounded wolf. But "bad" and "good" may be misleading labels. There are so-called "good" men who are as hard as flint, the self-righteous and pharisaical, such as those whom Jesus confronted one day with his withering indignation when they brought to him the woman taken in adultery; and there are so-

D. ABRAHAM'S INTERCESSION (18:23-33)

23-33. In vss. 20-21 the fate of Sodom still hangs in the balance. Vss. 23-33a imply that it has already been determined, and tell of Abraham's endeavor to persuade the Lord to stay his hand. This alone would suggest that the passage, with which vs. 22b belongs, is secondary. Furthermore, both J¹ and J², concrete in their thinking, would have told of Abraham interceding for Lot and for any other righteous people there called "bad men," such as saloonkeepers and the neighborhood leaders of corrupt political machines, who have a bighearted compassion for all human beings, no matter how reprobate they are. But it is the consistent badness in the bad and the inconsistent badness in the hypocritically good which make them cruel, and the generosity of those whom the respectable may class as bad men is due to the great warm fact that there is so much actual goodness in them. So also the highest generosity and compassion are in those who are neither all bad, nor half bad, nor half good, but who, like Abraham, come as near to thoroughgoing goodness as human nature can. The most merciful men all through the Bible are the best men—Joseph, Moses, David, Stephen, Barnabas. Supremely so was Jesus, who in his perfect righteousness could be the friend of publicans and sinners. There is no more corrupting sin than censoriousness and self-righteousness. Let church members examine their own hearts.

The truth which applies to individuals applies to nations also. How can a world which has been torn and ravaged by the cruelty of war be healed? Only by the merciful. At the peace conference in Paris in August, 1946, Alcide de Gasperi, representative of the new government of defeated Italy, pleaded for "the universal aims of Christianity," for "a lasting and constructive peace which you are also seeking, and that co-operation between nations which it is your task to accomplish." Tragically, he was listened to for the most part in stony silence. "You would think," wrote Dorothy Thompson, "that men who had failed to prevent a world war and now fail to create a peace would be humble of heart, but they are not. . . . Perhaps all must be vanquished to learn the first law of human life—that we are all members of one another." It is easy for the proud and for those who are drunk with power to consider the enemy as men of Sodom, deserving of nothing but destruction. They like to arrogate to themselves a supposed right to the favor of God and to act as though fanatical revenge had the merit of religion. If Abraham had been like them he would have gloated over Sodom. Being the man he was—an example sorely needed—he was moved with pity.

A second truth stands out: the sacred worth of individuals, and the evil of involving the innocent minority in a judgment visited on the mass. The deepest depravity and moral perversion of war lies there; and war with modern weapons makes this evil more monstrous than ever before. Obliteration-bombing of cities, economic blockade, miscellaneous death, whether coming suddenly or through slow starvation, strike women and children impartially with men, the guiltless of a nation's sins as surely as the guilty.⁴ It is a grievous fact that even good people may grow callous to these things. Atrocities which at first shocked the conscience may come to be accepted with only lukewarm questioning or with none at all. But a world in torment will begin to have a better hope only when there shall be many men like Abraham. Sodom did deserve punishment, he knew. But what if in wicked Sodom there were fifty who were righteous; what if there were not fifty, but yet were forty-five, or forty, or thirty, or twenty,

26 And the LORD said, If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then I will spare all the place for their sakes.

27 And Abraham answered and said, Behold now, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord, which am but dust and ashes:

28 Peradventure there shall lack five of the fifty righteous: wilt thou destroy all the city for lack of five? And he said, If I find there forty and five, I will not destroy it.

29 And he spake unto him yet again, and said, Peradventure there shall be forty found there. And he said, I will not do it for forty's sake.

the Judge of all the earth do right?" 26 And the LORD said, "If I find at Sodom fifty righteous in the city, I will spare the whole place for their sake." 27 Abraham answered, "Behold, I have taken upon myself to speak to the Lord, I who am but dust and ashes. 28 Suppose five of the fifty righteous are lacking? Wilt thou destroy the whole city for lack of five?" And he said, "I will not destroy it if I find forty-five there." 29 Again he spoke to him, and said, "Suppose forty are found there." He answered, "For the might be in the city instead of representing him as pursuing a discussion of abstract principles. It was not, indeed, until an age much later than that of J² that the problem of the righteous individual in an evil community began to trouble the religious conscience of Israel. Even the great prophets of the eighth and following centuries scarcely raise the question as to the fate of the righteous in the national calamity, the certain approach of which they were proclaiming.

To say that the passage is late is not, of course, in any way to lessen its significance. It reflects a realization that the Lord cares for the individual who is not, so to speak, or even only ten? Should those ten also be caught in the general destruction and given no chance to escape? To Abraham it seemed to be intolerable that this should be allowed to happen.

So much for the instincts which made Abraham the type of a great soul. But observe the further and more important fact: Abraham believed that what was highest in his own heart was his right clue to the nature of God. That which to his own conscience seemed lifted above all doubt must be divine in its authority. That is the meaning of the vivid story of Abraham in the dialogue with God and of his question which he was sure could have only one answer, Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? Compare this approach to truth with the danger present in some twentieth-century theology, especially Barthianism, when pushed to an extreme. To make God "wholly other," the unknowable, save as he draws near in supernatural revelations that have no direct relationship to the natural awareness of human minds and hearts, is to blunt the belief of men that in their best selves they can know God and feel his near direction.

But the final suggestion of the story of Sodom—though certainly not the final suggestion of the Bible or the O.T.—is a somber one. Not even five righteous persons were left in Sodom to justify its being spared destruction. Here is an eternal picture of the corrosive possibilities of a bad environment. Those who accustom themselves to the ways of an evil society may themselves at last be evil. What is happening now to people who make no effective protest against the wrongs they live with every day?

27. Out of the Dust.—Here is a message which belongs particularly to the generations which have been caught in two world wars. The words of Abraham may be the words of twentieth-century mankind, for to Abraham too it looked as though his world would go up in flames. Pleading for the mercy of God, he recognized on the one hand his human unworthiness; on the other hand he knew the dignity of a man who dares to converse with God.

I . . . am but dust and ashes. Much of the heritage of human civilization has been forced to say that. Note the scars of London and the destruction of historic edifices in England, the devastation of towns and cities in Holland, in Italy, in the countries of middle Europe, and in Germany. Consider the near obliteration of Hiroshima and Nagasaki and Tokyo. Shadowing the future, there is for every nation the menace of the atomic bomb, with its possibility of turning not merely a few cities but all civilization into dust and ashes.

There is a mood in individual spirits like the picture of our earth, a waning in confidence, a sense of frustration, of moral failure. There are lives which are like spiritual dust bowls. Old springs of refreshment from which our fathers swallowed up in the community, for the community is a community of persons. It indicates that at the time it was written thought was being given to the matter of vicarious righteousness—the city might be saved because of the righteousness of a few. This surely reflects at least the beginning of a realization of the organic relationship of Israel—and drew seem to be no longer flowing. Life for many of their sort is like those arid stretches in the western United States where the forests have been cut down, where the rain does not fall, and the earth which ought to grow the harvest blows away in dust. There are other lives which have turned into dust and ashes in another way. A sign on a railroad which ran through forests read, "Do not let fires start. They are hot, and run faster than you can." But many persons have let fires start in the field of their own passions—physical passions or passions of hot ambition, and the moral freshness and vitality of their spirits have been scorched and burned. Or lives may be turned to ashes in still another way. The kind of fires which ought to have been there, the altar fires of idealism and hope and courage, may have burned down until there is next to nothing left. One may see this unhappy tendency in much of the literature of the mid-twentieth century. W. H. Auden has written of the weakening of moral responsibility:

It is only lately that in novel after novel one encounters heroes without honor or history; heroes who succumb so monotonously to temptation that they cannot truly be said to be tempted at all; heroes who, even if they are successful in a worldly sense, remain nevertheless but the passive recipients of good fortune; heroes whose sole moral virtue is a stoic endurance of pain and disaster.⁵

Thus the mood of the middle and later twentieth century is not one of smooth vanity or bravado. We voice more readily the General

Confession with its summary, "and there is no health in us."

But consider the other reality as expressed in the words of Abraham. Dust and ashes though he was he had taken upon himself to speak to the Lord: If we are not to think too largely of ourselves neither must we believe too little. The revulsion from overconfidence must not turn into moral cowardice. Note the danger today of pessimism, not only in secular thought but also in some theology. To guard against that danger two facts should be pondered. First is the fact of God's judgment. We may think we want a pliable and soft universe which would yield to human wish and convenience; yet we know that there could be no growth in a universe that had no moral certainties. God's judgment corrects, but also it fortifies. Alongside the judgment of God stands the mercy of God. Consider Abraham's conviction that even a few righteous in Sodom constituted a sufficient plea for God's mercy. In every continent there may be the saving remnant, the obscure men and women who are true and decent, the salt that can preserve. Belief in the goodness that may be somewhere in every human community is the antidote to moral pessimism and defeat. As that great Christian of the twentieth century, Albert Schweitzer, wrote:

However much concerned I was at the problem of the misery in the world, I never let myself get lost in broodings over it; I always held firmly to the thought that each one of us can do a little to bring some portion of it to an end. . . . Because I have confidence in the power of truth and of the spirit, I believe in the future of mankind.⁶

still more, of the Christian church—to the world. And in the question in vs. 25, Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? we have a moving affirmation of Israel's faith in the essential righteousness of the God who demanded righteousness from men—all men, not Israel only. The universalism should be noted.

XXII. DESTRUCTION OF SODOM AND GOMORRAH (19:1-29)

Vss. 1-28 are from J¹, with some slight elaboration by J² and more extensive additions by later editors. Vs. 29 is from P, and is all that writer had to say about the event. It may have been the immediate continuation of 13:12abα. It may have been followed by a genealogy of Lot, dropped by RP in favor of the J narrative in vss. 30-38.

This story—belonging to a widely diffused class of tales having possibly a mythological background (see Skinner, Genesis, pp. 311-12)—of the destruction of a city which had once stood in the vicinity of the Dead Sea, probably at its southern end, was presumably current in Hebron when the Israelites settled there. The fact that the tale in the form it has here suggests a volcanic upheaval makes it likely that it was carried over to this region from some other locality—there is no volcanic matter near the Dead Sea—to explain the disappearance of the city. Had it been indigenous, it seems probable that it would have told of the city being overwhelmed by the waters forming the Dead Sea, especially as Genesis, as has been seen, seems to hold that the Dead Sea did not come into existence until after this event (cf. 13:10; 14:3, 10).

The tale was thus non-Yahwist in its origin. J¹, unifying the various local traditions by relating them to Yahwism, took it over and linked it to the saga of Hebron by identifying the supernatural visitants with those whom Abraham had entertained, and by making the man who was saved from the disaster Abraham's nephew, who had come with him from the desert (12:4a) and who had settled in, or in the vicinity of, Sodom (13:7-11a, 12bβ).

19:1. This verse was in J² the immediate continuation of 18:33b and, it may be assumed, recorded that "the men" came to Sodom in the evening. The intrusion of 18:22b-33a resulted in the representation that the Lord's two companions proceeded to Sodom alone. Hence the reading the two angels; it is to be noted that nowhere else in chs. 18-19 are they designated as angels. The author who inserted this material states simply that "the LORD went his way, when he had finished speaking with Abraham" (18:33a). He does not represent him as following the angels to Sodom, an omission which was doubtless due to his horror at the thought that the Lord should have been subjected to the shocking insult recorded in vss. 4-9.

19:1-25. The City of Sodom.—In this chapter Lot appears in a better light than in his previous relationships with Abraham, yet at the same time the sordid folly of his selfish choice to live in Sodom appears all the darker as seen in its results. Compared with the general population of Sodom, Lot was a decent person. The writer of II Peter could even think of him as "just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked." The moments came when, as in the vile events described in this chapter, he was more than vexed. He tried to resist the extreme outrage which the lustful gang in Sodom were about to perpetrate upon the men who had harborage in his house. He would go to great lengths to fulfill the obligation of hospitality—

2 And he said, Behold now, my lords, turn in, I pray you, into your servant's house, and tarry all night, and wash your feet, and ye shall rise up early, and go on your ways. And they said, Nay; but we will abide in the street all night.

3 And he pressed upon them greatly; and they turned in unto him, and entered into his house; and he made them a feast, and did bake unleavened bread, and they did eat.

4 ¶ But before they lay down, the men of the city, even the men of Sodom, compassed the house round, both old and young, all the people from every quarter:

5 And they called unto Lot, and said unto him, Where are the men which came in to thee this night? bring them out unto us, that we may know them.

6 And Lot went out at the door unto them, and shut the door after him,

7 And said, I pray you, brethren, do not so wickedly.

8 Behold now, I have two daughters which have not known man; let me, I pray you, bring them out unto you, and do ye to his face to the earth, 2 and said, "My lords, turn aside, I pray you, to your servant's house and spend the night, and wash your feet; then you may rise up early and go on your way." They said, "No; we will spend the night in the street." 3 But he urged them strongly; so they turned aside to him and entered his house; and he made them a feast, and baked unleavened bread, and they ate. 4 But before they lay down, the men of the city, the men of Sodom, both young and old, all the people to the last man, surrounded the house; 5 and they called to Lot, "Where are the men who came to you tonight? Bring them out to us, that we may know them." 6 Lot went out of the door to the men, shut the door after him, 7 and said, "I beg you, my brothers, do not act so wickedly. 8 Behold, I have two daughters who have not known man; let

A. LOT'S HOSPITALITY (19:1-3)

2. With this cf. 18:2-5. The men's initial refusal to accept the proffered hospitality may be intended merely as a piece of Oriental politeness, or it may be that the author had in mind the fact that they had come to investigate conditions in the city.

3. The sin of Sodom was unnatural vice. Lot therefore knew only too well what remaining in the street all night would have meant, and urged them strongly to come to his house.

B. THE SIN OF SODOM (19:4-11)

The text of vs. 4-10 is confused on account of successive glossings, but what is recorded as having happened is clear enough. The men of the city demanded that Lot hand over his guests to them that they might gratify their unnatural lust. Lot, horrified at the mere thought of such a breach of hospitality, goes so far as to offer to deliver his daughters to them—an offer which was angrily refused. At this point the visitors, who had been listening to the conversation—this suggests that shut the door after him (vs. 6), and so vs. 9bβ, are secondary—intervened, drew Lot back into the house, shut the door, and smote the men outside with blindness.

8. This is recorded to Lot's credit as one who was concerned at all costs to fulfill the sacred obligation of a host to protect his guests. At the same time, such treatment of an obligation which in his world and time was one of the supreme laws of honor. But he had got himself into a place where there could be no decent way out of the crisis that had caught him. All he could think of was the desperate and shameful alternative of sacrificing his own daughters. Even this would not avail. The gang that assaulted his house wanted the men who were his guests there—wanted them for sodomy, the vileness to which the city of Sodom gave its name. In the day when Lot made what he thought was his smart decision to select the neighborhood of Sodom in the choice Abraham offered him he did not foresee that the place them as is good in your eyes: only unto these men do nothing; for therefore came they under the shadow of my roof.

9 And they said, Stand back. And they said again, This one fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a judge: now will we deal worse with thee than with them. And they pressed sore upon the man, even Lot, and came near to break the door.

10 But the men put forth their hand, and pulled Lot into the house to them, and shut to the door.

11 And they smote the men that were at the door of the house with blindness, both small and great: so that they wearied themselves to find the door.

12 ¶ And the men said unto Lot, Hast thou here any besides? son-in-law, and thy sons, and thy daughters, and whatsoever thou hast in the city, bring them out of this place:

13 For we will destroy this place, because the cry of them is waxen great before the face of the LORD; and the LORD hath sent us to destroy it.

14 And Lot went out, and spake unto his sons-in-law, which married his daughters, and said, Up, get you out of this place; for the LORD will destroy this city. But he seemed as one that mocked unto his sons-in-law.

me bring them out to you, and do to them as you please; only do nothing to these men, for they have come under the shelter of my roof." 9 But they said, "Stand back!" And they said, "This fellow came to sojourn, and he would play the judge! Now we will deal worse with you than with them." Then they pressed hard against the man Lot, and drew near to break the door. 10 But the men put forth their hands and brought Lot into the house to them, and shut the door. 11 And they struck with blindness the men who were at the door of the house, both small and great, so that they wearied themselves groping for the door.

12 Then the men said to Lot, "Have you any one else here? Sons-in-law, sons, daughters, or any one you have in the city, bring them out of the place; 13 for we are about to destroy this place, because the outcry against its people has become great before the LORD, and the LORD has sent us to destroy it." 14 So Lot went out and said to his sons-in-law, who were to marry his daughters, "Up, get out of this place; for the LORD is about to destroy the city." But he seemed to his sons-in-law to be jesting.

the daughters would have been abhorrent to Hebrew morality. The incident was doubtless a part of the story as it lay before J¹ and he included it in his narrative, possibly with the implication that the sin of Sodom was so great that a righteous man living there inevitably found himself confronted with such a moral predicament that he could choose only between the two evils—an instance of the realism of J¹'s thinking—and he chose the lesser. In this connection, however, the story of Abraham's surrendering of Sarah to the Pharaoh (12:11-20), and that of Isaac's surrendering of Rebekah to the king of Gerar (26:7-11), should be noted. It is unlikely that either J¹ or J² approved of this conduct, so that the inclusion of the stories in their collections provides an indication that the populace in general still regarded the wife as the chattel of her husband. Similarly, an unmarried daughter was the property of her father (cf. Deut. 22:13-21, 28-29).

9. The meaning of this verse is that Lot, a mere sojourner in the city, had no right to interfere.

C. GOD DESTROYS THE CITIES (19:12-29)

12-29. Vss. 12-26 have also been extensively glossed. Vs. 28 indicates that by sunrise the destruction was complete; this contradicts the implication of vs. 15 that the men waited all night—the attempt against them had been made early in the evening (cf. vs. 4)—before taking action. The narrative following vs. 11 must originally have told how the men announced their intention to destroy the city, how they got Lot and his daughters out—perhaps miraculously, cf. and set him outside the city (vs. 16)—and urged him to 15 ¶ And when the morning arose, then the angels hastened Lot, saying, Arise, take thy wife, and thy two daughters, which are here; lest thou be consumed in the iniquity of the city.

16 And while he lingered, the men laid hold upon his hand, and upon the hand of his wife, and upon the hand of his two daughters; the LORD being merciful unto him: and they brought him forth, and set him without the city.

17 ¶ And it came to pass, when they had brought them forth abroad, that he said, Escape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed.

18 And Lot said unto them, Oh, not so, my Lord:

19 Behold now, thy servant hath found grace in thy sight, and thou hast magnified thy mercy, which thou hast showed unto me in saving my life; and I cannot escape to the mountain, lest some evil take me, and I die:

20 Behold now, this city is near to flee unto, and it is a little one: O, let me escape thither, (is it not a little one?) and my soul shall live.

21 And he said unto him, See, I have accepted thee concerning this thing also, that I will not overthrow this city, for the which thou hast spoken.

22 Haste thee, escape thither; for I cannot do any thing till thou be come thither. Therefore the name of the city was called Zoar.

15 When morning dawned, the angels urged Lot, saying, "Arise, take your wife and your two daughters who are here, lest you be consumed in the punishment of the city." 16 But he lingered; so the men seized him and his wife and his two daughters by the hand, the LORD being merciful to him, and they brought him forth and set him outside the city. 17 And when they had brought them forth, they^f said, "Flee for your life; do not look back or stop anywhere in the valley; flee to the hills, lest you be consumed." 18 And Lot said to them, "Oh, no, my lords; 19 behold, your servant has found favor in your sight, and you have shown me great kindness in saving my life; but I cannot flee to the hills, lest the disaster overtake me, and I die. 20 Behold, yonder city is near enough to flee to, and it is a little one. Let me escape there — is it not a little one? — and my life will be saved!" 21 He said to him, "Behold, I grant you this favor also, that I will not overthrow the city of which you have spoken. 22 Make haste, escape there; for I can do nothing till you arrive there." Therefore the name of flee to the hills (vs. 17), and how they rained on Sodom . . . brimstone and fire from the LORD out of heaven" (vs. 24).

The representation that Lot went out in vs. 14 is out of keeping with the desperate situation depicted in vss. 6-11, and indicates that the verse is secondary—inserted possibly to answer the question how it was that Lot's two daughters of marriageable age (cf. vs. 31) were still unmarried. Its intrusion retarded the tempo of the narrative in its primary form and this led to the addition of vs. 15.

Vss. 18-22, accounting for the survival of the city of Zoar, possibly at the south end of the Dead Sea, in a region represented by the tale as having been completely devastated, are also secondary. So too is vs. 26, as is indicated by the fact that his (KJV) syntactically would prove so evil. But because he did not care enough to consider that, he took the chance and he reaped the consequences. Like many another man since, he learned that early choices which seem clever when they smother conscience must pay their heavy reckoning.

There is no guarantee of limited liability for a wrong act.

Yet Lot does not fully share the fate of Sodom. There was worth in his recognition that the city was at the point of destruction and in his effort to save his family. But when all is 23 ¶ The sun was risen upon the earth when Lot entered into Zoar.

24 Then the LORD rained upon Sodom and upon Gomorrah brimstone and fire from the LORD out of heaven; the city was called Zo'ar.^s 23 The sun had risen on the earth when Lot came to Zo'ar.

24 Then the LORD rained on Sodom and Gomor'rah brimstone and fire from the LORD out of heaven; 25 and he overthrew those cities, and all the valley, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and what grew on the ground. 26 But Lot's wife behind him looked back, and she became a pillar of salt.

^s That is Little refers to the subject of the preceding sentence (vs. 25). The verse explains a curiously shaped salt formation in the terrain. Its insertion led to the earlier mention of Lot's wife in the tale.

By vs. 27-28 J1 completes his articulation of the story with the Hebron saga of ch. 18.

The frequent allusions to the legend in the O.T. indicate the impression it made upon the Israelite mind. The overthrow of the cities is referred to as an outstanding instance of the operation of the divine judgment in Deut. 29:23; Isa. 1:9; 13:19; Jer. 49:18; 50:40; Amos 4:11; Zeph. 2:9. The two cities are mentioned as examples of appalling wickedness—with the implication that those who imitate them will meet the same fate—in Deut. 32:32; Isa. 1:10; Jer. 23:14; and Sodom alone in Isa. 3:9; Lam. 4:6; Ezek. 16:46-55. In Deut. 29:23 Admah and Zeboiim, mentioned alone in Hos. 11:8, are said and done, his deliverance was not due to his deserts. The climax of the story is in the LORD being merciful unto him.

26. When Regrets Are Ruinous.—The woman caught in the whirlwind of fire from doomed Sodom because she was still too reluctant to leave the wicked city has become proverbial: "Remember Lot's wife" (Luke 17:32).

The deadliest looking back is that of the imagination which has become entangled in sinful associations which it cannot willingly let go. Lot's wife was not only accustomed to Sodom; apparently she liked it and did not want to leave. In that she was representative of all those in every time who are caught in the consequences of the evil they cannot quite let go. It is not enough to turn the back tentatively upon old temptations; there must be a clean, full break. The man for whom drink may be ruin must make himself resolute to escape it. Unless he genuinely wants to, nobody else can save him. So is it also with other sins, particularly those sins of the flesh, with regard to which the permitted backward thought can so quickly light again the instinctive passions. If a lighted candle is blown out, a column of smoke will rise from the quenched wick. Touch a lighted match to the smoke, even if an inch or two from the candle, and the fire will run down the smoke and set the wick aflame again. Lot's wife held her hot desires too close to Sodom, and the result was disastrous.

There is another kind of looking back which may not be associated with sinfulness, but which may also be destructive of the great possibilities of life. It is the looking back which is obsessed with the memory of old failures and lets whole-hearted energy be paralyzed because the forces of personality are split. Half of them are pulling back to yesterday, and what remains of imagination is too feeble to go forward. This may be a danger for men who essentially are good—or want to be. They realize that in certain critical moments and matters they have failed. If only they could go back and live life over, they say to themselves, how different the present then would be. That of course is a natural and almost inevitable movement of the mind, and it has in it this good element: it testifies to a sensitive conscience. Nevertheless, the imagination must be disciplined and turned another way. The past must be faced, acknowledged, and written off with unflinching recognition of the red ink on the ledger; but then the page must be resolutely turned to a new one where another and more positive record can begin. That is the lesson which brave souls have to learn. Many a man told of in the Bible had to overcome original blunders and defeats. Remember Jacob, Joseph, Moses, David. Paul the apostle is the great witness to that truth. Looking back on his earlier life, he might have been sucked down into a quicksand of vain regrets; but, as he wrote to the Philippians, he had learned instead to be as one who, "forgetting those things

27 ¶ And Abraham gat up early in the morning to the place where he stood before the LORD:

28 And he looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and toward all the land of the plain, and beheld, and, lo, the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace.

29 ¶ And it came to pass, when God destroyed the cities of the plain, that God remembered Abraham, and sent Lot out of the midst of the overthrow, when he overthrew the cities in the which Lot dwelt.

30 ¶ And Lot went up out of Zoar, and dwelt in the mountain, and his two daughters with him; for he feared to dwell in Zoar: and he dwelt in a cave, he and his two daughters.

27 And Abraham went early in the morning to the place where he had stood before the LORD; 28 and he looked down toward Sodom and Gomor'rah and toward all the land of the valley, and beheld, and lo, the smoke of the land went up like the smoke of a furnace.

29 So it was that, when God destroyed the cities of the valley, God remembered Abraham, and sent Lot out of the midst of the overthrow, when he overthrew the cities in which Lot dwelt.

30 Now Lot went up out of Zo'ar, and dwelt in the hills with his two daughters, for he was afraid to dwell in Zo'ar; so he dwelt in a cave with his two daughters.

bracketed with Sodom and Gomorrah, suggesting perhaps that another variant of the tale was once current in Israel.

XXIII. ORIGIN OF MOAB AND AMMON (19:30-38)

The section is from the J¹ narrative, except for the references to Zoar in vs. 30, which are from the hand of the writer responsible for vs. 19-23.

The legend was derived by J¹ from the east Jordan tradition—his familiarity with which is indicated by his inclusion of other tales from that region in his narrative. It was independent of the sagas of Sodom and Hebron with which J¹ has linked it, was presumably current in some form among the Moabites and the Ammonites, and was associated with a certain cave in the mountains of Moab. In vs. 30 the Hebrew should be rendered "the cave" (Gunkel, Genesis, p. 218) or "a certain cave," not a cave.

There is not a man on earth to come in to us (vs. 31) presupposes that the background of the tale was a world-wide disaster, such as the Flood, which had wiped out the human race. The action of the two women was thus in its original setting heroic, and the story was doubtless told with pride by their supposed descendants. It may be doubted, however, whether J¹ shared this admiration. He seems rather to have regarded the story as a reflection upon Moab and Ammon. (This is certainly the intention of Deut. 32:32 where "their"—"our enemies" vs. 31—refers to Ammon and Moab.) Their origin was incestuous, and the implication may have been that this kind of thing was still prevalent among them (cf. Exeg. on 9:20-25).

which are behind," must be "reaching forth unto those things which are before" (Phil. 3:13).

27-29. The Power of Intercession.—Moffatt translates vs. 27, "In the morning when Abraham rose and went to the spot where he had stood before the Eternal"; and that standing "before the Eternal" was the event described in 18:22-33 when Abraham pleaded with God not to destroy Sodom if even ten righteous men were there. Now Abraham goes back to that place of his intercession, as though prayer were his first instinctive morning act; and he sees the burning city, for not even ten righteous men were there. But Lot is sent . . . out of the midst of the overthrow. And why? Because God remembered Abraham. There was not much to remember about Lot that would have deserved his saving. But Abraham's devotion had thrown a protection around him. So in ways deeper and wider than we know the prayer of the good man may avail to save. Who can set limits to intercessory prayer and to vicarious mercy? The declaration of Lot as saved because God remembered Abraham may stand as a little foregleam of the faith in the salvation of mankind because God remembers Jesus and the atonement he made upon the Cross.

30-38. Lot's Daughters.—As the Exeg. has pointed out, this story is of obscure origin and purpose. Its inclusion in the total narrative is another evidence of the unwavering solicitude

31 And the firstborn said unto the younger, Our father is old, and there is not a man in the earth to come in unto us after the manner of all the earth:

32 Come, let us make our father drink wine, and we will lie with him, that we may preserve seed of our father.

33 And they made their father drink wine that night: and the firstborn went in, and lay with her father; and he perceived not when she lay down, nor when she arose.

34 And it came to pass on the morrow, that the firstborn said unto the younger, Behold, I lay yesternight with my father: let us make him drink wine this night also; and go thou in, and lie with him, that we may preserve seed of our father.

35 And they made their father drink wine that night also: and the younger arose, and lay with him; and he perceived not when she lay down, nor when she arose.

36 Thus were both the daughters of Lot with child by their father.

37 And the firstborn bare a son, and called his name Moab: the same is the father of the Moabites unto this day.

31 And the first-born said to the younger, "Our father is old, and there is not a man on earth to come in to us after the manner of all the earth. 32 Come, let us make our father drink wine, and we will lie with him, that we may preserve offspring through our father." 33 So they made their father drink wine that night; and the first-born went in, and lay with her father; he did not know when she lay down or when she arose. 34 And on the next day, the first-born said to the younger, "Behold, I lay last night with my father; let us make him drink wine tonight also; then you go in and lie with him, that we may preserve offspring through our father." 35 So they made their father drink wine that night also; and the younger arose, and lay with him; and he did not know when she lay down or when she arose. 36 Thus both the daughters of Lot were with child by their father. 37 The first-born bore a son, and called his name Moab; he is the father of the Moabites to

The fact that the two daughters are unnamed suggests that in the original tale their named father had played the more important part and that the initiative had been with him. In view of the references to the wine of Moab in Isa. 16:7-10; Jer. 48:11-12, 32-33 (cf. Deut. 32:32), it is possible that among the Israelites the tale had already been embellished by the addition of the feature that he had been drunk when he committed incest. However that may be, the representation here that his daughters deliberately made him drunk will be the work of J¹, endeavoring to preserve something of his reputation, for J¹, articulating this tale with the sagas of Sodom and Hebron, had identified him with the nephew of Abraham who had come with him from the desert and had been delivered from Sodom.

The fact that the man in the cave appears to have been named suggests that the name Lot was carried back from him to the hero of Sodom and thence to Abraham's nephew. In this connection 36:20 should be noted, where Lotan, another form of Lot, appears as a son of Seir the Horite. Lot thus had a place in the tradition of Edom.

37. Moab is taken as the equivalent of mē'ābh, meaning "from a father" or "from my father." The true etymology of the word is uncertain.

of the compilers of Genesis to preserve every fragment of tradition that had come down to them. It was as though they felt that everything that was told as having happened must have had some part in the plan of God, and therefore must be recorded. It may be that here the purpose was to show the superiority of the line of Israel that descended through Abraham over that of the Moabites and Ammonites, who are described as of incestuous birth. It may be, on the other hand, that this is a more ancient story from some lost setting, not to slur but to honor women who at a crisis in their world's existence allowed themselves to conceive thus in order that life might not be extinguished. Such an act would have its special appeal in an age when the corporate interest of the clan or tribe outranked concern for the individual.

38 And the younger, she also bare a son, and called his name Ben-ammi: the same is the father of the children of Ammon unto this day.

this day. 38 The younger also bore a son, and called his name Ben-ammi; he is the father of the Ammonites to this day.

20 And Abraham journeyed from thence toward the south country, and dwelt between Kadesh and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar.

20 From there Abraham journeyed toward the territory of the Negeb, and dwelt between Kadesh and Shur; and he 38. Ben-ammi, taken as meaning "son of my kinsman," is represented as the father of the Ammonites, always called in the O.T. "sons of Ammon," except in the M.T. of I Sam. 11:11—where the LXX, Syriac, and three Hebrew MSS also have "sons of Ammon"—and Ps. 83:7. The RSV renders Ammonites here and elsewhere. The true etymology of 'Ammôn is also uncertain.

XXIV. ABRAHAM AND ISAAC (20:1–21:7)

A. ABRAHAM LEAVES HEBRON (20:1a)

20:1a. And dwelt between Kadesh and Shur is a doublet to and he sojourned in Gerar (cf. Procksch, Genesis, p. 113; Smend, Erzählung des Hexateuch, p. 43; and Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse, p. 259*, who hold that the verse has been shortened by RJE). The latter, belonging to the story following, is from E; the former, accordingly, from J.

Between Kadesh and Shur was, as 16:7, 14 indicates, the location of Beer-lahai-roi. The association of Isaac with Beer-lahai-roi (cf. 24:62; 25:11b) is certainly traditional, for there would otherwise have been no reason for mentioning the place alongside of Beer-sheba, with which he is elsewhere associated (cf. 22:19; 26:33; 28:10, the continuation of ch. 27; also 21:14, suggesting that Abraham was living there at the time Isaac was weaned). It may accordingly be assumed that the first half of this verse, recording Abraham's move to Beer-lahai-roi, is from J¹, and that the purpose of the notice was to bring him to that place for Isaac's birth.

The Beer-lahai-roi figure, Isaac, was not originally connected with Abraham of Hebron. The Israelites who settled in the vicinity of Beer-lahai-roi, in taking over that sanctuary for the Lord, necessarily took over its legends. Isaac thus became their patron saint, the father of the community, as Abraham had come to fill this role for the Yahwists who settled at Hebron.

The Israelites at Hebron and those at Beer-lahai-roi were, however, conscious of the interclan unity which existed between them, and which, being Semites, they expressed in genealogical terms. It was necessary, therefore, that Isaac, the father of Beer-lahai-roi, should be related to Abraham, the father of Hebron. This necessity was met by making Abraham the father of Isaac. Whether the two traditions had already been thus articulated before J¹ wrote it is impossible to say. J¹, at any rate, accepted the articulation and possibly strengthened it by adding the detail that Abraham had been at Beer-lahai-roi when Isaac was born.

The probability has already been noted in connection with 16:13-14 that E took account of the Beer-lahai-roi element in the Isaac tradition by placing the promise of a son to Sarah there. In J this occurred at Hebron (18:9-14). As will be seen below, E located the birth of the child at Beer-sheba.

20:1-18. Abraham in Gerar.—(See Expos. on 12:11-20.) This chapter incorporates from the E document what seems to be a parallel story to that which had come from J in ch. 12. Essentially the two stories are the same—in the danger and dilemma Abraham faces when he goes with his wife into another country, in the discreditable device by which he tries to protect himself, in the actions of the foreign ruler, and finally in Abraham's undeserved deliverance at the hands of God. Only at two points does the second story have any important difference from

2 And Abraham said of Sarah his wife, She is my sister: and Abimelech king of Gerar sent, and took Sarah.

3 But God came to Abimelech in a dream by night, and said to him, Behold, thou art but a dead man, for the woman which thou hast taken; for she is a man's wife.

4 But Abimelech had not come near her: and he said, LORD, wilt thou slay also a righteous nation?

5 Said he not unto me, She is my sister? and she, even she herself said, He is my brother: in the integrity of my heart and innocency of my hands have I done this.

6 And God said unto him in a dream, Yea, I know that thou didst this in the integrity of thy heart; for I also withheld thee from sinning against me: therefore suffered I thee not to touch her.

7 Now therefore restore the man his wife; for he is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee, and thou shalt live: and if thou restore her not, know thou that thou shalt surely die, thou, and all that are thine.

8 Therefore Abimelech rose early in the morning, and called all his servants, and told all these things in their ears: and the men were sore afraid.

sojourned in Gerar. 2 And Abraham said of Sarah his wife, "She is my sister." And Abim'elech king of Gerar sent and took Sarah. 3 But God came to Abim'elech in a dream by night, and said to him, "Behold, you are a dead man, because of the woman whom you have taken; for she is a man's wife." 4 Now Abim'elech had not approached her; so he said, "Lord, wilt thou slay an innocent people? 5 Did he not himself say to me, 'She is my sister'? And she herself said, 'He is my brother.' In the integrity of my heart and the innocence of my hands I have done this." 6 Then God said to him in the dream, "Yes, I know that you have done this in the integrity of your heart, and it was I who kept you from sinning against me; therefore I did not let you touch her. 7 Now then restore the man's wife; for he is a prophet, and he will pray for you, and you shall live. But if you do not restore her, know that you shall surely die, you, and all that are yours."

The two documents J and E, which lay before RJE, thus differed at these two points. RJE solved the difficulty by taking a fragment of the E story of the promise of a son to Sarah and attaching it to the Hagar-Ishmael legend (ch. 16), and followed J in his representation that the promise to Sarah had been given at Hebron. He then favored E by placing Isaac's birth at Beer-sheba—cf. 21:31, which originally preceded the E account of Isaac's birth (see below)—and made the J notice of Abraham's journey to Beer-lahai-roi, between Kadesh and Shur, a mere preliminary to his further move to Gerar.

The Beer-sheba element in the Isaac tradition is discussed in the Intro., p. 442.

B. ABRAHAM AT GERAR (20:1b-18)

This is a parallel to the stories in 12:10-20 (J²) and 26:6-11 (J¹). It is accordingly from E, as the use of God ('elohim) throughout the narrative—except in vs. 18, which is a gloss on vs. 17—and the revelation in a dream (vs. 3) indicate. It is thus the latest of the three recensions. As in the J¹ version the episode is located at Gerar. To be noted are: (a) the explicit statement in vs. 4 that Abimelech had not entered into marital relations with Sarah, and (b) the partial justification of Abraham in vs. 12—both instances of E's concern, to be noted below, for the moral reputation of the patriarchs.

4. People is a scribal error; "man" should be substituted for it (Holzinger, Genesis, p. 159).

7. A prophet here means little more than a man of God. In Israel the prophet was originally an ecstatic, but the title came eventually to be applied to men who were regarded as the exponents of God's word and the agents of his will, with special powers

9 Then Abimelech called Abraham, and said unto him, What hast thou done unto us? and what have I offended thee, that thou hast brought on me and on my kingdom a great sin? thou hast done deeds unto me that ought not to be done.

10 And Abimelech said unto Abraham, What sawest thou, that thou hast done this thing?

11 And Abraham said, Because I thought, Surely the fear of God is not in this place; and they will slay me for my wife's sake.

12 And yet indeed she is my sister; she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother; and she became my wife.

13 And it came to pass, when God caused me to wander from my father's house, that I said unto her, This is thy kindness which thou shalt show unto me; at every place whither we shall come, say of me, He is my brother.

14 And Abimelech took sheep, and oxen, and menservants, and womenservants, and gave them unto Abraham, and restored him Sarah his wife.

15 And Abimelech said, Behold, my land is before thee: dwell where it pleaseth thee.

16 And unto Sarah he said, Behold, I have given thy brother a thousand pieces of silver: behold, he is to thee a covering of the eyes, unto all that are with thee, and with all other: thus she was reprovèd.

17 ¶ So Abraham prayed unto God: and God healed Abimelech, and his wife, and his maidservants; and they bare children.

8 So Abim'elech rose early in the morning, and called all his servants, and told them all these things; and the men were very much afraid. 9 Then Abim'elech called Abraham, and said to him, "What have you done to us? And how have I sinned against you, that you have brought on me and my kingdom a great sin? You have done to me things that ought not to be done." 10 And Abim'elech said to Abraham, "What were you thinking of, that you did this thing?" 11 Abraham said, "I did it because I thought, There is no fear of God at all in this place, and they will kill me because of my wife. 12 Besides she is indeed my sister, the daughter of my father but not the daughter of my mother; and she became my wife. 13 And when God caused me to wander from my father's house, I said to her, 'This is the kindness you must do me: at every place to which we come, say of me, He is my brother.'" 14 Then Abim'elech took sheep and oxen, and male and female slaves, and gave them to Abraham, and restored Sarah his wife to him. 15 And Abim'elech said, "Behold, my land is before you; dwell where it pleases you." 16 To Sarah he said, "Behold, I have given your brother a thousand pieces of silver; it is your vindication in the eyes of all who are with you; and before every one you are righted." 17 Then Abraham prayed to God; and God healed Abim'elech, and also healed his wife and female slaves so that they bore children.

as intercessors (cf. vs. 17), whether they were ecstatics or not. For E, with his northern affinities, the prophet rather than the priest was the accredited representative of the Lord. It should be noted, however, that vs. 7aβ together with vs. 17 which belongs with it are probably secondary: nothing is said before vs. 17 about Abimelech being stricken—a difficulty recognized by the glossator who added vs. 18—and vs. 7aβ makes the forgiveness of Abimelech dependent on the prayer of Abraham who had wronged him, not on his obedience to God's command.

9. And my kingdom is an addition, the result of people in vs. 4.

the first: the scene is changed; and there is an evident concern to palliate Abraham's actions by suggesting that he did not completely lie, since Sarah, although she was his wife, was also his half sister. Notwithstanding these differences in details, the purpose of the two narratives remains identical. It was to express the faith, sometimes as it may seem to us uncritical in its analysis of particular circumstances but always greatly convinced, that God's protection of his people of the covenant would never fail.

18 For the LORD had fast closed up all the wombs of the house of Abimelech, because of Sarah, Abraham's wife.

21 And the LORD visited Sarah as he had said, and the LORD did unto Sarah as he had spoken.

2 For Sarah conceived, and bare Abraham a son in his old age, at the set time of which God had spoken to him.

3 And Abraham called the name of his son that was born unto him, whom Sarah bare to him, Isaac.

4 And Abraham circumcised his son Isaac being eight days old, as God had commanded him.

21 The LORD visited Sarah as he had said, and the LORD did to Sarah as he had promised. ² And Sarah conceived, and bore Abraham a son in his old age at the time of which God had spoken to him. ³ Abraham called the name of his son who was born to him, whom Sarah bore him, Isaac. ⁴ And Abraham circumcised his son Isaac when he was eight days old, as God

C. BIRTH OF ISAAC (21:1-7)

This section is a conflation of J, E, and P, with some redactional elaboration. The J material is the continuation of 20:1a, and places Isaac's birth at Beer-lahai-roi. E locates it at Beer-sheba, for, as will be shown below, the story in ch. 20 was in that document followed immediately by the account of Abraham's dispute with Abimelech over certain wells and by the naming of Beer-sheba, i.e., the E recension of 21:22-34. According to P, Isaac was born at Kiriath-arba, i.e. Hebron, Abraham's only Palestinian dwelling place in that document.

21:1-8. Father and Son.—The picture drawn in Genesis of Abraham and Isaac and the other patriarchs may have curious and complex origins, as the Exeg. indicates: yet the fact remains that here are figures which represent with imperishable vividness the likenesses and contrasts in human character.

Abraham's son is a very different person from his father. The great man's son is seldom great. This should be surprising, but actually it has become almost a truism. When there do appear two men of eminence in successive generations, as "the Elder Pitt" and "the Younger Pitt," or as in the Adams family of Massachusetts, it is a conspicuous exception in the course of history. Isaac was no exception. He was the ordinary son of the extraordinary father. Abraham's life moved through a wide orbit, Isaac's in a narrow one. The story of Abraham began in far-off Ur of the Chaldeans, where he left what had been his home and kindred and an old environment to follow an unpredictable adventure, and once went as far as Egypt; but Isaac never moved out of his little circle in Palestine. Abraham broke new paths; Isaac trod in those marked for him. Abraham was the adventurer; Isaac fitted himself into a pattern already set. Abraham was a dominant personality; Isaac was for the most part a passive one. Abraham is pictured as a commander of men, while Isaac avoided collisions. See the picture of Abraham as drawn in ch. 14, and note the contrast between Abraham reproving Abimelech in 21:25 and Isaac moving away from the disputed wells in 26:22.

Yet Isaac had qualities which have their place in human life. Most men cannot play a role like Abraham's. Neither the characteristics born in them by the strange variations of inheritance nor outward opportunity enable them to do so. They will not create, but they can conserve. Isaac was a link between the new life which had been begun and the expanding life which was destined to be. He had an instinctive recognition of what made his father's greatness, and a reverence for it. He saw that the best thing in Abraham was his religion, and he reflected and transmitted that. He himself was not built on a superlative scale; nevertheless he had a hold on something bigger than himself. Observe the quiet confidence with which he faced the strife about the wells in ch. 26. If he avoided the conflict, it was not because of any cowardice (see in 26:28-29 the impression he is shown as having made on Abimelech) but because of a trust that what he needed would be given him from God. Measured by the standards of his time, his family life had a faithfulness and concentration of affection which made it notable. He was no King Arthur, but nevertheless he anticipated one standard of the good man's life

5 And Abraham was a hundred years old, when his son Isaac was born unto him.

6 ¶ And Sarah said, God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me.

7 And she said, Who would have said unto Abraham, that Sarah should have given children suck? for I have borne him a son in his old age.

8 And the child grew, and was weaned: and Abraham made a great feast the same day that Isaac was weaned.

9 ¶ And Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Yet I have borne him a son in his old age."

8 And the child grew, and was weaned; and Abraham made a great feast on the day that Isaac was weaned. 9 But Sarah saw the 21:6. God has made laughter for me is E's explanation of the name Isaac—a parallel to 17:17 (P) and 18:12 (J²). Every one who hears will laugh over me, a doublet to the preceding sentence, is from J¹.

XXV. HAGAR AND ISHMAEL (21:8-21)

This is the E recension of the J² story in ch. 16. The main difference between the two recensions is that in J Hagar left Abraham's tent before the birth of her son because, sturdy Bedouin that she was, she would not put up with the harsh treatment meted out to her by Sarah, chagrined by her maid's pregnancy and her own barrenness and angered by the former's lusty contempt for her. In E Sarah, seeing Ishmael playing with Isaac (see RSV), demands that Hagar and her son be sent away in order that Isaac may be the sole heir of Abraham. E thus makes Sarah's jealousy a little more respectable. He also records Abraham's reluctance to let the child go (vs. 11; contrast 16:6). There is accordingly a tenderness in E, absent from J, which finds further expression in his account of the anguish of the mother—no longer the self-reliant figure of J—at her child's weeping in the desert.

A. SARAH'S JEALOUSY (21:8-10)

8. A child was weaned at about the age of three. The feast was the customary family feast on the occasion of the weaning of a child.

9. The Egyptian may be harmonization by RP (cf. 16:3). According to E, Ishmael was at this time a mere babe (cf. vs. 14, 17, and see below). The words with her son Isaac which Tennyson put into the words of the king:

To speak no slander, no, nor listen to it,
To lead sweet lives in purest chastity,
To love one maiden only, cleave to her.⁷

In our modern world, with its restlessness and strife, its instability and its temptations to unfaithfulness, we could do worse than to regard the example of Isaac:

What was fine in him developed because he had the wisdom and grace to welcome the best that he had inherited. Fortunate is the man who when he has looked at his father has seen in him a real religion, so that his father's goodness is to him not a perfunctory thing but a winsome fact. Not all men have that inheritance, and that may be the father's fault. But some men who do have it turn their backs indifferently upon what can be their greatest riches. They go after gods of their own, with the shallow and impatient notion that to recognize the "God of Abraham thy father" would abridge their independence. This is more likely when the son knows that neither his own temperament nor his career will parallel his father's. He is afraid that the same religious loyalties might cramp his individuality. That—whenever it occurs—is a frustrating delusion. The inspiration which comes from the ever-living God can make each generation more characteristically itself and more sure to bring its own contribution to the value of life, as Isaac brought his.

12 ¶ And God said unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad, and because of thy bondwoman; in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice; for in Isaac shall thy seed be called.

were dropped by some scribe who either felt that Ishmael, now seventeen years old (cf. 17:25) according to the present narrative, would not be playing with a three-year-old, or he wished to provide some further justification for Sarah's conduct by giving the participle meçahêq—a wordplay on "Isaac"—the meaning mocking.

B. EXPULSION OF HAGAR (21:11-14)

11. Abraham's reluctance to accede to Sarah's demand is on account of his son. There is no concern for the mother. With this may be compared Abraham's reply to Sarah's bitter charge in 16:6. In that recension Hagar's child had not yet been born, and Hagar herself, as here, was little more than a chattel.

12. In view of the absence of reference to the mother in vs. 11 it is probable that and because of your slave woman is an addition by a later writer who had come to recognize that a woman was a person. For through Isaac shall your descendants be named makes explicit one of the reasons for the inclusion of the tale: to explain why it was that the divine promise to Abraham had passed to his second son Isaac instead of to Ishmael (cf. 17:18, 20-21).

Exeg. of both passages). The narrative here is from a later source than the one which precedes it in the book.

From the parallel forms of the story of Hagar two facts emerge. One is common to both tellings of the story, viz., the low estimate in which the woman was held in the times to which the account of Abraham belongs. Little or no dignity was accorded her as a person. She could be treated as a chattel, a mere instrument of convenience for the man and for the family he headed. Concubinage was taken as a matter of course and appears without any special sense of inconsistency in the old writers' pictures of the patriarchs. So with Abraham here, and so similarly with Jacob in 30:3-5, 9-13. Hence comes a reminder of what must frequently be borne in mind in reading Genesis, viz., that the religious consciousness which was to have so noble a growth in Israel had its subsoil in the same life and the same ideas as those of other peoples of ancient times. Consequently the examples of the patriarchs must not be taken indiscriminately and slavishly as though they were God's permanent patterns for human behavior. Their greatness was in what they were growing toward, not in the primitive conceptions to which some of their roots went down. Remembrance of that would have saved the history of religion from some of the shadows of ignorance and misinterpretation which have lain upon it, e.g., saved it from such dark errors as defense of slavery as an ordinance of God, and the burning of women accused of being witches, because both of these could be buttressed by examples in the Bible.

The other fact which emerges from the Hagar stories is brighter and happier. It is a growing humaneness and compassion. Abraham had an instinctive fondness for his child, even if it was not his real wife's child—"O that Ishmael might live before thee!" (17:18.) But in the first form

14 And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away: and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba.

15 And the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs.

16 And she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot: for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lifted up her voice, and wept.

17 And God heard the voice of the lad; and the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her, What aileth thee, Hagar? fear not; for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is.

18 Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand; for I will make him a great nation.

14 So Abraham rose early in the morning, and took bread and a skin of water, and gave it to Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, along with the child, and sent her away. And she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba.

15 When the water in the skin was gone, she cast the child under one of the bushes. 16 Then she went, and sat down over against him a good way off, about the distance of a bowshot; for she said, "Let me not look upon the death of the child." And as she sat over against him, the child lifted up his voice¹ and wept. 17 And God heard the voice of the lad; and the angel of God called to Hagar from heaven, and said to her, "What troubles you, Hagar? Fear not; for God has heard the voice of the lad where he is. 18 Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him fast with your hand; for I will

14. The original reading of putting it on her shoulder, along with the child—the Hebrew of which is awkward—was "and put the child upon her shoulder." The present text is due to RP, attempting to harmonize the story with the representation of P that Ishmael was fourteen years old when Isaac was born (17:24-25; 21:5). The reference to Beer-sheba as a known place is an indication that the story to which vs. 31, recording its naming, belongs preceded this tale in E.

C. GOD'S PROMISE TO HAGAR (21:15-21)

16. The Hebrew she lifted up her voice (RSV mg.) is further harmonization of the same character as that in vs. 9, by a later hand than RP. The picture of the mother helplessly awaiting the death of her baby in the desert is a further instance of the tenderness of the E recension.

17. And God heard the voice of the lad indicates that the LXX of vs. 16 is correct. Where he is is an allusion to the site of the well mentioned in vs. 19, a sacred spot among the Ishmaelites. As to whether E included in his story a notice of its naming it is impossible to say; if he did, it has been dropped by RJE, possibly because of his manipulation of the J recension by which he had identified Hagar's well with Beer-lahai-roi (cf. 16:7b, 13-14). On the other hand E, not being particularly interested in the Ishmaelites, may simply have ignored this feature of the tale.

This verse must have been followed in E by a notice of the naming of the child Ishmael; cf. God heard (vs. 17), and note that the name does not appear in the story itself up to this point.

of the story neither Sarah nor Abraham is represented as having any compassion toward Hagar. When Sarah turned bitterly against her, Abraham replied, "Behold, thy maid is in thy hand; do to her as it pleaseth thee" (16:6); and what seemed good to Sarah was to deal "hardly with her," so she fled into the desert. Later on, however, one who pondered that story was troubled by its harshness, and in the later narrative of this ch. 21 a new note of tenderness appears. The thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight—first, it is true, because of his son, but also, it is added, because of Hagar. And more important than what is represented concerning Abraham is what is suggested of the compassion of God. The picture of Hagar here in this second story has a greater pathos and pitifulness than in the first; and above the mother's 19 And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water; and she went, and filled the bottle with water, and gave the lad drink.

20 And God was with the lad; and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderness, and became an archer.

21 And he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran: and his mother took him a wife out of the land of Egypt.

22 ¶ And it came to pass at that time, that Abimelech and Phicol the chief captain of his host spake unto Abraham, saying, God is with thee in all that thou doest:

23 Now therefore swear unto me here by God, that thou wilt not deal falsely with me, nor with my son, nor with my son's son: but according to the kindness that I have done unto thee, thou shalt do unto me, and to the land wherein thou hast sojourned.

24 And Abraham said, I will swear.

25 And Abraham reproved Abimelech because of a well of water, which Abimelech's servants had violently taken away.

26 And Abimelech said, I wot not who hath done this thing: neither didst thou tell me, neither yet heard I of it, but to-day.

make him a great nation." 19 Then God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water; and she went, and filled the skin with water, and gave the lad a drink. 20 And God was with the lad, and he grew up; he lived in the wilderness, and became an expert with the bow. 21 He lived in the wilderness of Paran; and his mother took a wife for him from the land of Egypt.

22 At that time Abimelech and Phicol the commander of his army said to Abraham, "God is with you in all that you do; 23 now therefore swear to me here by God that you will not deal falsely with me or with my offspring or with my posterity, but as I have dealt loyally with you, you will deal with me and with the land where you have sojourned." 24 And Abraham said, "I will swear."

25 When Abraham complained to Abimelech about a well of water which Abimelech's servants had seized, 26 Abimelech said, "I do not know who has done this thing; you did not tell me, and I have not

20. And became an expert with the bow may be an allusion to a special skill of the Ishmaelites; more probably it is a softening of 16:12, due perhaps to a decline in Ishmaelite truculence in the period intervening between J² and E.

XXVI. ABRAHAM'S DISPUTE WITH ABIMELECH (21:22-34)

This section is a conflation of J² and E. Both documents had an account of a dispute between Abraham and the servants of Abimelech king of Gerar over certain wells—in vs. 25 "wells" should be read with the LXX for a well (RSV)—which the former had dug. Abraham and Abimelech succeeded in reaching an agreement and swore to abide by it. The place was then named Beer-sheba, meaning lit., Well of seven (RSV mg.; cf. the seven ewe lambs in vss. 28-30), here interpreted as well of the oath (RSV mg.); the Hebrew word for oath is a derivative of that meaning seven.

anguish over what she thought was her dying child is a God who understands and pities what is in the mother's heart. Hagar, fear not; for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is. Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand. Thus, as so often in the O.T., out of the primitive and undeveloped, new vistas open. From human instincts which at first were harsh and might be cruel the divine spirit was leading men forward to a larger and more sensitive conception of the dignity and worth of every human life.

22-32. Beer-sheba.—A striking fact in Genesis is the frequency of reference to wells. One's thought is carried back to another age and another world—to a nomadic world in which access to wells was vital to existence. In this narrative of Abraham and Abimelech the ancient chroniclers were registering what they desired to have regarded as the title deeds of Abraham's descendants to the wells at Beer-sheba. In the account as they give it there is a double emphasis. There is stress upon the personal dignity and strength of Abraham, who speaks to Abimelech with authoritative forcefulness (vs. 25). But as always in this book the greater stress is not upon the inherent qualities of a person but upon his significance 27 And Abraham took sheep and oxen, and gave them unto Abimelech; and both of them made a covenant.

28 And Abraham set seven ewe lambs of the flock by themselves.

29 And Abimelech said unto Abraham, What mean these seven ewe lambs which thou hast set by themselves?

30 And he said, For these seven ewe lambs shalt thou take of my hand, that they may be a witness unto me, that I have digged this well.

31 Wherefore he called that place Beer-sheba; because there they sware both of them.

32 Thus they made a covenant at Beer-sheba: then Abimelech rose up, and Phicol the chief captain of his host, and they returned into the land of the Philistines.

33 ¶ And Abraham planted a grove in Beer-sheba, and called there on the name of the LORD, the everlasting God.

34 And Abraham sojourned in the Philistines' land many days.

heard of it until today." 27 So Abraham took sheep and oxen and gave them to Abim'elech, and the two men made a covenant. 28 Abraham set seven ewe lambs of the flock apart. 29 And Abim'elech said to Abraham, "What is the meaning of these seven ewe lambs which you have set apart?"

30 He said, "These seven ewe lambs you will take from my hand, that you may be a witness for me that I dug this well." 31 Therefore that place was called Beer-sheba; because there both of them swore an oath.

32 So they made a covenant at Beer-sheba. Then Abim'elech and Phicol the commander of his army rose up and returned to the land of the Philistines. 33 Abraham planted a tamarisk tree in Beer-sheba, and called there on the name of the LORD, the Everlasting God. 34 And Abraham sojourned many days in the land of the Philistines.

33. Abraham is here represented as the founder of the sanctuary at Beer-sheba and the inaugurator of its cult. It may be inferred that the deity of the place was known as 'ēl 'ōlām, the Everlasting God, i.e., that the sanctuary was originally non-Yahwist. From the J¹ recension (26:19-33)—the oldest of the three—it is clear that its founder was traditionally Isaac. J², followed by E, now ascribes it to Abraham—another example of the way in which the priesthood of Hebron reached out and claimed for its patron the founding of other sanctuaries (cf. 12:6, 8).

For both J² and E this was the first introduction of Beer-sheba. This indicates that the E recension of the story preceded the story of the expulsion of Hagar—in which (vs. 14) Beer-sheba is mentioned as a known place—and indeed followed upon the tale in ch. 20 (cf. the order of events in ch. 26). E thus, as has been noted, placed Isaac's birth at Beer-sheba, in this way preserving his traditional association with that sanctuary (cf. Exeg. on ch. 26). Vs. 22 (E), which begins this story, must have been preceded by a notice of Abraham's moving from Gerar (cf. 26:17). The present position of the story is due to RJE, who preferred the J² order of events, according to which the dispute about the wells followed upon the birth of Isaac.

as a servant of God. Abimelech himself must testify to Abraham that God is with thee in all that thou doest; it was because of this recognition that Abimelech wanted Abraham to make a covenant with him. And the covenant thus represented to have been made gives a reason for the traditional significance of the border point of Beer-sheba.

33-34. Trees.—In Beer-sheba Abraham planted a grove. Far older than Abraham was the belief among ancient peoples that awesome or grand objects of nature might be dwelling places of the divine. Some mighty oak or other majestic tree could suggest the numinous. That could be superstition: but it can also be the symbolic poetry of worship. Joyce Kilmer lent wings to imagination when he wrote of

A tree that looks at God all day,
And lifts her leafy arms to pray.⁸

And Abraham may have been led to larger thoughts of the LORD, the everlasting God, within the grove he planted at Beer-sheba.

22 And it came to pass after these things, that God did tempt Abraham, and said unto him, Abraham: and he said, Behold, here I am.

2 And he said, Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and get thee into the land of Moriah; and offer him there for a burnt offering upon one of the mountains which I will tell thee of.

3 ¶ And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering, and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him.

4 Then on the third day Abraham lifted up his eyes, and saw the place afar off.

22 After these things God tested Abraham, and said to him, "Abraham!" And he said, "Here am I." 2 He said, "Take your son, your only son Isaac, whom you love, and go to the land of Mori'ah, and offer him there as a burnt offering upon one of the mountains of which I shall tell you." 3 So Abraham rose early in the morning, saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and his son Isaac; and he cut the wood for the burnt offering, and arose and went to the place of which God had told him. 4 On the third day Abraham lifted up his eyes and saw the place afar off.

XXVII. TESTING OF ABRAHAM (22:1-19)

The story, except for vss. 15-18 and a few minor additions, is from E. It is one of the most beautifully told and most moving of the stories in Genesis, and indicates that E, at his best, is artistically on a level with J². There is a note of human sympathy here, as in the E Hagar story (21:9-21), a feeling for the relationship between father and child which finds expression again in the E recension of Laban's farewell to Jacob (31:43-55).

22:2. Moriah is the name of the temple mount in II Chr. 3:1. Thus in its present form the story claims for Abraham the founding of the great sanctuary in Jerusalem. That this is secondary, however, is clear from the text of the narrative. For upon one of the mountains of which I shall tell you is contradicted by the place of which God had told him (vs. 3).

3. Nor was this place a mountain, for a mountain would have been visible from a much greater distance than is implied by vss. 4-6.

4. Mērāhōq, rendered afar off, does not mean a great distance away, as is indicated by 37:18, where it is used of the distance at which his brothers could recognize Joseph, and Exod. 2:4, where it refers to the distance at which Moses' sister stood to watch the ark in which he was.

22:1-19. What Abraham Learned.—Here is a chapter of the O.T. which shows the need of reading with discretion and discrimination. There is truth before which one will stand with reverence; but there are vestiges also of old ideas which the developing conscience has long since outgrown. It is as though in some green and fruitful field where harvests ripen one should come upon the fossil bones of strange, dismaying creatures which once walked the earth. Here in the story of Abraham and Isaac there is imbedded the fact that once men not only practiced human sacrifice, but did it at what they thought was divine command. Suppose they did that now? Any man who thought of it, if his thoughts were detected, would be put in a mental hospital. Any man who actually carried it out would be convicted of murder and executed. So the story of Abraham going out to sacrifice Isaac may seem either incredible or else profoundly disturbing to children in Sunday school or to adults who hear it read in church, unless they know what to sift out of it in order that the real truth may appear.

Why did this story of what was planned to be a human sacrifice get into the Bible? Because it was desired to show that Abraham's devotion to the God he worshiped was capable of going to the farthest point religion could reach. Human sacrifice was an actual custom among some of the Canaanite tribes. It was practiced for centuries. In the time of Elisha, ca. 800 B.C., in a crisis of battles for his capital, the king of Moab "took his eldest son . . . and offered him for a burnt offering upon the wall" (II Kings 3:27). If men worshiping pagan deities could carry their religion to that terrific cost, how could Abraham show that his religion

5 And Abraham said unto his young men, Abide ye here with the ass; and I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you.

6 And Abraham took the wood of the burnt offering, and laid it upon Isaac his son; and he took the fire in his hand, and a knife; and they went both of them together.

7 And Isaac spake unto Abraham his father, and said, My father: and he said, Here am I, my son. And he said, Behold the fire and the wood: but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?

8 And Abraham said, My son, God will provide himself a lamb for a burnt offering: so they went both of them together.

9 And they came to the place which God had told him of; and Abraham built an altar there, and laid the wood in order, and bound Isaac his son, and laid him on the altar upon the wood.

10 And Abraham stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son.

11 And the Angel of the LORD called unto him out of heaven, and said, Abraham, Abraham: and he said, Here am I.

5 Then Abraham said to his young men, "Stay here with the ass; I and the lad will go yonder and worship, and come again to you." 6 And Abraham took the wood of the burnt offering, and laid it on Isaac his son; and he took in his hand the fire and the knife. So they went both of them together. 7 And Isaac said to his father Abraham, "My father!" And he said, "Here am I, my son." He said, "Behold, the fire and the wood; but where is the lamb for a burnt offering?" 8 Abraham said, "God will provide himself the lamb for a burnt offering, my son." So they went both of them together.

9 When they came to the place of which God had told him, Abraham built an altar there, and laid the wood in order, and bound Isaac his son, and laid him on the altar, upon the wood. 10 Then Abraham put forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son. 11 But the angel of the LORD called to him from heaven, and said, "Abraham, Abraham!" And he said, "Here am I."

5. If the place of which God had told him (vs. 3) had been a mountain Abraham would, in accordance with general O.T. usage, have said not that he would go, but that he would "go up."

8. 'elohim-yireh, God will provide, is the first of the three wordplays on 'el yireh—the original of Jehovah-jireh—in vs. 14; see below.

11. The angel of the LORD is redactional for "God"; cf. "from me" (vs. 12).

meant as much to him? Only by being willing to go as far as they did. So, in representing what went on in the mind of Abraham, the story has a deep and dramatic authenticity. Here was a great soul living in a crude age. He saw people around him offering up their children to show their faith and their obedience to false gods. In spite of the torment to his human love he could not help hearing an inward voice asking him why he should not do as much; and because that thought seemed to press upon his conscience he thought it was the voice of God. The climax of the story is the revelation that what the voice of God would ultimately say was something completely different from what Abraham in his first agony of acceptance had supposed. The climax is not the sacrifice of Isaac but the word from God that Isaac shall not be sacrificed. The story that began with threatened tragedy ends in a perfect oneness between the heart of God and the heart of man.

So the immortal story has a double aspect. The first is what it reveals of God. William Cowper's hymn beginning, "God moves in a mysterious way" has in it these lines:

Behind a frowning providence
He hides a smiling face.

That phrase has a repellent crudeness. Who can imagine God smirking behind a mask? But a truth is seeking expression there: the ways of God are sometimes hidden and at first not understood; but ultimately his will is found to be not contradictory to the purest emotions planted in human souls. God is not a dark authority who requires the immolation of instinctive human emotions. The Bible read in its great sweep and progress is the story of the revelation of God as love—a love vaster and more profoundly wise than human souls can always immediately recognize, but in the end such as will satisfy all that is highest in those 12 And he said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son, from me.

13 And Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and behold behind him a ram caught in a thicket by his horns: and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt offering in the stead of his son.

14 And Abraham called the name of that place Jehovah-jireh: as it is said to this day, In the mount of the LORD it shall be seen.

12 He said, "Do not lay your hand on the lad or do anything to him; for now I know that you fear God, seeing you have not withheld your son, your only son, from me."

13 And Abraham lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, behind him was a ram, caught in a thicket by his horns; and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered it up as a burnt offering instead of his son. 14 So Abraham called the name of that place The LORD will provide;^k as it is said to this day, "On the mount of the LORD it shall be provided."^l

^k Or see

^l Or he will be seen

12. Yere' 'elohim, you fear God, is the second wordplay on 'el yireh.

13. Wayyar' . . . 'ayil, and looked . . . a ram, is the third.

14. Yhwh yireh, Jehovah-jireh, is impossible in E, who never uses the name Yahweh before the revelation to Moses (Exod. 3:14-15). Originally 'el yireh, "God will see" or provide (RSV), must have stood here.

The second half of the verse, Skinner remarks, yields "no sense appropriate to the context" (Genesis, p. 330). The emendation suggested by Procksch (Genesis, p. 318) is perhaps the most satisfactory: to insert "this" before mount; the reference to the mount, however, indicates that the sentence is secondary, so Procksch's further emendation of the LORD to "God" is unnecessary. The half verse as reconstructed may be rendered: "As it is said to this day, 'On this mount one sees the LORD.'"

There can be little doubt that this recurring motif 'el yireh is a wordplay on the name of the sanctuary of which the tale was originally told. Procksch (ibid., p. 316), noting the probability that a story such as this peculiar to E would, in view of his northern affinities, have to do with some northern sanctuary, has argued cogently that this was the sanctuary of the oak of Moreh—'elôn Móreh—at Shechem. (Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 240-42, argues for Jeruel [II Chr. 20:16]. Against this is the improbability that E would be preserving the legend of a southern sanctuary as obscure as Jeruel was.) If Procksch's argument is sound, then for the land of Moriah, in vs. 2, originally stood "the oak of Moreh." (Wellhausen, Composition, p. 21, suggests "the land of the Hamorites" [cf. the reference to Hamor in 33:19]; Skinner, Genesis, p. 329, mentions "the land of the Amorites" as a possibility. In both cases the suggestion seems to be that the corruption of the present text is accidental. In favor of the proposed "Moreh" may be noted the LXX, τὴν γῆν τὴν ὑψηλὴν; cf. 12:6, where τὴν δρὺν τὴν ὑψηλὴν renders "the oak of Moreh.") The change to the present text will then be due to some writer, possibly RP, who (a) finding no saga concerning Jerusalem in Genesis wished to provide souls. The O.T. is continually lifting the conception of God out of the irrationality and arbitrariness of pagan superstitions. Reflect upon the consistent message of the prophets. "For I desired mercy, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings" (Hos. 6:6). "What doth the LORD require of thee?" they asked, and answered as Micah did (Mic. 6:8). Read Ps. 103:13, "Like as a father pitieth his children, so the Lord pitieth." And beyond the O.T. lies the revelation of God in Jesus. Ponder the eternal significance of the Incarnation and the Atonement. See how in the Gospels and the Epistles all that is most tender and loving in human hearts is identified with God and made a sign of God. "If you, then, who are evil, know how to give good gifts to your children, how much more will your Father who is in heaven give" (Matt. 7:11). So the Almighty is revealed to be not inscrutable fate, nor some cruel Moloch, but our Father.

The other aspect of the story has to do with man. Its message is that only an all-out religion is supremely real. As long as Abraham believed 15 ¶ And the Angel of the LORD called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time,

16 And said, By myself have I sworn, saith the LORD, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son,

17 That in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the seashore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies;

18 And in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice.

19 So Abraham returned unto his young men, and they rose up and went together to Beer-sheba; and Abraham dwelt at Beer-sheba.

15 And the angel of the LORD called to Abraham a second time from heaven, 16 and said, "By myself I have sworn, says the LORD, because you have done this, and have not withheld your son, your only son, 17 I will indeed bless you, and I will multiply your descendants as the stars of heaven and as the sand which is on the seashore. And your descendants shall possess the gate of their enemies, 18 and by your descendants shall all the nations of the earth bless themselves,^m because you have obeyed my voice."

19 So Abraham returned to his young men, and they arose and went together to Beer-sheba; and Abraham dwelt at Beer-sheba.

^m Or be blessed one, and (b) possibly was not averse to eliminating the close association of Abraham with the Samaritan center at Shechem. Upon one of the mountains of which I shall tell you (vs. 2) is part of the same redaction. If, as seems likely, the story was traditional at Shechem, then it was originally told of another hero than Abraham of Hebron, and its association with him and Isaac will be the work of E.

The primary intent of the tale was presumably to explain why it was that human sacrifice was no longer offered at the sanctuary at which it was told. In E it has a deeper significance: human sacrifice has no place in the worship of the Lord the God of Israel (cf. Mic. 6:6-8).

15-18. These verses are an addition of some writer, possibly RJE, who felt that Abraham's faith was deserving of explicit commendation here.

that the sacrifice of his own son was right he was ready to walk even the road of that awful obedience. That is what is expressed in God did tempt Abraham, or in truer phrase, "did put him to the test"; i.e., there came a moment in the life of Abraham, as there may come to every man, when it must be discovered whether he is willing to pay the utmost price for what his conscience tells him ought to be compelling. The faith of the Bible is that God at last can prevent the necessity for that sacrifice; or if he permits it, as with Jesus in Gethsemane and his sacrifice on the cross, will so enter into and identify himself with human suffering that it will become redeeming.

15-19. Unlimited Devotion.—Those today who read the Bible reverently, but with reverence that is discriminating, cannot take this passage as simply and uncritically as earlier generations did. It used to be held that to question the authority of any part of Holy Writ was close to blasphemy. Who were we that we should "pick and choose"? If it was written that Abraham's blessing was confirmed because he was ready to slay his son in sacrifice, then that was God's truth, and the matter ended there. But it could not end there. Religious thinkers who humbly and truly wanted to think God's thoughts after him began to perceive that his thoughts are higher even than some of the O.T. interpreters understood. Those early interpreters sometimes saw truth in a limited perspective and ascribed to God convictions which had come to them out of an environment where they saw "through a glass darkly." It was not the will of God that Abraham should sacrifice Isaac; the nature of God was revealed in the moment when he stayed Abraham's hand and prevented the sacrifice. Abraham was not blessed for correctness in conception of God's will; he was blessed because when he thought he knew God's will he was willing to obey it to the limit.

That sort of spirit always does mean greatness. When everything a man has is committed to what he believes, he can go far. Those who wrote of Abraham were right when they recognized the power of such all-out commitment.

20 ¶ And it came to pass after these things, that it was told Abraham, saying, Behold, Milcah, she hath also borne children unto thy brother Nahor;

21 Huz his firstborn, and Buz his brother, and Kemuel the father of Aram, 22 And Chesed, and Hazo, and Pildash, and Jidlaph, and Bethuel.

23 And Bethuel begat Rebekah: these eight Milcah did bear to Nahor, Abraham's brother.

24 And his concubine, whose name was Reumah, she bare also Tebah, and Gaham, and Thahash, and Maachah.

23 And Sarah was a hundred and seven and twenty years old: these were the years of the life of Sarah.

20 Now after these things it was told Abraham, "Behold, Milcah also has borne children to your brother Nahor: 21 Uz the first-born, Buz his brother, Kemuel the father of Aram, 22 Chesed, Hazo, Pildash, Jidlaph, and Bethuel." 23 Bethuel became the father of Rebekah. These eight Milcah bore to Nahor, Abraham's brother. 24 Moreover, his concubine, whose name was Reumah, bore Tebah, Gaham, Tahash, and Ma'acah.

23 Sarah lived a hundred and twenty-seven years; these were the years of

XXVIII. DESCENDANTS OF NAHOR (22:20-24)

20-24. The nucleus of this list (vs. 20) is from J², preparing for the story in ch. 24. This was elaborated by a later J hand to connect Israel with certain Bedouin tribes in the desert east of Palestine—another instance of the tendency toward universalism in the J school. In vs. 22 Bethuel is a substitution by RP for an original "Laban." RP also added vs. 23a to harmonize the list with the representation of 28:5 (P).

XXIX. BURIAL OF SARAH (23:1-20)

Only here and in ch. 17 does P expand the history of the patriarchs to something more than a dry chronicle. It has been noted that the expansion of ch. 17 was made to

There are loyalties which deserve all that a man can give, and in that giving he is blessed. Not only the story of Abraham but history in general witnesses to the instinctive belief that this is true. Consider what men have done and will do for their clan or their country. They give their sons to die in battle, to "make the supreme sacrifice." Though they themselves are bereaved, they trust that their nation may be blessed, because through the dedication of young lives the nation may hear the promise which was spoken to Abraham, thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies.

How shall the two facts that seem contradictory be brought into unity: the fact that God perverted the sacrifice of Isaac, and the fact that Abraham was ready to make that sacrifice? It is in the truth that the dedication God desires is not to death but to life. There is such a thing as a sovereign loyalty which must overrule the ordinary reservations of affection, and it is a higher call than the patriotic passion which may be the strongest loyalty the secular world understands. God may have some great purpose to which he would have a man see his son dedicated—a purpose in which that son's life is not lost but enlarged. Yet the father may not want to give him up. Perhaps it is that the boy shall turn aside from the profitable opportunity of his father's business to choose some career of service which the world will never reward. Perhaps it is to go as a missionary to some difficult and lonely place. In church they may be singing, "Give of thy sons to bear the message glorious,"⁹ but the father shuts his lips to words like those. Nevertheless, it is only when human love is lifted up and consecrated to the love of God that life can be on the road to its redemption. That is the mighty truth which shines in the story of Abraham, as a great light which glorifies whatever else was limited in the thoughts of those who told it.

23:1-20. The Poignancy of Sorrow.—Sarah's death is recounted briefly, but the description of the arrangements for her burial is long. From time immemorial the burial of the dead has had a vast solemnity. Human sorrow has tried to immortalize the names and to perpetuate the memory of those whom it has lost. Witness the pyramids of Egypt. So Abraham, though he could have no great monument for Sarah, is represented here as paying a lavish price for

2 And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba; the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan: and Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her.

4 I am a stranger and a sojourner with you: give me a possession of a buryingplace with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight.

the life of Sarah. 2 And Sarah died at Kir'iath-ar'ba (that is, Hebron) in the land of Canaan; and Abraham went in to mourn for Sarah and to weep for her. 3 And Abraham rose up from before his dead, and said to the Hittites, 4 "I am a stranger and a sojourner among you; give me property among you for a burying place, that I may provide explicit divine authority for the rite of circumcision, which had taken on a special importance for Israel because of the circumstances of the Exile. No such institutional interest informs this chapter. Here P is affirming Israel's claim that the cave of Machpelah at Hebron, the sepulcher of Abraham and Sarah (25:10), of Isaac and Rebekah (49:31), and of Jacob (50:13) and Leah (49:31) belonged to them. This affirmation was presumably made against the Edomites, who had taken possession of Hebron when its former inhabitants had been carried into exile or had moved northward into lands left vacant by war and deportation.

23:2. The implication is that Abraham had moved from Beer-sheba (22:19) back to Hebron. Kiriath-arba: Josh. 14:15 (cf. Judg. 1:10) states, probably correctly, that this was the former name of Hebron. P's use of it is an archaism. The name means "City of Four." The significance of the component "four" cannot be recovered. Gunkel (Genesis, p. 273) suggests that it refers to four roads which met there. Another possibility is that it is reminiscent of the four characters of the legend preserved in ch. 18—the three supernatural visitants and Abraham. In Josh. 15:13 (cf. Josh. 21:11) Arba is personalized as the father of Anak, i.e., the ancestor of the Anakim, the pre-Israelite inhabitants of Hebron, according to Num. 13:28; Josh. 15:14 (cf. Judg. 1:20).

3. The Hittites: A people whose center was in the central part of Asia Minor—the modern Turkey. In the fourteenth century B.C. their empire reached as far as, and included part of, Palestine (G. Ernest Wright and Floyd Vivian Filson, eds., The Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible [Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1945], pp. 29-30). Hence the presence of a Hittite strain in the population there in O.T. times, evidenced by, e.g., 15:20; Exod. 3:8, 17; 23:23, 28; Deut. 7:1; I Sam. 26:6; II Sam. 11:3; also Ezek. 16:3. P is the only document in which they are definitely located in the south (cf. 26:34; 36:2). The representation here that they formed the population of Hebron in the time of Abraham is quite impossible as the kingdom did not become powerful until the sixteenth century.

4. Abraham, merely a stranger and a sojourner, had no right to own land. Here he asks that he may be given this right.

the cave in which to bury her. In the customary formula of Oriental bargaining, Ephron the Hittite declares magniloquently that he gives the cave to Abraham, but in the same breath parades the fact that it is worth four hundred shekels of silver. As the picture is presented here, Abraham does not even attempt to reduce the exaggerated price. He weighs out the silver, current money with the merchant, and calls all the Hittites who are near to bear witness to the transaction. So the cave of Machpelah belonged irrevocably to him and to his family—the cave in which he himself would ultimately be buried, and Isaac, and Jacob, and others after them; and over which a Mohammedan mosque would rise, to guard to this day what are maintained to be the patriarchs' graves. The importance of the record for the people of Israel was that the land to which Abraham had come was thus certified forever as belonging sacredly to them.

Such is the formal aspect of this chapter. But the sentences with which it opens are more personal and poignant. Here is the voice of human sorrow which is as old as the world, and as new as the most recent heartbreak. Abraham

5 And the children of Heth answered Abraham, saying unto him,

6 Hear us, my lord: thou art a mighty prince among us: in the choice of our sepulchres bury thy dead; none of us shall withhold from thee his sepulchre, but that thou mayest bury thy dead.

7 And Abraham stood up, and bowed himself to the people of the land, even to the children of Heth.

8 And he communed with them, saying, If it be your mind that I should bury my dead out of my sight, hear me, and entreat for me to Ephron the son of Zohar,

9 That he may give me the cave of Machpelah, which he hath, which is in the end of his field; for as much money as it is worth he shall give it me for a possession of a buryingplace amongst you.

10 And Ephron dwelt among the children of Heth: and Ephron the Hittite answered Abraham in the audience of the children of Heth, even of all that went in at the gate of his city, saying, 11 Nay, my lord, hear me: the field give I thee, and the cave that is therein, I give it thee; in the presence of the sons of my people give I it thee: bury thy dead.

bury my dead out of my sight." 5 The Hittites answered Abraham, 6 "Hear us, my lord; you are a mighty prince among us. Bury your dead in the choicest of our sepulchres; none of us will withhold from you his sepulchre, or hinder you from burying your dead." 7 Abraham rose and bowed to the Hittites, the people of the land. 8 And he said to them, "If you are willing that I should bury my dead out of my sight, hear me, and entreat for me Ephron the son of Zohar, 9 that he may give me the cave of Mach-pe'lah, which he owns; it is at the end of his field. For the full price let him give it to me in your presence as a possession for a burying place." 10 Now Ephron was sitting among the Hittites; and Ephron the Hittite answered Abraham in the hearing of the Hittites, of all who went in at the gate of his city, 11 "No, my lord, hear me; I give you the field, and I give you the cave that is in it; in the presence of the sons of my people I give it to you; bury your dead."

5-20. P may wish to imply that the generosity of the burghers had an ulterior motive—an unwillingness to permit an alien to own land. If so, then the remainder of the narrative is intended to show that it was despite this reluctance that Abraham obtained legal possession of the cave of Machpelah (vss. 17-18, 20), paying for it four hundred shekels of silver, according to the weights current among the merchants (vs. 16).

It should be noted that P is making no claim to Israelite possession of Hebron or of its sanctuary by the oak of Mamre. The relative location in Hebron of the cave of came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her. As Genesis portrays her, Sarah had been a person whose passing, like the fall of some tall tree, must leave an empty space against the sky. As Abraham's wife and comrade she had gone through many experiences with him, and always in fidelity. She, with him, had made the choice to leave the rich civilization of Ur of the Chaldeans, and to go out to the long adventure of the spirit. She, with him, had known the uncertain life of Canaan, sojourning "in a foreign land, living in tents" (Heb. 11:9). She, with him, had lived through the wistful and sometimes bitter disappointment of the years of childlessness. She, with him, had shared the joy and pride of Isaac's birth. According to the portrayal of Genesis, she was very beautiful. She had her obvious faults, but she had character and great distinction—a woman who could be jealous, but who had passionate devotion to those she loved. There is a tender imaginative touch in one of the naïve religious dramas of medieval England. In the Brome play, Abraham and Isaac, when Abraham has led Isaac out to sacrifice him, and Isaac has just learned what his father's purpose is, he cries:

Now I wold to God my moder were her on this hyll
Sche wouold knele for me on both hyr kneys
To save my lyffe.¹⁰

She was dead now, and Abraham mourned and wept for her. Then he stood up from before his dead, i.e., he had to go out and meet the 12 And Abraham bowed down himself before the people of the land.

13 And he spake unto Ephron in the audience of the people of the land, saying, But if thou wilt give it, I pray thee, hear me: I will give thee money for the field; take it of me, and I will bury my dead there.

14 And Ephron answered Abraham, saying unto him,

15 My lord, hearken unto me: the land is worth four hundred shekels of silver; what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead.

16 And Abraham hearkened unto Ephron; and Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver, which he had named in the audience of the sons of Heth, four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant.

17 ¶ And the field of Ephron, which was in Machpelah, which was before Mamre, the field, and the cave which was therein, and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about, were made sure

12 Then Abraham bowed down before the people of the land. 13 And he said to Ephron in the hearing of the people of the land, "But if you will, hear me; I will give the price of the field; accept it from me, that I may bury my dead there." 14 Ephron answered Abraham, 15 "My lord, listen to me; a piece of land worth four hundred shekels of silver, what is that between you and me? Bury your dead." 16 Abraham agreed with Ephron; and Abraham weighed out for Ephron the silver which he had named in the hearing of the Hittites, four hundred shekels of silver, according to the weights current among the merchants.

17 So the field of Ephron in Mach-pe'lah, which was to the east of Mamre, the field with the cave which was in it and all the trees that were in the field, throughout its Machpelah and the sacred oak cannot be determined. According to vs. 19, the cave was east of Mamre. In modern times Ḥārām Rāmet el Ḥalīl, some two miles north of Hebron, is represented as the site of the oak. The cave is in the famous sanctuary el Ḥārām (Gunkel, Genesis, p. 273).

P, of course, had no interest in the oak or its sanctuary. For him there were no Yahwist sanctuaries, places of sacrifice, until the tabernacle was erected in the desert (Exod. 40:17) pursuant to a divine command. He may indeed be maintaining by implication here that the so-called holy place at Hebron was really profane—a burying ground.

The significance of the story lies in the fact that it provides evidence that P, for all his ecclesiasticism, was, however dimly, aware of the importance of Israel as a natural world and its sad responsibilities. In every age human beings have had to do that. There is the everlasting poignancy of human pain: bereavement, and then the fact that one must go on in loneliness to face what life requires. As a modern Jewish rabbi has written:

The first law . . . which should be followed in the loss of a loved one is: express as much grief as you actually feel. Do not be ashamed of your emotions.¹

It may be either a cold heart, or one unnaturally frozen by some inhibition, that does not at some time like Abraham mourn and weep. Yet there is another truth which Abraham also represented. It is not right that grief should be allowed to become a paralyzing bondage. According to ancient rabbinical tradition, Rabbi Joshua said . . . : "My sons, I know that it is impossible not to mourn, but to mourn excessively is forbidden." Why? Because that great Jewish sage felt that we human beings must think not only of the past but of the future. We are commanded by our religion to be the servants of life as long as we live.²

So Abraham is identified with us, and we with him. Yet not altogether. There is a grayness in the picture of Abraham that need not always exist. So far as the evidence in Genesis society stemming from Abraham. With this may be compared his insistence upon the necessity of the possession of Palestine; see Exeg. on 17:8.

XXX. CHOICE OF A WIFE FOR ISAAC (24:1-67)

This chapter is a conflation of J² and E. RP has added the name of Bethuel throughout as Rebekah's father (cf. 22:22b, 23a); in the older sources Laban, and so Rebekah, are the children of Nahor (29:5), the husband of Milcah (11:29; 22:20).

The two recensions of the story were in general agreement. RJE, conflating them, used that of J² as the basis of his narrative, inserting into it certain features from E:

(a) According to the J² recension the servant was commissioned to obtain any woman of Abraham's kindred as a wife for Isaac (vss. 4, 49); according to E, the girl desired by Abraham was definitely named, as is indicated by "the woman" (vss. 5, 8). This difference between the two versions is something more than a literary variation. Underlying it is a certain difference in the theory of revelation. In J² the natural is given full scope; the servant is to use his discretion, though he will be guided by the angel whom God will send before him (vs. 7). In E, Abraham, with the heightened goes, no belief in immortality was attributed to Abraham or to his contemporaries. Of such it might be said, in Whittier's words:

Alas for him who never sees
The stars shine through his cypress-trees!
Who, hopeless, lays his dead away,
Nor looks to see the breaking day
Across the mournful marbles play! *

But the O.T. moves forward to the N.T., in which the message is: "That ye sorrow not, even as others which have no hope" (I Thess. 4:13); and, "Death is swallowed up in victory . . . through our Lord Jesus Christ" (I Cor. 15:54, 57).

24:1-3. The Individual and the Group.—The Oriental custom here assumed as a matter of course seems strange now in some of our Western lands. When the time had come for Isaac to marry it was not Isaac who was to choose his bride. His father, the head of the family, would find the right one for him. Isaac was not a detached individual. His individuality was not even a decisive consideration. He was part of the family, with its solidarity of inheritance, of character, and of destiny; and what should be legitimate for him in even his most personal affairs was conditioned by those facts.

Through a great part of the O.T. the corporate consciousness is dominant. The person is subordinate to the group. A whole family could be punished for the sins of its members. When Achan appropriated the forbidden spoils of Jericho, "his sons, and his daughters, and his oxen, and his asses, and his sheep, and his tent, and all that he had" were seized together with Achan himself and put to death (Josh. 7:24-25). When Ezekiel prophesied, he knew that this conception of the responsibility of all for each and each for all was woven into every thread of Jewish thinking. The family and the nation made the faith of the individual. If the children's teeth were set on edge, it was because the fathers had eaten sour grapes (Ezek. 18:2).

Plainly, there was strength and virtue in this solidarity of the group. It gave to the Jewish race a pre-eminent tenacity. Filial piety knit the supernatural powers of a man on his deathbed (see below), specifically designates the woman, and the servant has no discretion; the natural is thus restricted, if not distrusted. And connected with this is E's realistic admission of the possibility that "the woman may not be willing" (vs. 5; cf. vs. 8) to accept her divine vocation.

(b) In the J² recension Laban and Milcah grant the servant's request for Rebekah without consulting her (vss. 50a, 51-54); in E Rebekah herself makes the decision (vss. 50b, 57-58, 60; also vs. 5). Here again there is something more than a literary variation. Rebekah is a person, with rights; with this may be compared the implications of "because of your slave woman" (21:12). The ingenuity with which the redactor has combined these two diverse representations may be noted: Rebekah's assent has become an assent to the servant's desire to leave for Palestine at once instead of waiting for a few days.

(c) According to J² Abraham's kinsfolk lived in "the city of Nahor" (vs. 10), i.e., Haran (cf. 29:4-5); according to E they lived in Mesopotamia (vs. 10).

It has already been noted that J¹ represented Abraham as having come from "the land of the people of the east" (29:1) in the north Arabian desert. J², in making Haran his place of origin, may have been motivated, as Meyer suggests (Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, p. 248; cf. Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 168, 325; Skinner, Genesis, p. 334), by the fact that in his time that city had become the chief seat of Aramaean culture. But a further factor may have influenced him if, as has been suggested above, the names Sarah and Milcah point to a Haran element in the traditions of Hebron and Beer-sheba. For this, in turn, would point to a pre-Israelite migration from Haran to Palestine, and J² may well have been giving concrete expression to that tradition. In this case Abraham is for the moment the personification not of the Yahwist clans who settled in Hebron but of this group from Haran.

The significance of J²'s concern to relate this pre-Israelite migration to the Yahwist tradition of the desert should not be overlooked. It indicates that the Israelite settlement in Palestine had issued not merely in the appropriation and adaptation of the cult legends of certain Canaanite sanctuaries. It had resulted in the incorporation of the communities which had worshiped at those sanctuaries not only into Yahwism but also into Israel—so completely that account was taken of their cultural as well as of their religious traditions.

E, representing Abraham as having come from Mesopotamia, would seem to be preserving the tradition of still another group of non-Israelite origin which had come from there; and he has made Abraham for the moment the personification of this group.

members of a family together, and the proud belief that they were a chosen people preserved the purity of their blood. They held the Fifth Commandment in unquestioned reverence, and with good reason believed that a nation which knew how to honor its fathers and mothers would be long in the land.

The Jewish conviction of responsibility to the group has its tonic suggestion still, especially in marriage. The Roman Catholic Church takes a stand in this matter which can be offensively arrogant and narrow, but which can be respected at least for the clearness of its purpose. It believes that it is the custodian of a saving faith which must be handed on uncompromised, and therefore it insists that marriage shall be on its own terms, and that the children of every marriage shall be brought up in its own nurture. It has built up a distorted doctrine of Christian inheritance, but it is right in seeking to make sure that the inheritance is not lost. It is wise enough to know that a rich married life cannot be built on passion and unthinking impulse, but only on principles bigger than individuals, to which they must be true. Protestants, on the other hand, are often too complacent and flabby in this matter. The Protestant young man or woman about to be married may treat religious loyalties as inconsequential for both sides of the marriage or may yield indifferently to the emphatic Roman Catholic claims. But marriages without religious conviction, and mixed marriages in which those convictions are incompatible, may lack the fortifying strength which the men and women of the Bible understood. Among Christians outside Romanism there is an awakening realization that our young people must be helped to know more clearly and to feel more deeply the preciousness of their own heritage and tolerantly but with unswerving loyalty to maintain it. That there should be division within the

2 And Abraham said unto his eldest servant of his house, that ruled over all that he had, Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh:

3 And I will make thee swear by the LORD, the God of heaven, and the God of the earth, that thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites, among whom I dwell:

4 But thou shalt go unto my country, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son Isaac.

5 And the servant said unto him, Peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me unto this land: must I needs bring thy son again unto the land from whence thou camest?

blessed Abraham in all things. 2 And Abraham said to his servant, the oldest of his house, who had charge of all that he had, "Put your hand under my thigh, 3 and I will make you swear by the LORD, the God of heaven and of the earth, that you will not take a wife for my son from the daughters of the Canaanites, among whom I dwell, 4 but will go to my country and to my kindred, and take a wife for my son Isaac." 5 The servant said to him, "Perhaps the woman may not be willing to follow me to this land; must I then take your son back to the land from which you came?" 6 Abraham said to him, "See to it that you do not

Both recensions of the story insist that the pure Israelite stock, symbolized by Abraham, had not been contaminated by the marriage of Isaac. But the meaning of the tale goes deeper than that. It reflects Israel's consciousness of the authentic values of primitive Yahwism and a concern for their preservation. These values had, historically, been apprehended in the desert. In making Abraham originally an Aramaean from the city of Haran, J² obscured this fact—the fact of the ineradicable influence of the desert upon Israel's thinking, an influence which had early set them on the path toward transcendent, ethical monotheism. That J² himself had not lost sight of this is, however, indicated by his later insistence upon Sinai as the original center of Israel's religion.

But though J², and E after him, had a purpose in writing the tale, he at the same time allowed his artistry full play in its composition. The story moves freely, is finely concerned with human values, and provides us with a trustworthy picture of the conditions of the age in which it took form.

A. ABRAHAM'S DIRECTIONS TO HIS SERVANT (24:1-10)

24:2. Put your hand under my thigh: A reference to an oath by the genital organs, emblems of the life-giving power of deity, though this ancient significance of the act had doubtless been forgotten by the time of J².

3-10. I will make you swear by the LORD: The implication is that Abraham is on his deathbed, and so is himself unable to ensure that his wishes will be carried out. The same implication attaches to vs. 6, derived from E. The notice of Abraham's death must whole church which ought to be one in Christ is a tragic fact, and though it is necessary now to live within that limitation, it ought to be transcended in spirit as much as possible. The great thing is to try to make sure that according to our best lights the supreme loyalties are preserved. The soundness of individual life and the stability of marriage and the home depend upon that which has been given by God. As Abraham knew, so we should know, that the great traditions of a family and a religious culture must be treated by successive generations as a holy trust.

1-9. Abraham's Desire.—The story begins on a note of thankfulness. Abraham recognizes that he has been blessed in all things. He has prospered in his possessions, and above all, he has a son. Now his most commanding hope is that Isaac should be rightly married and thus the family and the inheritance be carried on. Then

7 ¶ The LORD God of heaven, which took me from my father's house, and from the land of my kindred, and which spake unto me, and that sware unto me, saying, Unto thy seed will I give this land; he shall send his angel before thee, and thou shalt take a wife unto my son from thence.

8 And if the woman will not be willing to follow thee, then thou shalt be clear from this my oath: only bring not my son thither again.

9 And the servant put his hand under the thigh of Abraham his master, and sware to him concerning that matter.

10 ¶ And the servant took ten camels of the camels of his master, and departed; for all the goods of his master were in his hand: and he arose, and went to Mesopotamia, unto the city of Nahor.

11 And he made his camels to kneel down without the city by a well of water at the time of the evening, even the time that women go out to draw water.

take my son back there. 7 The LORD, the God of heaven, who took me from my father's house and from the land of my birth, and who spoke to me and swore to me, 'To your descendants I will give this land,' he will send his angel before you, and you shall take a wife for my son from there. 8 But if the woman is not willing to follow you, then you will be free from this oath of mine; only you must not take my son back there." 9 So the servant put his hand under the thigh of Abraham his master, and swore to him concerning this matter.

10 Then the servant took ten of his master's camels and departed, taking all sorts of choice gifts from his master; and he arose, and went to Mesopotamia, to the city of Nahor. 11 And he made the camels kneel down outside the city by the well of water at the time of evening, the time when thus have followed upon vs. 9 in both recensions. The addition to the J² narrative of the material now preserved in 25:1-4, 6 necessitated the postponement of this notice, and also of that in 25:5, telling how Abraham disposed of his goods. This originally followed vs. 1 in J² (cf. vs. 36*b*) and was in turn followed by 25:11*b* (cf. vs. 62), which J² had taken over from J¹. Its present position is due to R^P, who separated it from 25:5 because of 25:7-10 (P).

B. THE SERVANT MEETS REBEKAH (24:11-27)

11. In placing the servant's meeting with Rebekah at a well of water, J² makes use of a theme apparently not uncommon in shepherd folklore. It was at a well that Moses met his future wife (Exod. 2:16-17), and that Jacob met Rachel (29:2-12). It may be noted that the well here, just outside the city and open, is not the same as that in ch. 29, appear that intense consciousness of kindred and that recoil from alliance with the uncovenanted stranger which pervade Hebrew thought in all Genesis. Isaac must not marry one of the Canaanites. It is the father's concern (see also Exos. on 18:16-19) to find for him a bride of his own blood and lineage. Therefore Abraham will send his devoted servant to seek for one in the land from which Abraham had come and in which his kindred dwelt. But equally imperative it is to make sure that Isaac shall not go there himself to live. The servant suggests that possibility (vs. 5) and Abraham rejects it with utmost emphasis. As the servant has sworn a most solemn oath to try to find a bride for Isaac, so now Abraham has him take another oath that, even at the cost of failing to bring a bride, he shall not take Isaac there.

Abraham recalls God's promise, Unto thy seed will I give this land. Here is the consciousness of destiny which shines through all the history of Abraham. And with it is an equally shining faith that God who has purposed great ends for a human life will also make sure the way by which those ends shall be achieved. Eliezer, the servant, will be guided in his search. The LORD God of heaven, which took me from my father's house, and from the land of my kindred, . . . shall send his angel before thee, and thou shalt take a wife unto my son from thence.

10-20. The Double Guidance.—A lovely description is this—so serene, so gentle, so marked by purity of purpose and the sweetness of right response! In Eliezer's prayer (vs. 12) there is the same instinctive piety that had already been manifest in the prayer of Abraham. The mas-

12 And he said, O LORD God of my master Abraham, I pray thee, send me good speed this day, and show kindness unto my master Abraham.

13 Behold, I stand here by the well of water; and the daughters of the men of the city come out to draw water:

14 And let it come to pass, that the damsel to whom I shall say, Let down thy pitcher, I pray thee, that I may drink; and she shall say, Drink, and I will give thy camels drink also: let the same be she that thou hast appointed for thy servant Isaac; and thereby shall I know that thou hast showed kindness unto my master.

women go out to draw water. 12 And he said, "O LORD, God of my master Abraham, grant me success today, I pray thee, and show steadfast love to my master Abraham. 13 Behold, I am standing by the spring of water, and the daughters of the men of the city are coming out to draw water. 14 Let the maiden to whom I shall say, 'Pray let down your jar that I may drink,' and who shall say, 'Drink, and I will water your camels' — let her be the one whom thou hast appointed for thy servant Isaac. By this I shall know that thou hast shown steadfast love to my master."

where it is located in the field, i.e., the open country, and is covered with a stone which required a number of men to move it (see Exeg. on ch. 29).

12. The servant, standing outside the city of Nahor, Abraham's brother, has now reached a critical point in his mission. According to the J² recension, from which the prayer following is derived, Abraham had left the choice of a wife for his son to his discretion. In the exercise of that discretion his concern must be that he should act in accordance with the Lord's will and choose the woman whom the Lord had already appointed for Isaac (vs. 14). Thus with great sensitivity J² presents the problem of the interaction of the human and the divine.

ter's spirit had communicated itself to the servant; and to Eliezer the thought of God had a surer meaning because he was the LORD God of . . . Abraham. How greatly the relationships of men would be enriched if the religion of the employer were always such as to win the heart of the man employed!

So Eliezer prayed. That was his first way of seeking guidance. He had an errand on which he could invoke God's blessing, and he trusted that a wisdom higher than his own would light his way. But he did not assume that this guidance would be arbitrary. It would enlist his own intelligence and his consecrated common sense. Presently the girls of the countryside would be coming to draw water from the well where he had halted with his camels. If there should be one among them whom God intended as the bride of Isaac, how should he, Eliezer, know her? By something that she wore? By some particular feature of her looks? No. There was a more important criterion than that—the criterion of her spirit. The girl who should be the quickest in discernment, the kindest, the swiftest to help—that was the girl he would be seeking. So his prayer was that God would bring it to pass that the girls who came would so naturally reveal themselves, and that he might so clearly observe, that he would know without doubt which one was meant to be the bride of Isaac. Exactly thus his prayer was answered. To the well at evening came Rebekah, a damsel . . . very fair to look upon, and when Eliezer asked her that he might drink a little from her pitcher, she not only gave him what he asked but hastened, and emptied her pitcher into the trough, and ran again unto the well to draw water, and drew for all his camels. Eliezer knew then that he had received his sign. May it not be that God's signs are often given through this same combination of prayer and the use of human faculties which have been offered for God to guide?

It might have been said of Eliezer, as was said of David Livingstone by his biographer who was interpreting the reason for Livingstone's clear perception of his course of duty:

How did he get this? First, his singleness of heart, so to speak, attracted the light: "If thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light." Then, he was very clear and very minute in his prayers. Further, he was most careful to scan all the providential indications that might throw light on the Divine will.⁴

15 ¶ And it came to pass, before he had done speaking, that, behold, Rebekah came out, who was born to Bethuel, son of Milcah, the wife of Nahor, Abraham's brother, with her pitcher upon her shoulder.

16 And the damsel was very fair to look upon, a virgin, neither had any man known her: and she went down to the well, and filled her pitcher, and came up.

17 And the servant ran to meet her, and said, Let me, I pray thee, drink a little water of thy pitcher.

18 And she said, Drink, my lord: and she hastened, and let down her pitcher upon her hand, and gave him drink.

19 And when she had done giving him drink, she said, I will draw water for thy camels also, until they have done drinking.

20 And she hastened, and emptied her pitcher into the trough, and ran again unto the well to draw water, and drew for all his camels.

21 And the man wondering at her held his peace, to wit whether the LORD had made his journey prosperous or not.

15 Before he had done speaking, behold, Rebekah, who was born to Bethu'el the son of Milcah, the wife of Nahor, Abraham's brother, came out with her water jar upon her shoulder. 16 The maiden was very fair to look upon, a virgin, whom no man had known. She went down to the spring, and filled her jar, and came up. 17 Then the servant ran to meet her, and said, "Pray give me a little water to drink from your jar." 18 She said, "Drink, my lord"; and she quickly let down her jar upon her hand, and gave him a drink. 19 When she had finished giving him a drink, she said, "I will draw for your camels also, until they have done drinking." 20 So she quickly emptied her jar into the trough and ran again to the well to draw, and she drew for all his camels. 21 The man gazed at her in silence to learn whether the LORD had prospered his journey or not.

15-27. The explicit naming of Rebekah and her parents here—Bethuel the son of is an intrusion by RP—anticipates and destroys the effect of vs. 24. It is accordingly

15-16. The Character of Rebekah as a Girl.—Here begins one of the most winsome passages in Genesis. In most early societies, including the society of Israel, men were dominant and women were generally obscure. But in the O.T. there are women who were significant, and one of them is Rebekah. She is, in the words of the Exeg., "a person, with rights." And note what an extraordinarily attractive person she at first appears to be as Abraham's servant meets her at the well (see Expos. on vs. 10-20). After she had drawn water for Eliezer she tells him who her father is and that she knows her father will want to give this stranger and his camels shelter. Presently at her father's house Abraham's servant tells his story: who had sent him, why he had come, his prayer that God would bless his coming. So will Rebekah go with him? Yes, she will go. It is all innocent, fresh, and simplehearted, and everything about Rebekah has been winsome. Abraham's servant had good reason to think he saw in her spontaneous actions at the well the finest grace of womanhood: the fearlessness of a pure and unspoiled spirit, friendliness, and a quick and generous impulse to be kind. So it would come about that he would take Rebekah home with him to be the bride of Isaac.

If then or later the servant whose mission was to win Rebekah for Isaac's bride had wished to particularize what was admirable in her, he could have set these facts within his list: Her natural charm and winsomeness (vs. 16); her swift and kindly friendliness (vs. 18); her happyheartedness which made her do not only what was asked of her but more (vs. 19); her quick and sure decisiveness (vs. 58); her ability to command a great devotion. Isaac loved her when he first saw her (vs. 67), and apparently he loved no other woman but Rebekah all his life. Here, in an age and in a society where polygamy was familiar, is monogamous marriage. So in the marriage service of the Book of Common Prayer through many generations there was the petition that "as Isaac and Rebekah lived faithfully together, so these persons may surely perform the vow and covenant betwixt them made."

21-49. Rebekah's Family.—Eliezer's wondering (vs. 21) could not have been due to any uncertainty about Rebekah. What he had seen in her gave no room for doubt on her account as to whether the Lord had made his journey prosperous or not. He gave her the rich token jewels which he had brought. But there remained her family to be considered. In Hebrew

22 And it came to pass, as the camels had done drinking, that the man took a golden earring of half a shekel weight, and two bracelets for her hands of ten shekels weight of gold;

23 And said, Whose daughter art thou? tell me, I pray thee: is there room in thy father's house for us to lodge in?

24 And she said unto him, I am the daughter of Bethuel the son of Milcah, which she bare unto Nahor.

25 She said moreover unto him, We have both straw and provender enough, and room to lodge in.

26 And the man bowed down his head, and worshipped the LORD.

27 And he said, Blessed be the LORD God of my master Abraham, who hath not left destitute my master of his mercy and his truth: I being in the way, the LORD led me to the house of my master's brethren.

28 And the damsel ran, and told them of her mother's house these things.

29 ¶ And Rebekah had a brother, and his name was Laban: and Laban ran out unto the man, unto the well.

30 And it came to pass, when he saw the earring, and bracelets upon his sister's hands, and when he heard the words of Rebekah his sister, saying, Thus spake the man unto me, that he came unto the man; and, behold, he stood by the camels at the well.

31 And he said, Come in, thou blessed of the LORD; wherefore standest thou without? for I have prepared the house, and room for the camels.

32 ¶ And the man came into the house: and he ungirded his camels, and gave straw and provender for the camels, and water to wash his feet, and the men's feet that were with him.

33 And there was set meat before him to eat: but he said, I will not eat, until I have told mine errand. And he said, Speak on.

34 And he said, I am Abraham's servant.

35 And the LORD hath blessed my master greatly, and he is become great: and he hath given him flocks, and herds, and silver, and gold, and menservants, and maidservants, and camels, and asses.

36 And Sarah my master's wife bare a son to my master when she was old: and unto him hath he given all that he hath.

22 When the camels had done drinking, the man took a gold ring weighing a half shekel, and two bracelets for her arms weighing ten gold shekels, 23 and said, "Tell me whose daughter you are. Is there room in your father's house for us to lodge in?" 24 She said to him, "I am the daughter of Bethu'el the son of Milcah, whom she bore to Nahor." 25 She added, "We have both straw and provender enough, and room to lodge in." 26 The man bowed his head and worshiped the LORD, 27 and said, "Blessed be the LORD, the God of my master Abraham, who has not forsaken his steadfast love and his faithfulness toward my master. As for me, the LORD has led me in the way to the house of my master's kinsmen."

28 Then the maiden ran and told her mother's household about these things. 29 Rebekah had a brother whose name was Laban; and Laban ran out to the man, to the spring. 30 When he saw the ring, and the bracelets on his sister's arms, and when he heard the words of Rebekah his sister, "Thus the man spoke to me," he went to the man; and behold, he was standing by the camels at the spring. 31 He said, "Come in, O blessed of the LORD; why do you stand outside? For I have prepared the house and a place for the camels." 32 So the man came into the house; and Laban ungirded the camels, and gave him straw and provender for the camels, and water to wash his feet and the feet of the men who were with him. 33 Then food was set before him to eat; but he said, "I will not eat until I have told my errand." He said, "Speak on."

34 So he said, "I am Abraham's servant. 35 The LORD has greatly blessed my master, and he has become great; he has given him flocks and herds, silver and gold, menservants and maidservants, camels and asses. 36 And Sarah my master's wife bore a son to my master when she was old; and to him

38 But thou shalt go unto my father's house, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son.

39 And I said unto my master, Peradventure the woman will not follow me.

40 And he said unto me, The LORD, before whom I walk, will send his angel with thee, and prosper thy way; and thou shalt take a wife for my son of my kindred, and of my father's house:

41 Then shalt thou be clear from this my oath, when thou comest to my kindred; and if they give not thee one, thou shalt be clear from my oath.

42 And I came this day unto the well, and said, O LORD God of my master Abraham, if now thou do prosper my way which I go:

43 Behold, I stand by the well of water; and it shall come to pass, that when the virgin cometh forth to draw water, and I say to her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water of thy pitcher to drink;

44 And she say to me, Both drink thou, and I will also draw for thy camels: let the same be the woman whom the LORD hath appointed out for my master's son.

45 And before I had done speaking in mine heart, behold, Rebekah came forth with her pitcher on her shoulder; and she went down unto the well, and drew water: and I said unto her, Let me drink, I pray thee.

42 "I came today to the spring, and said, 'O LORD, the God of my master Abraham, if now thou wilt prosper the way which I go, 43 behold, I am standing by the spring of water; let the young woman who comes out to draw, to whom I shall say, "Pray give me a little water from your jar to drink," 44 and who will say to me, "Drink, and I will draw for your camels also," let her be the woman-whom the LORD has appointed for my master's son.'

45 "Before I had done speaking in my heart, behold, Rebekah came out with her water jar on her shoulder; and she went down to the spring, and drew. I said to her, 'Pray let me drink.' 46 She quickly let down her jar from her shoulder, and said, 'Drink, from the other recension (E) and suggests that in that document the servant's petition had been that the woman named by Abraham—obviously Rebekah—might appear upon the scene and make herself known. This suggestion finds confirmation in vs. 21—obviously from another source than vss. 17-20, telling of the fulfillment of the sign asked for in vs. 14—which indicates further that the E narrative at this point differed from that of J².

thought it was not possible that a girl alone should decide whether she should be married. He must go and confer with her kinsmen. The first member of her family he met was her brother Laban, and Laban hurried to greet Eliezer with what seemed to be a warmth equal to Rebekah's. But a wry thought suggests itself as one notes the exact words of the story. It was when Laban saw the earring, and bracelets upon his sister's hands that he was lavish with hospitality. Whether the narrator deliberately meant to or not, he has given a hint here of

C. THE MARRIAGE IS ARRANGED (24:28-60)

49. The Lord had indeed revealed his choice of Rebekah, but the possibility remained that her people might not consent to her marriage. In this case the servant would have to go farther.

50. Laban and Milcah—Bethuel is RP's substitution for "Milcah"—recognizing that the thing comes from the LORD give their consent without (vs. 51) consulting Rebekah.

Laban's characteristic—the characteristic which he was to show later in his dealings with Jacob, a quick eye for profit.

Anyhow, Eliezer was welcomed; and as he recites the whole story of his mission, there shines in it again his high sense of heavenly guidance. Abraham had told him, he said, that the LORD . . . will send his angel with thee, and prosper thy way, and he thanked God that this had been true. What he said to Rebekah's family echoed what he had already said to her: Blessed be the LORD God of my Master Abraham, who hath not left destitute my master of his mercy and his truth: I being in the way, the Lord led me to the house of my master's brethren. Note the bright meaning in those words. Eliezer was in the way and so the angel of the Lord went with him. So it may often be. The divine guidance does not come to those who idly sit and speculate; nor to those who evade an obligation; nor to those who, having started, hesitate and stop. It comes to those who, knowing they are on the road of duty, have only the one purpose to pursue it to the end.

50-60. The Giving of Rebekah.—Once again, in vs. 50-51, there sounds the dominant note

54 And they did eat and drink, he and the men that were with him, and tarried all night; and they rose up in the morning, and he said, Send me away unto my master.

55 And her brother and her mother said, Let the damsel abide with us a few days, at the least ten; after that she shall go.

56 And he said unto them, Hinder me not, seeing the LORD hath prospered my way; send me away that I may go to my master.

57 And they said, We will call the damsel, and inquire at her mouth.

58 And they called Rebekah, and said unto her, Wilt thou go with this man? And she said, I will go.

59 And they sent away Rebekah their sister, and her nurse, and Abraham's servant, and his men.

60 And they blessed Rebekah, and said unto her, Thou art our sister; be thou the mother of thousands of millions, and let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate them.

61 ¶ And Rebekah arose, and her damsels, and they rode upon the camels, and followed the man: and the servant took Rebekah, and went his way.

62 And Isaac came from the way of the well Lahai-roi; for he dwelt in the south country.

ments. 54 And he and the men who were with him ate and drank, and they spent the night there. When they arose in the morning, he said, "Send me back to my master."

55 Her brother and her mother said, "Let the maiden remain with us a while, at least ten days; after that she may go."

56 But he said to them, "Do not delay me, since the LORD has prospered my way; let me go that I may go to my master."

57 They said, "We will call the maiden, and ask her." 58 And they called Rebekah, and said to her, "Will you go with this man?" She said, "I will go."

59 So they sent away Rebekah their sister and her nurse, and Abraham's servant and his men.

60 And they blessed Rebekah, and said to her, "Our sister, be the mother of thousands of ten thousands; and may your descendants possess the gate of those who hate them!"

61 Then Rebekah and her maids arose, and rode upon the camels and followed the man; thus the servant took Rebekah, and went his way.

62 Now Isaac had come fromⁿ Beer-la'-hai-roi, and was dwelling in the Negeb.

ⁿ Syr Tg: Heb from coming to

57. This was in its original context (E) the reply of Laban and Milcah to the servant's request for Rebekah; i.e., the decision was left with the girl herself, who (vs. 58) consents to go.

D. ISAAC MARRIES REBEKAH (24:61-67)

62. The mention of Beer-lahai-roi in association with Isaac indicates a J source. J², as has been seen, had already stated in the notice now preserved in 25:11b, but which came in his narrative after 24:1b; 25:5, that "Isaac dwelt at Beer-lahai-roi." He must that echoes through all the narrative like the motif of a symphony—the note of the guidance of God. The thing proceedeth from the LORD, say Laban and Bethuel; Rebekah must go to be Isaac's wife, as the LORD hath spoken. Then Eliezer thanked God that his quest was completed, and he was eager to turn home. Hinder me not, he urged, seeing the LORD hath prospered my way. When Rebekah's family wanted to keep her with them a little longer, Rebekah herself was called—doubtless with the hope that she would surely shrink from going so very quickly. But instead of that she answered simply, I will go. And so the story comes to its climax as though to say that God's purpose for Isaac was achieved through no arbitrary compulsion, but with the free consent of this girl's heart. A dignity is accorded to her womanhood which was unusual for the ancient Orient. Finally, with a characteristic blessing (vs. 60), they send her on her way.

61-67. Rebekah Comes to Isaac.—The centuries succeed one another, customs change, and the center of life shifts from old lands to new; but the primal realities abide. Rebekah comes to marry a man she has never seen; and when she realizes that he is near she immediately veils herself that he may not yet see her. To modern 63 And Isaac went out to meditate in the field at the eventide: and he lifted up his eyes, and saw, and, behold, the camels were coming.

64 And Rebekah lifted up her eyes, and when she saw Isaac, she lighted off the camel.

65 For she had said unto the servant, What man is this that walketh in the field to meet us? And the servant had said, It is my master: therefore she took a veil, and covered herself.

66 And the servant told Isaac all things that he had done.

63 And Isaac went out to meditate in the field in the evening; and he lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, there were camels coming. 64 And Rebekah lifted up her eyes, and when she saw Isaac, she alighted from the camel, 65 and said to the servant, "Who is the man yonder, walking in the field to meet us?" The servant said, "It is my master." So she took her veil and covered herself. 66 And the servant told Isaac all the things that he had done. 67 Then Isaac brought her into the tent,^o and took Rebekah, and she became his wife; and he loved her. So Isaac was comforted after his mother's death.

accordingly have told how the servant brought Rebekah to him there. The author who inserted 25:1-4, 6 and transferred the notice of Abraham's death, originally coming after 24:9, naturally represented the servant as returning to Abraham at Beer-sheba (cf. 21:33 [J²]; 22:19 [E]). This necessitated a change in the wording of the original of vs. 62 to its present form. Originally it read, "And they came to the entrance of Beer-lahai-roi" (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, p. 259; Skinner, Genesis, p. 347).

67. His mother Sarah's (KJV) is a gloss; the words are syntactically impossible in the Hebrew. The concluding phrase originally read "his father's death"; the mother's of the present text is due to the intrusion of 25:1-4, 6.

Western thought that belongs to a bygone time; but what has time to do with these four words, And he loved her? Here is the fountain of the wonder of life. A man has his links with the past, as Isaac did. He has grown up as a little boy under the wing of his mother, but a new knowledge of what a woman gives him comes when he finds his wife. He loved her. In its primitive expression that might mean only sexual union, with no great meaning for the spirit. But in the scene of Rebekah's coming to Isaac there is a simplicity and sweetness that creates another atmosphere. Through it vistas of contemplation open far beyond what actually happened with Isaac and Rebekah, vistas into all that the love of man and woman has meant and can mean in human life—for reverence toward one another's personality, for romance, for richness of mutual devotion. If sordid stories of infidelity make the headlines in the news, it is because they are exceptional; back of them are the numberless men and women who have the deep and quiet comfort of their certainty of love—and in that certainty are most sensitive to God. Not many husbands and wives could express in words what Elizabeth Barrett Browning wrote for Robert Browning, but, in a love which God has blessed, many besides herself have said within their hearts:

How do I love thee? Let me count the ways.
I love thee to the depth and breadth and height
My soul can reach, when feeling out of sight
For the ends of Being and ideal Grace.
I love thee to the level of everyday's
Most quiet need, by sun and candle-light.
I love thee freely, as men strive for Right;
I love thee purely, as they turn from Praise.⁵

63a. Meditation.—"To meditate" is defined by Webster as "to dwell in thought." Multitudes of people physically and intellectually are transients. They do not dwell in anything, least of all in thought. Isaac is not the greatest of O.T. figures, but he appears here as an example of a quality greatly needed. We see in him the contemplative man, and this twentieth century needs contemplation. People scurry here and there, worried, hurried, tense. Look at the crowds on the subway. One of the most notable sociological reports made in many years was the thorough analytic study of a small American

XXXI. SONS OF KETURAH (25:1-6)

25:1-6. Vss. 1-4, 6, are, as has already been noted, a late insertion in the J document. They affirm Israel's relationship with certain Arabian tribes (cf. 22:21-24; also the expansion of the J² material in ch. 10). Vs. 5 is from J² and originally followed 24:1b.

city which "was selected as having many features common to a wide group of communities." This report, which had to do with the whole field of life in that representative city, its businesses, its homes, the education and recreation of its young people, its leisure, and its community activities, was published under the generic name of Middletown.⁸ A review of the book summed up its picture of contemporary facts as follows:

In Middletown, everybody is busy. Idleness is a vice. To be continually busy, to fill one's days with exacting engagements, to rush from one organized activity to another—in brief, to keep going—this is the supreme virtue in Middletown. . . . There is no spirit of leisure in Middletown, . . . no time to read, no time to think, no time . . . for serenity and balance.

Or note the description of Dodsworth in Sinclair Lewis' novel of that name. Back from Europe and passing through Grand Central Terminal in New York, he stood contemplatively (he who a year ago would never have stood thus, but would have rushed with the most earnest of them) on the balcony overlooking the shining acres of floor. . . . Why, he wondered, was it that the immensity of Notre Dame or St. Paul's did not dwarf and make ridiculous the figures of the worshippers as this vastness did the figures of travelers galloping to train-gates. Was it because the little people, dark and insignificant in the cathedrals, were yet dignified, self-possessed, seeking the ways of God, whereas here they were busy with the ludicrous activity of insects?⁷

Much of our modern life is like children riding on a merry-go-round, exultant as the hobby-horses move up and down and the music plays, and then when the whole thing wheezes to a stop, climbing down a little dizzily, exactly where they got on, having gone nowhere. We need more Isaacs, men who know how to meditate, "to dwell in thought."

What ought meditation to be? Not idle daydreaming, not the drifting of the mind away from the day's reality. Rather it should be the deliberate relating of life to a high pattern. The noblest figures of the Bible are men with that gift. Nothing specifically is said about meditation in the case of Abraham, but the fact that he came out of Ur of the Chaldeans shows that he had been thinking great thoughts to which his whole life was to be related. Moses dwelt with such thoughts in exile, and saw the vision of the burning bush. David meditated in the silence of the pastures of Bethlehem. Paul went off into Arabia. Jesus himself withdrew into the wilderness after his baptism in the Jordan. In every case meditation had to do with the vital pattern of God's purpose to which life was to be related. To that purpose everything should belong, including the inner and the intimate. Isaac was meditating on the eve of his marriage. Was that the reason why in an age of polygamy he kept one loyalty all his life? Friendship, love, family life, right citizenship, all depend upon setting them contemplatively in relation to ideals and great ends. Moreover, meditation should look forward. The best meditation is not the passive recollections of people grown old in spirit, but the looking forward of those whose purpose is always young (see Isa. 40:31).

How shall the right meditation be made possible? For one thing, a man must get apart from the crowd. There is a "strife of tongues" from which one must be separated. "Religion is what the individual does with his own solitariness."⁸ Partial truth, but a truth. Unless a man is sometimes alone, he may be so deafened that he cannot hear God. Moreover, for the right meditation a man must seek the right surroundings. Isaac goes out into the fields at eventide—the serenity of wide spaces, the silence of sunset, the mystery of the slowly descending dark. See Jesus going apart into the hills, spending whole nights in prayer. He knew what it was to dwell in thoughts great enough for God.

To be noted is the fact that Ishmael is represented as present at his father's burial, indicating that P retained nothing of the story preserved in ch. 16 (J²) and 21:9-21 (E). Vs. 11*b*, as has been noted, came in the J² narrative following 24:1*b*; 25:5. RP transferred it to this point, and supplied vs. 11*a* as the connecting link.

made up of many strands. Its main concern is to enlarge the details of relationships within which the central life of Israel is to be exactly framed. The list of the children of Keturah establishes that relationship with some of the Arabian tribes, as to whom it is made plain (vss. 5-6) that they were dismissed with only secondary tokens from Abraham, while the real inheritance went to Isaac. Similarly in vss. 12-18 there is recorded the lineage of the Ishmaelites, who may have been a powerful tribe of the desert in the centuries just before the first narratives now woven into Genesis were written. Then in vss. 19-20 there is part of the

to the J document, from which vs. 18 is derived, they ranged as far as the border of Egypt. There can be little doubt that of the two representations J's is the more authentic.

The Ishmaelites have left practically no mark in history. From the fact that they are mentioned in neither the Egyptian nor the Assyrian records Meyer (Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, p. 324) infers that they flourished from the twelfth to the ninth centuries B.C. After that, "Ishmaelite" may have become more or less synonymous with "Bedouin" (cf. Judg. 8:24). This may be the explanation of the conflict between vss. 13-17 and vs. 18.

18. Following the LXX and the Vulg., "he dwelt" should be read for they dwelt. In the direction of Assyria is either a gloss, or possibly from RP harmonizing the verse with vss. 13-17. The verse is from J² and originally formed the conclusion of the story in ch. 16. RJE² presumably transferred it to follow 21:21. RP placed it here as the final notice regarding Ishmael.

XXXIV. JACOB AND ESAU I (25:19-34)

A. PORTENTS AT THEIR BIRTH (25:19-26)

Vss. 19-20, 26b are from P. Vs. 20 is all that P had to say of Isaac's marriage; contrast the detailed narrative of J² and E in ch. 24.

formal record of the priestly writers, whose main concern was to show the unbroken and sure succession of the family of Abraham.

Of warmer suggestion are vss. 7-11. Abraham, at a ripe old age, was gathered to his people. This cannot mean that he was buried with his ancestors, since their graves must have been in far away Chaldea. Does it reflect perhaps a hope, desirous though dim, of life beyond this life? Vss. 9-10 add sacredness to the associations of Machpelah, where Sarah already had been buried (see Expos. on ch. 23; 35:29). But thought may linger most on these words of vs. 11, It came to pass after the death of Abraham, that God blessed his son Isaac. Here again is the great Hebrew conviction of religion binding a family together. It was not a transient thing for one man to be related to God. The covenant which enfolded father and son bound the generations in a continuing benediction.

19-26. The Foreordaining of Israel.—To the Hebrew sense of the preciousness of the family, 20 And Isaac was forty years old when he took Rebekah to wife, the daughter of Bethuel the Syrian of Padan-aram, the sister to Laban the Syrian.

21 And Isaac entreated the LORD for his wife, because she was barren: and the LORD was entreated of him, and Rebekah his wife conceived.

22 And the children struggled together within her; and she said, If it be so, why am I thus? And she went to inquire of the LORD.

23 And the LORD said unto her, Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels; and the one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger.

Isaac, 20 and Isaac was forty years old when he took to wife Rebekah, the daughter of Bethu'el the Aramean of Paddan-aram the sister of Laban the Aramean. 21 And Isaac prayed to the LORD for his wife, because she was barren; and the LORD granted his prayer, and Rebekah his wife conceived. 22 The children struggled together within her; and she said, "If it is thus, why do I live?"^g So she went to inquire of the LORD. 23 And the LORD said to her,

"Two nations are in your womb, and two peoples, born of you, shall be divided; the one shall be stronger than the other, the elder shall serve the younger."

^g Syr: Heb obscure

Paddan-aram is P's equivalent of the Haran of J² and the Mesopotamia of E. Just what it designates is uncertain. It may be equivalent to "the field of Aram" mentioned in Hos. 12:12—"field" meaning "open country"—or, since the Assyrian padanu and harrānu (Haran) both mean "a way," it may mean simply Haran.

The remaining material in the section, vss. 21-26a, is from J. Originally it followed the tale in 26:1-33—also from J—as is indicated by the fact that there Isaac and Rebekah are obviously still childless. Its present position is due to RP, who substituted it for the colorless statement (cf. vs. 13) of the names of Isaac's sons with which P had continued vs. 20.

Basically the narrative is from J¹. It has however been elaborated by J², as is indicated by the facts: (a) The name Rebekah is given not at the first mention of Isaac's wife, vs. 21, where it would be expected, but in vs. 22. (b) Behold in vs. 24 suggests that this is the first mention of the twins. It may accordingly be inferred that vss. 22-23, together with Rebekah his wife in vs. 21, are from J². This suggests that in the J¹ tradition Isaac's wife was unnamed. The J¹ tradition is basically that of Hebron. This J² supplemented, in the stories of the patriarchs, with material derived in part from the tradition of Beer-sheba which, it may be inferred, included the detail that Isaac's wife was named Rebekah.

22. The Hebrew of struggled together is lit., "crushed one another." Rebekah took this as a portent, and went to inquire of the LORD, i.e., she consulted the oracle at the sanctuary, presumably (cf. 26:33) at Beer-sheba.

23. The poem may well have had independent currency. Its inclusion here ascribes the superiority of Jacob to Esau, i.e., of Israel to Edom, not to the cold-blooded calculation of Jacob recorded in vss. 27-34, but to divine decree. J² thus again affirms his faith in God's control of history.

and especially to the faith that every family which stemmed from Abraham was part of the covenant of God, barrenness was the supreme calamity; and no act of God could be a more direct blessing than the reversal of a woman's barrenness. God's answer to prayer in the case of Rebekah is only one instance of the recorded belief of Israel that he had intervened. So it had been with Sarah (15:2-6; 18:12-14). So also it would be with Rachel (29:31; 30:22-23), with the mother of Samson (Judg. 13:2-7), with Hannah (I Sam. 1:2-20), and so at the beginning of the N.T. with Elizabeth, of whom John the Baptist should be born (Luke 1:7-13).

But it is not only in Rebekah's fertility that the O.T. accents here its belief in the special act of God. The children struggling together in the womb represent the rivalry between Israel and the desert Ishmaelites, a rivalry in which the descendants of Abraham should pre-24 ¶ And when her days to be delivered were fulfilled, behold, there were twins in her womb.

25 And the first came out red, all over like a hairy garment; and they called his name Esau.

26 And after that came his brother out, and his hand took hold on Esau's heel; and his name was called Jacob: and Isaac was threescore years old when she bore them.

27 And the boys grew: and Esau was a cunning hunter, a man of the field; and Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents.

24 When her days to be delivered were fulfilled, behold, there were twins in her womb. 25 The first came forth red, all his body like a hairy mantle; so they called his name Esau. 26 Afterward his brother came forth, and his hand had taken hold of Esau's heel; so his name was called Jacob.⁷ Isaac was sixty years old when she bore them.

27 When the boys grew up, Esau was a skilful hunter, a man of the field, while Jacob was a quiet man, dwelling in tents.

⁷ That is He takes by the heel or He supplants

25. Red, 'adhmonî, is a gloss, playing on Edom, 'edhôm. Hairy, sē'ār, provides the etymology not of Esau but of "Seir"; the word alludes to Esau's traditional role as the father of the Edomites who dwelt in Mount Seir. The name Esau thus appears to be a secondary feature in the tradition upon which J¹ was drawing, i.e., at some point in its development Seir came, for whatever reason, to be identified with Esau, who may be connected, or identical, with the Phoenician Ousōos, a hero of the chase (cf. vs. 27).

26. This feature of the tale is referred to in Hos. 12:3. The name Jacob—He takes by the heel or He supplants (RSV mg.)—appears as a component of a Palestinian place name, Jacob-el, in the lists of Thutmose III, dating from the fifteenth century, some time before the entry of Israel into the land. Whether Jacob-el means "God overreaches" or "Jacob is God" is uncertain. In any case, there can be no doubt that the name Jacob is derived from the pre-Israelite tradition of Canaan. That he was an east Jordan figure is indicated by the fact that the scene of each of the two legends concerning him which are inseparably bound up with a certain locality is laid in that region—the covenant with Laban in Mount Gilead (31:44-48; cf. 31:25), and the wrestling at the Jabbok in the vicinity of Penuel (32:24-31).

The east Jordan figure was taken up into the tradition of the Israelite tribes which settled east of the Jordan and, in the process of unification, was related to Abraham and Isaac of Hebron and Beer-sheba by being made the son of the latter. As to whether this occurred gradually as the result of popular speculation or whether it was part of J¹'s schematization of his material it is impossible to say. Similarly there can be no decision as to whether Jacob's twin, Esau, came to be regarded as the ancestor of Edom before or after Jacob had been connected with Israel.

The birth story in vss. 19-26 thus originally had nothing to do with Isaac and Rebekah, but was independently current east of the Jordan. The motif of the prenatal struggle of twins may have been fairly widespread; cf. the story of Acrisius and Proetus, sons of Abas, king of Argos (Apollodorus The Library II. 2. 1), and the Polynesian myth of the twins Tangaroa and Rongo (T. K. Cheyne, Traditions and Beliefs of Ancient Israel [London: Adam and Charles Black, 1907], p. 356).

B. JACOB ACQUIRES ESAU'S BIRTHRIGHT (25:27-34)

This story is from J¹, with some minor additions by later hands. It is a tale of the kind that would be told among peasants living on the edge of the desert to express their vail. Here again is set forth the conviction which echoes so often in Genesis—that the people who looked back to Jacob as their forefather were destined to greatness not through any chances of human history, but because of the sovereign purpose of God. Nothing that should happen to Jacob or through Jacob could be explained by contingent or superficial factors of time and place. What he was to be was predestined; and that predestination is seen as active even before he came out of the womb.

27-34. The Character of Esau.—Esau is an example of how a man with a bad reputation can be more attractive than another who has contempt for what they thought to be the nomad's lack of care for the future. J¹ used it to account for the fact that not Esau, traditionally the first-born of his father, but Jacob, his younger brother, was the heir to the divine promise of Abraham; i.e., it explains away, so to speak, that feature—the priority of Esau—in the birth story in vss. 21-26 which was inconsistent with the historical situation in J¹'s time. It was true that Esau's supposed descendants, the Edomites, had attained national organization earlier than managed to acquire a good one. In the O.T. estimates Esau has a black mark, while his brother Jacob has all the marks of favor. Jacob is listed as a prince in Israel, and the father of the twelve tribes of the chosen people: but the Edomites, whom the Jews hated, were called sons of Esau. Yet notwithstanding all that, in the choice of a companion as between Esau and Jacob, almost anyone would have chosen Esau.

Thus there was a plus side to his ledger. What were the assets on it? The first asset was his physical vigor. Esau was an outdoorsman, a cunning hunter, a man of the field, a contrast to Jacob who seemed a paler sort of creature, his mother's favorite, and generally to be found about her tent. Esau was rough but he was virile, and his old father Isaac turned to him instinctively because he knew that if there was anything he wanted done, Esau could do it; and as he grew old he leaned increasingly on Esau's strength. It is true, of course, that the best man, and the bravest, is not necessarily the man with the biggest body and the strongest muscles. The frail man may be the spiritual giant: consider the apostle Paul. Nevertheless, physical soundness and vigor are greatly to be desired, and every man has the duty of making his body as fit an instrument as it possibly can become. A body neglected may make the whole personality seem anemic, while the deliberate purpose to bring the body to its highest pitch adds power inwardly as well as outwardly. Remember Theodore Roosevelt, born a delicate boy, yet setting out persistently to develop—as he did develop—a physique of astonishing resilience and tough endurance. Although he is no saint in the biblical calendar, Esau may well stand as an example in this first point.

Nor was physical vigor his only virtue. He was a warmhearted man. Evidently he loved his father, as his father loved him. When Isaac was old and blind, the rough Esau was gentle with him and quick to respond to everything he wanted. If Isaac had a wish for something special to eat, it was Esau who would go and get it. If Esau was careless about the particular advantages of the birthright, he was not careless about his father's blessing. He wanted that, whatever else was lost. And his bigheartedness was shown not only in relation to one he loved: he could be generous and magnanimous even to Jacob, who had defrauded him of his birthright.

At first his hot blood flared into such anger that Jacob got away fast and far: but in the end, when Jacob came cautiously home, with timid stratagems to placate Esau by gifts sent out in advance, Esau made all those look cheap by his own magnanimity as he "ran to meet [Jacob], and embraced him, and fell on his neck, and kissed him" (35:4). He was not the kind of man who could keep a grudge. He would rather be fond of people than to go on hating, even when he had a right to hate. In any time or place a man like Esau will be lovable. He may be easygoing and careless and lacking in any strenuous principles or fixed aims, so that he may be set down in public records as a poor sort of citizen, and yet have such impulsive lovingkindness that he is immensely attractive. Note how in some sentimental movies the villain may be more appealing than the hero, or the bootlegger and the gambler more companionable than the caricature set up to be a clergyman. Note what it is that makes unprincipled political machines powerful in many cities. They hand out public assets for private gain, and play fast and loose with the birthright of civic honor, and every genuine observer knows that they are bad; but they hold power because the district leaders and the workers in the wards are so often men who love people and get them what they think they want. Life at its best must keep away from the faults and failures of Esau, but it is also true that life will not reach its best unless it has an infusion of Esau's virtue. Programs of social reform will not succeed if their spirit is scrimped and iced,

In the name of a cautious, statistical Christ.*

Men in public office will not win the heart of the people and make them follow willingly on the road of some new adventure unless they have the human touch.

What then was the matter with Esau? Why did he not play a great role in Israel's spiritual history? Because he was a man who lived only in the immediate moment, and by the light only of what was obvious. He was heir to the birthright, and the birthright meant a great deal if you looked far enough. It meant the privilege someday of being the family's representative,

* John Boyle O'Reilly, "In Bohemia."

28 And Isaac loved Esau, because he did eat of his venison: but Rebekah loved Jacob.

29 ¶ And Jacob sod pottage: and Esau came from the field, and he was faint:

30 And Esau said to Jacob, Feed me, I pray thee, with that same red pottage; for I am faint: therefore was his name called Edom.

28 Isaac loved Esau, because he ate of his game; but Rebekah loved Jacob.

29 Once when Jacob was boiling pottage, Esau came in from the field, and he was famished. 30 And Esau said to Jacob, "Let me eat some of that red pottage, for I am famished!" (Therefore his name was called

Israel, as is indicated by the list of Edomite kings preserved in 36:31-39 (see below), but culturally they had remained stationary while Israel had passed from nomadism to peasantry, and were furthermore conscious that they stood in a unique relationship to Yahweh, the powerful God of Sinai, who had given them the land of Palestine.

Why had leadership passed from Edom to Israel? J¹ had given one answer to this question in his story of Abraham's obedience to the divine call (12:1-4a, 6-7). Here he provides another answer, one which was doubtless more in accord with popular thinking. It was because the Israelites, like their father Jacob, were cleverer, more provident, and more self-controlled than the Edomites, represented by their father Esau.

28. An addition by J², preparing for the story in ch. 27.

29. The word translated pottage is from the same root as that translated boiling. The sentence might therefore be rendered, "Jacob once was boiling something."

30. A literal rendering of the Hebrew is, "Pray let me swallow of the red stuff—that red stuff there—for I am famished." The fact that the statement that the stuff which and especially its priestly representative to guide it in the ways of God. It may have been an exaggeration to say that Esau despised his birthright (vs. 34); but he did disregard it. Its benefits were intangible and seemed a long way off. They did not fill the stomach when it was hungry. So when one day Esau came in from a long hunting, so famished that he was almost faint, and smelled some food that Jacob had been cooking, the birthright seemed very insubstantial in comparison with the steaming pottage that Jacob offered. What he wanted right then was something to eat; I am at the point to die, said he, and what profit shall this birthright do to me? So he made the deal. Possibly he thought the whole transaction did not amount to anything, since who could ever get Isaac to consent? But in any case he had lost his right to protest against such deprivation as might subsequently come to him. He had showed that he did not care enough for life's great possibilities to pay the price of present discipline. He must have what he wanted when he wanted it, and consequences could go hang. That was the critical weakness of Esau and that was his condemnation. He lost tomorrow because he snatched so greedily at today.

Consider his descendants in every generation, including ours: the young men who cannot let any long-range dedication stand in the way of appetite; the frivolous girl who says of something trivial, "I'll die if I do not get it"; the mature people for whom comfort always comes first and for whom anything like religious responsibility is ruled out if it is hard; the men in public office who will sell a birthright of great ideals to satisfy immediate clamor. Attractive traits will not save such people from ultimate dishonor.

28. The Character of Rebekah as a Woman.—A character study of Rebekah is significant more in the questions it provokes than in the answers. The O.T. writers do not often draw a neat moral at the end of a description. They give the facts even though they may be inconsistent and confused, and leave us to interpret them as best we can. Thus is suggested an enduring truth: there is rarely any sure clue to any life. Any personality, ancient or modern, has elements that baffle analysis. We move toward true appraisal only when we are undogmatic. Honestly and patiently we seek for partial certainties, and are frank to recognize that no picture of another soul will ever be complete.

The story of Rebekah had an idyllic beginning (cf. Expos. on 24:15-16). But what followed was not idyllic. It was the uncomfortable realization of this that made the revisers of the American Book of Common Prayer omit in the 1920's the reference to the mutual faithfulness of Isaac and Rebekah which had been in the inherited book for centuries. That reference was put there originally because Isaac and Rebekah were the one notable pair among Edom.^s) 31 Jacob said, "First sell me your birthright." 32 Esau said, "I am about to die; of what use is a birthright to me?"

^s That is Red

Jacob was boiling was red occurs here, rather than at the first mention of it in vs. 29, suggests that it was not a feature of the tale in its primary, popular form, but is part of J¹'s adaptation of it to make it refer to Israel and Edom. Therefore his name was called Edom is an explanatory gloss; neither J¹ nor J² would have been guilty of thus breaking into the narrative. Gunkel remarks that the name Edom is "a memento of the greed and stupidity of [the Edomites'] ancestor" (Genesis, p. 297).

31. The term birthright denotes the advantages and rights normally enjoyed by the eldest son. These included natural vigor of body and character (cf. 49:3; Deut. 21:17), a position of honor as head of the family (cf. 27:29), and a double share of the inheritance (Deut. 21:15-17). When applied to tribes or nations it conveys the notion of political and material superiority. This is what it means here, i.e., the story is definitely nonreligious and, as has been suggested above, reflects the earthy ideas of the peasantry, not the religious insight of J¹.

the patriarchs who were monogamous. But the fact that a man or woman has only one mate does not of itself make a marriage successful. Divorce is not the only thing that destroys a marriage; there may be a gradual divergence so wide and deep that the essential marriage is destroyed even though the shell of it remains. It takes more than staying together to keep a man and woman "faithful." To be faithful they must create and cherish mutual sympathies, mutual convictions, mutual aims. They will not do that if their individual desires and preferences get out of hand. Faith in one another and faithfulness toward one another depend upon a bond secured by something higher than either one. What minister has not heard the shabby story of the recriminations between a man and woman whose marriage has become a bitterness because one or both was selfishly obsessed to have his or her own way? The only road of faithfulness is when both are humbly and truly trying to walk God's way. Any preparation for marriage is hollow unless it is filled with that conviction.

The divergence between Isaac and Rebekah came out of their different regard for their two sons. Isaac loved Esau . . . but Rebekah loved Jacob. For that divided favoritism perhaps both Isaac and Rebekah were to blame, but Rebekah more aggressively so than Isaac. Her love for Jacob was so fiercely jealous that it broke loose from any larger loyalty. As between her twin sons, she wanted Jacob to have the best of everything, no matter how he got it; and to that end she would not scruple at trickery and unfairness both toward her husband and her son Esau. There was something of the tigress in Rebekah, instinctively protecting the cub that by physical comparison was inferior. So she could come to the point of saying to Jacob even this: "Upon me be thy curse, my son: only obey my voice" (27:13).

Thus the Rebekah-of-the-well has become an altogether different woman: scheming for Jacob to steal the birthright, pushing both Esau and Isaac for the moment out of her regard, unscrupulous because one purpose only obsessed her. It was not that she wanted to hurt anybody, she might have said. It was just that she was so determined to do what she thought would help Jacob that she was blind to anything or anybody that might get hurt. And all the while what she was doing was in the name of love.

A study in character here, and of the way in which an emotion essentially beautiful may become perverted. It is instinctive and right that a woman should love passionately. But the greatest love must always be subject to a greater loyalty: loyalty to truth, to honor, to the relationship of life to God. Rebekah forgot that, and she corrupted Jacob as she tried to cherish him. As it is the passion of her love that can make a woman wonderful, so it is the failure to keep that love purified by the light of God that can make love ruinous. Jezebel is pictured as one of the evil women of the Bible, but it may be that originally she was not deliberately evil. She loved Ahab, proudly, fiercely, but with blind disregard for everything except what Ahab wanted; and see what she did to Ahab. Consider Lady Macbeth; read the story of Steerforth and his mother in David Copperfield. In every congregation there is a woman who is repeating the story of Rebekah—a mother 33 And Jacob said, Swear to me this day; and he swore unto him: and he sold his birthright unto Jacob.

34 Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentils; and he did eat and drink, and rose up, and went his way. Thus Esau despised his birthright.

26 And there was a famine in the land, besides the first famine that was in the days of Abraham. And Isaac went unto Abimelech king of the Philistines unto Gerar.

33 Jacob said, "Swear to me first." So he swore to him, and sold his birthright to Jacob. 34 Then Jacob gave Esau bread and pottage of lentils, and he ate and drank, and rose and went his way. Thus Esau despised his birthright.

26 Now there was a famine in the land, besides the former famine that was in the days of Abraham. And Isaac went to Gerar, to Abim'elech king of the Nevertheless J¹, in including the tale in his narrative, was again insisting upon the values of the natural through which the supernatural works. Indeed, it may be said that this discernment of the values of the natural was one of the factors which enabled the spiritual leaders of Israel to raise their people from the level reflected in this tale to the conscious awareness of themselves as a holy nation.

34. Esau rose and went his way: With these words J¹ dismissed Esau from his narrative. J² had further stories to tell about him, however, and gave to went his way the meaning that he went about his business, not that he left Isaac's tent for good.

XXXV. ISAAC, REBEKAH, AND ABIMELECH (26:1-33)

This story is basically from J¹ and is the earliest Israelite recension of the tale which appears also in 12:11-20 (J²) and in 20:1b-17 (E). It was thus originally told not of Abraham, but of Isaac. It boasts of the cleverness of Isaac in outwitting Abimelech and takes pride in the beauty and desirability of Isaac's wife. Like the tale in 25:27-31, it reflects a certain lusty nationalism in which considerations of morality had little place.

who secretly encourages her son in self-indulgence and extravagance, or presses her unworthy schemes in order that her daughter may be "a social success." She is expressing what she thinks is her devotion, but that does not make it the less demoralizing. What ought to be great qualities of heart can end in deadly hurtfulness if love is not purified and disciplined by principles that have come from God.

Yet even out of the unlovely chapter of Rebekah's life there emerges something fine. Why did Rebekah prefer Jacob? Was it because of a woman's insight which can be more sensitive to unseen values than a man is likely to be? Isaac preferred Esau, the bluff and virile son, the full-blooded and physically more attractive man. But Jacob, in spite of limitations and glaring faults, had something which Esau did not have. In the Hebrew family the birthright was at least in part a spiritual privilege. It meant that the holder of it would be a shaper of ideas and ideals. Esau, who lived mostly by the lusty dictates of his body, was indifferent to these; not so Jacob. He had a belief in spiritual destiny, dim and distorted at first, but nevertheless so stubborn that ultimately it would prevail. Rebekah saw this, and she was determined to protect it.

Thus the thought of Rebekah ends like an unsolved equation. She represents the woman's greatest contribution to the race, viz., the ability to recognize and to cherish those qualities in her child by which the future may be shaped. In that primitive family she advanced her purpose by the stratagems of a relentless shrewdness that laid other loyalties aside. How can the relationship between husband and wife in this Christian Era be so developed that the insights of Rebekah may not have to stoop to dishonesty in order to be expressed?

26:1-6. The Divine Overruling.—Here again recurs the emphasis, so constant in Genesis, upon God's guidance of events, often not perceived, but always present. To Isaac it seemed as though the obviously sensible thing was to go down to Egypt. In the land where he found himself there was famine; in Egypt there would be food. Why stay where he was and be hungry, when he could go to Egypt and be satisfied? But in the crowded civilization of Egypt he and all that he represented would have been lost. God's purpose was that the

2 And the LORD appeared unto him, and said, Go not down into Egypt; dwell in the land which I shall tell thee of.

3 Sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee, and will bless thee; for unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham thy father;

4 And I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed:

5 Because that Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws.

Philistines. 2 And the LORD appeared to him, and said, "Do not go down to Egypt; dwell in the land of which I shall tell you.

3 Sojourn in this land, and I will be with you, and will bless you; for to you and to your descendants I will give all these lands, and I will fulfill the oath which I swore to Abraham your father. 4 I will multiply your descendants as the stars of heaven, and will give to your descendants all these lands; and by your descendants all the nations of the earth shall bless themselves: 5 because Abraham obeyed my voice and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws."

Whether or not J¹ approved of the tale it is difficult to say—J² and E both reveal their uneasiness about it. The stories he tells about Jacob in his dealings with Laban rather suggest that, however insistent he may have been on the moral necessity of justice and decency between Israelite and Israelite, he was less concerned about moral standards in Israel's relations with other peoples. And, since in the tale Isaac's wife was never really in peril, he may have overlooked the possible consequences of Isaac's deception—another point at which the moral thinking of J² and E had advanced beyond that of J¹.

A. DECEPTION OF ABIMELECH (26:1-11)

26:1. Beside the former famine that was in the days of Abraham is an addition by J² to harmonize the story with his own recension. Isaac's starting point must have been Beer-lahai-roi (cf. 25:11b).

The Philistines, coming from the islands of the Aegean and the coasts of Asia Minor, were the leading people in a great invasion of Syria, ca. 1175 B.C., in the reign of Ramses III (Wright and Filson, Westminster Atlas, pp. 45-46). They established themselves on the coast of Palestine to the south and were still powerful at the time of J¹. The mention of them here indicates that the present story is not an ancient legend current at Beer-sheba or Beer-lahai-roi in pre-Israelite times, i.e., before the advent of the Philistines, but is Israelite in its origin. It jeers at the supposed stupidity of the Philistines, just as the tale in 25:27-34 jeers at the nomad neighbors of Israel. It may be noted further that the relationship of Israel with the Philistines is again the theme of the Samson stories, which also contrast Israelite cleverness with Philistine stupidity though in a more somber vein.

To Gerar is an erroneous gloss—dependent perhaps on ch. 20—contradicting vs. 17, which records Isaac's arrival at Gerar after he had left Abimelech.

people of whom Isaac should be a progenitor must develop its destiny in a more rugged land. If Abraham's descendants had not stayed in Canaan, Israel as a people might never have emerged.

There is suggestion here for lives in every generation. Often there is the threat of some kind of famine. Sometimes it is physical famine; sometimes it is the subtler famine of what seems a lack of opportunity for ambition. Men may flinch from either, but some high purpose in history would be frustrated if they do. The first pioneers of English civilization in the western continent were tempted to leave the hardships and dangers of Jamestown Island, and the Pilgrims at Plymouth were tempted to abandon their adventure after the dreadful winter when they laid the bodies of a large part of their company in the graves on Burial Hill; but history would have been different and poorer if they had not endured. So it may be also with individuals. Here is one in some post

6 ¶ And Isaac dwelt in Gerar.

7 And the men of the place asked him of his wife; and he said, She is my sister: for he feared to say, She is my wife; lest, said he, the men of the place should kill me for Rebekah; because she was fair to look upon.

8 And it came to pass, when he had been there a long time, that Abimelech king of the Philistines looked out at a window, and saw, and, behold, Isaac was sporting with Rebekah his wife.

9 And Abimelech called Isaac, and said, Behold, of a surety she is thy wife: and how saidst thou, She is my sister? And Isaac said unto him, Because I said, Lest I die for her.

10 And Abimelech said, What is this thou hast done unto us? one of the people might lightly have lain with thy wife, and thou shouldst have brought guiltiness upon us.

6 So Isaac dwelt in Gerar. 7 When the men of the place asked him about his wife, he said, "She is my sister"; for he feared to say, "My wife," thinking, "lest the men of the place should kill me for the sake of Rebekah"; because she was fair to look upon. 8 When he had been there a long time, Abim'elech king of the Philistines looked out of a window and saw Isaac fondling Rebekah his wife. 9 So Abim'elech called Isaac, and said, "Behold, she is your wife; how then could you say, 'She is my sister?'" Isaac said to him, "Because I thought, 'Lest I die because of her.'" 10 Abim'elech said, "What is this you have done to us? One of the people might easily have lain with your wife, and you would

6. The mention of Gerar is again secondary. It may have displaced the name of another locality, but more probably J¹ contented himself with the statement that Isaac went . . . to Abimelech king of the Philistines (vs. 1b).

7. In the first half of the verse Isaac's wife is not named. Since this is the first reference to her in J¹, the inference (cf. 25:21a) is that in that document her name was not given. The second half of the verse, awkward because of the use of the first person—thinking is not in the Hebrew—is an addition, dependent on 12:12. Thus, in this recension Isaac represented his wife as his sister simply to find out how stupid the Philistines might be.

8. The Hebrew of the word rendered fondling is from the same root and so is a wordplay on Isaac. Rebekah is an intrusion by J².

10. What is this you have done to us? is an expression of indignation which comes too late in the recorded conversation. Furthermore, Isaac's explanation in vs. 9 depends where conscience tells him he ought to be, but he is beginning to grow dissatisfied. He looks across the borders of his life and sees other men more comfortable and prosperous than he. Why not pull up stakes and try his fortune in their Egypt? In the immediate calculations of common sense, that might seem to be the thing to do. So at moments it has seemed to many a man or woman working in a settlement in some discouraging city slum; to a teacher in an ill-equipped country school; to the minister in what might be called an unimportant parish; to the missionary in a lonely post. They may be developing in themselves and communicating to others qualities of character which will enrich the whole future of the community they serve. They cannot see that now. It is hard to believe that there is any reality except the reality of famine. Yet they stay where they are, their hearts held by a compulsion which is the unseen hand of God. Like a great man and schoolmaster of the nineteenth century, they may say at last: "How strange life is! How little one knows what is best! Life is best, the living the day manfully, truly, and humbly. Not what we plan, but how we live. Not what we aim at doing, but how we do what we have to do—that is God's life."¹

6-17. God's Watchfulness.—(See Expos. on 12:11-20; ch. 20.) In these verses there seems to be another variant of a traditional story that had to do first with Abraham, but now is at-11 And Abimelech charged all his people, saying, He that toucheth this man or his wife shall surely be put to death.

12 Then Isaac sowed in that land, and received in the same year a hundredfold: and the LORD blessed him.

13 And the man waxed great, and went forward, and grew until he became very great:

14 For he had possession of flocks, and possession of herds, and great store of servants: and the Philistines envied him.

15 For all the wells which his father's servants had digged in the days of Abraham his father, the Philistines had stopped them, and filled them with earth.

16 And Abimelech said unto Isaac, Go from us; for thou art much mightier than we.

have brought guilt upon us." 11 So Abim'elech warned all the people, saying, "Whoever touches this man or his wife shall be put to death."

12 And Isaac sowed in that land, and reaped in the same year a hundredfold. The LORD blessed him, 13 and the man became rich, and gained more and more until he became very wealthy. 14 He had possessions of flocks and herds, and a great household, so that the Philistines envied him. 15 (Now the Philistines had stopped and filled with earth all the wells which his father's servants had dug in the days of Abraham his father.) 16 And Abim'elech said to Isaac, "Go away from us; for you are much mightier than we."

upon the secondary material in vs. 7. Vss. 9b, 10a thus have the appearance of being an insertion to bring this recension of the tale more into line with those of J² and E. With their removal the somewhat raucous tone of the narrative is recovered.

11. As a result of his cleverness Isaac now receives special protection.

It would thus appear that the theme of this, the original recension of this tale, was Israelite cleverness. Isaac was not trying to save himself at the cost of danger to his wife; he was simply showing up the gullibility of the Philistines. The story hangs together loosely as though the narrator were in a hurry to reach the point and go on. Abimelech himself is not involved and, indeed, seems to have been brought in for the sole purpose of providing undeserved protection for Isaac so that he could proceed to amass wealth, as described in the section following.

J², not understanding that he was dealing with an earthy piece of humor on a somewhat low level and taking too seriously the startled remonstrance of Abimelech, One of the people might easily have lain with your wife (vs. 10), was troubled by the story. Apparently he could not ignore it because of its popularity—witness the fact that it was carried over to Abraham. He accordingly tried, not too successfully, to mitigate the conduct of the patriarch. Nevertheless, he represents Abraham as being expelled from Egypt for it.

E was less sensitive. Possibly he was nearer to J¹ than he was to J², thinking that foreigners were fair game. He does make a feeble attempt to maintain that Abraham had not really lied because Sarah was actually his half sister. Apart from this, however, he reveals no moral concern; instead, Abraham is materially benefited as a result of the affair (cf. 20:14-15). Indeed, E's attitude toward the story is one of the more puzzling problems in Genesis. The fact that, apart from the fragment preserved in 16:13-14, the story in ch. 20 is the beginning of the extant E material tempts one to speculate whether E may not have represented the episode as having occurred before Abraham's call.

B. DISPUTE CONCERNING THE WELLS (26:12-31)

12-31. This section is basically from J¹. The J² and E recensions of the story—in both of which Abraham, not Isaac, is the hero—are preserved, conflated, in 21:22-33.

Vss. 15, 18 are from J² or RJE, harmonizing the story with 21:25. In vs. 23 the mention of Beer-sheba is awkward in view of the notice in vs. 33 that the place received 17 ¶ And Isaac departed thence, and pitched his tent in the valley of Gerar, and dwelt there.

18 And Isaac digged again the wells of water, which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father; for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham: and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them.

19 And Isaac's servants digged in the valley, and found there a well of springing water.

20 And the herdmen of Gerar did strive with Isaac's herdmen, saying, The water is ours: and he called the name of the well Esek; because they strove with him.

17 So Isaac departed from there, and encamped in the valley of Gerar and dwelt there. 18 And Isaac dug again the wells of water which had been dug in the days of Abraham his father; for the Philistines had stopped them after the death of Abraham; and he gave them the names which his father had given them. 19 But when Isaac's servants dug in the valley and found there a well of springing water, 20 the herdsmen of Gerar quarreled with Isaac's herdsmen, saying, "The water is ours." So he called the name of the well Esek,^u because they con-its name only after Isaac had dug a well there. J¹ must therefore have given a less explicit designation of the locality. For this J², for whom Beer-sheba had already been tached to Isaac. The apparent purpose in the other versions, to set forth God's watchfulness over and blessings upon those who were his own, is less clearly evident here, though it is suggested in vss. 12-14.

18. The True Conservatism.—Here is more than a particular incident. Here is an enduring parable. In what sense did Isaac's action illustrate the meaning and the value of the conservative spirit? Isaac was turning back to what were proven wells. There might be other oases if he looked for them, but here were those he knew. So in the field of religion there are some things which have been proved. Life does not begin anew with any generation. We are heirs of a long past: in culture and experience; in lessons learned about life, man, God, and duty; in knowledge of which experiences lead to soundness and which to sickness of the soul. The rebellion of immaturity which turns away from the old springs of knowledge and faith may be dangerous. As Jowett of Baliol said, "We are none of us infallible, not even the youngest." Isaac had sense enough to know that what his father had found to be good would be good for him.

The wells of Abraham were not only proven wells: they would be easier to draw from than new wells would. It is true that the Philistines had done their worst to spoil them by flinging in them earth and stones. Yet it would take less labor to clear these wells than to dig wells in hard, new ground. So it is in uncovering the waters from which faith has already drunk. Sometimes a new generation comes to the old wells and is annoyed because they seem to be uselessly choked. The living waters of religious meaning seem blocked by old dogmas and disputes. Some people desert the church because they find it cluttered up with petty things. But the waters of God can flow again where they used to flow. The sensible thing is to come with honesty and patience to help clear away the stodgy ideas and the inconsistencies which have got into religious institutions and let the waters of God flow free again.

The wells of the fathers are the wells which are rich in sentiment. When Isaac went back to where he had been with Abraham, old memories awoke. The water he drank there slaked the thirst not only of his body but of his spirit. Old associations may awake again those emotions which belonged to life when it was most sensitive and pure. "The old oaken bucket that hung in the well" can mean more than the shiniest new faucet (see II Sam. 23:15-17, with its story of David longing for the water that was by the gate of Bethlehem). So the best men in their best moments will turn back yearningly to recapture the faith they learned from their mothers, the principles ingrained in a religious home, the everyday goodness of men and women who were their neighbors in some little town, the first response to the reality of religion which some simple man of God in a village church aroused in them. Life may make many experiments and excursions, but it can never dispense with the conservative instinct that comes back to drink again from the father's wells.

19-22. Peace After Strife.—From the portrayal in Genesis, Isaac appears as a milder and more pacific man than most of the O.T. figures. For 21 And they digged another well, and strove for that also: and he called the name of it Sitnah.

22 And he removed from thence, and digged another well; and for that they strove not: and he called the name of it Rehoboth; and he said, For now the LORD hath made room for us, and we shall be fruitful in the land.

23 And he went up from thence to Beer-sheba.

tended with him. 21 Then they dug another well, and they quarreled over that also; so he called its name Sitnah.^v 22 And he moved from there and dug another well, and over that they did not quarrel; so he called its name Reho'both,^w saying, "For now the LORD has made room for us, and we shall be fruitful in the land."

23 From there he went up to Beer-sheba.

anyone who had to move his flocks here and there in a land where water was scarce, wells were vital. Patiently Isaac had dug again Abraham's old wells which the Philistines had tried to destroy. The herdsmen of Gerar twice disputed his possession of them, and twice Isaac moved away. As he left the first well, he named it Esek, which means Contention; and as he left the second, he named it Sitnah, which means Enmity. To the third well the herdsmen of Gerar did not follow, and he named that Rehoboth, which means Enlargement, and he said, For now the LORD hath made room for us, and we shall be fruitful in the land.

The earth is more crowded than it was in the days of Isaac. We live in the time of "the vanished frontier." It is not so possible to move magnanimously from one place of opportunity that someone else may have it, and find another one farther on. Nevertheless, there is a sense in which every good man's life must seek to be like that of Isaac, in that it does not want stubbornly to maintain itself at the place of contention or strife, but will seek the place where not only possessions but all peaceful happiness can be enlarged. It is interesting to note that later verses of this same chapter tell of a visit to Isaac of Abimelech with the chief captain of his army, but they did not come to fight. On the contrary, they came to say: "We saw certainly that the Lord was with thee: and we said, Let there be now an oath betwixt us, even betwixt us and thee, and let us make a covenant with thee" (vs. 28). There was long time and far space of understanding between Isaac at his well and the Teacher by the Sea of Galilee; but in the spirit of Isaac one may see a foregleam of him who said, "Whosoever shall compel thee to go a mile, go with him twain" (Matt. 5:41); and also a hint of the promise that "the meek . . . shall inherit the earth" (Matt. 5:5).

23-24. The Faith a Man Inherits.—Here for the first time appear the words which are to echo and re-echo in the Bible—the God of Abraham. The full reality of God no language can describe. "I AM THAT I AM." But the meaning of God for any generation may be largely determined by what the preceding generation has known. Isaac's consciousness of God did not have to wait to grow out of his own unhelped experience. His father had made the thought of God a fact in life since as far back as he could remember. Religion had been part of the atmosphere he breathed, and worship would have for him always the living warmth of its association with his father.

This is not an indispensable condition for the growth of religious consciousness. God can and does reveal himself directly and anew to an individual human soul, and no revelation avails unless the individual accepts it for himself. But knowledge of God and love of him have a long start when they come warm and living through the example of some person whom a younger one has looked up to and loved. Here is the high and solemn responsibility of parenthood. It is a hollow business when all that a father gives his son is perfunctory acknowledgment of the supposed worth of religion which is not real to him.

Think on the other hand of the enrichment which comes to a son when God is to him first of all "my father's God." The God of Abraham: from the beginning the Jewish people understood that and built their life upon it. Religious instruction of a son was not left to chance. In early and formative years it was the clear and definite duty of his father. At best of course it is more than duty; it is desire and devotion. Think of some of those who have exemplified what a father can do to give his son a spiritual inheritance for which he will be forever thankful. Religious inheritance which is transmitted first through individuals and through families may become embodied in a nation. Consider the immeasurable results in history of the fact that for the Jewish race the God to be worshiped and obeyed was the God of Abraham—the God reflected in a great soul whose quality was righteousness. Because the God of Israel was the God interpreted by a man like that, the religion that stems from the O.T. has always had a singular loftiness of ethical ideals and tenacity of moral principle. Consider the contrast between the God of Abraham and the adulterous deities of the Greek Olympus, or the gods represented in the degrading images of Hindu temples. Modern nations which owe the best of their moral substance to the Judaeo-Christian heritage have critical need to consider whether that substance is being dissipated by laxity and carelessness. A nation which no longer has such principles to stand by will disintegrate; and only as it passes on great convictions to its children and its children's children is it strong. The psalmists understood that (Ps. 105). Remember too the words in the Litany of the Book of Common Prayer, "O God we have heard with our ears, and our fathers have declared unto us, the noble works that thou didst in their days, and in the old time before them."

As the O.T. goes on, the words the God of Abraham are expanded. In the record of Moses' vision of the burning bush (Exod. 3:15) it is written that "God said moreover unto Moses, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, the LORD God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you." Prophets of Israel, seeking to proclaim God with most majestic and comprehensive meaning, would name his name with a wider reference than this first one in Genesis. Elijah in his contests with the priests of Baal calls upon the "LORD God of Abraham, Isaac, and of Israel" (I Kings 18:36).

The significance of God is not only that he inspired one great man; he inspired and inspires men of different sorts, and the greatness of his godhood is that it can thus be a power on many levels of life. Abraham the heroic man, Isaac the inconspicuous man, Jacob the inconsistent man—all had their part in revealing the many-faceted light of the divine as it shines into human souls. There are not many Abrahams. They have their priceless worth—the spiritual pioneers, the channels of new revelation, the great men of vision and of action, and history is ennobled because of them. But by themselves they can never constitute society. God must manifest himself in the quiet men like Isaac, who make up the great majority. He must manifest himself, too, in the men of warring impulses, like Jacob—the men for whom it is not easy to be good but who let the purifying forces so work upon them that they grow better. The God who is seen in Abraham and Isaac and Jacob is a God who brings to human hearts more assurance and more comfort than one who might have been known only as the God of Abraham.

Here is a truth which has rich application to every group of would-be religious people, and here is happy stimulus for those whose privilege it is to minister to them. Often when people listen to what is preached about God they may be left wistful. They begin to think that perhaps only specially endowed persons can hope to be in touch with God. But the great truth is otherwise. The reflection of God is never finished. The glory of his manifested meaning can be increased by all the little growing goodnesses inspired in the humble men and women of every ordinary congregation.

25. The Essentials of Life.—This single sentence has a larger suggestion than is contained in the facts so tersely stated. Here is only the bare catalogue of what Isaac did on a particular day. But note the deeper implications in the three nouns: an altar, a tent, and a well—and the altar first. With Isaac, as with Israel in all its history, God was no afterthought. A stage in pitched his tent there: and there Isaac's servants digged a well.

26 ¶ Then Abimelech went to him from Gerar, and Ahuzzath one of his friends, and Phicol the chief captain of his army.

27 And Isaac said unto them, Wherefore come ye to me, seeing ye hate me, and have sent me away from you?

28 And they said, We saw certainly that the LORD was with thee: and we said, Let there be now an oath betwixt us, even betwixt us and thee, and let us make a covenant with thee; name of the LORD, and pitched his tent there. And there Isaac's servants dug a well.

26 Then Abim'elech went to him from Gerar with Ahuz'zath his adviser and Phicol the commander of his army. 27 Isaac said to them, "Why have you come to me, seeing that you hate me and have sent me away from you?" 28 They said, "We see plainly that the LORD is with you; so we say, let there be an oath between you and us, and you nothing but good and have sent you away in peace refers to vss. 1-17 and ignores vss. 19-21, indicating that for J1 the Gerarites were not even subjects of Abimelech.

The original narrative thus tells of Isaac's moving from the realm of Abimelech to Gerar (vs. 17). There he had trouble with the Gerarites over certain wells (vss. 18-21), and moved to Rehoboth—probably the modern er-Ruhaibeh, about twenty miles a journey, a place of abiding, must be linked with a new commitment of life. Existence was not secular, but lifted up always to a religious reference. Isaac was expressing here the inherited impulse which he had received from his father Abraham and which gave to Abraham his greatness. The careers of many men, ancient and modern, judged by this world's measurements, might seem immensely more important and impressive than that of either Abraham or Isaac. They deal with more intricate affairs, have more possessions, play their parts in a vastly more elaborate civilization. They have so much that they tend to think they are self-sufficient, and that their own immediate ambitions are enough to give direction to every day. God may be only occasionally in their consciousness. How different is the O.T. picture! Here are men with whom prayer comes ahead of their own particular devices. If any part of life was to be worth something, it must begin with worship.

And Isaac pitched his tent. Within that the life of a family was sheltered. In one aspect, all that went on there was commonplace enough. Everyday human needs had to be provided for through the routine of ordinary work. The building of an altar could not obviate that, nor contact with the spiritual world take men out of this one. But what Israel remembered was that family life—its duties, loyalties, and affections—needed always to be under the protection of the altar. Consider further the significance of what it was that Isaac dwelt in. He had no house, solid and comfortable, such as men today normally desire. He lived in a tent.

That contrasting fact suggests a consciousness possessed by men of the O.T. which modern life may lack. They were not rooted in material things, but "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. 11:13). In the civilization of today, complex and materially rich, there is danger that men may be so satisfied with what they already possess that they do not reach forward to that spiritual communion which pilgrim souls would seek to gain. Yet in the scale of the eternal values the great man is he who knows that life is a pilgrimage, and for whom the words of the old hymn are commanding:

Yet nightly pitch my moving tent,
A day's march nearer home.*

The third thing related to Isaac was the well. The well was essential for existence. Out of it must come the water to slake the thirst of men and cattle; and because of it there could be an oasis of growth and shade. Without water, physical life would end. But all through the Bible water is a symbol for the satisfaction of a deeper thirst. "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God" (Ps. 42:1). And the promise of the Bible is that as God has given the wells for men's physical needs, so he gives to those who seek them the wells of the spirit. "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters" (Isa. 55:1). "The water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life" (John 4:14).

* James Montgomery, "Forever with the Lord."

29 That thou wilt do us no hurt, as we have not touched thee, and as we have done unto thee nothing but good, and have sent thee away in peace: thou art now the blessed of the LORD.

30 And he made them a feast, and they did eat and drink.

31 And they rose up betimes in the morning, and sware one to another: and Isaac sent them away, and they departed from him in peace.

32 And it came to pass the same day, that Isaac's servants came, and told him concerning the well which they had digged, and said unto him, We have found water.

33 And he called it Shebah: therefore the name of the city is Beer-sheba unto this day.

let us make a covenant with you, 29 that you will do us no harm, just as we have not touched you and have done to you nothing but good and have sent you away in peace. You are now the blessed of the LORD." 30 So he made them a feast, and they ate and drank. 31 In the morning they rose early and took oath with one another; and Isaac set them on their way, and they departed from him in peace. 32 That same day Isaac's servants came and told him about the well which they had dug, and said to him, "We have found water." 33 He called it Shibah; therefore the name of the city is Beer-sheba to this day.

southwest of Beer-sheba—where his possession of the well he dug was not disputed (vs. 22). Thence he moved northward again (vs. 23, 25 $\alpha\gamma b$), and came once more into contact with Abimelech, with whom he made a covenant (vss. 26-31). The same day his servants found water, and he named the place Beer-sheba (vss. 32-33).

It is probable that J¹, following vs. 33, recorded that Isaac built an altar and called upon the name of the Lord, thus explicitly crediting him with the inauguration of the cult of Beer-sheba. If so, the notice was dropped by J² when he inserted vss. 24-25 $\alpha\alpha\beta$.

The story voices an Israelite claim to Rehoboth (vs. 22), if not to ownership of two other wells, Esek (vs. 20), and Sitnah (vs. 21), and reflects the continual concern for water in the desert. The account of the covenant with Abimelech may well echo an actual agreement between the inhabitants of Beer-sheba and the neighboring Philistines.

C. ISAAC AT BEER-SHEBA (26:32-33)

32-33. With vss. 1-11 the account of the covenant with Abimelech also records Isaac's migration from Beer-lahai-roi to Beer-sheba. In this way J¹ accounted for the fact that Isaac was connected with two sanctuaries. Such a dual association would seem to indicate that some clans actually did migrate from Beer-lahai-roi, carrying with them certain of its traditions, including that of Isaac, to Beer-sheba. (It is of course possible that these clans were not Israelite, i.e., that the association of Isaac of Beer-lahai-roi with Beer-sheba antedated the Israelite occupation.) The memory of the move was part of the tradition of Beer-sheba which J¹, it has been noted, related to the tradition of Hebron by making Isaac of Beer-lahai-roi and Beer-sheba the son of Abraham.

In J², as has been seen, the process is carried a step further in that Abraham, not Isaac, is represented as the founder of Beer-sheba (21:33); and the other stories told about Isaac in this chapter are transferred to Abraham (12:11-20; and the J² strand of 21:22-33). This may have been the work of J² himself; more probably, however, it reflects the development of the tradition of Beer-sheba in the century which elapsed between J¹ and J².

It may be noted once again that J¹'s relating of Isaac to Abraham was no mere manipulation of diverse traditions. Rather it reflects the unifying power of Yahwism and was a necessary step in the direction of a monotheism which was something more than an affirmation about God. Israelite monotheism, religious rather than speculative, aimed always at, and achieved to a remarkable degree, unification of life under the one God, Yahweh.

A. ESAU'S MARRIAGES (26:34-35)

34-35. The section is from P, leading up to 28:1-9. The implication is that Esau did not inherit the promise because he had taken foreign wives. The verses are thus the P parallel to 25:21-26a; 25:27-34; 27:1-40.

B. JACOB SECURES HIS FATHER'S BLESSING (27:1-40)

This is a conflation of the J² and E recensions of a story telling how Jacob secured for himself the blessing which his father had intended to bestow upon his first-born and favorite son Esau.

The purpose of the story is, like that in 25:27-34, to explain the relative positions of the Israelites and the Edomites. It further resembles the earlier story in that it is probably based upon a piece of crass folk humor, a tale showing the ease with which the clever seminomad could outwit the simple desert dweller. By the introduction of the 34-35. Xenophobia.—When Esau married two Hittite girls, what offended Isaac and Rebekah was not that they were two, but that they were Hittites. Plural marriages were neither uncommon nor unacceptable to the standards of the time, but to marry outside the clan was to mix its blood and to break its solidarity. That is why these Hittite daughters-in-law were a grief of mind unto Isaac and to Rebekah.

Determination to maintain what is called the purity of a people's blood may spring only from an arrogant and arbitrary sense of superiority, and may be put forward with fantastic claims—such as in Houston Stewart Chamberlain's defense of German megalomania in The Foundations of the Nineteenth Century,³ or in Madison Grant's diatribe against those who would tolerate the weakening of the Anglo-Saxon empire, in The Passing of the Great Race.⁴ Unreasoning instinct may be at the root of the grief of mind which accompanies any idea of alliance with aliens. So in part it was with Isaac and Rebekah, and with the people of Israel through its later history; e.g., consider the feelings which underlie the book of Esther. But there was another factor in Israel which tended to lift what might have been only a fierce instinctive separatism to a higher level of emotion. That was the passionate conviction that Israel was meant to be not only a nation, but a theocracy. To maintain its racial integrity therefore was to maintain the religious institution of covenant and law and holy faith. That purpose shines through what otherwise would have seemed the inflexible and cruel judgment of Nehemiah against those in Jerusalem who had married out of Jewry, when he "contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain of them," and compelled them to put away their alien wives (Neh. 13:25). It shines more nobly through the heroic struggle of the Maccabees, who fought to the death against the foreigners who defiled the temple and threatened all that was distinctive of the Jewish soul. But there was a still higher level to which the thought of Israel was to rise. Not only could it give to its exclusiveness a religious meaning; at its highest it could transcend exclusiveness. Read the story of Jonah; consider the lovely outreach of the book of Ruth; and meditate upon the conception of a saving remnant in Israel that should be the suffering servant, of whom it might be said that "he hath poured out his soul unto death; . . . he bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors" (Isa. 53:12).

27:1-4. Dignity in Age.—In Isaac's words there is a curious blending of the earthy and the spiritual. Isaac is thinking of something that he particularly wants to eat, and his affection for Esau is linked with the fact that Esau names of Isaac, Jacob, and Esau, J²—or the tradition upon which he depended—gave it an ethnographical significance.

The story does not advance in any way the earlier J¹ account of the relations between Jacob and Esau. J²'s inclusion of it in his narrative can be due only to its popularity, and is a further indication of the extent to which he was responsive to the tastes of those for whom he was writing. There is in his recension no shadow of condemnation of Jacob's action, and the only possible indication that he was at all uneasy about it is the role played by Rebekah (see below). It is not until the account of Jacob's meeting with Esau is reached in ch. 33 that we find signs of his disapproval.

But if he included the tale under necessity, he put it to good use. J¹, when he told of Jacob's going to "the land of the people of the east" (29:1), had left his journey unmotivated. In J²'s narrative it is motivated by Jacob's fear that Esau would revenge himself upon him for the trick recorded in this story.

Though the two recensions of the tale are in absolute agreement in that both represent Jacob as deceiving his dying father and obtaining his blessing, they differ, sometimes significantly, at certain points:

(a) J² speaks of game, E of savory food (vs. 3); this may be due merely to the fact that the word rendered game—literally, "that which is hunted"—is used in a slightly different form in other parts of E, with the meaning "provisions" (cf. 42:25; 45:21; Exod. 12:39; Josh. 1:11; 9:11).

(b) J² has Jacob carry through the deception by wearing Esau's best garments (vs. 15)—the derisive implication being that Esau "smelled to high heaven," so that even his best clothes were odoriferous. E makes use of another motif: Esau was hairy—a wordplay on Seir (cf. 25:25)—like a goat; Jacob therefore put goat skins on his hands and neck so that his blind father, feeling him, thought he was Esau. This difference, it may be assumed, represents the embellishment the tale had received in the north in the two centuries which elapsed between J² and E.

(c) Both recensions represent Rebekah as the real author of the plan to deceive Isaac (cf. vss. 5a, 15 [J²]; vss. 8-14, 16-17 [E]), but E is at special pains to stress Jacob's unwillingness to fall in with the scheme. This suggests that by E's time the tale had come to be regarded as morally objectionable, so an attempt was made to lessen the embarrassment it caused by shifting the blame from Jacob to Rebekah, who, being a woman, might be expected to act in a questionable manner, and whose reputation, for the same reason, was of less concern to her descendants. This, it may be noted, is one of the many attempts—significant in that they reflect a heightening of moral sensitivity—made by E to rehabilitate the reputations of the patriarchs: cf. his partial justification of Abraham in 20:12, and his treatment of the whole Jacob-Laban story, discussed below.

(d) J² represents the deception as being carried through without difficulty; Isaac asks no questions, he smells the clothes Jacob is wearing, and blesses him (vss. 25-27, 29aαβb); only when Esau appears upon the scene does Isaac bewilderedly realize that he has been deceived (vss. 32-33a). E is more appreciative of the difficulties involved. He has Jacob raise the question as to the feasibility of his mother's plan (vss. 11-12). depicts Isaac as suspicious from the first (vss. 21-22), and represents him as realizing what had happened immediately after Esau came in (vs. 35).

is the one who can get it for him. Thus far he was like many human beings, whose interests seem to center in the body; but he was different in that he had no illusions about that body. He did not try to ignore the fact that he was growing old and that he must prepare to die. Numberless people do try to ignore both—or try to hide what grows impossible to ignore. Witness the women obsessed with all the pitiful modern devices which they try to think will disguise their age. And as for facing the end of life, a director of the British Broadcasting Corporation has remarked that he had listened to over six hundred radioed sermons, and only one of them had had anything to say about death. Often one may read with surprise that some person he knows has died without leaving a will, or with a will that is obviously out of date; but it need not be surprising, for it is only one more evidence of the fact of men's reluctance to come eldest son, and said unto him, My son: and he said unto him, Behold, here am I.

2 And he said, Behold now, I am old, I know not the day of my death:

3 Now therefore take, I pray thee, thy weapons, thy quiver and thy bow, and go out to the field, and take me some venison;

4 And make me savory meat, such as I love, and bring it to me, that I may eat; that my soul may bless thee before I die.

5 And Rebekah heard when Isaac spake to Esau his son. And Esau went to the field to hunt for venison, and to bring it.

6 ¶ And Rebekah spake unto Jacob her son, saying, Behold, I heard thy father speak unto Esau thy brother, saying,

7 Bring me venison, and make me savory meat, that I may eat, and bless thee before the LORD before my death.

8 Now therefore, my son, obey my voice according to that which I command thee.

9 Go now to the flock, and fetch me from thence two good kids of the goats; and I will make them savory meat for thy father, such as he loveth:

10 And thou shalt bring it to thy father, that he may eat, and that he may bless thee before his death.

called Esau his older son, and said to him, "My son"; and he answered, "Here I am."

2 He said, "Behold, I am old; I do not know the day of my death. 3 Now then, take your weapons, your quiver and your bow, and go out to the field, and hunt game for me, 4 and prepare for me savory food, such as I love, and bring it to me that I may eat; that I may bless you before I die."

5 Now Rebekah was listening when Isaac spoke to his son Esau. So when Esau went to the field to hunt for game and bring it, 6 Rebekah said to her son Jacob, "I heard your father speak to your brother Esau, 7 'Bring me game, and prepare for me savory food, that I may eat it, and bless you before the LORD before I die.' 8 Now therefore, my son, obey my word as I command you. 9 Go to the flock, and fetch me two good kids, that I may prepare from them savory food for your father, such as he loves; 10 and you shall bring it to your father to eat, so that he may bless you be-

(e) According to J², Esau received no blessing; his request for one (vs. 34) was received by his father in silence, as is indicated by the words "and Isaac was silent" occurring in some LXX MSS at the end of vs. 38a. J² thus reflects the complete subservience of Edom to Israel at the time the story took form (cf. II Sam. 8:14). By the time E wrote, Edom was again independent (cf. II Kings 8:20-22), so he tells of Isaac blessing Esau, though in somewhat ambiguous terms (vss. 39-40).

27:1. Isaac's blindness is of course crucial to both recensions of the story. The close connection of the blessing and the eating, insisted on in both recensions, rests upon some religious notion—possibly as Holzinger (Genesis, p. 180) suggests, that the desired prophetic utterance would be induced by the physical stimulus (cf. I Sam. 10:5-6; II Kings 3:15-17); possibly that of a sacrificial meal establishing communion with the Deity (Gunkel, Genesis, p. 309).

4. The implication of that my soul may bless thee before I die (KJV) is that Isaac is on his deathbed. Néphesh, soul, here bears the meaning of the totality of the person's power (Pedersen, Israel I-II, pp. 99-112; see RSV). Strengthened by the meal, the soul to grips with the uncertainty and shortness of life. And when men do make their wills, what is generally the substance of their testament? Property. They specify what is to be the division of their money, their real estate, and other material assets; and beyond that they may have no more to say. But the words of Isaac have a larger suggestion. The end of what he had to say to Esau was that my soul may bless thee before I die. How many fathers have a spiritual testament which above all else they want to pass on to their sons?

5-17. Rebekah and Jacob.—When Jacob had managed to bargain Esau out of his birthright, he had acted alone; now his mother is the moving spirit. Where Jacob's interests were at stake, she had a cleverness and a determination that rose completely to meet the occasion. When

11 And Jacob said to Rebekah his mother, Behold, Esau my brother is a hairy man, and I am a smooth man:

12 My father peradventure will feel me, and I shall seem to him as a deceiver; and I shall bring a curse upon me, and not a blessing.

13 And his mother said unto him, Upon me be thy curse, my son: only obey my voice, and go fetch me them.

14 And he went, and fetched, and brought them to his mother: and his mother made savory meat, such as his father loved.

15 And Rebekah took goodly raiment of her eldest son Esau, which were with her in the house, and put them upon Jacob her younger son:

16 And she put the skins of the kids of the goats upon his hands, and upon the smooth of his neck:

17 And she gave the savory meat and the bread, which she had prepared, into the hand of her son Jacob.

fore he dies." 11 But Jacob said to Rebekah his mother, "Behold, my brother Esau is a hairy man, and I am a smooth man. 12 Perhaps my father will feel me, and I shall seem to be mocking him, and bring a curse upon myself and not a blessing." 13 His mother said to him, "Upon me be your curse, my son; only obey my word, and go, fetch them to me." 14 So he went and took them and brought them to his mother; and his mother prepared savory food, such as his father loved. 15 Then Rebekah took the best garments of Esau her older son, which were with her in the house, and put them on Jacob her younger son; 16 and the skins of the kids she put upon his hands and upon the smooth part of his neck; 17 and she gave the savory food and the bread, which she had prepared, into the hand of her son Jacob.

is to pour out all its dynamic force in one last prophetic act. The belief in the peculiar efficacy of the utterance of a dying man finds frequent expression in the O.T. (48:10-20; 49:1-28; 50:24; Deut. 33; Josh. 23; II Sam. 23:1-7; I Kings 2:1-4; II Kings 13:14-19). It approximated the divine word which carried in it the power of its own fulfillment (cf. Isa. 55:11; Jer. 23:29)—such was the solemnity of death.

13. A dying man's curse would be as efficacious as his blessing, but such an utterance as Rebekah's upon me be your curse, spoken beforehand, had the power to deflect it. Such a belief is on a level with that implied throughout the narrative that the blessing uttered over Jacob would benefit him even though it was intended for Esau.

she overheard Isaac's words to Esau, indicating that he was about to give Esau his final blessing, she acted instantly. Calling Jacob and telling him what she had heard, she said to him, Now therefore, my son, obey my voice according to that which I command thee. The authority of a mother's affection may turn a man to goodness; misused, it may involve him in evil for which he will pay a heavy price. Rebekah could make a decision for Jacob; but notwithstanding her readiness (see Expos. on vs. 13), she could not take upon herself the debt of retribution which it would entail. As a strange example of the way in which lofty ideas may be made a motive for low acts, it may be that Rebekah told herself she was carrying out the will of God. Had not the divine voice said to her, before Esau and Jacob were born, that the elder shall serve the younger? Why, then, should she not act now, by whatever stratagem was necessary, to appropriate Isaac's blessing for Jacob rather than for Esau? So she framed and carried out her stratagem of disguising Jacob, which the narrative so vividly describes. The end, she thought, must justify the means. But she was wrong. If she had dealt openly and honestly with Isaac, she might have persuaded him to give willingly to Jacob that which was predestined to be his. But instead she incited a deceit which made Jacob look contemptible, brought bitterness to Isaac, roused Esau's justified fury, and led to Jacob's exile and to a breach in the family which not in her lifetime would be healed.

13. Emotion Evilly Used.—Frederick W. Robertson was among the greatest of English-speaking preachers, and one of his notable sermons was on "Isaac Blessing His Sons." In it, as he touched upon these words of Rebekah, Upon me be thy curse, my son, he set forth unforgettably the truth that even the most pas-

18 ¶ And he came unto his father, and said, My father: and he said, Here am I; who art thou, my son?

19 And Jacob said unto his father, I am Esau thy firstborn; I have done according as thou badest me: arise, I pray thee, sit and eat of my venison, that thy soul may bless me.

20 And Isaac said unto his son, How is it that thou hast found it so quickly, my son? And he said, Because the LORD thy God brought it to me.

21 And Isaac said unto Jacob, Come near, I pray thee, that I may feel thee, my son, whether thou be my very son Esau or not.

22 And Jacob went near unto Isaac his father; and he felt him, and said, The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau.

23 And he discerned him not, because his hands were hairy, as his brother Esau's hands: so he blessed him.

24 And he said, Art thou my very son Esau? And he said, I am.

25 And he said, Bring it near to me, and I will eat of my son's venison, that my soul may bless thee. And he brought it near to him, and he did eat: and he brought him wine, and he drank.

18 So he went in to his father, and said, "My father"; and he said, "Here I am; who are you, my son?" 19 Jacob said to his father, "I am Esau your first-born. I have done as you told me; now sit up and eat of my game, that you may bless me." 20 But Isaac said to his son, "How is it that you have found it so quickly, my son?" He answered, "Because the LORD your God granted me success." Then Isaac said to Jacob, 21 "Come near, that I may feel you, my son, to know whether you are really my son Esau or not." 22 So Jacob went near to Isaac his father, who felt him and said, "The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau." 23 And he did not recognize him, because his hands were hairy like his brother Esau's hands; so he blessed him. 24 He said, "Are you really my son Esau?" He answered, "I am." 25 Then he said, "Bring it to me, that I may eat of my son's game and bless you." So he brought it to him, and he ate; and he sionate human devotion, if unprincipled, will not bless but destroy. In her ambition for Jacob, Rebekah stopped at nothing. If evil means seemed necessary, she would assume the consequences. Said Robertson:

Here you see the idolatry of the woman: sacrificing her husband, her elder son, high principle, her own soul, for an idolized person. . . . Do not mistake. No one ever loved child, brother, sister, too much. It is not the intensity of affection, but its interference with truth and duty, that makes it idolatry. Rebekah loved her son more than truth, i.e. more than God. . . . The only true affection is that which is subordinate to a higher. . . . Compare, for instance, Rebekah's love for Jacob with that of Abraham for his son Isaac. Abraham was ready to sacrifice his son to duty. Rebekah sacrificed truth and duty to her son. Which loved a son most?—which was the nobler love? ⁵

Though Rebekah was ready to take the consequences of the wrong entirely upon herself, she could not do it. They involved Jacob—as the punishment of the evil which Lady Macbeth prompted involved Macbeth. The sin of deception was not originally Jacob's, but when he acquiesced in his mother's suggestion, it became his too. So he went on to increasingly gross and deliberate falsehood until he became capable of the blasphemous lie of telling his father, Isaac, when the old man asked how he could so quickly have secured the venison which he, Jacob, was offering under the pretense that he was Esau, "The LORD thy God brought it to me" (vs. 20). So the lesson of Jacob's relationship to Rebekah is summed up in Robertson's vivid words, "Beware of that affection which cares for your happiness more than for your honor."

18-40. Jacob and Isaac and Esau.—How dramatic and moving Genesis can be! Where in prose literature can this passage be surpassed in portrayal of human emotions, and in the poignancy and pathos of its conclusion? In the first place there is Jacob, following his mother's craftily suggested trick with an unscrupulous thoroughness that could make him descend to claiming the help of God (vs. 20) in making his lie successful. There is Isaac, pitiful in his 26 And his father Isaac said unto him, Come near now, and kiss me, my son.

27 And he came near, and kissed him: and he smelled the smell of his raiment, and blessed him, and said, See, the smell of my son is as the smell of a field which the LORD hath blessed:

28 Therefore God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine:

29 Let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee: be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee: cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be he that blesseth thee.

30 ¶ And it came to pass, as soon as Isaac had made an end of blessing Jacob, and Jacob was yet scarce gone out from the presence of Isaac his father, that Esau his brother came in from his hunting.

31 And he also had made savory meat, and brought it unto his father, and said unto his father, Let my father arise, and eat of his son's venison, that thy soul may bless me.

32 And Isaac his father said unto him, Who art thou? And he said, I am thy son, thy firstborn, Esau.

33 And Isaac trembled very exceedingly, and said, Who? where is he that hath taken venison, and brought it me, and I have eaten of all before thou camest, and have blessed him? yea, and he shall be blessed.

brought him wine, and he drank. 26 Then his father Isaac said to him, "Come near and kiss me, my son." 27 So he came near and kissed him; and he smelled the smell of his garments, and blessed him, and said,

"See, the smell of my son is as the smell of a field which the LORD has blessed!

28 May God give you of the dew of heaven, and of the fatness of the earth, and plenty of grain and wine.

29 Let peoples serve you, and nations bow down to you.

Be lord over your brothers, and may your mother's sons bow down to you.

Cursed be every one who curses you, and blessed be every one who blesses you!"

30 As soon as Isaac had finished blessing Jacob, when Jacob had scarcely gone out from the presence of Isaac his father, Esau his brother came in from his hunting. 31 He also prepared savory food, and brought it to his father. And he said to his father, "Let my father arise, and eat of his son's game, that you may bless me."

32 His father Isaac said to him, "Who are you?" He answered, "I am your son, your first-born, Esau."

33 Then Isaac trembled violently, and said, "Who was it then that hunted game and brought it to me, and I ate it all* before you came, and I have blessed him? — yes,

27. The opening words of the blessing given in J²—its continuation is the first two and the last two lines of vs. 29—allude to the fact that Jacob was wearing Esau's garments. This indicates that the utterance J² ascribed to Isaac was his own composition, from the first a part of the tale.

29. The third and fourth lines, preceded by vs. 28, constitute the E blessing. The reference to your mother's sons indicates that this poem had an independent existence troubled eagerness, trying to assure himself that this son before him is Esau whom he loves. Then the blessing wrongly given—wrongly, so far as Isaac's desire was concerned, and yet in accord with destiny. Isaac's heart was wrapped up in Esau, and his anguish was as deep as Esau's anger when he knew that Esau had been defrauded. But the tragedy was that he could not reverse what he had done. What shall I do now unto thee, my son? he cried. He would give to Esau all the blessing that rested in him to confer, a blessing that had love in it like the dew of heaven from above, and had fierceness in it, in the hope that although Jacob should have the pre-eminence, Esau should someday break his yoke from off thy neck. But the tragedy was that he must see this son of his chief devotion sacrificed to facts which he could not cancel. The method which Rebekah and Jacob had contrived happened only to be the particular means through which the blessing passed away from Esau. In Esau's earlier limitations that loss was predetermined. It was written in his character that he could not have the birthright blessing; and though Isaac might have cried out in such words as would come 34 And when Esau heard the words of his father, he cried with a great and exceeding bitter cry, and said unto his father, Bless me, even me also, O my father.

35 And he said, Thy brother came with subtilty, and hath taken away thy blessing.

36 And he said, Is not he rightly named Jacob? for he hath supplanted me these two times: he took away my birthright; and, behold, now he hath taken away my blessing. And he said, Hast thou not reserved a blessing for me?

37 And Isaac answered and said unto Esau, Behold, I have made him thy lord, and all his brethren have I given to him for servants; and with corn and wine have I sustained him: and what shall I do now unto thee, my son?

38 And Esau said unto his father, Hast thou but one blessing, my father? bless me, even me also, O my father. And Esau lifted up his voice, and wept.

39 And Isaac his father answered and said unto him, Behold, thy dwelling shall be the fatness of the earth, and of the dew of heaven from above;

40 And by thy sword shalt thou live, and shalt serve thy brother: and it shall come to pass when thou shalt have the dominion, that thou shalt break his yoke from off thy neck.

and he shall be blessed." 34 When Esau heard the words of his father, he cried out with an exceedingly great and bitter cry, and said to his father, "Bless me, even me also, O my father!" 35 But he said, "Your brother came with guile, and he has taken away your blessing." 36 Esau said, "Is he not rightly named Jacob? For he has supplanted me these two times. He took away my birthright; and behold, now he has taken away my blessing." Then he said, "Have you not reserved a blessing for me?" 37 Isaac answered Esau, "Behold, I have made him your lord, and all his brothers I have given to him for servants, and with grain and wine I have sustained him. What then can I do for you, my son?" 38 Esau said to his father, "Have you but one blessing, my father? Bless me, even me also, O my father." And Esau lifted up his voice and wept.

39 Then Isaac his father answered him: "Behold, away from^v the fatness of the earth shall your dwelling be, and away from^v the dew of heaven on high.

40 By your sword you shall live, and you shall serve your brother; but when you break loose you shall break his yoke from your neck."

before being incorporated into the narrative. In none of the documents do Isaac and Rebekah have more than two sons.

39. The blessing of Esau begins with a couplet which refuses—the rendering of the KJV is incorrect—to him what had been granted to Jacob in the E recension, the fatness of the earth and the dew of heaven.

40. The first line refers to Edomite raids on the territory of their neighbors and to their plundering of caravans. The second line alludes to Edom's subjugation to Israel from the time of David to that of Joram (II Kings 8:20-22). The metrical difficulty of the last two lines, reversing the blessing given to Jacob, makes it probable that they have been added by E to make the oracle agree with the course of events.

from the lips of Othello concerning Desdemona, "Oh, the pity of it!" not all the pitifulness within the fact could change it.

34. The Inexorableness of Judgment.—Bless me. So Esau cried, but for the blessing he wanted now it was too late. His father would have given it to him if he could, but his father also was helpless. The wheels of moral destiny had turned too far. Esau had despised his birthright at one critical moment of choice, and he himself had made possible the success of Jacob's plot. He had been weighed in the balances of divine judgment and had let himself be found wanting. Now when the verdict had been sealed, no human emotions could reverse it. So moral causes—what a man does or fails to do—go on to their implacable conclusions. Esau was never a bad man; but he was a man careless and contemptuous of unseen values. Heb. 12:16 calls him a "profane person." To be profane is not primarily a matter of coarse speech, but a half-contemptuous irreverence that treats the holiest

41 ¶ And Esau hated Jacob because of the blessing wherewith his father blessed him: and Esau said in his heart, The days of mourning for my father are at hand; then will I slay my brother Jacob.

42 And these words of Esau her elder son were told to Rebekah: and she sent and called Jacob her younger son, and said unto him, Behold, thy brother Esau, as touching thee, doth comfort himself, purposing to kill thee.

43 Now therefore, my son, obey my voice; and arise, flee thou to Laban my brother to Haran;

44 And tarry with him a few days, until thy brother's fury turn away;

41 Now Esau hated Jacob because of the blessing with which his father had blessed him, and Esau said to himself, "The days of mourning for my father are approaching; then I will kill my brother Jacob." 42 But the words of Esau her older son were told to Rebekah; so she sent and called Jacob her younger son, and said to him, "Behold, your brother Esau comforts himself by planning to kill you. 43 Now therefore, my son, obey my voice; arise, flee to Laban my brother in Haran, 44 and stay with him a while, until your brother's fury turns away;

C. ESAU'S HATRED OF JACOB (27:41-45)

41-45. This section is a conflation of J² and E, both of whom represent Jacob as leaving his home for fear of Esau. To be noted are Rebekah's words in vss. 44-45 (E), where she sends her favorite son away for a short time. In the event, Jacob's absence lasted for more than twenty years because of her brother Laban's fraudulent dealing with him. The E narrative never refers to Rebekah from this point on, for she died without ever seeing her son again, the victim, in a sense, of her own duplicity. Both the J² and E narratives recorded Isaac's death at this point and R^{JE} retained the notice here. It was later dropped by RP in favor of the material in 35:27-29 (P).

possibilities of life as though they were cheap and did not matter. Joseph's older brothers were profane persons. The Herod of the Gospels was profane (Luke 23:9-12). So was Herod Agrippa who said mockingly to Paul, "Almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian" (Acts 26:28).

Note that though the profane man may show what he is in one recklessly decisive moment, it is not that moment which has made him what he is. The birthright which should have belonged to Esau had material advantage (Deut. 21:17), but it was not the material benefit that was most important. The first-born was the representative of the family in its relationship to God, its priestly intercessor. But Esau cared little for that. Someday perhaps he might get around to being interested in it, but actually he had too many other things that came first—like the men in the N.T. parable of the wedding feast who had excuses why they could not come (Luke 14:16-24), Esau could not bother yet to fit himself for a religious role; and what was neglected came to seem more and more negligible.

Note also that the final tossing away of his right to the blessing was for an inducement that would have seemed ridiculous had he not grown so casually indifferent to the birthright's value. To barter away his highest privilege for a mess of pottage was something nobody could have done unless his imagination had been for a long time in process of being dulled. But since it was dulled, the sudden impulse to get some trivial thing he wanted met no great resistance. It may happen again! A boy is born into a family of high inheritance. He has the chance to be a spiritual influence in his generation. But he is not interested. He ignores his privilege, or laughs it off—not finally, he thinks, but until he feels more seriously inclined to take it up. Then one day by some uncalculated word or act he once for all sells out his destiny—for a fleshly appetite, for money, for popular applause, thinking that this betrayal of his better self would be incidental, like so many former ones, and not dreaming that this time it would be fatal. For the tragic lesson of the O.T. story is that some lapses are fatal. Isaac could give to Esau, when Esau woke in bitter realization, the blessing of his affection; but he could never give now the full blessing of the destiny which Esau had denied. Esau had laid a judgment on his life which Isaac could not alter. In how many other lives may the moral fates be sealed by the long carelessness that culminates in one word that cannot be unsaid, in one deed that cannot be undone! So Heb. 12:17 says that Esau, when afterward he desperately wanted the birthright he had held so lightly, "was rejected," and 45 Until thy brother's anger turn away from thee, and he forget that which thou hast done to him: then I will send, and fetch thee from thence: why should I be deprived also of you both in one day?

46 And Rebekah said to Isaac, I am weary of my life because of the daughters of Heth: if Jacob take a wife of the daughters of Heth, such as these which are of the daughters of the land, what good shall my life do me?

45 until your brother's anger turns away, and he forgets what you have done to him; then I will send, and fetch you from there. Why should I be bereft of you both in one day?"

46 Then Rebekah said to Isaac, "I am weary of my life because of the Hittite women. If Jacob marries one of the Hittite women such as these, one of the women of the land, what good will my life be to me?"

D. JACOB LEAVES FOR PADDAN-ARAM (27:46-28:5)

Vs. 46 is from RP, to effect a transition from the foregoing JE material to the P account of Jacob's departure, 28:1-5, originally the immediate continuation of 26:34-35. P, following his scheme of recording nothing unfavorable about the patriarchs, omitted entirely the story of Jacob's deception of his father and of his consequent flight from his brother's fury. Jacob left home at his father's express command to take a wife from his mother's family (vs. 2)—here P is dependent upon the motif of ch. 24; and he went with his father's blessing, freely bestowed, which designated him as the heir of the divine "found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears." As in the Rubáyát,

The Moving Finger writes; and, having writ, Moves on.⁶

In the N.T. there is another figure who was profane, as Esau was. It is the younger son in Jesus' parable who was contemptuous of his sonship and almost threw it away (Luke 15). Observe however that in the merciful teaching of Jesus the profane and reckless lad does find room to repent, and by grace is restored in his father's home.

41-45. The Long Consequence of Evil.—It was no wonder that Rebekah was fearful for Jacob when she learned of the threat that Esau had made. She knew well enough that Esau had reason to be enraged. He had been deceived by his brother at his mother's instigation, and he had lost irrevocably the blessing that might have been his. Now that he declared he would kill Jacob, he might surely do it. But if Rebekah was alarmed, she did not lose her self-command. She thought she could take care of this situation as she had managed the former one. Now therefore, my son, obey my voice, she said to Jacob. He had obeyed her before, and had succeeded in tricking Esau out of the birthright; let him listen to her again, and he could get himself with equal success out of the consequence of Esau's anger. He could go off to her own brother, where presumably he would be safe and comfortable. It would be necessary just to tarry with him a few days. Then when Esau's gusty anger had blown by, she would send Jacob a message and tell him to come home. It was all as smooth and simple as that—so she imagined. But the consequences of evil may be longer and graver than the one who has instigated the evil can foresee. Rebekah had hoped that after a temporary tumult everything would settle down peacefully, and this favorite son of hers would be with her as the head, after Isaac, of the family. But her slow and silent punishment was still to come. The son she had sent off for a few days was to stay in exile for more years than her life could bridge. The message that she said she would send him presently either she did not dare to send, or Jacob did not dare to answer. There is no sign in the following narrative that the mother and the son ever met again. When Jacob did at last come back, Rebekah apparently was dead; and if so, she carried to her grave the frustration of her own life which had grown out of the false act by which she had tried to lift her preferred child into favor.

46. The Daughters of Heth.—(See Expos. on 26:34-35.) George Hodges, in his bright and affectionate O.T. stories for children called The Garden of Eden, has Rebekah say, "Those Heth girls worry me almost to death."⁷ Thus with gentle humor he puts it; but there was no humor, only strict seriousness, in the thought of the priestly writers that above everything Israel must be kept separate from alien people and alien ideas.

⁷ Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1909, p. 27.

28 And Isaac called Jacob, and blessed him, and charged him, and said unto him, Thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan.

2 Arise, go to Padan-aram, to the house of Bethuel thy mother's father; and take thee a wife from thence of the daughters of Laban thy mother's brother.

3 And God Almighty bless thee, and make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, that thou mayest be a multitude of people;

4 And give thee the blessing of Abraham, to thee, and to thy seed with thee; that thou mayest inherit the land wherein thou art a stranger, which God gave unto Abraham.

5 And Isaac sent away Jacob: and he went to Padan-aram unto Laban, son of Bethuel the Syrian, the brother of Rebekah, Jacob's and Esau's mother.

6 ¶ When Esau saw that Isaac had blessed Jacob, and sent him away to Padan-aram, to take him a wife from thence; and that as he blessed him he gave him a charge, saying, Thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan;

7 And that Jacob obeyed his father and his mother, and was gone to Padan-aram;

28¹ Then Isaac called Jacob and blessed him, and charged him, "You shall not marry one of the Canaanite women. 2 Arise, go to Paddan-aram, to the house of Bethu'el your mother's father; and take as wife from there one of the daughters of Laban your mother's brother. 3 God Almighty² bless you and make you fruitful and multiply you, that you may become a company of peoples. 4 May he give the blessing of Abraham to you and to your descendants with you, that you may take possession of the land of your sojournings which God gave to Abraham!" 5 Thus Isaac sent Jacob away; and he went to Paddan-aram to Laban, the son of Bethu'el the Aramean, the brother of Rebekah, Jacob's and Esau's mother.

6 Now Esau saw that Isaac had blessed Jacob and sent him away to Paddan-aram to take a wife from there, and that as he blessed him he charged him, "You shall not marry one of the Canaanite women," 7 and that Jacob had obeyed his father and his mother and gone to Paddan-aram. 8 So when Esau saw that the Canaanite women promise to Abraham (vss. 3-5). Thus Jacob's marriages to his cousins, which in both J² and E had been an unforeseen result of his journey to Laban, became in P the reason for it—an interesting example of P's treatment of history.

E. ESAU'S THIRD MARRIAGE (28:6-9)

6-9. These verses, recording Esau's third marriage, are from P. They depend upon a tradition preserved in 36:10 (J²).

28:1-9. For Proper Marriages.—This passage is not part of the description from the Yahwist document which makes up 27:1-45. Together with 27:46, these verses link up directly with 26:34-35, and are as though 27:1-45 had not been written. The beginning of ch. 28 resumes the terse summary of the priestly writers, whose main interest was to show the certified and unbroken lineage through which the inheritance from Abraham was preserved and passed on. There is no hint here of conflict between Jacob and Esau, nor any suggestion that the reason for Jacob's journey to the east was trouble at home. He is not in flight; he is going peacefully and expressly to get married. And it is a different picture of Esau that is presented. He is as amenable as Jacob. When he saw that his first marriage grieved his parents, he determined to marry in a circle they would be more likely to approve. So he married a granddaughter of Abraham. She was the daughter of Ishmael, and thus not of the preferred legitimate line; whereas Jacob is to marry from among the kinspeople of Rebekah, as to whom there was no doubt of proper blood and status. Thus within the framework of genealogy, with which the priestly writers were constantly concerned, the descendants both of Esau and Jacob have their assured place, with those of Jacob being put satisfactorily on a higher level.

9 Then went Esau unto Ishmael, and took unto the wives which he had Mahalath the daughter of Ishmael Abraham's son, the sister of Nebajoth, to be his wife.

10 ¶ And Jacob went out from Beer-sheba, and went toward Haran.

did not please Isaac his father, 9 Esau went to Ish'mael and took to wife, besides the wives he had, Ma'ha-lath the daughter of Ish'mael Abraham's son, the sister of Neba'ioth.

10 Jacob left Beer-sheba, and went to-

XXXVII. JACOB AT BETHEL (28:10-22)

This account of the inauguration of the, or a, sanctuary at Bethel is a conflation of J² and E, both of which placed the incident at this point in the narrative. The J² recension is much less concrete than the E. It tells of the Lord appearing to Jacob and bestowing upon him the blessing of Abraham and Isaac (vss. 13-15), and of Jacob's offering of the inaugural sacrifice, the account of which is, however, only fragmentarily preserved in vss. 16 and 19.

The E recension is more detailed and colorful, telling of Jacob's vision of the angels of God ascending and descending on a ladder reaching from the earth to heaven (vss. 11-12), and of how the pillar, standing at Bethel in the writer's own day, was set up there as a memorial by Jacob, who also inaugurated the custom of anointing it (vss. 17-18). This was followed by the vow in vss. 20-22, concluding presumably with an explicit notice of the naming of the place Bethel (cf. vs. 19 [J²]).

It is thus E who has preserved the ancient legend current at Bethel, with which J² was apparently unfamiliar. He must, however, have known of the tradition associating Jacob with the sanctuary there and embodied it as best he could.

Now the belief and ideas finding expression in the older legends which J² incorporated into his narrative are the beliefs and ideas of the people among whom the legends took form. They are not necessarily those of J² himself. This story is, however, his own free composition, and as such reflects his own ideas. It is therefore a fact of highest importance for an understanding of his point of view that he here attributes Jacob's inheritance of the promise to Abraham not to his own heartless cunning, as in the tales preserved in 25:27-34 and 27:1-40, but to the Lord's free choice of him (vss. 13-14). In this he is neither voicing his approval of Jacob's earlier conduct nor suggesting that the Lord approved of it. He is rather tacitly emptying the two older tales of their significance and so revealing his own inner feeling regarding them.

The E story, on the other hand, is traditional and reflects certain beliefs held at Bethel, beliefs in which E doubtless shared, for they were in no way inconsistent with his idea of the character of God and his ways with men.

10-15. Jacob's Dream.—Now it is from the vivid materials of the J and E traditions that the narrative is woven; and few passages in all the O.T. have equaled these six particular verses in their influence upon religious thought. Jacob's vision of the ladder and the angels—how numberless are the souls who have kindled at the thought of that! It echoes in Christian prayers and hymns. Philip Doddridge invokes the God of Bethel, by whose hand

Thy people still are fed.

One of the beautiful Negro spirituals goes, "We are climbing Jacob's ladder." And worshipers beyond counting have sung, and will sing, "Nearer, my God, to Thee," through which the wistful seeker after God identifies himself with "the wanderer," when, "the sun gone down," darkness was over him and his "rest a stone"; and from that background comes the prayer: -

Yet in my dreams I'd be Nearer, my God, to Thee, Nearer to Thee!

In the Genesis story Jacob was a wanderer; that is the first fact which makes his story so poignant for many a heart. Men and women often feel themselves in spiritual exile—not pilgrims, for there is no clear quest before their eyes; but just poor, lonely travelers through what often seems an empty land. They long for an experience like Jacob's, to show that in the most desolate place there can be a shin-

11 And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep.

ward Haran. 11 And he came to a certain place, and stayed there that night, because the sun had set. Taking one of the stones of the place, he put it under his head and lay down in that place to sleep. 12 And he dreamed that there was a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven; and behold, the angels of God were

11. The rendering a certain place does not preserve all the connotations of the Hebrew. The meaning is rather "the well-known place," "the place we are talking about," i.e., the sanctuary at Bethel. The word translated place also has the meaning "sanctuary."

The implication of the verse is thus that the place was already holy—according to Semitic ideas, a spot at which man could come into effective contact with the divine. Of this, however, Jacob knew nothing. He simply happened to stop there for the night, as Moses happened to stop at a holy place in the desert (Exod. 4:24-26).

Jacob slept, his head upon a stone he found there. This is probably a reference to a practice of incubation at Bethel in which dream oracles were sought by sleeping with the head against the sacred stone. The stone, later the ceremonial pillar of the sanctuary (cf. vs. 18), will have been of considerable size, which suggests an earlier form of the tradition in which the hero—whether Jacob or another figure—was a giant.

12. The ladder may call to mind the similar idea which underlies the story of the tower whose top was to reach to heaven, by means of which men hoped to approach the gods (11:1-9). Something of this kind would seem anciently to have been behind this story, though E, of course, intended no such suggestion. It has been conjectured that the image of the ladder was suggested by the "huge stones [which] seem to be piled one upon another to make columns nine or ten feet or more in height" (John P. Peters, Early Hebrew Story [New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1904], p. 111) near the summit of the slope north of the modern Beitin, the site of the ancient Bethel.

This verse and 32:1-2 are the only references in the Hexateuch to companies of angels. The angel of the Lord, or of God, in such passages as 16:7 and 21:17, is simply the representative of God, even God himself in self-manifestation. Indeed, it is probable that in an earlier form of these and similar stories it was the Lord, or God, himself who appeared. Later God was represented as sending one of his retinue to reveal his will. The idea of a numerous retinue, reflected here and in 32:1-2, is the product of men's deeper apprehension of the majesty of God to which they gave expression by depicting ing something which bridges the gap between earth and heaven so that henceforth all the horizons of hope and trust are lifted and enlarged. And the promise that lies in the story of Bethel becomes the more touching when it is remembered that Jacob was not only a wanderer, but a guilty and burdened and remorseful one. He had not deserved a vision of God. But he needed it; and all his life in his groping and unworthy way he had desired it. The reason he wanted the birthright was because he had at least an instinct for spiritual realities. The birthright did not mean inheritance of money; it meant the headship of the family in its covenant with God. He could not be content with the things of the flesh, as Esau was; and even when he was most guilty of the sins of earth, he knew that there was a higher Righteousness to which he was accountable. To such a man, unworthy but in a deep sense wistful, the vision came—and comes:

But (when so sad thou canst not sadder)
Cry;—and upon thy so sore loss
Shall shine the traffic of Jacob's ladder Pitched betwixt Heaven and Charing Cross.*

Thus it was in beauty and benediction that the vision came to Jacob. Notwithstanding all that he had done, communication between earth and heaven was not broken. The Lord God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac—the him as surrounded by a mysterious court, far greater than that of any earthly monarch. In view of these considerations it is probable that the E story, in the form in which it was originally told at Bethel, told not of angels but of gods ascending and descending the ladder.

God of his fathers and of all the inheritance of his home—was with him still, and would go with him on the way ahead. In that experience of Jacob is expressed what the Hebrew people felt about their whole contradictory history: in the midst of ignorance and evil there is still the possibility of a saving revelation. Even on the rocky slopes where Jacob was alone there rose the shining stairway that brought the heavenly glory, with angels going up like prayers of men to God and angels coming down like the grace of God to men. That vision epitomizes the whole wonder of the Hebrew faith and hope as they move on through the O.T. to their culmination in Christ.

16. God's Unexpected Presence.—Hear the surprise in Jacob's cry as he awakened from his sleep: Surely the LORD is in this place; and I knew it not. What less likely place and time—so it had seemed to him—could there be for God to manifest himself? He had come to one of the bleakest and most forbidding spots a man could have chanced upon. It was no pleasant meadow, no green oasis, no sheltered valley. It was a hilltop of barren rock; and its barrenness seemed to represent at that moment Jacob's claim on life. He was a fugitive, and he was afraid. His mother had told him to go off for "a few days," and then she would send and bring him home. But Jacob may have had a better idea of the truth: that it would be no "few days" but a long time of punishing exile before he could ever dare to return. There was good reason to feel that he was alone with emptiness. When he had lain down to sleep, he was a long way off from the place of his clever and successful schemes. There was nothing to measure his own little soul against except the silent and dreadful immensities he saw from the height of Bethel: the empty earth, the sky, the stars. Yet the strange fact was that there existed in Jacob's soul something to which God could speak (see Expos. on vs. 10-15). Unprepossessing though he was, he was capable of response to more than the things of flesh and sense. He had not despised or ignored his inheritance. He knew that it was faith in God that had given dignity to Abraham and Isaac, and he had a hunger—even if mixed with baseness—to get his own life into touch with God. When such a man is confronted in his solitariness with the sublimity of the hills and the awful mystery of the marching stars, he may be capable of great conceptions which begin to take shape in his subconscious. In his dreams he sees not only nature, but the gates of heaven. Yet how many there are who fall short of Jacob in this—men in whom solitariness produces nothing, who fall asleep but will not dream, who when they are forced to be alone are either bored or frightened. Out of the aloneness they dread they get nothing, because they have not kept the seed of religion that in their hour of need and crisis might have quickened in their souls.

17 And he was afraid, and said, How dreadful is this place! this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven.

I did not know it." 17 And he was afraid, and said, "How awesome is this place! This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven."

17. Jacob's emotion upon waking from his dream—awoke from his sleep in vs. 16 is from the J recension—is one of awe, and he utters the name of the place bēth-'ēl, house of God.

17. Reverence as the Root of Religion.—In the words here written Jacob expresses a realization in which he was the representative of what made the Hebrew people great. To him, and to them, there could be a gate of heaven, because in the first place there was a heaven. To the Hebrew mind this world was never all: something vaster overarched it. The supernatural enfolded the natural, and the numinous was as real as everyday events. The existence of this other world might seem dreadful; the emotion it first produced might be awe, and even fear. But it was never despised and seldom forgotten or ignored. So there was always an element of nobility in the Hebrew character and in Hebrew history, because there was reverence before an Eternal One who was increasingly recognized as just and holy. However forgetful, rebellious, or unworthy men might be, they could never be irresponsible, because they were conscious of an authority high and lifted up which it was their destiny to obey. Life could not be aimless, because there was a star of truth to steer by; nor small and mean, because there were infinite horizons. The reason the Bible is in a class apart from other ancient history is because through all its human record there is this overtone of reference to the reality of the divine; and the reason why the Jews have lasted while other ancient peoples perished is because this tenacity of faith gave them endless fortitude.

What does this fact suggest, by contrast, concerning nations of today? Consider the perilous secularism which is exhibited too often in contemporary "culture," and particularly in the relatively rich United States: the smug assumption that prosperity is natural; the belief that "money talks"; the lax standards in "society"; the everlasting "Let's have a drink"; the obsession with sex in books, plays, and movies, and the exploitation of it in advertisements to commercialize suggestiveness; the cheap ridicule of self-control and chastity among the young. What clear code of conduct is there? What recognition of principle, so firm and commanding that violation of it would be counted as dishonor? If history means anything, it is certain that a nation which is not conscious of standing at the gate of any heaven, and lifts its eyes no higher than the level of its impulse, is moving toward disintegration. Subject to none of the great imperatives reflected in the Bible, its life becomes cheap and flabby.

There is no beginning, no movement, no peace and no end
But noise without speech, food without taste.

And the wind shall say: "Here were decent godless people:
Their only monument the asphalt road
And a thousand lost golf balls."*

17. Religious Dread.—When Jacob woke from his vision and felt that he had stood at the gate of heaven, there was first the sense of wonder and thanksgiving at the revelation of God's mercy; but then there swept over him an overwhelming awe. How dreadful is this place! he cried. When a man is made to know that God has not forgotten him, even though he has been a moral failure, there is the moment of rapturous exaltation such as Jacob had when he saw the shining ladder and the angels; but when he remembers the holiness of God, he turns his face away from its intolerable light. The vision must be more than the immediate emotion: it calls him to account. Who can contemplate the distance between himself and God, even when the angels of God's forgiveness throw a bridge across it, and not bow down in agonized unworthiness? So it was with Jacob. The consciousness of guilt in him made him shrink from the revelation of God even when he craved it. He had done wrong, and he was trying to escape its consequences. His brother's anger was formidable enough; but there was something more formidable which he wanted to forget but which confronted him. His conscience was shocked into the certainty that he could not get away from God. The dread of that perception was on him now. Before he could ever be at peace with himself and with his world, he would have to come to grips with the facts of his past experience—and with the invisible power of the righteousness he had violated—and wrestle with 18 And Jacob rose up early in the morning, and took the stone that he had put for his pillows, and set it up for a pillar, and poured oil upon the top of it.

18 So Jacob rose early in the morning, and he took the stone which he had put under his head and set it up for a pillar

18. Maççēbhāh, pillar, is the technical name of the sacred monolith which stood, apparently, in every Canaanite sanctuary. Originally the supposed abode of the deity—there are traces of this idea here, cf. vs. 22—these came to be regarded as symbols of the Lord's presence. By a later refinement they became memorials of some theophany or other important event, and this is the meaning E always attaches to them (31:13, 45; 33:20, as emended, see below; 35:14; Exod. 24:4; cf. Josh. 24:26). J never mentions them them for his life, as he would one day at Peniel. It was well for Jacob that his awareness of God did not end with the vision of the ladder, but went on to realize the purification through which he must go before he could take the blessings which the angels of the ladder might bring to him. For Jacob, and for all men, there can be no flippant self-assurance. In relation to their sins the inexorable love of God must first seem dreadful before it can be redeeming.

18. The Primitive in Religion.—When Jacob took the stone on which he had pillowed his head and set it up as a sacred thing, he followed an impulse which is as old and deep as man's religious consciousness. When a man has had a spiritual experience it is natural for him to think that the place where he had it and the thing associated with it are in themselves holy. He wants to make a shrine at which the particular experience he has had may be not only remembered but repeated. The danger is that afterward the shrine may represent not a repetition of the real experience, but only a superstition. In Canaan and among the early Hebrews the land was dotted with shrines made sacred because some natural object had laid its spell upon imagination and created a sense of the supernatural: some huge old oak, a cave, a rock, a well. Consider the later history of the O.T., with its long conflict between the prophets and the stubborn crudities and corruptions that characterized the "high places" and the sacred groves. Once those hilltops and the darkness of those forests had been the sign to men of Something greater than themselves; now they had sunk to be excuses for what was most undeveloped and unmoral in themselves. A localized God could be satisfied with localized honors; prayers and sacrifices at the shrines were the worshiper's obligation, but with these his obligation ended. When he wanted to worship, he must go back and perform the proper ritual where the divine was supposed to dwell. Think of the woman of Samaria and her belligerent assertion that "our fathers worshiped on this mountain" (John 4:20). Reflect upon the way in which primitive religion survives in modified but still recognizable forms: in the strange dark carry-over from plain paganism which has turned a black image of ancient Mexico into the Virgin of Guadalupe; in the unreasoning attachment to particular customs and conditions simply because they are traditional; in the preservation of relics, "a fragment of the true cross," the "holy blood," a bone of some dead saint—in which material thing a supernatural healing and sanctifying power is supposed to dwell; in the crowd contagion raised by some excited vision and reported miracle which turns the grotto at Lourdes into a shrine to which streams of pilgrims come, convinced that the Virgin Mary visibly appeared there and in miraculous presence dwells there now. The danger of localized religion is that it so emphasizes locality and related ritual that religion drifts back toward the shadowland of magic.

18. Consecrating the Commonplace.—It would be well to read Hubert L. Simpson's Altars of Earth in connection with this passage. His thesis is that the altars of men's approach to God are built upon our common ground. He is referring primarily to Exod. 20:24, "An altar of earth thou shalt make unto me." He writes:

The essential characteristic of all spiritual worship is that it should spring out of a sense of man's weakness [and be thus] an altar of earth, raised from the dust of the ground to which the mortal part of man bears kin, and yet smoking with the flame of imperishable things.

And of this altar raised by Jacob from the loose stones, he writes:

Let permanence, if you will, be an element in the expression of your religious experience, so far as you are able to secure it; but above all let the predominant characteristic be simplicity and immediacy. The stones at Bethel, the boulders from the river-bed at the crossing of Jordan; to-day's temptation, to-day's trouble, to-day's triumph—through these things we rise to God.¹

except in connection with Canaanitish worship (Exod. 34:13). The polemic of Deuteronomy against them, however, indicates that E was in advance of his time and that they still retained their idolatrous associations in the popular mind.

"Immediacy" and "simplicity"—those are good key words. A man's contact with God can begin wherever he is and whenever his need reaches up to find the heavenly answer. Abraham lived in tents, pitching them here today and there tomorrow, but it was never as though he had left God behind. Moses found God in the desert before the burning bush. Gideon had his call to God's service when he was threshing wheat. The first disciples were called by Jesus from their fishing boats. And that blessedly unpretentious saint, Brother Lawrence, who was a cook in a monastery kitchen, declared: "It is not necessary for being with God to be always at church. We may make an oratory of our heart wherein to retire from time to time to converse with Him in meekness, humility and love."² It was observed of him "that in the greatest hurry of business in the kitchen he still preserved his recollection and heavenly-mindedness"; for, said he: "The time of business does not with me differ from the time of prayer, and in the noise and clatter of my kitchen, while several persons are at the same time calling for different things, I possess God in as great tranquility as if I were upon my knees at the Blessed Sacrament."³

With immediacy, simplicity. Always there is danger that real religion may be lost in the complexity of its forms. What begins as a living spring of spiritual experience may lose its freshness in the elaborate reservoirs which men may think they must establish to contain its waters. So the inspiration of the great pioneers of Israel was choked in the intricate channels of the law. So the quickening message of the prophets was turned into the ornate ritual of the temple, and what had been a surge of the spirit slowed into a ceremonial form. Remember what Amos found at Bethel; and what Jesus said as he saw the way the priests and Pharisees made much of ostentatious worship, but inwardly gave no glory to God. They needed—he told them—to recall what Hosea had said long before, "I desired mercy, and not sacrifice; and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings" (Hos. 6:6).

churches that real religion, which is the swift and simple impulse of the heart, may be smothered by elaborations which are supposed to lead men to God, but instead may only hide him? Great architecture, beautiful music, art and color, may ennoble worship, but they may also become an overpowering obsession that leads to nothing beyond itself. Who has not seen congregations that are less interested in drawing near to God than they are in drawing up plans for a more elegant church building; that will raise money enthusiastically for a new steeple or for tiles and marble and stained glass, but have not put their heart into raising their own life and the life of their communities closer to the purposes of Christ? "The pure in heart shall see God." However much more those words may mean, they surely mean this: only those who have kept unspoiled the simplicity of their desire for God can perceive how and where he comes into life.

19. The New Name.—This note about the names of the place may seem on the surface only a passing matter of nomenclature. People in the region near which Jacob had his vision would have said that they lived at Luz; but afterward the name Jacob gave to the spot which had become for him a shrine overshadowed that earlier routine name. In the tradition which came down from Jacob, this neighborhood was no longer merely what men had called it; it was what God had made it. Bethel means The house of God. So the whole suggestion widens. One's imagination dwells upon the fact that frequently in the O.T., and in history generally, a place which originally was ordinary has become exalted because some great spiritual experience was associated with it. Jerusalem was at first only the rocky hilltop where Araunah the Jebusite had his threshing floor, but after the temple had been built there it became the Holy City which should be the symbol of God's presence on the earth. One undistinguished house in that same city, that of John Mark's mother, if it existed today, would be as a shrine of the Holy Grail, because the Last Supper was held in its upper room. And less likely places have become for the moment a house of God. Paul made the prison at Philippi into such when he and Silas

20. It is unlikely that this and the two following verses belong to the old story; they are rather from E himself, to effect a transition to the story of Jacob and Laban. The bargaining tone of the vow may be a subtle indication of what E thought of Jacob's character as it had hitherto developed.

21. The LORD shall be my God cannot be from E, who does not use the LORD before Exod. 3:14-15, and in any case could not have represented Jacob as going as far as this in dictating his terms of service. It is either an explanatory—and somewhat erroneous—gloss on vs. 22a or, less likely, an insertion by RJE.

"prayed, and sang praises unto God" (Acts 16:25). So did John Bunyan, writing The Pilgrim's Progress, transform Bedford jail. Everywhere it is possible for a Luz to become a Bethel. There is a story of two simple folk who lived in a fisherman's cottage in a little village by the sea. When the man came home at the end of a day, his wife said to him, "The new minister came here today, and he asked a question I couldn't answer." "What did he ask?" "He asked me," said she, "Does Jesus Christ live here?" "And what did you say?" the husband demanded. "I didn't know what to say." "Well, why couldn't you tell him that we are respectable people?" "But he didn't ask me that." "Well, why didn't you tell him we go to church when we feel like it?" "But he didn't ask me that either." "Then you could have told him that we read the Bible—sometimes." "But he didn't ask me that. What he asked me was 'Does Jesus Christ live here?'" It is a question which goes far. In what home or place of daily business are those who dwell there desiring to make it a Bethel, the house of God?

20-22. Conceptions of Prayer.—What Jacob prays is certainly not an inspiring prayer, or even a creditable one. No wonder the man who made it stands at that moment as an unattractive figure. Jacob has just deceived his father and defrauded his brother, and in fear of Esau's anger all he can do is guiltily to run away. He has had his dream of the ladder of angels that reminded him of God. Yet now the only thing it suggests to him is that perhaps he can persuade God to make a bargain by offering to do great things—on condition. If God will save his skin and also make him prosperous, then he will give back to God a tenth of what God may have given him. A cheap prayer, if ever there was one! Yet how sure are we that we have outgrown it—or even come up all the little way to Jacob's level? Are there none so shallow as to think that all they need to do is to pay God lip service, hoping in return to claim rich benefits; to say, as Jacob did, then shall the LORD be my God, but never feel obliged to bring back even 1 per cent, much less 10 per cent as Jacob promised, of God's blessings to the service of God?

In what Jacob said there is much room for reflection on the meaning of prayer. Here is an expression of religious primitiveness, a primitiveness not surprising in the record of early times, but all too often repeated in the religion of a generation remaining infantile even though it is supposed to be adult. The first instincts of human nature have to do with the material and tangible—the physical instincts to keep alive and be comfortable. God is the Power off somewhere who controls what we want and do not have, who might give it to us if we can make him well disposed. If we can contrive what he likes, perhaps he will answer with what we like. That is the primitive idea—an idea no less primitive when it is found in modern sophistication, as in the paltry religious approaches of men who think they can treat the majesty of God as they might treat—in Harry Emerson Fosdick's vivid phrase—"a cosmic bell-hop" who can be persuaded by a tip.

From this crude idea, as symbolized in the prayer of Jacob, we may follow in the Bible the growing consciousness of the meaning of prayer. First there is the expanding recognition of what God is: the Spirit of truth and holiness, and of deep-reaching as well as far-reaching mercy. He is the source from which comes indeed the answer to our everyday needs: life itself, sustenance and safety, daily bread, the

22. The initial and belongs with the preceding clause. This being eliminated, the terms of Jacob's vow are that if God protects him then Bethel will be a sanctuary and the stone its pillar. The second half of the verse is secondary, as the change to the second person indicates. It claims that the custom of tithing at Bethel also originated with Jacob.

23. In view of the antagonism which E shows elsewhere in his narrative toward the Aaronite priesthood of Bethel (cf. Smend, Erzählung des Hexateuch, pp. 354, 358-59), and of the fact that the inaugural legend of the cult of the golden calf appears to have attributed the founding of that sanctuary to Aaron (Exod. 32:1-6; Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 625-26), the question presents itself as to what sanctuary it was that E was referring to in this story.

It may be noted that the location of the sanctuary at Bethel referred to in 12:8 is somewhat carefully defined. The verse 12:8 is from the J document. As to whether its present form is that in which it left the hand of J¹ or J², or whether it has been elaborated by a later hand—cf. also the labored attempt to define the location of the place in the redactional 13:4—it is impossible to say. In any case it would seem to represent an attempt to distinguish between sanctuary and sanctuary at Bethel, a fact which may be relevant here.

materials for the clothes we wear, the houses we live in, the tools for an existence more abundant. But these are only the beginning of what he is and what he has to offer. He is the One to whom men turn to

He is the creator not only of men's bodies but of their souls; and his nature and purpose are understood only when men remember this. See in the psalms and in the prophets the recognition of God as the High and Holy One, to be approached with awe and reverence and adoring wonder. There is also the corresponding development in men's recognition of what they themselves are meant to be. Since God has created them not only as bodies but as souls, it is in their souls supremely that they must grow. This awareness too can be traced all through the O.T. as it expands. The great voices in Israel go a long way beyond bargaining or the desire only for earthly benefits. They cry out for purity of heart, for the spirit of holiness, for attunement of man's will to the redeeming will of God. See this at least emerging in the prayer of Solomon (I Kings 3) who confesses, "I am but a little child; I know not how to go out or come in"; and who pleads therefore for "a wise and an understanding heart." Read Jer. 1; Ps. 51.

⁴Martin Rinkart, tr. Catherine Winkworth, "Now thank we all our God."

So gradually there comes the perception that prayer is the relationship between the best that man has discovered in himself and the infinite goodness of God. Prayer then no longer moves on the level of small preoccupations. It can put the petition for the needs of the body into one swift phrase, as Jesus put it in the Lord's Prayer, and leave it there with trustfulness; and then look up and on to larger matters—to God's cleansing mercy for the soul's faults and his strength for the soul's purposes, to loyalty to his kingdom and its coming. Not anything that comes from God, but God himself, is the concern of prayer at its highest. "Man's chief end is to glorify God, and to enjoy him forever." Think of Jesus. Meditate upon the message which comes from the words of innumerable great souls, both among the mystics and among the militant saints—a message expressed anew by a contemporary exponent of the mystical life, Thomas R. Kelly:

There is . . . no need for fret when faithfully turning to Him, if He leads us but slowly into His secret chambers. If He gives us increasing steadiness in the deeper sense of His Presence, we can only quietly thank Him. If He holds us in the stage of alternation we can thank Him for His loving wisdom, and wait upon His guidance through the stages for which we are prepared. . . . Here is not ecstasy but serenity, unshakableness, firmness of life-orientation. We are become what Fox calls "established men."⁵

XXXVIII. JACOB AT PADDAN-ARAM (29:1-31:55)

The fact that the J¹ document, which embodies the tradition of the south, claims Jacob as one of the ancestors of the group that centered at Hebron indicates that there was some close connection between that group and the clans east of the Jordan. It is only reasonable to assume that Jacob, himself an east Jordan figure (cf. Exeg. on 25:26), was first adopted as an ancestor by the eastern clans and, indeed, that it was pressure from the east which led to his incorporation into the southern tradition.

The E story of Bethel, together with the association of Jacob with the Ephrathite figure Rachel (see Exeg. on 29:1-14) and with the Shechemite figure Joseph (see Exeg. on 29:1-14; ch. 37), would seem to indicate that he was similarly and independently adopted by the northern tribes.

A. JACOB'S MEETING WITH RACHEL (29:1-14)

29:1-14. The nucleus of this story is from J¹. It told how Jacob met Rachel, the daughter of Laban, at a well in the land of the people of the east (vs. 1), i.e., in the north Arabian desert. It seems probable that the east Jordan figure Jacob had been associated with Laban, the representative of the nomad Aramaeans, before he was brought into the southern tradition, which J¹ systematized and reduced to writing, for the contact with the Aramaeans which this story reflects would naturally have been established in the first instance by the clans east of the Jordan, which had first claimed Jacob as their ancestor. It also seems probable that Jacob's association with Rachel antedated his incorporation into the tradition of the south.

Rachel appears to have been in origin the central figure in the tradition of Ephrath in Benjamin, the site of her sepulcher (35:19, in which "that is, Bethlehem" is a gloss; cf. I Sam. 10:2). The fact that a pillar (cf. Exeg. on 28:18) stood beside the sepulcher (35:20) indicates that it was a sanctuary of which, it may be inferred, Rachel was the patron saint—possibly of totemistic origin, for Rachel means "ewe."

It is this Ephrathite figure who fills the role of the mother of Joseph (30:23-24) in the J¹ tradition—and in J² and E. Joseph was, as will be seen, a figure in the tradition of Shechem, the site of his grave (Josh. 24:32). It is unlikely that this association of these two figures was the work of the southerner, J¹. It seems rather to be the result of a process of unification which had begun in the north, similar to that going on in the south.

Now it has been noted in connection with the Exeg. of 28:10-22 that the appearance of Jacob in the role of the founder of the sanctuary at Bethel points to a fusing of the

Thus the true prayer ends in dedication. It has passed beyond the controlling thought, like Jacob's, of what a man can get; for, having been in touch with God, it has caught the joy of wondering what one can give. No man can commune with the love of God without becoming more loving. Read the epistles of John. Reflect upon what Paul learned of God from his Master. See in his letters, as at the end of Romans, what he knew and wanted all Christians to understand of that dedication in service by which men present their whole selves as a "living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God" (Rom. 12:1).

29:1-11, 18, 20. Jacob: Another Aspect.—Jacob at first was not attractive, but in the glimpses of him here he is revealed in a brighter light. Of the two brothers, Esau had appeared as the virile one. Beside Esau's outdoor energies and his swift, bold strength, Jacob seemed passive large, 3 and when all the flocks were gathered there, the shepherds would roll the stone from the mouth of the well, and water the sheep, and put the stone back in its place upon the mouth of the well.

4 Jacob said to them, "My brothers, where do you come from?" They said, "We are from Haran." 5 He said to them, "Do you know Laban the son of Nahor?" They said, "We know him." 6 He said to them, "Is it well with him?" They said, "It is well; and see, Rachel his daughter is coming with the sheep!" 7 He said, "Behold, it is still high day, it is not time for the animals to be gathered together; water the sheep, and go, pasture them." 8 But they said, "We cannot until all the flocks are gathered together, and the stone is rolled from the mouth of the well; then we water the sheep."

tradition of the north with that of the land east of the Jordan, quite independent of the movement by which Jacob had been taken into the tradition of the south. Jacob had, so to speak, moved in two directions—south to Hebron and west to Bethel and Shechem, where he had become the father of Joseph and the husband of the Ephrathite Rachel.

In this story J¹ dramatizes Jacob's association with Rachel, making use of one of the favorite motifs current among nomad shepherds, that of the meeting at a well (cf. 24:11-23; Exod. 2:15-21; also the reference to the gatherings at the "places of drawing water" [Judg. 5:11]).

Jacob, in the desert, came to a well covered with a stone, so great that it took a number of men to move it, thus ensuring that no one person would be able to take more than his fair share of the precious water. He found some shepherds with their flocks (vss. 2-3) and asked them why they were loitering there. He was told that they had to wait for enough men to gather to move the stone (vss. 7-8)—in vs. 8 "shepherds" and pale. But now in the new country he is anything but that. A great stone was over the well where the sheep were watered, and the men who were there were waiting for other shepherds to come and help them roll it aside; but Jacob went and rolled it aside himself. Why? Because he had met Rachel; and in contact with Rachel, Jacob from the first moment was a different man. He kissed her first as his kinswoman, but quickly he fell in love with her. He said to Laban, her father, that he would serve seven years for her; and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her. In the light of words like these, Jacob's remoteness in time and place passes like a shadow, and he is at one with all lovers of every age in the timeless wonder of the meeting of man and maid. Moreover, Jacob showed himself to be an individual to a degree that was notable in that period when family pressure was generally so controlling. His father, Isaac, had had his bride picked out for him. Laban tried to foist upon Jacob the daughter he wanted Jacob to take; but in spite of that deception, Jacob would not be turned from the girl to whom his heart went out. He served for her not only the first seven years of his agreement, but seven years more; and Rachel was henceforth the center of his life's devotion. In the whole story of his career, which sometimes was far from beautiful, this relationship with Rachel shines like a shaft of sunlight, sifting with a lovely radiance through a broken, cloudy sky.

4-6, 12-14. Welcome from One's Own.—"Blood is thicker than water" is not an ancient phrase, but the fact which it seeks to express

9 ¶ And while he yet spake with them, Rachel came with her father's sheep: for she kept them.

10 And it came to pass, when Jacob saw Rachel the daughter of Laban his mother's brother, and the sheep of Laban his mother's brother, that Jacob went near, and rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the flock of Laban his mother's brother.

11 And Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice, and wept.

12 And Jacob told Rachel that he was her father's brother, and that he was Rebekah's son: and she ran and told her father.

13 And it came to pass, when Laban heard the tidings of Jacob his sister's son, that he ran to meet him, and embraced him, and kissed him, and brought him to his house. And he told Laban all these things.

14 And Laban said to him, Surely thou art my bone and my flesh. And he abode with him the space of a month.

9 While he was still speaking with them, Rachel came with her father's sheep; for she kept them. 10 Now when Jacob saw Rachel the daughter of Laban his mother's brother, and the sheep of Laban his mother's brother, Jacob went up and rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the flock of Laban his mother's brother. 11 Then Jacob kissed Rachel, and wept aloud. 12 And Jacob told Rachel that he was her father's kinsman, and that he was Rebekah's son; and she ran and told her father.

13 When Laban heard the tidings of Jacob his sister's son, he ran to meet him, and embraced him and kissed him, and brought him to his house. Jacob told Laban all these things, 14 and Laban said to him, "Surely you are my bone and my flesh!" And he stayed with him a month.

must be read for flocks with the LXX and the Syriac. At this moment Rachel appeared with her father's sheep (vs. 9), whereupon Jacob himself, without assistance, removed the stone for her and watered her flock (vs. 10). He then told Rachel who he was and she ran to tell her father, who came and welcomed him (vss. 12-13). Jacob then remained with him for a month (vs. 14b).

This was the J¹ version of the story and it was not too skillfully related to its context, for it does not explain how Jacob, fresh from Beer-sheba, recognized Rachel. It was to correct this that J², a more finished writer than J¹, inserted vss. 5-6. That these verses are secondary is suggested by the fact that vs. 6b anticipates vs. 9; furthermore, Jacob's speech in vs. 7 not only is an awkward reply to vs. 6b, but would come better as the first remark of an enterprising young man to a group of seemingly idle shepherds. J² also inserted vs. 4, to locate Laban at Haran (cf. 24:10-11). It should be noted, however, that the well described here is certainly not that of the tale in ch. 24.

J² is further responsible for the three references to Laban as his mother's brother in vs. 10, and for the words and that he was Rebekah's son in vs. 12; i.e., according to J¹, who never mentions the name of Rebekah, Jacob's relationship with Laban was through Abraham only, not through his mother (cf. kinsman in vs. 12 [RSV]; this is lit., brother [KJV], but the word bears another meaning than that which it has in vss. 10-11—suggesting diversity of authorship). In vs. 13 his sister's son is also from J², as is vs. 14a.

And embraced him and kissed him (vs. 13) is all that is left of the E account of Jacob's arrival at Laban's.

The stage is now set for the story of Jacob's marriage. It should, however, be noted that in neither J¹, J², nor E is it stated that Jacob had gone to the east for the purpose of marrying Laban's daughters. This feature appears only in P (28:1-5). J² and E both represent Jacob as fleeing from Esau (27:41-44), while J¹ leaves the journey quite unmotivated. But there can be no doubt that both J² and E, though perhaps not J¹, intended to imply that the course of events was determined by the guiding hand of God.

15 ¶ And Laban said unto Jacob, Because thou art my brother, shouldest thou therefore serve me for nought? tell me, what shall thy wages be?

15 Then Laban said to Jacob, "Because you are my kinsman, should you therefore serve me for nothing? Tell me, what shall

The purity of Israelite blood was being divinely preserved. This should not be taken as indication of racism. Desert blood stands for desert values (cf. Exeg. on ch. 24)—the values of Yahwism—which, these authors are concerned to insist, are and must remain dominant in Israel's religion and culture.

B. JACOB'S MARRIAGES (29:15-30)

This section is from E, except vss. 24, 26, 28b, and 29. Vss. 24, 28b, and 29 are from P—all that remains of his matter-of-fact notice of Jacob's marriages, which presumably followed on 28:9; cf. 28:5, according to which Jacob had already arrived at Paddan-aram.

Vs. 26 is from J, probably J¹. It should be noted that Laban's words here have a certain dignity not altogether suitable in their present setting. This suggests that they were originally not a defense—somewhat irrelevant—against Jacob's arraignment of him for his duplicity, but rather a simple reply to Jacob's request for the hand of his younger daughter, It is not so done in our country, to give the younger before the first-born.

From this, and from the fact that there is no trace of J elsewhere in vss. 15-30, it may reasonably be inferred that neither J¹ nor J² knew anything of Jacob's serving fourteen years for his two wives. (Cf. Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse, pp. 262*-63*. It should be noted, however, that Eissfeldt, postulating three independent pre-Deuteronomiac narratives [see article "The Growth of the Hexateuch," p. 192], maintains that it was only the first of them—his L document—which placed Jacob's marriages early. On this see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 99-100, 592-93.) Instead they represented Jacob's marriages as occurring shortly after his arrival at Laban's. Their chronology accordingly differed considerably from that of E, a fact which the J material in ch. 34 and certain features in the Joseph story (see Exeg. on 37:3; also on chs. 42-44), in any case, suggest.

In support of this reconstruction a further point is to be noted: the unlikelihood of either J¹, the exponent of the southern tradition, or of J², whose sympathies lay in the south, representing Leah, the mother of the southern tribes, as having been foisted off on Jacob by fraud. This story of Laban's deception of Jacob is thus a northern tradition, developed over the years, to explain why it was that Rachel, the "mother" of the powerful Joseph tribes, was not Jacob's first wife but his second. It was because Jacob had been tricked by his father-in-law; his love was given to Rachel and he served is as old as the heart of man. There is the everlasting impulse to find security, and to feel the warmth of it, within the circle of those to whom one belongs by birth and blood, within the tribe, the clan, the family. At the end of his lonely journey Jacob's heart leaped up to know that he had come to his kinsmen. When he first met Rachel and told her who he was, she ran and told her father. And . . . Laban . . . ran to meet him, . . . and kissed him, and brought him to his house. Association with Laban was to prove later on to have its drawbacks, but Jacob did not know it then. What he did know, and what Laban also knew, was that kinship meant hospitality. When a man came to his own people, he was coming home. Human life would be a chilled and lonely thing if that were not true—if, instead, every individual had to shift utterly for himself, and never know that there are those with whom he has a oneness that can make him sure of welcome. As Robert Frost has put it:

Home is the place where, when you have to go there,
They have to take you in. I should have called it Something you somehow haven't to deserve.*

16 And Laban had two daughters: the name of the elder was Leah, and the name of the younger was Rachel.

17 Leah was tender eyed; but Rachel was beautiful and well-favored.

18 And Jacob loved Rachel; and said, I will serve thee seven years for Rachel thy younger daughter.

19 And Laban said, It is better that I give her to thee, than that I should give her to another man: abide with me.

20 And Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her.

21 ¶ And Jacob said unto Laban, Give me my wife, for my days are fulfilled, that I may go in unto her.

22 And Laban gathered together all the men of the place, and made a feast.

23 And it came to pass in the evening, that he took Leah his daughter, and brought her to him; and he went in unto her.

24 And Laban gave unto his daughter Leah Zilpah his maid for a handmaid.

25 And it came to pass, that in the morning, behold, it was Leah: and he said to Laban, What is this thou hast done unto me? did not I serve with thee for Rachel? wherefore then hast thou beguiled me?

your wages be?" 16 Now Laban had two daughters; the name of the older was Leah, and the name of the younger was Rachel.

17 Leah's eyes were weak, but Rachel was beautiful and lovely. 18 Jacob loved Rachel; and he said, "I will serve you seven years for your younger daughter Rachel." 19 Laban said, "It is better that I give her to you than that I should give her to any other man; stay with me." 20 So Jacob served seven years for Rachel, and they seemed to him but a few days because of the love he had for her.

21 Then Jacob said to Laban, "Give me my wife that I may go in to her, for my time is completed." 22 So Laban gathered together all the men of the place, and made a feast. 23 But in the evening he took his daughter Leah and brought her to Jacob; and he went in to her. 24 (Laban gave his maid Zilpah to his daughter Leah to be her maid.) 25 And in the morning, behold, it was Leah; and Jacob said to Laban, "What is this you have done to me? Did I not serve with you for Rachel? Why then have seven years for her, and then the crafty Laban had substituted weak-eyed, unattractive Leah for her beautiful younger sister. Rachel was really Jacob's first choice.

16. The fact that Rachel is here introduced as for the first time indicates that E retained nothing of the story in vs. 1-12. It has been suggested above that the association of Rachel with the Aramaean figure Laban is the result of the interaction between the northern and east Jordan Israelite traditions. Leah's position as Laban's daughter seems to be a reflex of this, for Leah appears to have been first the traditional mother of the tribe of Simeon—and possibly of Levi. When Simeon came to be reckoned as a son of Jacob, his mother of necessity came to be regarded as Jacob's wife. The fact that the pre-exilic tradition nowhere mentions her grave is a slight indication that she was not a Palestinian figure, and furnishes support of Meyer's suggestion (Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, pp. 426-27; cf. Simpson, op. cit., pp. 465-66) that she originated in the desert, far to the south. The meaning of her name, "wild cow," points to a totemistic milieu. (P, indeed, records that she was buried in the cave of Machpelah [49:31]. It is unlikely, however, that he is preserving an authentic tradition. For P, the cave of Machpelah was the sepulcher of all the patriarchs, and he deliberately set aside, as will be seen [50:11-13], the earlier tradition that Jacob had been buried east of the Jordan.)

18. The custom of serving for a bride was known among the ancient Arabs, and was still met with in recent times (John Lewis Burckhardt, Travels in Syria and the Holy Land [London: John Murray, 1822], pp. 297-98).

23. The deception was possible because of the custom of bringing the bride to the bridegroom veiled (cf. 24:65).

26 And Laban said, It must not be so done in our country, to give the younger before the firstborn.

27 Fulfil her week, and we will give thee this also for the service which thou shalt serve with me yet seven other years.

28 And Jacob did so, and fulfilled her week: and he gave him Rachel his daughter to wife also.

29 And Laban gave to Rachel his daughter Bilhah his handmaid to be her maid.

30 And he went in also unto Rachel, and he loved also Rachel more than Leah, and served with him yet seven other years.

31 ¶ And when the LORD saw that Leah was hated, he opened her womb: but Rachel was barren.

you deceived me?" 26 Laban said, "It is not so done in our country, to give the younger before the first-born. 27 Complete the week of this one, and we will give you the other also in return for serving me another seven years." 28 Jacob did so, and completed her week; then Laban gave him his daughter Rachel to wife. 29 (Laban gave his maid Bilhah to his daughter Rachel to be her maid.) 30 So Jacob went in to Rachel also, and he loved Rachel more than Leah, and served Laban for another seven years.

31 When the LORD saw that Leah was hated, he opened her womb; but Rachel

C. JACOB'S FAMILY (29:31-30:24)

This section is a conflation of J and E, with some minor additions by RP. P apparently had no equivalent birth chronicle but was content simply to list the sons of Jacob (35:22b-26). J¹ recorded the births of five sons only: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, sons of Leah; and Joseph, the son of Rachel. To these he added Dinah, preparing for the story in ch. 34. The J¹ material in the section is thus contained in 29:31-35; 30:21-24.

Reuben's position as first-born seems to have been due to the fact that the east Jordan tribe bearing this name had been the first to claim Jacob as ancestor; there is no historical evidence that it ever held a position of leadership among the other tribes (cf. Judg. 5:15b-16).

Simeon appears as the second son, possibly because Leah had been reckoned as his mother before coming to fill that role for the other clans (cf. Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, pp. 426-27).

Levi is represented as the third son. When J¹ wrote, he was regarded as the ancestor of the Levitical priesthood (cf. Deut. 33:8-11) centering at Hebron. There is evidence (49:5-7; cf. also ch. 34), however, of the one-time existence of a secular tribe of Levi which had, as a result of some violence, been so nearly exterminated (49:7b) that only

26. Tradition.—The words of Laban find their echo in every century. They are what conservatism always says. It must not be so done in our country. New ideas, new choices, are taboo; if something has not been before, it is not to be now. There is value in that. Long established customs are not likely to have grown up without reason. Instead, they represent the slowly matured consciousness of a social group as to what gives soundness to the general life. To challenge such conviction may invite deserved rebuke. In Great Britain, where the accepted code of morals and manners has a sturdiness which often seems unique, the person who inclines to violate it may not be met with any expostulating argument but be told, "It simply is not done." There does come a point, however, when that is not a sufficient answer. Some customs need to be challenged and changed. The instinct of the individual may perceive that what was meant to be a benefit, and long had seemed so, has become a bondage of the spirit. When Laban asserted that Jacob must marry Leah whether he wanted to or not, because it was the custom that the older daughter should be married first, Jacob protested in every way he could. No matter what sanction the custom had, he knew that a more vital reality for him its priesthood survived. The close association of this tribe with Simeon—note “Simeon and Levi are brothers” (49:5)—may well account for Levi’s position in the list.

Judah, the fourth son, was the eponym of the most powerful group in the south which was, even when J¹ wrote, in process of welding together certain other groups, such as the Simeonites, who had shared in the disaster which decimated Levi (49:7b; ibid., p. 411), the Jerahmeelites, and the Kenites (I Sam. 27:10; 30:29), to form with it the tribe of Judah.

The fact that the grave of Joseph—the first and only son of Rachel in J¹—was one of the ancient monuments at Shechem (33:19; cf. Josh. 24:32) suggests that he was in origin a Shechemite figure, who had come to be regarded as their ancestor by the northern tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (see Exeg. on 29:1-14; also on ch. 48), which formed “the house of Joseph” (Judg. 1:22).

J¹’s chronicle is thus a schematization in genealogical terms of the relationships of those tribes which were known to him—the southern group, the east Jordan Reuben, and the house of Joseph. The representation of Reuben as a son of Leah, despite the fact that historically the tribe appears to have been a member, however inactive, of the northern confederacy (Judg. 5:15b-16), suggests that it was culturally closely connected with the south—as indeed J¹’s familiarity with legends rooted east of the Jordan further indicates (cf. 32:24-31; also Judg. 8:4-21; 11:34-39, both of which belong to the earliest stratum of J).

J² knew of seven other tribes. Of these, Issachar and Zebulun were apparently regarded as of pure Israelite stock, and their eponyms were reckoned as sons of Leah (cf. 30:17-20). This is basically E, but the inclusion in it of a fragment from J² (vs. 20aβyb), and the clear allusion to the birth of Issachar in vs. 16αγ, indicate that there was a parallel in J². The tribes of Dan, Naphtali, Gad, and Asher, on the other hand, seem to have been of mixed origin; accordingly, the eponyms of the first two were represented as sons of Bilhah, Rachel’s handmaid (cf. 30:1-8), and those of the other two as sons of Zilpah, Leah’s handmaid (30:9-13). On the seventh, Benjamin, see 35:16-20.

E’s chronicle agrees substantially with that of J², though he provided variant etymologies for some of the names as the doublets in 30:13, 20, 23, 24 indicate. He also differed from J² in placing the birth of Issachar before Zebulun—the order accepted by RJE (cf. 30:17-20). The implication of 30:14-16, 22-24, is that in J² Issachar was and for Rachel was being sacrificed to it. In his partial way Jacob was the forerunner of a new emphasis on the value of the individual. In the growing understanding of life and man and God which the O.T. expresses, the individual begins to emerge with an increased importance: Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and many of the psalms bring a message of the responsibility of all persons for their own choices and character. Where in our own time culture has been most deeply affected by the Judaeo-Christian heritage, especially in its Protestant form, as in the British Commonwealth and the United States, there has been ascribed to the individual a worth such as the ancient world did not know. So it is proclaimed that all men have rights God-given and inalienable, among which are “life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.” Herbert Hoover, speaking on his seventy-fourth birthday in the little Iowa town where he was born, referred to the Quaker Meetinghouse where he had gone as a boy, “with its deep roots in religious faith, its tolerance and devotion to the liberty of the individual”; and to his conception of the United States, where are “the open windows through which pours the sunlight of the human spirit,” and where human dignity is “not a dream, but an accomplishment.” The human dignity which is the gift of God is not idiosyncrasy or license. Its freedom must be conditioned by all that is wisest and best in what society has learned. But there is invincible truth in what Jacob intuitively felt and Laban resisted—that 29:21-30:24. Jacob’s Family.—We have remembered Jacob’s love for Rachel, and there was beauty in it (see Expos. on 29:1-11, 18, 20). But Jacob lived within the framework of his time. He had polygamous relationships and these did not seem strange to the writers of Genesis. By that means the family was preserved and enlarged. To modern readers the status of born about the same time as Joseph, and so after Zebulun; cf. also the order of Zebulun-Issachar in Deut. 33:18.

31. Cf. the circumstances in I Sam. 1:2-5. The belief that the Lord protects the less favored wife and makes her fruitful is an expression of the concern for the family which marks the religion of Israel.

32. The true derivation of Reuben is uncertain. The original form of the name may have been Re'ûbhêl, which possibly means "lion"; this would point to an original totemistic significance.

33. Simeon: Possibly also totemistic, denoting the offspring of a hyena and a wolf.

34. Levi may be the gentilic of Leah, "wild cow." There is also the possibility (Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, p. 426) that both Levi and Leah are derivatives of a word meaning "serpent," from which "leviathan" (Job 3:8; Pss. 74:14; 104:26; Isa. 27:1; also Job 41:1) is also derived.

35. Judah: The derivation is uncertain. Meyer suggests it is derived from hódh, meaning "he [God or people?] is majestic" (ibid., p. 441).

the wives, and of the maids who were treated as wives, seems pathetic. For the most part they appear as instruments of a group purpose rather than as independent persons. It is as though they were bearing the burden of Eve as it is written in the story of the Garden of Eden, "Thy desire shall be to thy husband, and he shall rule over thee." In primitive societies women are thus the creatures of a man, and that stage had not altogether passed for Israel. Children, and especially male children, were needed for the strength of the family and the tribe; and so a childless woman felt disgraced, and to have children was the chief blessing she could desire. In the record given here in Genesis it is not the women who are of most importance, but rather the roll of the children born of them. The genealogy of the twelve tribes is being established, with its climax in the birth of Joseph; and their origin is being set in the light of the particular purpose of God.

30:1. The Gift of Children.—Give me children, or else I die! Here in supremely poignant phrase is the expression of a longing that throbs through all the O.T. To the people of Israel childlessness was the ultimate calamity; and to the woman it meant not only sorrow but humiliation and shame. Note the affliction of Abraham and Sarah when for so long they had no heir born of their own flesh (15:2-3; 16:2), 30:3. Bilhah: Probably connected with the Horite clan Bilhan (36:27). That she may bear upon my knees: In cases of this kind the slave girl seems to have been delivered upon the knees of her mistress, to whom the child was reckoned to belong; cf. even I may have children through her. It is uncertain, however, whether this is the origin of the ceremony of adoption alluded to in 50:23. Both customs may be derived from the practice by which the child of a lawful marriage was actually brought forth on its father's knees (see Skinner, Genesis, pp. 386-87).

7. Dan: The etymology given here is probably correct, the name being an abbreviation of a theophoric form such as Abidan (cf. Num. 1:11), meaning "My father [God] is judge."

8. Rachel with two sons had not yet prevailed against her sister. The original idea was that she had wrestled with God. With my sister is a gloss by one to whom this was distasteful. Naph'tali, Meyer suggests (op. cit., p. 539), is derived from the word naphthal—not found in the O.T.—denoting the northern highlands, west of the upper Jordan (cf. Isa. 9:1).

Now it is Rachel who cries out in unbearable distress that her sister has children and she has none.

The longing for parenthood which the O.T. continually reflects was the natural human instinct, and it was something more. It represented the deep desire for the continuance of one's own life and character. In the records of the earliest patriarchs there is little or no evidence of belief in personal immortality. The one way in which what had been real in a man could survive would be through his descendants. Children therefore were the greatest gift that could be asked of God. "Lo, children are a heritage of the Lord: and the fruit of the womb is his reward. As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man; so are children of the youth. Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them." So sang one of the psalmists (Ps. 127:3-5), and Proverbs went on to say: "Children's children are the crown of old men" (Prov. 17:6). All through Jewish history the family tie has been tenacious and dear. This has been one of the great reasons for the amazing power of survival which the race has shown in spite of persecution and all the other alien forces that threatened its disintegration. In the Fifth Commandment family solidarity is made the ground of God's own assurance of the people's life.

In modern days there has grown up a movement undreamed of in ancient times—that of birth control. Essentially it is the effort to adjust

9. Zilpah may mean "abundance."

11. Gad is the name of an Aramaean and Phoenician god of luck or fortune, referred to in Isa. 65:11. A hybrid tribe like Gad may well once have claimed descent from this deity.

13. Asaru appears in the inscriptions of Seti I and Ramses II (ca. 1400 B.C.) as the name of a region in the west of Palestine (ibid., p. 540). If Asher is derived from this, then the tribe took its name from the locality it occupied. Holzinger (Genesis, pp. 197-98), however, connects the name with the Canaanite goddess 'Ashērāh.

14-16. These verses contain a piece of folklore according to which the eating of mandrakes—a plumlike fruit—was an aid to conception. The implication is that Rachel's pregnancy was due to this. J²'s dislike of the idea is evident from his explicit statement in vs. 22 that Rachel conceived because God remembered Rachel, . . . and opened her womb. RJE has further obscured the implication of the tale by following E in placing the birth of Zebulun between those of Issachar and Joseph.

the size of families to the economic resources of parents, and to give to children the nurture they need. It has been resisted by one fanaticism, and by another dogmatism which can be fanatical. Militaristic leaders have seized upon the slogan to increase and multiply, and have issued it by an authority which has no concern for biblical or religious sanctions. Mussolini and Hitler, in the heyday of their pretension to enduring power, used every persuasion and compulsion to increase the birth rate, whether legitimate or illegitimate. They were not interested in families as such; they were interested in more children so that in the next generation there could be more soldiers. Obviously that sort of production of children not for any sacredness of personal worth but as pawns for the purposes of the state—cannon fodder for another war—is a perverted evil. A multiplication of children encouraged by an institution for other and less openly avowed ends may also be an evil. Roman Catholicism opposes birth control with a rigid dogmatism that may be passionately conscientious; but mixed with this is the motive of producing more Roman Catholics, and not less willingly when the many children keep the population—as in Roman Catholic Quebec—at a low economic level and in a relative illiteracy which makes the people more amenable to the direction of the priests. But if the indiscriminate propagation of children is wrong, this is not to say that birth control is necessarily right.

18. Issachar probably does mean "man of hire" (Meyer, op. cit., p. 536; Gunkel, Genesis, p. 331); 49:15 refers to the tribe as being "a slave at forced labor." The name would thus seem to have been that given to its members by their Canaanite overlords.

20. Zebulun is probably derived (Meyer, op. cit., p. 538) from the personal name Zebul (cf. Judg. 9:28), possibly the name of the leader under whom the group first attained tribal status.

21. Dinah is included in preparation for ch. 34. It is a personal name, and it is highly improbable that she was the eponym of a clan.

24. For the origin of the figure Joseph see above, and Exeg. on 29:1-14. The name, here explained as a derivative of the Hebrew verb add, may be a contraction of Yōseph-ēl. Whether or not it is identical with the Yšp'r of the list of Thutmose III is uncertain.

With some persons and some motives it may be what its bitter enemies say it is, "a gospel of unrestrained lust sure to result in grave physical and moral disorders." * Techniques for preventing conception may be seized upon as a cover for sexual license outside of marriage, and in marriage birth control may be used as a means of deliberately evading the responsibility of children. The only birth control that has dignity and sacredness is what is better called "planned parenthood," which is not the prevention of parenthood, but the thoughtful and conscientious use of knowledge to provide that children are brought into the world at such times and in such spacing as will make the whole family grow up in fullest health and happiness.

In other words, the emphasis should always be positive and creative. The instinctive cry of Rachel has in it an eternal truth—give me children, or else I die. Married persons who deliberately deny themselves children, or have only one child or two, solely because they are more interested in their own luxurious irresponsibility, destroy in themselves the possibility 25 ¶ And it came to pass, when Rachel had borne Joseph, that Jacob said unto Laban, Send me away, that I may go unto mine own place, and to my country.

D. JACOB OUTWITS LABAN (30:25-43)

25-43. The section is a conflation of J¹, slightly elaborated by J² and E.

The J¹ narrative told of the proposal of Jacob, who had hitherto been working for Laban, to set up an establishment for himself (vss. 29-30). Laban, unwilling to lose his services, thereupon offered to allow him to fix his own wages. Jacob replied that he wanted nothing at the moment, but proposed that Laban should remove from his flocks all the speckled and spotted animals—vs. 32, in which the imperative "pass" is to be read for let me pass, with the Vulg., and "and remove" for removing, with the LXX and the Vulg. (Smend, Erzählung des Hexateuch, p. 76). These were to be set apart by themselves (cf. vs. 36). Jacob would then care for the rest of the flock and would receive as his wages any speckled and spotted that might be born to these normally colored animals in the future. To this Laban promptly agreed (vss. 34-36)—indeed, why would he not accept a proposal so favorable to himself? If Jacob was such a fool as to suggest it, let him take the consequences!

of their richest growth. It is in homes where there are a number of children that the happiest and fullest human character can flower. It is out of such homes that there may come the qualities of understanding, co-operation, and mutual affection which are sorely needed if society is to be lifted toward a divine ideal. Now, as truly as in the O.T. times, the opportunity of parenthood must be recognized as the high and holy gift of God.

25-43. Jacob Outwits Laban.—The chronicler must have set down this account with a very human and perhaps unregenerate pleasure. Here was Jacob, the progenitor of Israel, outsmarting the uncovenanted Laban. From a natural point of view that seemed eminently appropriate. More than once Laban had deliberately cheated Jacob. He had promised him Rachel to wife, and after Jacob had served seven years for her he withheld Rachel and gave him Leah instead. According to Jacob, Laban had also changed his wages ten times (31:7). Jacob had good reason therefore to be suspicious when Laban tried to persuade him to stay and work for him further (vs. 27), and all the more so when Laban added unctuously, for I have learned by experience that the LORD hath blessed me for thy sake. Anybody would have said that if Laban could now be cheated in his turn, it would be what he thoroughly deserved.

As a matter of fact, Jacob does not cheat him. He carries through exactly the terms of an agreement which he had proposed to Laban, and which Laban explicitly accepted. He was not 31 And he said, What shall I give thee? And Jacob said, Thou shalt not give me any thing: if thou wilt do this thing for me, I will again feed and keep thy flock.

32 I will pass through all thy flock to-day, removing from thence all the speckled and spotted cattle, and all the brown cattle among the sheep, and the spotted and speckled among the goats: and of such shall be my hire.

33 So shall my righteousness answer for me in time to come, when it shall come for my hire before thy face: every one that is not speckled and spotted among the goats, and brown among the sheep, that shall be counted stolen with me.

34 And Laban said, Behold, I would it might be according to thy word.

35 And he removed that day the he goats that were ring-streaked and spotted, and all the she goats that were speckled and spotted, and every one that had some white in it, and all the brown among the sheep, and gave them into the hand of his sons.

also?" 31 He said, "What shall I give you?" Jacob said, "You shall not give me anything; if you will do this for me, I will again feed your flock and keep it: 32 let me pass through all your flock today, removing from it every speckled and spotted sheep and every black lamb, and the spotted and speckled among the goats; and such shall be my wages. 33 So my honesty will answer for me later, when you come to look into my wages with you. Every one that is not speckled and spotted among the goats and black among the lambs, if found with me, shall be counted stolen." 34 Laban said, "Good! Let it be as you have said." 35 But that day Laban removed the he-goats that were striped and spotted, and all the she-goats that were speckled and spotted, every one that had white on it, and every lamb that was black, and put them in charge of

But Jacob, though he may have been a knave, was no fool. He placed rods upon which he had peeled white streaks before the eyes of the stronger animals in the flocks at rutting time, with the result that the young born to them were striped, speckled, and spotted, and so belonged to him (vss. 37-39, 42a). Thus his substance increased rapidly (vs. 43), and Laban was left with the feebler animals (vs. 42b).

This story of one knave outwitting another—doubtless another piece of shepherd lore—is of a piece with that in 25:27-34 (cf. also 26:1-11; 27:1-40), and it was told by J¹ with unfeigned delight; clever Jacob had outwitted the dull nomad Aramaean.

J² was less enthusiastic, but there was not much he could do about it. The popularity of the story made it necessary for him to include it in his enlarged edition of the J¹ narrative. He did, however, prefix to it vss. 25, 27, to suggest that if Jacob had had his way he would have returned to Palestine at this point. Furthermore, the implication is, Laban having admitted that his present prosperity was due to the Lord's blessing on Jacob (vs. 27)—underlined in vs. 30aγ, also J²—his willingness to take advantage of Jacob's seeming simplicity was the more reprehensible and went far to justify the latter in his sharp practice.

false like Laban; he was simply more inventive and adroit. When he had proposed to Laban that all he asked in the way of wages was that little fraction of the flock which might be odd in color, that seemed to Laban a highly desirable bargain, especially since he, Laban, took the opportunity then and there to remove from the flock all the sheep and goats that might breed the type that would belong to Jacob. The trouble was that he did not foresee the extraordinary device by which Jacob would be able to make the flock breed according to his interest—a device not ruled out by the bargain.

So by every secular standard Jacob was entitled to his triumph. But the interest of the O.T. story lies in the fact that the narrator was not judging by secular standards. He believed that Jacob's triumph was directly linked to his religion. He describes Jacob as saying to Rachel and Leah, "God hath taken away the cattle of your father, and given them to me" (31:9). Moreover, an angel appears to Jacob and gives him God's message thus: "I have seen all that Laban doeth unto thee. I am the God of Bethel, . . . where thou vowedst a vow unto me" (31:12-13). In other words, Jacob's clever 36 And he set three days' journey betwixt himself and Jacob: and Jacob fed the rest of Laban's flocks.

37 ¶ And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, and of the hazel and chestnut tree; and pilled white streaks in them, and made the white appear which was in the rods.

38 And he set the rods which he had pilled before the flocks in the gutters in the watering troughs when the flocks came to drink, that they should conceive when they came to drink.

39 And the flocks conceived before the rods, and brought forth cattle ring-streaked, speckled, and spotted.

40 And Jacob did separate the lambs, and set the faces of the flocks toward the ring-streaked, and all the brown in the flock of Laban; and he put his own flocks by themselves, and put them not unto Laban's cattle.

his sons; 36 and he set a distance of three days' journey between himself and Jacob; and Jacob fed the rest of Laban's flock.

37 Then Jacob took fresh rods of poplar and almond and plane, and peeled white streaks in them, exposing the white of the rods. 38 He set the rods which he had peeled in front of the flocks in the runnels, that is, the watering troughs, where the flocks came to drink. And since they bred when they came to drink, 39 the flocks bred in front of the rods and so the flocks brought forth striped, speckled, and spotted. 40 And Jacob separated the lambs, and set the faces of the flocks toward the striped and all the black in the flock of Laban; and he put his own droves apart, and did not put them

The E narrative at this point was very different. J²'s additions, both here and later, to the J¹ story of Jacob and Laban had done little to change the character of the tale. It remained a lusty account of rogue competing with rogue. E revised it thoroughly, to represent Laban as repeatedly endeavoring to defraud Jacob. (Gunkel is in error in maintaining that E also told of Jacob using the peeled-rod device [Genesis, pp. 336-40]; also Skinner [Genesis, p. 390]. Holzinger [Genesis, p. 201] holds that the material is from J, with some harmonization by RJE.) E's account of the agreement between the two can be reconstructed with little difficulty from the fragments which RJE inserted into the J narrative—thus to some extent obscuring its point—vss. 26, 28, the words in vs. 32 and every black lamb, such shall be my wages, and vs. 33; and from his condensation of the rest of it in 31:8-12. Laban first agreed that Jacob should receive the spotted and speckled young of the goats and the black of the sheep and then, as each arrangement worked out favorably for Jacob, changed his wages ten times (cf. 31:7a). God, however, intervened to protect Jacob from being victimized (31:7b).

37-39. A note by S. R. Driver may be quoted for what it is worth: "The physiological principle involved is well established, and, as Bochart shewed (Hieroz. II. c. 49: i. p. 619 ff., stratagem and the success it brought him are the result of the commitment he believed God had given to him at Bethel to make him prosperous. A curious blending of the earthy and the heavenly—a blending which one must recognize to exist in part of the O.T. and in influences which have flowed from it! The people of Israel were convinced that there is an intimate relationship between favor with heaven and material well-being in this world. The positive aspect of that was to give powerful sanction to keen-wittedness and commercial sagacity, so that the Jew in many practical matters has exhibited an intelligence greater than that of his non-Jewish rival. As with Jacob in his contest with Laban, he can show that he deserves to win.

The negative aspect is of course the implication that prosperity ought to be the concomitant of religion. That is not confined to Judaism. John Calvin, who was greatly influenced by the O.T., tended to make it appear that the Christian citizen, sturdy and self-reliant, would be more evidently a man of God if he was a success in business. It is true that there are qualities inspired by religion—integrity, diligence, faithfulness in familiar duties—which may bring this world's goods as their result. But to look toward these as a necessary reward of religion is to dishonor the love of God, which must be sought for itself, by trying to make it an instrument of our selfishness. It is not in Jacob's outwitting Laban that we see the true end of worship. It 41 And it came to pass, whensoever the stronger cattle did conceive, that Jacob laid the rods before the eyes of the cattle in the gutters, that they might conceive among the rods.

42 But when the cattle were feeble, he put them not in: so the feebler were Laban's, and the stronger Jacob's.

43 And the man increased exceedingly, and had much cattle, and maidservants, and menservants, and camels, and asses.

31 And he heard the words of Laban's sons, saying, Jacob hath taken away all that was our father's; and of that which was our father's hath he gotten all this glory.

2 And Jacob beheld the countenance of Laban, and, behold, it was not toward him as before.

with Laban's flock. 41 Whenever the stronger of the flock were breeding Jacob laid the rods in the runnels before the eyes of the flock, that they might breed among the rods, 42 but for the feebler of the flock he did not lay them there; so the feebler were Laban's, and the stronger Jacob's. 43 Thus the man grew exceedingly rich, and had large flocks, maidservants and menservants, and camels and asses.

31 Now Jacob heard that the sons of Laban were saying, "Jacob has taken all that was our father's; and from what was our father's he has gained all this wealth." 2 And Jacob saw that Laban did not regard him with favor as before. 3 Then the LORD said to Jacob, "Return to the land of your fathers and to your kindred, and I will be with you." 4 So Jacob sent and called Rachel and Leah into the field where his flock was, 5 and said to them, "I see that your father does not regard me with favor as he did before. But the God of my father ed. Rosenm.), was known to the ancients, and was applied, for instance, for the purpose of obtaining particular colours in horses and dogs (Oppian, Kynegetica, I, 327 ff., 353-6). According to an authority quoted by Delitzsch, cattle-breeders now, in order to secure white lambs, surround the drinking-troughs with white objects." E. JACOB'S DECISION TO RETURN HOME (31:1-16)

31:1-16. Except for vss. 1 and 3, the section is from E. Vs. 1 is J¹ and was immediately followed by vss. 19, 21a; i.e., in J¹ Jacob's departure was motivated simply by his recognition of the fact that he had about reached the limit: Laban's sons were getting restless. J², concerned here as elsewhere to make more explicit the providential element in Jacob's career, added vs. 3.

is rather in Jesus, who, "though he was rich, yet for your sakes . . . became poor" (II Cor. 8:9).

31:1-29. The Purpose and Providence of God.—For the intricate composition of this passage, with its overlappings and inconsistencies, see the Exeg. For the expositor it is not particularly fruitful, since it deals mostly with the sharpening disagreement between Laban and Jacob, and their mutual recriminations. Yet through it all it is impressive to see how the narrators are moved by their central conviction that everything in Jacob's life, no matter how small and ordinary, was overarched by the high purpose and providence of God. It must not be only annoyance with Laban that determines Jacob to go home; his going must be another chapter in the divine ordaining. So the LORD said unto Jacob, Return unto the land of thy fathers, and to thy kindred; and I will be with thee (vs. 3).

7 And your father hath deceived me, and changed my wages ten times; but God suffered him not to hurt me.

8 If he said thus, The speckled shall be thy wages; then all the cattle bare speckled: and if he said thus, The ring-streaked shall be thy hire; then bare all the cattle ring-streaked.

9 Thus God hath taken away the cattle of your father, and given them to me.

10 And it came to pass at the time that the cattle conceived, that I lifted up mine eyes, and saw in a dream, and, behold, the rams which leaped upon the cattle were ring-streaked, speckled, and grizzled.

11 And the angel of God spake unto me in a dream, saying, Jacob: and I said, Here am I.

12 And he said, Lift up now thine eyes, and see, all the rams which leap upon the cattle are ring-streaked, speckled, and grizzled: for I have seen all that Laban doeth unto thee.

13 I am the God of Bethel, where thou anointedst the pillar, and where thou vowedst a vow unto me: now arise, get thee out from this land, and return unto the land of thy kindred.

has been with me. 6 You know that I have served your father with all my strength; 7 yet your father has cheated me and changed my wages ten times, but God did not permit him to harm me. 8 If he said, 'The spotted shall be your wages,' then all the flock bore spotted; and if he said, 'The striped shall be your wages,' then all the flock bore striped. 9 Thus God has taken away the cattle of your father, and given them to me. 10 In the mating season of the flock I lifted up my eyes, and saw in a dream that the he-goats which leaped upon the flock were striped, spotted, and mottled. 11 Then the angel of God said to me in the dream, 'Jacob,' and I said, 'Here I am!' 12 And he said, 'Lift up your eyes and see, all the goats that leap upon the flock are striped, spotted, and mottled; for I have seen all that Laban is doing to you. 13 I am the God of Bethel, where you anointed a pillar and made a vow to me. Now arise, go forth from this land, and return to the land

The E narrative has been to some extent dislocated by RJE, who intruded material harmonizing the passage with the preceding J account of Jacob's sharp practice and summarizing the omitted E parallel to this (vss. 8-12). It must have recorded at the beginning the theophany—probably in a dream (cf. vs. 11)—mentioned by Jacob in vs. 13, in which God explicitly commanded him to return to Palestine and fulfill the vow he had made at Bethel (28:20-22a) twenty years before. Jacob then summoned his two wives, reminded them of the shifty treatment their father had given him, and told them of the command he had now received in the theophany (vss. 4-7, 13). Rachel and Leah aligned themselves unreservedly against their father—another point in E's rehabilitation of Jacob's character; he had treated them "as foreigners" and had, with incredible meanness, kept for himself the dowry (Exod. 22:17) or purchase price which Jacob had paid for them, i.e., the fourteen years' service which Jacob had given him had not benefited the daughters in the slightest. They were accordingly more than willing that Jacob should return home (vss. 14-16).

The stage was now set in both the J² and E narratives for Jacob's flight.

Jacob says to Rachel and Leah, the God of my father hath been with me (vs. 5). It is through God's express favor that he has got the best of Laban; and the angel of the Lord, he tells them, has come to him in a dream and said to him: I am the God of Bethel, where thou anointedst the pillar, and where thou vowedst a vow unto me; now arise, get thee out from this land, and return unto the land of thy kindred (vs. 13).

Moreover, God warns Laban against any violence to Jacob, so that he has to say: It is in the power of my hand to do you hurt: but the God of your father spake unto me yesternight, saying, Take thou heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad (vs. 29). Also Laban's concern for his little idol gods which he accused Jacob of having stolen is so pictured as to put him on the level of primitive superstition, 14 And Rachel and Leah answered and said unto him, Is there yet any portion or inheritance for us in our father's house?

15 Are we not counted of him strangers? for he hath sold us, and hath quite devoured also our money.

16 For all the riches which God hath taken from our father, that is ours, and our children's: now then, whatsoever God hath said unto thee, do.

17 ¶ Then Jacob rose up, and set his sons and his wives upon camels;

18 And he carried away all his cattle, and all his goods which he had gotten, the cattle of his getting, which he had gotten in Padan-aram, for to go to Isaac his father in the land of Canaan.

19 And Laban went to shear his sheep: and Rachel had stolen the images that were her father's.

20 And Jacob stole away unawares to Laban the Syrian, in that he told him not that he fled.

21 So he fled with all that he had; and he rose up, and passed over the river, and set his face toward the mount Gilead.

22 And it was told Laban on the third day, that Jacob was fled.

23 And he took his brethren with him, and pursued after him seven days' journey; and they overtook him in the mount Gilead.

24 And God came to Laban the Syrian in a dream by night, and said unto him, Take heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad.

25 ¶ Then Laban overtook Jacob. Now Jacob had pitched his tent in the mount: and Laban with his brethren pitched in the mount of Gilead.

of your birth.' " 14 Then Rachel and Leah answered him, "Is there any portion or inheritance left to us in our father's house?

15 Are we not regarded by him as foreigners? For he has sold us, and he has been using up the money given for us. 16 All the property which God has taken away from our father belongs to us and to our children; now then, whatever God has said to you, do."

17 So Jacob arose, and set his sons and his wives on camels; 18 and he drove away all his cattle, all his livestock which he had gained, the cattle in his possession which he had acquired in Paddan-aram, to go to the land of Canaan to his father Isaac. 19 Laban had gone to shear his sheep, and Rachel stole her father's household gods. 20 And Jacob outwitted Laban the Aramean, in that he did not tell him that he intended to flee. 21 He fled with all that he had, and arose and crossed the Eu-phra'tes, and set his face toward the hill country of Gilead.

22 When it was told Laban on the third day that Jacob had fled, 23 he took his kinsmen with him and pursued him for seven days and followed close after him into the hill country of Gilead. 24 But God came to Laban the Aramean in a dream by night, and said to him, "Take heed that you say not a word to Jacob, either good or bad."

25 And Laban overtook Jacob. Now Jacob had pitched his tent in the hill country, and Laban with his kinsmen encamped

F. JACOB'S FLIGHT FROM LABAN (31:17-43)

17-43. The section is a conflation of J (J¹+J²) and E, except for vs. 18aβγb, from P.

The J¹ story is of the same character as his account of Jacob's outwitting of Laban. It is built around the incident of the theft of the teraphim. While Laban was away at sheepshearing, Rachel stole the images (vs. 19) and Jacob fled (vs. 21aα). The implication of this recension is that Jacob was involved in, or at least knew of, the theft (contrast vs. 32b, J²).

Laban, hearing that Jacob had gone, went after him, and came up with him at the mountain (vss. 22, 23a, 25aβα), shortly to be named Galeed, a wordplay on Gilead (vs. 48), and immediately charged him with having stolen his gods (vss. 26aα, 30b). Jacob knowing the trick Rachel had planned—in J¹, vs. 34 followed vs. 30b—embarked upon a brazen piece of bluff, and replied, Any one with whom you find your gods shall not live (vs. 32a). Laban then searched Leah's tent (vs. 33a—the mention of the tent of the maidservants is secondary), and then went into Rachel's tent. There Rachel, despite 26 And Laban said to Jacob, What hast thou done, that thou hast stolen away unawares to me, and carried away my daughters, as captives taken with the sword?

27 Wherefore didst thou flee away secretly, and steal away from me; and didst not tell me, that I might have sent thee away with mirth, and with songs, with tabret, and with harp?

28 And hast not suffered me to kiss my sons and my daughters? thou hast now done foolishly in so doing.

29 It is in the power of my hand to do you hurt: but the God of your father spake unto me yesternight, saying, Take thou heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad.

30 And now, though thou wouldest needs be gone, because thou sore longedst after thy father's house, yet wherefore hast thou stolen my gods?

in the hill country of Gilead. 26 And Laban said to Jacob, "What have you done, that you have cheated me, and carried away my daughters like captives of the sword? 27 Why did you flee secretly, and cheat me, and did not tell me, so that I might have sent you away with mirth and songs, with tambourine and lyre? 28 And why did you not permit me to kiss my sons and my daughters farewell? Now you have done foolishly. 29 It is in my power to do you harm; but the God of your father spoke to me last night, saying, 'Take heed that you speak to Jacob neither good nor bad.' 30 And now you have gone away because you longed greatly for your father's house, but why did the way of women (vs. 35) which rendered her ceremonially unclean (cf. Lev. 15:19-23), was sitting on the gods. She apologized for not rising when her father entered, pleading her condition. Laban accordingly searched in vain (vss. 33*b*, 35).

The teraphim were probably, as the RSV translation indicates, household gods. J¹'s scorn for them is clear. Rachel in her uncleanness even sat on them, and nothing happened to her. In contrast with this is Laban's concern for his gods which, despite their supposed divinity, could be insolently stolen. And in the background is the derisive figure of Jacob, playing his last wanton stroke against his father-in-law.

The relish with which J¹ told the tale is obvious. That J², on the other hand, found it morally offensive is evident from the revision to which he subjected it. By inserting vs. 32*b* and shifting the notice in vs. 34 to its present position, he represented Jacob as upon which the events of the story pour a sardonic scorn.

30-35. Rudiments of Worship.—Probably it is true, as the Exeg. suggests, that the main purpose for the mention of the images is to disparage Laban for the superstitious value he put on them, and by contrast to indicate that Jacob was superior to such things. In that case, Rachel's sitting upon them would be only another stroke in the picture of the idols' degradation. But there is another road on which imagination travels. Suppose that Rachel sat upon the images not to make her father's search for them ridiculous, but because she craved to keep them for herself. Then that might be taken as evidence simply of pathetic superstition on her part; but it is possible to see in it something more than that. Suppose that on her way to an unfamiliar country and to a strange new relationship, Rachel wanted to carry with her what had been significant at home. That can be a wholesome human instinct. None of us is isolated and self-sufficient. The meaning of life is bound up with the complex of associations of the family or the group. If these are altogether left behind, the human being will be lonely and lost. The immigrant is for witness. A stream of peoples came, e.g., to the United States from the old countries of Europe. They brought their picturesque costumes, their music, their folk dances, and their folkways. Often the communities into which they went have been too crass and too stupidly self-satisfied to see the worth of what these newcomers brought. They have ridiculed the manners and the customs that differ from their own; too frequently with the result that the immigrants themselves have grown embarrassed and ashamed. In the process of being Americanized they have discarded the inheritance and hidden the particular gifts by which the culture of American communities might have been colored and enriched. One of the obligations owed to sensitive leaders in some neighborhood settlements is that they have 31 And Jacob answered and said to Laban, Because I was afraid: for I said, Peradventure thou wouldest take by force thy daughters from me.

32 With whomsoever thou findest thy gods, let him not live: before our brethren discern thou what is thine with me, and take it to thee. For Jacob knew not that Rachel had stolen them.

33 And Laban went into Jacob's tent, and into Leah's tent, and into the two maidservants' tents; but he found them not. Then went he out of Leah's tent, and entered into Rachel's tent.

34 Now Rachel had taken the images, and put them in the camel's furniture, and sat upon them. And Laban searched all the tent, but found them not.

35 And she said to her father, Let it not displease my lord that I cannot rise up before thee; for the custom of women is upon me. And he searched, but found not the images.

you steal my gods?" 31 Jacob answered Laban, "Because I was afraid, for I thought that you would take your daughters from me by force. 32 Any one with whom you find your gods shall not live. In the presence of our kinsmen point out what I have that is yours, and take it." Now Jacob did not know that Rachel had stolen them.

33 So Laban went into Jacob's tent, and into Leah's tent, and into the tent of the two maidservants, but he did not find them. And he went out of Leah's tent, and entered Rachel's. 34 Now Rachel had taken the household gods and put them in the camel's saddle, and sat upon them. Laban felt all about the tent, but did not find them. 35 And she said to her father, "Let not my lord be angry that I cannot rise before you, for the way of women is upon me." So he searched, but did not find the household gods.

being ignorant of the theft. At the same time he endeavored to shift the emphasis from the fact that the teraphim had been stolen by stating (vs. 20, cf. vs. 26aβγ) that "Jacob stole the heart of Laban"—rendered in the RSV, outwitted Laban—and by having Jacob defend himself against a general charge of dishonesty (vs. 32aβ) which, in fact, had not been made; with this is allied Jacob's outraged protest in vss. 37-40. These last verses, it may be noted, are a moving description of a faithful shepherd, in which the artistry of J² appears at its best.

The only other addition made by J² to his predecessor's narrative is the geographical note in vs. 21aβ, necessitated by his having changed the location of Laban's home from the desert to Haran. It may be noted that the representation that Mount Gilead was from seven to ten days' journey (cf. vss. 22-23) from Laban's starting point fits only with J¹'s location of him. Both Haran and the vague Mesopotamia of E (cf. 24:10) are much farther away, Haran some 350 miles as the crow flies. J² had, however, to tolerate the inconsistency.

E dealt with the story by rewriting it completely, preserving only the feature that Jacob had departed secretly (vss. 17-18aα, 27). Since the covenant following was made at Mizpah, E refers quite naturally to the hill country of Gilead as a known place (vss.

actively encouraged the foreign people to preserve and contribute the unique values which have been their own.

So far, then, perhaps so good. But what exactly, it may be asked, has this to do with Rachel and her images? Rachel was bringing not gracious aspects of human culture, musical and artistic, but the representations of primitive religion. Ought they not to have been promptly despised and left behind? To that question one may give a too-quick dogmatic answer. Get rid of the childlike and the crude; get rid of it even when tendrils of all the worship we have known are wrapped about it, and we have not yet found what will take its place! In the days of slavery the Negroes conceived the poignant words and haunting music of the spirituals. Later, in the advancing years of freedom and new opportunity and knowledge, many were ashamed of the associations of the spirituals and wanted to forget them; but the truer interpreters of the genius of the race knew that they were too precious to let go. Rachel's images are far from standing on a level of religious truth and beauty with the spirituals; but nevertheless they are a symbol of that instinct of 36 ¶ And Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban: and Jacob answered and said to Laban, What is my trespass? what is my sin, that thou hast so hotly pursued after me?

37 Whereas thou hast searched all my stuff, what hast thou found of all thy household stuff? set it here before my brethren and thy brethren, that they may judge betwixt us both.

38 This twenty years have I been with thee; thy ewes and thy she goats have not cast their young, and the rams of thy flock have I not eaten.

39 That which was torn of beasts I brought not unto thee; I bare the loss of it; of my hand didst thou require it, whether stolen by day, or stolen by night.

40 Thus I was; in the day the drought consumed me, and the frost by night; and my sleep departed from mine eyes.

36 Then Jacob became angry, and up-braided Laban; Jacob said to Laban, "What is my offense? What is my sin, that you have hotly pursued me? 37 Although you have felt through all my goods, what have you found of all your household goods? Set it here before my kinsmen and your kinsmen, that they may decide between us two. 38 These twenty years I have been with you; your ewes and your she-goats have not mis-carried, and I have not eaten the rams of your flocks. 39 That which was torn by wild beasts I did not bring to you; I bore the loss of it myself; of my hand you required it, whether stolen by day or stolen by night. 40 Thus I was; by day the heat consumed me, and the cold by night, and my sleep

21*b*, 23*b*). When Laban came up with Jacob he did not question his honesty, the implication being that on such a point there could be no dispute. Instead, he reproached him for carrying off his daughters without giving him an opportunity to say farewell to them, and Jacob replied in kind (vss. 26*b*, 28, 31). There is a lacuna in the extant E material at this point, but apparently Laban made some further complaint, Jacob's reply to which is preserved in vss. 36*b*, 41-43.

Into this narrative a later hand, E², inserted vs. 24—awkward in its representation that Laban delayed a whole night before arraigning Jacob—to emphasize God's care for him. From the same hand comes the related vs. 42*b*.

worship which is deeper than its poor forms. The wisest missionaries of the Christian gospel have learned to look with a reverent understanding upon even the crudest religious expressions of pagan people, and never to despise these but to lead through them to the larger truth. It would be well if all Christian teachers should meet with the same patience ideas that seem to them childish and grotesque. The words of Thomas Carlyle are worth remembering:

You take wheat to cast into the Earth's bosom: your wheat may be mixed with chaff, chopped straw, barn-sweepings, dust and all imaginable rubbish; no matter: you cast it into the kind just Earth; she grows the wheat,—the whole rubbish she silently absorbs, shrouds it in, says nothing of the rubbish. The yellow wheat is growing there; the good Earth is silent about all the rest.⁹

36-42. Jacob's Indignation.—Here in the midst of what is mostly an unattractive story is a flash of beauty. In the first place, there is a ring of honest indignation in Jacob's words to Laban. He, Jacob, had certainly been no perfect example in his dealings; but it was true that at the beginning, and by his own initiative, he had been completely faithful to the agreement between Laban and himself. It was Laban who began deceit; and in comparison with Laban, Jacob's own original honesty of purpose gave him some reason for his passionate claim: Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the fear of Isaac, had been with me, surely thou hadst sent me away now empty. God hath seen my affliction and the labor of my hands, and rebuked thee yesternight.

Then there is the stirring description of the shepherd in vss. 38-40—of the shepherd so devoted to his flock and so careless of his own advantage that no risk or cost was too great for him to incur for his sheep. Reading Jacob's words, even if Jacob's own career was not always consistent with them, one is reminded of David in the upland pastures defending his sheep against the lion and the bear; and of the one supreme Shepherd who "calleth his own sheep

41 Thus have I been twenty years in thy house: I served thee fourteen years for thy two daughters, and six years for thy cattle; and thou hast changed my wages ten times.

43 ¶ And Laban answered and said unto Jacob, These daughters are my daughters, and these children are my children, and these cattle are my cattle, and all that thou seest is mine: and what can I do this day unto these my daughters, or unto their children which they have borne?

44 Now therefore come thou, let us make a covenant, I and thou; and let it be for a witness between me and thee.

fled from my eyes. 41 These twenty years I have been in your house; I served you fourteen years for your two daughters, and six years for your flock, and you have changed my wages ten times. 42 If the God of my father, the God of Abraham and the Fear of Isaac, had not been on my side, surely now you would have sent me away empty-handed. God saw my affliction and the labor of my hands, and rebuked you last night."

43 Then Laban answered and said to Jacob, "The daughters are my daughters, the children are my children, the flocks are my flocks, and all that you see is mine. But what can I do this day to these my daughters, or to their children whom they have borne? 44 Come now, let us make a covenant, you and I; and let it be a witness between you and me." 45 So Jacob took a stone, and set it up as a pillar. 46 And Jacob said to his kinsmen, "Gather stones," and they took stones, and made a heap; and

G. JACOB'S COVENANT WITH LABAN (31:44-55)

44-55. According to J, the purpose of the covenant between Jacob and Laban was to define the boundary between the Israelites east of the Jordan and the nomad Aramaeans. As a witness to the agreement, a heap of stones was made, which was given the name Galeed, meaning The heap of witness (RSV mg.), intended to provide an etymology for Gilead. The extant material of this recension is found in vss. 44b, 46 (reading "Laban" for "Jacob" with the O.L.; note that it is Laban, not Jacob, who explains the meaning of the heap in vs. 51), 51-52, 48; in vss. 51-52 the references to the pillar are redactional harmonization. The meal referred to in vs. 46 is the sacred feast preceding the covenant ceremony. Vs. 47 is a learned gloss. Nowhere else in the Jacob-Laban cycle of stories is there the slightest suggestion that the two spoke different languages.

This is probably the primary Palestinian tradition of Laban: he was the representative of the nomad Aramaeans. And Jacob stands opposite him representing the people living immediately east of the Jordan. In all likelihood it was this association of the two which led to Laban's being given the role of the father of Leah and Rachel, Jacob's wives.

The tale itself was presumably preserved in the vicinity of a certain cairn in the hill country of Gilead, which was originally believed to be the abode of some god, who ever stood on guard to enforce the provisions of the agreement. For J1, however, it was simply a memorial and the agreement was without supernatural sanctions. These J2

43-55. Jacob's and Laban's Covenant.—Here the tumultuous story of Jacob and Laban comes to its more peaceful and pleasant conclusion. It is like a day that had been marked by noontime heat and sudden clouds and thunderstorm, drawing now toward a quiet evening. It is characteristic of the O.T. that all human relationships are lifted up into the larger relationship with God. Laban and Jacob make a covenant with one another, and when they call upon God provided by inserting vs. 53a, in which the God of their father—awkward in the Hebrew—is a gloss.

It is impossible to identify the site of the cairn. All that can be said is that J¹ located it somewhere in the hill country of Gilead, between the Syro-Arabian desert and the river Jabbok, the next place mentioned in his account of Jacob's journey home.

In the J narrative of Jacob's flight there is no real connection between the theft of the household gods and the covenant with Laban which followed. The two incidents are simply placed side by side—a fact which suggests that the tale of the theft was in its origin independent of the Jacob-Laban tradition.

The E story of the covenant, on the other hand, is organically related to his story of Jacob's flight. There, as has been seen, Laban had reproached Jacob for not allowing him to say farewell to his daughters. Vs. 43, in which Laban voiced his concern for their future safety, leads directly to the covenant (vs. 44a) in which Jacob promised that he would not ill-treat Leah and Rachel or take wives in addition to them (vs. 50). As a memorial of the covenant, Laban sets up a pillar (vs. 45—"Laban" should be read for "Jacob"; in vs. 49 it is Laban, not Jacob, who explains its significance). The pillar is called Mizpah (vs. 49). In the present form of the text it stands simply as a symbol of the Lord's watching between Laban and Jacob (vs. 49). The LORD is impossible in E; the LXX reads more correctly "God." Even this, however, is probably a substitution for an original "this pillar" (cf. Holzinger, Genesis, pp. 206-7). If so, then E preserves something of the ancient idea of the pillar (maççēbhāh) as an abode of deity (cf. vs. 48 [JJ]), though he empties the allusion of any real significance by the words in vs. 50, God is witness between you and me, and by the statement that Jacob swore by the Fear of his father Isaac (vs. 53b). For E, the Fear of his father Isaac undoubtedly meant the God worshiped and feared by Isaac. Originally it probably had a more mythological significance (Meyer, to confirm that covenant it is characteristic of the O.T. again that they think of him first not as the God of the individual only, but as the God of their fathers. Laban invokes the God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor, and Jacob swears by the fear of his father Isaac. Here is that sense of a corporate and continuing loyalty which made the religion of Israel so tenacious and so strong. To the heap of stones which they set up as a token of their covenant they gave the name Mizpah, which means Watchpost; and the meaning was that they were calling God to witness that they must keep their agreement, after they had parted.

It is significant also that the cairn of stones and the pillar described as thus set up by Jacob and Laban were thought of in the later tradition of Israel as the boundary line between the land of Israel and the land of Syria—a boundary line which should not be transgressed by the descendants of Jacob and of Laban. Certainly the purpose suggested there has meaning and importance for every time. "Good fences make good neighbors," wrote Robert Frost in "Mend-

54 Then Jacob offered sacrifice upon the mount, and called his brethren to eat bread: and they did eat bread, and tarried all night in the mount.

55 And early in the morning Laban rose up, and kissed his sons and his daughters, and blessed them: and Laban departed, and returned unto his place.

So Jacob swore by the Fear of his father Isaac, 54 and Jacob offered a sacrifice on the mountain and called his kinsmen to eat bread; and they ate bread and tarried all night on the mountain.

Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, pp. 254-55). Vss. 54—in which again "Laban" is to be read for "Jacob"—and 55^{abα} conclude the E recension.

In this tale E claims that Mizpah received its name from the maççēbhāh erected there by Laban to watch between him and Jacob. Mizpah means Watchpost (vs. 49 RSV mg.), or "outlook point." A number of Mizpahs, or Mizpehs, are mentioned in the O.T. (e.g., Josh. 11:3; 15:38; Judg. 10:17; 20:1; I Sam. 22:3); the name might be given to any high point.

It is impossible to say whether E is here preserving the local tradition of one such place east of the Jordan or whether he invented the story because, having located Laban in Mesopotamia, the J story of a boundary agreement between him and Jacob was no longer relevant. In any case, he has given a unity of theme—Laban's concern for his family—to the account of Jacob's separation from his father-in-law, which is lacking in the J parallel. In so doing he records effectively the final defeat of Laban. At the same time, he has done something to redeem the character of the man whom, in his effort to rehabilitate the character of Jacob, he had made into a shifty, most unattractive figure.

XXXIX. JACOB AND ESAU III (32:1-33:16)

A. JACOB PREPARES TO MEET ESAU (32:1-23)

32:1-23. A conflation of J—J² plus some later material—and E.

According to J², after Laban had departed, Jacob sent messengers to the land of Seir, i.e., Edom, in the hope of making friends with Esau, from whose anger he had fled ing Wall." But more than good fences are needed for that. There must be a consciousness of God as stabilizing the relationships of men by a righteousness that at last may prove stronger than human rivalry and passion. One remembers, with desire that its ideal might be both actual and universal, the "Christ of the Andes," the majestic figure set up on the border between Argentina and Chile as a symbol of commitment to peace between the two countries.

32:1-2. Mahanaim.—How often we meet this mention of angels in the story of Jacob's life! Angels on the ladder in the vision at Bethel; the dream of an angel that told him to leave the country of Laban; angels now before him on his way; the memory of an angel at the last when he laid his hands upon the sons of Joseph, and said, "The Angel which redeemed me from

3 And Jacob sent messengers before him to Esau his brother unto the land of Seir, the country of Edom.

4 And he commanded them, saying, Thus shall ye speak unto my lord Esau; Thy servant Jacob saith thus, I have sojourned with Laban, and stayed there until now:

5 And I have oxen, and asses, flocks, and menservants, and womenservants: and I have sent to tell my lord, that I may find grace in thy sight.

6 ¶ And the messengers returned to Jacob, saying, We came to thy brother Esau, and also he cometh to meet thee, and four hundred men with him.

7 Then Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed: and he divided the people that was with him, and the flocks, and herds, and the camels, into two bands;

3 And Jacob sent messengers before him to Esau his brother in the land of Se'ir, the country of Edom, 4 instructing them, "Thus you shall say to my lord Esau: Thus says your servant Jacob, 'I have sojourned with Laban, and stayed until now; 5 and I have oxen, asses, flocks, menservants, and maid-servants; and I have sent to tell my lord, in order that I may find favor in your sight.'"

6 And the messengers returned to Jacob, saying, "We came to your brother Esau, and he is coming to meet you, and four hundred men with him." 7 Then Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed; and he divided the people that were with him, and the flocks and herds and camels, into two com-

some twenty years before (vss. 3-5). The messengers returning with the word that Esau was coming to meet him with four hundred men, Jacob's fear increased, and he divided his family, servants, and animals into two companies, hoping that if Esau attacked one of them the other might escape (vss. 6-8). Both companies he sent on ahead of him while he himself remained beside a certain stream—the Jabbok, cf. vs. 22 (E)—for the night (vss. 24a, 13a).

At this point J² broke into his Jacob-Esau narrative by inserting the story of Jacob's wrestling at the Jabbok, taken over from J¹, vss. 24b-29, 31, to be considered presently. In the meantime, it may be noted that J² represents Jacob as relying on his own cleverness to extricate himself from a difficult situation, which, it will be seen, he manages to do, though at some cost to himself (cf. 33:1-16). There is no suggestion that he relied on divine assistance—indeed, J² seems purposely to be avoiding such a suggestion. He is showing how Jacob at long last had to pay for the deception by which he had deprived Esau of his father's blessing, and also for his tricky dealings with Laban; i.e., J² in this story, which is his own free composition, is drawing the sting of the morally difficult all evil, bless the lads" (48:16). There had been much earthliness and evil in Jacob, and certainly it was too bold a phrase to say that he had been redeemed from all of it. But the striking fact is the repeated association of angels with the name of this imperfect man. The one great characteristic which gradually refined him was his desire—which from the beginning he possessed—for nearer knowledge of God. May it be therefore that the angels of God come, even though in invisible presence, to every man who has that saving eagerness? Not only in the case of Jacob, but in that of many another, those who look at the man's life and what is happening in it and around it may be able to say that as he went on his way the angels of God met him.

3-23. Old Fears Returning.—This long passage is a vivid picture of a man who could not get away from the consequences of an old wrong. Many years before, Jacob had defrauded Esau. He had got away to a safe distance and he had stayed there a long time. Doubtless he had tried to forget about Esau, or at any rate to act as if Esau's oath to be avenged could be forgotten. While he was in Laban's country he could feel comfortable. But the time had come when he wanted to go back home; and though the thought of it drew him, it appalled him too. There was the nostalgia of early memories, but there was the nightmare of the later one, and it overshadowed all the rest. Esau was there; and what would Esau do?

As a matter of fact, Esau would not do anything. If he had not forgotten what Jacob had done to him, he had stopped bothering himself about it. Hot tempered and terrifying though he could be, he was too casual to carry a grudge.

8 And said, If Esau come to the one company, and smite it, then the other company which is left shall escape.

9 ¶ And Jacob said, O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac, the LORD which saidst unto me, Return unto thy country, and to thy kindred, and I will deal well with thee:

material—whether derived from J¹ or elsewhere—which circumstances had compelled him against his will to include in his narrative. Here Jacob does not emerge as a hero. A later J writer, to ameliorate this unfavorable picture, inserted the prayer in vss. 9-12.

The E narrative differed from that of J² to a very considerable extent. It locates Jacob's preparations for meeting Esau at Mahanaim (vss. 1-2), preserving what may be only a fragment of the tradition of that place. The implication would seem to be that the vision of angels deepened Jacob's moral sensitivity. At any rate, when he heard that Esau was coming—to be inferred from what follows; the E notice is missing, having been dropped by RJE in favor of vs. 6 (J)—he at once resolved to make handsome amends for the past. Taking from his own vast flocks and herds a large number of animals, he made up five droves—of goats, sheep, camels, cows, and asses. He then sent them on ahead of him, a drove at a time, carefully spaced, instructing the servant in charge of each to tell Esau that it was a gift from his brother who was coming along behind. In this way Jacob hoped that Esau would be prevailed upon to forget the past (vss. 13b-21a). The implication is that Jacob would himself meet Esau shortly after the fifth drove; i.e., E, having dropped the story of the wrestling at the Jabbok, had no need to have Jacob remain behind alone.

As ch. 33 tells, he would meet Jacob presently with the bluff generosity of the big man who lets bygones be bygones. But not only did Jacob not know that; what he supposed he knew was the exact opposite. Esau would confront him as a deadly threat.

Consequently, he begins to plan how he can placate him. He will send an ingratiating message. He will pretend to trust what he does not really dare believe, that I may find grace in thy sight. He waits for his messengers to come back; and when they do come and tell their tidings, he is panic-stricken. For they tell him that Esau is coming—not only Esau, but Esau with four hundred men. To Jacob's imagination they all had swords in their hands. Certainly it looked as though punishment was on the march, and that seemed the more certain because he knew that there was nothing better that he had merited. It was a time for desperate devices. He divided his flocks and herds and everything he possessed into two companies, and he told his servants that if Esau attacked one, the other at least should try to escape. Meanwhile, Esau had no idea of attacking anybody; but "the wicked flee when no man pursueth" (Prov. 28:1).

At this point Jacob said his prayers. After that he felt less afraid. He thought of another plan to protect himself against Esau's coming. He distributed his camels and cattle into nu-

13 ¶ And he lodged there that same night; and took of that which came to his hand a present for Esau his brother;

14 Two hundred she goats and twenty he goats, two hundred ewes and twenty rams, 15 Thirty milch camels with their colts, forty kine and ten bulls, twenty she asses and ten foals.

16 And he delivered them into the hand of his servants, every drove by themselves; and said unto his servants, Pass over before me, and put a space betwixt drove and drove.

17 And he commanded the foremost, saying, When Esau my brother meeteth thee, and asketh thee, saying, Whose art thou? and whither goest thou? and whose are these before thee?

18 Then thou shalt say, They be thy servant Jacob's; it is a present sent unto my lord Esau: and, behold, also he is behind us.

13 So he lodged there that night, and took from what he had with him a present for his brother Esau, 14 two hundred she-goats and twenty he-goats, two hundred ewes and twenty rams, 15 thirty milch camels and their colts, forty cows and ten bulls, twenty she-asses and ten he-asses. 16 These he delivered into the hand of his servants, every drove by itself, and said to his servants, "Pass on before me, and put a space between drove and drove." 17 He instructed the foremost, "When Esau my brother meets you, and asks you, 'To whom do you belong? Where are you going? And whose are these before you?' 18 then you shall say, 'They belong to your servant Jacob; they are a present sent to my lord Esau; and RJE, putting these two recensions together, placed that of J first, intact. Then he told of Jacob stopping where he was for the night—making use of the notice with which J² had introduced the Jabbok story (vs. 13a)—and continued with the E account of Jacob's preparations. He then in vss. 21b-24a—in part derived from J²—represented Jacob as sending on his immediate family late at night while he remained behind alone. The stage was thus set for the Jabbok story.

It has already been noted that in the story in ch. 27, E placed the blame for the incident therein related upon Rebekah—thus to a considerable degree clearing Jacob of responsibility—and that he implied that Rebekah paid the price for her duplicity by never seeing her favorite son again. It has further been noted that in the E recension of the Laban stories, Jacob is consistently the innocent victim of his father-in-law's grasping unscrupulousness. In this story the same point of view is manifest. Jacob, though not himself responsible; recognizes the justice of Esau's anger, and takes steps to effect a reconciliation; i.e., in the E material read in isolation, Jacob's character is morally unobjectionable. One of the effects of the conflation of E with J² is that in the resultant merous groups, and he sent them out at intervals in the direction from which Esau would be approaching. When Esau should encounter the first of these, he was to be told that they were a present from his brother Jacob; so with the second group, and the third, and all down the line until Esau should be appeased. Then he sent off his handmaids and their children, and Leah and her children, and last of all he and Rachel followed. The irony of it was that all these precautions were unnecessary. When Esau finally appeared, and Jacob bowed himself to the ground seven times before him, "Esau ran to meet him; . . . and fell on his neck, and kissed him" (33:4).

Jacob had passed through a humiliating process. He had been thoroughly afraid, and this was the more galling because he thought of himself as somebody who ought not to have had to be afraid. In his possessions he was a person of consequence. He had tried to suggest that to Esau in his first messages. But none of his possessions fortified him when his conscience let him down. Even when Esau met him with such astonishing magnanimity, Jacob was not yet at ease. He still kept on his guard, with unhappy apprehension lest Esau might change his mind (see 33:12-17). Knowing that he had not deserved Esau's brotherliness, he could not believe that he could trust it.

19 And so commanded he the second, and the third, and all that followed the droves, saying, On this manner shall ye speak unto Esau, when ye find him.

20 And say ye moreover, Behold, thy servant Jacob is behind us. For he said, I will appease him with the present that goeth before me, and afterward I will see his face; peradventure he will accept of me.

21 So went the present over before him; and himself lodged that night in the company.

22 And he rose up that night, and took his two wives, and his two womenservants, and his eleven sons, and passed over the ford Jabbok.

23 And he took them, and sent them over the brook, and sent over that he had.

24 ¶ And Jacob was left alone; and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day.

moreover he is behind us.' " 19 He likewise instructed the second and the third and all who followed the droves, "You shall say the same thing to Esau when you meet him, 20 and you shall say, 'Moreover your servant Jacob is behind us.'" For he thought, "I may appease him with the present that goes before me, and afterwards I shall see his face; perhaps he will accept me." 21 So the present passed on before him; and he himself lodged that night in the camp.

22 The same night he arose and took his two wives, his two maids, and his eleven children, and crossed the ford of the Jabbok. 23 He took them and sent them across the stream, and likewise everything that he had. 24 And Jacob was left alone; and a man wrestled with him until the breaking of the narrative J²'s disapprobation of Jacob on moral grounds is obscured, and it seems as though his conduct, as it is represented in J², were condoned.

The analysis of the JE narrative into its component documents thus helps to make clear the fact that there was a distinct advance in moral sensitivity. It is only J¹ who manifests any delight in the more than questionable conduct of his hero, and it was not long before the moral austerity of Yahwism asserted itself and in one way or another condemned his duplicity.

B. JACOB'S WRESTLING AT THE JABBOK (32:24-32)

24-32. Except for vs. 30 (E), this section is from J—J¹ revised by J², with vs. 32 added. (Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 359-60, and Procksch, Genesis, pp. 193, 372 [cf. Skinner, Genesis, p. 407] regard it as a conflation of J and E. Smend, Erzählung des Hexateuch, p. 86, and Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse, p. 264*, ignoring the inconsistencies in the story, derive it from J¹ [L].)

J¹ appears to have taken over practically unchanged the legend of the Jabbok—the word 'ābhaq, wrestled, occurring only here in the O.T., is a wordplay on "Jabbok"—

The barrier in the way of forgiveness may lie not in unreadiness of the wronged to give, but in the inability of the one who has done wrong to receive. Jacob had to be humbled and chastened before he could be made clean. The wrestling by the Jabbok would be the beginning of that. He had to admit down deep that he did not deserve anything, and he had to get rid of the pride that thought he could work out his peace by his own wits. Only so could he ever feel that the relationship with Esau had really been restored. More importantly, it is only so that men can believe in and accept the forgiveness of the love of God.

24-32. The Reckoning with God.—Primitive myth, Jewish particularism, the light of lofty spiritual understanding—all these are blended in this story of Jacob's wrestling. Once it was believed that every conspicuous natural object had its particular spirit, and a river might have its river-god who resented any crossing of the river. Such a myth may have influenced the form of the story here. The impulse to explain the Jewish taboo upon eating the muscle of the thigh, the proud desire to link the name of Israel with a heroic origin, may be the reasons for other elements in the story, such as vss. 25, 28. But out of the mixed material emerges one dominant picture. It is that of the man who, in spite of many faults, had an indomitable desire to have his life rightly related to God, but who must be disciplined and chastened before that desire

25 And when he saw that he prevailed not against him, he touched the hollow of his thigh; and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint, as he wrestled with him.

26 And he said, Let me go, for the day breaketh. And he said, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me.

day. 25 When the man saw that he did not prevail against Jacob, he touched the hollow of his thigh; and Jacob's thigh was put out of joint as he wrestled with him.

26 Then he said, "Let me go, for the day is breaking." But Jacob said, "I will not let according to which some supernatural being, presumably the numen of the place, wrestled with Jacob all night (vs. 24) to prevent him from crossing the stream. In the course of the struggle Jacob's thigh was dislocated (vs. 25a). As the dawn approached the mysterious wrestler—the implication is that he was a night demon who must not be abroad in the daytime—urged Jacob to let him go, but Jacob, possibly realizing now for the first time the supernatural character of his antagonist, refused to comply until the other blessed him (vs. 26). The original, pre-Israelite form of the tale, it may be assumed, then recorded that there he blessed him (vs. 29b), continued with the sentence in vs. 31a, which noted the narrow escape of the demon, the sun rose upon him as he passed Penuel, and concluded in all probability with a notice that Jacob named the stream Jabbok.

could be fulfilled. A very different experience is the one here described from the one at Bethel. There the vision of the ladder and the angels of God had come to Jacob as a benediction—as God does come, in some first wondering spiritual experience, to the young. Now the reality of God had to be encountered in another and more awful way. The soul must wrestle with the dreadful mystery of existence. It must learn the full meaning of the ultimate power to which it is constrained to give account. On his way home Jacob had prayed to God for protection against Esau (vss. 10-11), but he well knew he did not deserve it. "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth, which thou hast showed unto thy servant." And now he was left alone. No human helper could be at his side in the agonizing struggle which presently he had to face. No props of former confidence or conceit could sustain him. His own character would be put to its determining proof.

24-25. The Struggle in the Dark.—Who was the antagonist coming out of the darkness to seize Jacob for a struggle that would last until the breaking of the day? Not Esau, as in the first fearful moment of surprise Jacob might have imagined. Not any human foe, however terrible. Not a river-god. No; but the Almighty God of Righteousness, forcing him to make his reckoning. The O.T. story is dramatizing here the consequence that comes to every soul that has tried too long to evade the truth about itself. Thus far Jacob's life had seemed successful. By one stratagem and another he had outwitted Esau, Isaac, and Laban. Coming home prosperous, all the outward circumstances might have made him boastful. But his conscience saw something else. He saw his world shadowed by his guilt. Old memories awakened, old fears rose up from the past in which he had tried to bury them. He had to face these memories and submit to their bruising recollection. Now that he was to meet Esau, he knew that he was not the masterful person he had liked to imagine he was. He had made his smooth way ahead among people who had not known him; now he had to encounter people who did know him, and would remember him as a liar and a coward. He was brought up short to a reckoning with himself, which was a reckoning with God. He could ignore the prospect of that in the busy daytime, but now it was night, and he was alone; and when a man is alone, then least of all can he get away from God. When the mysterious antagonist touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh, and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint, it was a symbol of the fact that Jacob was in the grip of a power which his self-assurance could not match. Jacob knew that henceforth he could never walk in lofty arrogance again.

26. Holding On.—Another strange mingling of elements is in the picture here. The exclamation of the unnamed wrestler, Let me go, for the day breaketh seems to have its origin in the dim old belief that spirits could walk the earth only during the darkness, and that when the day began to break they had to go back to the place of shadows from which they had come. But the timeless meaning is in the words of Jacob, I will not let thee go, except thou bless me. In the good and evil that made up Jacob there were two factors of nobility that saved

27 And he said unto him, What is thy name? And he said, Jacob. | you go, unless you bless me." 27 And he said to him, "What is your name?" And he said,

This story, the antiquity of which is obvious, is probably the basic Jacob legend in the O.T. Jacob prevailed over his supernatural opponent; cf. Hos. 12:3-4, "In his [Jacob's] strength he strove with God: yea he struggled with the angel, and prevailed" (ASV mg.). A point to be noted is the superhuman strength ascribed to Jacob; with this may be compared the implications of 28:18, according to which Jacob himself set up the pillar at Bethel, and of 29:10, where he alone and unaided moved a stone which normally could be moved only through the combined efforts of a number of men (cf. 29:8). All three passages seem to echo the representation of Jacob as a giant.

him. The first was his awareness that life has a divine meaning above its material fact—the awareness that made him seek the birthright and made possible his vision at Bethel. The second quality, revealed here in his wrestling, was his determination. He had struggled all night until he was lame and agonized; but when his antagonist wished to separate himself, Jacob desperately held on. When a man is forced to wrestle with moral reality and its consequences, he may try to get rid of them as quickly as he can. But Jacob's quality was otherwise. Caught in the grip of judgment, his prevailing desire was not for escape. He would hold on until something decisive happened. In punishment, as in prosperity, he would not let the experience go until he had wrung a blessing from it. The shallow man may ignore his sins; the cowardly man may try to evade their consequences; but Jacob now was neither one. Hurt and humiliated though he was, and needing to repent, he still dared believe that his great desire could prevail. In Charles Wesley's hymn one can hear his cry:

Yield to me now, for I am weak,
But confident in self-despair;
Speak to my heart, in blessing speak;
Be conquered by my instant prayer.¹

Frederick W. Robertson has given a further interpretation to Jacob's answer to the demand of his antagonist, Let me go:

Jacob held Him more convulsively fast, as if aware that the daylight was likely to rob him of his anticipated blessing; in which there seems concealed a very deep truth. God is approached more nearly in that which is indefinite than in that which is definite and distinct. He is felt in awe, and wonder and worship, rather than in clear conceptions. There is a sense in which darkness has more of God than light has. . . . In sorrow, haunted by uncertain presentiments, we feel the infinite around us. The gloom disperses, the world's joy comes again, and it seems as if God were gone—the Being who had touched us with a withering hand, and wrestled with us, yet whose presence, even when most terrible, was more blessed than His absence. . . . Yes, in solitary, silent, vague darkness, the Awful One is near.²

27-28. The Significance of a Name.—There is a little book by Charles R. Brown entitled *What Is Your Name?*³ and its first chapter deals with this same Genesis story. A new name is given to Jacob. There is profound significance in the names of God (see Expos. on vs. 29). What of the significance of the name of a man? At first a particular name may mean nothing. But what is "at first"? A child is given a name when he is born. But that is not the beginning of his name. He is somebody's son. His "given name" may be new with him, but part of his name belongs to his family. That family name is never altogether colorless. It may have the nearly neutral tint of average respectability; it may be dark with discredit; or it may shine with the purple and gold of accumulated honor. A man cannot help his heredity? No, but to an important degree he can determine which part of his heredity he appropriates. Many tendencies are born in him. It will be easier to follow some than others, but there is room for choice and courage to determine which will be dominant in the end.

Jacob was a mixed character if ever there was one. He had in him some of Rebekah's quick, unscrupulous wit, but also some of Isaac's loyalty. He had some of Sarah's jealousy, but some of Abraham's farseeing faith. What he would make out of his family inheritance would depend on which part of it he seized and sanctified. In ch. 30 there is the curious tale of how Jacob got the sheep to produce lambs "ring-streaked, speckled, and spotted" by arranging when the sheep conceived that they had ring-streaked, speckled, and spotted things to look at. In relation to the ring-streaked possibilities he was born with, it was possible for Jacob, if he looked with enough desire at the white streaks

J¹, including this legend in his narrative, gave it a new point of extraordinary importance. By vs. 27-28 he unified the tradition brought from the desert, that his people were the sons of Israel, with the various local traditions of Canaan, in assimilating which they had come to claim Abraham, Isaac, and, finally, Jacob as their ancestors. As to whether at the same time he dropped the notice of the naming of the Jabbok, or whether this was deleted later by RJE when he inserted vs. 30, it is impossible to say.

J², taking this story over from J¹, rejected the representation that Jacob had prevailed over God (cf. vs. 28) by laming him. He added vs. 25b—thus changing the and looked away enough from the black ones, to become a man patterned according to the better rather than the worse elements in his inheritance. To some degree at least that was what he did.

It would make a big difference if not only individuals but nations set themselves to do the same. Germany of the twentieth century had a double inheritance; Goethe, Schiller, Beethoven, and Bach were on the one side; Nietzsche, Bernhardi, and the Prussian Junkers on the other. Its doom was that it repudiated the part of its inheritance that was born of the spirit, and chose to incarnate what was brutal. The United States also has a double inheritance: from Washington and Lincoln and the world ideals of Woodrow Wilson on the one hand, and from pinchbeck politicians and profiteers and economic pirates on the other. Read Russell Davenport, My Country.⁴ Read—as related to England—Our Threatened Values, by Victor Gollancz.⁵ Destiny is determined not mechanically by the so-called "human nature that never changes," but by the part of its inherited nature which it chooses to value and promote.

A name, however, is more than an inheritance. It is the mark of an individual who can create something new: new not only in relation to the ancestral past, but new also in relation to the stages of his own development. Jacob's name, when he first appears, makes a poor impression. Read "Jacob" in ch. 27, and all that the name suggests is the self-interest and mean spirit of "the supplanter." His name was never wholly divested of its first unattractiveness, but by the grace of God associations were added to it which made the final balance different. The One who wrestled with him there by the ford of Jabbok said he should be called Israel; and strange as it might seem, it was thus as Israel, "a prince of God," that succeeding generations thought of him.

Why? Because he had shown another side of himself to which God could give a different name. At his worst he had been something better than a sensualist. He was not ruled by the appetite of his body, as Esau—so much more immediately attractive but so easygoing and therefore so inconsequential—generally was. His ambitions were on a higher level than the physical. He wanted the birthright because the one who held it should be the representative of the family not only toward men but toward God—a fact which interested Esau not at all. That Jacob could have had his dream at Bethel showed that he was sensitive to the unseen. And when he had once fixed the goal of this desire, he had unlimited determination in moving toward it. Consider the long years he served Laban before he reached the end which inflexibly he had pursued. It was this tenacity of purpose which was his essential strength, and this that made the mysterious wrestler say to him that he had power with God and with men and had prevailed.

Moreover the name of Jacob is lighted at the end by a ray of beauty not often met with in Genesis. At first he seemed to love nobody but himself; but when he met Rachel he showed that love for her and for all that belonged to her could become the ruling power of his life. The man whose name in the beginning is synonymous with one contemptible deed identifies that name at last with a great devotion. Far better it is of course if a man can make his name winsome from the outset. "Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? by taking heed thereto according to thy word" (Ps. 119:9). But many a man may need the encouragement which comes from the story of Jacob to believe that a name which has once been shadowed by discredit can be lifted to honor. Recall what Jesus helped Simon son of Jonas to believe about himself (John 1:42). Read the baptismal office in the Book of Common Prayer, and the promise which stands back of the meaning of the preceding sentence so that it was Jacob who was lamed—and vs. 31b, so that vs. 31a now referred to Jacob passing Penuel. In this way any suggestion that God had to get away at dawn was removed from the tale. Vs. 29a is also from J², and is evidence of popular speculation as to who Jacob's opponent was. J² implies (cf. Judg. 13:17-21) that he was the angel of the Lord. And with men in vs. 28, alluding to Jacob's discomfiture of Laban, is from a later hand than J², who would not thus have commended Jacob's duplicity.

A further purpose of J²'s additions becomes clear when it is recognized that he represents the event recorded in the story as the occasion of an extraordinary change in Jacob. Prior to this his character had left much to be desired. From now on he appears in a new light. There is a vast difference between the depiction of him—however softened by J²—as a crafty rogue in the Laban stories and the patient old man of chs. 37; 42-45.

J² has implicitly given a profound significance to the blessing of vs. 29. What was originally a crass piece of mythology has become in his hands a parable. Jacob, congratulating himself on his final besting of Laban, is brought down to earth by the news of Esau's approach. His reaction is remorse, not penitence, and this determines the preparations he makes to extricate himself from what seems to be a difficult situation.

Christian name. Remember what the Spirit said to "him that overcometh": "I . . . will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written" (Rev. 2:17). As Charles R. Brown wrote:

The ideals you cherish, the purposes you hold, the capacity you feel for something finer than anything as yet attained—all these are contained in that new name written upon the white stone which every man is privileged to wear upon his breast.⁶

29. The Names of God.—In Jacob's question, Tell me, I pray thee, thy name, there is the echo of an ancient superstition, but there is also the reaching out toward an everlasting truth. Men used to think there was a sort of magical potency in a name. A name was much more than a label of identification; it belonged to the essence of a personality. Know a name and you had a way open to the secret of the person. You could use the name not only for invocation but as a spell of incantation. So it was believed in relation not only to human beings but also to beings who were divine. Jacob felt himself in the grip of a supernatural power. He needed above everything to know that power's name.

But beyond the element in Jacob's desire that reflects old superstition there is the greater truth. The Bible is a history of man's discovery, by God's revealing, of nobler names of God. The character of religion is determined by the name and therefore by the nature of the God men worship. That was so all through the O.T. and into the N.T.; and it is true now. God could be thought of as the Elohim, the power in many ways inscrutable, with whom one came into contact in the forces of nature, in the resurrection of light in the springtime, or in the waning of the sun in winter; in the nameless terror of an eclipse, in earthquakes and volcanoes and thunder and lightning and the wild fury of storms. His presence was suggested by the dark mystery of the forest or by some vast old tree and some strangely shaped stone. Modern men may think of God in terms superficially altered but essentially the same. Consider how many there are to whom God is real only when they are confronted by something that mystifies them or shocks them and makes them afraid; a mortal illness, a pestilence, a storm at sea that threatens shipwreck. The name of God may be Yahweh, which signified originally the god of the tribe. Consider the twentieth-century obsession of nationalism which again may make religion the worship of a tribal god, until in its perverted forms patriotism becomes—in Samuel Johnson's words—"the last refuge of a scoundrel." The name of God may be "the God of Sabaoth," the god of war, whose chief function is to lead the fighting men. Read the Song of Moses in Exod. 15, the prayer of Joshua in Josh. 10, the Song of Deborah in Judg. 5, the imprecatory psalms; and consider how in all there he blessed him. 30 So Jacob called the name of the place Peni'el,^v saying, "For I have seen God face to face, and yet my life

^v That is The face of God

But then, at last, he has to reckon with God. He emerges from the conflict physically lamed but spiritually regenerated. Nevertheless, as will be seen, the penalty for his past treatment of Esau has to be paid, and in this section of the tale (33:1-16) the old self-centeredness reappears momentarily for a final purging. And it may well be that in the mind of J² Jacob's suffering at the loss of Joseph was in expiation of the past.

Vs. 32, referring to a custom not elsewhere mentioned in the O.T., is a later addition. The significance of the taboo is uncertain. Robertson Smith (Religion of Semites, p. 380) explains it from the idea that the thigh was sacred as the seat of life. Wellhausen (Reste arabischen Heidentums [2nd ed.; Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1897], p. 168) calls attention to a trace of it in ancient Arabia.

Vs. 30, as has been noted above, is from E, a fragment of the story which he substituted for the J story of the wrestling, shrinking from its stark anthropomorphism. As to whether he drew upon the legend of the founding of the sanctuary at Penuel—of which Peniel is simply another form—it is impossible to say. The site of Penuel has not been identified. All that is known is that it was east of the Jordan, not far from Succoth (cf. 33:17; Judg. 8:5-8).

generations even the church has invoked God for the ends of violence.

But a truer perception of God breaks through the long record of the Bible. His name becomes "the Holy One of Israel." It is seen that his supreme revelation is not in the awesomeness of nature, but in the heart of man; and that his most essential working is not in what the forces of his universe do to man, but in what his spirit achieves within man. Consider the immense significance of the ethical insight of the prophets, beginning with Elijah, and their inflexible message that the Holy One of Israel could not be approached with empty rituals but only through righteousness of life. Later it was perceived that even the name "the Holy One of Israel" was not enough. God's holy purpose was not limited to one people. Read the first chapters of the prophecy of Amos, and see how passionately he makes it clear that all nations alike must become the instruments of the Holy One, in whose hands are the destinies of all mankind. Hosea and Second Isaiah take another step in understanding: with them the sternness of Amos is suffused by a new appreciation of God as redeeming love. And so the O.T. stands at the threshold of the N.T., and over that threshold came Jesus, teaching us to say "Our Father." Which name then interprets God to us? The Lord who is encountered only as the author of the unpredictable emergencies which insurance policies rule out as "acts of God"; the God of the tribe; the God who marches with flags and drums? Or the God of conscience, the God of the growing heart, the God who is seen in the face of him to whom was given "the name which is above every name"?

30. The Encounter with God.—Jacob got no verbal answer to his question. In his demand to know God's name there may have been reflected the primitive belief that to know a name was to have the key word to control (see Expos. on vs. 29). Men have outgrown that idea, but may substitute for it another equally fallacious. Knowledge about God may still seem the important thing; and if some glib theological phrase is learned, we may suppose that we have caught the reality of religion. There is a sense, of course, in which the name of God is decisive for life and hope. Is he fate, or Father? Is he an indifferent force that moves on its blind and cruel way, or can we call upon him as one who has compassion on his children? In that sense to know his name, ultimately revealed as the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, is to have life undergirded by joyful trust. But that sort of knowing does not come through formulas. Jacob could never have got his real answer through a word or phrase. Such may be husks for the intellect, while the soul is left unfed. Jacob had to feel the truth of God—to feel in his own experience an actual contact with the Infinite, to know the awful power of God's holiness that may have to blast and burn our petty human confidence before it can fully bless. That is why Jacob called the place of his struggle Peniel, and said that he had seen God face to face. He did not need to be told anything. Ineffably he knew that his soul was not only is preserved." 31 The sun rose upon him as he passed Penu'el, limping because of his thigh. 32 Therefore to this day the Israelites do not eat the sinew of the hip which is upon the hollow of the thigh, because he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh on the sinew of the hip.

How closely E associated his Penue! story with the account of Jacob's meeting with Esau is apparent from the frequent wordplays on Penue!—The face of God (RSV mg.)—in the latter; cf. vs. 20*b*, in which "see his face" occurs, and in which the Hebrew expressions rendered "appease," "before," and "accept," all have "face" as one of their constituents; cf. also 33:10.

preserved but expanded because he had encountered the terrible but transforming spirit of the Lord.

31. From Darkness into Sunrise.—In the wrestling with his dread antagonist, Jacob's thigh had been thrown out of joint, and henceforth he was lame. But the lame Jacob was to be a better man than the Jacob who had not been lame. It often takes hurts to make better men. A man's conceit and self-sufficiency may have to be humbled before he is fit to play his right role. Jacob as he first appeared dislocated relationships and disturbed society. The only person he cared about was Jacob. He had been possessed by the idea that the best ought properly to belong to him; and if it did not belong to him already, he reached out to take it. He was quicker witted than most people, and so when he used unscrupulous means to get what he wanted, he generally succeeded. Prompted by his mother, he had carried out the conspiracy that had won from blind old Isaac the birthright that should have gone to Esau. Then he had escaped Esau's anger, and got away to a safe place where he could begin to build up his fortunes. In Laban he encountered one who could be crafty too, but in the end he got the best of Laban. He started out poor and came back rich. What else could he be, then, but aggressive and cocksure? He had taken it for granted that in any group he would come out on top. Such qualities may make for what seems success, but they make intolerable men. Something had to happen to Jacob to bring down his self-assurance, and it had happened when the touch of the mysterious antagonist withered his thigh. In his own soul's recognition he was lame. So a new humility begins to appear in him. He will confess his wrong to Esau, ask forgiveness, seek re-entrance into the relationship he knows he has abused. In the home country he seemed a smaller man than when he had been away with Laban. But inwardly he had grown to be a bigger one. He was ready to stop pretending that he was somebody more dominant than he was fit to be.

Consider the enduring relevance of this truth that a man becomes his better self only when he is forced to lay aside his pride. Trace the career of Simon Peter: impulsive and self-assertive, boasting that though other men might fail, he would not fail (Matt. 26:33); brought to confess himself so sinful that he was not fit to stand in Jesus' presence (Luke 5:8); abjectly disgraced at a crucial hour, so that he went and wept in bitter shame (Matt. 26:75); but through these experiences chastened so that afterward he would be faithful. Trace the career of Saul of Tarsus made into the apostle Paul: his pride as a Pharisee, his confidence in his learning and his Hebrew birthright, his cold fanaticism of self-assurance as he watched the death of Stephen; then his conversion, his repudiation of his imagined worth (Phil. 3:8), his recognition of the weakness of all human strength (Rom. 7:9-23), and his emergence into the man who by confession and humility was exalted.

Consider this same truth in relation to classes and nations. Ponder those economic and social groups in history that have failed because they would not recognize their defects as revealed by the truth of God. And must a nation's prosperity and seeming success blind it to the fact that self-sufficiency will bring it to a moral reckoning with God by which it may be not only lamed, but so broken that it will be at the end of its road?

The story of Jacob's wrestling ends on a brighter note. As he passed over Penue! the sun rose upon him. At the very hour when he might have been most discouraged about himself, a new day dawned. Being ready now to recognize his shortcomings, he could begin to pass beyond them. He knew he was lame and so had stopped thinking of himself as a person of unlimited fitness and unlimited deserts. Instead, he was willing to learn what God might do with a man who confessed that he was lame. To learn that may be the last and greatest lesson for many a human soul.

C. JACOB'S MEETING WITH ESAU (33:1-16)

33:1-16. This section is basically from J². Into it R^{JE} has inserted from the parallel E recension the words and embraced him . . . and kissed him in vs. 4, and vss. 5, 10b, 11a. For Jacob, vs. 1 and throughout this narrative, and in vs. 17 and in the story in ch. 34, J², having recorded the changing of Jacob's name (32:28), probably had "Israel" (cf. 35:21; 37:13; etc.). The present use of Jacob is due to R^P, who preferred not to anticipate 35:10 (P).

33:1-17. Jacob and Esau Meet and Part.—In this chapter the long and fascinating story of the relationship between Esau and Jacob comes to its conclusion. Here, as earlier, the curious contrast between the characters of the two brothers is manifest. Esau is impetuous and outgoing, moved by the impulse of the moment; Jacob is cautious and calculating. Jacob has just been depicted in his all-night wrestling, struggling in the darkness until he had won "power with God" and had been given his great new name of Israel. Yet here, after all that, one sees again some of the traits of the same old Jacob who had schemed Esau out of his birthright. What is the explanation of these inconsistent pictures? Perhaps it must be found in a recognition that the O.T. writers, along with their extraordinary spiritual insights, had also the limited estimates which belonged to their racial inheritance, their environment, and their time. On the one hand, they had caught the supreme truth of the overruling grace of God. On the other hand, as they thought of Jacob, ancestor of the Israelites, as against Esau, ancestor of the Edomites, they never wholly escaped the impulse to take a very human pride in Jacob's superior shrewdness and skill; and they do not seem to have been troubled by the fact that—as they portray him—he was not guileless. They had not begun to reach the understanding of the One who would ultimately say, "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein" (Mark 10:15).

So it comes about that in this chapter, as in some of the earlier ones, Esau seems at first the better of the two brothers. Jacob is full of inhibitions; Esau has none, and lets himself go wherever the flood of his emotion turns. Jacob makes his elaborate plans to placate what he thinks will be Esau's long-cherished wrath. Esau has dismissed that long ago, and the instinct uppermost in him is just the old one of kinship. So he ran to meet Jacob, and fell on his

7 And Leah also with her children came near, and bowed themselves: and after came Joseph near and Rachel, and they bowed themselves.

8 And he said, What meanest thou by all this drove which I met? And he said, These are to find grace in the sight of my lord.

9 And Esau said, I have enough, my brother; keep that thou hast unto thyself.

10 And Jacob said, Nay, I pray thee, if now I have found grace in thy sight, then receive my present at my hand: for therefore I have seen thy face, as though I had seen the face of God, and thou wast pleased with me.

11 Take, I pray thee, my blessing that is brought to thee; because God hath dealt graciously with me, and because I have enough. And he urged him, and he took it.

12 And he said, Let us take our journey, and let us go, and I will go before thee.

dren, and bowed down; 7 Leah likewise and her children drew near and bowed down; and last Joseph and Rachel drew near, and they bowed down. 8 Esau said, "What do you mean by all this company which I met?" Jacob answered, "To find favor in the sight of my lord." 9 But Esau said, "I have enough, my brother; keep what you have for yourself." 10 Jacob said, "No, I pray you, if I have found favor in your sight, then accept my present from my hand; for truly to see your face is like seeing the face of God, with such favor have you received me. 11 Accept, I pray you, my gift that is brought to you, because God has dealt graciously with me, and because I have enough." Thus he urged him, and he took it.

12 Then Esau said, "Let us journey on our way, and I will go before you." 13 But Jacob said to him, "My lord knows that the children are frail, and that the flocks and herds giving suck are a care to me; and if they are overdriven for one day, all the

It will be recalled that in the J² narrative Jacob, preparing to meet Esau, had divided his flock and herds into two companies for the sake of their safety (32:7-8). The irony with which J² recorded the sequel has been obscured by R^{J^E} by his insertion of vss. 10*b*, 11*a*. According to J², when Esau inquired why it was that Jacob's caravan was traveling in two divisions Jacob, still terrified, did not dare give the true explanation but, to save his face, gave half of his possessions to Esau (vss. 8-9, 11*b*)—which he had not had the slightest intention of doing. And J²'s sardonic humor finds further expression neck, and kissed him. He is unconcerned with all the presents Jacob tries to urge upon him; he does not want them. And note the difference in the way each of the two speaks to the other. Jacob, fearful and anxious, says of the presents he is offering, These are to find grace in the sight of my lord. But Esau waves them aside, because he has enough, and because Jacob is my brother.

How strange are the mingled elements in human characters! Esau was to be reckoned as the "profane" man; and in the end, of the two he was the failure. Yet in immediate ways he seemed often so much more attractive; for he was vigorous, warmhearted, and too essentially good-natured to carry a grudge. One can see men like him in every generation—impulsive, friendly men who seem to like everybody, and whom it is easy for everybody to like. Yet their fatal weakness may be, as with Esau, that they are too easygoing to care greatly about the values in life that matter most.

Consider, on the other hand, Jacob. Even yet he has not finished with the consequences of old wrongs. He is distrustful of Esau because he knows that he has not deserved kindness at his hands. That is always one of the possible penalties of wrongdoing. A man projects into the imagined feelings of others the condemnation he inwardly visits upon himself. He dares not assume their good will, or even take the risk of believing in it when it is made plain. So Jacob not only tried anxiously to buy Esau's favor, but when Esau showed that he had it without any price, Jacob was still incredulous; and the one thing he wanted to do was to separate from Esau as soon as he plausibly could (vss. 12-15). And yet, and yet—this Jacob is the one who at Peniel had "prevailed," had "seen God face to face," and who would prevail. The 14 Let my lord, I pray thee, pass over before his servant; and I will lead on softly, according as the cattle that goeth before me and the children be able to endure, until I come unto my lord unto Seir.

flocks will die. 14 Let my lord pass on before his servant, and I will lead on slowly, according to the pace of the cattle which are before me and according to the pace of the children, until I come to my lord in Se'ir."

15 So Esau said, "Let me leave with you some of the men who are with me." But he said, "What need is there? Let me find favor in the sight of my lord." 16 So Esau returned that day on his way to Se'ir. 17 But Jacob journeyed to Succoth,^w and built himself a house, and made booths for his cattle; therefore the name of the place is called Succoth.

in Jacob's nervous rejection of his brother's proposal that they continue their journey together (vss. 13-15). Jacob's sigh of relief when the other set out for his home in Seir (vs. 16) is almost audible.

The E recension simply told of Esau's acceptance of Jacob's gift and of the brothers' reconciliation.

XL. JACOB AND HIS FAMILY (33:17-35:26)

A. JACOB COMES TO SHECHEM (33:17-20)

17-20. This section is a conflation of J², E, and P. J² told of Jacob proceeding to Succoth (vs. 17aα)—the site of Succoth is unknown—and there crossing the Jordan en route to Shechem, where from the sons of Hamor . . . he bought for a hundred pieces of money the piece of land on which he had pitched his tent (vs. 19; Shechem's father is from RP, harmonizing the notice with ch. 34). The sons of Hamor were, it may be inferred from Judg. 9:28, historically one of the leading clans of Shechem. The piece of land Jacob purchased from them was the site of Joseph's grave (cf. Josh. 24:32). J¹, whose familiarity with the details of the Joseph tradition of Shechem was of the slightest, appears to have known nothing of this. J², on the other hand, is concerned to assert the Israelite claim to the shrine there (cf. ch. 23 [P]), the ownership of which thus appears to have been in dispute at the time he wrote. This was one of the reasons for which he brought Jacob to Shechem. For in having Jacob cross the Jordan at Succoth J² was departing radically from the J¹ narrative.

As Meyer (Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, pp. 275-76; cf. Skinner, Genesis, pp. 414, 427) has shown, in the J narrative in its primary form Jacob's route from the Jabbok to Hebron lay east of the Jordan. Thus it was in the territory of the tribe bearing his name that Reuben's violation of his father's concubine occurred (35:22a). It was because of this shocking act of impiety, J¹ implies, that Reuben lost the prerogatives belonging to him as first-born (Meyer, op. cit., p. 276; Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse, pp. 23-24).

J², by having Jacob cross the Jordan to Shechem and proceed from there to Hebron, necessarily transferred the scene of Reuben's impiety to some undefined point between Shechem and Hebron. More important, however, is his change in the Joseph story. J¹, as will be seen, located the sale of Joseph to the Ishmaelites in the south. J², possibly in dependence upon a detail of the Joseph tradition unknown to his predecessor, transferred it to the north. This was indeed the second reason for which he brought Jacob to Shechem.

The E parallel narrative is very different from this account of Jacob's peaceful arrival at Shechem. He first told of Jacob building himself a house, possibly at the place where he had met Esau, and making booths for his cattle, for which reason the place

18 ¶ And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Shechem, which is in the land of Canaan, when he came from Padan-aram; and pitched his tent before the city.

19 And he bought a parcel of a field, where he had spread his tent, at the hand of the children of Hamor, Shechem's father, for a hundred pieces of money.

20 And he erected there an altar, and called it El-Elohe-Israel.

18 And Jacob came safely to the city of Shechem, which is in the land of Canaan, on his way from Paddan-aram; and he camped before the city. 19 And from the sons of Hamor, Shechem's father, he bought for a hundred pieces of money* the piece of land on which he had pitched his tent. 20 There he erected an altar and called it El-El'öhe-Israel.†

* Heb a hundred qesitas

† That is God, the God of Israel

received the name of Succoth (vs. 17aβb). The implication of the house building is that Jacob remained there for some considerable time. E would here seem to be echoing the northern tradition that the invading Israelites had occupied the country there for some time before moving west (cf. W. F. Albright, "Archaeology and the Date of the Hebrew Conquest of Palestine," Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, No. 58 [1935], p. 15). This tradition also underlies the account—peculiar to E—of the conquest of the Amorite kingdom of Sihon (Num. 21:21-31).

The E notice of how long Jacob remained at Succoth and of his departure therefrom has been dropped by RJE, who preferred at this point the J² representation that Jacob settled down quietly near Shechem, buying the land where he had spread his tent. E, having had Jacob remain at Succoth long enough for his family to grow up and for himself to acquire a considerable retinue, had told of Jacob taking the place by storm. This is indicated by Jacob's dying reference to the event in 48:22, where the wordplay on Shechem is to be noted (cf. RSV mg.). The beginning of this narrative is found in vs. 18b, and he camped before the city, where camped before in its original content had a hostile significance (cf. Isa. 29:3). The conclusion of it is in vs. 20, in which "a pillar" (maççēbhāh) is to be read for an altar, with Wellhausen (Composition, p. 50; Wellhausen is followed by most modern commentators; see Holzinger, Genesis, pp. 212-13; Gunkel, Genesis, p. 369; Skinner, Genesis, p. 416). The Hebrew word rendered erected is from the same root as maççēbhāh, and is not elsewhere used of the building of an altar.

The pillar thus referred to, it may be inferred, was still standing at Shechem when E wrote. Originally it was, no doubt, the ceremonial maççēbhāh of some sanctuary, but in the course of time it had come to be regarded as the memorial which Jacob had erected following his capture of Shechem (cf. Exod. 17:15; I Sam. 15:12). The name it bore, El-Elohe-Israel (vs. 20), was also ascribed to Jacob. It may be noted that this is E's introduction of the name Israel. As to whether or not he recorded a changing of Jacob's name, as in 32:28 (J), it is impossible to say. In either case, he continued to use the name Jacob in his narrative (cf. 35:20, and see further below).

Vs. 18aαβ is from P. On his way from Paddan-aram (vs. 18aγ) is from RP, inserted because of his transposition of 35:9, 11—occurring in P before this, see below—to their present context.

reason was in the fact which the earlier chapters already have prefigured, that this man in spite of his faults never lost the consciousness that his life must try to relate itself to God.

18-20. Jacob's Altars.—In these final verses there is symbolized what has been suggested in connection with the preceding verses, viz., why it was Jacob and not Esau who, notwithstanding many contrary indications, was to become the decisive figure in the history of Israel. There is no record that Esau ever built an altar. His interests moved casually and, in the main, contentedly upon the level of this earth. But for Jacob life had another dimension. As he had done at other times and places, so now upon his return home he erected there an altar. And he called it El-Elohe-Israel. It was dedicated to God, as God's chastening yet redeeming power had been revealed to him at Peniel. Not by any virtue of what he was, but by the purpose of God which would work through him, his life would be significant.

34 And Dinah the daughter of Leah, which she bare unto Jacob, went out to see the daughters of the land.

2 And when Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the country, saw her, he took her, and lay with her, and defiled her.

34 Now Dinah the daughter of Leah, whom she had borne to Jacob, went out to visit the women of the land; 2 and when Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, the prince of the land, saw her, he seized her and lay with her and humbled her.

B. SEDUCTION OF DINAH (34:1-31)

34:1-31. This chapter is a conflation of J and a narrative from a secondary strand of P. (Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 369-74; Smend, Erzählung des Hexateuch, pp. 93-94; Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse, pp. 23-25, regard the chapter as a conflation of J [J¹, L] and E. Skinner, Genesis, pp. 417-18, with considerable hesitancy, makes it a conflation of supplementary narratives attached respectively to J and E. Procksch, Genesis, pp. 199-200, 543-44, holds that it is a conflation of J and P. An analysis of the chapter, substantiating in detail the position advanced here, will be found in Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 116-21.) The two narratives, as will be seen, differed markedly from each other so that RP, who conflated them, had to provide considerable harmonizing material.

It has already been noted that in 35:22a J¹ accounts for the fact that the tribe of Reuben, supposedly descended from the first-born of Jacob, was not the leader of the tribes of Israel: Reuben had forfeited the prerogatives and privileges of his position by his shocking act of impiety. These prerogatives would have then passed to Simeon, Jacob's second son. But his putative descendants were also historically of little importance. J¹ accounts for this fact by the present story. Simeon, by an act of treachery, lost the leadership which had come to him; and since Levi, the third son of Jacob, was involved with Simeon, the rights and privileges of the first-born passed to Judah (cf. Eissfeldt, op. cit., pp. 23-24; see also Simpson, op. cit., pp. 132, 471), the eponymous ancestor of the most powerful group in the south, and for J¹ the leading tribe of Israel.

This story of how Simeon and Levi lost their rights must therefore in the J¹ document have followed the account of Reuben's downfall and have been located in the south. Nor would there be any reason for J² to change this order of events. The J narrative thus had nothing to do with Shechem, where the P narrative, on the other hand, was firmly rooted. RP, conflating the two stories, necessarily retained Shechem as the scene of the outrage.

Support for the position that in the J narrative the incident was located in the south is provided by the reading of several LXX MSS of "the Horite" for the Hivite in vs. 2, the correctness of which has been argued by Meyer (Israeliten und ihre

34:1-31. Provocation and Revenge.—A dark and turbulent old tale is this, with good and evil strangely mingled. There is the pathos of a girl's betrayal; the wild passion of a young man who was not corrupt at heart; the fierce, unbridled vengeance let loose upon him. It is life in the raw, as it was lived in a primitive society; and yet its essential emotions are common to human beings always.

Jacob's daughter, Dinah, goes out to see the daughters of the land—the innocent venture of a young girl wanting to find friends. To her there came the tragedy which has come to some girls in every age and place—the tragedy which Thomas Hardy has made timeless in Tess of the d'Urbervilles. A young man sees her, covets her, violates her. Yet what he meant and what he did were not completely evil. It was not a trivial affection that Shechem felt for Dinah. Of the warmth with which he loved her it was written that his soul clave to her. He begged his father, Hamor, to secure her for his wife. So much for Shechem. But now others come into the picture. Jacob heard what had happened to Dinah and held his peace until his sons came in from the field. When he told them they were furious that Shechem had defiled their sister, and wrought folly in Israel, . . . which thing ought not to be done. How charged with meaning the old words are! Which thing ought not to be done. So speaks a moral conscience which is as old as history. As long as men have been human they have had a sense of ought and ought not, and have known that they were held accountable

3 And his soul clave unto Dinah the daughter of Jacob, and he loved the damsel, and spake kindly unto the damsel.

4 And Shechem spake unto his father Hamor, saying, Get me this damsel to wife.

5 And Jacob heard that he had defiled Dinah his daughter: now his sons were with his cattle in the field: and Jacob held his peace until they were come.

3 And his soul was drawn to Dinah the daughter of Jacob; he loved the maiden and spoke tenderly to her. 4 So Shechem spoke to his father Hamor, saying, "Get me this maiden for my wife." 5 Now Jacob heard that he had defiled his daughter Dinah; but his sons were with his cattle in the field, so Jacob held his peace until they came.

Nachbarstämme, p. 331). The O.T. consistently locates the Horites in the south (14:6; 36:20-21, 29-30; Deut. 2:12, 22; cf. Num. 13:5; I Chr. 1:39).

The name of Dinah's suitor in the J narrative here cannot therefore have been Shechem (vs. 2). The reference to him as the young man in vs. 19 (J) suggests that he may well have been designated simply as "a young man, a Horite"; with this may be compared I Sam. 30:13, where "a young man of Egypt" is a rendering of the Hebrew "a young man, an Egyptian."

The J¹ story told of how this young man fell in love with Dinah (vs. 3), of his cohabitation with her (vs. 2b α)—apparently with her consent; the representation of the act as a rape is from J²; the word rendered seized (vs. 2 RSV) does not necessarily have a stronger connotation than took (KJV); see below. Her father, hearing of this, told his sons about it when they returned from the field (vss. 5 $\alpha\gamma$, 7 $\alpha\beta$). The young man, however, agreed to undergo circumcision (cf. vss. 11-14), the implication being that this would satisfy the girl's family so that marriage would follow. But Simeon and Levi, despite the agreement, killed the young man and took Dinah out of his house. It may be assumed that J¹'s version of the tale concluded with an explicit condemnation of their action by Jacob.

This story J² took over from J¹, adding to vs. 2 the words and humbled her, and to vs. 7, and very angry, because he had wrought folly in Israel. He also substituted for the condemnation of Simeon and Levi which, it is assumed, J¹ had put in the mouth of Jacob, the somewhat colorless vs. 30 and the brothers' indignant justification of their act (vs. 31).

J² thus reveals an attitude toward sex more rigorous than that of J¹. The latter's horror of sexual perversion is indicated by his expurgation of the story in 9:21-25, and by his comment in 13:13. The revulsion with which he regarded the incestuous action of Lot's daughters (19:30-35) has been noted. And his abhorrence of adultery is implicit in 35:22a; 39:11-12. On the other hand, he records without condemnation Dinah's yielding to the Horite, and, as will be seen, describes with evident admiration the heroic measures taken by Tamar to ensure the realization of her right to bear children (ch. 38). In both these narratives the women concerned were either unmarried or widowed, so there was no infraction of the marital rights of a third party; nor is there in the stories any suggestion of promiscuity. J¹'s attitude toward sex, where perversion, incest, or the rights of a third party were not involved, was thus essentially matter of fact.

For J² the matter was less simple. It was doubtless his contact with Baalism that made him more aware than his predecessor had been of the lurking dangers in the relationships of men and women. As a result, there is a certain note of melancholy in his treatment of the problem of sex—already noted in the Exeg. of ch. 3—and this led to his revision of the J¹ narrative here.

It may be noted that since both J¹ and J² had placed Jacob's marriages to Leah and Rachel soon after his arrival at Laban's, according to J² more than twenty years before (cf. 31:38), there is no difficulty as regards the ages of Simeon, Levi, and Dinah in fitting the story into their narratives.

It is hard to say what the historical event was upon which the J¹ tale was based. It was probably some act of treachery toward the Horites on the part of the clans of Simeon

6 ¶ And Hamor the father of Shechem went out unto Jacob to commune with him.

7 And the sons of Jacob came out of the field when they heard it: and the men were grieved, and they were very wroth, because he had wrought folly in Israel in lying with Jacob's daughter; which thing ought not to be done.

8 And Hamor communed with them, saying, The soul of my son Shechem longeth for your daughter: I pray you give her him to wife.

9 And make ye marriages with us, and give your daughters unto us, and take our daughters unto you.

10 And ye shall dwell with us: and the land shall be before you; dwell and trade ye therein, and get you possessions therein.

11 And Shechem said unto her father and unto her brethren, Let me find grace in your eyes, and what ye shall say unto me I will give.

12 Ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye shall

6 And Hamor the father of Shechem went out to Jacob to speak with him. 7 The sons of Jacob came in from the field when they heard of it; and the men were indignant and very angry, because he had wrought folly in Israel by lying with Jacob's daughter, for such a thing ought not to be done.

8 But Hamor spoke with them, saying, "The soul of my son Shechem longs for your daughter; I pray you, give her to him in marriage. 9 Make marriages with us; give your daughters to us, and take our daughters for yourselves. 10 You shall dwell with us; and the land shall be open to you; dwell and trade in it, and get property in it."

11 Shechem also said to her father and to her brothers, "Let me find favor in your eyes, and whatever you say to me I will give.

and Levi, and this may well have been a contributing cause to their near annihilation reflected in 49:5-7.

The P story contained nothing of any dishonoring of Dinah, but told of the desire of Shechem, the son of Hamor, to have her as his wife, and of Hamor entering into negotiations with Jacob for a general treaty permitting marriage between their respective families. To this Jacob agreed, provided the Shechemites would undergo circumcision, a condition which was immediately accepted.

This story, coming from P², may well represent an attempt—somewhat liberal in its outlook (cf. Isa. 56:2)—to deal with the problem of mixed marriages which troubled the postexilic Palestinian community.

RP, finding in the documents with which he was working two stories in which circumcision was laid down as the condition on which a foreigner could marry an Israelite woman, combined them, identifying "the young man" of the J narrative with Shechem the son of Hamor. The process of conflation was accomplished with little difficulty up to the point at which the young man in the J narrative, and all the Shechemites in the P narrative, were circumcised. Then to provide an ending to his new narrative congruent with that of J, RP supplied vs. 25*b*, 27-29. The awkward confusion of these verses, noted by all commentators, is an indication of their redactional character.

7. Wrought folly in Israel: This striking phrase is again used of acts of sexual immorality in Deut. 22:21; Judg. 20:6, 10; II Sam. 13:12-13; Jer. 29:23; cf. Judg. 19:23, 24.

to its judgment. And there is the other word, the significance of which the sons of Jacob did not stop to ponder. Shechem's act was to them an insult and an outrage, a crime to be avenged. But it was also folly. With Shechem, and with many a man in every time, some evil deed has come to pass not through deliberate viciousness, but through the hot impulse and the lack of self-control which makes the man morally a fool. As Edward Rowland Sill has put it:

"Tis not by guilt the onward sweep
Of truth and right, O Lord, we stay;
'Tis by our follies that so long
We hold the earth from heaven away."

say unto me: but give me the damsel to wife.

13 And the sons of Jacob answered Shechem and Hamor his father deceitfully, and said, because he had defiled Dinah their sister:

14 And they said unto them, We cannot do this thing, to give our sister to one that is uncircumcised; for that were a reproach unto us:

15 But in this will we consent unto you: If ye will be as we be, that every male of you be circumcised;

16 Then will we give our daughters unto you, and we will take your daughters to us, and we will dwell with you, and we will become one people.

17 But if ye will not hearken unto us, to be circumcised; then will we take our daughter, and we will be gone.

18 And their words pleased Hamor and Shechem Hamor's son.

19 And the young man deferred not to do the thing, because he had delight in Jacob's daughter: and he was more honorable than all the house of his father.

20 ¶ And Hamor and Shechem his son came unto the gate of their city, and communed with the men of their city, saying,

21 These men are peaceable with us; therefore let them dwell in the land, and trade therein; for the land, behold, it is large enough for them; let us take their daughters to us for wives, and let us give them our daughters.

22 Only herein will the men consent unto us for to dwell with us, to be one people, if every male among us be circumcised, as they are circumcised.

you say to me; only give me the maiden to be my wife."

13 The sons of Jacob answered Shechem and his father Hamor deceitfully, because he had defiled their sister Dinah. 14 They said to them, "We cannot do this thing, to give our sister to one who is uncircumcised, for that would be a disgrace to us. 15 Only on this condition will we consent to you: that you will become as we are and every male of you be circumcised. 16 Then we will give our daughters to you, and we will take your daughters to ourselves, and we will dwell with you and become one people. 17 But if you will not listen to us and be circumcised, then we will take our daughter, and we will be gone."

18 Their words pleased Hamor and Hamor's son Shechem. 19 And the young man did not delay to do the thing, because he had delight in Jacob's daughter. Now he was the most honored of all his family. 20 So Hamor and his son Shechem came to the gate of their city and spoke to the men of their city, saying, 21 "These men are friendly with us; let them dwell in the land and trade in it, for behold, the land is large enough for them; let us take their daughters in marriage, and let us give them our daughters. 22 Only on this condition will the men agree to dwell with us, to become one people: that every male among us be

In Josh. 7:15 it refers to Achan's act of impiety in taking plunder for himself at the capture of Jericho, thus breaking God's command that the city and everything in it was to be utterly destroyed.

The word nebhālāh, here translated folly, and its cognate nābhāl, "fool," are difficult to render in English. "Fool," and "folly" . . . are inadequate, and suggest wrong associations. The fault of the nābāl [nābhāl] is not weakness of reason, but moral and religious insensibility, a rooted incapacity to discern moral and religious relations, leading

So Shechem had committed folly, and was guilty for that fact. He deserved punishment, and Jacob's sons were determined to make themselves the agents of it. But what they did was worse than the original offense, more cruel, more hateful, and more ruinous. Its ugly details are written in the story, and they include the smooth advances of calculated deceit, then treachery, then pitiless slaughter. The whole action of Jacob's sons was an example of the way in which men can make the pretense of administering justice become an excuse for fero-

24 And unto Hamor and unto Shechem his son hearkened all that went out of the gate of his city; and every male was circumcised, all that went out of the gate of his city.

25 ¶ And it came to pass on the third day, when they were sore, that two of the sons of Jacob, Simeon and Levi, Dinah's brethren, took each man his sword, and came upon the city boldly, and slew all the males.

26 And they slew Hamor and Shechem his son with the edge of the sword, and took Dinah out of Shechem's house, and went out.

27 The sons of Jacob came upon the slain, and spoiled the city, because they had defiled their sister.

28 They took their sheep, and their oxen, and their asses, and that which was in the city, and that which was in the field,

Only let us agree with them, and they will dwell with us." 24 And all who went out of the gate of his city hearkened to Hamor and his son Shechem; and every male was circumcised, all who went out of the gate of his city.

25 On the third day, when they were sore, two of the sons of Jacob, Simeon and Levi, Dinah's brothers, took their swords and came upon the city unawares, and killed all the males. 26 They slew Hamor and his son Shechem with the sword, and took Dinah out of Shechem's house, and went away. 27 And the sons of Jacob came upon the slain, and plundered the city, because their sister had been defiled; 28 they took their flocks and their herds, their asses, and whatever was in the city and in the field; 29 all their wealth, all their little ones and their wives, all that was in the houses, they captured and made their prey. 30 Then Jacob said to Simeon and Levi, "You have brought trouble on me by making me odious to the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites and the Per'izzites; my numbers are few, and if they gather themselves against me and attack me, I shall be to an intolerant repudiation in practice of the claims which they impose. . . . Senseless and senselessness may be suggested as fair English equivalents, it being understood that the defective 'sense' which they predicate shows itself particularly in acts of impiety, profligacy, and churlishness, and that it is, in fact, the latter ideas which the two words, in actual use, really connote." (S. R. Driver, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Deuteronomy [New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1895; "International Critical Commentary"], p. 256.) I.e., the fool is one who refuses to recognize his obligations to the community to which he belongs. Folly, the action of a fool, is thus action which is criminally irresponsible, making for social, and so for personal, disintegration.

cious violence. In modern society that is no longer so possible for individuals. The modern area where it is possible is in war. The massed and impersonal violence of a nation against another nation can be almost as brutal as the work of Jacob's sons. The nation which has no restraining principle in its world contacts may be—to use our common phrase—"in bad odor" among decent peoples. Jacob had a stronger word for it. Using that, men of conscience within a nation could say to those who would dishonor the whole national membership by militaristic

C. JACOB'S RETURN TO BETHEL (35:1-15)

35:1-15. This section is a conflation of E and P. From E are derived vss. 1-5, 6b, 7-8, 14a, telling how Jacob at God's command left Shechem for Bethel to fulfill the vow he had made (28:20) twenty years before. In vss. 2-4 there is an echo of a local tradition—the motif recurs in Josh. 24:14-18—accounting for the imageless character of the worship at Shechem (cf. Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, p. 559). The fact that nowhere in the preceding narratives is there the slightest suggestion that Jacob's family had been practicing idol worship would seem to indicate that in its primary form the tradition had no connection with Jacob. It had simply said that under the oak which was near Shechem (vs. 4)—probably identical with the oak at Moreh (12:6; Deut. 11:30)—there were buried images of gods that had once been worshiped by Israel's ancestors. This tradition E now associated with Jacob. He thus not only drew the sting of the J story of the theft of Laban's household gods; he also represented Jacob as the person savagery, You make me to stink among the inhabitants of the earth.

35:1-7. Belated Obedience.—Let the mind linger upon this chapter's first three words, And God said. They are not new. In Genesis one comes upon them again and again. They are so short and seem so simple that it is possible to pass over them almost without notice. Yet in those three syllables sounds a supreme motif of this whole book. And God said. . . . God said the words that made creation. God said what Adam and Eve should hear in Eden. God said to Cain, "Thou art cursed from the earth"; and to Noah, "With thee will I establish my covenant." He spoke to Abraham, and to Isaac, and now to Jacob. In the actual issues of life, and to all sorts of men, the good and the bad and the in-between, God makes his purpose known. That is the continual message of Genesis, and nothing in the book is more important than that. If we ask haggling questions about the how of revelation, we shall find no answer. What we do find is simply the plain, straight statement of the fact. The old writers knew nothing of our "psychology," but they knew a great deal about what happens in human souls. One thing they knew was that every man has a conscience, and that God in his own way will make that conscience recognize truth it cannot pretend it does not hear.

So much for the general fact. Consider now the special suggestion of the words as they have to do with Jacob. God said to him, Arise, go up to Bethel, and dwell there. It was at Bethel in the days of his worst distress that he had seen his vision of the ladder reaching up to heaven and the angels of God ascending and descending. He had set up an altar there that day and

5 And they journeyed: and the terror of God was upon the cities that were round about them, and they did not pursue after the sons of Jacob.

6 ¶ So Jacob came to Luz which is in the land of Canaan, that is, Bethel, he and all the people that were with him.

7 And he built there an altar, and called the place El-beth-el; because there God appeared unto him, when he fled from the face of his brother.

8 But Deborah Rebekah's nurse died, and she was buried beneath Bethel under an oak: and the name of it was called Allon-bachuth.

5 And as they journeyed, a terror from God fell upon the cities that were round about them, so that they did not pursue the sons of Jacob. 6 And Jacob came to Luz (that is, Bethel), which is in the land of Canaan, he and all the people who were with him, 7 and there he built an altar, and called the place El-bethel,^z because there God had revealed himself to him when he fled from his brother. 8 And Deb'orah, Rebekah's nurse, died, and she was buried under an oak below Bethel; so the name of it was called Al'lon-bacuth.^a who had established monolatry in Israel, and so claimed for him a place of much greater significance in the development of Yahwism than had ever been suggested by J².

The reference in vs. 5 is to Jacob's storming of Shechem. The implication is that Jacob spent little time there after taking the city. Vs. 7 records Jacob's actual fulfillment of his vow. Vs. 8, curious because of its sudden introduction of Rebekah's nurse as a member of Jacob's caravan, may be secondary, a fragment of the tradition of the sanctuary Allon-bacuth. This may be identical with the Bochim mentioned in Judg. 2:5. Vs. 14aα was originally the continuation of vs. 8, and told of Jacob erecting a pillar on Deborah's grave. The verse in its present form is from RP, equating the pillar with that mentioned in 28:18.

sworn a vow of dedication. But that was many years ago. Early intentions had grown dim. He had lived in Laban's country, and if he had held on supposedly to his own faith, he did not hold it so importantly as to be troubled by the fact that his household had its idols. And when he came back to the home country, he did not go to Bethel; he went to Shechem, a softer place.

He did not intend what happened there: but what did happen came about because that was where he took his family. Dinah, his daughter, "went out to see the daughters of the land" (34:1). It was the natural thing for any young girl to do—to look for companionship. She found it, and the result was tragic, as the story in ch. 34 has recounted. Whose fault was it? Dinah's? If hers in part, certainly not hers wholly; and indeed the story gives no sign that she anticipated the evil in which she was caught. Whose fault, then? Jacob's conscience knew well enough. What had he done to give this daughter any conception of the God with whom he had once made a covenant? How had he helped fortify her for the temptations she might meet? Who but himself had brought her to where temptations were? So Jacob had to ask himself, and it was a remorseful answer that he had to make. Now he would try to give his family the religious dedication which they should have had at first: he would go with them to Bethel and renew there the sense of the presence of God which he ought to have sought before.

8. The Humbly Great.—A name, a single descriptive word, and one bare statement; that is all. Meager information, but a spark for the imagination. For why should Deborah's death find place in the narrative at all unless there was one clear reason, viz., her loss was grievous to somebody? It had no importance in history, but there was somebody whose heart was feeling what another would one day put into words:

But she is in her grave, and, oh,
The difference to me!^{*}

Deborah was the nurse of Jacob's mother, and perhaps two generations of the family had depended upon her loving faithfulness. Later in the same chapter it is told that Rachel, the wife whom Jacob loved above all other human beings, died when Benjamin was born. If Deborah had been with her, conceivably she might have lived.

So the humble person may play a part in human affections and needs that will never be

^b Heb El Shaddai

The rest of the material in the section is from P or RP. Part of it, vs. 6a 11-13a, 15, occupied in P the same position as the Bethel saga (28:11-22) in JE (Gunkel, Genesis, p. 387; cf. Skinner, Genesis, pp. 425-26); i.e., P followed JE in the representation that it was at Bethel on his way to visit Laban that Jacob was appointed heir to the divine promise first made to Abraham. Thus the command, be fruitful and multiply (vs. 11), in its original context had an appropriateness quite lacking at this point in the narrative, following the chronicle of the birth of Jacob's family. RP, perhaps because he felt it would be too difficult to conflate it with 28:11-22, placed it here and, by changing the E accounted for in public records. Who can measure all that nurses have given to those they loved and served? The formal definition in the dictionary is only a cold form of words, but "my nurse" may say something immensely more. Robert Louis Stevenson prefaced his Child's Garden of Verses with a dedication "To Alison Cunningham, from Her Boy," a dedication which begins:

For the long nights you lay awake
And watched for my unworthy sake, and ends with a prayer that every child may hear as kind a voice

As made my childish days rejoice!

Similarly, though they cannot put it so fittingly into words, many may remember the nurse that has been a second mother; and when she dies, the place where she is buried may well have such a name as Deborah's Allon-bacuth, the Oak of weeping.

In modern times the word "nurse" has come also to have a broader association. Nurses are not only the simple and unlearned persons who have charge of children. There is also the "trained nurse." Something new in history began with Florence Nightingale. The care of the sick has been revolutionized, and the incalculable ministry of modern hospitals made possible by the trained nurse. Then Lillian Wald in New York established the "visiting nurses," and sent their gentleness and skill into the homes of the poor to be a benediction to whole communities.

Yet always it is the spirit rather than the institution which is vital. Professional nursing, with its new dignity of status and unlimited possibilities for good, can be spoiled if it is separated from its original root of warm compassion. Who has not seen and felt the difference between a nurse who really cares, and the perfunctory one who is interested only in drawing her pay and watching the clock? Much has rightly been done by organized nurses in self-protection, in improving working conditions and establishing reasonable hours. But with nursing, as with every other profession, if it becomes commercialized its finest meaning is corrupted. A decisive difference comes through the contribution made by a warm human heart. To care enough for people to be sensitive to suffering, to want so much to help that the thought of self can disappear, is a more priceless thing even than technical ability. That makes nursing a dedication, and exalts the nurse into an instrument of the spirit for whom many men and women may thank God.

9-15. The Name Israel: Another Record.—The compiler of Genesis in its ultimate form has already included the vivid stories, drawn from J and E and woven together, of Jacob's wrestling by the brook Jabbok with the awesome antagonist who said to him at last, "Thy name

13 And God went up from him in the place where he talked with him.

14 And Jacob set up a pillar in the place where he talked with him, even a pillar of stone: and he poured a drink offering thereon, and he poured oil thereon.

16 Then they journeyed from Bethel; and when they were still some distance from Ephrath, Rachel travailed, and she had verse referring to the pillar on Deborah's grave, made the pillar a memorial of the theophany.

P placed the incident recorded in vss. 9-10 not at Bethel but on the border of Palestine; i.e., the change of Jacob's name to Israel occurred in that document in relatively the same position as in J (32:24-30).

D. BIRTH OF BENJAMIN (35:16-20)

16-20. This section is a conflation of J² and E. In vs. 19 that is, Bethlehem is a gloss, erroneously identifying this Ephrath with the "Ephrathah" of Ruth 4:11; Mic. 5:2. It is clear from I Sam. 10:2 (cf. Jer. 31:15) that Rachel's grave was situated in Benjamin not far from Ramah.

The fact that there was a pillar standing beside it (vs. 20) suggests that it was a cult center. Of this J¹ appears to have been ignorant, despite his knowledge of the tradition representing Rachel as Jacob's wife. J², more familiar with the traditions and legends of the north than his predecessor had been, knew of its existence, and therefore included in his narrative the account of Rachel's death and burial. Indeed, the necessity of bringing Jacob to Ephrath was one of the reasons which led him to abandon the representation of J¹ that Jacob had proceeded from the Jabbok to Hebron by an east Jordan route.

In locating the birth of Benjamin in Palestine, J² recorded in genealogical terms the fact that the Benjamites, though long quasi-independent (cf. Judg. 5:14), had attained tribal status only after the Conquest. J¹, though aware of them as a group (cf. Judg. 3:15aγ), appears to have tacitly included them in the house of Joseph.

shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel" (32:28). But he chooses to include also the more formal record which had come to his hand from the priestly writers, and which is inserted here in these verses (with the exception of vs. 14, which comes apparently from one of the older sources). In their precise and emphatic way the priestly writers are underscoring the proclamation of the mighty destiny of the Israelitish people as this had been for many generations established in the people's faith. From God Almighty had the promise come that not only should the Promised Land be theirs, but that kings shall come out of thy loins. Already there had been kings whom tradition glorified: Saul, David, Solomon. Bravely—even if in the light of later events wistfully—they believed that other kings and conquering leaders would arise.

In the outward form of their expectation they were to be disappointed. Yet in a deeper sense the truth would be greater than they had dreamed; for out of the line of Israel was to come the King of kings.

16-20. Rachel's Death.—Full of pathos is this brief description. Jacob's love for Rachel had been the brightest element in his character; now she dies, and he must make her grave. There had been sadness in her life before: her father's trick of having Leah married first, the bitter years when she was barren. Then joy had come with the birth of Joseph (30:22-24). But now the coming of her hoped-for second son must cost her life. At first, when she had no children, she had cried, "Give me children, or else I die" (30:1); now when her sons had been born, she should die and leave them. It is not

19 And Rachel died, and was buried in the way to Ephrath, which is Bethlehem.

20 And Jacob set a pillar upon her grave: that is the pillar of Rachel's grave unto this day.

21 ¶ And Israel journeyed, and spread his tent beyond the tower of Edar.

hard labor. 17 And when she was in her hard labor, the midwife said to her, "Fear not; for now you will have another son."

18 And as her soul was departing (for she died), she called his name Ben-o'ni;^c but his father called his name Benjamin.^d 19 So Rachel died, and she was buried on the way to Ephrath (that is, Bethlehem), 20 and Jacob set up a pillar upon her grave; it is the pillar of Rachel's tomb, which is there to this day. 21 Israel journeyed on, and pitched his tent beyond the tower of Eder.

^c That is Son of my sorrow

^d That is Son of the right hand or Son of the South

The name Benjamin, meaning Son of the right hand, suggests that they were so designated because of their geographical position to the right, i.e., the south, of Ephraim. The designation almost inevitably gave rise to the claim that they were descended from one Benjamin, who, on their achievement of independence, naturally came to be regarded as the youngest son of Jacob.

As has already been noted (see further below), J² located the sale of Joseph to the Ishmaelites in the vicinity of Shechem. In his narrative, accordingly, the birth of Benjamin occurred after this event. E, who placed Joseph's kidnaping by the Midianites in the south, necessarily transposed the order of the two events. R^JE, conflating the two narratives, adopted at this point the representation of E.

E. REUBEN'S IMPIETY (35:21-22a)

21-22a. This section is from J¹, who located the event east of the Jordan in the territory occupied by the tribe of Reuben. It seems likely that J¹ is here dependent upon some local tradition having its origin in that region. Some confirmation of this is furnished by the abrupt appearance of Jacob's concubine, not previously mentioned by J¹. The identification of the concubine with Bilhah is the work of J².

In view of the characterization of Reuben in the ancient oracle in 49:3-4, the historical event underlying the tale may well have been some rash act of aggression on the part of the Reubenites against a neighboring tribe. However that may be, J¹ used the story to account for the fact that although Reuben was traditionally the first-born of Jacob, the tribe claiming him as ancestor was comparatively insignificant (cf. Judg. 5:15b-16). The tale, it may be assumed, in its primary form ended with a curse pronounced by his father on Reuben—"and Israel heard of it" (vs. 22b) is certainly not the original conclusion. This was dropped, so as not to anticipate 49:4a, when the blessing of Jacob (49:2-27) was added to the J narrative.

J² having, as has been noted above, abandoned the representation of J¹ that Jacob had journeyed from the Jabbok to Hebron east of the Jordan, was compelled to change strange therefore that she became in the thought of Israel a symbol of wistfulness and sorrow, so that Jeremiah (31:15) would say concerning the desolation of Jerusalem, "A voice was heard in Ramah, lamentation, and bitter weeping; Rachel weeping for her children." She named her child, Benoni, Son of my sorrow. But a happier fact was expressed in the name that Jacob gave him, Benjamin, the Son of the right hand. For the tribe of Benjamin was to play its signal part in history, since from it came Saul, the first king (I Sam. 9:1-2), and that greater Saul of Tarsus, who was to be the apostle Paul (Phil. 3:5).

21-22a. See Expos. on 49:4.

lay with Bilhah his father's concubine: and Israel heard it. Now the sons of Jacob were twelve:

23 The sons of Leah; Reuben, Jacob's firstborn, and Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Zebulun:

24 The sons of Rachel; Joseph, and Benjamin:

25 And the sons of Bilhah, Rachel's handmaid; Dan, and Naphtali:

26 And the sons of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid; Gad, and Asher. These are the sons of Jacob, which were born to him in Padan-aram.

27 ¶ And Jacob came unto Isaac his father unto Mamre, unto the city of Arba, which is Hebron, where Abraham and Isaac sojourned.

28 And the days of Isaac were a hundred and fourscore years.

29 And Isaac gave up the ghost, and died, and was gathered unto his people, being old and full of days: and his sons Esau and Jacob buried him.

Reuben went and lay with Bilhah his father's concubine; and Israel heard of it.

Now the sons of Jacob were twelve. 23 The sons of Leah: Reuben (Jacob's firstborn), Simeon, Levi, Judah, Is'sachar, and Zeb'ulun. 24 The sons of Rachel: Joseph and Benjamin. 25 The sons of Bilhah, Rachel's maid: Dan and Naph'tali. 26 The sons of Zilpah, Leah's maid: Gad and Asher. These were the sons of Jacob who were born to him in Paddan-aram.

27 And Jacob came to his father Isaac at Mamre, or Kir'iath-ar'ba (that is, Hebron), where Abraham and Isaac had sojourned. 28 Now the days of Isaac were a hundred and eighty years. 29 And Isaac breathed his last; and he died and was gathered to his people, old and full of days; and his sons Esau and Jacob buried him.

the scene of Reuben's outrage to a point west of the Jordan. This change could be made with little difficulty. The Hebrew mighdal 'ēdher, rendered the tower of Eder (vs. 21), means simply "a flock tower"—one of the many such towers which must have existed in a pastoral country. A mighdal 'ēdher, probably in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, is mentioned in Mic. 4:8.

F. SONS OF JACOB (35:22b-26)

22b-26. This section is from P—apparently all that was contained in that document on the birth of Jacob's sons; contrast the detailed JE material in 29:31–30:24. The original position of the list was probably immediately after 37:2ac, "This is the history of the family of Jacob."

XLI. DEATH OF ISAAC (35:27-29)

27-29. This section, originally the continuation of vs. 10, is from P. Both the J and the E narratives represent Isaac as being on his deathbed when he blessed Jacob (27:1-40; cf. 27:41), and so imply that he died shortly after Jacob's departure to visit Laban.

27-29. The Solemnity of Death.—In vs. 29 there comes a haunting echo of an earlier passage: 25:8-9. Except for the names, the two are identical. Isaac dies, and his sons Esau and Jacob come to bury him. Abraham died, and his sons Isaac and Ishmael came and buried him. In each case there had been bitterness between the two sons. Isaac was the cherished one; Ishmael had been driven out because of Sarah's jealousy for Isaac. So in the next generation also the two sons had been divided by Jacob's crafty trick that stole the birthright and Esau's resulting furious anger. But both times the two sons meet at a father's funeral—the one thing that after long separation could reunite them.

The verses are more than bare records of events. They suggest a deep instinct that runs through all the history of Israel—the instinct of family loyalty. Whatever might drive individuals apart, something still stronger held them, and would keep them from complete estrangement. Not in word only, but in fact the people of Israel accepted the commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother: that thy days may be long upon the land which the LORD thy God giveth thee." Obedience to that commandment 36 Now these are the generations of Esau, who is Edom.

2 Esau took his wives of the daughters of Canaan; Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite;

3 And Bashemath Ishmael's daughter, sister of Nebajoth.

4 And Adah bare to Esau Eliphaz, and Bashemath bare Reuel;

5 And Aholibamah bare Jeush, and Jaalam, and Korah: these are the sons of Esau, which were born unto him in the land of Canaan.

36 These are the descendants of Esau (that is, Edom). 2 Esau took his wives from the Canaanites: Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, Oholiba'mah the daughter of Anah the son^e of Zibeon the Hivite, 3 and Bas'emath, Ish'mael's daughter, the sister of Neba'ioth. 4 And Adah bore to Esau, El'iphaz; Bas'emath bore Reu'el; 5 and Oholiba'mah bore Je'ush, Jalam, and Korah. These are the sons of Esau who were born to him in the land of Canaan.

XLII. DESCENDANTS OF ESAU (36:1-43)

36:1-43. This chapter is a conflation of J and P, with considerable redactional harmonization.

A. THE EDMITES (36:1-19)

1-19. The first section contains valuable information regarding the Edomites (see Skinner, Genesis, pp. 436-37), some of it, doubtless, derived from Edomite records.

is one reason why the Jewish race has had such tenacity and toughness of survival. It has honored and protected the family. It has chastened and corrected selfish irresponsibility by putting into the hearts of each generation a sense of duty to the group.

A funeral is not the place or time at which to begin a family loyalty, nor the occasion at which to express it best, but it may be a symbol of the loyalty that is or ought to be. Among all sorts of people there are reunions like those of Isaac and Ishmael, and of Esau and Jacob—reunions of living persons long estranged brought together at least for that hour in the presence of the dead. For a funeral breaks through the crust of the present and revives the past. It stirs half-forgotten memories—memories of childhood, of innocence, of happy, unconscious acceptance of life as good. Such memories may be joy and blessing if they have been woven into life; but even if they have been overlaid instead by "barren gain and bitter loss," they may still be a blessing if they make us more sensitive to our shortcomings, more charitable to others, more ready to let new and better emotions grow from ground watered by tears. So it is when there has been estrangement, or estrangement partially made up, as Esau's and Jacob's had been. Something older and stronger than the rift may rise in the presence of the dead to speak of unity.

But what when there has been no division, and nothing deeply calling for repentance? Suppose Isaac and Ishmael, and Esau and Jacob, had brought to their father's funeral a devotion to one another and to him that had never been breached. Then they need have had—as many men do have when they stand at the funeral of one they have loved—no deep bitterness in grief, but a great thankfulness and pride for that which God had given them in the relationships to which they had belonged. A noble gentleman, Sir Edward Grey, British secretary of state for foreign affairs in the early 1900's once wrote: "I was thinking the other day what a secure possession the past is. The happiness and beauty that it had cannot now be spoiled or impaired: having had it one cannot be pessimistic either about this life or another."⁹ Out of personal loyalties and family loyalties such convictions can come; and the Bible more than any other book has shown men what loyalty can mean, and especially has made plain that loyalty to family and to people is sweet only when it is lifted up into the thought of God.

⁹ George M. Trevelyan, Grey of Fallodon (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1937), p. 177.

6 And Esau took his wives, and his sons, and his daughters, and all the persons of his house, and his cattle, and all his beasts, and all his substance, which he had got in the land of Canaan; and went into the country from the face of his brother Jacob.

7 For their riches were more than that they might dwell together; and the land wherein they were strangers could not bear them because of their cattle.

8 Thus dwelt Esau in mount Seir: Esau is Edom.

9 ¶ And these are the generations of Esau the father of the Edomites in mount Seir:

10 These are the names of Esau's sons; Eliphaz the son of Adah the wife of Esau, Reuel the son of Bashemath the wife of Esau.

11 And the sons of Eliphaz were Teman, Omar, Zepho, and Gatam, and Kenaz.

12 And Timna was concubine to Eliphaz Esau's son; and she bare to Eliphaz Amalek: these were the sons of Adah Esau's wife.

13 And these are the sons of Reuel; Nahath, and Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah: these were the sons of Bashemath Esau's wife.

14 ¶ And these were the sons of Aholibamah, the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon, Esau's wife: and she bare to Esau Jeush, and Jaalam, and Korah.

15 ¶ These were dukes of the sons of Esau: the sons of Eliphaz the firstborn son of Esau; duke Teman, duke Omar, duke Zepho, duke Kenaz, 16 Duke Korah, duke Gatam, and duke Amalek: these are the dukes that came of Eliphaz in the land of Edom: these were the sons of Adah.

17 ¶ And these are the sons of Reuel Esau's son; duke Nahath, duke Zerah, duke Shammah, duke Mizzah: these are the dukes that came of Reuel in the land of Edom: these are the sons of Bashemath Esau's wife.

18 ¶ And these are the sons of Aholibamah Esau's wife; duke Jeush, duke Jaalam, duke Korah: these were the dukes that came of Aholibamah the daughter of Anah, Esau's wife.

19 These are the sons of Esau, who is Edom, and these are their dukes.

6 Then Esau took his wives, his sons, his daughters, and all the members of his household, his cattle, all his beasts, and all his property which he had acquired in the land of Canaan; and he went into a land away from his brother Jacob. 7 For their possessions were too great for them to dwell together; the land of their sojournings could not support them because of their cattle. 8 So Esau dwelt in the hill country of Se'ir; Esau is Edom.

9 These are the descendants of Esau the father of the Edomites in the hill country of Se'ir. 10 These are the names of Esau's sons: EL'iphaz the son of Adah the wife of Esau, Reu'el the son of Bas'emath the wife of Esau. 11 The sons of EL'iphaz were Teman, Omar, Zepho, Gatam, and Kenaz. 12 (Timna was a concubine of EL'iphaz, Esau's son; she bore Am'alek to EL'iphaz.) These are the sons of Adah, Esau's wife. 13 These are the sons of Reu'el: Nahath, Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah. These are the sons of Bas'emath, Esau's wife. 14 These are the sons of Oholiba'mah the daughter of Anah the son of Zib'eon, Esau's wife: she bore to Esau Je'ush, Jalam, and Korah.

15 These are the chiefs of the sons of Esau. The sons of EL'iphaz the first-born of Esau: the chiefs Teman, Omar, Zepho, Kenaz, 16 Korah, Gatam, and Am'alek; these are the chiefs of EL'iphaz in the land of Edom; they are the sons of Adah. 17 These are the sons of Reu'el, Esau's son: the chiefs Nahath, Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah: these are the chiefs of Reu'el in the land of Edom; they are the sons of Bas'emath, Esau's wife. 18 These are the sons of Oholiba'mah, Esau's wife: the chiefs Je'ush, Jalam, and Korah; these are the chiefs born of Oholiba'mah the daughter of Anah, Esau's wife. 19 These are the sons of Esau (that is, Edom), and these are their chiefs.

B. THE HORITES (36:20-30)

20-30. The Horites are the Hurrians, a non-Semitic people from the highlands east of Mesopotamia; in the fifteenth and fourteenth centuries they spread so widely over Syria and Palestine that one of the Egyptian names for Canaan was Khûru (see Wright and Filson, Westminster Atlas, p. 29; also W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity [2nd ed.; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1946], pp. 109-10).

C. THE KINGS OF EDMOM (36:31-43)

31-43. Of particular interest are vss. 31-39. The first king of Edom, Bela the son of Beor, is probably to be identified with "Balaam the son of Beor," whom the king of Moab hired to curse Israel (Num. 22:5; cf. Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, pp. 376-80). In vs. 39, "Hadad" should be read for Hadar, with some MSS and version 35 And Husham died, and Hadad the son of Bedad, who smote Midian in the field of Moab, reigned in his stead: and the name of his city was Avith.

36 And Hadad died, and Samlah of Masrekah reigned in his stead.

37 And Samlah died, and Saul of Rehoboth by the river reigned in his stead.

38 And Saul died, and Baal-hanan the son of Achbor reigned in his stead.

39 And Baal-hanan the son of Achbor died, and Hadar reigned in his stead: and the name of his city was Pau; and his wife's name was Mehetabel, the daughter of Matred, the daughter of Mezahab.

40 And these are the names of the dukes that came of Esau, according to their families, after their places, by their names; duke Timnah, duke Alvah, duke Jetheth,

41 Duke Aholibamah, duke Elah, duke Pinon,

42 Duke Kenaz, duke Teman, duke Mibzar,

43 Duke Magdiel, duke Iram: these be the dukes of Edom, according to their habitations in the land of their possession: he is Esau the father of the Edomites.

37 And Jacob dwelt in the land wherein his father was a stranger, in the land of Canaan.

35 Husham died, and Hadad the son of Bedad, who defeated Mid'ian in the country of Moab, reigned in his stead, the name of his city being Avith. 36 Hadad died, and Samlah of Masre'kah reigned in his stead. 37 Samlah died, and Shaul of Reho'both on the Eu-phra'tes reigned in his stead. 38 Shaul died, and Ba'al-ha'nan the son of Achbor reigned in his stead. 39 Ba'al-ha'nan the son of Achbor died, and Hadar reigned in his stead, the name of his city being Pau; his wife's name was Mehet'abel, the daughter of Matred, daughter of Me'zahab.

40 These are the names of the chiefs of Esau, according to their families and their dwelling places, by their names: the chiefs Timna, Alvah, Jetheth, 41 Oholiba'mah, Elah, Pinon, 42 Kenaz, Teman, Mibzar, 43 Mag'diel, and Iram; these are the chiefs of Edom (that is, Esau, the father of Edom), according to their dwelling places in the land of their possession.

37 Jacob dwelt in the land of his father's sojournings, in the land of support (cf. I Chr. 1:50). There is little doubt that this Hadad was the king subdued by David (cf. I Kings 11:14-18; see ibid., pp. 355-63). On the assumption that each of the eight kings mentioned in the present list reigned on an average for twenty years—"a reasonable allowance in early unsettled times" (Skinner, Genesis, pp. 434-35)—the foundation of the Edomite monarchy may be dated about 150 years before the rise of the monarchy in Israel, a circumstance which is reflected in the representation of Esau as the elder brother of Jacob.

XLIII. JOSEPH COMES TO EGYPT (37:1-36)

37:1-36. The P material in this chapter is limited to vs. 1 and part of vs. 2: This is the history of the family of Jacob. Joseph, being seventeen years old, was . . . with the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, his father's wives; and Joseph brought an ill report of them to their father. Apart from this, the chapter is a conflation of J² and E.

the priestly ones, are at their congenial task of trying to put not only the direct but the collateral lines of the Israelitish family into a firm frame of history.

37:1-3. Jacob's Blunder.—Jacob is dwelling now in a land where his father was a stranger. So the chronicler suggests what the people of Israel constantly desired to emphasize—that the country to which Abraham had come with his lonely mandate from God had now become the home of his descendants. Jacob has the chance to establish his family in peace and happiness. But he begins with a serious blunder. He shows the same sort of favoritism which his mother had shown to him. Plenty of trouble grew up from that, and may grow up in other instances from roots not of conscious wrongdoing but only of mistakes.

Observe the mixed emotions which were at work in Jacob. Always he had been a person of

The J² narrative began by recording Jacob's love for Joseph, because of which he made him a long robe with sleeves (vs. 3)—the KJV rendering a coat of many colors depends upon the LXX—and the brothers' consequent hatred of their father's favorite, a hatred which was increased by Joseph's dream of the sheaves (vss. 5a, 6-8). It then told how it happened that Joseph fell into his brothers' hands at Dothan (vss. 12-13a, 14b-17), and of their selling him to a caravan of Ishmaelites after stripping him of his coat (vss. 19-21, 25-27, 23b, 28aγ). This they dipped in blood and brought to their father, convincing him that Joseph had been killed by a wild beast (vss. 31-33, 34b-35).

Underlying this narrative is a much briefer story by J¹—fragments of which are preserved in vss. 3a, 4aαγ, 26-27, 28aγ—which located Joseph's misadventure not at Dothan near Shechem in the north, but in the desert to the south of Hebron.

It is important to note that J¹ had now completed his articulation of the various local traditions of the south and east. These he had related to Yahwism and brought together into a connected narrative. He was now confronted with the necessity of getting the family of Jacob into Egypt in preparation for the second and more historical part of his work, the account of the Exodus and the Conquest. This he accomplished by telling how Jacob's fifth son was sold by his brothers to the nomad Ishmaelites, who in turn sold him into slavery in Egypt. There he rose to a position of great power. This made it possible for him to bring his father and his brothers from Palestine to Egypt in a time of famine. The stage was thus set for the Exodus.

This tale of a boy being kidnaped and sold into slavery may be based upon nothing more than what was doubtless a not infrequent occurrence in the desert near Hebron; i.e., J¹, having exhausted his store of local traditions, may have here resorted to free composition. However, it is not impossible that he was drawing upon a tradition which associated the Shechemite figure, Joseph, with Egypt. There is, of course, no way of determining whether or not the pre-Israelite tradition of Joseph associated him with Egypt from the beginning. It may have done so. But it is perhaps more likely that the Egypt motif was a later accretion drawn from the career of Yanhamu, the Semitic minister of Amenhotep IV (cf. Skinner, Genesis, pp. 441, 501-2; Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 398-99, 437-38), to whom reference is made in the Tell-el-Amarna letters (J. A. Knudtzon, ed., Die El-Amarna-Tafeln [Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1907-15], II, 1169-72).

However that may be, it would seem that if there was a tradition associating Joseph with Egypt, it was only vaguely known in the south, with the result that J¹'s version of it differed markedly from the form in which it was current in the north. J², concerned to have his predecessor's narrative as a whole accepted by the powerful tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, was therefore at special pains to revise the story of Joseph, whom they had come to claim as their ancestor, so that it would conform more closely in its details to the legend of Shechem. It was for this reason that he changed the location of the sale of Joseph from the southern desert to the vicinity of Shechem—a very considerable alteration, since it involved changing Jacob's route from the Jabbok to Hebron from the east to the west of the Jordan. Indeed, it is likely that the local tradition explicitly placed the event at Dothan. Nothing else seems to account for the otherwise pointless vss. 16-17.

conflicting impulses. There was good in him, even if sometimes it seemed hard to find; and one element that was most surely good was the love he had had for Rachel. For seven years he served her father Laban for the promise that then he might marry her, "and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her" (29:20); and when Laban broke his promise, he set himself to face with inflexible persistence seven years more. In an age when polygamy was the custom, Jacob had more than one wife, but that was with him more a matter of accepted rule than of his own moving. Apparently the one and only woman he really loved was Rachel. He had other children, but Rachel's children only were close to his heart. Joseph was her first-born. Then, when she gave birth to Benjamin, she died; and when Jacob buried her, his heart was buried with her, except for the sons she left behind. Of these two Joseph, who had been born first, still stood first in his affection. Great traits of human nature are 2 These are the generations of Jacob. Joseph, being seventeen years old, was feeding the flock with his brethren; and the lad was with the sons of Bilhah, and with the sons of Zilpah, his father's wives: and Joseph brought unto his father their evil report.

Canaan. 2 This is the history of the family of Jacob.

Joseph, being seventeen years old, was shepherding the flock with his brothers; he was a lad with the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, his father's wives; and Joseph brought an

Another feature of J²'s elaboration was the introduction of the motif of the coat with long sleeves (vss. 3*b*, 23*b*, 31-33). This, it may be inferred from II Sam. 13:19—II Sam. 13:18 seems to be gloss—was a royal garment (cf. Gunkel, op. cit., p. 404). J² is thus acknowledging the claim of the Joseph tribes to a royal authority independent of the tribe of Judah.

The dream of the sheaves (vss. 5-8) is a third feature from J². The implication of this is that Joseph's future thus revealed—note the subtle allusion to the agrarian policy which brought about his rise to power—had already been determined by God. Despicable as his brothers' action was in selling him into slavery, they were the unwitting agents of divine Providence. History was in God's control.

J²'s elaboration of the earlier narrative thus included (a) the provision of details of the tradition which had been unknown to J¹; (b) the recognition of the right of the northern tribes to have their own king; and (c) an emphasizing of the religious and theological significance of the story. At the same time he allowed his imagination and his literary skill to have free play. His account of Joseph's brothers bringing his cloak to their father and of the old man's grief has rarely been surpassed. Up to this point in his narrative he has for the most part been under certain restrictions in that he has had to take account of the traditions lying before him, to expurgate those which J¹ had not used, and to adapt them to Yahwism. Even under these limitations he has shown an extraordinary skill—witness, e.g., his narrative in chs. 2-3. Here, however, he has been able to write freely, and he shows himself to be an artist of the first rank.

The E recension, while it followed the story of J² in its main outline, differed from it in certain details:

(a) It omitted all reference to the coat with long sleeves which the brothers had callously brought to their father as evidence that Joseph was dead. This scene E rejected because of his concern, here as elsewhere, for the moral reputation of the patriarchs.

(b) For J²'s dream of the sheaves (vs. 7) it substituted that of the sun, moon, and stars bowing down to Joseph (vs. 9). This is more mythological in character than that of the sheaves in which J² had pointed ahead to Joseph's agrarian policy, and may have been derived from a tradition originally having nothing to do with Joseph, as the reference to Joseph's mother (vs. 10), already dead according to E (35:19), suggests. E's motive for substituting this for the more homely allegory of J² may have been his desire to provide a symbol more suggestive of the splendor of Joseph's future career.

(c) It represented Reuben as intervening to save Joseph's life (vss. 22, 29). This change was made presumably because the historic rivalry between the north and the south independent of time. The romance of many a modern story has its prototype in Jacob—the romance of a man who never moves out from the influence of a supreme devotion. To Jacob, Joseph represented not only himself; he represented Rachel. Jacob would give to the living the devotion he had given to the dead. Jacob would take the place of the dead, and be to Joseph mother as well as father. There was pathos in that, and beauty, as there always is in a parent's prodigal emotion toward a child.

But was there also another impulse? As Jacob tried to satisfy a broken affection, so perhaps he was trying to fulfill an unfinished picture of himself. He had always been ambitious. He could not bear to be under the shadow of Esau. He had wanted to be the first in the family—recognized to be the first indisputably. By craftiness and patience he seemed to have succeeded, but inwardly he was never sure. Often he felt inferior, even when his fortunes were superior. Now he would compensate for that. In this son had made difficult of acceptance J²'s portrayal of Judah as Joseph's protector (vss. 21, 26; in vs. 21 "Judah" must be read for "Reuben." Practically all modern commentators recognize the necessity of this emendation; see Holzinger, Genesis, p. 224; Gunkel, Genesis, p. 401; Skinner, Genesis, p. 447; Driver, Genesis, p. 324.) Furthermore, E had dropped as morally offensive the story in which J² had told of Reuben's forfeiture of his position as first-born through his violation of his father's concubine (35:22a). In the E document, therefore, Reuben was still by right and in fact the leader of his brothers.

(d) It told of Joseph being kidnaped by Midianites (vss. 28aβ, 29-30), not sold to an Ishmaelite caravan by his brothers (vs. 28aγ). This not only greatly lessened the brothers' guilt—in line with E's general treatment—but also made less difficult the subsequent interpretation of the event as a providential act of God (45:8; cf. 45:7 [J²]). The substitution of the Midianites for the Ishmaelites was doubtless made because the story in 21:9-21, according to which Ishmael was the brother of Isaac, had rendered awkward the representation that his descendants in the third generation already formed an ethnological group. J² was of course, because of the story in 16:1-12, involved in the same difficulty. But he apparently found it impossible to abandon the J¹ tradition that Joseph had been sold to the Ishmaelites. J¹ does not relate Ishmael to Israel. It may be noted further that E does not relate Midian to Israel; 25:2 is from a late stratum of J.

(e) It located the kidnaping in the wilderness (vs. 22), i.e., in the desert near Beer-sheba where, according to E (cf. 46:5), Jacob was living. This departure from the J² tradition is especially significant in view of the fact that J² seems to have placed Joseph's misadventure at Dothan to meet the requirements of the tradition of Shechem, of which E, a northerner, was certainly aware and so was deliberately disregarding.

Now it has already been argued in connection with 33:19 that J²'s affirmation of the Israelite ownership of Joseph's grave suggests that at the time he wrote this claim was in dispute. There can be little doubt that Joseph's grave was a cult center. J²'s claim that the site belonged to Israel was in effect an assertion of the right of the Levitical priesthood to control the shrine. If the Levites failed to establish their claim, one result will have been the survival of a non-Levitical priesthood at Shechem functioning at the shrine of Joseph, and a deep-rooted antagonism between them and the Levitical priesthood at the sanctuary of the oak of Moreh (cf. 12:6; Deut. 11:30; Josh. 24:26). The Levites, it may safely be assumed, would be at pains to minimize the importance of the shrine of their rivals. E's interest in the sanctuary beside the oak of Moreh is evidenced both by the story in 22:1-14, and by the circumstance with which he describes the institution of the covenant there by Joshua (Josh. 24:1-25; 8:30-34). The absence of any allusion in his narrative to Joseph's grave at Shechem (50:25; Exod. 13:19; Josh. 24:32 are all from J²; see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, ad loc.) may thus be not an oversight, but rather due to E's deliberate policy of ignoring the association of Joseph with Shechem. If this is the case, then E's changing of the scene of Joseph's misadventure from the vicinity of Shechem to the south is perhaps explained: it was designed to undermine the prestige of the priesthood of the shrine of Joseph by tacitly rejecting the traditional association of their patron with Shechem.

A. JOSEPH HATED BY HIS BROTHERS (37:1-11)

3. The phrase the son of his old age implicitly ignores Benjamin, whom J² refers to in the same words in 44:20. It may be noted further that in the chronicle of the birth of Jacob's children, in both J² and E, there was little difference in the ages of Joseph and of the younger children of Leah. J¹, on the other hand, knew of only five children of Leah, born in close succession, and it may be inferred, represented Joseph as being born

4 And when his brethren saw that their father loved him more than all his brethren, they hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him.

5 ¶ And Joseph dreamed a dream, and he told it his brethren: and they hated him yet the more.

6 And he said unto them, Hear, I pray you, this dream which I have dreamed:

7 For, behold, we were binding sheaves in the field, and, lo, my sheaf arose, and also stood upright; and, behold, your sheaves stood round about, and made obeisance to my sheaf.

8 And his brethren said to him, Shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dreams, and for his words.

9 ¶ And he dreamed yet another dream, and told it his brethren, and said, Behold, I have dreamed a dream more; and, behold, the sun and the moon and the eleven stars made obeisance to me.

10 And he told it to his father, and to his brethren: and his father rebuked him, and said unto him, What is this dream that thou hast dreamed? Shall I and thy mother and thy brethren indeed come to bow down ourselves to thee to the earth?

sleeves. 4 But when his brothers saw that their father loved him more than all his brothers, they hated him, and could not speak peaceably to him.

5 Now Joseph had a dream, and when he told it to his brothers they only hated him the more. 6 He said to them, "Hear this dream which I have dreamed: 7 behold, we were binding sheaves in the field, and lo, my sheaf arose and stood upright; and behold, your sheaves gathered round it, and bowed down to my sheaf." 8 His brothers said to him, "Are you indeed to reign over us? Or are you indeed to have dominion over us?" So they hated him yet more for his dreams and for his words. 9 Then he dreamed another dream, and told it to his brothers, and said, "Behold, I have dreamed another dream; and behold, the sun, the moon, and eleven stars were bowing down to me." 10 But when he told it to his father and to his brothers, his father rebuked him, and said to him, "What is this dream that you have dreamed? Shall I and your mother and your brothers indeed come to bow our-considerably later. The fact that J² retained the words the son of his old age is one indication that in his narrative Joseph was still Jacob's youngest son, and that the birth of Benjamin occurred after Joseph had been sold to the Ishmaelites.

10. The first clause, difficult after and told it to his brothers (vs. 9), must originally have been "and his brethren told his father," a reading suggested by Jacob's question, who had traits so like his own—his ambition and his thirst for life—he would enact more brilliantly the role he had always wanted to play. The coat of many colors which he put on Joseph was a symbol of that desire. Joseph should be what Jacob had always wanted to be; in Joseph he would see himself as the admiration and envy of all. In the present day there are many who may recognize themselves in that mirror of Jacob: parents who try to satisfy their own frustrated dreams by putting a child into a pattern in which their thwarted pride vicariously is fed. But such a fact is planted thick with unhappy consequences, such as those which in the case of Jacob were quickly to appear.

4-28. The Older Brothers.—The sons of Leah and Bilhah and Zilpah saw that Joseph was their father's favorite, the petted child of his too-obvious partiality. Human nature being as it is, it was not strange that they were irritated. They could justify among themselves the anger they felt by charging that their father was unjust. But there was a subtler and less conscious reason for their resentment. They must have recognized that Joseph, with his bright, imaginative spirit, was more attractive than they were. Perhaps there was real cause why his father should prefer him; but that was exactly what they did not choose to admit.

If they had been men of more magnanimous spirit, they would have thought and felt differently. If they could not share Jacob's fondness for the little brother, they could have treated it with amusement; there was nothing in it that did them too serious harm. On the contrary, Joseph could have done them good if they had 11 And his brethren envied him; but his father observed the saying.

12 ¶ And his brethren went to feed their father's flock in Shechem.

13 And Israel said unto Joseph, Do not thy brethren feed the flock in Shechem? come, and I will send thee unto them. And he said to him, Here am I.

14 And he said to him, Go, I pray thee, see whether it be well with thy brethren, and well with the flocks; and bring me word again. So he sent him out of the vale of Hebron, and he came to Shechem.

15 ¶ And a certain man found him, and, behold, he was wandering in the field: and the man asked him, saying, What seekest thou?

selves to the ground before you?" 11 And his brothers were jealous of him, but his father kept the saying in mind.

12 Now his brothers went to pasture their father's flock near Shechem. 13 And Israel said to Joseph, "Are not your brothers pasturing the flock at Shechem? Come, I will send you to them." And he said to him, "Here I am." 14 So he said to him, "Go now, see if it is well with your brothers, and with the flock; and bring me word again." So he sent him from the valley of Hebron, and he came to Shechem. 15 And a man found him wandering in the fields; and the man asked him, "What are you seeking?"

What is this dream that you have dreamed? which implies that the content of the dream had not been related to him by Joseph himself.

B. JOSEPH IS SOLD INTO SLAVERY (37:12-28)

12. There can be little doubt that according to the document from which this verse derived—J²—Jacob was still living in the vicinity of Shechem, for the representation that the brothers went from the pastoral south to Shechem to pasture their flocks is an impossible one.

14. From the valley of Hebron is thus redactional harmonization. R^{J^E}, in conflating the J² and E narratives, chose to follow the former in locating Joseph's misadventure in the north, and the latter in placing the birth of Benjamin (35:16-19) before the event. He recorded Jacob's move from Shechem to Bethel (35:1-6) and from Bethel southward (35:16) before beginning the story of Joseph. He favored J², however, in that he represented Jacob as settling not at Beer-sheba (cf. 46:5a, and see below), but at Hebron. It may be noted further that it is highly improbable that either J² or E would have told of Jacob sending his favorite son alone from the south to Shechem.

not dourly shut their eyes to what his temperament suggested. Their natural disposition was to settle down into the groove of dull ideas and of drab routine. They were the sort of men who did not readily think or do anything different—commonplace men who, left to themselves, will keep everything around them commonplace. But the fact that Joseph was around meant that they could not be left to themselves. His character broke in on their complacency. His restless imagination was always suggesting that life could have an exciting wideness if anyone were not too dull or lazy to explore it. So what must happen? One of two things. Either they would respond to his provocation, or they would get rid of it and if necessary get rid of him.

Observe the parallels to that in other families: the tendency of brothers and sisters who are stodgy, and want to stay so, to ridicule and repress the boy or girl who has ambitions. Consider how nearly frustrated Moses was by Aaron and Miriam. Think of the family of Jesus, and of his brothers' antagonism when he first went out from Nazareth. They also were the sort who let the youthfulness of the spirit die—men already old in prejudice though in years still in their prime. In Family Portrait,¹ James the brother of Jesus, annoyed by the disturbing purpose of that uncomprehended brother of his, is commenting bitterly on what he thinks are the fantastic ideas with which Jesus has been allowed to grow up. "When I was a young boy"—he begins; and then Mary Cleophas interrupts him. "Get out, James! You were born middle-aged." Consider the families today in which one child, unusually dowered by God, wakes only the hostility of others in the family because 16 And he said, I seek my brethren: tell me, I pray thee, where they feed their flocks.

17 And the man said, They are departed hence; for I heard them say, Let us go to Dothan. And Joseph went after his brethren, and found them in Dothan.

18 And when they saw him afar off, even before he came near unto them, they conspired against him to slay him.

19 And they said one to another, Behold, this dreamer cometh.

20 Come now therefore, and let us slay him, and cast him into some pit, and we will say, Some evil beast hath devoured him; and we shall see what will become of his dreams.

21 And Reuben heard it, and he delivered him out of their hands; and said, Let us not kill him.

22 And Reuben said unto them, Shed no blood, but cast him into this pit that is in the wilderness, and lay no hand upon him; that he might rid him out of their hands, to deliver him to his father again.

16 "I am seeking my brothers," he said, "tell me, I pray you, where they are pasturing the flock." 17 And the man said, "They have gone away, for I heard them say, 'Let us go to Dothan.'" So Joseph went after his brothers, and found them at Dothan. 18 They saw him afar off, and before he came near to them they conspired against him to kill him. 19 They said to one another, "Here comes this dreamer. 20 Come now, let us kill him and throw him into one of the pits; then we shall say that a wild beast has devoured him, and we shall see what will become of his dreams." 21 But when Reuben heard it, he delivered him out of their hands, saying, "Let us not take his life." 22 And Reuben said to them, "Shed no blood; cast him into this pit here in the wilderness, but lay no hand upon him"—that he might rescue him out of they do not want to grow. But lest this should seem the only way in which human nature can act, observe the opposite reality. In the presence of persons more brilliant than themselves men do not have to recoil into sullen resentment lest they should seem to be outshone. On the contrary, the less brilliant man may so generously and ungrudgingly identify himself with the other one that his own life attains a happy expansiveness which it would never have had alone. It is as possible to be magnanimous as it is to be mean. Think of Jonathan's relationship to David, of Andrew's relationship to Peter, of Barnabas' relationship to Paul. Let the members of every Christian family ponder and heed. To stifle and distort another personality is a deadly wrong; to help it to expand is divine. Remember the words of Jesus: "Whosoever shall offend one of these little ones . . . it is better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and he were cast into the sea" (Mark 9:42); and "Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, he shall not enter therein" (Mark 10:15). Hearing that, let each one who is a father ask himself whether by any blunder he is jeopardizing his son's development, and every brother ask himself whether another brother is being hurt by him.

21-30. Reuben or Judah?—In this description of what went on between the brothers in regard to Joseph two strands are woven without any particular attempt to make them harmonize—another instance of the will of the ultimate compilers of Genesis not to let any part of the tradition go. In one breath it is Reuben who says of Joseph, Let us not kill him; in the next it is Judah who demands, What profit is it if we slay our brother, and conceal his blood? Then presently it is Reuben again who returns to the pit where Joseph had been left and, not finding him, rends his clothes because he supposes Joseph to be dead. Perhaps in both the tribes of Reuben and of Judah men wanted to believe that their own ancestor had been better than the other sons of Jacob. At any rate, it is good to find in the dark story these gleams of human compassion set against so much that was cruel and malevolent. But even at its best, the action of the brothers was an ugly witness to what men can descend to in any time. The value of a human being, to say nothing of the bond of brotherhood, was cheap to them. For twenty pieces of silver they sold Joseph as a slave. One

23 ¶ And it came to pass, when Joseph was come unto his brethren, that they stripped Joseph out of his coat, his coat of many colors that was on him;

24 And they took him, and cast him into a pit: and the pit was empty, there was no water in it.

25 And they sat down to eat bread: and they lifted up their eyes and looked, and, behold, a company of Ishmaelites came from Gilead, with their camels bearing spicery and balm and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt.

26 And Judah said unto his brethren, What profit is it if we slay our brother, and conceal his blood?

27 Come, and let us sell him to the Ishmaelites, and let not our hand be upon him; for he is our brother and our flesh: and his brethren were content.

their hand, to restore him to his father. 23 So when Joseph came to his brothers, they stripped him of his robe, the long robe with sleeves that he wore; 24 and they took him and cast him into a pit. The pit was empty, there was no water in it.

25 Then they sat down to eat; and looking up they saw a caravan of Ish'maelites coming from Gilead, with their camels bearing gum, balm, and myrrh, on their way to carry it down to Egypt. 26 Then Judah said to his brothers, "What profit is it if we slay our brother and conceal his blood? 27 Come, let us sell him to the Ish'maelites, and let not our hand be upon him, for he is our brother, our own flesh." And his

24. The E narrative at this point must, in view of vs. 29, have gone on to say that the brothers moved away from the pit. This notice was dropped by RJE in favor of vs. 25-27.

25. In the J¹ narrative, which located the event in the desert to the south of Hebron, the presence of the Ishmaelites did not have to be accounted for: they lived there. J², to account for their appearance near Shechem, tells of a caravan of Ishmaelites coming from Gilead.

27. Note the Ishmaelites, instead of "these Ishmaelites," to be expected after vs. 25—an indication that the verses are from different hands.

thinks ahead to Israel in the time of Amos, greedy and merciless in its exploitation of the poor and helpless, and remembers the blazing wrath of the prophet against those who were "not grieved for the affliction of Joseph" (Amos 6:6). And the twenty pieces of silver which the sons of Jacob received when they sold their brother have a tragic echo in the fact that human loyalty can be so corrupted that a Judas for thirty pieces of silver will sell the Christ himself.

24. Into the Pit, and Out of It.—Joseph is thrown by his brothers into a pit—a dreadful physical fact. But morally and spiritually, too, it may often seem that the soul of man is in a pit. The realization of this may come with shocking suddenness. Joseph at one moment walked in the sunlight in his coat of many colors; the next moment he was down in stifling darkness. One moment he seemed to have no need of anything; the next moment he had agonized need of everything. So with human souls. From self-sufficiency they may be plunged into paralyzing helplessness and desperate need of God. Yet at Joseph's worst moment there were unsuspected forces moving for his release. God's purpose working through its own instruments would carry his life on to deliverance and great destiny. Beyond this verse in Genesis comes the sound of Ps. 40:2, "He brought me up also out of a horrible pit, out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock."

In what sense may the soul of humanity seem to be in a pit? First, in its history and its inheritance. Life on this earth has developed from primeval forms. Note H. G. Wells's words in The Outline of History:

If a disembodied intelligence with no knowledge of the future had come to earth and studied life during the early Palæozoic age, he might very reasonably have concluded that life was absolutely confined to the water, and that it could never spread over the land. It found a way. In the Later Palæozoic Period that visitant might have been equally sure that life could not go beyond the edge of a swamp.*

When life did go beyond the edge of the swamp, it was represented first by the great reptiles. Then came the age of the great beasts. Then brothers heeded him. 28 Then Mid'ianite traders passed by; and they drew Joseph up and lifted him out of the pit, and sold him to the Ish'maelites for twenty shekels of silver; and they took Joseph to Egypt.

29 When Reuben returned to the pit and saw that Joseph was not in the pit, he rent his clothes 30 and returned to his brothers, and said, "The lad is gone; and I, where appeared man. It was a long way by which he had to come, through an evolution from crude beginnings. Pessimists and moral cynics belittle the difference between what man was and what he is and may be. They think of human nature as still essentially most kin to the reptile, the ape, the wolf, or the tiger. But the great fact is that man is different. The reptile was content to stay in the swamp; man wanted to climb out of it. He had and still has primitive instincts against which he must struggle, for he began on the plane of the animal; but he has not been content to dwell there. Admittedly such progress as he has made has been painful, and woefully imperfect; for as his consciousness developed there developed with it an inner area of possible evil choice which the animal never knew. But nevertheless a divine influence has been urging him. Read James Henry Breasted, The Dawn of Conscience, especially this:

28. RJE, by attaching the J² sentence, and sold him to the Ishmaelites for twenty shekels of silver, to the preceding E account of Joseph being taken out of the pit by the Midianites, and by tacitly identifying the Ishmaelites with the Midianites, has skillfully fused together the J² story of the sale of Joseph and the E story of his being kidnaped.

In the life of the prehistoric hunter, struggling to survive among the fierce and terrible mammals about him, it was a profound change, a fundamental advance, when he first began to hear whispers from a new world which was dawning within him. Here was a new trumpet call which, unlike the tug of hunger or the panic call of self-preservation, did not stir one impulse alone while leaving all the others cold, but for the first time marshalled all the battalions of the human soul.³

See William Herbert Carruth's "Each in His Own Tongue," with the concluding lines of its first verse:

³ New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1933, pp. xxiii-xxiv.

Some call it Evolution,
And others call it God.⁴

So the religious man today in his interpretation of human life and of its possibilities must believe in a power whose purpose is to lift the human spirit out of the pit of frustration or pessimism or despair.

Not only humanity in general, but individuals, may seem to be in the pit. Men get into terrifying situations. Why? Partly because they may be caught in the net of irrational human evil. That was partly the fact with Joseph. He was in the pit because his brothers put him there, and because they had in them a malevolence which he could not have expected. So sometimes there seems to be a malevolence in human relationships which can be explained only by the profound old doctrine of original sin. But it was only partly because of the evil of others that Joseph was in the pit. He had been wrong himself: conceited, self-absorbed, exasperating in his assurance. When any man is like that, God's sternly merciful providence may need to put him into a pit to show him that he is no colossus bestriding the earth, but a poor shamed thing, muddy, ignominious, and inadequate.

But Joseph did not belong in the pit. There was essential goodness in him. Reuben had recognized that, and Reuben would be God's instrument for his deliverance. The Lord had a purpose with Joseph, and through being cast into a pit Joseph was started on a road on which he would understand God as never before—understand him as the truth which was to search him, the judgment which was to chasten him, the strength which was to lift him, the hope which was to lead him on.

C. JACOB'S GRIEF (37:29-36)

35. A literal rendering of the last sentence is "and his father wept for him." This notice is somewhat redundant after vs. 34a (E) and 34b-35a (J²). It is possible that the original was, "and his mother wept for him," for in the J² narrative Rachel was still alive at the time. If so, the present text is from RJE. Some support for this conjecture is perhaps furnished by the moving figure in Jer. 31:15, of Rachel weeping for her exiled children. Note also the alteration of the original "father's" to "mother's," in 24:67, by a late J hand.

Sheol: The underworld, whither it was believed a man's shade went at death to continue an existence colorless and without significance because it was separated from God (cf., e.g., Ps. 115:17; Eccl. 9:10b). Jacob, wearing sackcloth until the day of his death, would appear in Sheol as a mourner, and then Joseph would know the depth of his grief.

31-36. Evil After Evil.—The consequences of wrongdoing cannot be cut short. One sin creates a situation where it seems necessary to commit another in order to try to hide the first. The sons of Jacob had been guilty of a crime against their brother. Though they did not mind hurting him, they had no direct desire to hurt their father. The fact of what they had done would certainly hurt him enough; but now in order to protect themselves and to cover up their guilt, they had to hurt him worse by a lie that enlarged his grief. They could not dare to tell him what they had actually done with Joseph, which at least had left him alive; they made up the cruel tale that a wild beast had torn him, and that he was dead. They even refined their father's anguish by showing him Joseph's precious coat which they had smeared with blood. Before the tragic death of their father's sorrow they felt perhaps a shamed remorse; but the words with which they pretended to comfort him could be only hypocrisy. Henceforth their relationship to their father, as well as their relationship to Joseph, was poisoned. Suppose Jacob should find out what they had done. Suppose one brother should betray the others. Because that was possible, there could be no confidence any more. The lie, once it had been let loose, infected every association in the family. Their effort to make their situation with their father secure through falsehood had only added to their risks. So it always is with a lie. "For the lie is but an artificial attempt to prop up an inverted pyramid which becomes more top heavy with every lie, while truth, like a pyramid

XLIV. JUDAH AND TAMAR (38:1-30)

This section is from J¹, with some minor additions by J², to be noted below. The story is built up around three motifs. The first is that of the woman who slays her lovers—the theme which is basic to the book of Tobit (cf. Tob. 3:8). It finds expression here in the words “For he feared that he would die, like his brothers” (vs. 11), in which Judah by implication lays the deaths of Er and Onan, actually the consequence of their own wickedness (vss. 7-10), to the sinister power of Tamar. This motif appears to have been introduced simply to provide a background to the main part of the story. In view of the fact, however, that the names Tamar and Sarah—the heroine of Tobit—are both connected with Ishtar (cf. Skinner, Genesis, p. 452), there may be here an echo of a myth which was perhaps still current in Palestine in J¹'s time.

The second motif is that of heroic incest (vss. 13-26), and the third that of the birth struggle of twins for priority (vss. 27-30). Both of these occur elsewhere and separately in the J¹ narrative, the former in the story of Lot's daughters (19:30-36), the latter in that of the birth of Esau and Jacob (25:24-26).

Since these two legends were derived from Canaanite sources they are necessarily of earlier origin than this obviously Israelite story of Judah, which would therefore appear to be dependent upon them. This dependence would seem to be due to conscious and deliberate appropriation, for it is difficult to suppose that the recurrence in one story of two originally separate and independent motifs is due to chance.

The tale appears to have a twofold purpose. First, it justifies the possibly recent incorporation into the tribe of Judah of three clans which had hitherto been regarded as of alien stock, and whose presence in the land had long antedated the Israelite conquest. It is now claimed that they were Judahite in origin: their eponyms, Shelah, Perez, and Zerah, were sons of Judah by Canaanite women, and, it is implied, had remained with their Canaanite kinsfolk in Palestine when their father migrated to Egypt.

Second, the story accounts for an increase in the prestige of the clan of Perez—historically due, in all probability, to the fact that David was a member of the clan (cf. Ruth 4:18-22).

These two points could certainly have been made even if Judah had not been cast in such a dubious role—as indeed the clan of Shelah was accounted for. (Eissfeldt, Hexateuch-Synopse, pp. 29-30, maintains that in this story J¹ was explaining why tribal leadership had passed from Judah to Joseph. But if the suggestion advanced above is sound, that J¹ wrote in the reign of David, then Eissfeldt's interpretation can hardly be valid.) Since it is unlikely that J¹ would himself have deliberately put Judah in such an unfavorable light—witness his uneasiness regarding the story of Lot's daughters (see Exeg. on 19:30-38)—it would seem that he has simply incorporated into his narrative a popular tale which was already in circulation when he wrote. At the same time, as has been noted above in the Exeg. of ch. 34, his attitude toward sex was essentially matter of 38:1-30. Judah and Tamar.—To many readers of the Bible, it must seem strange that this story is inserted in the midst of the narrative of Joseph. It is like an alien element, suddenly and arbitrarily thrust into a record which it serves only to disturb. Certainly few people would choose this chapter as a basis for teaching or preaching. Then why is this dark old tale preserved? Apparently because it is the expression, under the names and figures of individual persons, of traditions as to how certain minglings and intermarryings of tribes occurred. This part

4 And she conceived again, and bare a son; and she called his name Onan.

5 And she yet again conceived, and bare a son; and called his name Shelah: and he was at Chezib, when she bare him.

6 And Judah took a wife for Er his first-born, whose name was Tamar.

fact. He shows no misgivings about the story. The heroism of Tamar was the important thing. The behavior of Judah was indeed deplorable, but J¹ may have felt that it would do the Judahites no harm to have their tribal pride punctured. Certainly he had been even more merciless with Reuben (cf. 35:22a) and Simeon and Levi (cf. 34:25a, 26a).

J², more concerned about the reputations of the patriarchs, and indeed more sensitive as regards moral issues than J¹ had been—witness his treatment of the J¹ stories of Jacob and Laban, and of Simeon and Levi—made a somewhat desperate effort to lessen Judah's guilt. He inserted the note in vs. 12 that Judah's wife had died. This fact, he implies, explained, though it did not justify, Judah's behavior with Tamar. He also added vss. 21, 22b. In these verses the word used of Tamar signifies a cult prostitute (RSV mg.), not a common harlot (cf. vs. 15). The implication of this is that Judah's relationship with her had been something more than a mere vulgar adventure. It had had religious overtones, however abhorrent to J² the religion in question may have been. And this representation was strengthened by the note in vs. 12 that Judah was accompanied by his friend. That this note is an addition to the original tale is indicated by the fact that the friend does not appear in the narrative in vss. 13-20, the clear implication of which is that Judah was alone.

In the J¹ narrative the story presumably followed those of Reuben (35:22a), and of Simeon and Levi (ch. 34), and preceded that of Joseph (ch. 37). The present sequence of events is due to J², whose transfer of the sale of Joseph to the north necessitated some reordering of the J¹ material.

A. TAMAR, ER, AND ONAN (38:1-11)

38:1. It happened at that time is part of J²'s dealing with the chronological difficulties arising from his relocation of the story of the sale of Joseph and his introduction of that of the birth of Benjamin into the J¹ narrative. Nothing is recorded of Hirah beyond the fact that he was a native of Adullam, the modern Tell esh-Sheikh Madhkûr (Wright and Filson, Westminster Atlas, p. 107; Félix Marie Abel, Géographie de la Palestine [Paris: Gabalda, 1938], II, 239), some twelve miles southwest of Bethlehem in the territory of the tribe of Judah.

5. Chezib—Achzib in Josh. 15:44; Mic. 1:14, probably the modern Tell el-Beidā (Wright and Filson, op. cit., p. 107; Abel, op. cit., II, 90), southwest of Adullam—was, it may be inferred, the center of the clan of Shelah.

8. The custom of levirate marriage, presupposed here, was widespread in primitive times. Its motive was to prevent the extinction of a family, for it was deemed a disaster

9 And Onan knew that the seed should not be his; and it came to pass, when he went in unto his brother's wife, that he spilled it on the ground, lest that he should give seed to his brother.

10 And the thing which he did displeased the LORD: wherefore he slew him also.

11 Then said Judah to Tamar his daughter-in-law, Remain a widow at thy father's house, till Shelah my son be grown: for he said, Lest peradventure he die also, as his brethren did. And Tamar went and dwelt in her father's house.

12 ¶ And in process of time the daughter of Shuah Judah's wife died; and Judah was comforted, and went up unto his sheepshearers to Timnath, he and his friend Hirah the Adullamite.

13 And it was told Tamar, saying, Behold, thy father-in-law goeth up to Timnath to shear his sheep.

14 And she put her widow's garments off from her, and covered her with a veil, and wrapped herself, and sat in an open place, which is by the way to Timnath; for she saw that Shelah was grown, and she was not given unto him to wife.

brother." 9 But Onan knew that the offspring would not be his; so when he went in to his brother's wife he spilled the semen on the ground, lest he should give offspring to his brother. 10 And what he did was displeasing in the sight of the LORD, and he slew him also. 11 Then Judah said to Tamar his daughter-in-law, "Remain a widow in your father's house, till Shelah my son grows up" — for he feared that he would die, like his brothers. So Tamar went and dwelt in her father's house.

12 In course of time the wife of Judah, Shua's daughter, died; and when Judah was comforted, he went up to Timnah to his sheepshearers, he and his friend Hirah the Adullamite. 13 And when Tamar was told, "Your father-in-law is going up to Timnah to shear his sheep," 14 she put off her widow's garments, and put on a veil, wrapping herself up, and sat at the entrance to Enaim, which is on the road to Timnah; for she saw that Shelah was grown up, and she had not been given to him in marriage.

if a man should be left without a descendant to perpetuate his name. That the responsibility tended to be evaded is suggested not only by this tale, but also by Deut. 25:5-10 and Ruth 4:1-8 (see further, Driver, Deuteronomy, pp. 280-82).

9. The verbs in the second and third clauses of the verse are in the frequentative and should be translated, "whenever he went, etc." Vs. 10, however, seems to refer to a single act. It is therefore highly probable that vs. 9b is a substitution, made on grounds of delicacy by J² or another hand, for an original, more detailed account of Onan's offense.

B. TAMAR'S RELATIONS WITH JUDAH (38:12-23)

12. Was comforted is a conventional phrase for the effect of the mourning ceremonies (cf. Jer. 16:7). Sheepshearing was the occasion of an important festival in ancient Israel (cf. I Sam. 25:4-11; II Sam. 13:23-28). In view of went up, the Timnah referred to can hardly be the Danite city of that name (Judg. 14:1), which is on lower ground than Adullam. It is probably the Timnah of Josh. 15:57, the modern Tibne, some ten miles west of Bethlehem.

14. A widow wore mourning garments all her life (cf. Judith 8:5; 10:3; II Sam. 14:2). According to Prov. 7:10, a harlot was known by her attire. Here put on a veil of the tradition had attained a kind of authority which made the final compiler of the materials of Genesis hesitate to discard it. So he let it remain, crude and unedifying though it might appear, just because it was too deeply imbedded in the transmitted stories of Israel to be got rid of. It is like the outcropping through some green and fertile landscape of ancient geologic strata in which are fossils of forms of life we would not want to see walking upon our earth today.

Even so, in the unlovely narrative there are at least some elements of right purpose emerging like flowers from rank ground. One can see here—twisted though its manifestation may be—the powerful and generally wholesome instinct 15 When Judah saw her, he thought her to be a harlot; because she had covered her face.

16 And he turned unto her by the way, and said, Go to, I pray thee, let me come in unto thee; (for he knew not that she was his daughter-in-law:) and she said, What wilt thou give me, that thou mayest come in unto me?

17 And he said, I will send thee a kid from the flock. And she said, Wilt thou give me a pledge, till thou send it?

18 And he said, What pledge shall I give thee? And she said, Thy signet, and thy bracelets, and thy staff that is in thine hand. And he gave it her, and came in unto her, and she conceived by him.

19 And she arose, and went away, and laid by her veil from her, and put on the garments of her widowhood.

20 And Judah sent the kid by the hand of his friend the Adullamite, to receive his pledge from the woman's hand: but he found her not.

21 Then he asked the men of that place, saying, Where is the harlot, that was openly by the wayside? And they said, There was no harlot in this place.

22 And he returned to Judah, and said, I cannot find her; and also the men of the place said, that there was no harlot in this place.

23 And Judah said, Let her take it to her, lest we be shamed: behold, I sent this kid, and thou hast not found her.

15 When Judah saw her, he thought her to be a harlot, for she had covered her face. 16 He went over to her at the road side, and said, "Come, let me come in to you," for he did not know that she was his daughter-in-law. She said, "What will you give me, that you may come in to me?" 17 He answered, "I will send you a kid from the flock." And she said, "Will you give me a pledge, till you send it?" 18 He said, "What pledge shall I give you?" She replied, "Your signet and your cord, and your staff that is in your hand." So he gave them to her, and went in to her, and she conceived by him. 19 Then she arose and went away, and taking off her veil she put on the garments of her widowhood.

20 When Judah sent the kid by his friend the Adullamite, to receive the pledge from the woman's hand, he could not find her. 21 And he asked the men of the place, "Where is the harlot^b who was at Enaim by the wayside?" And they said, "No harlot has been here." 22 So he returned to Judah, and said, "I have not found her; and also the men of the place said, 'No harlot has been here.'" 23 And Judah replied, "Let her keep the things as her own, lest we be laughed at; you see, I sent this kid, and you could not find her."

^b Or cult prostitute and wrapping herself up are doublets. The former may be from J², implying that Tamar was representing herself as a temple prostitute. The veiling of the prostitute may have originally signified her dedication to Ishtar, the veiled goddess; the veiling of Ishtar may be a reflex on the veiling of her votaries, which rested upon a primitive sexual taboo. This taboo accounts for the bridal veil (cf. 24:65) and the implications of 29:23, 25. Jer. 3:2 and Ezek. 16:25 allude to the custom of the harlot sitting by the wayside.

18. Signet, cord, and staff were apparently the insignia of a man of rank among the Israelites.

21. Sacred prostitution was widely practiced at Canaanite sanctuaries. The prostitute was dedicated to Ishtar or some other deity. Commerce with her was believed to ensure, through sympathetic magic, the fertility of the land, the flocks and herds, and the family.

of the Jewish people that family heritage must be continued. One may see also in Tamar the wistful and pathetic yearning of the woman for motherhood.

But with this said, the fact remains that the significance of this story is not in any positive content, but in the perspective it suggests for a whole reading of Genesis. It reminds us anew that in the midst of those parts of the O.T. through which there shines a right understanding of God and of his will for human life, there are other parts which are the cloudy medium of 24 ¶ And it came to pass about three months after, that it was told Judah, saying, Tamar thy daughter-in-law hath played the harlot; and also, behold, she is with child by whoredom. And Judah said, Bring her forth, and let her be burnt.

25 When she was brought forth she sent to her father-in-law, saying, By the man, whose these are, am I with child: and she said, Discern, I pray thee, whose are these, the signet, and bracelets, and staff.

26 And Judah acknowledged them, and said, She hath been more righteous than I; because that I gave her not to Shelah my son. And he knew her again no more.

27 ¶ And it came to pass in the time of her travail, that, behold, twins were in her womb.

28 And it came to pass, when she travailed, that the one put out his hand: and the midwife took and bound upon his hand a scarlet thread, saying, This came out first.

29 And it came to pass, as he drew back his hand, that, behold, his brother came out: and she said, How hast thou broken forth? this breach be upon thee: therefore his name was called Pharez.

30 And afterward came out his brother, that had the scarlet thread upon his hand: and his name was called Zarah.

24 About three months later Judah was told, "Tamar your daughter-in-law has played the harlot; and moreover she is with child by harlotry." And Judah said, "Bring her out, and let her be burned." 25 As she was being brought out, she sent word to her father-in-law, "By the man to whom these belong, I am with child." And she said, "Mark, I pray you, whose these are, the signet and the cord and the staff." 26 Then Judah acknowledged them and said, "She is more righteous than I, inasmuch as I did not give her to my son Shelah." And he did not lie with her again.

27 When the time of her delivery came, there were twins in her womb. 28 And when she was in labor, one put out a hand; and the midwife took and bound on his hand a scarlet thread, saying, "This came out first." 29 But as he drew back his hand, behold, his brother came out; and she said, "What a breach you have made for yourself!" Therefore his name was called Perez.ⁱ 30 Afterward his brother came out with the scarlet thread upon his hand; and his name was called Zarah.

C. TAMAR IS EXONERATED (38:24-30)

24. Death by burning is the punishment imposed by the Code of Hammurabi (157) for incest with a mother. This passage suggests that it was in ancient Israel the usual punishment for adultery. Later the penalty of stoning was substituted (Deut. 22:23-24; cf. Ezek. 16:40), except in the case of a priest's daughter turned prostitute (Lev. 21:9).

human ignorance and passion. In the story of Judah and Tamar the human instincts and ancient customs set forth with such startling realism should certainly not be confused with lives redeemed. Yet even when its realism is most stark, and least accompanied by any spiritual illumination, the O.T. record can still, as was said in II Tim. 3:16, be "profitable for . . . reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." Just because of the seeming inconsistency and inappropriateness of this story of Judah and Tamar as compared with the main message of Genesis, we are helped to remember that the road of revelation to the final height of spiritual understanding is a long road and an uneven one. Often it has to "slope through darkness up to God."

27-30. The Birth of Perez.—A strange pendant to an unlovely story, so this seems; and it still may seem so, even when its purpose is perceived. At the end of the book of Ruth we read, "These are the generations of Perez"; and the following list of his descendants ends thus: "And Obed begat Jesse, and Jesse begat David." In other words, Perez was the ancestor of the hero-king David, who came from the tribe of Judah. But why should the chronicler have wished to record the fact that David's ancestor was born of such a one as Tamar? Because, here as elsewhere, the emphasis is not on human worth, but on the will and saving work of God. As Rahab the harlot, who received the spies at Jericho, was exalted in memory as an instrument in God's long purpose of deliverance (Heb. 11:31), so Tamar, through her pitiful desire for a child, 39 And Joseph was brought down to Egypt; and Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the guard, an Egyptian, bought him of the hands of the Ishmaelites, which had brought him down thither.

39 Now Joseph was taken down to Egypt, and Pot'i-phar, an officer of Pharaoh, the captain of the guard, an Egyptian, bought him from the Ish'maelites

XLV. JOSEPH IN EGYPT (39:1-41:57)

Ch. 39 is basically from J—J¹ with some additions—who continued his story of Joseph by telling how the Ishmaelites who had bought him from his brothers took him down with them to Egypt, and sold him to an unnamed Egyptian. This was followed by the account of his rejection of the advances of his master's wife. The story seems to be based upon the Egyptian "Tale of the Two Brothers" (see, among others, Skinner, Genesis, p. 459), to which, however, there are numerous parallels in other literatures (see Andrew Lang, Myth, Ritual and Religion [new ed.; London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1899] II, 318-26). According to the Egyptian tale, Bata, unmarried, lives with his older brother Anubis, is tempted by the latter's wife, exactly as Joseph was by his mistress, and rejects her advances in horror. When Anubis returns home in the evening his wife, covered with self-inflicted wounds, falsely accuses Bata. Anubis, believing her, plans to kill him, but finally convinced of his innocence slays his wife instead.

This story J perhaps adapted, changing its conclusion. Joseph was thrown into prison. There he was able to help two of the Pharaoh's servants, and this led eventually to his release and to his meeting with the Pharaoh.

J's purpose was thus not only to present Joseph as an honorable and competent young man (39:2b, 4b), but also to set the stage for his rise to power in Egypt.

E, disliking the sex motif, omitted the story of Joseph's temptation entirely; cf. his omission of the stories of Reuben's incest (35:22a), of the seduction of Dinah (ch. 34), and of Judah's relations with Tamar (ch. 38). Instead he had the Midianites who had kidnaped Joseph sell him to "Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, the captain of the guard" (37:36; cf. 39:1). Joseph attended him (39:4a), i.e., he became his personal servant. When two of the officers of the court fell into disfavor with the Pharaoh, they were put under arrest in the house of the captain of the guard, and Joseph was assigned the duty of attending them until their case was decided (cf. 40:3aα, 4). From that point, as will be seen, E's narrative of Joseph's rise to power parallels that of J.

RJE combined these two narratives (a) by identifying the unnamed Egyptian of J with Potiphar, the captain of the guard; (b) by representing Joseph, following his imprisonment, as being given a position of responsibility by the keeper of the prison (39:21-23); and (c) by interpreting the phrase, in custody in the house of the captain of the guard (40:3aα), as meaning in the prison where Joseph was confined (40:3aβb).

A. JOSEPH CAST INTO PRISON (39:1-23)

39:1. The word rendered officer is literally "eunuch." This creates no difficulty, however, when it is realized that Joseph's temptress was the wife, not of Potiphar the was used by God's mercy to play a part in his story.

39:1-6. The Turn of the Road.—Here was the beginning of the discipline by which Joseph's character was put to the proof and his possibilities fulfilled. Potiphar bought him of the hands of the Ishmaelites. He was a slave now in a foreign land. That might have meant for him nothing but discouragement and disintegration. But he met this situation with a courage and fidelity which were to turn evil into incalculable ultimate good. He served Potiphar in such a way that he not only found grace in Potiphar's sight, but that the LORD blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; and the blessing of the LORD was upon all that he had in the house, and in the field.

As a boy at home Joseph had had serious faults. Unquestionably he liked the favoritism that his father showed him. He had strutted in his coat of many colors. He had been vain and self-assertive. What saved him now? Two things,

2 And the LORD was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man; and he was in the house of his master the Egyptian.

3 And his master saw that the LORD was with him, and that the LORD made all that he did to prosper in his hand.

4 And Joseph found grace in his sight, and he served him: and he made him overseer over his house, and all that he had he put into his hand.

5 And it came to pass from the time that he had made him overseer in his house, and over all that he had, that the LORD blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; and the blessing of the LORD was upon all that he had in the house, and in the field.

who had brought him down there. 2 The LORD was with Joseph, and he became a successful man; and he was in the house of his master the Egyptian, 3 and his master saw that the LORD was with him, and that the LORD caused all that he did to prosper in his hands. 4 So Joseph found favor in his sight and attended him, and he made him overseer of his house and put him in charge of all that he had. 5 From the time that he made him overseer in his house and over all that he had the LORD blessed the Egyptian's house for Joseph's sake; the blessing of the LORD was upon all that he had, in eunuch, but of the unnamed Egyptian of the J narrative. It should nevertheless be noted that cases of eunuchs being married are not unknown. Procksch (Genesis, pp. 231, 391), noting indications of more than one hand in vss. 7-20, accordingly maintains that E also told of Joseph's being tempted. The unevennesses in vss. 7-20 are, however, to be accounted for as the result of J2's elaboration of J1's simpler narrative (see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 131, 355).

2. The LORD was with Joseph: The words are intended to explain not only the fact that Joseph found favor with his master and was put in charge of the household (cf. vs. 4), but also his subsequent rise to power over the whole of Egypt.

under God: an influence that went far back in his family tradition, and a change of environment that human calculations would not have been wise enough to choose. From the time of Abraham there had been bred in this family a consciousness of God that laid hold of Joseph and would ennoble him. A child's character cannot be shaped by sudden accidents or by extemporized advice. The inherent quality in the sons of one generation traces back to the family's convictions; and what a present generation believes in will affect children yet unborn. But his inherent possibilities would not alone have been enough to change Joseph from a spoiled child into a great man. He had to have what his father would never have chosen for him: adversity, hardship, and affliction. He had to be tried in the furnace in order that the dross in him might be burned away. So the overruling facts of life, shaped by the unseen hand of God, ordained.

self-pity instead of the courage that can meet hard tests! When Joseph disappeared, Jacob thought he was dead and so found nothing to do but to lament; but if he had known that Joseph was alive in Egypt and could have communicated with him, would he have had the wisdom to help him meet the hard new facts affirmatively and bid him resolve—as Joseph by God's grace did resolve—that no disaster should dismay him and no bludgeoning of events should beat him down?

In that crucial matter Joseph had no human help. He had to work out, under God, his own salvation. He had to be willing to learn, and above all to learn the truth about himself. The disasters which had come upon him were partly his own fault, but that is the hardest thing for a man ever to admit. It would have been more agreeable to say that if his father had petted him, he should also have been able to protect him, that if his brothers hated him, it was only because they were hateful men. As a matter of fact, he had been an irritating person: vain, self-absorbed, oblivious to the offense he gave. If he had failed to face that fact, he would have continued not only an egotist but a whimpering one. But he did face it. After he had been sold into Egypt, he had to begin to think—to think honestly about Joseph and about what was

6 And he left all that he had in Joseph's hand; and he knew not aught he had, save the bread which he did eat. And Joseph was a goodly person, and well-favored.

7 ¶ And it came to pass after these things, that his master's wife cast her eyes upon Joseph; and she said, Lie with me.

8 But he refused, and said unto his master's wife, Behold, my master wotteth not what is with me in the house, and he hath committed all that he hath to my hand; house and field. 6 So he left all that he had in Joseph's charge; and having him he had no concern for anything but the food which he ate.

Now Joseph was handsome and good-looking. 7 And after a time his master's wife cast her eyes upon Joseph, and said, "Lie with me." 8 But he refused and said to his master's wife, "Lo, having me my master has no concern about anything in the house, and he has put everything that he has in my hand; 9 he is not greater in this house

9. Sin against God: The reference is to Yahweh. J, here as elsewhere, does not permit his characters to use the sacred name of the God of Israel when speaking to foreigners. But he represents Joseph as conscious of the Lord's presence even in a strange land. Any sin is a sin against him (cf. 20:6; II Sam. 12:13; Pss. 41:4; 51:4).

wrong with him. He must have been learning to pray most of all not "change facts" or "change other men," but "change me." That is what all who climb to moral greatness have to pray. "I acknowledge my transgressions: . . . cleanse me from my sin" (Ps. 51:3, 2). The overconfident Simon Peter had to be brought to such a cry. So did Paul, who was at first the Pharisee. "O wretched man that I am! who shall deliver me?" (Rom. 7:24.) "I know how to be abased," he said (Phil. 4:12). That was what Joseph had to come to know. It is what every man needs to know. The true abasement is not merely accepting the hard things that happen; it is the painful humbling of a man's own pride to admit the reasons in himself that helped to make them happen. Then for the first time, as with Joseph, his soul is free and fit to be exalted.

7-9. The Basis of Moral Integrity.—Here in less than a hundred words is revealed the reinforcement which a man may call upon in a moment of fierce temptation. Note first the intensity of the temptation. There was the appeal to the passions of the body, which a young man may feel with such hot instinct that he can tell himself the response is "only natural." There was the appeal also of the seemingly romantic, which can set before a young man a lure that is the more seductive because it may appear that it is the ideal in him rather than the evil that is being appealed to. Potiphar's wife was unsatisfied with her own husband. She could whisper that she not only wanted Joseph, but that she needed him. If she was not older than Joseph, she was certainly more experienced; and there is a kind of feminine experience that has the sinuous fascination of the serpent. Joseph was assailed with the flattery of her affection, and this could have had an added power if he had let it touch another possible emotion in himself, viz., self-pity. He had been cruelly battered about by hostility in his own family, and here was someone whose softness would compensate for that. Here was healing for his inner hurt. Furthermore, here was incitement for ambition, and a prospect for pride. This woman, powerfully placed, if he encouraged her devotion to him might carry his interests far. And all the while he could excuse his conscience by the plain fact that whatever might be questionable, he had not provoked it. He could have repeated the old words of the Garden of Eden. The woman tempted me, "and I did eat." Put all those things together—sex-passion, romance, a man's secret hunger for a woman's solace, calculations of advantage, an alibi for conscience—and there was a net of temptation that took great moral strength to break. Yet what Joseph faced can essentially be repeated in every generation. Names are different, scenes are modernized, the exact pattern shifts, but the same test tries men's fiber. It is easy to find excuses for defeat, not so easy to find strength to win. A virile old priest whose ministry was mostly among sailors met one day a man in public life who had got himself involved in a corrupt entanglement. "But, Father," the man said to his rebuke, "you don't know what the outside pressure was." "Outside pressure," came the indignant answer, "outside pressure! Where were your inside braces?"

from me but thee, because thou art his wife: how then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?

10 And it came to pass, as she spake to Joseph day by day, that he hearkened not unto her, to lie by her, or to be with her.

than I am; nor has he kept back anything from me except yourself, because you are his wife; how then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?" 10 And although she spoke to Joseph day after day, he would not listen to her, to lie with her or

In the experience of Joseph, what were the "inside braces"? There was first a decent sense of human fairness which made him a man of honor. The baby is an individualist, and little children are anarchic. They are conscious only of their own wants and they reach out to get these satisfied. Human growth is a growth into relationships. The child must learn to adjust himself to others, for only so can there be any tolerable society. Petulant and demanding self-assertion must be controlled. But morally some men never grow up from being babies. Men of mature souls do—as Joseph did. That maturity does not come automatically; it must be achieved. It must feed on straight thoughts and on right feelings responsibly cultivated. Deprived of these the moral character, like an unfed body, has the rickets and cannot stand up under press. Neglect in little choices, irresponsibility in what seems unimportant conduct, will have disastrous results when the heavy test comes.

What lay back of Joseph when he was confronted with the sudden and wholly unforeseen temptation in Potiphar's house? Hidden facts, but real facts and decisive ones, somewhere in the earlier years. From something good in his inheritance, from something faithful in his own accumulating attitudes, from mindfulness of God, he had built up subconsciously the moral reserves he would need. He had produced a nature that was incompatible with knavery. Behold, he said, my master wotteth not what is with me in the house, and he hath committed all that he hath to my hand. He might have argued that he could sin against Potiphar without Potiphar's ever knowing it, but he could not sin without knowing it himself. "Character is what a man is in the dark." Joseph had built up inside himself the sense of honor which has respect for other men's honor and therefore cannot be mean enough to disgrace both himself and them. How . . . can I do this great wickedness? he cried. "How can I not do it?" the weak man will plead. It takes a long integrity to make the kind of man whose inability is to do wrong, whose compulsion is to do right.

This leads to a further truth. A man's integrity in the world of men is not the result of human motives only. Joseph made that clear in the full sentence of which only half just now was quoted: How . . . can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God? Only in relation to God are other human souls seen in their full dignity, and duty toward them made compelling. Humanitarianism alone is a structure of morals built on sand. Unless men are regarded as of eternal worth, human obligations become reduced to passing whim or shifting calculation. "Men have no Father, and therefore they should all act as brothers": the flimsiness of humanistic ethics is laid bare in that sardonic saying. Consider how in Nazi Germany all decent respect for human beings disappeared with repudiation of religion. Without accountability to God, human relationships can degenerate into a crafty manipulation of advantage. What ultimate reason then is there for not treating human beings as pawns to be pushed off the board as part of a winning game? What reason unless there is the ultimate authority of truth and righteousness, and magnanimity and mercy, as established in the character of God? The dependably good man is the godly man. Reflect upon the convictions which must be inculcated in a child if there is to be any moral certainty. There must be a steady star to steer by if the course is to be held true through changing winds and across a changing sea.

10. Continuing Resistance.—Potiphar's wife kept on in her passionate allurements. Failing to persuade Joseph the first time, she pursued him day by day. Temptation thus renewed may be harder to resist than was the first suggestion. A decent man can be shocked by the bold suddenness of evil, and his conscience may recoil. But the shock wears off and presently the suggestion seems not so strange. Then comes a new time of danger. As a steel bridge which can resist a heavy blow may be endangered by the successive shocks that come from the tread of marching men, so a man's moral resistance may disintegrate beneath the impact of temptation that comes relentlessly on and on. Joseph had sense enough to know that he must not be where the feet of temptation continually walked. He must not depend upon the fact that he had said "No" to Potiphar's wife. Henceforth he must take care not to be with her.

11 And it came to pass about this time, that Joseph went into the house to do his business; and there was none of the men of the house there within.

12 And she caught him by his garment, saying, Lie with me: and he left his garment in her hand, and fled, and got him out.

to be with her. 11 But one day, when he went into the house to do his work and none of the men of the house was there in the house, 12 she caught him by his garment, saying, "Lie with me." But he left his garment in her hand, and fled and got out of 11-12. Defenses Against Temptation.—Sexual immorality in present-day society is so general, and sometimes so unashamed, that the preacher and teacher of the truths of God will have it on their hearts continually to guard those they care for from that sin. Vss. 7-9 have suggested one message; these suggest a further one.

Face at the outset the discreditable fact: many men today, if tempted less dramatically than Joseph, may yet be tempted oftener. "Sex appeal" is everywhere; and there is less restraint, either by good manners or by accepted modesty. Principles of conduct which once were powerful have been eaten into by the "acids of modernity." From Freudian psychiatrists, from the snickering suggestiveness of decadent novels, from scraps of salacious conversation, adolescent boys and girls have been infected with the idea that sexual control is nothing but outdated superstition. Why resist their impulses when not resisting them is the mark of grown-up men and women? So they think they know; and who is responsible for that corrupting pseudo knowledge? A great network of influences, some of them represented by gentlemen of most polite demeanor and personal respectability, who sit perhaps in the pews of churches: writers who turn out erotic stuff because there is a market greedy for it; owners or executives of magazines that in text and illustrations make license look alluring; businessmen who advertise products by linking them with sex attraction; and all the multitude of lesser folk who throw their weight into the sinking scale by the kind of books they buy, the plays they go to see, and the general laxness they encourage. Meanwhile, right-minded men and women may be timid or confused. They have no clear moral yea and nay to speak, because their religious loyalties have grown too vague and weak to furnish sure convictions. Therefore it is not so much particular and personal wickedness as a want of principles which an older generation should have passed on to them that has made innumerable people act as if there were no such thing as principle in sex.

Note what Joseph did. When temptation reached out for him, he tore himself away quickly and decisively. He fled, and got him out. "Flee . . . youthful lusts," says II Tim. 2:22.

The first necessity with the allurements of sexual sin is to see it for what it is, to call it by its right name. Miscellaneous sex relationships, illicit so-called love affairs, are not love; they are only lust. Sex is part of the divine ordaining and in its right use it is sanctified. But sex impulse undisciplined degrades the personality into an instrument of low passion. It has no loyalty and therefore its "romance" is rottenness. It may corrupt the body—it does corrupt the soul. Read Prov. 7. Those who have let themselves go in sexual license can become so carnal, cynical, and callous that it will be hard for them to love one woman truly or to bring to any marriage a whole heart. The high imperatives of religion which keep a man clean, and not any perverted philosophy which justifies philandering, are the road to happiness. Many a man has thanked God that he did "flee . . . youthful lusts." Where is the one who is sorry that he did?

Turning again to Joseph—what enabled him to flee? Influences which the narrative makes plain: his innate moral integrity, his sense of honor in human relationships, his reverence toward God (see Expos. on vss. 7-9). These were linked together, and the first two depended on the third. They were the great factors in his resistance, but less conspicuous factors may be noted. He was occupied and interested. He found himself faced with the suddenly seductive woman at the moment when he was going about his responsible business. If he had had a lazy or an empty mind, it would have been more open to what she was trying to put into it; but being neither lazy nor empty its wholesome occupancy resisted the push of the unexpected and uncongenial. Work which enlists a man's energies and gives him contented self-expression is always a safeguard against sensuality. It is those who lounge about in uselessness, the "play-boys," who have nothing to do with imagination but let the doors to it swing open the easiest way, that are like ramshackle houses into which every disreputable guest can find an entrance. Joseph, busy with the trust which Potiphar had given him, was a different sort. Furthermore, it seems evident that he was being made a different sort from the beginning. The positive content of his mind was no momentary accident. His habitual thinking had been positive—positive with purpose and with clean resolve.

My strength is as the strength of ten,
Because my heart is pure.⁷

Back of what the man will do lies what the boy was thinking—the thoughts let in and the thoughts kept out. Purity which can stand great tests is not come by passively. It must be wanted and be hardly won. Tests come early and must be bravely met. Wrote Milton, "I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed."⁸ Something must have been striven for if there is to be honor at the end. A man must have prayed in earnest the psalmist's prayer, "Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me" (Ps. 51:10).

13-23. Through Disaster.—Here is the event which must have seemed to Joseph the bitterest and most undeserved blow which fate could deal him, but which nevertheless he met with a faith in God and a fidelity that brought good in the end. The test he faced was the more crucial because it seemed so contradictory. In Canaan he had not been without fault, and there was some reason why his brothers had turned against him; but in any moral order of life, what reasonableness could there be in what happened now? He was betrayed by a vile woman's treachery. He was punished and imprisoned not because he had been evil but because he had been innocent. In the face of such sardonic injustice as that, he might have been tempted to curse both man and God. But stripped of all human comradeship though he was, Joseph yet believed that the Lord was with him; and because he bore himself as a man accountable to God, he had the quality that gave him favor in the sight of the keeper of the prison.

A young artist who had been through a cruel period of poverty, loneliness, and seeming failure said: "If I could write a book, I would call it by this title—From Ashes to God. It is only when you have been burned to ashes that you completely find God. Then when everything in you seems to have been extinguished, a new little flame is somehow lighted, which grows and grows and can never be put out. That flame is God." Joseph was obviously a man who had to find God out of ashes if he was to find God at all—and know that God had found him and held him all the while. The same is true of other great figures of the Bible: Elijah, crying out in his loneliness and despair, "Now, O Lord, take away my life" (I Kings 19:4); Peter, looking at Jesus and saying, "Depart from me; for I am a sinful man" (Luke 5:8); Paul the apostle crying, "Who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" (Rom. 7:24). Religious experience thus may begin with stark realism, but it need not so end. It can end with redemption. In place of mourning, it can bring the oil of joy; in place of a spirit of heaviness, the garment of praise.

Consider two aspects of life in which a soul can rise from ashes to God. First, there is deliverance from defeat. This defeat may be in the realm of material circumstances, as with the artist whose words were quoted. Many other persons similarly have had legitimate hopes and ambitions apparently destroyed, eager and creative purposes frustrated. How can such lives emerge into victory? The answer is a strange one, but it is true. The way to overcome defeat may 17 And she spake unto him according to these words, saying, The Hebrew servant, which thou hast brought unto us, came in unto me to mock me:

18 And it came to pass, as I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled out.

19 And it came to pass, when his master heard the words of his wife, which she spake unto him, saying, After this manner did thy servant to me; that his wrath was kindled.

home, 17 and she told him the same story, saying, "The Hebrew servant, whom you have brought among us, came in to me to insult me; 18 but as soon as I lifted up my voice and cried, he left his garment with me, and fled out of the house."

19 When his master heard the words which his wife spoke to him, "This is the way your servant treated me," his anger was kindled. 20 And Joseph's master took him and put him into the prison, the place where the king's prisoners were confined,

20. Death would be the usual punishment for such conduct as that with which Joseph was charged (cf. "The Tale of the Two Brothers" referred to above). J obviously had to ignore this fact.

be to accept defeat. When a man enters most completely into defeat, disguises nothing, avoids nothing, accepts the full consequences of life as life really is, then he may be on the threshold of larger triumph. So it was with Joseph. Sold as a slave by the vindictiveness of his brothers, accused now falsely of a crime, thrown into prison, what does he do? He does not sit down idly and bemoan his lot. He meets his disasters with a spirit that grows increasingly intelligent, self-critical, steadfast, and determined. Looking back presently on his darkest hours, he will see that it was not human agency that shaped his life, but God. THE LORD was with Joseph, and showed him mercy. . . . THE LORD was with him. . . . THE LORD made it to prosper (vss. 21-23). Listen to that threefold repetition of the LORD.

Nor is it only in the Bible that we see men who move through ashes up to God. Read the life of Edward L. Trudeau, caught in the prime of life and doomed, as it seemed at first, to a useless invalidism, but becoming the pioneer of the modern treatment of tuberculosis. He said:

I have learned that the conquest of Fate is not by struggling against it, not by trying to escape from it, but by acquiescence; that it is often through men that we come to know God; that spiritual courage is of a higher type than physical courage; and that it takes a higher type of courage to fight bravely a losing than a winning fight.⁹

As defeat in outward circumstances may need to be met by recognizing that defeat, so it is also as concerns the inner life. An individual has sinned. Or irrespective of personal guilt, one recognizes himself to be a member of a sinful society. The blight of moral mistakes lies on us in our world. That defeat must be met with open eyes. Our world can be delivered from its increasing perils only if we are honest enough to realize our need for moral understanding, repentance, and regeneration.

Second, there is deliverance from seeming victory. That may sound like a paradox, but it is plain fact. Often we find God only when we stop thinking that we have already found him, and win our spiritual victories only when we reject the thought that we have already won. Consider the symbolic meaning in some great churches of laying on the altar on Ash Wednesday, the beginning of the penitential time of Lent, the ashes got from burning palms used on the festival Palm Sunday the year before. So the religious man must be continually offering up his early and partial achievements as only so much ashes in the sight of God. Read Phil. 3. Think of Paul counting everything that once had been his pride as being nothing in comparison with Christ; and now, forgetting the things behind, pressing forward to the things ahead.

Will it be claimed that this discounting of partial victories dooms life to discouragement? No, for the soul's progress is like climbing up a mountain. There are many lesser heights that must be scaled before the summit can be reached. To halt on any one of these is to be defeated. It is necessary to keep going down into intervening valleys in order to climb up out of them to higher ground ahead. Energy 21 ¶ But the LORD was with Joseph, and showed him mercy, and gave him favor in the sight of the keeper of the prison.

22 And the keeper of the prison committed to Joseph's hand all the prisoners that were in the prison; and whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it.

23 The keeper of the prison looked not to any thing that was under his hand; because the LORD was with him, and that which he did, the LORD made it to prosper.

40 And it came to pass after these things, that the butler of the king of Egypt and his baker had offended their lord the king of Egypt.

40 Some time after this, the butler of the king of Egypt and his baker offended their lord the king of Egypt. 2 And Pharaoh was angry with his two officers, the chief butler and the chief baker, 3 and he put them in custody in the house of the captain of the guard, in the prison where

B. INTERPRETER OF DREAMS (40:1-23)

Ch. 40 is a conflation of J and E, the E narrative being the basic element in the composition. This recorded that the Pharaoh, being angry with two of his officers, the chief of the butlers and the chief of the bakers, placed them under house arrest with the captain of the guard (vss. 2, 3aα), who detailed his personal servant (cf. 39:4aβ), Joseph, to attend them (vs. 4). One night each of them had a strange dream (vs. 5a). These Joseph interpreted for them (vss. 7-14a, 15a, 16-19): that of the chief butler as auguring his restoration to office, that of the chief baker as an omen of his coming execution. In each case Joseph's interpretation was fulfilled (vss. 20aα, 21-22), but the chief butler, whom Joseph had asked to plead for him to the Pharaoh, did not remember him (vs. 23a).

The J narrative was similar. Here, however, the royal establishment is thought of as less elaborate: the king of Egypt had but one butler and one baker (vs. 1), who were incarcerated in the same prison as Joseph (vs. 3aβb). Their dreams seem to have been identical (see Exeg. on vs. 5) and Joseph interpreted them as presaging their release from prison, asking them to speak to the Pharaoh on his behalf (vss. 14b, 15b); but when they were freed, on the occasion of the Pharaoh's birthday (vs. 20aβy), they forgot about him (cf. vs. 23b). This story is from J¹, with some elaboration by J².

40:1. The title the king of Egypt is an indication of the earliest narrative of the Hexateuch, J¹ (Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, p. 25).

3. RJE identifies the house of the captain of the guard (E) with the prison where Joseph was confined (J). and effort must be given to the utmost, burned down to the ashes of complete commitment, before the victory is won. So it is always with the soul's ascent to God. It is only when we are through with self-saving that we are saved. Joseph could not have stopped and said that he had already done enough when he had won his victory over temptation in Potiphar's house. He could not plead that he must not go down into the darkness of a still worse trial. Out of that darkness came new light. And all the way from Joseph to our own time it has been true that then is lighted the flame which "can never be put out. That flame is God."

40:1-22. Joseph's Fellow Prisoners.—From primitive savages all the way to present-day psychologists, dreams and the meaning of dreams have had a haunting fascination. In strange ways they mirror events, and sometimes they seem to foreshadow them. But what of the life

4 And the captain of the guard charged Joseph with them, and he served them: and they continued a season in ward.

5 ¶ And they dreamed a dream both of them, each man his dream in one night, each man according to the interpretation of his dream, the butler and the baker of the king of Egypt, which were bound in the prison.

6 And Joseph came in unto them in the morning, and looked upon them, and, behold, they were sad.

7 And he asked Pharaoh's officers that were with him in the ward of his lord's house, saying, Wherefore look ye so sadly to-day?

8 And they said unto him, We have dreamed a dream, and there is no interpreter of it. And Joseph said unto them, Do not interpretations belong to God? tell me them, I pray you.

9 And the chief butler told his dream to Joseph, and said to him, In my dream, behold, a vine was before me;

10 And in the vine were three branches: and it was as though it budded, and her blossoms shot forth; and the clusters thereof brought forth ripe grapes:

Joseph was confined. 4 The captain of the guard charged Joseph with them, and he waited on them; and they continued for some time in custody. 5 And one night they both dreamed—the butler and the baker of the king of Egypt, who were confined in the prison—each his own dream, and each dream with its own meaning. 6 When Joseph came to them in the morning and saw them, they were troubled. 7 So he asked Pharaoh's officers who were with him in custody in his master's house, "Why are your faces downcast today?" 8 They said to him, "We have had dreams, and there is no one to interpret them." And Joseph said to them, "Do not interpretations belong to God? Tell them to me, I pray you."

9 So the chief butler told his dream to Joseph, and said to him, "In my dream there was a vine before me, 10 and on the vine there were three branches; as soon as it budded, its blossoms shot forth, and the

5. The awkwardness of the verse is due to the fact that RJE is here combining two different representations—that of J, according to which the dreams were identical, and that of E, that they were different. From J comes and one night they both dreamed; from E, each his own dream, and each dream with its own meaning. The clause referring to the king of Egypt is, of course, from J. The Israelites shared in the belief, held by the Egyptians and by other peoples in that age, in divinely inspired dreams (for references see Skinner, Genesis, p. 461). But generally in the O.T. the dream either contains the revelation (e.g., 20:3; 28:13, 15; I Kings 3:5-15), or its significance is plain (e.g., 28:11-12; 37:5-10). The art of interpreting dreams is ascribed only to Joseph and to Daniel. It may be that this was a feature of the Shechem tradition of Joseph. The story of Daniel is modeled on that of Joseph.

8. Since they were under arrest they could not consult a professional interpreter, as they would have done had they been at liberty. Joseph implies that a professional is not needed: God can reveal the meaning of their dreams to whom he will.

they foreshadow? That is where the deeper mystery lies. In the story here two men are condemned to prison by Pharaoh's sudden anger. One is taken back into favor, the other put to death. For what reason? Perhaps there was no reason, but only a ruler's irresponsible caprice. Yet life was as dear to one man as to the other, and the dreadful sequel to his dream all the more bitter and irrational by the side of the other man's deliverance. Who shall interpret the tragedy of life's contradictions? Joseph could not do that. Only God can reveal at last the pattern on the other side of what seems to human eyes the tangled skein.

For the writer of this chapter the fellow prisoners of Joseph have a secondary interest. They concern him only because of the relationship they happen to have with Joseph. And that relationship does throw added light on Joseph's character. In prison, as in Potiphar's house, he was the direct opposite of the sort of man whom George Bernard Shaw satirically characterized 11 And Pharaoh's cup was in my hand: and I took the grapes, and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup, and I gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand.

12 And Joseph said unto him, This is the interpretation of it: The three branches are three days:

13 Yet within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thine head, and restore thee unto thy place; and thou shalt deliver Pharaoh's cup into his hand, after the former manner when thou wast his butler.

14 But think on me when it shall be well with thee, and show kindness, I pray thee, unto me, and make mention of me unto Pharaoh, and bring me out of this house:

15 For indeed I was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews: and here also have I done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon.

16 When the chief baker saw that the interpretation was good, he said unto Joseph, I also was in my dream, and, behold, I had three white baskets on my head:

17 And in the uppermost basket there was of all manner of bakemeats for Pharaoh; and the birds did eat them out of the basket upon my head.

18 And Joseph answered and said, This is the interpretation thereof: The three baskets are three days:

19 Yet within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thy head from off thee, and shall hang thee on a tree; and the birds shall eat thy flesh from off thee.

clusters ripened into grapes. 11 Pharaoh's cup was in my hand; and I took the grapes and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup, and placed the cup in Pharaoh's hand." 12 Then Joseph said to him, "This is its interpretation: the three branches are three days; 13 within three days Pharaoh will lift up your head and restore you to your office; and you shall place Pharaoh's cup in his hand as formerly, when you were his butler. 14 But remember me, when it is well with you, and do me the kindness, I pray you, to make mention of me to Pharaoh, and so get me out of this house. 15 For I was indeed stolen out of the land of the Hebrews; and here also I have done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon."

16 When the chief baker saw that the interpretation was favorable, he said to Joseph, "I also had a dream: there were three cake baskets on my head, 17 and in the uppermost basket there were all sorts of baked food for Pharaoh, but the birds were eating it out of the basket on my head." 18 And Joseph answered, "This is its interpretation: the three baskets are three days; 19 within three days Pharaoh will lift up your head — from you! — and hang you on a tree; and the birds will eat the flesh from you."

11. The implication seems to be that just as the natural process of the growth of the grapes had been miraculously accelerated, so the juice fermented as it was being pressed into the cup.

14. For house the LXX reads "prison," rightly.

15. The first half of the verse alludes to Joseph's kidnaping by the Midianites (E); the second half to the injustice done to him by his master's wife (J).

17. The birds were eating it: The implication is that he could not drive them away. This is the ominous feature of the dream, and determines its meaning.

as one who "will never miss a chance to lose an opportunity." Joseph never failed to seize each opportunity; and this he seemed to do not by any selfish calculation but by the moving of God's Spirit in him which made him meet every turn of life magnanimously. When Joseph was put in charge of the two new prisoners, he served them. And he did more. He had the sensitiveness and the instinctive sympathy which made him observant of these men's faces so that he could read their feelings underneath; and what they felt, he cared about. One morning he looked at them, and, behold, they were sad. Why were they sad? he asked them. That question led to the story of their dreams; that story to his interpretation; and as a sequel to that came the release of the chief butler, and through him—though tardily—the release of Joseph himself. So far as Joseph was concerned, there was nothing he could do for the two men that he

20 ¶ And it came to pass the third day, which was Pharaoh's birthday, that he made a feast unto all his servants: and he lifted up the head of the chief butler and of the chief baker among his servants.

21 And he restored the chief butler unto his butlership again; and he gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand:

22 But he hanged the chief baker: as Joseph had interpreted to them.

23 Yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph, but forgat him.

20 On the third day, which was Pharaoh's birthday, he made a feast for all his servants, and lifted up the head of the chief butler and the head of the chief baker among his servants. 21 He restored the chief butler to his butlership, and he placed the cup in Pharaoh's hand; 22 but he hanged the chief baker, as Joseph had interpreted to them. 23 Yet the chief butler did not remember Joseph, but forgat him.

20. As Smend (Erzählung des Hexateuch, p. 103) observes, Pharaoh's birthday would not be the occasion of the punishment of the chief baker. The words which was Pharaoh's birthday, he made a feast for all his servants are from J. They suggest that according to this narrative both men were released.

23. But forgat him: Lit., "and forgat him," a doublet to the preceding sentence, is from J. The verb was therefore probably in the plural originally. Though nothing is said of the slow withering of Joseph's hopes for release, his sad figure casts its shadow over the conclusion of the story, another instance of J's literary skill.

had not done; and he comes through the prison experience increasingly revealed as having qualities that would make him great.

23. The Sin of Forgetfulness.—Joseph had already suffered two betrayals: through the jealous violence of his brothers and through the twisted passion of Potiphar's wife. Now comes another injury less malicious but hardly less disillusioning than the others. Here is a man he had befriended and helped. The chief butler did not set out to do him any harm; he simply did nothing at all. He just went off casually and forgot. But to Joseph, in prison, that was as hurtful as if it had been a deliberate wrong.

The sins of omission often are our worst discredit. In the Book of Common Prayer the General Confession acknowledges that "we have done those things which we ought not to have done," but rightly first it confesses that "we have left undone those things which we ought to have done." It is not enough to say to a friend, "I did not mean to hurt you." The test of friendship is how truly did you mean to help? The chief butler doubtless meant to help Joseph; he may have been voluble with promises. But all the same, he forgot. Forgetfulness in matters of this kind is no accident. It represents a deeper moral failure of unfaithfulness. Shallow-spoken gratitude, hollow loyalty professed but not put into practice, can convict a man's whole character of being sham, not substance.

"But I did intend to help Joseph," the chief butler might have argued in his own excuse. "I would have helped him sooner if I had remembered. But how could I help it if I forgot?"

So too often say the rest of us. Any day may see its best possibilities spoiled not by gross evil but by small neglect, by the errand not carried out, the letter stuck in the pocket and not posted, the responsibility accepted and then let drop out of mind. "How can I be blamed if I did not remember?" may be smoothly asked. But the answer is that failure to remember is no unavoidable bad luck. It is bad management of the mind which, because of its irresponsibility, can be immoral. When what ought to be dependable and solid becomes only a "frustrate ghost," then that is not mere unfortunate circumstance. It is sin.

Why is it possible to pledge trust and then forget? First, because of lack of intention and lack of attention. A promise may be so glibly made that it does not register. A person says he will do something and he thinks he means to do it, but the intention will wither as surely as a flower with no roots if he does not pay enough attention to plant it positively in his mind. Second, because of defective association paths. Memory depends upon the network of contacts established in the brain. Some of them form into a complex so strongly charged by habitual emphasis that there is little chance that anything linked with it can be lost from consciousness. With many persons that dominant complex is self-interest. Anything which has to do with that, and which is energized by that, is remembered. So we can always remember what we really want to do. But something that mainly affects somebody else is like an uncharged wire in the mind of the person who is self-absorbed.

41 And it came to pass at the end of two full years, that Pharaoh dreamed: and, behold, he stood by the river.

2 And, behold, there came up out of the river seven well-favored kine and fat-fleshed; and they fed in a meadow.

3 And, behold, seven other kine came up after them out of the river, ill-favored and lean-fleshed; and stood by the other kine upon the brink of the river.

4 And the ill-favored and lean-fleshed kine did eat up the seven well-favored and fat kine. So Pharaoh awoke.

41 After two whole years, Pharaoh dreamed that he was standing by the Nile, 2 and behold, there came up out of the Nile seven cows sleek and fat, and they fed in the reed grass. 3 And behold, seven other cows, gaunt and thin, came up out of the Nile after them, and stood by the other cows on the bank of the Nile. 4 And the gaunt and thin cows ate up the seven sleek and fat cows. And Pharaoh awoke.

C. JOSEPH'S RISE TO POWER (41:1-57)

This chapter is a conflation of J and E, with some additions from P: vss. 44, 46-47, 54b, 57, and possibly 45aα.

The J story told of the Pharaoh's dream of the ears of grain (vss. 5-7), of Joseph's interpretation of it (vss. 14aβ, 22-24a, 21a, 26aβ, 27aβ, 31, 32bβ), of his advice to the Pharaoh to appoint overseers who would gather up all the food of the seven plenteous years and store it in the cities against the coming famine (vss. 34a, 35abβ, 36a), of the Pharaoh's appointment of Joseph himself (vss. 38, 41, 43a), of Joseph's marriage (vs. 45aβ), of how he carried out his policy (vss. 45b, 48a, 49bα), of the birth of Joseph's sons (cf. vs. 51bβ), and of the beginning of the famine (vss. 53-54a, 55-56a).

For the J dream of the ears of grain E substituted that of the cows (vss. 1-4), less fantastic, but at the same time less apt in its imagery of the famine. He recorded Joseph's interpretation of it (vss. 8-14aα, 14b-20, 21b, 24b-26aα, 27aαb, 28-30, 32bα) much as J had done, but changed Joseph's advice to the Pharaoh to appoint a number of overseers to make it agree with the action taken, the appointment of one man who would store up not all the yield of the years of plenty—which was obviously impossible—but only one fifth of it (vss. 33, 34b, 35bα, 36b). He then recorded the appointment of Joseph (vss. 37, 39-40, 42, 43b, 49a), the birth of his sons (vss. 50a, 51abα, 52), and the coming of the famine (vs. 56b). The E narrative is thus little more than a revision of that of J.

RJE, in weaving the two accounts together, was careful to preserve the salient points of each. Such statements as the dream of Pharaoh is one (vs. 25) are part of his harmonization.

There is no electric energy of interest to make it come alive. The thought of Joseph was only an unnoticed flicker on the edge of the chief butler's thought. No recollection concentrated there because he did not really care. It is the self-absorption which similarly does not care that makes so many of us guilty of the sin of forgetting. But sometimes the forgetting may be more directly purposeful. It is due to deliberate repression. Consider what modern psychology has revealed of the secret operation of the subconscious. The mind buries what it does not want to remember. Perhaps the chief butler's impulse was to banish the whole humiliating incident of his imprisonment, to wipe it from his recollection as though it had never been. This involved forgetting Joseph too, though no doubt the chief butler never could forget him wholly; but he stifled the memory so far as any effective consciousness was concerned, because he did not want to arouse the other painful memories connected with it. How many of us forget the gratitude we owe, the faithfulness we promised, the help we were going to render, because pride does not want to recall the circumstances in which our obligation rose?

41:1-8. Pharaoh's Dream.—The symbolism of Pharaoh's dream grew out of conceptions deep-rooted in Egyptian thought. The Nile, out of which the fertility and the very life of Egypt came, was anciently venerated as the father of the gods. In Egyptian carvings the male ox represented it, and sometimes the ox was accompanied by seven cows. So in that labyrinth of the subconscious out of which dreams arise, some premonition of disaster took shape for

5 And he slept and dreamed the second time: and, behold, seven ears of corn came up upon one stalk, rank and good.

6 And, behold, seven thin ears and blasted with the east wind sprung up after them.

7 And the seven thin ears devoured the seven rank and full ears. And Pharaoh awoke, and, behold, it was a dream.

8 And it came to pass in the morning that his spirit was troubled; and he sent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof: and Pharaoh told them his dream; but there was none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh.

9 ¶ Then spake the chief butler unto Pharaoh, saying, I do remember my faults this day:

10 Pharaoh was wroth with his servants, and put me in ward in the captain of the guard's house, both me and the chief baker:

11 And we dreamed a dream in one night, I and he; we dreamed each man according to the interpretation of his dream.

5 And he fell asleep and dreamed a second time; and behold, seven ears of grain, plump and good, were growing on one stalk. 6 And behold, after them sprouted seven ears, thin and blighted by the east wind. 7 And the thin ears swallowed up the seven plump and full ears. And Pharaoh awoke, and behold, it was a dream. 8 So in the morning his spirit was troubled; and he sent and called for all the magicians of Egypt and all its wise men; and Pharaoh told them his dream, but there was none who could interpret it to Pharaoh.

9 Then the chief butler said to Pharaoh, "I remember my faults today. 10 When Pharaoh was angry with his servants, and put me and the chief baker in custody in the house of the captain of the guard, 11 we dreamed on the same night, he and I, each having a dream with its own meaning.

† Gk: Heb them

The J material in this chapter seems to be the free composition of J² based in part perhaps, as has already been suggested, upon the career of Yanhamu. Under what circumstances J¹ recorded Joseph's release from prison it is impossible to say, as there is a lacuna in his narrative between 40:14bβ and 43:11 (see further below).

41:5. Were growing (RSV) is a translation of the same word as that rendered came up in vs. 2. This use of the word with two different meanings is an indication of a difference of source.

8. The magicians of Egypt and all its wise men are mentioned in order to show the inferiority of heathen magic and the occult art as practiced in Egypt to the true religion of Israel (cf. Exod. 8:18-19a; 9:11; Dan. 2:2-19; 5:8, 15-28).

Pharaoh in these symbolic pictures of the fat cows and the lean cows—adumbrations of forces that could in fact make the stark difference of good or ill for Egypt, the fertilizing inundations of the river, or no water and paralyzing drought. But though dreams come thus from hidden mental associations which have rational relationship, the conscious mind cannot always recognize the relationship which the symbols express. All that Pharaoh knew was that he was under the shadow of a portent which perplexed and depressed him. The portent was worse when the dream shifted its imagery, but with the same calamitous suggestion. He awoke, and found it was a dream, but the effect of it was so inescapable that he was convinced it was more than a dream. No wonder he sent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof. But they could not interpret what he told them. To the writers of Genesis this was a matter of course. Only an understanding given by God could interpret the realities of today and tomorrow.

9-15. Joseph Is Remembered.—Now comes another vivid link in the whole close-woven drama of the Joseph story. (One thinks wishfully, and with wonder, of what Shakespeare might have done with it if his attention had turned that way!) The chief butler, who had been helped by Joseph in prison and, when set free, had promptly forgotten, now recalled his benefactor. I do remember my faults this day, he exclaimed. He had certainly been at fault, and it was perhaps no credit to him that the divine plan for Joseph was to be no longer frustrated. Why did he remember? Was it because he suddenly saw advantage for himself in being able to give to Pharaoh this report of the sort of man Pharaoh was seeking? Was his confession of his fault merely the cringing self-

12 And there was there with us a young man, a Hebrew, servant to the captain of the guard; and we told him, and he interpreted to us our dreams; to each man according to his dream he did interpret.

13 And it came to pass, as he interpreted to us, so it was; me he restored unto mine office, and him he hanged.

14 ¶ Then Pharaoh sent and called Joseph, and they brought him hastily out of the dungeon: and he shaved himself, and changed his raiment, and came in unto Pharaoh.

15 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I have dreamed a dream, and there is none that can interpret it: and I have heard say of thee, that thou canst understand a dream to interpret it.

16 And Joseph answered Pharaoh, saying, It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace.

17 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, In my dream, behold, I stood upon the bank of the river:

18 And, behold, there came up out of the river seven kine, fat-fleshed and well-favored; and they fed in a meadow:

19 And, behold, seven other kine came up after them, poor and very ill-favored and lean-fleshed, such as I never saw in all the land of Egypt for badness:

20 And the lean and the ill-favored kine did eat up the first seven fat kine:

21 And when they had eaten them up, it could not be known that they had eaten

12 A young Hebrew was there with us, a servant of the captain of the guard; and when we told him, he interpreted our dreams to us, giving an interpretation to each man according to his dream. 13 And as he interpreted to us, so it came to pass; I was restored to my office, and the baker was hanged."

14 Then Pharaoh sent and called Joseph, and they brought him hastily out of the dungeon; and when he had shaved himself and changed his clothes, he came in before Pharaoh. 15 And Pharaoh said to Joseph, "I have had a dream, and there is no one who can interpret it; and I have heard it said of you that when you hear a dream you can interpret it." 16 Joseph answered Pharaoh, "It is not in me; God will give Pharaoh a favorable answer." 17 Then Pharaoh said to Joseph, "Behold, in my dream I was standing on the banks of the Nile; 18 and seven cows, fat and sleek, came up out of the Nile and fed in the reed grass; 19 and seven other cows came up after them, poor and very gaunt and thin, such as I had never seen in all the land of Egypt. 20 And the thin and gaunt cows ate up the first seven fat cows, 21 but when they had eaten

21. The word rendered eaten them is literally "come into their midst." This is an extraordinary circumlocution for the eating up of the cows, but is apt enough as a descrip-blame which might prevent angry punishment from Pharaoh? Or was he genuinely sorry and honestly ashamed? Whatever the outward event, the answer to that question would make a crucial inward difference with the man himself. A fault may be remembered only with the purpose of squirming out of its consequences, and in that case it remains as a hidden corruption to the conscience. Or it may be remembered with the emphasis on my faults, in which case the stabbing memory may mean repentance and a new turn on the moral road.

16. Not Man, but God.—How characteristic of the whole book of Genesis are the words of this sentence: It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace! Non nobis, Domine! The O.T. writers understood the dignity that could belong to a man, but always that dignity was derived. It was not in anything that a man could boast about as his own endowments. It was in the fact that he could be an instrument in the hands of God. Conspicuously that was true of Joseph, both in what happened to him and in his own awareness. He was not depending now on his own cleverness. He would use all the discernment he had, but it was God who must direct it and illumine it. Not he, but God, would give Pharaoh his answer; and because the answer would come from God, it could turn Pharaoh's perplexity into peace.

17-33. The Dream Retold and Interpreted.—(For the dream itself see Expos. on vss. 1-8.) them; but they were still ill-favored, as at the beginning. So I awoke.

22 And I saw in my dream, and, behold, seven ears came up in one stalk, full and good:

23 And, behold, seven ears, withered, thin, and blasted with the east wind, sprung up after them:

24 And the thin ears devoured the seven good ears: and I told this unto the magicians; but there was none that could declare it to me.

25 ¶ And Joseph said unto Pharaoh, The dream of Pharaoh is one: God hath showed Pharaoh what he is about to do.

26 The seven good kine are seven years; and the seven good ears are seven years: the dream is one.

27 And the seven thin and ill-favored kine that came up after them are seven years; and the seven empty ears blasted with the east wind shall be seven years of famine.

28 This is the thing which I have spoken unto Pharaoh: What God is about to do he showeth unto Pharaoh.

29 Behold, there come seven years of great plenty throughout all the land of Egypt:

30 And there shall arise after them seven years of famine; and all the plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt; and the famine shall consume the land;

31 And the plenty shall not be known in the land by reason of that famine following; for it shall be very grievous.

32 And for that the dream was doubled unto Pharaoh twice; it is because the thing is established by God, and God will shortly bring it to pass.

33 Now therefore let Pharaoh look out a man discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt.

them no one would have known that they had eaten them, for they were still as gaunt as at the beginning. Then I awoke. 22 I also saw in my dream seven ears growing on one stalk, full and good; 23 and seven ears, withered, thin, and blighted by the east wind, sprouted after them, 24 and the thin ears swallowed up the seven good ears. And I told it to the magicians, but there was no one who could explain it to me."

25 Then Joseph said to Pharaoh, "The dream of Pharaoh is one; God has revealed to Pharaoh what he is about to do. 26 The seven good cows are seven years, and the seven good ears are seven years; the dream is one. 27 The seven lean and gaunt cows that came up after them are seven years, and the seven empty ears blighted by the east wind are also seven years of famine. 28 It is as I told Pharaoh, God has shown to Pharaoh what he is about to do. 29 There will come seven years of great plenty throughout all the land of Egypt, 30 but after them there will arise seven years of famine, and all the plenty will be forgotten in the land of Egypt; the famine will consume the land, 31 and the plenty will be unknown in the land by reason of that famine which will follow, for it will be very grievous. 32 And the doubling of Pharaoh's dream means that the thing is fixed by God, and God will shortly bring it to pass. 33 Now therefore let Pharaoh select a man discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt.

tion of what happened to the first seven ears of grain, and suggests that vs. 21 belongs to J and so stood originally after vs. 24a.

Now Joseph justifies the faith he had expressed in vs. 16. The symbolism of Pharaoh's dream resolves itself in his enlightened understanding, and he tells Pharaoh the meaning of the seven fat cows and seven full ears of corn, and the seven sinister cows and seven blasted ears—and the meaning is that there shall be seven seasons of plenty, then seven years of famine when all the plenty shall be forgotten. What Pharaoh needs to do is to find a man discreet and wise, whom he shall set over all the land to provide against the coming calamity.

Is that only an ancient story, or is it a solemn warning that needs to ring like an iron bell for the hearing of modern times? In the nineteenth century and in the early part of the twentieth, 34 Let Pharaoh do this, and let him appoint officers over the land, and take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt in the seven plenteous years.

35 And let them gather all the food of those good years that come, and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh, and let them keep food in the cities.

36 And that food shall be for store to the land against the seven years of famine, which shall be in the land of Egypt; that the land perish not through the famine.

37 ¶ And the thing was good in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of all his servants.

38 And Pharaoh said unto his servants, Can we find such a one as this is, a man in whom the Spirit of God is?

34 Let Pharaoh proceed to appoint overseers over the land, and take the fifth part of the produce of the land of Egypt during the seven plenteous years. 35 And let them gather all the food of these good years that are coming, and lay up grain under the authority of Pharaoh for food in the cities, and let them keep it. 36 That food shall be a reserve for the land against the seven years of famine which are to befall the land of Egypt, so that the land may not perish through the famine."

37 This proposal seemed good to Pharaoh and to all his servants. 38 And Pharaoh said to his servants, "Can we find such a man as this, in whom is the Spirit of God?"

38. The thought of the Spirit of God as the enduring source of inward illumination and intellectual power finds expression elsewhere in the O.T. only in later writings, e.g., Exod. 31:3; Num. 27:18; Ezek. 36:27. Earlier the Spirit appears as a catastrophic force, seizing upon a man and empowering him to feats of physical prowess, as, e.g., in Judg.

in many countries of the world and more particularly in Great Britain at the proud zenith of the Victorian era and in the United States rising rapidly to world power, there was prosperity, fat-fleshed and well-favored, such as was not seen on the earth before. But what of the years to follow—years which come from horizons dark with the clouds of confusion and the threat of war? Those years can be like the devouring cows and blasted corn. Where is there a statesman discreet and wise enough to discern the signs of the times, and great enough to mobilize under God the physical and moral resources of the earth sufficiently to avert disaster?

34-49. Executing the Idea.—It is sometimes supposed that the religious man will be only a visionary. He may see what is desirable, but he will have no practical ability to get it done. Goodness, yes; but what about his gumption? Joseph had both, and Pharaoh intuitively recognized that fact. He saw at once not only that Joseph had the right idea; he perceived that here was also the man who could carry it out. So there follows the gorgeous pageant of Joseph's investiture with viceregal power; his progress through the land in Pharaoh's chariot while the people bow before him; and the swift translation into action of his plan to gather in the years of plenty the food that would be needed for the famine that was to come. Thus Joseph the man of prayer was the man who could also perform. So it should always be. One of Phillips Brooks's great sermons is on "Visions and Tasks." "It is a terrible thing," he said, "to have seen the vision, and to be so wrapped up in its contemplation as not to hear the knock of needy hands upon our doors." And he said also, "It is a terrible thing to hear the knock and have no vision to declare to the poor knocker."¹ Egypt would have faced a grim future if Joseph had been lacking in either way. So will other lands and later civilizations if there are no new Josephs. With Joseph a vision of the great forces moving in his world was linked with compassion for people, and his compassion for people was made effective because he understood the forces with which he had to deal.

38. The Meaning of Inspiration.—What the Exeg. suggests here as to the developing conceptions of the Spirit of God may have a practical and present message. There is still the idea that the more authentic gifts of God come as inexplicable miracles. Even more frequent and familiar are the ideas that religion when it is real must show itself in exciting ways, and as a corollary that unless a man is moved by conspicuous emotions there must be something the matter with his religion.

Hidden in both assumptions is an element of truth, crude and groping though the expression of it may be. Special energies do come from God to give men unwonted strength. The old chronicler was right when in Judges he re-

39 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Forasmuch as God hath showed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art:

40 Thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled: only in the throne will I be greater than thou.

41 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, See, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt.

42 And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck;

39 So Pharaoh said to Joseph, "Since God has shown you all this, there is none so discreet and wise as you are; 40 you shall be over my house, and all my people shall order themselves as you command; only as regards the throne will I be greater than you." 41 And Pharaoh said to Joseph, "Behold, I have set you over all the land of Egypt." 42 Then Pharaoh took his signet ring from his hand and put it on Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in garments of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck;

6:34; 14:19; I Sam. 11:6. Allied with this idea is that of the Spirit as the cause of ecstasy, found, e.g., in Num. 11:25; I Sam. 10:6; Joel 2:28. With this development may be compared Paul's insistence that the most excellent gift of the Spirit is not speaking with tongues or working miracles, but the enduring quality of love (I Cor. 12:30-13:13).

41. Joseph is put in charge not only of the royal household but of the whole administration. The reference would seem to be to the coveted office of T'ate, "the second after the king in the court of the palace" (Adolf Erman, Life in Ancient Egypt, tr. H. M. Tirard [London: Macmillan and Co., 1894], p. 87). Syrian slaves were frequently elevated to such dignities (ibid., pp. 106-7, 517-18).

It is evident from this verse that J² had a certain knowledge of Egyptian customs and institutions. This can scarcely be attributed to the remembered experience of the sojourn in Egypt, at least 250 years before he wrote. It will have been acquired from Egyptian merchants and other travelers in Palestine. Indeed, it is not impossible that he himself had visited Egypt.

42. The signet ring, used in sealing documents (cf. Esth. 3:12; 8:8; also I Kings 21:8), is given as a token of authority (cf. Esth. 3:10; 8:2). The weaving of fine linen ported Gideon's victory as due to something supernatural which filled Gideon with a force he would not have had alone. It is a plain fact which every physiologist confirms that when some new stimulus enters a man's mind it may be answered by the release of glandular energies within him which lift his whole self to a higher pitch. The religious man knows that the supreme stimulus is the one which comes when he is in touch with God. Henry M. Stanley, in the journal he kept concerning his hazardous search in central Africa for the lost Livingstone, wrote:

On all my expeditions, prayer made me stronger, morally and mentally, than any of my non-praying companions. It did not blind my eyes, or dull my mind, or close my ears; but, on the contrary, it gave me confidence. It did more: it gave me joy, and pride, in my work, and lifted me hopefully over the one thousand five hundred miles of Forest tracks, eager to face the day's perils and fatigues. You may know when prayer is answered, by that glow of content which fills one who has flung his cause before God, as he rises to his feet.²

It would be an unhappy thing if we should be too sophisticated to see any value in the belief—no matter how primitive have been some of its expressions—that the Spirit may appear "as seizing upon a man and empowering him to feats of physical prowess." Christian Science and similar cults ought not to be allowed to appropriate and exploit the faith which is as old as time that the spirit of God can work divine results in human bodies.

Error comes when the crudity rather than the deeper and holier content of the agelong belief is preserved. That God can give men strength is true; that this strength comes as a sort of arbitrary marvel apart from moral meaning is superstition. In our modern times, when money is often accounted a surer instrument of strength than muscle, thousands who want to make religion a short cut to prosperity flock to hear self-appointed leaders promise that if we expect it hard enough, God will give us whatever we want. Religion slides back then into the realm of magic, which may be no less magic when its formulas are those of New Thought instead of tribal thaumaturgy.

43 And he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, Bow the knee: and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt.

44 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt.

45 And Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah; and he gave him to wife Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On. And Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt.

46 ¶ And Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh king of Egypt. And Joseph went out from the presence of Pharaoh, and went throughout all the land of Egypt.

47 And in the seven plenteous years the earth brought forth by handfuls.

48 And he gathered up all the food of the seven years, which were in the land of Egypt, and laid up the food in the cities: the food of the field, which was round about every city, laid he up in the same.

49 And Joseph gathered corn as the sand of the sea, very much, until he left numbering; for it was without number.

43 and he made him to ride in his second chariot; and they cried before him, "Bow the knee!"^k Thus he set him over all the land of Egypt. 44 Moreover Pharaoh said to Joseph, "I am Pharaoh, and without your consent no man shall lift up hand or foot in all the land of Egypt." 45 And Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaph'enath-pane'ah; and he gave him in marriage As'enath, the daughter of Poti'phera priest of On. So Joseph went out over the land of Egypt.

46 Joseph was thirty years old when he entered the service of Pharaoh king of Egypt. And Joseph went out from the presence of Pharaoh, and went through all the land of Egypt. 47 During the seven plenteous years the earth brought forth abundantly, 48 and he gathered up all the food of the seven years when there was plenty^l in the land of Egypt, and stored up food in the cities; he stored up in every city the food from the fields around it. 49 And Joseph stored up grain in great abundance, like the sand of the sea, until he ceased to measure it, for it could not be measured.

was an Egyptian art (ibid., p. 448). The gold chain (cf. Dan. 5:7) may contain an allusion to the Reward of the Gold, an Egyptian decoration often conferred in recognition of eminent service to the crown (ibid., p. 118). E thus evinces a knowledge of Egyptian customs, similar to that of J and doubtless similarly acquired.

43. Bow the knee: A rendition, based on the Vulg. ut genuflecterent, of the Hebrew 'abhrék, an obscure word of uncertain meaning (cf. RSV mg.).

45. The conferring of a new name was common with promotions such as that of Joseph (ibid., pp. 106, 517; cf. p. 144). The meaning of Zaphenath-paneah is uncertain. Potiphera is another form of "Potiphar," who appears in the E document not as the priest of On, but as the captain of the guard, Joseph's master (37:36). On is Heliopolis, seven miles northeast of Cairo, anciently a center of the worship of the sun-god Re.

But more serious, because more likely to trouble people who are both simple and sincere, is the other tendency to identify religion with ecstasy. Here again truth is at the heart of what may become distortion. Of course religion does have deep ties with the emotions. It can lift men into an exalted state which expressed itself in the O.T. in religious dances and in the frenzied utterances of bands of wandering prophets in the time of Saul, and similarly today in the hysteria of camp meeting evangelism and among the sects which consider that men and women have more fully arrived at holiness when they fall down in excitement and roll on the floor. Most people will not be attracted to these extremes, but numbers of earnest souls are troubled by this question: "What if my religion seems to have no ecstasy at all?" "Surely," they think, "if we are in touch with God, something ought to happen. Why do we not have new feelings of superhuman happiness? And if no experience has come, how do we really know that we are Christians? Other people have passed through great crises of conversion; and some, like Paul, have felt themselves lifted up to the third heaven. That unmistakably would be to know the Holy Spirit. But when we are so different, and when our religious life seems to move along on level ground, have we missed the Spirit al-

50 And unto Joseph were born two sons, before the years of famine came: which Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On bare unto him.

51 And Joseph called the name of the firstborn Manasseh: For God, said he, hath made me forget all my toil, and all my father's house.

52 And the name of the second called he Ephraim: For God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction.

50 Before the year of famine came, Joseph had two sons, whom As'enath, the daughter of Poti'phera priest of On, bore to him. 51 Joseph called the name of the first-born Manas'seh,^m "For," he said, "God has made me forget all my hardship and all my father's house." 52 The name of the second he called E'phraim,ⁿ "For God has made me fruitful in the land of my affliction."

^m That is Making to forget

51. Manasseh appears among the Babylonians as a personal name, Mannašu (Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, p. 515), a fact which suggests that the historic tribe of Manasseh was called by the name of the leader under whom it emerged as an independent entity. As to when this occurred it is difficult to say. The tribe is not mentioned in the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5), which does, however, refer to Machir (Judg. 5:14), later reckoned as a son, i.e., as a clan, of Manasseh (50:23). This may indicate one of two things: either (a) that the Manassites entered Palestine at a date subsequent to that of the defeat of Sisera (ca. 1200 B.C.), and that the clan of Machir eventually attached itself to them; or (b) that they were in Palestine at the time the song was composed, but had not yet attained tribal status. In favor of the former alternative is the fact, evidenced by the E document, that there was among the northern tribes a group which looked not to Sinai but to Horeb as the desert center of Yahwism. The entry of this group into the land will presumably have been independent of that of the Sinai group. The concern of the E document with Shechem, the capital of Manasseh, suggests that the Manassites belonged to the Horeb group from which that document emanated.

However that may be, Manasseh cannot have come to be regarded as a son of Joseph until after the settlement. It was the necessity of reconciling the tribal tradition with that of the Shechemite figure Joseph which led ultimately to the representation. The etymology provided in this verse is, as is usually the case, fanciful—a device to clinch the linking together of two originally independent figures.

52. Ephraim is primarily a place name, from the same root as Ephrathah, situated in the center of the territory of the tribe (ibid., p. 514); i.e., the tribe took its name from the land it occupied in Palestine. Like Manasseh, and for the same reason, its eponym together?" No. There is no ground for that discouragement, as the Exeg. has reminded us; Paul himself insisted "that the most excellent gift of the Spirit is not speaking with tongues or working miracles, but the enduring quality of love."

This does not mean that religious experience need be flat. We may not be temperamentally emotional; the important matter is not intensity of emotion, but honesty of obedience. So far as concerns Joseph, there is no indication in the narrative of how he felt, nor any indication that Pharaoh chose him because he looked excited. The evidence that the Spirit of God was in him had to do with deeper aspects than that. Here was a man who showed in his controlled but unmistakable authority that there was a spirit in him not present in ordinary men—the spirit of truth to see what needed to be done, and the spirit of faithfulness to go and do it.

50-52. Joseph Names His Sons.—By the favor of Pharaoh, Joseph has been married to a daughter of a priest of Re, the sun-god, at Heliopolis, and has been given the name which represented the profound impression he had made on Pharaoh—the name which seems to have meant "God, the living one, hath spoken" (vs. 45). Thus Joseph was highly exalted in Egypt, although as the developing drama will show, he was never to lose his controlling loyalty to his own people. Now he gives to his two sons names which are significant of his reflection upon his life. The name Manasseh symbolized the fact that God had made him forget his hardships and his father's house, i.e., forget them not in the sense of their being wiped out of 53 ¶ And the seven years of plenteousness, that was in the land of Egypt, were ended.

54 And the seven years of dearth began to come, according as Joseph had said: and the dearth was in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread.

55 And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread: and Pharaoh said unto all the Egyptians, Go unto Joseph; what he saith to you, do.

56 And the famine was over all the face of the earth: and Joseph opened all the storehouses, and sold unto the Egyptians; and the famine waxed sore in the land of Egypt.

57 And all countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because that the famine was so sore in all lands.

53 The seven years of plenty that prevailed in the land of Egypt came to an end; 54 and the seven years of famine began to come, as Joseph had said. There was famine in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread. 55 When all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread; and Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, "Go to Joseph; what he says to you, do." 56 So when the famine had spread over all the land, Joseph opened all the storehouses,^o and sold to the Egyptians, for the famine was severe in the land of Egypt. 57 Moreover, all the earth came to Egypt to Joseph to buy grain, because the famine was severe over all the earth.

came eventually to be represented as a son of Joseph. The etymology provided is less fanciful than that of Manasseh, for the land from which the tribe of Ephraim derived its name seems to have been so called because of its fertility (cf. Skinner, Genesis, p. 471).

55. This verse, derived from J, was in its original context followed by 47:15aβγδ, 16a, 17a (see below).

56. The clause in 47:17a was followed by the first half of this verse, And the famine was over all the face of the earth (J), leading up to the account of the coming of Joseph's brothers from Canaan to buy food in Egypt. The second half is from E. This was, in its original context, followed by the primary material in 47:14, 18-21 (see below), and the account of the coming of Joseph's brothers.

thought or canceled from experience, but rather in the sense that what had been bitter in them was transcended. His was the resolve which Paul was afterward to glorify when he wrote of "forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before" (Phil. 3:13). His other son he named Ephraim: For God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction. How deep and rich is the suggestion of that! The land of affliction is often the fruitful land—fruitful of patience, faith, courage, fortitude, victory. The times when the soul of Israel rose to its noblest heights were often the times when outward events were darkest: Moses in the wilderness, Elijah coming back from Horeb, Isaiah and Jeremiah in besieged Jerusalem. The psalmist understood the truth when he sang of those who "going through the vale of misery use it for a well" (Ps. 84:6 Book of Common Prayer). And Paul could lift that same truth to heroic purpose when he wrote concerning what he chose to stay and face in Ephesus, "A great door and effectual is opened unto me, and there are many adversaries" (I Cor. 16:9).

53-57. The Coming of the Famine.—According to Joseph's interpretation of Pharaoh's dream, so the facts proceeded. After the years of plenty, the distress which he had prophesied began. At first the dearth was in all lands; soon it was worse than dearth, and famine was over all the face of the earth. Because of Joseph's inspired foresight, there was food in Egypt; and people from everywhere began to come and try to buy the food they could not get in their own countries. Such was the plainly recounted physical fact; but in it one may catch the gleam of a suggestion that has to do with a higher realm than the physical. Often in regions of our earth and of our life there can be a spiritual dearth that can deepen into spiritual famine. Yet by the mercy of God there may be a place where there is food, if men know where to turn to seek it. And the mark of that place will be the presence in it of some great man inspired by God to know the needs of his time and to consecrate himself to meet them.

42 Now when Jacob saw that there was corn in Egypt, Jacob said unto his sons, Why do ye look one upon another?

42 When Jacob learned that there was grain in Egypt, he said to his sons,

XLVI. JOSEPH AND HIS BROTHERS IN EGYPT (42:1-45:28)

This section is a conflation of J and E, except for 42:5-6a which come from P. The two narratives followed along the same lines. They told of Jacob's sending his sons to Egypt, while he kept Benjamin with him at home; of Joseph's recognition of his brothers when they appeared before him, and of their failure to recognize him; of his charging them with being spies; of their defense of themselves by insisting that they were brothers; of their mention of Benjamin; of Joseph's providing them with grain; of his warning them that they would not see him on another visit unless they brought Benjamin with them; of their return to Palestine; and of their second journey to Egypt, accompanied by Benjamin.

Within the framework of the tale there are some interesting differences, especially in the development of the motif of Joseph's desire to see Benjamin, his full brother, the son of Rachel. It may be recalled here that according to the J document it was not until after Joseph had been sold to the Ishmaelites that Benjamin was born, at Ephrath on the way from Shechem to Hebron. Joseph thus knew nothing of his existence—or of his mother's death—until the facts emerged in his questioning of his brothers (cf. 43:7; 44:19-20). The J account of the actual cross-examination is missing, together with his description of Joseph's reaction to the news, RJE having preferred the E recension (42:13-16) at this point. However it is clear from 43:3-7 that, knowing the famine would continue for another five or six years, Joseph had no doubt that his brothers would have to come to Egypt again for grain. Therefore all he had to do to ensure that his desire to see Benjamin would be fulfilled was to tell them that he would not see them unless they had the boy with them—an excellent example of J's literary artistry.

E is less sensitive. He has Joseph, ostensibly on the ground of his suspicions as to their good faith, demand that they send one of their number back to Palestine to get Benjamin, while the rest of them are held in custody. He then puts them in prison for three days to convince them of the seriousness of their situation. On the third day, however, he relents a little. He will hold only one of them as a hostage. The others are to return home and bring Benjamin down to Egypt at once.

E further represents the brothers as recognizing that whatever was happening to them was in retribution for their treatment of Joseph seven or eight years before. Possibly there was a parallel to this in J, though it is unlikely, in view of the fact that there is no trace of it in RJE's compilation. It would rather seem that here again J so contrived his narrative that its overtones would suggest the truth to those who had ears to hear (cf. 42:38; 44:19-29, and see below).

Underlying the J material in chs. 42-45 is a simpler narrative by J¹ which told of only one journey of Joseph's brothers to Egypt (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, p. 441), and knew nothing of Benjamin (cf. Hugo Gressmann, "Ursprung und Entwicklung der Joseph-Sage," EYXAP|ΣTHPION, ed. Hans Schmidt [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1923], I, 11). Fragments of this are preserved in 43:11, 13b α , 15b-17, 24b, 26acb (see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 144-46).

42:1-5. The Quality of Decision.—Here in vss. 1-2 is one of those extraordinary O.T. sentences which with a handful of words lights up a whole scene. There they all are, Jacob and the full circle of his sons, so sharply outlined that it is as though we could see their attitudes and mark the expression on each face. The crucial fact is what everybody knows. There is famine in the land. The little that they have to eat is running low, and there is no hope of getting any more from their own fields. What is there to do then? The brothers have no answer. They only stare at one another helplessly. Nobody gives a lead. But it was different with Jacob. He was an old man now, but energy still could kindle in him like a fire. He said he had heard

2 And he said, Behold, I have heard that there is corn in Egypt: get you down thither, and buy for us from thence; that we may live, and not die.

3 ¶ And Joseph's ten brethren went down to buy corn in Egypt.

4 But Benjamin, Joseph's brother, Jacob sent not with his brethren; for he said, Lest peradventure mischief befall him.

5 And the sons of Israel came to buy corn among those that came: for the famine was in the land of Canaan.

6 And Joseph was the governor over the land, and he it was that sold to all the people of the land: and Joseph's brethren came, and bowed down themselves before him with their faces to the earth.

7 And Joseph saw his brethren, and he knew them, but made himself strange unto them, and spake roughly unto them; and he said unto them, Whence come ye? And they said, From the land of Canaan to buy food.

"Why do you look at one another?" 2 And he said, "Behold, I have heard that there is grain in Egypt; go down and buy grain for us there, that we may live, and not die." 3 So ten of Joseph's brothers went down to buy grain in Egypt. 4 But Jacob did not send Benjamin, Joseph's brother, with his brothers, for he feared that harm might befall him. 5 Thus the sons of Israel came to buy among the others who came, for the famine was in the land of Canaan.

6 Now Joseph was governor over the land; he it was who sold to all the people of the land. And Joseph's brothers came, and bowed themselves before him with their faces to the ground. 7 Joseph saw his brothers, and knew them, but he treated them like strangers and spoke roughly to them. "Where do you come from?" he said. They said, "From the land of Canaan, to buy

A. JOSEPH'S BROTHERS COME TO EGYPT (42:1-6)

42:1. The abrupt change of scene is remarkably effective. Skinner notes that "the energy and resourcefulness of the father is set in striking contrast to the perplexity of the sons" (Genesis, p. 474).

6. An official in such a responsible position as that assigned to Joseph in the story would scarcely himself have interviewed foreigners coming to buy grain. The representation that he did so was, of course, demanded by the story as a whole. It seems probable, however, that if J had had any real awareness of the administrative problems involved in such an office as Joseph's he would have taken pains to account more adequately for the brothers' contact with him.

B. JOSEPH'S TREATMENT OF HIS BROTHERS (42:7-44:34)

1. JOSEPH'S BROTHERS IN PRISON (42:7-17)

7. Joseph's treatment of his brothers from this point until the disclosure of his identity (45:1) is, in the present combined narrative, a strange mixture of harshness that there was grain in Egypt. Doubtless his sons had heard so too, but apparently they took it just as empty information, not as something to be translated into instant action. They were ready to give up, but Jacob said, Get you down. Get down, as it were, to earth—to the good earth of Egypt, where there might be an answer to their need.

Jacob was no ideal character. But he shows now as earlier one great quality of strength: he could decide, and he could act. His sons at this moment were in danger of being unable to do either. They stared at one another as though to say, "Somebody ought to think of something"; and then they shifted irresolutely as though they were also saying, "It's up to somebody to do something—but not me." Jacob, on the other hand, took command. To him the report about food in Egypt meant something and must lead to something. The authority of his perception and his purpose was great enough to arouse his sons to action. It is as though they had been waiting for the masterful word. Men often are: individuals and families get by their crises only when there is some person here and there who, notwithstanding imperfections, has this quality of decisive strength.

6-38. Joseph's Brothers Come to Egypt.—Here begins the long and somewhat repetitious story of the re-establishment of Joseph's rela-

8 And Joseph knew his brethren, but they knew not him.

9 And Joseph remembered the dreams which he dreamed of them, and said unto them, Ye are spies; to see the nakedness of the land ye are come.

10 And they said unto him, Nay, my lord, but to buy food are thy servants come.

11 We are all one man's sons; we are true men; thy servants are no spies.

12 And he said unto them, Nay, but to see the nakedness of the land ye are come.

13 And they said, Thy servants are twelve brethren, the sons of one man in the land of Canaan; and, behold, the youngest is this day with our father, and one is not.

food." 8 Thus Joseph knew his brothers, but they did not know him. 9 And Joseph remembered the dreams which he had dreamed of them; and he said to them, "You are spies, you have come to see the weakness of the land." 10 They said to him, "No, my lord, but to buy food have your servants come. 11 We are all sons of one man, we are honest men, your servants are not spies." 12 He said to them, "No, it is the weakness of the land that you have come to see." 13 And they said, "We, your servants, are twelve brothers, the sons of one man in the land of Canaan; and behold, the youngest is this day with our father, and magnanimity. There is first the charge that they are spies—an opinion which he is represented as maintaining with all the obstinacy of a government official—culminating in their imprisonment for three days (42:9-17). This is followed by an apparently unmotivated change of heart, and the brothers, all except Simeon, are released, provided with grain, and sent back to Palestine to get Benjamin (42:18-26). Their money is, however, placed in the mouth of their sacks (42:25) apparently out of generosity (cf. 43:23), though, as might have been expected, it has the effect of striking terror into them (cf. 42:28*b*). Similarly, Joseph's treatment of them when they came to Egypt the second time (43:16-34) appears to have been kindly intentioned, though again it aroused their fears (cf. 43:18). This kindly treatment was, however, at once offset by the placing of the cup in Benjamin's sack (44:2), and Joseph's insistence that the boy should be left with him as a slave (44:17).

The impression of heartless capriciousness is to a considerable degree due to the fact that the narrative as we have it is the result of the conflation of two documents. Neither of these source documents taken by itself represents Joseph as thus playing with his brothers. The E document told simply of their imprisonment for three days and of their release to bring Benjamin down to Egypt. The fact that nothing except 43:23*b* has been preserved of E's account of Joseph's reception of them on their second visit suggests that it contained nothing striking, and warrants the inference that 43:23*b* was in its original context followed almost immediately by 45:2-3.

Thus Joseph's harshness in the E narrative was limited to his temporary imprisonment of his brothers and to his retaining of Simeon in custody. Nor is there in it the slightest suggestion of caprice, for the implication of 42:21-24 is that he acted as he did for the purpose of bringing them to recognize the cruelty of their own conduct to him some eight years before.

tionship with his family, leading up to the disclosure of his identity to his astonished brothers, and finally to the bringing down of old Jacob into Egypt. The contrasts in Joseph's extraordinary career mount now toward their climax. When the brothers, driven by the famine in Canaan, come to Egypt to try to buy food, Joseph recognizes them; but they do not know him in this awesome man in the seat of Pharaoh's power. Joseph remembers (vs. 9) the dreams which he had had long ago in Canaan concerning them—the dreams in which under the symbols of sheaves standing in the field they all bowed down to him. Now the dreams were mightily fulfilled. Here were these brothers who had sold him into slavery, suing abjectly to him for food with which to keep alive. If the rest of the picture of Joseph were not of a completely different tone, it might seem that he is moved by the very human impulse to make their punishment bitter. He speaks roughly to them (vs. 7); he declares, You are spies. But as the narrative proceeds, it appears that Joseph has another purpose. He is develop

14 And Joseph said unto them, That is it that I spake unto you, saying, Ye are spies:

15 Hereby ye shall be proved: By the life of Pharaoh ye shall not go forth hence, except your youngest brother come hither.

16 Send one of you, and let him fetch your brother, and ye shall be kept in prison, that your words may be proved, whether there be any truth in you: or else by the life of Pharaoh surely ye are spies.

17 And he put them all together into ward three days.

18 And Joseph said unto them the third day, This do, and live; for I fear God:

and one is no more." 14 But Joseph said to them, "It is as I said to you, you are spies.

15 By this you shall be tested: by the life of Pharaoh, you shall not go from this place unless your youngest brother comes here.

16 Send one of you, and let him bring your brother, while you remain in prison, that your words may be tested, whether there is truth in you; or else, by the life of Pharaoh, surely you are spies." 17 And he put them all together in prison for three days.

18 On the third day Joseph said to them, "Do this and you will live, for I fear God:

The J document, after telling of Joseph's initial charge against them, simply recorded the stipulation he then laid down that they would not be permitted to see him should they return without Benjamin. The placing of the money in their sacks was thus in its original context a thoughtful act of generosity (cf. 43:23a). Their terror when they found it (42:28b) was, J would imply, no fault of Joseph's; it represented the first slight stirring of conscience as regards an action done years before, which had that very day been called out of the past by Joseph's seemingly undesigned questioning. Joseph's hospitable reception of them when they came the second time was thus quite genuine. It failed, however, to elicit from them any explicit recognition of their past treachery (contrast 42:21-22 [E]). Joseph therefore resorted to the device of charging Benjamin with the theft of his divining cup. Not only did the confession of guilt follow (44:16) but Judah's moving plea (44:18-34), showing his concern for his old father, revealed that a deep change of heart had occurred.

15. By the life of Pharaoh: In Egypt the Pharaoh was honored as a god. This oath is thus analogous to "as the LORD liveth" (cf. Judg. 8:19; I Sam. 14:39, 45; I Kings 17:1, 12; II Kings 2:2; etc.).

2. THE ORDER CONCERNING BENJAMIN (42:18-25)

18. The words I fear God in this context postulate by implication the existence of a standard of international morality of which God is the guardian (cf. Gunkel, Genesis, ing a plan by which he can keep control of his brothers' movements, inform himself continuously about his father and his younger brother, and ultimately bring them into Egypt. That, of course, is the reason for the device of the money put into the sacks of grain.

The older brothers are uneasy and fearful as they stand before the powerful "Egyptian." They would have been still more fearful had they known that he was Joseph. The fact stated in vs. 23 is simple and obvious, but it suggests an intriguing if accidental spiritual parallel. The thoughts and speech of guilty men are disclosed in ways they do not guess. There is a curious suggestion also in vs. 13: Thy servants are twelve brethren, they say. They supposed that Joseph was dead, but they still speak of the twelve as though he were one of them. Perhaps there is a reflection here of the Hebrew sense of unbreakable family solidarity; and one remembers Wordsworth's "We Are Seven."

18, 35. The Noble and the Ignoble Fear.—To fear, and to be afraid; it may sound as though they meant the same, but they are as wide apart as the world. One word had to do with Joseph, the other with his brethren; the emotions on one side and the other were as different as day and night.

I fear God, said Joseph. Reviewing his life, we can see what that phrase, used so often in the Bible, means. It has nothing to do with fright. It is not abject. It is the reverent awe of a soul, at the highest point of its own awareness, before the infinite greatness and glory of God. It is watchfulness, intent and serious, against any disloyalty to God's righteousness and truth. The man who in this sense "fears God" is not afraid of any mortal danger:

19 If ye be true men, let one of your brethren be bound in the house of your prison: go ye, carry corn for the famine of your houses:

20 But bring your youngest brother unto me; so shall your words be verified, and ye shall not die. And they did so.

19 if you are honest men, let one of your brothers remain confined in your prison, and let the rest go and carry grain for the famine of your households, 20 and bring your youngest brother to me; so your words will be verified, and you shall not die."

p. 444). The same thought underlies 20:11 and, less immediately, the closing words of 39:9.

20. And they did so, senseless here, is a variant to vs. 25b This was done for them and should be deleted.

the only thing he could be afraid of is unfaithfulness. He is like a sentry put at a post of guard by an authority which he completely accepts and trusts. He is vigilant against any hostile forces that may be moving in the dark, but he has no fear of them. Lesser fears are dwarfed and lost in one supreme concern; that he shall not be unfaithful to God who has trusted him.

So it was with Joseph. In the hot assault made upon his moral integrity when he was first a slave in Egypt, he was saved from wickedness because he shrank from outraging the conscience God had given him. When the long frustration and unfairness in which his life had seemed to be caught might have tempted him in Pharaoh's prison to act like a criminal since he was treated like one, he still kept not only his integrity but also his disciplined intelligence. When his brothers came into Egypt, he had the chance to satisfy the natural impulse to revenge after what he had suffered at their hands; but an authority more commanding spoke to his heart. I fear God, he said. That kind of fear always has the magnificent moral astringency which a great life needs. It scorches the mean choice by the fire of the divine choice. See how true that was in all the noblest figures of the O.T.—in Moses, Elijah, Isaiah, Nehemiah. See the reflections of the same truth in other lives down the long course of history—Joan of Arc, John Huss, John Wycliffe, Abraham Lincoln, Robert E. Lee. Souls who have bound themselves to a great commitment, and whose only fear is lest they fail to be loyal, are lifted out of all lesser fears to walk on the heights of courage.

Observe now the contrast of Joseph's brothers. They had not feared God. They thought they did not need to fear anything. They had followed their ungoverned impulses of jealous hatred, anger, and calculating cruelty. When they got rid of Joseph they thought that was the end of the matter. But it was only the beginning. Murder will out, and no evil can be successfully buried. Having started with one kind of evil, they had to adopt another kind to try to protect it. They had to lie to Jacob. Thus their relationship to their father was poisoned. So was their relationship to one another. How did they know that one of them might not betray the secret? They were like men who had to walk henceforth with the haunted sense that something was following them. "Our fatal shadows that walk by us still." ³ So it always is with hidden guilt. Macbeth and Lady Macbeth could not forget the blood of Duncan, and even in the midst of a feast Macbeth sees Banquo's ghost. Remember Hawthorne's description of Arthur Dimmesdale in The Scarlet Letter. The most terrible nemesis of guilt may be that its ghosts arise even in the moments when there seems least likelihood. The moment here, when it was said of Joseph's brothers that they were afraid, was the finding of the money in their sacks. That might naturally have been a moment for happy excitement and delighted gratitude. They knew they had not stolen the money. Their hands in this instance were clean. Why could they not assume therefore that this was an amazing act of generosity which they could accept with rejoicing? The reason was that they knew they did not deserve generosity and so they could not believe in it. Even if they were innocent in this matter they could not think of themselves as innocent, or suppose that others would so consider them. Their record had its foundation in rottenness, and therefore they were fearful that any accident might bring the structure of life tumbling down. So they were afraid, as men always will be when they have flouted God's moral realities. Because they have not had a holy and a saving fear they dwell continually in a shameful fear—the fear that their flimsy pretenses will collapse. The foolish and the flippant sometimes argue that religion is weakening because men then depend no longer on themselves. They had better not! A house rests on its foundations; and a life that is to stand stanch and 21 ¶ And they said one to another. We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us.

22 And Reuben answered them, saying, Spake I not unto you, saying, Do not sin against the child; and ye would not hear? therefore, behold, also his blood is required.

23 And they knew not that Joseph understood them; for he spake unto them by an interpreter.

24 And he turned himself about from them, and went; and returned to them again, and communed with them, and took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes.

25 ¶ Then Joseph commanded to fill their sacks with corn, and to restore every man's money into his sack, and to give them provision for the way: and thus did he unto them.

And they did so. 21 Then they said to one another, "In truth we are guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the distress of his soul, when he besought us and we would not listen; therefore is this distress come upon us." 22 And Reuben answered them, "Did I not tell you not to sin against the lad? But you would not listen. So now there comes a reckoning for his blood." 23 They did not know that Joseph understood them, for there was an interpreter between them. 24 Then he turned away from them and wept; and he returned to them and spoke to them. And he took Simeon from them and bound him before their eyes. 25 And Joseph gave orders to fill their bags with grain, and to replace every man's money in his sack, and to give them provisions for the journey. This was done for them.

21. See Exeg. on vs. 7 above.

25. This verse is from E, except the clause and to replace every man's money in his sack. Thus, according to this document, the men were given provisions for the journey. They would therefore not open their sacks until they reached home.

unafraid against all the winds that blow must be founded on that deep adjustment to the everlasting facts of truth and righteousness which the Bible calls "the fear of the Lord."

21. Nemesis.—Here is a picture of the fact that buried guilt will not stay buried, but rises again as a terrifying ghost. These brothers of Joseph had done an evil thing, and they knew it, but had tried to forget it. People looking on them from the outside might not suspect the guilt that festered within. Their father did not know, and perhaps no one else knew, that they had sold their brother into slavery and to what might have been death. But because they knew, they could not kill their uneasiness. Even when no consequence had caught up with them, they always secretly feared it would. Now they thought it had. Therefore is this distress come upon us.

What was the sin of these brothers, and in what way does it represent a continually recurring human sin? Essentially it was the sin of betraying those right relationships of life which are ordained by God. They were all sons of one father, and they lied to him, betrayed him, and committed a cruelty that had broken his heart. They were brothers to Joseph and they treated him not as a brother but as an enemy. Their own particular impulses of anger, jealousy, and self-assertion had torn relationships in pieces.

There is no ultimate meaning in life without right relationships. Consider the illustration of a symphony orchestra. Suppose the violinists in angry petulance or jealousy insisted upon playing on one string, or the cornetist blasted on his horn, or the man at the kettledrum banged it when he felt inclined. Here would be individual license turning what ought to be co-operation into ugly chaos. So in the larger facts of life. The man who begins to drink too much cannot co-ordinate, either physically or morally. He may argue that as an individual he is free to do as he pleases. But engrossed in one appetite, he loses increasingly his intelligent human contacts, responsibilities, and loyalties. A man and woman falling in love establish a new relationship, but selfishness on the part of either one, or unwillingness for mutual adjustment, will destroy it. In the business and industrial world the gravest evils come from failure in relationship: a hard employer treating men as impersonal tools; the employee shrugging off responsibility for honest work. In international affairs the repudiation of relationships lies at the root of war and its world-wide wreckage. Consider the Nazi philosophy, which scoffed at any relationship to the rest of the world except 26 And they laded their asses with the corn, and departed thence.

27 And as one of them opened his sack to give his ass provender in the inn, he espied his money; for, behold, it was in his sack's mouth.

28 And he said unto his brethren, My money is restored; and, lo, it is even in my sack: and their heart failed them, and they were afraid, saying one to another, What is this that God hath done unto us?

29 ¶ And they came unto Jacob their father unto the land of Canaan, and told him all that befell unto them; saying,

30 The man, who is the lord of the land, spake roughly to us, and took us for spies of the country.

31 And we said unto him, We are true men; we are no spies:

32 We be twelve brethren, sons of our father; one is not, and the youngest is this day with our father in the land of Canaan.

33 And the man, the lord of the country, said unto us, Hereby shall I know that ye are true men; leave one of your brethren here with me, and take food for the famine of your households, and be gone:

26 Then they loaded their asses with their grain, and departed. 27 And as one of them opened his sack to give his ass provender at the lodging place, he saw his money in the mouth of his sack; 28 and he said to his brothers, "My money has been put back; here it is in the mouth of my sack!" At this their hearts failed them, and they turned trembling to one another, saying, "What is this that God has done to us?"

29 When they came to Jacob their father in the land of Canaan, they told him all that had befallen them, saying, 30 "The man, the lord of the land, spoke roughly to us, and took us to be spies of the land. 31 But we said to him, 'We are honest men, we are not spies; 32 we are twelve brothers, sons of our father; one is no more, and the youngest is this day with our father in the land of Canaan.' 33 Then the man, the lord of the land, said to us, 'By this I shall know that you are honest men: leave one of your brothers with me, and take grain for the famine of your households, and go your

3. THE BROTHERS' RETURN TO CANAAN (42:26-38)

27. This verse and vs. 28a are from J (see vs. 25), who (cf. 43:21) went on to tell how all the brothers at once opened their sacks. This notice was dropped by RJE because of vs. 35 (E).

28. What is this that God has done to us? See Exeg. on vs. 7. J regularly uses God instead of "the Lord" (Yahweh) in the Joseph story after ch. 39.

30-37. This passage is from E. Thus, according to that document, the brothers told Jacob immediately upon their arrival home of Joseph's demand to see Benjamin; and the second journey was undertaken at once in order to secure the release of Simeon. The J narrative ran somewhat differently. Nothing was said by the brothers of Joseph's demand until, when the grain was exhausted, Jacob asked them to go to Egypt again to master it. Consider isolationism in the United States with its mean indifference to constructive international accord. In every case the violation of human relationships is due to the breaking of men's obedient relationship to the remembered will of God.

How are men saved from the sin and guilt of wrong relationships? Through recognition of their sin and through repentance. But repentance often cannot come directly out of the heart which sin has hardened. The saving element may need to be made possible through the forgiveness of the one who has been injured. So with the brothers of Joseph. Because he treated them as brothers, they at last could be his brothers again. Thus we gain a glimpse into salvation through Christ. He, the Elder Brother, can relieve human souls from the burden of their guilt and bring them back to right relationships in the Father's family. It is the restoration of right relationships therefore which all followers of Christ must strive for. Consider the Christian's duty to rise like Joseph above personal injury and prejudice into a larger magnanimity.

Only such a spirit can redeem industrial relationships. Read the life of William Henry Baldwin, Jr., one of the most distinguished railroad executives of the early twentieth century. "Ignorance, arrogance and tyranny rise to the 34 And bring your youngest brother unto me: then shall I know that ye are no spies, but that ye are true men: so will I deliver you your brother, and ye shall traffic in the land.

35 ¶ And it came to pass as they emptied their sacks, that, behold, every man's bundle of money was in his sack: and when both they and their father saw the bundles of money, they were afraid.

36 And Jacob their father said unto them, Me have ye bereaved of my children: Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and ye will take Benjamin away: all these things are against me.

37 And Reuben spake unto his father, saying, Slay my two sons, if I bring him not to thee: deliver him into my hand, and I will bring him to thee again.

38 And he said, My son shall not go down with you; for his brother is dead, and he is left alone: if mischief befall him by the way in the which ye go, then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.

way. 34 Bring your youngest brother to me; then I shall know that you are not spies but honest men, and I will deliver to you your brother, and you shall trade in the land.' "

35 As they emptied their sacks, behold, every man's bundle of money was in his sack; and when they and their father saw their bundles of money, they were dismayed. 36 And Jacob their father said to them, "You have bereaved me of my children: Joseph is no more, and Simeon is no more, and now you would take Benjamin; all this has come upon me." 37 Then Reuben said to his father, "Slay my two sons if I do not bring him back to you; put him in my hands, and I will bring him back to you." 38 But he said, "My son shall not go down with you, for his brother is dead, and he only is left. If harm should befall him on the journey that you are to make, you would bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to Sheol."

to replenish their supply (43:2). Only then did they break the news to him that Benjamin must accompany them. Jacob's reply to this is now contained in 42:38, which was placed in its present position by RJE when he combined the two narratives. Judah's words in 43:3-5 were thus in their original context his reply to his father's refusal to permit Benjamin to go (42:38).

35. This verse awkwardly breaks the connection between vss. 34 and 36. It cannot be from J, in view of vss. 27-28. It is probably a secondary elaboration of the E narrative.

36-37. Me and upon me are both emphatic. Jacob reminds them that it is his children, not their own, that they are disposing of one by one. Reuben's reply in vs. 37 is thus to the point.

top in organized labor," he said, "whenever such organization is opposed by tyranny and arrogance, and in my experience I have seen as much of these qualities of human nature in the employer as in the employee." 4 Carroll D. Wright, United States Commissioner of Labor, said of him; "If you could get Baldwin's capacity, sympathy, and moral interest into all our big employers, there would be an end to all really serious labor trouble within two years." 5

So in politics, a great man is not the narrow partisan but an Abraham Lincoln, "with malice toward none, with charity for all."

36-38. Jacob's Grief.—The shadow of what threatens to be a new calamity falls on the old man. The partiality which he had had for Joseph has been transferred to Benjamin; and now there is danger that he may lose him. Simeon may be lost too; and for all these afflictions he blames the other brothers. But there is one brighter element in what his words disclose about himself. At least his sense of values is higher than it once was. When he was with Laban his mind was much on how he could get more sheep and cattle. He knows more surely now that life for him is in his children. (In connection with the words of Reuben [vss. 22, 37] see Expos. on 38:21-22, 29-30.)

43 And the famine was sore in the land.

2 And it came to pass, when they had eaten up the corn which they had brought out of Egypt, their father said unto them, Go again, buy us a little food.

3 And Judah spake unto him, saying, The man did solemnly protest unto us, saying, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you.

4 If thou wilt send our brother with us, we will go down and buy thee food:

5 But if thou wilt not send him, we will not go down: for the man said unto us, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you.

6 And Israel said, Wherefore dealt ye so ill with me, as to tell the man whether ye had yet a brother?

7 And they said, The man asked us straitly of our state, and of our kindred, saying, Is your father yet alive? have ye another brother? and we told him according to the tenor of these words: Could we certainly know that he would say, Bring your brother down?

8 And Judah said unto Israel his father, Send the lad with me, and we will arise and go; that we may live, and not die, both we, and thou, and also our little ones.

9 I will be surety for him; of my hand shalt thou require him: if I bring him not unto thee, and set him before thee, then let me bear the blame for ever:

10 For except we had lingered, surely now we had returned this second time.

11 And their father Israel said unto them, If it must be so now, do this; take of 43 Now the famine was severe in the land. 2 And when they had eaten the grain which they had brought from Egypt, their father said to them, "Go again, buy us a little food." 3 But Judah said to him, "The man solemnly warned us, saying, 'You shall not see my face, unless your brother is with you.' 4 If you will send our brother with us, we will go down and buy you food; 5 but if you will not send him, we will not go down, for the man said to us, 'You shall not see my face, unless your brother is with you.'" 6 Israel said, "Why did you treat me so ill as to tell the man that you had another brother?" 7 They replied, "The man questioned us carefully about ourselves and our kindred, saying, 'Is your father still alive? Have you another brother?' What we told him was in answer to these questions; could we in any way know that he would say, 'Bring your brother down?'" 8 And Judah said to Israel his father, "Send the lad with me, and we will arise and go, that we may live and not die, both we and you and also our little ones. 9 I will be surety for him; of my hand you shall require him. If I do not bring him back to you and set him before you, then let me bear the blame for ever; 10 for if we had not delayed, we would now have returned twice."

11 Then their father Israel said to them,

43:1-14. Jacob's Appeal.—Swiftly and vividly there is given the tense conference between Jacob and the older brothers, with Judah as their spokesman. With a heavy heart Jacob agrees at last to their insistence that he allow Benjamin to go down with them this time to Egypt. He supposes that their errand may have its way to the Egyptian's favor smoothed by gifts, and so he bids his sons to take of the best fruits in the land, . . . and carry down the man a present, a little balm, and a little honey, spices, and myrrh, nuts and almonds: and take double money in your hand. It was a natural supposition, and seemingly a wise one. He did not know that the man in Egypt was one who had no desire for presents, and that already his heart was reaching out to him. Unconsciously Jacob was enacting here a parable of the mistake men make in a far higher relationship. The mercy of God is often as unrealized as Joseph's mercy was by Jacob. God may be thought of as someone off at a distance, holding in his hand the issues of life and death, but with his disposition hidden from our knowledge. Therefore he must be placated with material gifts and sacrifice. But all the while God's goodness needs no buying. As with Joseph and Jacob, his compassion foreruns our appeal.

He moved my soul to seek him, seeking me.*

the best fruits in the land in your vessels, and carry down the man a present, a little balm, and a little honey, spices and myrrh, nuts and almonds:

12 And take double money in your hand; and the money that was brought again in the mouth of your sacks, carry it again in your hand; peradventure it was an oversight.

13 Take also your brother, and arise, go again unto the man:

14 And God Almighty give you mercy before the man, that he may send away your other brother, and Benjamin. If I be bereaved of my children, I am bereaved.

15 ¶ And the men took that present, and they took double money in their hand, and Benjamin; and rose up, and went down to Egypt, and stood before Joseph.

16 And when Joseph saw Benjamin with them, he said to the ruler of his house, Bring these men home, and slay, and make ready; for these men shall dine with me at noon.

17 And the man did as Joseph bade; and the man brought the men into Joseph's house.

"If it must be so, then do this: take some of the choice fruits of the land in your bags, and carry down to the man a present, a little balm and a little honey, gum, myrrh, pistachio nuts, and almonds. 12 Take double the money with you; carry back with you the money that was returned in the mouth of your sacks; perhaps it was an oversight. 13 Take also your brother, and arise, go again to the man; 14 may God Almighty^p grant you mercy before the man, that he may send back your other brother and Benjamin. If I am bereaved of my children, I am bereaved." 15 So the men took the present, and they took double the money with them, and Benjamin; and they arose and went down to Egypt, and stood before Joseph.

16 When Joseph saw Benjamin with them, he said to the steward of his house, "Bring the men into the house, and slaughter an animal and make ready, for the men are to dine with me at noon."

17 The man did as Joseph bade him, and

4. THE BROTHERS' SECOND JOURNEY TO EGYPT (43:1-15)

43:14. The reference to the other brother, Simeon, indicates that this verse is from E, as is vs. 23b. Apart from these two fragments, chs. 43-44 are from J. On El Shaddai (RSV mg.) see Exeg. on 17:1.

5. JOSEPH'S MEETING WITH BENJAMIN (43:16-34)

16. The mention of Benjamin is awkward in view of vs. 29 and is probably a gloss, the original reading being "Now when Joseph saw them."

14. See Expos. on 42:36-38.

15-34. Brotherly Love.—Ch. 42 began to sound a new note in the story of Joseph—his yearning for his younger brother (see 42:4, 15-16, 20, 34). This note now becomes predominant. Benjamin appears before Joseph (vs. 15). Joseph orders a feast of welcome; he releases Simeon, with Peace be to you, fear not; and when he looks at Benjamin again and cries out a blessing in the name of God upon him, he is so moved that he cannot control himself and goes out where he may weep. Nor is it only in the story of Joseph that this note of the love of brother for brother is new. It is new for the whole of Genesis. Other human relationships have been emphasized and made beautiful: the love of man and woman, as between Abraham and Sarah, Jacob and Rachel; the love of father and son, as with Abraham and Isaac, Jacob and Joseph; the love of mother to child, as with Hagar and Ishmael, Rebekah and Jacob. But a brother has not yet been pictured as devoted to another brother; not Ishmael and Isaac, not Esau and Jacob; not the older sons of Jacob among themselves. But Joseph's love for Benjamin is deep and passionate. Those other relationships are perhaps easier to achieve than this love of Joseph for Benjamin. The bond between father and son may involve no rivalry, for each one can give expansion to the other's life. The love of a man for a woman has the binding power of the two complementary sexes. But two brothers in a family may seem only to get in each other's way. They are on the same level and may become rivals. In the early chapters of Genesis the instances of the relationship

18 And the men were afraid, because they were brought into Joseph's house; and they said, Because of the money that was returned in our sacks at the first time are we brought in; that he may seek occasion against us, and fall upon us, and take us for bondmen, and our asses.

19 And they came near to the steward of Joseph's house, and they communed with him at the door of the house,

20 And said, O sir, we came indeed down at the first time to buy food:

21 And it came to pass, when we came to the inn, that we opened our sacks, and, behold, every man's money was in the mouth of his sack, our money in full weight: and we have brought it again in our hand.

22 And other money have we brought down in our hands to buy food: we cannot tell who put our money in our sacks.

23 And he said, Peace be to you, fear not: your God, and the God of your father, hath given you treasure in your sacks: I had your money. And he brought Simeon out unto them.

24 And the man brought the men into Joseph's house, and gave them water, and they washed their feet; and he gave their asses provender.

25 And they made ready the present against Joseph came at noon: for they heard that they should eat bread there.

26 ¶ And when Joseph came home, they brought him the present which was in their hand into the house, and bowed themselves to him to the earth.

27 And he asked them of their welfare, and said, Is your father well, the old man of whom ye spake? Is he yet alive?

28 And they answered, Thy servant our father is in good health, he is yet alive. And they bowed down their heads, and made obeisance.

brought the men to Joseph's house. 18 And the men were afraid because they were brought to Joseph's house, and they said, "It is because of the money which was replaced in our sacks the first time, that we are brought in, so that he may seek occasion against us and fall upon us, to make slaves of us and seize our asses." 19 So they went up to the steward of Joseph's house, and spoke with him at the door of the house, 20 and said, "Oh, my lord, we came down the first time to buy food; 21 and when we came to the lodging place we opened our sacks, and there was every man's money in the mouth of his sack, our money in full weight; so we have brought it again with us, 22 and we have brought other money down in our hand to buy food. We do not know who put our money in our sacks." 23 He replied, "Rest assured, do not be afraid; your God and the God of your father must have put treasure in your sacks for you; I received your money." Then he brought Simeon out to them. 24 And when the man had brought the men into Joseph's house, and given them water, and they had washed their feet, and when he had given their asses provender, 25 they made ready the present for Joseph's coming at noon, for they heard that they should eat bread there.

26 When Joseph came home, they brought into the house to him the present which they had with them, and bowed down to him to the ground. 27 And he inquired about their welfare, and said, "Is your father well, the old man of whom you spoke? Is he still alive?" 28 They said, "Your servant our father is well, he is still alive." And they bowed their heads and made

27. The question as to whether Jacob was still alive indicates that some time had elapsed since the brothers' first journey.

of brothers are anything but admirable. Cain becomes so sullen and bitter against his brother Abel that he kills him. Jacob is so envious of the opportunity of Esau that he defrauds him of his birthright. But here in the story of Joseph and Benjamin the beauty that can be in brotherhood comes into the light. Joseph had loved Benjamin with all the complex of affection associated with his feeling for his father and mother. He loved him as the companion of his boyhood (but see Exeg. on 42:1-45:28), and with a protectiveness which he had never lost. Thought lingers upon this picture of a brother's devotion; and then turns forward to 29 And he lifted up his eyes, and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, Is this your younger brother, of whom ye spake unto me? And he said, God be gracious unto thee, my son.

30 And Joseph made haste; for his bowels did yearn upon his brother: and he sought where to weep; and he entered into his chamber, and wept there.

31 And he washed his face, and went out, and refrained himself, and said, Set on bread.

32 And they set on for him by himself, and for them by themselves, and for the Egyptians, which did eat with him, by themselves: because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews; for that is an abomination unto the Egyptians.

33 And they sat before him, the first-born according to his birthright, and the youngest according to his youth: and the men marveled one at another.

34 And he took and sent messes unto them from before him: but Benjamin's mess was five times so much as any of theirs. And they drank, and were merry with him.

obseisance. 29 And he lifted up his eyes, and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, "Is this your youngest brother, of whom you spoke to me? God be gracious to you, my son!" 30 Then Joseph made haste, for his heart yearned for his brother, and he sought a place to weep. And he entered his chamber and wept there. 31 Then he washed his face and came out; and controlling himself he said, "Let food be served." 32 They served him by himself, and them by themselves, and the Egyptians who ate with him by themselves, because the Egyptians might not eat bread with the Hebrews, for that is an abomination to the Egyptians. 33 And they sat before him, the first-born according to his birthright and the youngest according to his youth; and the men looked at one another in amazement. 34 Portions were taken to them from Joseph's table, but Benjamin's portion was five times as much as any of theirs. So they drank and were merry with him.

44 Then he commanded the steward of his house, "Fill the men's sacks with food, as much as they can carry, and put each man's money in the mouth of his

32. An interesting glimpse of Egyptian custom. J scarcely intends to suggest that Joseph's isolation was due to his being a Hebrew, but rather to his exalted position and perhaps to his having been admitted to the priestly caste (cf. 41:45).

the lovely story of the spiritual brotherhood between Jonathan and David, and to the words of Jesus, "One is your Master, even Christ; and all ye are brethren" (Matt. 23:8). This is the basis of all ultimate brotherliness.

32. Joseph's Loyalty.—Obviously Joseph, with his identity as yet undisclosed, could not sit at the table with his brothers. But neither did he eat with the Egyptians. Why not? To eat with ordinary Hebrews was an abomination unto the Egyptians; but it is hardly likely that anyone at Pharaoh's court would have dared to treat Pharaoh's viceroy as an ordinary Hebrew. Indeed, need he have been considered a Hebrew at all? In his lofty status could he not have been held to outrank in Egyptian citizenship the others in Pharaoh's court? Why then did he not eat with the Egyptians? Was it because he deliberately refrained from incorporating himself into the life of the more privileged people, and, as Moses was afterward to do, kept his devoted loyalty to his own? (But see Exeg.)

44:1-5. The Discerning Spirit.—Whether or not Joseph—according to the story—actually used his cup for divining is not certain, but it is obvious that the Egyptians thought he did. Among the Egyptians, as among many other ancient peoples, it was a familiar matter to seek supernatural guidance by signs. In Exod. 7 appear "the wise men," "the sorcerers," and "the magicians" of the court of Pharaoh. Repeatedly in the O.T. it is evident that the Israelites also took for granted this efficacy of magic and necromancy (see Num. 22:7; Judg. 6:21; I Sam. 9:18; 14:41-42; 28:7). Nor does belief in seers, magicians, medicine men, and all the paraphernalia of the mysterious belong only to primitive periods. Thousands of present-day people, sometimes at first sheepishly but sometimes then with a credulity that grows slavish, go peering into the shadow world where they think mysterious forces move. Joseph's divining cup was supposed to give guidance according to the patterns in which little pieces of gold and silver dropped into it were seen to fall. So people today will give at least a half belief to the fortuneteller who announces what will happen to them according to the pattern of tea leaves in a cup. Multitudes give much more than a half belief to other kinds of occult knowledge. Note the numbers in any community who will be drawn to the seances of a medium who is well advertised. Note the still more conspicuous fascination of astrology.

What do these facts suggest? A truth which the crudities mixed with it must not eclipse, viz., that there is a realm of genuine mystery that lies outside and around our ordinary comprehension. In the words of Hamlet,

There are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio,
Than are dreamt of in your philosophy.⁷

The realities in the midst of which life moves cannot be bounded by any brash definition. A sense of wonder is a spring of the expansion of the soul. To feel that there is something in our universe greater than our easy understanding, something to be sought after with humility and awe—that is what makes man different from the animal, and that is the beginning of religion. Therefore it is right to respect all gropings of men's souls toward what is to them the Great Unknown. From the perspective of a larger revelation many primitive religions, and much in some contemporary religions, may seem to be only superstition. But in that alloy of ignorance may be recognized the thread of gold. By recognition of this truth Christian missions to non-Christian lands have gained the effective wisdom of a new sympathy.

But on the other hand, it is equally a duty to separate the truth from the crude alloy, with gentleness for others, in resolute devotion to the truth itself. Often there is resistance to this, such as the resistance of Roman Catholicism in willingness to compromise with paganism among ignorant multitudes, and thus to exploit their loyalty to priestcraft and to an obscurantist ecclesiastical domination. We dare not forget the words of Jesus, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God . . . with all thy mind" (Matt. 22:37). The majesty and mystery of God will always have its widths and depths that cannot be put into any glib rationalizations; but his reality is reflected only as one approaches it with a mind made clean from any lazy ignorance.

Here is the glory of that freedom of thought which the Protestant Reformation brought back into Christianity—a freedom which is not irresponsibility, but on the contrary is the realization that only when every faculty of a man is released for fearless following of the truth do we find him who has made, not part of us only, but all of us for himself.

So we are led to the real meaning of prayer. In even the dim beginnings of religion, where it has not crossed the border from the shadowland of superstition, there is the living germ of prayer. Genuinely even when gropingly, souls in their religious childhood have tried—and many such still are trying—to climb the altar-stairs

That slope thro' darkness up to God.⁸

Because of the darkness, they have reached out for all sorts of signs to assure them that they were moving toward something or Someone real. But religion which has gained the mature enlightenment which comes from what the O.T. progressively teaches knows that the real signs are not in outward portents, but within. Read ch. i of Harry Emerson Fosdick's *The Meaning of Prayer*⁹ and ch. iii of George A. Buttrick's Prayer.¹ In order to divine the guiding truth that is beyond our immediate ken we do not need Joseph's divining cup; what we need is what we have—a conscience that turns deliberately toward God's light, and prays that he may "take the dimness of my soul away."²

1-13. Benjamin Is Brought Back.—Here Joseph has his servants repeat, with partial alteration, the device which he had used earlier to bring the older brothers back into his presence. As money had been put secretly into all their sacks before, now his own cup is sent off with them; but this time it is in the sack of Benjamin. In the story, as the narrator develops it, the suspense and tension keep increasing. It seemed acute enough when the older brothers were in danger of being accused of being thieves, but now Benjamin is involved: Benjamin the beloved of his father, Benjamin of whom Judah had promised his father, "I will be surety for him. . . . If I bring him not unto thee, . . . then

4 And when they were gone out of the city, and not yet far off, Joseph said unto his steward, Up, follow after the men; and when thou dost overtake them, say unto them, Wherefore have ye rewarded evil for good?

5 Is not this it in which my lord drinketh, and whereby indeed he divineth? ye have done evil in so doing.

6 ¶ And he overtook them, and he spake unto them these same words.

7 And they said unto him, Wherefore saith my lord these words? God forbid that thy servants should do according to this thing:

8 Behold, the money, which we found in our sacks' mouths, we brought again unto thee out of the land of Canaan: how then should we steal out of thy lord's house silver or gold?

9 With whomsoever of thy servants it be found, both let him die, and we also will be my lord's bondmen.

10 And he said, Now also let it be according unto your words: he with whom it is found shall be my servant; and ye shall be blameless.

11 Then they speedily took down every man his sack to the ground, and opened every man his sack.

And he did as Joseph told him. 3 As soon as the morning was light, the men were sent away with their asses. 4 When they had gone but a short distance from the city, Joseph said to his steward, "Up, follow after the men; and when you overtake them, say to them, 'Why have you returned evil for good? Why have you stolen my silver cup?' 5 Is it not from this that my lord drinks, and by this that he divines? You have done wrong in so doing.'"

6 When he overtook them, he spoke to them these words. 7 They said to him, "Why does my lord speak such words as these? Far be it from your servants that they should do such a thing! 8 Behold, the money which we found in the mouth of our sacks, we brought back to you from the land of Canaan; how then should we steal silver or gold from your lord's house? 9 With whomever of your servants it be found, let him die, and we also will be my lord's slaves." 10 He said, "Let it be as you say: he with whom it is found shall be my slave, and the rest of you shall be blameless." 11 Then every man quickly lowered his sack to the ground, and every man opened his sack. 12 And he searched, beginning with the eldest and ending with the youngest; and the cup was found in Benjamin's sack. 13 Then they rent their clothes, and every man loaded his ass, and they returned to the city.

It seemed that the meshes of old guilt had entangled them in inexorable punishment now, even in a matter of which they knew that they were innocent. But actually it would be only a part of the mounting drama which was to lead in a few hours to the disclosure of Joseph and his forgiveness, and would give Joseph the occasion to keep Benjamin and send back to old Jacob the glad news of the welcome waiting for them all in Egypt.

14-34. Judah's Plea.—Not many prose passages in any literature can compare in beauty and poignancy with this writing of an ancient 17 And he said, God forbid that I should do so: but the man in whose hand the cup is found, he shall be my servant; and as for you, get you up in peace unto your father.

18 ¶ Then Judah came near unto him, and said, O my lord, let thy servant, I pray thee, speak a word in my lord's ears, and let not thine anger burn against thy servant: for thou art even as Pharaoh.

19 My lord asked his servants, saying, Have ye a father, or a brother?

18 Then Judah went up to him and said, "O my lord, let your servant, I pray you, speak a word in my lord's ears, and let not your anger burn against your servant; for you are like Pharaoh himself. 19 My lord asked his servants, saying, 'Have you a father, or a brother?' 20 And we said to my lord, 'We have a father, an old man, and a young brother, the child of his old age; and his brother is dead, and he alone is left of his mother's children; and his father loves him.' 21 Then you said to your servants, 'Bring him down to me, that I may and unnamed Hebrew as it has come down to us in the KJV. For here is no artifice of wording. Here instead are the fundamental emotions of human life, expressed with a simplicity so immediate and spontaneous that they find their echo in hearts of every generation.

The brothers of Joseph had originally seemed to be a sorry lot—narrow-minded, jealous, and vindictive. But it may be that the experience of life, and especially the lesson of hard years, had begun to change them. It is a happy fact to have it suggested thus early in the O.T. that men who have been evil may repent. Whether this was wholly true or not of all the brothers, Judah at any rate appears as different; and Judah is the spokesman for the others. What he says is what they all have at least begun to feel. They had begun to understand that one of the worst of human sins is hardheartedness. They had been cruel because they did not care. Note how that sin and the retribution of it re-echo in the pages of the Bible. Nathan is standing before

David and telling him the shattering story of the rich man who took the poor man's lamb; and he makes David condemn himself with the indignant cry, "As the LORD liveth, the man that hath done this thing shalt surely die . . . because he had no pity" (II Sam. 12:5-6). Amos is pronouncing judgment and doom upon the ruthless people of his time, summing up their evil in this, that they were "not grieved for the affliction of Joseph" (Amos 6:6). Consider Jesus' terrible arraignment of the Pharisees in Matt. 23. He could forgive the weak and erring, but his anger blazed at men who had no pity for the little people. Read the parable of the unmerciful servant in Matt. 18, to whom the final devastating question was, "Shouldest not thou also have had compassion?"

Joseph's brothers had begun to learn what the real values of life are. See them reflected in the matchless plea which Judah makes to Joseph. He does not know who Joseph is, but he understands the emotions which every decent man

22 And we said unto my lord, The lad cannot leave his father: for if he should leave his father, his father would die.

23 And thou saidst unto thy servants, Except your youngest brother come down with you, ye shall see my face no more.

24 And it came to pass when we came up unto thy servant my father, we told him the words of my lord.

25 And our father said, Go again, and buy us a little food.

26 And we said, We cannot go down: if our youngest brother be with us, then will we go down: for we may not see the man's face, except our youngest brother be with us.

27 And thy servant my father said unto us, Ye know that my wife bare me two sons:

28 And the one went out from me, and I said, Surely he is torn in pieces; and I saw him not since:

29 And if ye take this also from me, and mischief befall him, ye shall bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.

30 Now therefore when I come to thy servant my father, and the lad be not with us; seeing that his life is bound up in the lad's life;

31 It shall come to pass, when he seeth that the lad is not with us, that he will die: and thy servants shall bring down the gray hairs of thy servant our father with sorrow to the grave.

32 For thy servant became surety for the lad unto my father, saying, If I bring him not unto thee, then I shall bear the blame to my father for ever.

33 Now therefore, I pray thee, let thy servant abide instead of the lad a bondman to my lord; and let the lad go up with his brethren.

set my eyes upon him.' 22 We said to my lord, 'The lad cannot leave his father, for if he should leave his father, his father would die.' 23 Then you said to your servants, 'Unless your youngest brother comes down with you, you shall see my face no more.' 24 When we went back to your servant my father we told him the words of my lord. 25 And when our father said, 'Go again, buy us a little food,' 26 we said, 'We cannot go down. If our youngest brother goes with us, then we will go down; for we cannot see the man's face unless our youngest brother is with us.' 27 Then your servant my father said to us, 'You know that my wife bore me two sons; 28 one left me, and I said, Surely he has been torn to pieces; and I have never seen him since. 29 If you take this one also from me, and harm befalls him, you will bring down my gray hairs in sorrow to Sheol.' 30 Now therefore, when I come to your servant my father, and the lad is not with us, then, as his life is bound up in the lad's life, 31 when he sees that the lad is not with us, he will die; and your servants will bring down the gray hairs of your servant our father with sorrow to Sheol. 32 For your servant became surety for the lad to my father, saying, 'If I do not bring him back to you, then I shall bear the blame in the sight of my father all my life.' 33 Now therefore, let your servant, I pray you, remain instead of the lad as a slave to my lord; and responds to: the sorrow of a man's heart over a lost son, the wistfulness of old age, the memory of a dead mother, the protective love for a youngest child. In the name of these Judah pleads, because he knows instinctively that such a plea ought not to be in vain. And his feeling is not a matter of words only: he is ready to act in a spirit exactly opposite from the spirit he had earlier followed. Once he had helped to sell a brother into slavery; now (vs. 33) he is asking to be put in prison himself in order that another brother may go free.

A chance for the searching of our own hearts is here. What has life done to us, and what do we respond to? Has life made us callous, so that we are ashamed lest somebody should call us "sentimental"? Or have we learned, like Judah, even if it is by the hard way as was the case with him, that a man can begin to live with himself only when he knows that the great affections are beyond all other things supremely worth preserving? The man who is hard to others turns his own soul into stone, and the whole ground of his life's best possibility for happiness grows barren. In I Pet. 3:8 there are two beautiful words: "Be pitiful." They make a summary

34 For how shall I go up to my father, and the lad be not with me? lest peradventure I see the evil that shall come on my father.

45 Then Joseph could not refrain himself before all them that stood by him; and he cried, Cause every man to go out from me. And there stood no man with him, while Joseph made himself known unto his brethren.

2 And he wept aloud: and the Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard.

3 And Joseph said unto his brethren, I am Joseph; doth my father yet live? And his brethren could not answer him; for they were troubled at his presence.

let the lad go back with his brothers. 34 For how can I go back to my father if the lad is not with me? I fear to see the evil that would come upon my father."

45 Then Joseph could not control himself before all those who stood by him; and he cried, "Make every one go out from me." So no one stayed with him when Joseph made himself known to his brothers.

2 And he wept aloud, so that the Egyptians heard it, and the household of Pharaoh heard it. 3 And Joseph said to his brothers, "I am Joseph; is my father still alive?" But his brothers could not answer him, for they were dismayed at his presence.

C. JOSEPH REVEALS HIS IDENTITY (45:1-28)

This chapter is a conflation of J and E. These two narratives varied only in minor details. To be noted especially is the philosophy of history presented in vss. 7, 8a. The former of these is from J, who thus maintains that the brothers, in selling Joseph to the Ishmaelites, had unwittingly been carrying out God's will. That J was not entirely oblivious of the difficulty involved in this interpretation of the event is indicated by the preceding section of this narrative—the account of the way in which Joseph labored to bring his brothers to acknowledge their guilt. Nevertheless, the moral difficulty remains that a deliberately sinful act is represented as having been practically caused by God.

of what Judah had learned, and of what he tried to say.

45:1-5. God Turns Evil to Good.—Joseph's remark to his brothers (vs. 5) seems at first like strange and indefensible counsel. Joseph's brothers not to be distressed or angry with themselves? Why was that not exactly what they should have been? Earlier in the story (see Expos. on 42:21) we hear what they themselves had been driven to confess. "We are verily guilty concerning our brother," they said to one another, "in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear. Therefore is this distress come upon us," they concluded, as they looked around at the walls of an Egyptian prison and wondered whether they would ever get out. Retribution had caught up with them and they knew it was deserved. If anything at this moment appeared certain, it was that they ought to be angry with themselves—and to wish that they had been angry and disgusted a long time before.

For now they were facing something worse than punishment. They were facing the final exposure of their own souls to themselves, and they found that revelation sickening. They had evaded that acknowledgment before, stifled whatever stirring of conscience they had, and gone on with bravado. But now the outward disaster cracked the inward repression. All the stifled foulness of their past spilled out where they could see and smell it. They were guilty men, guilty of the kind of sin that offends the elemental decencies. They had not only conceived an outrageous evil against their own brother, but had carried it out with ruthless unconcern for his desperate pleading. They could never be wicked enough to keep from wincing at that recollection. These brothers of Joseph, with the moral consequences overwhelming them at last, were ready to recognize that the Lord did live, and that fact seemed to promise nothing good for them.

But the words of Joseph strike another note. These brothers of his were to look away from themselves to something greater. They were to consider the inexhaustible goodness and grace of God, which could bend even the worst facts to his ultimately redeeming purpose. For men still hardened in their sin that thought would be impossible; or if it were partly laid hold of, it would be perverted. It would be a license for more evil if God was thus so little to be feared. But Joseph knew these men were beginning to be repentant. For the first time they had looked squarely into their own hearts and had recoiled.

4 And Joseph said unto his brethren, Come near to me, I pray you. And they came near. And he said, I am Joseph your brother, whom ye sold into Egypt.

5 Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye sold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life.

6 For these two years hath the famine been in the land: and yet there are five years, in the which there shall neither be earing nor harvest.

4 So Joseph said to his brothers, "Come near to me, I pray you." And they came near. And he said, "I am your brother, Joseph, whom you sold into Egypt." 5 And now do not be distressed, or angry with yourselves, because you sold me here; for God sent me before you to preserve life. 6 For the famine has been in the land these two years; and there are yet five years in which there will be neither plowing nor harvest.

It was to meet this difficulty that E, as has already been suggested, told not of Joseph's being sold by his brothers to a passing caravan, but of his being kidnapped before his brothers had finally decided what to do with him.

Henceforth they would not think of the greatness of God as something to be taken advantage of, but as terrible—yet also healing—in its contrast and rebuke. They would see that his purpose was not to destroy life but to preserve it; that to those who defied his purpose he stood as with a drawn sword across their path, but that to those who were ready to learn their lesson he was like a beckoning hand.

Reflect upon the career of Joseph and see how he had exemplified this truth. He had been sensitive to the values of life, not only physical but spiritual also. In Potiphar's house he might have destroyed what was more important than physical existence—destroyed a man's home and chance for happiness; but whatever else was dark to him at that moment, he knew clearly enough that God had meant him for something better than that. When he himself was unjustly put in prison, he again was proof against demoralization because God kept him sensitive to life. His relationships with the other prisoners, and particularly with Pharaoh's former chief butler and chief baker, were not accidental. He was generously interested in other people, and never so much obsessed with his own fate and fortune as to lack a quick imagination for their needs. He had the instinctive sympathy which could read men's trouble in their faces. "Why do you look so sad today?" he said to Pharaoh's officers one morning—the morning after they had had their cryptic dreams. He wanted to help them as far as he could in their difficulties; and there is no sign that he let his feelings rankle when one of them was released to freedom and honor while he himself was left behind forgotten. When the opportunity came to interpret the dream of Pharaoh, he was thinking again of life in an area much larger than his own. He was not reaching out for personal recognition. "It is not in me," he said to Phar-

ah; "God"—and notice the emphasis on that first word—"God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace." And the answer that Joseph interpreted, and of which later he was to become the instrument, was possible because the chance to preserve life summoned up his immediate energy and ability. As Pharaoh recognized, he was "discreet and wise"; and his wisdom came from the deep fact which Pharaoh also reflected when he called him "a man in whom the Spirit of God is." If he had not had a divine concern for the fate of a whole people, Joseph might not have had either the foresight or the long patience to become the agent of salvation for Egypt through the years of famine. Let laymen whose business is in practical affairs reflect here upon how high a thing it is to use that opportunity not predominantly for personal advantage but in some far-reaching sense "to preserve life." Which of us, man or woman, does not need the spirit of Joseph as it is expressed at the end of the story: when in spite of reasons he had for returning hurt for hurt, his affection for his family is so clean and true that the one thing he is concerned with is to forgive and to restore. What he wanted to know most was, "Doth my father yet live?" And to the men who had wronged him he did not say, "I am the authority who can break you"; he said, "I am Joseph your brother."

6-8. Life's Ultimate Perspectives.—Looking back, Joseph could say that the whole long course of his life had been shaped by God. It was God who had brought him where he was, not chance, nor men's choices, good or evil. But if it seemed that way now, it had certainly not always seemed so. God had not appeared concerned when his brothers put him in the pit, when the caravan took him into slavery in Egypt, when a woman's lies got him undeserved disgrace, when he lay in Pharaoh's prison. Note

7 And God sent me before you to preserve you a posterity in the earth, and to save your lives by a great deliverance.

8 So now it was not you that sent me hither, but God: and he hath made me a father to Pharaoh, and lord of all his house, and a ruler throughout all the land of Egypt.

7 And God sent me before you to preserve for you a remnant on earth, and to keep alive for you many survivors. 8 So it was not you who sent me here, but God; and he has made me a father to Pharaoh, and lord of all his house and ruler over all the land

45:7. It is not impossible that the words to save your lives by a great deliverance not only refer to the preservation of Jacob and his family from death by famine, but also point ahead to the deliverance at the Red Sea. If so, then J is representing this event—the greatest in the history of his people—not as historically conditioned but as having been determined by God from the beginning. It thus falls into the category of the supra-temporal.

8. A father to Pharaoh may have been an honorific title of the chief minister (cf. I Macc. 11:32).

then the fact that the long reality may be very different from the first appearance, and that God's hand may be moving long before it is revealed. Plainly that was true with Joseph. The very things that seemed at the moment the blindest and most cruel strokes of fate had brought his life to its fulfillment. Think also of the trials of Moses, the development of David's character by the persecution of Saul, the enlargement of the soul of Paul the apostle through the afflictions in which he had learned to glory because he could say at last, "When I am weak, then am I strong" (II Cor. 12:10). As a modern instance, would Franklin D. Roosevelt have attained the degree of power and public influence that he did attain but for the self-mastery he learned in the long months of meditation when infantile paralysis seemingly had ended his career? God's purposes, like grain, can grow in the dark as well as in the day, under rain as well as under sun. See Francis Thompson, "The Hound of Heaven":

Is my gloom, after all,
Shade of His hand, outstretched caressingly?

Note further that the hidden working of God's hand may be frustrated by refusal to trust and wait. Obviously that might have been true with Joseph. He could have grown cynical. The disappointed and disillusioned dreamer is often the man who does react into the most bitter cynicism. Are there no instances that come to mind of contemporary men who began as idealists in political life or in social service, but turned into reactionaries, disillusioned and sometimes corrupt?

Joseph could have become defiant. Men who have supposed themselves to be sincerely religious do sometimes become defiant if they have considered their relationship with God as a kind of contract, to be angrily repudiated if it does not work out quickly according to their wish. Job's wife said to him, "Curse God, and die" (Job 2:9). Joseph in the pit and Joseph in the prison—and any modern parallel to Joseph—may be tempted to say the same.

Or he might have been revengeful. If he had not blamed God, he still could have blamed his brothers and made up his mind to get even with them if ever he had the chance. He could have been vindictive in his heart, like Joab (II Sam. 4); like Mme. LeFarge in A Tale of Two Cities. There is the fierce pleasure of a terrible intoxication in the spirit of revenge, but it paralyzes the better self. If Joseph had spent his time and energy nursing his grievance against his brothers, he would not have had the clear-eyed and controlled perception to recognize the new possibilities that God put in his way.

But even if he had become neither cynical, nor rebellious, nor revengeful, he still might have become discouraged. The ordinary man can stand reverses and disaster up to a certain point, but after that he cannot take it. The real greatness is to be able to say, as Winston Churchill said in the darkest hours of England's destiny and his own, long before there was any sign of victory, "We shall not flag or fail. We shall go on to the end; . . . we shall fight with growing confidence . . . whatever the cost may be. . . . We shall never surrender."⁸

Why then did Joseph prevail? How did he attain to conquest over himself and over his destiny? Because he clung to his invincible instinct that God had a purpose for him worth believing in and pursuing; and because he followed at each turn of the way the partial light that showed the road ahead. Like Christian in ⁸ Speech in the House of Commons, June 4, 1940.

9 Haste ye, and go up to my father, and say unto him, Thus saith thy son Joseph, God hath made me lord of all Egypt: come down unto me, tarry not:

10 And thou shalt dwell in the land of Goshen, and thou shalt be near unto me, thou, and thy children, and thy children's children, and thy flocks, and thy herds, and all that thou hast:

11 And there will I nourish thee; for yet there are five years of famine; lest thou, and thy household, and all that thou hast, come to poverty.

12 And, behold, your eyes see, and the eyes of my brother Benjamin, that it is my mouth that speaketh unto you.

13 And ye shall tell my father of all my glory in Egypt, and of all that ye have seen; and ye shall haste and bring down my father hither.

of Egypt. 9 Make haste and go up to my father and say to him, 'Thus says your son Joseph, God has made me lord of all Egypt; come down to me, do not tarry; 10 you shall dwell in the land of Goshen, and you shall be near me, you and your children and your children's children, and your flocks, your herds, and all that you have; 11 and there I will provide for you, for there are yet five years of famine to come; lest you and your household, and all that you have, come to poverty.' 12 And now your eyes see, and the eyes of my brother Benjamin see, that it is my mouth that speaks to you. 13 You must tell my father of all my splendor in Egypt, and of all that you have seen. Make haste and bring my father down here."

10. You shall dwell in the land of Goshen is inconsistent with 47:6*b*, according to which the settlement in Goshen was made at Pharaoh's order on the ground that Joseph's brothers were shepherds. The clause here can only be a gloss, since E nowhere mentions Goshen (on the locality of Goshen see Exeg. on 46:28-47:12).

The Pilgrim's Progress, he obeyed the guidance that was given him. To Christian at the outset of his journey came Evangelist, and said, pointing with his finger over a very wide field, "Do you see yonder wicket gate?" The man said, "No." Then said the other, "Do you see yonder shining light?" He said, "I think I do." Then said Evangelist, "Keep that light in your eye, and go up directly thereto, so shalt thou see the gate; at which, when thou knockest, it shall be told thee what thou shalt do."

Joseph let the invitation of the generous interests God kindled in him lead him out of what could have been a cramped and corroding self-concern. Note the imaginative interest which made him able to interpret Pharaoh's perplexity, and the readiness to identify himself with a whole people's need, so that he could meet the crisis of Egypt in the time of famine. Read the story of Nehemiah and consider what it was that made him say, "Should such a man as I flee?" (Neh. 6:11). Remember Washington at Valley Forge. In World War I Lord Haldane was cruelly maligned and driven from office in England because it was falsely supposed that his numerous visits to Germany and his interest in German philosophy made him sympathetic with the enemy. Instead of yielding to self-pity, he devoted himself anew to generous labors, and he said afterward to a friend, "When things seem darkest for a man's self, let him get a cause to serve, and then he need never despair."

It was not you that sent me hither, but God. That can be said at last by many a man who has come out of seeming frustration into fulfillment: ad astra per aspera. That great fact can be trusted when skies are clouded and visibility obscure—the great fact that God's hand is on the helm. But that fact must be answered by another one: the brave and faithful readiness of the man himself not to 9-15, 25-26. The Vindicated Dream.—So the great story comes to its splendid climax. Through long years Jacob had thought of his son Joseph as dead. Actually he was alive; not only that, but his life had been lifted up to heights of unbelievable achievement. There in Egypt he occupied the seat of viceregal power. He could send back to his father now what once would have been the incredible message: God hath made me lord of all Egypt. . . . And ye shall tell my father of all my glory (vss. 9, 13). Turn back and recall the beginning of the story. When Joseph first came upon the scene in what was to prove the brilliant drama of his career, he was greeted with no applause. On the contrary, his brothers had looked at him with derision. They were in the fields with the sheep, and as they saw him coming toward them they pointed to him angrily, "Behold, this dreamer cometh" (37:19). To their minds he was a person who went mooning about with nonsensical ideas. Ordinary people often have similar prejudice against the so-called dreamer. They sneer at him as impractical. Even in more kindly ways the dreamer may be suspected. Charles Kingsley wrote, "Do lovely things, not dream them all day long."

15 Moreover he kissed all his brethren, and wept upon them: and after that his brethren talked with him.

16 ¶ And the fame thereof was heard in Pharaoh's house, saying, Joseph's brethren are come: and it pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants.

14 Then he fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck and wept; and Benjamin wept upon his neck. 15 And he kissed all his brothers and wept upon them; and after that his brothers talked with him.

Nevertheless Joseph was great, and great not in spite of being a dreamer but because of it. He would not be stifled by the commonplace. He had large thoughts and large ambitions. Only from such impulses can greatness emerge. Scan the O.T. and consider other significant figures who played a supreme part in history because they had great thoughts and bold imagination: to some degree Jacob, Moses, David, Nehemiah. Note instances of the same truth in secular history.

But Joseph was not yet fit for success. His dreams originally were self-centered (37:5-10). He was thinking about himself and his supposed pre-eminence. His dreams were about the honors that should come to him. He might have developed into only a vain self-seeker. Therefore in God's providence the story of his life had to enter into another and different chapter—a dark chapter before his possibilities could be fulfilled. Sold by his brothers into slavery, exiled into Egypt, beset by circumstances humiliating and almost hopeless, what would happen now? Would he turn bitter and cynical? Would he say that destiny had played him a dirty trick? Would he let both his hopes and his character disintegrate?

Here is the test of a man faced by difficulty and disaster. These might destroy him. On the other hand, it was possible that they might strengthen him. It depended upon the qualities inside. What actually happened was that Joseph met his tests with a courage that made him steadily a bigger man. Remember how in the midst of the apparent wreck of his life's hopes Joseph kept his moral integrity (see Expos. on 39:7-9). Remember the enlargement of his sympathies which came to him when he was shut up in Pharaoh's jail. Remember, too, how the field for the exercise of ambition became larger and nobler in Joseph's thought (see Expos. on vss. 6-8). He learned to be concerned not simply about himself, but about the fate of a nation. So he was capable of becoming Pharaoh's servant in the salvation of Egypt from threatened famine. Thus spiritually he had won the right to have his life go forward into its final shining chapter. His brothers coming down to Egypt, desperately seeking food, were ushered into the presence of an official who would hold their fate in his hands. That official was Joseph, but they were unaware that it was he. They, like their father, supposed that he was dead.

In one sense the Joseph they had known was dead. Here was a new man—the lad grown now into a man of such dimensions that he seemed a different person. In crucial ways he was different. He had become no longer a self-seeker, but a servant. He had let himself be used by the purposes of God, and so he had become great—great enough no longer to be conceited, great enough not to be inflated by success. It was said once sardonically: "When a man is elected a bishop he never remains the same. He either grows or he swells." Joseph, as one who had gone far in eminence, might have attributed his eminence verbally to God and yet really all the time have been preening himself upon his own achievements. He might have been a swollen man, but instead he was a man who in a very solid sense had grown. He had grown because he dared believe in his dreams through all dark days. In the beginning it was with contempt that his brothers said, "Behold, this dreamer." At the end they beheld the dreamer on a throne.

16-24. Pharaoh's Welcome.—Another stroke in the picture of Joseph's greatness. Not only is he himself exalted in Pharaoh's favor, but that favor is so sure that it extends to all who belong to him. That Joseph should have rediscovered his family pleased Pharaoh well. So the 17 And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Say unto thy brethren, This do ye; lade your beasts, and go, get you unto the land of Canaan;

18 And take your father and your households, and come unto me: and I will give you the good of the land of Egypt, and ye shall eat the fat of the land.

19 Now thou art commanded, this do ye; take you wagons out of the land of Egypt for your little ones, and for your wives, and bring your father, and come.

20 Also regard not your stuff; for the good of all the land of Egypt is yours.

21 And the children of Israel did so: and Joseph gave them wagons, according to the commandment of Pharaoh, and gave them provision for the way.

22 To all of them he gave each man changes of raiment; but to Benjamin he gave three hundred pieces of silver, and five changes of raiment.

23 And to his father he sent after this manner; ten asses laden with the good things of Egypt, and ten she asses laden with corn and bread and meat for his father by the way.

24 So he sent his brethren away, and they departed: and he said unto them, See that ye fall not out by the way.

25 ¶ And they went up out of Egypt, and came into the land of Canaan unto Jacob their father, 26 And told him, saying, Joseph is yet alive, and he is governor over all the land of Egypt. And Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not.

27 And they told him all the words of Joseph, which he had said unto them: and when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of Jacob their father revived.

28 And Israel said, It is enough; Joseph my son is yet alive: I will go and see him before I die.

17 And Pharaoh said to Joseph, "Say to your brothers, 'Do this: load your beasts and go back to the land of Canaan; 18 and take your father and your households, and come to me, and I will give you the best of the land of Egypt, and you shall eat the fat of the land.' 19 Command them^r also, 'Do this: take wagons from the land of Egypt for your little ones and for your wives, and bring your father, and come. 20 Give no thought to your goods, for the best of all the land of Egypt is yours.'"

21 The sons of Israel did so; and Joseph gave them wagons, according to the command of Pharaoh, and gave them provisions for the journey. 22 To each and all of them he gave festal garments; but to Benjamin he gave three hundred shekels of silver and five festal garments. 23 To his father he sent as follows: ten asses loaded with the good things of Egypt, and ten she-asses loaded with grain, bread, and provision for his father on the journey. 24 Then he sent his brothers away, and as they departed, he said to them, "Do not quarrel on the way." 25 So they went up out of Egypt, and came to the land of Canaan to their father Jacob. 26 And they told him, "Joseph is still alive, and he is ruler over all the land of Egypt." And his heart fainted, for he did not believe them. 27 But when they told him all the words of Joseph, which he had said to them, and when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of their father Jacob revived; 28 and Israel said, "It is enough; Joseph my son is still alive; I will go and see him before I die."

narrative recounts the lavishness of Pharaoh's preparations for bringing Jacob and his sons into Egypt and establishing them there. They shall have the good of the land. With rich provision for them all, and most for Benjamin, the brothers set out for Canaan to carry the amazing message to their father.

25-28. Light at Eventide.—So it must have seemed to Jacob, the news concerning Joseph breaking like the glory of an ineffable sunset through parted clouds at the end of a long, dark day. The latter part of his life, since Rachel died and Joseph disappeared, had been gray and sad. No wonder that he could not believe what his sons came now to tell him, and that his heart fainted. No wonder, either, that when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, his spirit revived. Nor was it the wagons 46 And Israel took his journey with all that he had, and came to Beer-sheba, and offered sacrifices unto the God of his father Isaac.

2 And God spake unto Israel in the visions of the night, and said, Jacob, Jacob. And he said, Here am I.

3 And he said, I am God, the God of thy father: fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will there make of thee a great nation.

4 I will go down with thee into Egypt; and I will also surely bring thee up again: and Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes.

5 And Jacob rose up from Beer-sheba: and the sons of Israel carried Jacob their father, and their little ones, and their wives, in the wagons which Pharaoh had sent to carry him.

6 And they took their cattle, and their goods, which they had gotten in the land of Canaan, and came into Egypt, Jacob, and all his seed with him:

7 His sons, and his sons' sons with him, his daughters, and his sons' daughters, and all his seed brought he with him into Egypt.

46 So Israel took his journey with all that he had, and came to Beer-sheba, and offered sacrifices to the God of his father Isaac. ² And God spoke to Israel in visions of the night, and said, "Jacob, Jacob." And he said, "Here am I." ³ Then he said, "I am God, the God of your father; do not be afraid to go down to Egypt; for I will there make of you a great nation. ⁴ I will go down with you to Egypt, and I will also bring you up again; and Joseph's hand shall close your eyes." ⁵ Then Jacob set out from Beer-sheba; and the sons of Israel carried Jacob their father, their little ones, and their wives, in the wagons which Pharaoh had sent to carry him. ⁶ They also took their cattle and their goods, which they had gained in the land of Canaan, and came into Egypt, Jacob and all his offspring with him, ⁷ his sons, and his sons' sons with him, his daughters, and his sons' daughters; all his offspring he brought with him into Egypt.

XLVII. JACOB IN EGYPT (46:1-48:22)

The passages in 46:6-27; 47:5aβb, 6a, 7-11, 27b-28; 48:3-6 are from P, some being secondary. The rest of the material is a conflation of J and E, with J predominating.

A. JACOB COMES TO EGYPT (46:1-7)

46:1. The implication of vss. 1b-4 is that it was the theophany there described which decided Jacob to go to Egypt; vs. 5a then records his departure. Vs. 1aα is thus from another hand than vss. 1b-5a; the use of the name Israel in vs. 1aα indicates its J derivation. J must accordingly have represented Jacob as being at some place other than Beer-sheba (vs. 5a). This place is nowhere mentioned in the extant J material of the Joseph stories, but there can be no doubt that it was Hebron, in view both of the and their contents that thrilled him. It was the fact that they came from Joseph, and that to Joseph he would go. Joseph my son is yet alive. That was enough. He would see him again before he died, and his life would go on in Joseph's. Here could be his nunc dimittis.

46:1-7. Israel Comes to Egypt.—Who can forecast the mysterious events that make up history? A boy is sold as a slave to a caravan. By developments which seem incredible he becomes a great man in the land of Egypt to which he had been taken. His family follow him there. That family and clan grow to be a numerous people; and from their sojourn in Egypt, at first beneficent and afterwards bitter and tragic, come Moses, the Passover, the Exodus, and the road to the Promised Land. No wonder the Israelitish chroniclers, holding the tradition of all this to have been true, believed that when Jacob went on his way he heard the very voice of God assuring him of what would happen. Fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will there make of thee a great nation: I will go down with thee . . . and I will also surely bring thee up again. It is significant too that Jacob's vision of the future is grounded in the faith which had come to him from the past. The divine voice said to him, I am God, the God of thy father; and it was unto the God of his father Isaac that Jacob offered sacrifices at Beer-sheba. According to the narratives in Genesis, Beer-sheba had been made sacred by both Abraham and Isaac. There Abraprominence of that city in the J document and of the P notice in 35:27, which has displaced the equivalent notice of J. And came to Beer-sheba is RJE's harmonization of the two narratives.

B. JACOB'S FAMILY (46:8-27)

8-27. A tradition, preserved in Deut. 10:22, represented the number of Israelites who settled in Egypt as seventy. These the compiler of this list desired to enumerate. To this ham was said to have made a covenant with Abimelech (21:31). There he went to dwell after the Lord had turned aside his proffered sacrifice of Isaac (22:19). It was in the wilderness of Beer-sheba that Hagar was wandering when the angel of God came to show her the well of water which would save the life of Ishmael (21:14-19). According to another tradition, the servants of Isaac dug wells there (26:32-33). And it was from Beer-sheba that

Jacob himself had started out on the journey that was to be marked by his never to be forgotten vision at Bethel (28:10). With Jacob, as with many men in other times, the renewal of associations such as those gave him the spiritual sensitiveness which enabled him to believe that the voice of God was speaking to him again.

8-27. More Genealogy.—Once more, as often in the preceding chapters, we meet the favorite and familiar purpose of the priestly writers to end he drew upon some census record—originally having nothing to do with the migration into Egypt—of the leading Israelite clans (cf. Num. 26:5-50), which traditionally numbered seventy (cf. Exod. 24:1, 9; Num. 11:16).

C. JACOB SETTLES IN GOSHEN (46:28-47:12)

46:28-47:12. The nucleus of this is a simple account of Jacob's meeting with Joseph, of Joseph's presenting five of his brothers to the Pharaoh, and of the latter's decision that, being shepherds by occupation, they should settle in Goshen.

The statement that the Israelites were settled apart by themselves in Goshen is first found in J². J¹ knows nothing of it; his account of the Exodus has the Israelites living certify the whole genealogy of the people of Israel (see Expos. on ch. 5).

46:28-47:6. The Arrival in Goshen.—The narrative at this point deals tersely with the meeting of Joseph and his father; it is more concerned with the question of where the family of Israel shall settle. After the munificent welcome decreed by Pharaoh in ch. 45, the last words in ch. 46 have a surprising sound in their suggestion that the Israelites were an abomination unto the Egyptians. As a matter of fact, however, herdsmen seem to have been represented on 30 And Israel said unto Joseph, Now let me die, since I have seen thy face, because thou art yet alive.

31 And Joseph said unto his brethren, and unto his father's house, I will go up, and show Pharaoh, and say unto him, My brethren, and my father's house, which were in the land of Canaan, are come unto me;

32 And the men are shepherds, for their trade hath been to feed cattle; and they have brought their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have.

33 And it shall come to pass, when Pharaoh shall call you, and shall say, What is your occupation?

34 That ye shall say, Thy servants' trade hath been about cattle from our youth even until now, both we, and also our fathers: that ye may dwell in the land of Goshen; for every shepherd is an abomination unto the Egyptians.

47 Then Joseph came and told Pharaoh, and said, My father and my brethren, and their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have, are come out of the land of Canaan; and, behold, they are in the land of Goshen.

2 And he took some of his brethren, even five men, and presented them unto Pharaoh.

3 And Pharaoh said unto his brethren, What is your occupation? And they said unto Pharaoh, Thy servants are shepherds, both we, and also our fathers.

while. 30 Israel said to Joseph, "Now let me die, since I have seen your face and know that you are still alive." 31 Joseph said to his brothers and to his father's household, "I will go up and tell Pharaoh, and will say to him, 'My brothers and my father's household, who were in the land of Canaan, have come to me; 32 and the men are shepherds, for they have been keepers of cattle; and they have brought their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have.' 33 When Pharaoh calls you, and says, 'What is your occupation?' 34 you shall say, 'Your servants have been keepers of cattle from our youth even until now, both we and our fathers,' in order that you may dwell in the land of Goshen; for every shepherd is an abomination to the Egyptians."

47 So Joseph went in and told Pharaoh, "My father and my brothers, with their flocks and herds and all that they possess, have come from the land of Canaan; they are now in the land of Goshen." 2 And from among his brothers he took five men and presented them to Pharaoh. 3 Pharaoh said to his brothers, "What is your occupation?" And they said to Pharaoh, "Your servants are shepherds, as our fathers were."

among the Egyptians (cf. Exod. 1:15-19; 3:22). (The additions to the J² narrative of the Exodus similarly have the two peoples living side by side [cf. Exod. 12:23], as do E and P.) It is unlikely, therefore, that J²'s representation rests upon anything more substantial than speculation, in the light of a more adequate knowledge of the geography of Egypt than had been possessed by J¹, as to the precise scene of the events which, according to the J¹ narrative, had preceded the Exodus.

Goshen has been identified as the Wadi Tūmilat, "a long narrow valley leading 'straight from the heart of the Delta to a break in the chain of the Bitter Lakes,' and therefore marking a weak spot in the natural defences of Egypt" (Skinner, Genesis, p. 488).

The earliest tradition appears to have represented the Exodus as a flight (cf. Exod. 14:5a). Although this feature became less prominent as the story was more and more elaborated, it would seem to have remained in the background of Israelite thinking. The location of the Israelites in Goshen was therefore a point of some importance in the J² narrative of the Exodus.

The J² nucleus of this section thus represents the Pharaoh as all unwittingly helping to set the stage for the "great deliverance" (45:7; cf. Exeg. on that verse, and on ch. 45 as a whole). This was too subtle a thought for some later writer of the J school: the assignment of Goshen to the Israelites could not have been made so casually as 47:3, 5a, 6b

4 They said moreover unto Pharaoh, For to sojourn in the land are we come; for thy servants have no pasture for their flocks; for the famine is sore in the land of Canaan: now therefore, we pray thee, let thy servants dwell in the land of Goshen.

5 And Pharaoh spake unto Joseph, saying, Thy father and thy brethren are come unto thee:

6 The land of Egypt is before thee; in the best of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell; in the land of Goshen let them dwell: and if thou knowest any men of activity among them, then make them rulers over my cattle.

7 And Joseph brought in Jacob his father, and set him before Pharaoh: and Jacob blessed Pharaoh.

8 And Pharaoh said unto Jacob, How old art thou?

4 They said to Pharaoh, "We have come to sojourn in the land; for there is no pasture for your servants' flocks, for the famine is severe in the land of Canaan; and now, we pray you, let your servants dwell in the land of Goshen." 5 Then Pharaoh said to Joseph, "Your father and your brothers have come to you. 6 The land of Egypt is before you; settle your father and your brothers in the best of the land; let them dwell in the land of Goshen; and if you know any able men among them, put them in charge of my cattle."

7 Then Joseph brought in Jacob his father, and set him before Pharaoh, and Jacob blessed Pharaoh. 8 And Pharaoh said to Jacob, "How many are the days of the might seem to imply. He therefore elaborated the story to represent Joseph as somewhat deviously contriving to have his brothers placed there, adding 45:10 α (see Exeg.), 46:28 $\alpha\beta\beta$, the words in Goshen in vs. 29, vs. 31-34, 47:1 b , 4.

Egyptian monuments as rough and uncouth, of lower caste than the dwellers in Egyptian cities, and therefore despised. It is a fact too, of course, that in the succeeding narrative of Exodus the Egyptians are represented as hostile to the Israelites. So perhaps here the more stark reality crops up through the lavish colors which the chronicler has used in depicting the attitude of Pharaoh in ch. 45, and which for the most part are used in the first part of ch. 47—especially vs. 6a.

7-10. Retrospect.—Few and evil have the days of the years of my life been. That may be only an Oriental manner of speech, the fashion in which the ordinary person represents himself as insignificant in order to show his humble deference to the greater man. But it may also be an expression of what Jacob actually felt about his own life, and life in general. Even the longest life may seem desperately short. Every man as he grows older feels that the years go by at a faster pace. In the unlikely event that his age should be a hundred and thirty years, as Jacob said his was, still the whole span telescopes itself in memory so that it becomes almost incredible that it has been so long. Measured by the greatness of desires, longings, regrets, and hopes and ambitions unfulfilled, it seems as fleeting as a candle flame about to be blown out by the un pitying wind. And if it seems short, so also it may seem evil, in that disaster has dogged it and that in the end it goes down to decay. It may be symbolized by Hamlet standing in the graveyard holding in his hand a skull. Many literary and philosophical interpreters in the twentieth century have agreed with Jacob's appraisal.

But it is obvious that life need not be regarded with such mordant pessimism. Jacob sounded as though he were ready to creep out of existence, beaten. But a man can say, instead, in the words of J. B. S. Haldane, "I hope that I shall find time to think as I die, 'I am glad that I lived when and where I did. It was a good show.'"⁵ Why then to Jacob had life come to seem so sour and shriveled; and why may men in every generation suffer the same disillusionment? Because, first, of self-seeking. That was the fundamental defect in Jacob. Conspicuously, in his youth, and more or less always, he was bent on getting something for himself. Every human being, of course, has selfish instincts, and biologically could not exist without them; but the difference between the man who makes life mean and the one who makes it magnanimous is in whether or not he has let the leading of God turn that self-seeking into imaginative sympathy for the interests of others. When self-seeking becomes habitual, the man simply does not see the human facts around him which at least might arouse his vivid interest in life's "good show." Jacob's own son, Joseph, began with impulses almost as obviously selfish as his father's, but nobler interests drew him out beyond himself:

years of your life?" 9 And Jacob said to Pharaoh, "The days of the years of my sojourning are a hundred and thirty years; few and evil have been the days of the years of my life, and they have not attained to the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their sojourning." 10 And Jacob blessed Pharaoh, and went out from the presence of Pharaoh. 11 Then Joseph settled his father and his brothers, and gave them a possession in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Ram'eses, as Pharaoh had commanded. 12 And Joseph provided his father, his brothers, and all his father's household with food, according to the number of their dependents.

This elaboration thus throws an interesting side light upon the J philosophy of history.

D. JOSEPH'S AGRARIAN POLICY (47:13-26)

47:13-26. This section is a conflation of J and E (for a detailed analysis see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 148-49). The E material, vss. 14, 18, 20-21 (allowing for the distress of fellow prisoners, the problem of Pharaoh's dream, the plight of Egypt. But outside of some special family affections there is no evidence that Jacob was interested in anybody else. The nemesis of that sort of self-absorption is nearly always self-pity. Note the tone of Jacob's laments in 37:35; 43:6, 14. "He refused to be comforted" sounds suspiciously like deliberately nursing his grief. Of course he had reason to grieve, but not to make a virtue of it—nor to be a prototype for succeeding persons who, like Mrs. Gummidge in David Copperfield, insist on being "a lone, lorn creetur," and on having everybody else admit that they "feel things more than other people." But apparently Jacob had sunk so deep in that emotional groove that even in what might have been the moment of complete rejoicing he still could not get out of his thought that life was short and evil.

The unhappy Jacobs in every generation, shut within their self-seeking, self-absorption, and self-pity, need to learn what Albert Einstein wrote, "The ideals which have always shone before me and filled me with the joy of living are goodness, beauty, and truth."* Or let them listen to a great Englishman of the nineteenth century, Edward Thring, headmaster of Uppingham School, who, when he looked back on a life that often had been marked by bitter difficulties and disappointments, declared: "I cannot even now bear to think of living it over again, yet year by year, aye, day by day, I felt the warrior joy of life and the conqueror's joy of getting the mastery. . . . My positive creed is an absolute, unflinching certainty of life triumphant."†

Jacob was not the sort who could feel that life had been triumphant. But even in his most pessimistic and self-depreciatory hours, he had hold of something greater and more important than his estimate of himself. Whatever happened to Jacob, still there was God. Notwithstanding his own unworthiness, God could be declared through him. Therefore he blessed Pharaoh, not with his blessing but with God's.

11-26. Joseph the Administrator.—This whole passage may well provoke curious reflection. It is obviously a panegyric upon Joseph. Here is recounted his foresight, his acumen, his clearly calculated and unswerving purpose. He had determined exactly how he would execute Phar-

14 And Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought: and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house.

15 And when money failed in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came unto Joseph, and said, Give us bread: for why should we die in thy presence? for the money faileth.

16 And Joseph said, Give your cattle; and I will give you for your cattle, if money fail.

17 And they brought their cattle unto Joseph: and Joseph gave them bread in exchange for horses, and for the flocks, and for the cattle of the herds, and for the asses; and he fed them with bread for all their cattle for that year.

18 When that year was ended, they came unto him the second year, and said unto him, We will not hide it from my lord, how that our money is spent; my lord also hath our herds of cattle; there is not aught left in the sight of my lord, but our bodies, and our lands:

languished by reason of the famine. 14 And Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt and in the land of Canaan, for the grain which they bought; and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house. 15 And when the money was all spent in the land of Egypt and in the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came to Joseph, and said, "Give us food; why should we die before your eyes? For our money is gone." 16 And Joseph answered, "Give your cattle, and I will give you food in exchange for your cattle, if your money is gone." 17 So they brought their cattle to Joseph; and Joseph gave them food in exchange for the horses, the flocks, the herds, and the asses: and he supplied them with food in exchange for all their cattle that year. 18 And when that year was ended, they came to him the following year, and said to him, "We will not hide from my lord that our money is all spent; and the herds of cattle are my lord's; there is nothing left in the sight of my lord but our bodies and our lands.

some necessary redactional harmonization; vs. 22 is a learned gloss), is a unity and followed 41:56b. It told how Joseph sold grain to the Egyptians until their money was exhausted, after which, in the second year of the famine, they surrendered the ownership of their land to Pharaoh, thus being reduced to slavery, since the only basis of personal freedom in a state like ancient Egypt was the possession of land.

The J parallel to this was in two sections: (a) Following 41:55, the account of the Egyptians giving their flocks and their herds to Joseph in exchange for food—vss. 15-17a, with allowance for redactional harmonization. (b) Following 47:12, the account of the aoh's authority, and how he would go about enabling Egypt to survive the famine. But note how he did it. During the seven years of plenty he collected a rich proportion of the grain. The record does not say he bought it; more probably he levied upon the crops a tax in the name of Pharaoh. But when the lean years came, it is specifically recorded that the people who came to beg for it had to buy it—to buy back what they had produced. They paid so heavily for it that Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt. When the people had no more money, he took their cattle (vss. 16-17). When they had no more cattle, he took title to their land (vs. 20). With all the land in his possession and the people therefore wholly subject to him, he even shifted some of them from one area to another (vs. 21). Only the priests were treated differently. Everybody else's land came into the grip of Pharaoh, but not the lands of the priests (vs. 22). Meanwhile the impoverished and landless people were represented as grateful that they were still in existence. They said, Thou hast saved our lives: let us find grace in the sight of my lord, and we will be Pharaoh's servants.

Because this chapter is in the Bible, and because it deals with Joseph who rightly is one of the Bible heroes, it is often taken for granted and passed by without remark. If one happens to see the dubious element in it, and the question arises as to why the Bible should praise a proceeding which seems so ruthless, some commentators are driven to extraordinary answers. Observe what even so great and good a man is Marcus Dods could write. When the people of Egypt had yielded to [Joseph] both their lands and their persons . . . the result . . . was that the people who

19 Wherefore shall we die before thine eyes, both we and our land? buy us and our land for bread, and we and our land will be servants unto Pharaoh: and give us seed, that we may live, and not die, that the land be not desolate.

20 And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh; for the Egyptians sold every man his field, because the famine prevailed over them: so the land became Pharaoh's.

21 And as for the people, he removed them to cities from one end of the borders of Egypt even to the other end thereof.

22 Only the land of the priests bought he not; for the priests had a portion assigned them of Pharaoh, and did eat their portion which Pharaoh gave them: wherefore they sold not their lands.

23 Then Joseph said unto the people, Behold, I have bought you this day and your land for Pharaoh: lo, here is seed for you, and ye shall sow the land.

19 Why should we die before your eyes, both we and our land? Buy us and our land for food, and we with our land will be slaves to Pharaoh; and give us seed, that we may live, and not die, and that the land may not be desolate."

20 So Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh; for all the Egyptians sold their fields, because the famine was severe upon them. The land became Pharaoh's; 21 and as for the people, he made slaves of them^t from one end of Egypt to the other. 22 Only the land of the priests he did not buy; for the priests had a fixed allowance from Pharaoh, and lived on the allowance which Pharaoh gave them; therefore they did not sell their land. 23 Then Joseph said to the people, "Behold, I have this day bought you and your land for Pharaoh. Now here is seed for you, and you permanent tax of one fifth laid upon the Egyptians in return for the provision of seed at the end of the famine—vss. 19b, 23-26a. RJE, combining these three passages, was compelled, in view of the seed motif, to place the resultant narrative here.

Both the J and the E narratives are etiological, the former to explain the rate of taxation in Egypt, and the latter to account for the system of land tenure which differed from that in force in Palestine. As to whether the authors were drawing upon Egyptian would otherwise have perished were preserved. . . . The people ceased to be proprietors of their own farms, but they were not slaves with no interest in the soil, but tenants sitting at easy rents—a fair enough exchange for being preserved in life.

Dods has not confronted the fact that people supposedly "sitting at easy rents" were picked up and relocated here and there, for this is what he says:

Modern experience supplies us with instances in which, by such a policy, a country might be regenerated and a seven years' famine hailed as a blessing if, without famishing the people, it put them unconditionally into the hands of an able, bold, and beneficent ruler.⁸

He does not tell us what "modern experience" he is thinking of. Obviously he was not thinking of the totalitarianisms of the twentieth century, for he was writing long before those times. But Hitler and Stalin would have found his words entirely to their liking.

The truth is, of course, that this chapter is an illustration of the fact that the actions of even the best men of the O.T. are not to be praised indiscriminately, as though they were sacrosanct, but must be set in the perspective of the Bible's growing revelation. In ancient times autocracy was taken for granted, and only gradually did any recognition of the rights of the common man arise. That Joseph should have been an autocrat in Egypt did not surprise anyone: people were simply grateful for his efficiency. Also, the men of Israel who wrote the story of Joseph were accustomed to the unconditional rule of kings. Most of them believed in autocracy. An increasing number believed in a particular form of it, theocracy, which is rule in the name of God administered by the church. So the biographers of Joseph thought it was quite proper that he had the people in his power and even that he should take their land; and equally proper that he should not take the lands of the priests.

From this two considerations emerge. The first is as to the conception of the worth of human beings, and the right conception therefore of society and government which the O.T. as a 24 And it shall come to pass in the increase, that ye shall give the fifth part unto Pharaoh, and four parts shall be your own, for seed of the field, and for your food, and for them of your households, and for food for your little ones.

25 And they said, Thou hast saved our lives: let us find grace in the sight of my lord, and we will be Pharaoh's servants.

26 And Joseph made it a law over the land of Egypt unto this day, that Pharaoh should have the fifth part; except the land of the priests only, which became not Pharaoh's.

27 ¶ And Israel dwelt in the land of Egypt, in the country of Goshen; and they had possessions therein, and grew, and multiplied exceedingly.

28 And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years: so the whole age of Jacob was a hundred forty and seven years.

shall sow the land. 24 And at the harvests you shall give a fifth to Pharaoh, and four fifths shall be your own, as seed for the field and as food for yourselves and your households, and as food for your little ones." 25 And they said, "You have saved our lives; may it please my lord, we will be slaves to Pharaoh." 26 So Joseph made it a statute concerning the land of Egypt, and it stands to this day, that Pharaoh should have the fifth; the land of the priests alone did not become Pharaoh's.

27 Thus Israel dwelt in the land of Egypt, in the land of Goshen; and they gained possessions in it, and were fruitful and multiplied exceedingly. 28 And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years; so the days of Jacob, the years of his life, were a hundred and forty-seven years.

tradition or were relying upon Israelite imagination working on the material of the Joseph legend it is impossible to say.

E. JACOB'S LAST WORDS TO JOSEPH (47:27-48:22)

Of the P material in this section 47:27b-28 is the continuation of 47:11, and 48:3-6, accounting for the tribal status of Ephraim and Manasseh, parallels 48:8-20. The verse 48:7 is an addition based on 35:16-19 and supplementing 49:31.

The rest of the material is from J and E. RJE was apparently desirous of preserving both his sources in substantial entirety. He was therefore compelled in conflating them to dislocate one of them (E) to produce a unified narrative. (A detailed analysis will be found in Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 150-52.) The dislocations are noted below.

J recorded, first, Jacob's charge to Joseph to bury him in Palestine (47:27a, 29-31) — preparing for the narrative in ch. 50. He then told of his blessing Joseph's two sons (48:2b, 9b, 10a, 13-14, 17-19, followed by "and he blessed them"). This tale was designed to explain two facts: (a) that the house of Joseph was composed of two divisions, each of tribal status, and each claiming Joseph as ancestor, though not as the tribal eponym; whole inspired, but which Genesis only partially suggests. The O.T. moves forward to larger and wider understanding. When the great prophets rose they proclaimed the rights of common men to justice and opportunity and laid the deep religious foundation upon which democratic civilizations were afterward to be built. The second consideration is as to the priests. Through numberless centuries priests and ecclesiastics of many names have been given special privileges and emoluments. A right impulse was being expressed in that—the impulse to safeguard in human society the status of those who were supposed to bring into it the atmosphere of the divine. But that impulse can hold danger. The fierce reaction in many European countries to ecclesiastical establishments is the embittered protest against ecclesiastical privilege and power that in many instances had grown overweening and corrupt. Though it had not come true in Joseph's Egypt, it has come true now, that religious hierarchies will no longer be given unconditional privilege. Not by smooth claims, but by character and the actual contribution of their service, they must justify their place in the community.

27-31. Jacob Faces His Death.—The O.T. looks with a straight gaze at the facts of human existence. The people of whom it tells did not deceive themselves with illusions or evasions.

29 And the time drew nigh that Israel must die: and he called his son Joseph, and said unto him, If now I have found grace in thy sight, put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and deal kindly and truly with me; bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt:

30 But I will lie with my fathers, and thou shalt carry me out of Egypt, and bury me in their buryingplace. And he said, I will do as thou hast said.

31 And he said, Swear unto me. And he swore unto him. And Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head.

48 And it came to pass after these things, that one told Joseph, Behold, thy father is sick: and he took with him his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim.

29 And when the time drew near that Israel must die, he called his son Joseph and said to him, "If now I have found favor in your sight, put your hand under my thigh, and promise to deal loyally and truly with me. Do not bury me in Egypt, ³⁰ but let me lie with my fathers; carry me out of Egypt and bury me in their burying place." He answered, "I will do as you have said."

31 And he said, "Swear to me"; and he swore to him. Then Israel bowed himself upon the head of his bed.

48 After this Joseph was told, "Behold, your father is ill"; so he took with him his two sons, Manas'seh and E'phraim.

and (b) that the tribe of Manasseh which had once ranked first in importance—a fact reflected in the representation of him as Joseph's first-born—had later yielded place to Ephraim. The implication of the story is that Jacob in blessing the two boys had given them a status equal to that of his own sons; and that by laying his right hand on the head of the younger he had set in motion the train of events by which Ephraim had risen to precedence over Manasseh. It may be assumed that the legend took its rise among the Ephraimites. The tale reflects the belief—finding expression also in ch. 27—that the words of a dying man had in them the power to ensure their own fulfillment.

E told of Jacob's prediction of the Exodus (48:1-2a, 21), of his giving to Joseph a double portion of land (vs. 22), of his blessing of Ephraim and Manasseh (vss. 8-9a, 10b-11, 15—reading "them" for Joseph—16, 12a), and finally of his blessing of Joseph himself (vss. 12b, 20a—reading "him" for them). The E narrative thus parallels that of J in that it accounts for the fact that the house of Joseph was composed of two tribes. On the other hand, it evinces little concern regarding the relative positions of Ephraim and Manasseh; it simply represents Jacob as mentioning Ephraim first (vs. 20a). A later writer, possibly RJE, added vs. 20b to call attention to this.

29. With put your hand under my thigh cf. 24:2.

30. Their burying place is a substitution by RP for an explicit designation of the site of Jacob's grave. This, according to J, was east of the Jordan (see Exeg. on 50:10-13).

If there was life, so certainly there would be death. As old age came upon them they recognized the inevitable nearness of the end and made ready for it. Our modern generations often flinch from that unvarnished honesty. There is an effort to act as though if death were kept out of mind, it could be kept off the horizon altogether. Sometimes its prospect is pushed away with flippant speech; more often the attempt is made to hide the fear of it in an uneasy silence. The men of the O.T. were of sterner stuff. They did not ask that death should bandage their eyes, and bid them "creep past." They met it as it was. It does not appear that faith in an eternal life had dawned for Jacob. Yet even without that, he could keep his spirit steady. How much more ought that to be true of those who are heirs of all the Christian hope that was born with the Resurrection.

48:1-7. Life's Eternal Lessons.—It is true, of course, that this chapter cannot be read too literally. It may be, as the Exeg. has previously suggested, that Jacob is more the personification of tribal ideals than a person; and if he was a person, it would remain to be questioned whether we have more than a legendary tradition of words spoken by him when he was drawing near his death. Nevertheless, here is the expression of the Hebrew belief as to what one like Jacob would have said. Here is a mirror in which one may see a people's conception of the meaning of life.

What was the supreme heritage that Jacob would hand on to his descendants? Not posses-

2 And one told Jacob, and said, Behold, thy son Joseph cometh unto thee: and Israel strengthened himself, and sat upon the bed.

3 And Jacob said unto Joseph, God Almighty appeared unto me at Luz in the land of Canaan, and blessed me,

4 And said unto me, Behold, I will make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, and I will make of thee a multitude of people; and will give this land to thy seed after thee for an everlasting possession.

5 ¶ And now thy two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, which were born unto thee in the land of Egypt, before I came unto thee into Egypt, are mine; as Reuben and Simeon, they shall be mine.

6 And thy issue, which thou begetteth after them, shall be thine, and shall be called after the name of their brethren in their inheritance.

7 And as for me, when I came from Padan, Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan in the way, when yet there was but a little way to come unto Ephrath: and I buried her there in the way of Ephrath; the same is Bethlehem.

2 And it was told to Jacob, "Your son Joseph has come to you"; then Israel summoned his strength, and sat up in bed. 3 And Jacob said to Joseph, "God Almighty appeared to me at Luz in the land of Canaan and blessed me, 4 and said to me, 'Behold I will make you fruitful, and multiply you, and I will make of you a company of peoples, and will give this land to your descendants after you for an everlasting possession.' 5 And now your two sons, who were born to you in the land of Egypt before I came to you in Egypt, are mine; Ephraim and Manasseh shall be mine, as Reuben and Simeon are. 6 And the offspring born to you after them shall be yours; they shall be called by the name of their brothers in their inheritance. 7 For when I came from Paddan, Rachel to my sorrow died in the land of Canaan on the way, when there was still some distance to go to Ephrath; and I buried her there on the way to Ephrath (that is, Bethlehem)."

sions. Not worldly shrewdness, craftiness in bargaining, smart stratagems by which to outwit and outmaneuver rivals. Not pride or supposed success. No, none of these, but one thing only: his tested experience of the guidance of God. A life which has nothing to say concerning that is a spiritual failure, no matter what else it has; and no life which can bequeath that has altogether failed.

3-7. Two Factors in Salvation.—Note the two events which stand pre-eminent in Jacob's retrospect while all lesser matters fade. One is his vision at Bethel (vs. 3); the other is the death of Rachel (vs. 7). They represent the two influences which had taken this man, whose life began so meanly, and had made him a person fit to have part in the purposes of God. One was his faith, the other was his love. To speak of his faith is to use the great word with qualifications, for Jacob's first conception of God (cf. vs. 4) was cramped into the pattern of his own original selfishness. Nevertheless he had, as Esau did not have, a sense of being apprehended by the Unseen. He believed that life had a larger destiny than any immediate circumstances showed. That was his faith, and little by little it led him to larger understanding. Also, in the midst of inconsistent relationships he had one great love which never lost its primacy, a love not of the flesh only but of the spirit. These two, faith and love, were everlasting facts when everything else should sink to insignificance. When any man comes to die, these alone will stand by him. Without these, the whole record will seem empty. With these and for these the final consciousness can be full of gratitude to God. And that gratitude can be not the less but the more profound when love has known the shadow of loss. As William R. Inge has written:

Bereavement is the deepest initiation into the mysteries of human life, an initiation more searching and profound than even happy love. Love remembered and consecrated by grief belongs, more clearly than the happy intercourse of friends, to the eternal world; it has proved itself stronger than death.*

Jacob remembered Rachel who had died on the way home to Canaan, and whom he had buried near Bethlehem; and her grave symbolized emotions without which his life would have been impoverished. The name of Bethlehem, which means "House of Bread," was given to it

8 And Israel beheld Joseph's sons, and said, Who are these?

9 And Joseph said unto his father, They are my sons, whom God hath given me in this place. And he said, Bring them, I pray thee, unto me, and I will bless them.

10 Now the eyes of Israel were dim for age, so that he could not see. And he brought them near unto him; and he kissed them, and embraced them.

11 And Israel said unto Joseph, I had not thought to see thy face: and, lo, God hath showed me also thy seed.

12 And Joseph brought them out from between his knees, and he bowed himself with his face to the earth.

14 And Israel stretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head, who was the younger, and his left hand upon Manasseh's head, guiding his hands wittingly; for Manasseh was the firstborn.

8 When Israel saw Joseph's sons, he said, "Who are these?" 9 Joseph said to his father, "They are my sons, whom God has given me here." And he said, "Bring them to me, I pray you, that I may bless them." 10 Now the eyes of Israel were dim with age, so that he could not see. So Joseph brought them near him; and he kissed them and embraced them. 11 And Israel said to Joseph, "I had not thought to see your face; and lo, God has let me see your children also." 12 Then Joseph removed them from his knees, and he bowed himself with his face to the earth. 13 And Joseph took them both, E'phraim in his right hand toward Israel's left hand, and Manas'seh in his left hand toward Israel's right hand, and brought them near him. 14 And Israel stretched out his right hand and laid it upon the head of E'phraim, who was the younger, and his left hand upon the head of Manas'seh, crossing his hands, for Manas'seh was the first-born.

48:10. In this source (J) Jacob is blind; contrast vss. 8, 11, both E, despite the use of the name "Israel," usually a mark of J.

for other reasons; but in it is the everlasting suggestion that for all human souls life will be in a profounder way the House of Bread if sorrow, as well as joy, dwells in it.

8-14. Jacob's Choice.—Joseph had brought his two sons to his father that they might receive his blessing; and he presented them with Manasseh, the first-born, before Jacob's right hand, so that the chief blessing might be given to him. But Jacob crossed his hands, guiding his hands wittingly, so that his chief blessing might fall upon the head not of Manasseh, but of Ephraim, the younger son. It seemed an arbitrary act. But to those who made the record of Genesis it was not arbitrary. A mightier choice than Jacob's was back of what he did. The choice was God's. The eyes of Israel were dim for age, so that he could not see; but as he embraced the boys, a discerning impulse moved him, and he followed this inward moving as against what Joseph had supposed he would do.

Back of the record doubtless lies the ex post facto influence of Ephraim's actual greatness among the tribes. The chroniclers rooted this in the story of Jacob's blessing. But whether or not the story is completely factual, it represents a profound perception. The chroniclers read history in the light of a divine purpose which they believed was moving there. As is repeatedly evidenced in Genesis, they saw the destiny of Israel shaped not by human intentions, but by the long, sure purpose of God. The accidents of birth and circumstance were not controlling. Cain was older than Abel, but Abel's sacrifice was preferred. Ishmael was Abraham's first-born son, but the voice of God said to Abraham, "in Isaac shall thy seed be called" (21:12). Esau was the elder of Isaac's twin sons, but to Jacob, not to Esau, was the promise given. In every instance, as men looked back, it appeared to them that the unseen Hand had been at work. That interpretation of the past gave dignity to history. It gave steadiness to the present, and tenacious courage to face the future, which has always been characteristic of the people of Israel.

15 ¶ And he blessed Joseph, and said, God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day,

15 And he blessed Joseph, and said,
"The God before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac walked, the God who has led me all my life long to this day,

15-16. The God of the Fathers.—Nothing is more characteristic of Genesis than the way in which the thought of God is always linked with something larger than the individual. He is the God who claims the particular person's loyalty, but he is his God because he has been also the God of his fathers. God's promise to Abraham was, "I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee" (17:7). God's voice came to Isaac, saying, "I am the God of Abraham thy father: fear not, for I am with thee, and will bless thee, and multiply thy seed for my servant Abraham's sake" (26:24). Isaac said to Jacob, "God Almighty bless thee . . . and give thee the blessing of Abraham" (28:3-4); and to Jacob himself as he dreamed at Bethel came the voice of God, "I am the LORD God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac" (28:13). All this Jacob remembers as he invokes now the God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk. That was the God who had fed him all his life long unto this day. This consciousness of the bond of faith that ran from generation to generation was the power that made the spiritual stanchness of the people of Israel.

Kipling wrote, "The race is run by one and one and never by two and two."¹ There is truth in that, but it is partial truth; and like all half-truths, it can be overbalanced into falsehood. Each man spiritually must run his own race, but in a larger sense he does not run alone. It is like a relay race in which each man must meet his own responsibility, but in which his opportunity and the victory in which he would share depend also upon the impetus which is handed on to him by those who have run before. In our modern world, with its atomistic tendencies, we are too apt to forget the mighty truth which the men of the O.T. knew. Inherited faith and old convictions may be casually laid aside; and the result is that we are in danger of losing the superb transmitted strength which Israel had. Yet history holds up before us examples of what the continuity of a great tradition can give to a people's life. Consider the British Commonwealth. What is it that has made, and that still makes, that little isle of England so sovereign a force among the civilizations of the earth? The heart of it is not so much in physical as in spiritual power; and that spiritual power has come down as the accumulating heritage from unforgotten centuries. The pageantry, the long-kept ancient customs, the stately public manners, might seem to a stranger only queer-ness; but as a matter of fact they are the expression of the abiding character to which all the generations have contributed. Justice, fair opportunity, the love of freedom as surely for commoner as for king, private morals and public honor—these are the qualities which have come down to the British people through an unbroken history of constancy and courage; and because they honored that inheritance they were able to reveal in the dark and disastrous days of the twentieth century such reserves of steady strength and unbreakable tenacity as newer and less tried peoples might hardly dare think they could achieve. Nor can that spirit be accounted for on secular grounds. Back of all that is noble in its civic expression is the religious heritage—that Judæo-Christian heritage of God-fearing men which in its essential loyalties goes back all the way to Abraham, and which in its N.T. fulfillment has been lifted up before the thought of the English generations as dominantly as the dome and cross of St. Paul's are lifted up against the London sky. It is the God in whose light the fathers . . . did walk who is needed by all the families of the earth today, as Jacob knew he was needed for the family of Joseph.

15. The Agelong Blessing.—Note the way in which Jacob describes what God had been to him. First, he recognized God in the light of all the best he had seen in his father and his father's father (cf. Expos. on 26:24). Then God was to him the one by whom his own experience had been enriched. He fed me all my life long unto this day. The word translated fed means "shepherded," and here for the first time we come upon the beautiful metaphor so characteristic of the Bible. God's protecting goodness had the intimate watchfulness of a shepherd for his flock. Isa. 40:11 proclaims, "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd." In Jer. 31:10 and Ezek. 34:12 there is the same promise. Still more personal is Ps. 23, "The LORD is my shepherd," and this figure of the lovingkindness of God is lifted up to its supreme expression in Jesus' parable of the shepherd going out to rescue his lost sheep (Luke 15:4). A man like Jacob, with his imperfect nature, was not large enough of soul to know the full meaning of his own faith, but for that very reason the faith he did experience can come with closer relationship to us. For here was a man who certainly was no saint and whose life, had it been guided by nothing but first impulses, would have been hardly better than contemptible. Yet he became aware that no human life has to depend upon itself alone. There is a divine Love which has us in its keeping, and values us beyond our deserving. God does not overlook us, although we seem unpossessing and obscure. He will be following us even when in our ignorance or our willfulness we wander away. And if we listen, even imperfectly like Jacob, we hear the Shepherd's voice which will lead us from the barren ground of our foolish impulse to those fields of life where our souls can grow.

16. The Redeeming Angel.—Jacob speaks of the Angel which redeemed me from all evil. He had been acquainted with evil: evil as meaning outward circumstances which threatened harm, such as the anger of Esau which he had deserved, and the trickery of Laban which he had not deserved; evil as meaning the sins which were in himself. He was typical in that he was more concerned to be delivered from that first group of evils than from the second; but he had learned dropped by RJE, who preferred the J representation that Jacob came peacefully to Shechem and bought a piece of ground there (33:19). It should be noted that the natural implication of Jacob's words here is that he was, when he spoke, in actual and enduring possession of the territory he had conquered (cf. Gressmann, "Joseph-Sage," EYXAPIΣTHPION, I, 7-8; Gunkel, Genesis, pp. 474-75; Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, pp. 110, 227, 414, etc.). Since there can be no doubt that the E document, even in its earliest form, told of Jacob's descent into Egypt and of his death there, this verse would seem to be a fragment of a story of Jacob's last will and testament, antedating the acceptance by the north of the southern tradition of the Egyptian sojourn.

XLVIII. JACOB BLESSES HIS SONS AND DIES (49:1-33)

The foundation of this section is P's account of Jacob's final charge to his sons and his death (vss. 1a, 28bβ-32, 33aαb). Into this RP inserted from J vs. 33aβ, he drew up his feet into the bed, from the account of Jacob's death, and the poem, vss. 2-27, linking it to the P source material with vss. 1b and 28aba.

A. THE BLESSING OF JACOB (49:1-28)

The poem, the so-called Blessing of Jacob, has been built up from a number of originally independent tribal oracles. These were brought together by a writer who, making the necessary redactional alterations, treated the collection as an utterance of the dying Jacob, and so as a definitive prediction (cf. Exeg. on 27:4) of the character and destiny of the several tribes. It was later added to the J narrative.

enough at least to know where the emphasis ought to lie. Not even an angel could make much of Jacob's life until he had made more of Jacob.

Jacob's words are true to a deep fact, viz., what God does in a man's life is as much beyond what he himself could accomplish as though an actual angel were walking always at his side. The redemption of a life does not come about accidentally, nor by force of circumstances. There is a misleading translation in the KJV which the RSV corrects. The KJV reads, "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God" (Rom. 8:28). But "things" do not work. The revealing form of the RSV is this, "We know that in everything God works for good with those who love him." God works; and he alone can resolve all contradictions and turn evil into good. The pious blessing which Jacob wanted to hand on to those he left was this faith that God's help is close and real and can be redeeming. It is the blessing which all men need.

49:1-28. The Scales of Judgment.—Genesis begins with the creation of the universe that culminates in man, and here at its climax suggests how the human beings whom God created had accepted or spoiled his creation. "God created man in his own image," says ch. 1; but life in many instances has marred the image. Here in ch. 49 is a portrait gallery of human types, good, bad, and indifferent. Here is what individuals and peoples can do to the original purpose of God. What is written is often called "the blessing of Jacob"; but much of it is no blessing; it is scathing rebuke and blame. Furthermore, as the Exeg. has shown, it does not come from Jacob. It is impassioned poetry written long after Jacob's time but ascribed, in the poet's high imagination, to that great remembered figure. These matters of date and authorship are interesting but not vitally important. What is important is the truth of the picture of life. The writer dramatizes his message in terms of vivid single persons. He has the individual Jacob speak to his individual sons. Actually he is speaking to the tribes who bore those names. He is showing the characteristics, noble or ignoble, which can come to be predominant in a human group. All that we need do to make his

5 ¶ Simeon and Levi are brethren; instruments of cruelty are in their habitations.

6 O my soul, come not thou into their secret; unto their assembly, mine honor, be not thou united: for in their anger they slew a man, and in their self-will they digged down a wall.

7 Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel.

3 Reuben, you are my first-born, my might, and the first fruits of my strength, pre-eminent in pride and pre-eminent in power.

4 Unstable as water, you shall not have pre-eminence because you went up to your father's bed; then you defiled it — you^w went up to my couch!

5 Simeon and Levi are brothers; weapons of violence are their swords.

6 O my soul, come not into their council; O my spirit,^{*} be not joined to their company; for in their anger they slay men, and in their wantonness they hamstring oxen.

7 Cursed be their anger, for it is fierce; and their wrath, for it is cruel!

I will divide them in Jacob and scatter them in Israel.

^{*} Or glory

49:3. The word rendered pride (RSV) can have either a good (cf. dignity [KJV]) or an evil connotation, and that rendered power also means "fury." Probably the author intended the words to be suggestive of both meanings.

4. The Hebrew original of unstable is a noun meaning "wantonness" or "recklessness." The allusion in the first line of the verse is thus to the violent instability of the tribe of Reuben, and Reuben's action, recorded in 35:22aβ, is cited as a particularly disastrous expression of this wanton recklessness. The historical event underlying the story of Reuben's relations with his father's concubine would thus seem, as has already been suggested, to have been some rash act of aggression against another tribe which resulted in a serious loss of prestige and power by Reuben.

It has already been noted that the addition to the J narrative of this oracle on Reuben was the cause of the omission of the curse with which the tale in 35:22 originally ended.

7. In view of the otherwise unnecessary reference to Simeon and Levi as brothers in vs. 5, this verse seems to attribute the all but complete disappearance of the tribes ancient message modern is to change tribe to nation. Here is a mirror in which a nation may look at its particular reflection, and consider whether it is satisfied with what it sees there.

3-7. Condemnation of the Violent.—All twelve sons of Jacob pass in review, so there are twelve descriptions. But they sift out into three general groups. The first is those who fall under devastating judgment. Of such is Reuben, and his condemnation is the more tragic because of the contrast with what ought to have been his destiny. He was his father's first-born, the beginning of my strength—type of the nation therefore long established, endowed with leadership, confident and proud. But Reuben, for all his proud position, had sunk into insignificance. Think of the nations in history that have done the same. The reason is linked with the ugly reference to Reuben in 35:22, which may be a dramatic way of indicating that sexual licentiousness had become conspicuous in the Reuben tribe. Unstable as water means not merely restless, like the restlessness of the sea; the picture is of passions that cannot be contained, as dammed up waters, once their barriers are broken, spill out wildly everywhere. The 8 ¶ Judah, thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise: thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies; thy father's children shall bow down before thee.

bearing their names to fratricidal warfare between them. Simeon, in historical times, was simply a clan of Judah (cf. Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, p. 411); and of Levi only the priesthood remained. (For an attempted reconstruction of the history of the tribe of Levi see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 442-43.)

8. An allusion to the achievement of David, leading to the shortlived pre-eminence of Judah over the northern tribes.

historian might read in the fall of imperial Rome a re-enactment of the tragedy of Reuben, when the old moral virility of the republic had changed to unstable and ungoverned impulses. As Reuben was condemned, so also were Simeon and Levi, for reasons equally as strong and relevant in every generation. Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel (vs. 7). So it was written of them, with reference particularly to the ferocity described in ch. 34. Note the significant fact that Simeon and Levi would have argued that their violence was virtue. Did they not do what they had done for the glory of Israel and for its right to dominate? Were they not defending the family honor? So modern nations have perpetrated outrageous evils in the name of manifest destiny, and let themselves loose in the lust of conquest. They have built their colonies by cruelty; and like Simeon and Levi have slain with the edge of the sword and "spoiled even all that was in the house" (34:29). So also men with blind herd instinct have gone out, as they claimed, to protect the purity and predominance of their blood, as mobs in some of the United States have done and still do, in brutal lynchings. But Jacob was right when he cried out (34:30), "Ye have troubled me to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land." Right-thinking men in every country know that a nation's real glory is not exalted but debased whenever its roads of expansion have gone forward through foul acts of cruelty. What can truth say to those who commit such abominations as lynching but, "You have made me to stink among the decent people of the world"? In any nation when men grow drunk with power and let violence loose, there may recur the deadly sin of Simeon and Levi, which must be denounced, and which if unrepented is bound to lead to doom.

13-21, 27. Qualified Commendation.—The second group among the twelve is of those condemned less drastically; and of some who won a blessing which had some value, even if it was not complete, e.g., Issachar. One wonders whether the judgment here is faintly contemptuous, or whether it is a tolerant and kindly commendation. Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens. An ancient Israelite may have meant nothing derisive when he compared a man or a people to an ass. The ass was the animal most depended upon for service. And Issachar was a strong ass. But he is couching down between two burdens. Does that mean that he is patiently ready to be laden with them, or that he is lying down so that he will not carry them at all? If the latter, then he is the people that shirks responsibility. If the former, he is the people without much ambition who yet deserves honor because he carries the humdrum burdens of the world; for he sees that at least there are mild rewards in obedience and subordination, and so he bows his shoulder to bear. Such are some of the humble peoples of the earth, like the black men of Africa who carried the loads of David Livingstone on the great explorations which would not have been possible without them; like the patient Chinese coolies that built the Burma Road; like the humble people everywhere who represent none of the brilliant achievements of civilization, but on whose shoulders much of its fundamental structure rests. Along with Issachar are other tribes to whom at least a qualified blessing belongs. There is Zebulun, which shall dwell at the haven of the sea; and he shall be for a haven of ships—the people that represented thus adventure and the energies of far-reaching commerce. There are Gad and Dan and Benjamin, each of which represents in its particular way the elemental courage of the little people that maintains its independence against larger forces by which it is surrounded. And there are Asher and Naphtali, representing the contentment of peoples who settle down peacefully to cultivate a fruitful land.

8-12, 22-26. The Source of Greatness.—But the great blessings are reserved for two tribes only—Judah and Joseph. The reason is plain:

9 Judah is a lion's whelp: from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up?

10 The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.

11 Binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass's colt unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes:

12 His eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk.

13 ¶ Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea; and he shall be for a haven of ships; and his border shall be unto Zidon.

14 ¶ Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens:

15 And he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute.

9 Judah is a lion's whelp; from the prey, my son, you have gone up.

He stooped down, he couched as a lion, and as a lioness; who dares rouse him up?

10 The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until he comes to whom it belongs;† and to him shall be the obedience of the peoples.

11 Binding his foal to the vine and his ass's colt to the choice vine, he washes his garments in wine and his vesture in the blood of grapes;

12 his eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk.

13 Zeb'ulun shall dwell at the shore of the sea;

he shall become a haven for ships, and his border shall be at Sidon.

14 Is'sachar is a strong ass, crouching between the sheepfolds;

15 he saw that a resting place was good, and that the land was pleasant;
so he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a slave at forced labor.

9. The first line refers to the youthful vigor of the tribe. The second line would be better rendered, "On prey, my son, you have grown up"; it elaborates the thought of the preceding statement. The last two lines are almost verbally identical with Num. 24:9a and are probably a quotation from another poem.

10. To whom it belongs: The Hebrew original, shiloh, is cryptic in the extreme. On this rendering it refers to the scepter. Another possible rendering is "he who is his"—i.e., he who is pre-eminently the representative of Judah. In either case the verse has a messianic significance and is probably later than its present context.

to these tribes the greatest men belonged. In the one case, Joseph himself; in the other, David. Joseph as the hero from whom one tribe originated, David as the hero whom the other produced, gave a quality of spirit which seemed in retrospect to permeate a whole people. history it recorded, from Abraham on through patriarchs, kings, and prophets, was the history of men who walked not in the light of this world only, but in the light of heaven. Israel has endured because of that inheritance. Few in numbers, scattered, persecuted often, it has maintained its existence because it kept in its soul the memory of men who obeyed God.

In the long run the permanence of any nation will depend upon the quality of its heroes. Does it exalt only its men of glittering so-called success, its creators of material wealth, its generals and admirals who by any means whatever have won their victories? Or does something deep within its soul acknowledge a greater inheritance? Does it feel the upward pull upon its character and conduct of a Robert Bruce, a Joan of Arc, a Washington, or of some other hero of the spirit concerning whom it could be said, as of Charles George Gordon, that he gave "his strength to the weak, his substance to the poor, his sympathy to the suffering, and his heart to God"? With lesser ideals a nation may seize for itself many temporary benefits, but on no lower terms can it win the lasting greatness which depends upon the blessing of God.

49:29-50:13. Jacob's Death and Burial.— There is an instinct which seems almost universal for men to desire to be buried with their people. It is as though the loneliness of death were in this measure overcome, and the bond with one's own still preserved. So there is a sacrosanctity to the place of graves. One may see in the midst of a great city some obscure corner, with modern buildings overlooking it, where old tombs stand dusty but undisturbed; or by

XLIX. BURIAL OF JACOB (50:1-21)

Vss. 12-13 are from P. The rest of the material is a conflation of J and E.

J² recorded Joseph's grief at his father's death (vs. 1), the embalming of Jacob's body (vs. 2a), and the national mourning in Egypt (vs. 3b). He then told of Joseph's securing permission from the Pharaoh to bury his father in Palestine (vss. 4-6), of the burial in Palestine (vss. 7-11), of Joseph's return to Egypt (vs. 14), and of his reassuring his brothers of his continued good will toward them (vss. 18, 21abβ).

This narrative is an elaboration of a slightly simpler tale which goes back to J¹. As has already been noted J¹, having completed his articulation of the various local traditions of Canaan into a unified whole, had been faced with the necessity of getting the supposed ancestors of the Israelite tribes into Egypt, in order that he might continue his narrative and set down in writing the historical tradition of the Exodus and the Conquest. It was for this reason that the story of Joseph was told. Having thus recorded Jacob's death as occurring in Egypt, it was necessary for J¹ to reconcile this representation with the fact that his grave was one of the famous sites of Palestine. This he probably did by means of this tale.

Only fragments of the E narrative have been preserved: vss. 2b-3a, telling of the embalming, and vss. 15-17, 19-20, 21bα, telling in more detail than J had done of the brothers' fears that Joseph would now take vengeance on them for their harsh treatment of him years before. This incident was recorded in E as occurring during the forty days mentioned in vs. 3a, i.e., before the burial. The present position of the material is of course due to RJE, who here preferred the representation of J² that Joseph's brothers had not expressed their misgivings until after their return to Egypt (vs. 18).

Although nothing has been preserved of E's account of the actual burial, it seems reasonable to assume that he followed the J narrative in this respect. If so then E, like J, by this narrative reconciled the representation that Jacob died in Egypt with the fact of his grave in Palestine. At the same time he seized the opportunity to emphasize once more the providential element in Joseph's career (vss. 19-20).

50:2. The first occurrence of the physicians is a redactional addition to harmonize the J representation (vs. 2a) that Joseph's servants embalmed the body of Jacob with the more sophisticated statement of E that this was done by the physicians.

some country lane a little burying ground still preserved, though the property surrounding it may have changed hands many times. Men do not readily violate what seem the title deeds of the dead. To Jacob the cave of Machpelah was holy ground, for there had been buried Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah, and there he had buried Leah. When he expressed his wish to be carried there, he knew that Joseph would fulfill it—as he did, with Egyptian pomp and pageantry. But the story of Jacob's burial as told in these two chapters has another ref-

5 My father made me swear, saying, Lo, I die: in my grave which I have digged for me in the land of Canaan, there shalt thou bury me. Now therefore let me go up, I pray thee, and bury my father, and I will come again.

6 And Pharaoh said, Go up, and bury thy father, according as he made thee swear.

7 ¶ And Joseph went up to bury his father: and with him went up all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt,

8 And all the house of Joseph, and his brethren, and his father's house: only their little ones, and their flocks, and their herds, they left in the land of Goshen.

9 And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen: and it was a very great company.

10 And they came to the threshingfloor of Atad, which is beyond Jordan; and there they mourned with a great and very sore lamentation: and he made a mourning for his father seven days.

11 And when the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, saw the mourning in the floor of Atad, they said, This is a grievous mourning to the Egyptians: wherefore the name of it was called Abel-mizraim, which is beyond Jordan.

12 And his sons did unto him according as he commanded them:

Now therefore let me go up, I pray you, and bury my father; then I will return." 6 And Pharaoh answered, "Go up, and bury your father, as he made you swear." 7 So Joseph went up to bury his father; and with him went up all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his household, and all the elders of the land of Egypt, 8 as well as all the household of Joseph, his brothers, and his father's household; only their children, their flocks, and their herds were left in the land of Goshen. 9 And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen; it was a very great company. 10 When they came to the threshing floor of Atad, which is beyond the Jordan, they lamented there with a very great and sorrowful lamentation; and he made a mourning for his father seven days. 11 When the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, saw the mourning on the threshing floor of Atad, they said, "This is a grievous mourning to the Egyptians." Therefore the place was named 'Abel-mizraim;^d it is beyond the Jordan. 12 Thus his sons did for him as he had commanded them; 13 for his sons carried him to the land of Canaan, and buried him in the cave of the field at Mach-pe'lah, to the east of Mamre, which Abraham bought with the field from Ephron the Hittite, to possess

^d That is meadow (or mourning) of Egypt

10. The explicit statement that the cortege came to the threshing floor of Atad, east of the Jordan, suggests that the J narrative located the burial there. This suggestion is supported by the fact, noted in the Exeg. on 25:26, that Jacob was originally an east Jordan figure, i.e., the monument known as Jacob's grave was located at the threshing floor of Atad (cf. Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, pp. 280-81; Skinner, Genesis, p. 538) near Abel-mizraim (vs. 11), east of the Jordan.

The J notice of the burial there was later dropped by RP in favor of the P representation (vss. 12-13) that Jacob was buried with Abraham and Isaac (49:31) in the cave of Machpelah at Hebron. The journey to the east of the Jordan was thus rendered quite purposeless.

11. The real meaning of Abel-mizraim is meadow of Egypt. The name doubtless commemorates some incident of the Egyptian occupation of Palestine. For other place names with the component "meadow" see Num. 33:49; Judg. 7:22; 11:33; II Sam. 20:15; II Chr. 16:4. The consonants of the Hebrew words for meadow and mourning, 'bl, are identical.

14 ¶ And Joseph returned into Egypt, he, and his brethren, and all that went up with him to bury his father, after he had buried his father.

15 ¶ And when Joseph's brethren saw that their father was dead, they said, Joseph will peradventure hate us, and will certainly requite us all the evil which we did unto him.

16 And they sent a messenger unto Joseph, saying, Thy father did command before he died, saying,

17 So shall ye say unto Joseph, Forgive, I pray thee now, the trespass of thy brethren, and their sin; for they did unto thee evil: and now, we pray thee, forgive the trespass of the servants of the God of thy father. And Joseph wept when they spake unto him.

18 And his brethren also went and fell down before his face; and they said, Behold, we be thy servants.

19 And Joseph said unto them, Fear not: for am I in the place of God?

20 But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive.

21 Now therefore fear ye not: I will nourish you, and your little ones. And he comforted them, and spake kindly unto them.

as a burying place. 14 After he had buried his father, Joseph returned to Egypt with his brothers and all who had gone up with him to bury his father.

15 When Joseph's brothers saw that their father was dead, they said, "It may be that Joseph will hate us and pay us back for all the evil which we did to him." 16 So they sent a message to Joseph, saying, "Your father gave this command before he died, 17 'Say to Joseph, Forgive, I pray you, the transgression of your brothers and their sin, because they did evil to you.' And now, we pray you, forgive the transgression of the servants of the God of your father." Joseph wept when they spoke to him. 18 His brothers also came and fell down before him, and said, "Behold, we are your servants." 19 But Joseph said to them, "Fear not, for am I in the place of God? 20 As for you, you meant evil against me; but God meant it for good, to bring it about that many people should be kept alive, as they are today. 21 So do not fear; I will provide for you and your little ones." Thus he reassured them and comforted them.

erence besides that which had to do with Jacob's own desire. The last verses of ch. 49 and 50:12-13 are the work of the priestly writers; and the formal record of the purchase of the cave by Abraham, which had been meticulously given in ch. 23, is here twice repeated (49:30; 50:13). Thus it was to be certified beyond doubt that this burying place belonged to Israel, and that the land in the midst of which the dust of the fathers rested was also destined to be Israel's possession.

50:14-21. Joseph's Ultimate Forgiveness.— Sometimes it is harder for men who have sinned to believe that they are forgiven than it is for one who has been wronged to forgive. Joseph had shown to his brothers the most moving and unmistakable evidence of the magnanimity with which he could put the past behind him, and of the old affection which not all the wrong they had done to him could quench. Yet now that Jacob was gone, they fell into a panic. What if Joseph had spared them only because he did not want to distress his father? What if he had no real concern for them? Those were questions which could have been asked only by men into whose hearts the consciousness of guilt had entered so deeply that hardly anything could wash it clean. That may be the deepest tragedy of evil. It so affects the outlook of guilty men that it may become almost impossible for them to look at goodness and see it cleanly and clearly for what it fully is. Even now the brothers thought they did not dare to plead directly for forgiveness. They had to claim that Jacob before he died had sent a plea on their behalf.

And Joseph wept. Why?—we ask. Was it from sheer disappointment that these brothers of his had so little understood him? Was it from sudden pity for their torment of fear? Was it some 23 And Joseph saw Ephraim's children of the third generation: the children also of Machir the son of Manasseh were brought up upon Joseph's knees.

24 And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die; and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob.

22 So Joseph dwelt in Egypt, he and his father's house; and Joseph lived a hundred and ten years. 23 And Joseph saw E'phraim's children of the third generation; the children also of Machir the son of Manas'seh were born upon Joseph's knees. 24 And Joseph said to his brothers, "I am about to die; but God will visit you, and bring you up out of this land to the land which he swore to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob."

L. DEATH OF JOSEPH (50:22-26)

Vss. 22*b*, 26*aβ*, stating that Joseph lived a hundred and ten years, are from R^P, based doubtless on P. The rest of the section is a conflation of J and E.

From E come vss. 22*a*, 23, telling of Joseph's long life and of his adoption of the children of his grandson Machir. As Judg. 5:14 indicates, the Machirites once formed an independent unit in the northern confederacy. Possibly E is here reflecting a claim of theirs, perhaps revived in the closing days of the northern kingdom, to tribal status, or to quasi-tribal status within Manasseh.

foregleam of the sort of tragic sorrow with which Jesus would look at Jerusalem and grieve that sin could be so hard to reach? Whatever the reason for his weeping, the words Joseph spoke showed him at his noblest. Fear not: for am I in the place of God? How different the world's history would have been in many times and places if there had been more men like Joseph whose purpose toward those who had wronged them was to steady and restore, not to terrify and punish. Too many suppose that they are in the place of God: that at all costs they must "see justice done," make sure that the sinner is humiliated, implacably "balance the account," when what they actually do is to tilt the scales the other way—to vengeance that calls itself disinterested virtue. Joseph looked at the events of life from a point of view so high that it rose above the thick atmosphere of human passion. He saw that what had been meant as evil God had turned to good. Therefore he could be the instrument of God's goodness now. Fear ye not, he said, I will nourish you, and your little ones. And he comforted them, and spake kindly unto them. From such a picture it is not a great distance to the standards proclaimed in the Sermon on the Mount.

24. The Inevitability of Death.—That is the reminder that rings most unmistakably from these words: And Joseph said, . . . I die. As against all the infinite variety of men's lives stands the fixed fact of the appointed end. From all separate ways, and across the changing centuries, the many roads of their existence converge upon the single gate. As a generality, all know that. Yet no recognition that death is inevitable and universal can keep a particular death from seeming unique. The moment comes when the individual is saying something much more poignant than "all men are mortal." He is saying, I die.

Note in the example of Joseph the marks of a good man's death. There is no distress or fear. Instead, there is a simplicity of acceptance that is at once childlike and mature. I die. In these serene monosyllables there is the response of the soul that with a child's obedience answers to the roll call: like Thackeray's Colonel Newcome, of whom it was written that as the chapel bell began to toll, he lifted his head with a sudden smile, and quickly said, "Adsum," and fell back upon his pillow. "It was the word we used at school, when names were called; and lo, he, whose heart was as that of a little child, had answered to his name, and stood in the presence of The Master."

There is also a trustfulness that is more than the child's surrender: a confidence that has in it not only the instinct of early innocence but an assurance woven out of long obedience to God. So in all ages men who like Joseph have tried to walk with God may say, as Mr. Standfast said in The Pilgrim's Progress: "I see myself now at the end of my journey; my toilsome days are ended. . . . My steps hath He strengthened in His way." And he can go on to say, like "Stonewall" Jackson dying at Chancellorsville when his duty had been done, "Let us cross over the river, and rest in the shade of the trees." Serenity in death is not accidental. It

25 And Joseph took an oath of the children of Israel, saying, God will surely visit you, and ye shall carry up my bones from hence.

25 Then Joseph took an oath of the sons of Israel, saying, "God will visit you, and you

Vss. 24-25, 26 $\alpha\beta$ are from J. Vs. 24 β points ahead to the Exodus (cf. Exeg. on 45:7). In vss. 25, 26 β , J² prepares further for his reconciliation of the representation of J¹ that Joseph died in Egypt with the fact—apparently unknown to J¹—of Joseph's grave in Shechem (cf. 33:19; Exod. 13:19; Josh. 24:32). This is another indication that comes, as it came to Joseph, out of the dedication of the preceding years. Consider the words of the often sung hymn of which the climactic prayer is,

God be at mine end,
And at my departing.

Leading up to that are the prayers which justify the final one: prayers that God be in my head,

And in my understanding;
God be in mine eyes,
And in my looking;
God be in my mouth,
And in my speaking.³

The death of Joseph suggests further that the good man in his death can be not only serene but also hopeful. Often it seems, unhappily, that this is not true. Many men when they die have no hope or inspiration to hand on to those who follow; and such men may include by no means only those whose lives have been evil or indifferent. They may include those who have been called good, but whose goodness was of a passive and unventuresome kind. They have invested nothing in the future. They have failed to keep themselves allied with what was young and brave and new. Consequently, when their own strength wanes and they feel the pathos of old age, it is as though all the flame of life had burned low and begun to flicker. Their dying, and not a greater living, is what seems to them overwhelmingly real. But for spirits like that of Joseph—and in every generation there are spirits like his—the whole outlook is different. They have loved children, and made companionship with the young. They have invested their sympathy and strength in large and generous causes that reach far beyond themselves. So, like Joseph, they have the happy confidence that God will lead their children and their children's children on great ways of fulfillment. And more than that: their hearts will say in the words that Henry van Dyke put into the mouth of old Abgarus when "the other wise man" was starting on his search "I am too old for this journey, but my heart shall be a companion of the pilgrimage day and night, and I shall know the end of the quest."³

25-26. To the Homeland at Last.—Beyond these few words that record the burial of Joseph in Egypt there looms a background of magnificent suggestion. More than any other people known to history the Egyptians surrounded death with pomp and grandeur. Witness the pyramids, the colossal temples and statues at Thebes and Karnak, the tombs in the valley of the kings. Among them the incredibly costly splendor of the recovered tomb of Tutankhamon, with his coffin beaten out of gold, gives probably only a partial revelation of the riches in the tombs of the greater Pharaohs, which were rifled long ago.

Here is witness to the age-long hunger of man for survival. Distorted and futile though some of the efforts to satisfy that hunger may have been, can one fail to reverence the instinct itself, or fail to see in it a promise that anything so deeply implanted in the human spirit must at last find fulfillment? Yet what is it that can justify that hope? Certainly, not the ostentation of tombs in which the dead are laid—either in ancient Egypt or in the fantastic modern "Forest Lawn" of California's Hollywood. "In what way shall we bury you?" asked Crito of Socrates just before he drank the fatal hemlock. "In any way that you like," answered Socrates, "you are burying my body only."⁴ What is real is that which no one can bury. If Joseph was embalmed in Egypt and put into a coffin, even a coffin of gold, that would not have guaranteed that Joseph still was there, nor made him more significant. Only the revelation of something immortal in the quality of the life that has been lived can be the token that a soul goes on.

"The souls of the righteous are in the hands of God." Also their influence is in the world, shall carry up my bones from here.” 26 So Joseph died, being a hundred and ten years old; and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt.

J2 was much more familiar with the local traditions of Shechem than J1 had been. On E's silence regarding Joseph's grave see Exeg. on 37:1-36.

26. The book, the overture to the Exodus, ends on a muted note.

and it is indestructible. Shakespeare made Mark Antony say in his oration over the dead Caesar:

The evil that men do lives after them,
The good is oft interred with their bones.⁵

That is a distortion of the full reality. In the solemn responsibility of life nothing that a man is and does can be limited to himself. It is true that the evil he does lives after him; but it is not true that the good is buried with his bones. Every man of morally heroic stature in the Bible or anywhere in history has set in motion a noble influence that moves in blessing down the years. As Emerson truly wrote, "We may say great men exist that there may be greater men."⁶

But the last verse of the book, which tells that Joseph was put in a coffin in Egypt, is not the verse of greatest significance. More important is the one that precedes it, for it is here that Joseph exacts the promise that his body shall not have its final resting place in Egypt. He would have it taken back to Canaan. It might have seemed that he had little reason to desire that: his memories of Canaan were short and clouded, and they ended in pictures which he might well wish to forget—of the pit into which his brothers threw him, his sale to the slavers, his being carried off from his home. Most of his life had been spent in Egypt, and this part of his life, unlike the other, had come to a climax of great achievement. He might have had his final burial there with pomp and honor. Why, then, did he not desire this? And why did he strictly charge that his body should be taken back to

Canaan to be buried there? It was because still in his heart there was loyalty to the land where he had been born and to the spirit and hopes it represented. In him was that nostalgia for the scenes of childhood which is in the heart of every man. Not that a man wants to go back and be a child again; but what he does want is to recapture the fresh wonder of those days when all his world was new. Across the years he sees it "appareled in celestial light." Although he was to die in Egypt, Joseph still belonged to a dearer country—like Rupert Brooke, dying at Skyros in the Aegean, but with the echo of these words which he had written:

If I should die, think only this of me:
That there's some corner of a foreign field
That is for ever England.⁷

So Joseph in his death expressed the everlasting faithfulness of a man's devotion to the country and the people and the purpose of God to which it was given him first to belong, and with the ongoing life of which, beyond all other attachments of the world, he wanted at last to be identified.

Thus Genesis ends with the record of a great man desiring to go back at last to what was to him the homeland. But Genesis means "The Book of the Beginnings"; and we remember the One who was not only the beginning but the ending, not only the Alpha but the Omega too. In him for lives like that of Joseph there can be the ultimate Homeland of the soul's desire.

Biblical religion rests on a historical faith that affirms revelation. The Bible assumes throughout that God has revealed himself in unique events that attest both his freedom and his gracious initiative. But these events are nevertheless conditioned by the dimensions of time and space. They are organically related to the processes of nature and history of which they are also a part and in whose context they occur. Consequently every book of the Bible must be studied and understood in terms of its uniqueness as over against its general Oriental environment. But it must likewise be studied and understood in terms of its affinity with and dependence upon this environment. This is notably true of a book such as Exodus, of which the explicit and immediate concern is the interpretation of that historic event of revelation on which the faith and community of Israel rested. The apparently heterogeneous and unrelated list of topics discussed in this Introduction actually have a common rationale in this double concern involved in all Bible study. The object of the Introduction is only in the first instance to correlate the result of critical literary and historical studies; its ultimate purpose is to show how our knowledge of the God who reveals himself as "the Lord of history" is, nevertheless, historically mediated.

I. Title, Subject, and Motif

The Hebrew title for the second division of the Pentateuch is w'ēlleh shemōth, "Now these are the names of," the initial words of the document. This is commonly abbreviated as shemōth, "Names." It offers no clue to the contents of the book.

"Exodus" is a naturalized English word resting on the Septuagint title. It denotes the marching out en masse of a large company.

This title may have suggested itself to the translators by their use of the word in 19:1, or by their estimate of the book as a whole, notably chs. 1-15. But it does not do full justice to the subject matter. Nor does it disclose the central motif. Less than half of the book deals with Israel's departure from Egypt. The larger part is concerned with the institution and ordering of its common life. Further, God rather than Moses, the leader and lawgiver, or Israel, the elect and redeemed, stands at the heart of the document. The controlling motif is the revelation of God's power in his victory over the Pharaoh which for the writers is a disclosure of his universal lordship.

The book of Exodus is comparable to a drama. The action consists of God's preparation for the deliverance of the enslaved Hebrews, his victory over Pharaoh, which accomplishes their rescue, and his establishment of Israel as his people. The action and triumph of God is the center from which the whole book proceeds. Not simply Israel's escape from bondage but also the meaning of its establishment as a community, the significance of its laws, and the efficacy of its cultus depend upon this divine action.

II. History of the Sources

Exodus belongs to "the five books of Moses." These, together with Joshua, are the outcome of a single process of development. Since Exodus is not an independent literary unit, the story of its production is a special aspect of the history of the larger complex to which it belongs.¹

Like the Hexateuch, Exodus is a record with both an oral and a literary history. These two aspects of its history are closely interrelated.

They are two features of a single process. One can be understood only in the light of the other. It was the great accomplishment of Pentateuch research in the nineteenth century to establish the hypothesis that four primary documents—J, E, D, and P—are embodied in the present record. These are all found in Exodus, and their special features will be mentioned presently. What the hypothesis did not settle was the problem of the prior history of these documents, especially of J and E. In the twentieth century this whole issue has been greatly illumined by the growing recognition that these documents owe their character and form not so much to older literary units that may have gone into each of them as to the nature and history of Israel's oral tradition from which the documents, including antecedent literary forms, were derived.

Exodus is crucially important in the study and reconstruction of the oral history of the Hexateuch. It provides us with the most explicit historical memories we have of the actual events that gave rise to and continued to nurture the community of Israel and its distinctive tradition. Martin Noth² specifies five main "themes" which for him sum up the oral and written tradition that culminated in the Pentateuch. Three of these—the escape from Egypt, the nomadic period, and the Sinai covenant—have their point of departure enshrined in Exodus.

The ancient Song of Miriam (15:21) is a "hymn" evoked by the actual experience of the escape and served as the nucleus of an ever-growing series of forms, cultic and "secular," which helped to keep alive that historic event as a living experience. The accounts of the plagues and of the Red Sea, as well as many episodes in the Moses saga, were among the elements that began to cluster about this original core of the theme of the escape from slavery. All of them were the outcome of the dialogue between history and present experience in which Israel's faith characteristically expressed itself.

Similarly, the "oath" against Amalek (17:16) serves as at least one of the nucleuses for the nomadic theme to which chs. 16–18 are related. It probably had its inception in the struggle in which Israel established its nomadic center at Kadesh.

Noth is possibly correct in assuming that the Sinai theme constitutes a development in the tradition which rests on no such primary actualities in Israel's past as do the other two.³ It is not impossible that this Sinai theme, featuring at its core the covenant (24:1, 2, 9-11), is an adaptation by Israel of the yearly renewal of the social bonds which was a constituent of the Canaanite autumn festival. What is certain is that in its Sinai theme the tradition reflects Israel's perennial internalization of the meaning of its history as this was exhibited in "the great deeds" of the Lord, notably in the exodus motif. Artur Weiser⁴ stresses the interrelated common development, at the same centers, of these divergent dimensions in Israel's tradition. Through the cultus the revelation of the divine nature, which is the concern of the themes that celebrate "the great deeds of Yahweh," is translated into the revelation of the divine will, which is the concern of the Sinai theme. Each depended upon the other. Sinai provided the Exodus with enduring relevance. But the historical basis provided by the Exodus was indispensable to the founding of the Sinai theme and, indeed, of Israel itself. The Decalogue and the laws of the covenant (chs. 20–23) constitute the oldest extant evidence for the internalizing process which was the peculiar function of the Sinai theme. They also attest the assimilative capacity of Israel's faith.

Modern students believe that the oral tradition was mediated and ordered by a cultic context which was essentially the same in all Israel. The "themes" of the tradition thus understood were everywhere available as "sources" for the literary documents embedded in Exodus. However, some of the earliest essays in the history of oral tradition did not think of it as thus integrated and ordered by a single cultic context. They were premised on the view that there was a variety of oral "traditions," popular and local in character. They presupposed all sorts of local etiological tales, provincial histories, and tribal or hero sagas. In his commentary,⁵ Hugo Gressmann maintained that such sagas, with Moses as hero, formed the basis of Exodus. The early chapters of Exodus dealing with the birth and youth of Moses make such an assumption very plausible. The written documents J and E are indeed continuous. But one is left with the impression that they utilize in Exodus a very different source from that used in Genesis. There seems to be a conscious effort to tie together the sources as part of a single story (cf. 1:1-7). Noth would describe this phenomenon as a variation in the themes of a single common source. One may discuss the extent to which the possible existence of such independent oral units as Gressmann contemplated can be reconciled with the notion that there was a single dominant tradition, bound by the ordering implicit in a cultic context. It may be that such noncultic and "local" oral traditions were gradually absorbed with their themes by the more formally controlled universal tradition. Or as Noth⁶ feels, it is possible that the originally minor role of Moses was developed wholly within the context of the oral tradition. In either case it is safe to say that Moses is not the "hero" of Exodus.

The scope, character, and vitality of the oral tradition greatly determine the nature, history, and distinctiveness of the written sources in Exodus, notably J and E. Let us assume that all Israel possessed one main tradition, a series of sacred themes which remained normative for all, even after the political division of the kingdom.⁷ If oral and written tradition developed for a long time in the same cultic context, then J and E have one common foundation. It also becomes hazardous to assign "authors" to these documents. The Yahwist and the Elohist are better thought of as selective artists who, each in his own time and situation, set down the living tradition as they experience it and as it interprets the situation they face. Furthermore, with the possible exception of legal materials, it becomes more difficult (and less important) to differentiate between the oral and written items utilized by J and E. Finally it becomes extremely difficult to separate out from one another the original contents of these documents, insofar as they are now preserved in Exodus.

The oral tradition from which both J and E were abstracted does not deny their significance as independent documents. But it does qualify this significance and set it in a wider context. In the Exegesis no new systematic separation of the basic documents will be attempted. As far as J and E are concerned, we shall follow the classical separation itemized in S. R. Driver, The Book of Exodus.⁸ To some extent this will be qualified by comparison with the separation made in George Beer's more recent commentary, Exodus, mit einem Beitrag von Kurt Galling.⁹ Beer was more hesitant than Driver about assigning every part of the text of JE to a specific source (cf. 2:1-10; 5:1-6:1). On the other hand, unlike Driver, he subdivided both J and E into separate documents, J¹, J² and E, E¹. Only a few of the distinctive features of J and E can be cited here. A study of the Exegesis will reveal the multitude of the peculiarities of each.

With respect to vocabulary, the most significant feature is the name for God. This name, יהוה, which the Yahwist has used throughout, the Elohist first introduces in 3:15, having previously used the common noun "Elohim." Further, whereas for J the holy mountain is called Sinai (19:11, 18, 20, 23; 34:2, 4), in E it is Horeb (3:1; 17:6; 33:6). Again, only E designates Moses' father-in-law as Jethro (3:1; 4:18; 18:1, 2, 5, 6, 9, 10, 12). J does not give his name in Exodus but seems to have known him as Hobab (Num. 10:29).

The lines which in Exodus separate the documents J, E, and P are most sharply illustrated in the account of the plagues (cf. pp. 838-39). There, and throughout, the theocentric emphasis and the simple and unreflective naturalness of J become apparent. The plagues are sent by God directly, Moses simply announcing them (9:1-7). At the same time "natural causes" are recognized in them (10:13). Likewise, at the crossing of the sea it was the "east wind" that removed the water (14:21).

In Exodus the E document shows a tendency to exalt Moses. To him the divine name is revealed (3:15). He wields the "rod of God" by which God accomplishes the wonders (7:15, 20; 9:23; 10:13; 14:16). In P Aaron has this honor. Further, in E Moses is recognized as a great leader by the Egyptians (3:21-22; 11:1-3). And for Israel he is the great intercessor and mediator (32:11-13, 30-34; 33:7-11).

The Deuteronomic editorial notes in Exodus are relatively few and for the most part easily distinguishable (10:1-2; 12:24-27a; 13:3-16; 15:25b-26; 17:14; 19:3b-8; 23:23-25a; 34:11-13, 16, 24; also in 20:1-17).

The Priestly document is easily separated from the others. The chief problem about it in Exodus concerns the integrity of chs. 25-31; 35-40. A. H. McNeile¹⁰ and others have held that these sections consisted of a single basic narrative supplemented by one or two layers of editorial additions. More recently Gerhard von Rad¹¹ has separated them into two basically independent sources, P^A and P^B, supplemented by a layer of editorial additions, P^S. Though the hypothesis must be treated with reserve, especially as applied in details, it seems to constitute a genuine advance in the interpretation of the tabernacle accounts.

III. Exodus and the History of Israel

Exodus is not a history of early Israel in any strict sense. It is rather an exposition of the meaning of that history for Israel. It is an interpretation of Israel's faith. In the light of our understanding of the history of Israel's tradition (cf. pp. 833-35) this interpretation of the faith of Israel represents the cumulative result of centuries of organic development. Exodus deals seriously with the fact that Israel's faith rests on a historic revelation. It assumes that the faith is rooted in and illustrated by a particular historical occurrence. Therefore there are embedded in Exodus memories of the actual historical circumstances and events in which by faith the Hebrews first saw the decisive disclosure of God and became the people of Israel.

¹⁰ The Book of Exodus (London: Methuen and Co., 1908; "Westminster Commentaries"), p. xxxvii.

¹¹ Die Priesterschrift im Hexateuch (Berlin: W. Kohlhammer, 1934).

This interpretation of the great initial "act of God" was not produced all at once when J or later documents were composed. Exodus takes up into itself the entire tradition of the faith from the first. Exodus is not only, as is sometimes assumed, a one-sided attempt to impute to Moses and the nomads he led the ideas—religious, cultic, historical, and ethical—of the ninth, eighth, or sixth centuries. It is also a significant exposition of a remembered history and of the faith that culminated in the ideas it contains. In Exodus the event of revelation in its initial meaning, and all subsequent interpretations of it down to the sixth century, are woven together into a single literary fabric.

Israel's early history as remembered in Exodus has little substantiating corroboration in ancient records. There is no account of a company of slaves that escaped from Egyptian slavery and that was established as a racial and religious community by a man named Moses. The external evidence, such as it is, is circumstantial. The migration of the Hebrews to Egypt and their manner of life in that land as portrayed in Genesis and Exodus correspond to a role played for centuries by a class of seminomadic people, the Habiru or 'Apiru. The etymological relatedness of the names warrants the conjecture that the biblical Hebrews derived from that class. In the thirteenth century an Egyptian Pharaoh referred to "Israel" (cf. below). Aside from such particulars, it can be said that the general outline of Israel's life and experience in Egypt and in the desert is in harmony with the conditions of life and population movements typical of the Near East until recent times. This is notably true in respect to the perennial tendency of nomadic and seminomadic groups to infiltrate into the sown lands of Egypt and Palestine.¹²

Since Exodus is an interpretation of Israel's faith rather than a genetic account of the people who hold it, or of the forms in which it was expressed, it raises many questions of historical, geographical, and cultic import which it does not fully clarify. This creates a series of special problems for the modern student.

IV. The Pharaoh of the Exodus

From the time of the Egyptian historian Manetho (250 B.C.) until quite recently the Exodus was placed early in the sixteenth century. The violently anti-Jewish Manetho insisted that the Israelites were expelled along with the Hyksos. Actually the date can be reconciled neither with 1:11 nor with the admittedly artificial framework of chronology in 12:40 (cf. I Kings 6:1).

For a considerable time modern scholars debated the relative merit of the fifteenth and thirteenth centuries.¹³ Increasingly the balance falls in favor of the thirteenth century.¹⁴ This date takes 1:11 at face value. Scholars who accept the thirteenth century date have usually recognized Ramses II (1301-1234) as the oppressor, and his son Merneptah (1234-27) as the Pharaoh of the Exodus. But some feel that Seti I (1319-1301) was the oppressor and that the Exodus occurred under Ramses II.¹⁵ These feel certain that Israel was in Palestine by the third quarter of the thirteenth century. Their conviction rests especially on the line of the Merneptah inscription¹⁶ which reads, "Israel is desolated, her seed is not." The assumption is that the Israel mentioned by Merneptah consisted of the sons of the slaves who came out of Egypt. There is no explicit evidence for this. However, there is archaeological evidence that Seti I began the building program in which the Hebrews were impressed as slaves. It is thus possible that Seti I rather than Ramses II was the "new king . . . who did not know Joseph" (1:8).

V. The Location of Sinai

There is no single clear testimony about the location of the mountain. Uncertainty developed perhaps because the mountain lay in territory later occupied by Israel's foes and because Israelites fixed their attention on Jerusalem.

The Bible has two names for the mountain, Horeb and Sinai. E and the Deuteronomist seem to use Horeb exclusively (3:1; 17:6; 33:6; Deut. 1:2, 6, 19; 5:2; 9:8; 18:16; 29:1). J uses Sinai. So does P, and this usage becomes the more prominent. Sinai and Horeb are usually considered to refer to one place. But this has been seriously questioned by McNeile and others.¹⁷ However, McNeile's carefully stated position has not been widely accepted.

Assuming that Sinai and Horeb are two different designations of the same place, there are three sites that are currently given serious consideration:

(a) Jebel Musa. This is the traditional site near the apex of the Sinai peninsula. Since late in the fourth century A.D. this mountain, eight thousand feet high, has been designated as Mount Sinai. Justinian (A.D. 527-65) officially recognized it as such. The statement of Deut. 1:2, that it was eleven days' journey from Sinai to Kadesh, favors this location. Moreover, the site is near the ancient Egyptian copper and turquoise mines which, in the days of Merneptah, were not worked as much as had been the case earlier. The Midianite clan with which Moses was associated was that of the Kenites (Judg. 4:11) who, according to their name, were smiths. Midianites therefore might well have settled at this mining center. It is largely on the basis of this proximity to the copper mines that Wright and Filson accept this traditional site as the location of Mount Sinai.¹⁸ To some extent they also lean on the locations of the stations of the journey from Egypt to Sinai which Flinders Petrie and other archaeologists have identified. But the evidence for these identifications is not generally accepted as conclusive. Moreover, the copper deposits in Midian proper are richer than those in the Serabit el Khadim region; and it was also mined in the 'Arabah. The Kenite smiths need not have been in the lower part of the peninsula to ply their trade.

(b) Midian. A second group of scholars led by such men as Eduard Meyer, Hugo Gressmann, and Alois Musil, have sought to locate Mount Sinai to the east of Aqabah. They proceed from the assumption that at the sealing of the covenant the mountain was an active volcano in eruption (19:16-25). Since there are no volcanic mountains on the peninsula it has seemed necessary to locate a site farther east where extinct volcanoes are found. But the biblical evidence for the thesis is not very convincing. Besides, it is by no means certain that the mountain described was actually a volcano in eruption. It seems more probable that the notion of the presence of God, represented by the pillar of the cloud and of fire, has been augmented and made more awesome by metaphors drawn from earthquake, storm, and perhaps volcanic activity.

(c) Paran. According to a third view, Sinai was situated in the wilderness of Paran, southwest of Edom. This seems more probable than the other two. In Num. 10:12 the wilderness of Sinai is a synonym for that of Paran. And when Moses invited his father-in-law to march with them from there, he protested that he must return to his own land (Num. 10:29-30). Had they been coming up from the lower part of the peninsula they could have traveled together to the head of the Gulf of Aqabah. In the blessing of Moses (Deut. 33:2) Sinai and Paran, plus Seir, are tied together as the site of the mountain. Hab. 3:3 links Paran and Teman. And Judg. 5:4-5 combines Sinai and Seir. Further, it seems that the holy mountain was near Kadesh-barnea, where Israel encamped for a long time (Num. 13:26; 20:1-14; 27:14; 33:36). In Num. 20:16 Kadesh is said to be at the outer border of Edom. Edom, according to the archaeological investigations of Nelson Glueck, was perhaps the only region in which there were permanent settlements at this time. Ezion-geber, Elath, and Kadesh-barnea ('Ain el-Qudeirat) were not made permanent settlements until the tenth century. It seems most probable, therefore, that the mountain at which Moses met God and at which the covenant was sealed is located somewhere northwest of the head of the Gulf of Aqabah, just across the "Arabah from Edom."

VI. Origin of Israel's Name for God

In the postexilic period it became customary to read, "Adonai," LORD, wherever the tetragrammaton occurred in the text. This practice, based on reverence, became standard and has persisted in the synagogue until today. The pronunciation of YHWH had thus fallen into disuse long before the Hebrew text was provided with vowel signs, and was therefore long in doubt. However, with the aid of Greek transcriptions and other resources, scholars have gradually come to agree that it was pronounced Yahweh. In poetry and as a part of personal names in the Bible we find the related forms Yah and Yahu (Yah: 15:2; 17:16; II Kings 1:3; Pss. 68:10; 104:35; 105:45; 106:1, 48; etc.; Yahu: I Kings 17:1, 16, 18, 22, 24; etc.). For long it was the dominant view that Yahweh was a relatively late Israelite expansion of these shorter forms. Consequently, in the mighty efforts that were put forth to discover the antecedents of the God of Israel in the cultures of the Near East that were older than the Hebrew, the brief forms of Yah and Yahu naturally served as cues. A brief summary of this effort, which still continues, together with helpful bibliographical suggestions is provided by Meek, who himself shares its point of departure.¹⁹ It seems, however, that this effort has largely failed.

¹⁷ Exodus, pp. cii-cvi.

¹⁹ Hebrew Origins, pp. 82-118.

That is, it has not resulted in any agreement as to the antecedent location or nature of the God of the Israelites. While this search continues, there is a drift today toward the view that Yah and Yahu are forms derived from Yahweh. Beer's confession of a personal change of view on this matter well points up a general tendency.³⁰ In the English-speaking world this current tendency is given momentum by the work and influence of William F. Albright.³¹

Once the priority of Yahweh over Yah and Yahu is granted, the possibilities are sharply limited. Three may be cited: (a) In Hebrew the root הוה has the meaning of "to be" or "to become." But this is a derived meaning. The primary meaning of this ancient Semitic root was "to fall" or "to blow." The name Yahweh should probably be understood in terms of the ancient meanings of this verb from which it is derived. Yahweh is "the falling one," or causatively, "the one who causes [lightning] to fall"; or he is "the blower," or causatively, "the one who causes [wind] to blow." The storm and nature attributes associated in the Bible with Yahweh are called in to fortify this hypothesis. But the view suffers from want of actual evidence that Yahweh was really abstracted from this root הוה when it possessed its primitive meaning. The best argument in favor of this view is a negative one: that the interpretations resting on the later Hebrew meaning of the root הוה seem too abstract, while this one is more material and dynamic. (b) There is next the view that Yahweh must be the causative form of the Hebrew verb היה or הוה, "to be," "to become," and so forth. Yahweh is the creator, "He causes to be." This is Albright's view. He scorns the objection that this was too abstract for the ancient mind, and cites comparable definitions from Babylonian, Canaanite, and Egyptian sources. On the basis of similar parallels he simultaneously makes sense of the formula in 3:14. Yahweh, "He causes to be," is an abbreviated form of a longer litany, "He causes to be what comes into existence." This "retransposition" of the formula includes changing its first verb to a causal form. Albright justifies this on the ground that the original transposition into the first person was made when the causative form of הוה was no longer used in Hebrew. This raises the question whether even at that time Israelites could still understand the meaning of Yahweh as Albright presents it. (c) The third view differs from Albright's chiefly in that it considers the 'ehyeh of 3:14 as the basis for interpreting Yahweh. Consequently, the meaning is not causative. Yahweh is made to mean "being," "he who is or will be,"

³¹ From Stone Age to Christianity, pp. 196-99.

‘O ׁו (LXX), "the Eternal" (Moffatt). It seems that this interpretation gives too much importance to 3:14.

It must be pointed out that by assuming the priority of Yahweh over Yahu or Yah, one is not reduced to looking for the antecedents of Moses' God in Israel alone. The first view mentioned above illustrates this position. Further it must be remembered that whether Yahweh was an abbreviation of the formula changed by the patriarchs, as Albright holds, or whether his name was the enlarged form of the name of a Canaanite deity, his decisive meaning for Israel was determined not by his antecedents, but by the revelation to Moses and his manifestation to Israel in the Exodus. This novelty and not the name is the element that is distinctive and crucial.

VII. The Plagues of Egypt

The "Plagues of Egypt" are variously designated as גְּפוֹת, "plagues" (9:14; 12:13); אֲזָחוֹת, "signs" (7:3; 8:23; 10:1-2); מִוֹפְתִים, "portents" (7:3; 11:9-10); and נֶגַע, "stroke," "visitation," or "plague" (11:1). In this general context these terms are synonymous; together they are God's "great acts of judgment" (7:4). All of the episodes are signs and portents, tokens of God's power and harbingers of his imminent conquest of Pharaoh. This is the way in which P refers to them exclusively. But all of the episodes likewise stress the calamity suffered by Pharaoh and his people. These ten plagues constitute the sanctions for God's demand on Pharaoh and they document the outcome of disobedience.

Our record is a narrative carefully constructed from the three literary traditions, J, E, P. To some extent the present literary form enables us to discern the growth of these stories, both following and preceding their first composition. At present J's hand is discernible in seven of the plagues, the fourth and fifth being wholly from his hand. P is present in five accounts, the third and sixth being by him alone. The account of the first plague well illustrates P's tendency to make the calamity more severe when he supplements either J or E. Five items show the hand of E and the ninth plague is perhaps entirely his. Since the third and sixth plagues are accounts by P alone and since the calamities they report seem analogous to the calamities in the fourth and fifth plagues (J) respectively, it has been suggested that these two are simply P's duplicates for four and five. Whatever may be the merit of that suggestion, it seems very likely that no single tradition or cycle originally counted ten plagues.

On account of the highly stylized and repetitious character of the entire literary unit it is relatively easy to distinguish the three literary strands. Thus, in P God always gives Moses the command, "Say to Aaron" (7:19; 8:5, 16), Aaron uses the rod, the plagues are always signs and portents, there is no interview with Pharaoh nor demand on him, there is a relation of God's demonstration to the powers of Egypt's magicians, and the closing formula is "and he would not listen to them; as the LORD had said" (7:22; 8:15*b*, 19; 9:12; cf. 7:3). In J Moses alone goes before Pharaoh (7:14-16; 8:1, 9-10, 20, 26, 29; 9:1, 13, 29; 10:1, 9, 25; 11:4-8; cf. 4:10-16). The demand formula is "let my people go, that they may serve me" (7:16; 8:1, 20; 9:1, 13; 10:3; cf. 4:23). God himself sends the plague and, sometimes at the intercession of Moses requested by Pharaoh, God himself removes it. At the end Pharaoh makes his heart "heavy," כבד (7:14; 8:15, 32; 9:7, 34; 10:1), in distinction from "strong," חזק, as in P and E. The most distinctive feature of the less fully represented tradition of E is that Moses uses the rod to produce the plague (7:15*b*, 17*b*, 20*b*; 9:23*a*; 10:13*a*). E ends a plague with the formula "and he did not let the children of Israel go" (9:35; 10:20, 27). The movement toward a climax and the premonition of Pharaoh's rout, which P communicates in Yahweh's contest with the magicians, J and E indicate by Pharaoh's increasingly generous efforts at striking a bargain with Moses.

There have been many efforts to rationalize these fantastic stories. Modern scholars have sought to provide a natural explanation at least for the core of each sign. McNeile even seeks to provide a natural explanation for the first six plagues in sequence, and likewise for the last four.²² Thus the fetid river, with its decaying fish, bred a crop of frogs. Whereupon the decomposing frogs caused the swarms of insects in the third and fourth plagues. These again lead to the fifth and sixth plagues. This is a highly dubious and conjectural procedure. More seriously, it causes one to forget the real purpose of the stories in their total context. It betrays a concern for historical veracity or congruity at the cost of meaning and truth. To be sure, many of these stories reflect something of the natural conditions and hazards of life in Egypt. Furthermore, some of them probably rest on actual events that facilitated the escape of the Israelites, and in which they saw the hand of God. But the text now presents a series of piously decorated accounts, woven together in an elaborate and artistic sequence of narratives. The significance and value of this total complex is symbolic rather than historical. The mosaic as a whole attests Israel's faith, resting on the historic experience of its escape from slavery; it aims at showing that not Pharaoh or the gods of Egypt but the living God of Israel makes nature serve man—or rather, makes nature serve his purposes for man's fulfillment.

For those who developed the literary sequence, the quasi-deterministic processes that make up nature and history, whether seen as laws and scientific categories or as a multiplicity of gods and demons, met at single point which was neither fate nor chaos. For them the point of meeting was the freedom of the living God who seeks men's allegiance and redemption. For biblical faith these quasi-deterministic processes of nature and history are seen as actually the vehicles and means of God's purpose. This faith is rooted in a series of climactic events—Exodus, Return, Resurrection, Pentecost—in which God's creative and redemptive freedom becomes palpable. These are the events of the "history of salvation" (Heilsgeschichte), the miracle which all "miracles" seek to illustrate.

VIII. The Kenite Hypothesis

The burden of the Kenite hypothesis is that not only the name of Yahweh, the God of Israel, but many aspects of Israel's cultus and social life were derived from the Kenite clan of Midianites to which Jethro belonged (Judg. 4:11). This hypothesis, first stated nearly a century ago by Ghillany, has had a persistent attraction for biblical scholars, though it has not won undisputed acceptance.

The best-known and most conspicuous bit of evidence offered in behalf of the hypothesis consists of an interpretation of 18:10-12 to the effect that Yahweh was the God of Jethro and that he brought him a sacrifice, Aaron and the elders of Israel being invited. The actual merit of this interpretation of these verses must be evaluated on the basis of our estimate of the nature of the whole cycle of accounts to which this chapter belongs.

Hugo Gressmann,²³ who sought to work out the implications of this hypothesis in a most radical manner, insisted that the cycle of stories in chs. 16-18, and continued in Num. 10:29 ff., was originally oriented towards Kadesh. For this cycle, he held, Kadesh was the place at which Israel became a community. There the Exodus received its implementation in terms of cultus and social organization, and this implementation took place by means of the appropriation of Kenite models.

This fundamentally separate tradition of ²³ Die Anfänge Israels (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1922; "Die Schriften des Alten Testaments in Auswahl"), pp. 86-94.

Kadesh, as Gressmann saw it, is now interrupted by the long account of the tradition focused upon Sinai (Exod. 19:1-Num. 10:28). According to that inserted account, mostly of later provenance, the implementation of the Exodus in the birth of the Israel community or influence takes place without any reference to surrounding cultural forms. Chs. 16-18 are now simply the account of a pilgrimage that terminates at Sinai. Sinai is the focus of their significance. But Gressmann felt that this impression was first created by the latest editorial harmonists of the Pentateuch. He contended that chs. 16-18 formed the first part of an independent tradition, parallel to and older than the Sinai cycle. The focus of this tradition was Kadesh; and its concern was to give an account of the origin of Israel's cultic and social forms.

In its present form ch. 18 has the flavor of an idyllic family party. Gressmann held that originally it reported more explicitly than now the establishment at Kadesh of the cultus of Yahweh. The present flavor was given to the account by the later editors who wanted to excise from it explicit references to the taking over of cultic forms by Israel from non-Israelites. Assuming this editorial tendency, Gressmann sought to reconstruct the original account to indicate what cultic forms had been taken over at Kadesh. In this reconstruction he combined Num. 10:29-36 and 11:11-17, 24-30 with Exod. 18. From his effort he concluded that this Kadesh cycle originally reported Israel's appropriation of three Kenite forms at Kadesh: sacrifice, the sacred lot, and the ark.

It may never be possible to establish or to refute the Kenite hypothesis conclusively, let alone the specific and detailed account of it which Gressmann offered. But its persistent existence, as well as the persistence of attacks upon it, dramatizes a very important feature about the nature of the biblical record. The hypothesis draws attention to the fact that the Old Testament reveals, at least implicitly, that the forms of Israel's life as the community of Yahweh were genetically related to the cultural forms in the midst of which Israel arose. On the other hand, the opposition to the hypothesis draws attention to the fact that at least in its latest strata the Pentateuch insists on the uniqueness, not only in spirit but also in form, of the cultus and law of Israel, and considers them to be the work and gifts of the Lord of Israel, owing nothing to environment. An honest interpreter must deal realistically with all the data, implicit and explicit. When this is done with respect to the Old Testament he will be challenged by a question: What is the nature and meaning of a faith the modes of whose cultus, and even possibly the name of whose deity, may have been appropriated from the Midianites (and whose temple was constructed by Phoenician engineers), but whose adherents nevertheless claimed throughout in word and practice that their cultus and culture were the unique work of the living God? It becomes clear that in its forms of expression—cultic, social, intellectual—biblical faith is always conditioned by and genetically related to its general setting and environment. It also becomes clear that its really distinctive feature is a center of experience and life, particular and historical in character, which is accepted in faith as the revelation of God. Proceeding from this "discontinuous" center the community assimilates and appropriates for itself the forms of the conditioning environment.

The strongest arguments for the Kenite hypothesis are: (a) the materials relevant to it are, on the whole, older than those of the Sinai cycle; (b) historically there is every reason to suppose that, because of perennial enmity, the writers would have wanted to emasculate any account in which Israelites were presented as debtors to Midian; and (c) the Midianites were actually distant kin of Israel, so that Israel under Moses may have recovered what was originally part of a common possession.

The hypothesis, however, has serious weaknesses: (a) For want of explicit evidence it is highly subjective, notably in its efforts at reconstruction; (b) the oldest written document of the Old Testament (J) does not hold that Moses first introduced a God to Israel as Yahweh, which is at least an aspect of the hypothesis; and (c) it is improbable that Moses would have won the confidence of the Israelites by coming to them in the name of a God they had not hitherto known. Meek²⁴ makes much of these last two objections, and insists that Yahweh was originally the God of Judah. H. H. Rowley, who accepts the Kenite hypothesis, ingeniously disposes of Meek's objections by incorporating his counterproposal in the hypothesis itself.²⁵

IX. The Exodus and the Covenant of Sinai

For Israel the core of revelation was the Exodus, an objective historical fact. The climax of God's self-disclosure is reached in the crossing of the sea. By faith Israel sees the meaning of existence laid bare in this objective historical occurrence. Interpreted by Moses, the event becomes the basis for and the primary illustration of the peculiar apprehensions of the nature of the God in whom Israel places its faith. This is attested in the ancient Song of Miriam (15:21). This historical occurrence is the cornerstone of Israel's existence as the people of God.

Revelation has taken place in the Exodus, and joyful and spontaneous testimony is borne to the God who has made himself known. Sinai stands for the systematic interpretation and implementation of the faith which is the gift of revelation. Sinai symbolizes the establishment of Israel as the church. It is the locus for the covenant that sets forth the relationship in which Israel stands to the God of its deliverance, and for the laws and ordinances in which this relationship receives its concrete expression, both in society and cultus.

Sinai stresses the organic and living relationship that exists between the social and religious institutions of Israel and the exodus revelation. It may well be, as has been held by many responsible scholars, that the section entitled "The Pilgrimage to Sinai" (15:22-18:27) was originally an account of Israel's settlement at Kadesh and of its adoption there of cultic institutions of foreign origin. Certainly there can be no doubt that in cultic forms as well as in the forms of social institutions and laws Israel was a debtor to the wider environment in which it developed. We may take Kadesh as the symbol of this indebtedness. But Sinai is the symbol that Israel could assimilate cultural forms so as to transform their inner meaning. Forms might be of foreign origin and yet express the nature and will of Yahweh. Under "Sinai," whenever or wherever they may actually have been promulgated, the laws of common life and the ordinances for common worship are presented as the expression of Yahweh's will for his people, mediated directly through Moses.

Sinai is also the symbol of the covenanted relationship in which Israel stands to Yahweh. It is the reminder that the whole of Israel's community life is organically and integrally conceived as the implementation of the exodus revelation. Its central meaning is neither a mystical fellowship nor a set of moral demands. It rests on the Exodus (19:4-7; 20:2). Later tendencies to treat law as revelation obscured this fact.
