

THE TEXT IS FLY WITHIN THE BOOK ONLY

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

A Commentary in Twelve Volumes

VOLUME 1

GENERAL AND OLD TESTAMENT ARTICLES

GENESIS

EXODUS

"Without equal in this or any other century."—Pulpit Digest
"Certainly one cannot call this less than a 'great' commentary."—Christian Century

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

*Christendom's
Most Comprehensive Commentary*

(For the complete plan of The Interpreter's Bible see the back of the jacket)

ABOUT VOLUME I

VOLUME I contains the complete commentary on Genesis and Exodus—and the twenty-two General Articles on the Bible and the Old Testament.

Here some of the ablest scholars and preachers of our time contribute their knowledge of the findings of recent research and their power of interpretation to explore the wealth of preaching and teaching opportunities in the beginning books of the Bible.

Cuthbert A. Simpson (Introduction and Exegesis of Genesis) is Regius Professor of Hebrew and Canon of Christ Church, Oxford, England. He is author of Revelation and Response in the Old Testament and Early Traditions of Israel.

Walter Russell Bowie (Exposition of Genesis) is sometime Professor of Homiletics in the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia. He is the author of such widely read books as The Story of the Bible, Lift Up Your Heart, Remembering Christ, The Story of the Church, and Christ with Me.

J. Coert J. Marsdam (Introduction and Exegesis of Exodus) is Professor of Old Testament Theology, The Federated Theological Faculty of the University of Chicago. He is author of Revelation in Jewish Wisdom Literature.

J. Edgar Park (Exposition of Exodus) was, until his death in 1956, President Emeritus, Wheaton College, Norton, Massachusetts. He was the author of The Miracle of Preaching.

The 22 General Articles on the Bible and the Old Testament supply the background needed for fullest understanding of the Scriptures. Taken together they would make a sizable volume—an unsurpassed general introduction to the Bible as a whole and to the Old Testament with concise yet thorough coverage of their many fields, as follows:

GENERAL ARTICLES ON THE BIBLE

The Bible: Its Significance and Authority—Herbert H. Farmer, Professor of Divinity, University of Cambridge

The Formation and Transmission of the Old Testament

The Canon of the Old Testament—Arthur Jeffery, Adjunct Professor of Semitic Languages, Union Theological Seminary

Text and Ancient Versions of the Old Testament—Arthur Jeffery

The Formation and Transmission of the New Testament

The Canon of the New Testament—Edgar J. Goodspeed, Professor Emeritus of Biblical and Patristic Greek, University of Chicago

(Continued on back flap)

ABINGDON PRESS

KANSAS CITY, MO. PUBLIC LIBRARY

AUG 1987

• Carche

MAI OCT 29 1987

NOV 23 '88

MAI DEC 22 1987

• Nineveh

MAI JAN 6 1988

MAI FEB 1 1988

MAI JUL 13 1988

MAI OCT 17 1988

MAI NOV 21 1988

• Babylon

Ur

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

IN TWELVE VOLUMES

VOLUME

- I. GENERAL ARTICLES ON THE BIBLE; GENERAL ARTICLES ON THE OLD TESTAMENT; GENESIS; EXODUS
- II. LEVITICUS; NUMBERS; DEUTERONOMY; JOSHUA; JUDGES; RUTH; SAMUEL
- III. KINGS; CHRONICLES; EZRA; NEHEMIAH; ESTHER; JOB
- IV. PSALMS; PROVERBS
- V. ECCLESIASTES; SONG OF SONGS; ISAIAH; JEREMIAH
- VI. LAMENTATIONS; EZEKIEL; DANIEL; HOSEA; JOEL; AMOS; OBADIAH; JONAH; MICAH; NAHUM; HABAKKUK; ZEPHANIAH; HAGGAI; ZECHARIAH; MALACHI
- VII. GENERAL ARTICLES ON THE NEW TESTAMENT; MATTHEW; MARK
- VIII. LUKE; JOHN
- IX. ACTS; ROMANS
- X. CORINTHIANS; GALATIANS; EPHESIANS
- XI. PHILIPPIANS; COLOSSIANS; THESSALONIANS; TIMOTHY; TITUS; PHILEMON; HEBREWS
- XII. JAMES; PETER; JOHN; JUDE; REVELATION; GENERAL ARTICLES; INDEXES

VOLUME I
GENERAL ARTICLES ON THE BIBLE

GENERAL ARTICLES ON THE
OLD TESTAMENT

THE BOOK OF GENESIS

THE BOOK OF EXODUS

EDITORIAL BOARD

GEORGE ARTHUR BUTTRICK

Commentary Editor

WALTER RUSSELL BOWIE

Associate Editor of Exposition

PAUL SCHERER

Associate Editor of Exposition

JOHN KNOX

*Associate Editor of
New Testament Introduction and Exegesis*

SAMUEL TERRIEN

*Associate Editor of Old Testament Introduction
and Exegesis*

NOLAN B. HARMON

Editor, Abingdon Press

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

The Holy Scriptures

IN THE KING JAMES AND REVISED STANDARD VERSIONS WITH GENERAL ARTICLES AND INTRODUCTION, EXEGESIS, EXPOSITION
FOR EACH BOOK OF THE BIBLE

IN TWELVE VOLUMES

VOLUME

I

דבר-אלהינו יקום לעולם

Abingdon Press

Copyright 1952 by Pierce and Smith in the United States of America. Copyright secured in all countries of the International Copyright Union. Published simultaneously in the United States, the Dominion of Canada, and Great Britain. All rights reserved. No part of the text may be reproduced in any manner whatsoever without written permission of the publishers, except brief quotations embodied in critical articles or reviews.

For information address Abingdon Press

Nashville, Tennessee

Copyright renewal © 1980 by Abingdon

ISBN 0-687-19207-2

Library of Congress Catalog Card Number: 51-12276

The text of the Revised Standard Version of the Bible (RSV) and quotations therefrom are copyright 1946, 1952 by Division of Christian Education of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the United States of America. Scripture quotations designated "ASV" are from the American Standard Version of the Revised Bible, copyright renewed 1929 by the International Council of Religious Education. Those designated "Moffatt" are from The Bible, A New Translation, by James Moffatt, copyright in the United States, 1935, by Harper & Brothers, New York; copyright in countries of the International Copyright Union by Hodder & Stoughton, Ltd., London. Those designated "Amer. Trans." or "Goodspeed" are from The Complete Bible, An American Translation, by J. M. Powis Smith and Edgar J. Goodspeed, copyright 1939 by the University of Chicago.

Thirty-ninth Printing 1984

MANUFACTURED BY THE PARTHENON PRESS AT NASHVILLE, TENNESSEE, UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

CONSULTING EDITORS

JOHN W. BAILEY

Professor Emeritus of New Testament Interpretation, Berkeley Baptist Divinity School

JOHN BAILLIE

Professor of Divinity, University of Edinburgh

FRANK RUSSELL BARRY

Bishop of Southwell

WALLACE BASSETT

Minister, Cliff Temple Baptist Church, Dallas

JOHN W. BEARDSLEE, JR.

New Testament, New Brunswick Theological Seminary

C. IRVING BENSON

Superintendent Minister, Wesley Church, Melbourne

B. HARVIE BRANSCOMB

Chancellor, Vanderbilt University

MILLAR BURROWS

Professor of Biblical Theology, The Divinity School, Yale University

J. HARRY COTTON

Professor of Philosophy, Wabash College

CLARENCE T. CRAIG

Dean, Drew Theological Seminary

ANGUS DUN

Bishop of Washington, D.C.

HERBERT H. FARMER

Professor of Divinity, University of Cambridge

HUGHELL E. W. FOSBROKE

Dean Emeritus, General Theological Seminary

ELLIS A. FULLER

President, Southern Baptist Theological Seminary

FREDERICK C. GRANT

Professor of Biblical Theology, Union Theological Seminary, New York

GEORGIA HARKNESS

Professor of Applied Theology, Pacific School of Religion

PAUL J. HOH

President, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Philadelphia

LYNN HAROLD HOUGH

Sometime Dean, Drew Theological Seminary

UMPHREY LEE

President, Southern Methodist University

HALFORD E. LUCCOCK

Professor of Homiletics, The Divinity School, Yale University

W. E. McCULLOCH

Associate Editor, The United Presbyterian

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON

Editor Emeritus, The Christian Century

JAMES MUILENBURG

Professor of Hebrew and Cognate Languages, Union Theological Seminary, New York

EDWIN McNEILL POTEAT

Minister, Pullen Memorial Baptist Church, Raleigh, North Carolina

SAMUEL DAVID PRESS

President Emeritus and Professor of New Testament and Systematic Theology, Eden Theological Seminary

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

ALEXANDER C. PURDY

Professor of New Testament, Hartford
Theological Seminary

GEORGE W. RICHARDS

President Emeritus and Professor Emeritus of Church History, Theological Seminary of the Evangelical and Reformed Church

R. B. Y. SCOTT

Professor of Old Testament Language and Literature, Faculty of Divinity, McGill
University

W. AIKEN SMART

Professor of Biblical Theology, Emory University

HORACE G. SMITH

President and Professor of Preaching, Garrett Biblical Institute

WILLARD L. SPERRY

Dean of the Divinity School, Chairman of the Board of Preachers, Harvard University

JOHN S. STAMM

Bishop of the Evangelical United Brethren
Church

W. TALIAFERRO THOMPSON

Professor of Christian Education, Union Theological Seminary, Richmond

HOWARD THURMAN

Minister, The Church for the Fellowship of All Peoples, San Francisco

LESLIE D. WEATHERHEAD

Hon. Chaplain to His Majesty's Forces, Minister, The City Temple, London

AMOS N. WILDER

Professor of New Testament Interpretation, Chicago Theological Seminary and Federated Theological Faculty of the University of Chicago

CONTRIBUTORS

WILLIAM F. ALBRIGHT

Professor of Semitic Languages, Johns Hopkins University

General Article

The Old Testament World

E. L. ALLEN

Lecturer in Divinity, University of Durham

Exposition Ezekiel

BERNHARD W. ANDERSON

Professor of Old Testament Interpretation, Colgate-Rochester Divinity School

Introduction and Exegesis Esther

GAIUS GLENN ATKINS

Professor Emeritus of Homiletics, Auburn Theological Seminary

Exposition Ecclesiastes

JOHN W. BAILEY

Professor Emeritus of New Testament Interpretation, Berkeley Baptist Divinity School

Introduction and Exegesis

I and II Thessalonians

FRANK H. BALLARD

Minister, Hampstead Garden Suburb Free Church, London

Exposition Psalms 90-150

ALBERT E. BARNETT

Professor of New Testament Interpretation, Candler School of Theology, Emory University

Introduction and Exegesis II Peter

Introduction and Exegesis Jude

GEORGES AUGUSTIN BARROIS

Associate Professor of Biblical Literature and Theology, Princeton Theological Seminary

General Article

Chronology, Metrology, etc.

FRANCIS W. BEARE

Professor of New Testament Studies, Trinity College, Toronto

Introduction and Exegesis .. Ephesians

Introduction and Exegesis ... Colossians

OSCAR F. BLACKWELDER

Minister, Lutheran Church of the Reformation, Washington, D.C.

Exposition Galatians

HAROLD A. BOSLEY

Minister, First Methodist Church, Evanston, Illinois

Exposition Micah

WALTER RUSSELL BOWIE

Professor of Homiletics, The Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia

General Article

The Teaching of Jesus: III. The Parables

Exposition Genesis

Exposition Luke 1-6

RAYMOND A. BOWMAN

Associate Professor, Department of Oriental Languages and Literature, University of Chicago

Introduction and Exegesis Ezra

Introduction and Exegesis .. Nehemiah

JOHN BRIGHT

Professor of Hebrew and the Interpretation of the Old Testament, Union Theological Seminary, Richmond

Introduction and Exegesis Joshua

GEORGE ARTHUR BUTTRICK

Minister, Madison Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York

General Article

The Study of the Bible

Exposition Matthew

Exposition Luke 13-18

Exposition Philemon

ALBERT GEORGE BUTZER

Minister, Westminster Presbyterian Church, Buffalo

Exposition Numbers

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

- HENRY J. CADBURY
 Professor of Divinity, The Divinity School, Harvard University
General Article . . . The New Testament and Early Christian Literature
- GEORGE B. CAIRD
 Professor of New Testament Literature and Interpretation, McGill University
Introduction and Exegesis
 I and II Samuel
- RAYMOND CALKINS
 Minister Emeritus, First Church in Cambridge, Congregational, Cambridge, Massachusetts Exposition II Kings
- JAMES W. CLARKE
 Minister, Second Presbyterian Church, St. Louis Exposition I and II Thessalonians
- JAMES T. CLELAND
 Professor of Preaching and Preacher to the University, The Divinity School, Duke University Exposition Ruth Exposition Nahum
Exposition Zechariah 9-14
- HENRY SLOANE COFFIN
 President Emeritus, Union Theological Seminary, New York
Exposition Isaiah 40-66
- ERNEST C. COLWELL
 President, University of Chicago
General Article The Text and Ancient Versions of the New Testament
- J. HARRY COTTON
 Professor of Philosophy, Wabash College
Exposition Hebrews
- GERALD R. CRAGG
 Minister, Erskine and American United Church, Montreal Exposition Romans
- CLARENCE T. CRAIG
 Dean, Drew Theological Seminary
General Article The Teaching of Jesus: I. The Proclamation of the Kingdom
Introduction and Exegesis
 I Corinthians
- ROBERT C. DENTAN
 Professor of the Literature and Interpretation of the Old Testament, Berkeley Divinity School, New Haven
Introduction and Exegesis
 Zechariah 9-14
Introduction and Exegesis Malachi
- BURTON S. EASTON
 Professor Emeritus of Literature and Interpretation of the New Testament, General Theological Seminary
Introduction and Exegesis James
- PHILLIPS P. ELLIOTT
 Minister, First Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn Exposition Judges
- W. A. L. ELMSLIE
 Principal and Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Theology and Literature, Westminster College, Cambridge
Introduction and Exegesis
 I and II Chronicles
Exposition I and II Chronicles
- MORTON SCOTT ENSLIN
 Professor of New Testament Literature and Exegesis, Crozer Theological Seminary
General Article
 New Testament Times: II. Palestine
- HERBERT H. FARMER
 Professor of Divinity, University of Cambridge
General Article The Bible: Its Significance and Authority
- THEODORE P. FERRIS
 Rector, Trinity Church, Boston
Exposition Acts
- FLOYD V. FILSON
 Professor of New Testament Literature and History, McCormick Theological Seminary
Introduction and Exegesis
 II Corinthians
- HUGHELL E. W. FOSBROKE
 Dean Emeritus, General Theological Seminary
General Article
 The Prophetic Literature
Introduction and Exegesis Amos

CONTRIBUTORS

CHARLES T. FRITSCH

Associate Professor of Old Testament,
Princeton Theological Seminary
Introduction and Exegesis . . . Proverbs

FRED D. GEALY

Professor of New Testament Greek, Perkins School of Theology, Southern Methodist University
Introduction and Exegesis
I and II Timothy and Titus

CHARLES W. GILKEY

Dean Emeritus of the University Chapel, Professor of Preaching, University of Chicago
Exposition Ezra
Exposition Nehemiah

S. MACLEAN GILMOUR

Professor of New Testament Literature and Criticism, Queen's Theological College
Introduction and Exegesis Luke

EDGAR J. GOODSPEED

Professor Emeritus of Biblical and Patristic Greek, University of Chicago
General Article
The Canon of the New Testament

ARTHUR JOHN GOSSIP

Emeritus Professor of Christian Ethics and Practical Training, University of Glasgow Exposition John

FREDERICK C. GRANT

Professor of Biblical Theology, Union
Theological Seminary, New York
Introduction and Exegesis Mark

ROBERT M. GRANT

Professor of New Testament Language and Interpretation, School of Theology, University of the South
General Article . . The History of the Interpretation of the Bible:
I. Ancient Period

WILLIAM H. P. HATCH

Professor Emeritus of the Literature and Interpretation of the New Testament,
Episcopal Theological School
General Article . . The History of the Early Church: II. The Life of Paul

ELMER G. HOMRIGHAUSEN

Professor of Christian Education, Princeton Theological Seminary Exposition I and II Peter Exposition Jude

PAUL WAITMAN HOON

Minister, First Methodist Church, Germantown, Philadelphia
Exposition I, II, and III John

STANLEY ROMAINE HOPPER

Professor of Christian Ethics, Drew Theological Seminary
Exposition Jeremiah

LYNN HAROLD HOUGH

Sometime Dean, Drew Theological Seminary
Exposition Revelation

WILBERT F. HOWARD

Principal, Handsworth College, Birmingham
Introduction and Exegesis John

ARCHIBALD M. HUNTER

Professor of Divinity and Biblical Criticism, King's College, Aberdeen University
Introduction and Exegesis I Peter

JAMES PHILIP HYATT

Professor of Old Testament, School of Religion, Vanderbilt University
Introduction and Exegesis . . . Jeremiah

WILLIAM A. IRWIN

Professor of Old Testament Language and Literature, Perkins School of Theology, Southern Methodist University
General Article
The Literature of the Old Testament
General Article
The Wisdom Literature

ARTHUR JEFFERY

Professor of Semitic Languages, Columbia University
General Article
The Canon of the Old Testament
General Article The Text and Ancient Versions of the Old Testament
Introduction and Exegesis Daniel

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

SHERMAN E. JOHNSON
 Professor of Literature and Interpretation of the New Testament, Episcopal Theological School
Introduction and Exegesis ... Matthew

GERALD KENNEDY
 Bishop, The Methodist Church, Portland Area
Exposition Daniel

HUGH THOMSON KERR
 Pastor Emeritus, The Shadyside Presbyterian Church, Pittsburgh
Exposition Song of Songs

G. G. D. KILPATRICK Principal, The United Theological College, Montreal
Exposition Isaiah 1-39

JOHN KNOX
 Professor of New Testament, Union
 Theological Seminary, New York
Exposition Luke 7-12
Introduction and Exegesis . . Romans
Introduction and Exegesis . . Philemon

NORMAN F. LANGFORD
 The Board of Christian Education, Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.
Exposition Joel
Exposition Obadiah

ARTHUR C. LICHTENBERGER
 Bishop Coadjutor of Missouri
Exposition Esther

GANSE LITTLE Minister, Broad Street Presbyterian Church, Columbus, Ohio
Exposition II Samuel

SIDNEY LOVETT
 Chaplain of Yale University
Exposition Amos

HALFORD E. LUCCOCK
 Professor of Homiletics, The Divinity School, Yale University
Exposition Mark

G. H. C. MACGREGOR
 Professor of Divinity and Biblical Criticism, University of Glasgow
Introduction and Exegesis Acts

G. PRESTON MACLEOD
 Minister, Knox United Church, Calgary, Alberta
Exposition Colossians

JOHN MARSH
 Professor of Christian Theology, The University, Nottingham
Introduction and Exegesis . . Numbers

JOHN MAUCLINE
 Professor of Old Testament Language and Literature, University of Glasgow
Introduction and Exegesis Hosea

HERBERT G. MAY
 Professor of Old Testament Language and Literature, Graduate School of Theology, Oberlin College
Introduction and Exegesis Ezekiel

S. VERNON McCASLAND
 Professor of Religion, University of Virginia
General Article New Testament
 Times: I. The Greco-Roman World

JOHN T. McNEILL
 Professor of Church History, Union
 Theological Seminary, New York
General Article . The History of the Interpretation of the Bible: II. Medieval and Reformation Period

THEOPHILE J. MEEK
 Professor of Oriental Languages, University College, University of Toronto
Introduction and Exegesis
 Song of Songs
Introduction and Exegesis
 Lamentations

WILLIAM PIERSON MERRILL
 Pastor Emeritus, Brick Presbyterian Church, New York
Exposition Lamentations

BRUCE M. METZGER
 Associate Professor of New Testament,
 Princeton Theological Seminary
General Article
 The Language of the New Testament

NATHANIEL MICKLEM
 Principal and Professor of Dogmatic Theology, Mansfield College, Oxford
Introduction and Exegesis ... Leviticus Exposition Leviticus

CONTRIBUTORS

PAUL S. MINEAR

Professor of New Testament, Andover
Newton Theological School
General Article The History of the Early Church: III. Paul the Apostle

JAMES MUILENBURG

Professor of Hebrew and Cognate Languages, Union Theological Seminary,
New York
General Article
The History of the Religion of Israel
Introduction and Exegesis
Isaiah 40-66

JACOB M. MYERS

Professor of Old Testament, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Gettysburg
Introduction and Exegesis Judges

MORGAN P. NOYES

Minister, Central Presbyterian Church,
Montclair, New Jersey
Exposition I and II Timothy Exposition Titus

J. EDGAR PARK

President Emeritus, Wheaton College, Norton, Massachusetts
Exposition Exodus

PIERSON PARKER

Professor of New Testament, General
Theological Seminary
Exposition Deuteronomy

ALFRED M. PERRY

Professor of New Testament Language and Literature, Bangor Theological Seminary
General Article
The Growth of the Gospels

ROBERT H. PFEIFFER

Lecturer on Semitic Languages and Curator of Semitic Museum, Harvard University; Professor, Boston University School of Theology
General Article The Literature and Religion of the Apocrypha
General Article The Literature and Religion of the Pseudepigrapha

HAROLD COOKE PHILLIPS

Minister, First Baptist Church, Cleveland Exposition Hosea

EDWIN MCNEILL POTEAT

Minister, Pullen Memorial Baptist Church, Raleigh, North Carolina
Exposition Psalms 42-89

GORDON POTEAT

Minister, Tourist Church, Daytona Beach, Florida
Exposition James

ALEXANDER C. PURDY

Professor of New Testament, Hartford
Theological Seminary
Introduction and Exegesis . . . Hebrews

O. S. RANKIN

Professor of Old Testament Language,
Literature and Theology, New College,
University of Edinburgh
Introduction and Exegesis . Ecclesiastes

JAMES REID

Minister, Formerly of St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church, Eastbourne, Sussex
Exposition II Corinthians

MARTIN RIST

Professor of New Testament Literature and Interpretation, Iliff School of Theology
Introduction and Exegesis . . Revelation

THEODORE H. ROBINSON

Professor Emeritus of Semitic Languages,
University College, Cardiff
General Article . . The History of Israel

J. COERT RYLAARSDAM

Associate Professor of Old Testament
Theology, The Federated Theological Faculty of the University of Chicago
Introduction and Exegesis Exodus

WILLIAM SCARLETT

Bishop of Missouri
Exposition Jonah

PAUL SCHERER

Professor of Homiletics, Union Theological Seminary, New York
Exposition Job
Exposition Luke 19-24

ROLLAND W. SCHLOERB

Minister, Hyde Park Baptist Church,
Chicago
Exposition Proverbs

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

- JOHN C. SCHROEDER
Master, Calhoun College, Yale University
Exposition I Samuel
- J. R. P. SCLATER
Minister, Old St. Andrew's Church,
Toronto
Exposition Psalms 1-41
- ERNEST F. SCOTT
Professor Emeritus of Biblical Theology,
Union Theological Seminary, New York
General Article . . . The History of the Early Church: I. The Beginnings
Introduction and Exegesis . Philippians
- R. B. Y. SCOTT
Professor of Old Testament Language and Literature, Faculty of Divinity, McGill
University
Introduction and Exegesis Isaiah 1-39
- MASSEY H. SHEPHERD, JR.
Professor of Church History, Episcopal Theological School
General Article The History of the Early Church: IV. The Post-Apostolic Age
- HENRY HERBERT SHIRES
Bishop Suffragan of California
Exposition Deuteronomy
- JOHN SHORT
Minister, Richmond Hill Congregational Church, Bournemouth
Exposition I Corinthians
- CUTHBERT A. SIMPSON
Sub-dean and Professor of Old Testament
Literature and Interpretation, General
Theological Seminary
General Article
The Growth of the Hexateuch
Introduction and Exegesis Genesis
- JOSEPH R. SIZOO
President, New Brunswick Theological Seminary
Exposition Joshua
- JAMES D. SMART Minister, Rosedale Presbyterian Church,
Toronto
Introduction and Exegesis Jonah
- LOUISE PETTIBONE SMITH
Professor of Biblical History, Wellesley College
Introduction and Exegesis Ruth
- NORMAN H. SNAITH
Tutor in Old Testament Languages and Literature, Wesley College, Leeds
General Article
The Language of the Old Testament
Introduction and Exegesis
I and II Kings
- RALPH W. SOCKMAN
Minister, Christ Church, New York
Exposition I Kings
- THEODORE CUYLER SPEERS
Minister, Central Presbyterian Church,
New York
Exposition Zechariah 1-8
- WILLARD L. SPERRY
Dean of the Divinity School, Chairman of the Board of Preachers, Harvard University
Exposition Haggai
Exposition Malachi
- RAYMOND T. STAMM
Professor of New Testament Language, Literature and Theology, Lutheran Theological Seminary, Gettysburg
Introduction and Exegesis . . . Galatians
- ROBERT HARVEY STRACHAN
Professor Emeritus of New Testament
Language and Literature, Westminster College, Cambridge
General Article
The Gospel in the New Testament
- CHARLES L. TAYLOR, JR.
Dean and Professor of Literature and Interpretation of the Old Testament, Episcopal Theological School
Introduction and Exegesis Nahum
Introduction and Exegesis . . Habakkuk
Introduction and Exegesis . . Zephaniah
- VINCENT TAYLOR
Principal and Tutor in New Testament
Language and Literature, Wesley College, Leeds
General Article
The Life and Ministry of Jesus

CONTRIBUTORS

WILLIAM R. TAYLOR

Principal and Professor, Department of Semitics, University College, University of Toronto

Introduction and ExegesisPsalms

SAMUEL TERRIEN

Associate Professor of Old Testament, Union Theological Seminary, New York

General Article . . . The History of the Interpretation of the Bible:

III. Modern Period

Introduction and ExegesisJob

D. WINTON THOMAS

Regius Professor of Hebrew, University of Cambridge

Introduction and ExegesisHaggai

Introduction and Exegesis

Zechariah 1-8

JOHN A. THOMPSON

Professor of Old Testament Language and Exegesis, Evangelical Theological Seminary, Cairo, Egypt

Introduction and Exegesis Joel

Introduction and ExegesisObadiah

HOWARD THURMAN

Minister, The Church for the Fellowship of All Peoples, San Francisco

Exposition Habakkuk

Exposition Zephaniah

THEODORE O. WEDEL

Canon of Washington Cathedral and Warden of the College of Preachers, Washington, D.C.

Exposition Ephesians

ROBERT R. WICKS

Dean Emeritus of the University Chapel, Princeton University

ExpositionPhilippians

ALLEN WIKGREN

Associate Professor of New Testament Language and Literature, The Divinity School and Federated Theological Faculty of the University of Chicago

General ArticleThe English Bible

AMOS N. WILDER

Professor of New Testament Interpretation, Chicago Theological Seminary and Federated Theological Faculty of the University of Chicago

General ArticleThe Teaching of Jesus: II. The Sermon on the Mount

Introduction and Exegesis

I, II, and III John

ROLLAND E. WOLFE

Professor of Biblical Literature, Western Reserve University

Introduction and ExegesisMicah

G. ERNEST WRIGHT

Professor of Old Testament History and Theology, McCormick Theological Seminary

General ArticleThe Faith of Israel

Introduction and Exegesis

Deuteronomy

HOW TO USE THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

The Interpreter's Bible is a guidebook to the city of the Bible. To some readers the Bible is a foreign city: they can find in this commentary, if it is properly used, a veritable "open-sesame." To other readers the Bible is a familiar place: even they may find by means of these volumes treasures which they never dreamed were just around the corner. The Bible has towers and streets and rivers, plazas and libraries and shrines, incalculably more historic and lifegiving than any London or New York. It amply justifies a multivolume work, involving twelve years of labor by over one hundred exegetes and expositors, with a commensurate outlay of money. Justifies? Nay, requires it in every century; for the Bible offers that enrichment and fellowship which other cities promise but fail to provide. It is more than a "city of refuge": it is the home of the "beloved community" of God in Christ.

Here then is a commentary guidebook to the city of the Bible. How is the guidebook planned? How should it be used? The editors "have a concern," as the Quakers might say, that The Interpreter's Bible shall be rightfully employed, and that none of its values shall be missed. The general reader, the teacher, and the preacher of the Bible, if they understand the scheme and purpose of these volumes, can all here find unusual resource.

The Prefaces

Is it too much to ask that the Prefaces be read? In many a book the preface is more than the front door: it is both the clue to the book's intention and the story of the author's pilgrimage. The Prefaces to these volumes, though they bear two individual names, are in large degree the statement of editors and publishers. There the reader is told that this work travels by a dual directional beam, honest scholarship within the Protestant evangelical faith. Every book is written in some faith. The cult of "objectivity" would be empty even if it were possible, for only faith gives content to any study; so our editors and contributors eagerly confess, as men under a saving conviction, that God in Christ "for us men, and for our salvation, came down . . . and was made man." That faith itself demands honesty of scholarship, for the Spirit of Christ guides men's minds without coercing them, and requires that we "speak every man truth with his neighbor." The Bible is not a series of phonograph records traced on helpless human wax by a compulsive needle, but genuinely an inspiration from which new light breaks age on age under the leading of that selfsame Spirit. The Prefaces tell further how the whole work was planned, how writers were chosen, why liberty of interpretation was given them under what gentle constraints, and the rules that were followed in the arduous task of editing. So we plead, for the reader's own understanding, that the Prefaces be read.

The Working Page

A sequential reading of the whole work is probably too exacting a request. Many a reader will be a hard-pressed teacher or preacher who will turn in the Commentary to the page that bears on his immediate task. So we now write to him. The working page is in three parts. The second is pendant on the first, and the third on the other two; and the proper method of study is therefore by a downward movement of the eye.

At the top of the page, in clear type, the King James Version and the Revised Standard Version of the passage under consideration are set side by side. Comparison and contrast can thus be made almost at a glance. The King James Version is not only a devotional classic in its own enduring right, which in majestic cadence worships God in the beauty of holiness, but is so inevitably true in many of its translations as almost to have added new power to the original word. For this reason, and because it is hallowed in memory, it is placed first on each working page. The Revised Standard Version stands alongside it because, by the general consent of scholars, it is the most accurate revision of the King James Version; and one which, moreover, has been intent on preserving the priceless values of the Tyndale-King James tradition. As compared with prior translations, the Revised Standard Version has the advantage of recently discovered manuscripts such as the papyri obtained by Chester Beatty, and the further advantage of newer knowledge of the original languages such as has followed from Adolf Deissmann's brilliant deduction that the New Testament was written in koine (vernacular) Greek. Contributors have been left free to use or quote from either version. Many have turned to the Revised Standard Version because that provides the more accurate rendering. Sometimes a contributor has stressed a difference between the two versions; sometimes he has proposed a third translation. At such junctures, to conserve time and space, we have not asked him to enter into lengthy explanations. The two versions themselves, set side by side, provide the key.

Midway in the working page, immediately below the scripture passage under study, is the Exegesis. Many readers, even teachers and preachers, are prone to overlook the setting of a phrase and the exact meaning of a word. A reader who casts his eye on a line of scripture and accepts what it "seems to mean" is dealing in astrology or pre-Copernican astronomy rather than in the present wonder of heavenly truth. Truth depends, not alone on accuracy of meaning, but on its total setting—on what a word or phrase meant for its original speaker in the original time and occasion. Such neglect of meaning has become a minor scandal, for thus the Bible has been twisted to support arbitrary notions and contemporary trends:

What damned error, but some sober brow
Will bless it, and approve it with a text?

The reader will notice that the expositors in these volumes, though the editors have given them a large liberty, have based their interpretations on the Exegesis. In no other way can any interpreter "rightly" divide "the word of truth." So the editors plead for a careful and grateful use of the Exegesis. Preachers who thus "search the Scriptures" will gain more, and better, sermons than they lose.

Below the Exegesis is the Exposition. The nature and strategy of these interpretations should be understood, for otherwise their resource cannot be tapped. They are not ready-made outlines for sermons or addresses, or even homilies for general reading. Such aids, like the schoolboy's "prop," could be the defeat of knowledge rather than its enhancement; and they could make Bible teaching a poor desultory effort or a secondhand purchase. The expositions are rather "openings": they point a path rather than impose a pattern. They are not a crutch, but a spur. They hint the relevance of the Scriptures for our time and for all time, and they invite the student to "take the hint." They are not bereft of illustration, for one of the values of these volumes is that they provide both an index and a corpus of illustrative material; but even the illustrations are given not as a lift for lazy legs, but as a challenge to the reader's quest. The exegetes have been chosen for their knowledge, honesty, and reverence; the expositors have been chosen for their readiness to be true to the Exegesis and for their gift of kindling suggestion. So for the teacher the Expositions are not an ambulance but a guide. Yet the average reader will find in them, when they are coupled with the scripture text, leading in his meditations.

The Introductions

But though the average owner of these volumes may turn first, because of the necessities of his daily task, to the working page, it would be unfortunate both for him and for those whom he would teach, if he were content to stay within such limits. The Introductions to the various Bible books are an invaluable library, especially for a teacher of the Scriptures. If gathered into one volume they would give as comprehensive knowledge in that field as has ever been published in one book. They answer questions which, while unanswered, leave the working page in bondage. Here are such questions: Who wrote this book? When was it written? Where was it written? Under what conditions and in the midst of what events? The Holy Spirit does not denature a writer's personal traits or make him utterly independent of his time. He lives indeed under the aspect of eternity, for God is pleased to use him, but he is used as the servant of God in his own place and age. A writer in our time, however obedient to the divine summons, could hardly forbear any mention of communism. So Bible writers addressed themselves to the case in point, and found in contemporary events God's stern or gentle providence. The Introductions answer these inescapable questions. So a wise reader will regard the words "See Intro." as a command to be eagerly obeyed.

HOW TO USE THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

The Bible teacher in particular will find the Introductions an indispensable aid. What happenings, God's handwriting in history, brought Amos from his flocks and sycamore trees to the king's palace and the haunts of the "prophets"? What appearance did his land wear, and what culture prevailed? Amos is a partly closed book until such questions are answered. What did men believe about human suffering when Job was written, and what travail of soul gave us that sublime drama? What history, with its successive hammerings of conquest until Israel became a blood-stained anvil, provides the background for the apocalypse of Daniel? What transpirings dictated the mood under which Paul wrote the Epistle to the Romans? Who was the author of Matthew, and when was that book composed: in Jerusalem about seventy years after Jesus as scholars long supposed, or in Syria toward the turn of the first century as now appears? When such questions are answered, the prayer

O may these heavenly pages be
My ever dear delight;
And still new beauties may I see,
And still increasing light is fulfilled; and the preacher or teacher becomes "a workman that needeth not to be ashamed."

There is danger that any reader of the Bible will read it by verses. The Introductions, showing the relation of the parts to the whole, rescue him from that danger. There were no verses in the original manuscripts. Indeed in the Greek text there were no spaces between the words. The Synoptic Gospels were intended for the instruction of young beginners in the Christian faith, and were written in stories and paragraphs rather than in verses. To cite another instance: Deutero-Isaiah consists in part of "oracles"—stanza-jets of white-hot prophecy. Perhaps preachers should preach on the proper units of Scripture rather than on phrases or verses torn, sometimes with violence or disfigurement, from their context. Certainly Bible classes and congregations would be edified if the interpreter oftener expounded a whole book. Then Jonah would be seen for what it is, a stirring challenge to a missionary faith that shall make the whole world one family around the feet of God. Then Luke-Acts would be seen in its original wholeness—the deeds of the Spirit of Christ recorded in proper sequel to his deeds in the flesh.

There are two other features of the Introduction that give outstanding help. First, there is an outline immediately following the title, in which the general reader or teacher will find guidance as he studies what follows, and which provides a pondered scheme for any instruction he may wish to give. Second, there is a good bibliography at the end of each Introduction, whereby the reader may pursue further study. The Interpreter's Bible is vast in scope, comprising in all about eight million words; but it is still hardly more than a primer when compared with all that has been written on the Scriptures through the centuries. Therefore the bibliographies. The Introduction to Matthew, for instance, divides the bibliography into three parts—commentaries, other works, and books that discuss the most important ancient sources. So the editors earnestly recommend the reading of the Introductions. The man who lives only within the working page of The Interpreter's Bible is hardly better than one who knows his own house and street but is ignorant of his city.

The General Articles

Just as the Introductions provide a necessary background for the working page, so the General Articles explain and illumine the Introductions. The simile in the preceding paragraph could be extended: the man who knows his own city without knowing his nation and world would still be ignorant. Who can understand Chicago without any knowledge of the streams of immigration by which its life has been fed, or of the prairies and lakes that sustain it, or of its problems of government? But many a reader of the Bible is correspondingly ignorant of its wider setting. This hinterland of Scripture sustains it, almost as streams of immigration and the fertility of prairies maintain an American city. Take the instances. In what sense is Scripture inspired? Two articles answer that question: "The Bible: Its Significance and Authority"; and another, which is actually three articles in one, "The History of the Interpretation of the Bible." From what wider history has the Old Testament come to us? Two articles satisfy that query: "The Old Testament World" and "The Faith of Israel." The former shows the origins of the Hebrew people in the Fertile Crescent, and how their history was affected by the political and military adventures of encompassing empires; the latter provides criteria without which no reader can properly judge "the Law, the Prophets, and the Writings."

Instances regarding the New Testament could be cited with as sharp or sharper point. Perhaps Volume VII should have been entitled Mark-Matthew, and Volume VIII Luke-Acts. The editors held to the traditional order lest they be accused of iconoclasm or hankering after novelty, but the new titles might still have been justified; for sudden illumination falls on the New Testament when the reader comes to terms with the chronological order of its books—many of the epistles first, then Mark a full generation after Jesus, then Luke-Acts and Matthew after almost another generation, then John and the other books. Another wave of light breaks when the reader realizes that not the epistles only, but the Gospels also, stem from the life of the early church. So the article on "The Growth of the Gospels" and those on "The History of the Early Church" are literally and urgently a "priority"; that is to say, an indispensable asset for which other assets must, if necessity dictates, for a time be sacrificed. Any reader, student, or would-be interpreter, will find added value in the General Articles in that they also begin with a synopsis and end with a bibliography.

The articles instanced are not more valuable than the others: they are used only as example, and they would themselves be incomplete without their companion articles. This feature alone of the Commentary comprises about half a million words, a small library in itself. The order of the articles and their location, whether in Volume I or Volume VII, have been carefully pondered; and each author has been chosen for his knowledge of a particular field. Here as in a panorama pass in review the history, the tides of immigration, the world-terrain of the city of the Scriptures. If a reader is ignorant of this vast and teeming hinterland, the Scriptures may baffle rather than inspire. In New York City the name Stuyvesant Square is only a name until a man knows the early history of New York, the teeming East Side with its belts of population, the bond between the U.S.A. and Europe, barges on the Hudson carrying coal from Pennsylvania, and grain elevators fed from the harvests of North Dakota. This illustration is not invincible, for the Bible has a power of its own to pierce man's ignorance; but that power finds swifter and surer release when the Bible reader knows the background of the Book.

Maps and Indexes

The maps in The Interpreter's Bible deserve more than casual mention. They picture the word-truth of working page, Introduction, and General Article. For when the pilot of the plane says through the loud-speaker, "Such-and-such a mountain is now on our right," the passenger can say to himself, if he has a map before him, "I see where we are!" The Interpreter's Bible provides a map for almost every book of the Bible. These are in black-and white outline for clarity, and placed in proper context. Certain additional maps of the same kind have been given, such as that of Jerusalem in New Testament times, this particular map having been set just before the General Articles in Volume VII. There are also four large maps in color. On the front end-pages of the Old Testament volumes is a color map of the early Old Testament world, featuring the Fertile Crescent; and on the back end-pages of the same volumes, a map of Palestine in the middle period of Old Testament history. As for the New Testament volumes, the color map on the front end-pages shows the Eastern Mediterranean world in New Testament times, and that on the back end-pages shows Palestine in New Testament times. These color maps have been specially drawn for The Interpreter's Bible in such a way as to emphasize the land contours. The maps of Palestine are portrayed as if seen from the east, from "the wilderness beyond Jordan," because the mountains and valleys are more clearly marked when viewed from such an angle. By the help of these maps the Bible reader can say of the journey of Abraham from Ur of the Chaldees, "I see where he trekked"; and of the fateful travel of the man who "fell among thieves," he can exclaim, "I understand now how he went down from Jerusalem to Jericho!"

HOW TO USE THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

The Indexes to the twelve volumes, found in Volume XII, are designed for their practicality. They provide far more than an aid to reading memory or a ready-finder. They are a guide to topical study, whether the topic be theological, historical, or homiletic. There will be three indexes for which over three hundred and fifty pages are allotted. The first index (first in importance, though last in order) is general—so named and so planned, with every subject and name appearing in its alphabetical place, to eliminate needless shuttling from index to index; yet so implemented with subentries, repeated entries, and cross references that one can find all facets of such topics as "redemption," which instantly commend themselves for study, carefully displayed under one heading. The second index will list scripture passages referred to out of context, so that a reader studying a passage in Romans may know, for example, if that same verse has been discussed in the volume on Galatians. No attempt has been made to avoid duplication, as, for instance, in the Exegesis and Exposition of parallel passages in the Synoptic Gospels; for the editors have felt that such duplication adds value to the Commentary by giving two interpretations (to cite a case in point) rather than one of the parable of the lost sheep. The third index consists of illustrations. There is a wealth of such material in these volumes, of far better quality and far vaster scope than any "book of illustrations" has provided; and this particular index offers this wealth at quick avail.

A house in Bruges has a motto inscribed on a rafter near the front door: "There Is More Within." This brief guide to The Interpreter's Bible only echoes that motto or, at best, only summarizes some main values. The very paper on which the Commentary is printed has been chosen with costly care for its lasting whiteness, lightness, and strength; and the bindings likewise have durability corresponding to their worthy and attractive appearance. Yet these externals only hint the inner treasure, for there is hardly a page that does not lead out and on, like a Columbus voyage, into a new world.

There is only one Book. That Book is the noun; other books are but poor adjectives. God renews in this Book, age on age, his covenant with his people. For fifty or sixty years there has been, at least in the English language, no comprehensive commentary on the Holy Scriptures. Now comes this Commentary, with better manuscripts as initial resource and with better knowledge than other commentaries could have claimed. It appears at a crucial juncture in history, when (if our human eyes can judge) one age is dying, and another is being born from a "holy void."⁶² No age can safely neglect the Book, least of all an age in transition; for an age that has struck its tents and is on the move needs even more than other ages a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night. The Bible tells of Israel, the chosen people through whom God's purpose has been made known to our world; it tells of Christ, than whom there is "no other name . . . by which we must be saved." There are signs that our era is turning from ruinous doctrines of self-help to a new obedience to God's will and power, from man's exploitive skill to a trust in God's mercy in Jesus Christ. We pray that The Interpreter's Bible may hasten that turning, and prepare the way along which Christ shall come to reign in love, "King of kings, and Lord of lords."

GEORGE ARTHUR BUTTRICK

BOOK EDITOR'S PREFACE

The Interpreter's Bible is presented as the embodiment of a comprehensive Christian biblical scholarship. Eminent scholars and interpreters living in different parts of the world, but at one in their zeal for truth, have been drawn upon to contribute to this Commentary. The list of those who have had a part in its making is a roster of persons renowned for distinguished leadership in the field of biblical interpretation. To each of these contributors every encouragement has been extended by the Editorial Board, so that out of the richness of their ripened scholarship, and out of the warmth of their expositional interpretation, The Interpreter's Bible may go forth to accomplish the mission for which it was created—to interpret anew the timeless truth of God's holy Word.

It will be expected, of course, that among 125 different writers there will be a certain diversity of interpretation, not only about passages of Scripture whose meanings have always been debated, but even about "accepted" passages. It is the glory of Protestantism that each believer has the right to be guided by his own mind and conscience under God's Spirit in matters of faith and its interpretation. The Protestant principle of "the priesthood of all believers" so affirms, and thus grants to every Christian the right to hold and to declare his own sense of Christian truth, provided he keeps within the bond of corporate love and prayer. There is real merit in honestly differing points of view, granted this fundamental concern for the fellowship of believers.

This advantage has been sought in The Interpreter's Bible. Although uniformity of presentation has of course been called for, according to the general plan of the Commentary, in the interpretation itself the exegetical and expository skill of the separate contributors has been depended upon to have full play in all those ways which would make for a deeper appreciation of the sacred Word. At the same time every effort has been made to see that all interpretation be constructive and edifying, and that nothing captious or capricious appear. The writers have been encouraged to speak the truth in love by such light as God has given to their reverent and disciplined minds. Truth always has a self-evidencing power, nowhere more so than in the pages of sacred Scripture, and the overwhelming fact is not that Christian scholars and exegetes differ from each other in interpreting biblical truth, but that they so heartily agree in all its essentials.

The Bible is a book of infinite variety, and both those who would read and those who would interpret the riches of its truth must be prepared, like the scribes of old, to discover within it treasures both new and old. The thoughts of God are always wider than the measure of man's mind; but that mind, with understanding reverence, has the power given it by the Creator to read God's thoughts after him in his holy Word.

Long ago a scholarly father of the church said that the Bible ought to be read by the light of that same Spirit through whom it was written. This is true, and of all men's interpretations we must say,

They are but broken lights of thee,
And thou, O Lord, art more than they.

God abides; his Word abides; and his Holy Spirit, coming imperceptibly like the morning light or in sudden lightning flash, is the best interpreter of his Word. So from many minds and much labor and consecration this great work goes forth, in the prayer that it may redound to the glory of God and advance the cause of Christian life and truth in the world.

NOLAN B. HARMON

EDITOR'S PREFACE

For fifty years no full-scale commentary has been produced in the English language on the whole Bible. Exegetical studies on the one hand and expository aids on the other have appeared, not with a "great gulf fixed" between them, but with too little mutual concern. Both scholarship and preaching have suffered from the separation: perhaps scholarship has tended to barren erudition, and preaching to "vain imaginings"—vain because of somewhat tenuous contact with the meaning of Scripture. Preachers, teachers, and other students of the Bible need a threefold resource: namely, introduction to Scripture and the individual books, exegesis of the text, and relevant exposition. We hope not only that The Interpreter's Bible will meet this need, but that it may disclose unsuspected treasures for those who would bring forth "things new and old" from the "unsearchable riches" of the Book.

Recent decades have seen a notable increase in biblical knowledge. New manuscripts of portions of both the Old and the New Testaments have been found, of considerably earlier date than those on which the standard text had previously been based, with consequent gain both in textual study and historical criticism. Archaeology, the scrutiny of ancient papyri, and research in comparative philology and literature and religion have all thrown light on the meaning of the Scriptures. Careful and reverent investigation has dated the various books of the Bible with far greater accuracy than was formerly possible; and this new chronology has been a lamp to our feet—as witness our fresh understanding of Isaiah, or of Matthew and Luke when these Gospels are compared with their Marcan source. Study of the text, especially in the light of Deissmann's brilliant realization that the New Testament manuscripts are written in vernacular rather than in literary Greek or in some special biblical vehicle, has brought the meaning of word and phrase into sharper focus. Form criticism has helped us to see how the traditions of the Hebrew fathers, the laws of the priests, the poems of the prophets and psalmists on the one hand, and the records of the teaching of Jesus on the other, have taken form and color, perhaps inevitably, from the life-situation respectively of the Hebrew community and the first-century church—an insight that is our gain rather than our loss. Above all, present theological trends have confirmed and renewed the faith of the church in the Bible as the very Word of God. So revolutionary is this whole body of knowledge that many of the older commentaries, despite their integrity in labor, are in some regards out-of-date.

But more than scholarship is needed in a true commentary. The gospel is eternal: from age to age we may catch new accents in God's Word to men, but the Word itself is from the foundation of the world. Similarly we may trace new marvels in the realm of light, as astrology gives place to the ever-growing wonder of astronomy, but the light abides unchanging, blessing all men's eyes, shining in every lowly place, even though we may understand only that light is light. Growing knowledge about the Bible is not enough to save us, any more than bricks are enough to make a home. The Spirit of the crucified and risen Lord must dwell in the knowledge, or the knowledge itself becomes a prison. Therefore a double demand confronts every commentary on the Scriptures: first, to be true to the clearer understanding that waits on reverent study, since God always has "new light to break from his Word"; and second, to avow its unwavering fealty to God's Incarnate Word by whose forgiving grace all men live. The Interpreter's Bible earnestly desires to meet this double demand: it would be honest in the truth that makes men free, and it would cleave to the evangel of Christ born, crucified, and risen "for us men and for our salvation."

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

The name The Interpreter's Bible was chosen not only because it shows well the purpose of these volumes, but because it carries pleasing echoes of "The Interpreter's House" where Christian, in Bunyan's inspired record, learned the deeper meanings of the gospel. The editors whose names appear facing the title page of the Commentary have come from different denominational backgrounds, and the writers represent almost every branch of the Christian church. For several years they have labored on this project, with a sense of mission and in prayer. Not only has there been no difference in spirit; there has been mutual trust deepening into friendship in the grace of Christ. Thus divergences in opinion have only added zest, comradeship, and wisdom in the task.

Slowly the Commentary has grown. Thirty-six consultants, drawn from all the larger Protestant groups in the English-speaking world, helped to guide the initial steps. The titles of general articles and the subjects of maps were determined. A style book was prepared to help contributors and to give consistency in form. The total number of words in the Commentary was estimated at approximately eight million. These were allotted in carefully planned proportions to general articles, and to the introduction, exegesis, and exposition of the separate books of the Bible. The contributors were then chosen; they represent the best exegetical and expository skill of our time. Manuscripts were carefully read, in each instance by both an exegetical and an expository editor, and changes made in co-operation with the respective authors. Questions of policy, foreseen and unforeseen, were honestly faced and carefully answered. Type forms were selected for the three-part arrangement of text, exegesis, and exposition which itself resulted from the study of twenty samples. Finally the copy for the first-published volume, Matthew-Mark, was sent to the printer—the "first fruits" of long labor and unrelinquished hope.

Some further remarks on the page format may be in order, for here also the Commentary breaks new ground, in line with the editorial resolve that The Interpreter's Bible shall provide comprehensive yet quickly available help to the student and teacher. At the top of the page in parallel columns are the King James Version and the Revised Standard Version of the scripture passages under discussion, so that the differences in the two versions may instantly be seen. Below these are the exegetical comments, printed across the page, with the key phrases struck off in bolder type, like the "notes" appended to a Shakespearean text. Below these is the exposition, printed in two columns, and so written that it may give prompting and "opening" to the interpreter. Each book of the Bible is prefaced by a succinct but well-informed introduction. General articles offer similar introduction to the whole book. A wide roster of maps gives visual aid. The Hebrew, Aramaic, and Greek terms are quoted where these are needed for clarity, but their use has been held to a minimum in favor of the easier-to-understand "transliteration." We believe that the reader who does not know the original languages will find no undue obstacle. The Hebrew and Greek letter fonts have been chosen to accord with the clear and attractive Baskerville type of the English text.

The editor would be recreant in debt of gratitude should he fail to acknowledge the invaluable help of his colleagues. The associate editors have worked unflinchingly, and with such stanch friendliness that it would be hard to imagine a more kindling esprit de corps. The consulting editors not only served as judicious advisers and critics in the planning of fundamental policies but have continued to provide wise counsel and encouragement. Contributors have exercised in Christian restraint the freedom they have been gladly accorded. They have expressed individual conviction, as the editors have urged, but have honored differing convictions; and they have not only accepted, but have sought and welcomed, editorial suggestion. Thomas Nelson and Sons and the International Council of Religious Education have given outright use not only of the Revised Standard Version of the New Testament already published, but also of the earlier drafts and the final version of the Old Testament while still in preparation—an extraordinary act of co-operation which has greatly enhanced the value of the

EDITOR'S PREFACE

Commentary. Thomas Nelson and Sons have also generously granted use of their black and white maps in sufficient number to illuminate each book of the Bible. Mr. Emil Lowenstein has prepared the excellent colored "dimensional maps" for the end pages of the volumes.

Special appreciation has been earned by the publishers. They have shown as true a sense of mission as any editor or writer. They have steadfastly refused to spare expense, even though they are well aware that their great financial investment may never be returned and certainly cannot be recovered in this generation. The members of their official Board of Publication caught the vision of service to all Christendom, and authorized the project without limitation upon its cost. Dr. B. A. Whitmore and Dr. Fred D. Stone, Publishing Agents at the time of its inception, and Mr. Lovick Pierce and Dr. Roy L. Smith, their successors, have given wise counsel and direction to the whole endeavor. Dr. Nolan B. Harmon has served both as a member of the Editorial Board and in his official capacity as Editor of Abingdon-Cokesbury Press. Others should be mentioned by name: Mr. Pat Beard, manager of the Press, who has given able over-all guidance and enthusiasm; Mr. Gordon Duncan, who wrote the style book and has provided constant help in that field; the Rev. Charles L. Wallis, who is responsible for the extensive indexes appearing in the final volume; Mr. E. Sinclair Hertell, who has corrected the copy; Miss Bernice Collier, who has prepared all manuscripts for the printer and compassed the exceedingly hard task of page-setting; and Miss Elizabeth Stouffer, who has been not only secretary to the whole Board but also a competent editorial assistant. A special word of gratitude is due the printers, binders, Linotype operators, proofreaders, and others who have contributed their skill and by their eager interest become partners in the enterprise. It is difficult to believe that any endeavor could have found a more harmonious and indefatigable "task force" than The Interpreter's Bible. For the editor the experience will always be a spring of gratitude.

Surely no commentary on the Bible has appeared at a more crucial juncture in history. We live at the end of an age. Accustomed patterns in statecraft and commerce, as in the church itself, are dissolving: "The old order changeth, yielding place to new." Only dimly can any man foresee the "shape of things to come." But one truth is paramount: God has spoken once and for all in Jesus Christ. In him alone can the world cohere. Each new age will not be new, but only "chaos and old night," if it does not worship Christ as Savior and sovereign Lord. The Holy Scriptures are sun by day and stars by night in every era of man's pilgrimage. Therefore a new commentary on the Bible is both timely and indispensable, for, in every unknown tomorrow, "thy word is a lamp unto my feet." It is our ardent prayer that The Interpreter's Bible may be used of God in the travail of our times for the coming of the kingdom of his Son.

GEORGE ARTHUR BUTTRICK

ABBREVIATIONS AND EXPLANATIONS

ABBREVIATIONS

Canonical books and bibliographical terms are abbreviated according to common usage

Amer. Trans. — The Bible, An American Translation , Old Testament, ed. J. M. P. Smith	Exeg.—Exegesis Expos.—Exposition Goodspeed— The Bible, An American Translation , New Testament and Apocrypha, tr. Edgar J. Goodspeed	KJV—King James Version (1611) LXX—Septuagint Macc.—Maccabees Moffatt— The Bible, A New Translation , by James Moffatt	RSV—Revised Standard Version (1946-52) Samar.—Samaritan recension Symm.—Symmachus Targ.—Targum Test. Reuben, etc.—Testament of Reuben, and others of the Twelve Patriarchs
Apoc.—Apocrypha Aq.—Aquila ASV—American Standard Version (1901) Barn.—Epistle of Barnabas Clem.—Clement C.T.—Consonantal Text Did.—Didache Ecclus.—Ecclesiasticus ERV—English Revised Version (1881-85)	Herm. Vis., etc.—The Shepherd of Hermas: Visions, Mandates, Similitudes Ign Eph., etc.—Epistles of Ignatius to the Ephesians, Magnesians, Trallians, Romans, Philadelphians, Smyrnaeans, and Polycarp	M T.—Masoretic Text N.T.—New Testament O.T.—Old Testament Polyc. Phil.—Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians Pseudep.—Pseudepigrapha Pss. Sol.—Psalms of Solomon	Theod.—Theodotion Tob—Tobit Vulg.—Vulgate Weymouth— The New Testament in Modern Speech , by Richard Francis Weymouth Wisd. Sol.—Wisdom of Solomon

QUOTATIONS AND REFERENCES

Boldface type in Exegesis and Exposition indicates a quotation from either the King James or the Revised Standard Version of the passage under discussion. The two versions are distinguished only when attention is called to a difference between them. Readings of other versions are not in boldface type and are regularly identified.

In scripture references a letter (a, b, etc.) appended to a verse number indicates a clause within the verse; an additional Greek letter indicates a subdivision within the clause. When no book is named, the book under discussion is understood.

Arabic numbers connected by colons, as in scripture references, indicate chapters and verses in deuterocanonical and noncanonical works. For other ancient writings roman numbers indicate major divisions, arabic numbers subdivisions, these being connected by periods. For modern works a roman number and an arabic number connected by a comma indicate volume and page. Bibliographical data on a contemporary work cited by a writer may be found by consulting the first reference to the work by that writer (or the bibliography, if the writer has included one).

GREEK transliterations

α = a	ε = e	ι = i	ν = n	ρ = r	φ = ph
β = b	ζ = z	κ = k	ξ = x	σ(ς) = s	χ = ch
γ = g	η = ē	λ = l	ο = o	τ = t	ψ = ps
δ = d	θ = th	μ = m	π = p	υ = u, y	ω = ō

HEBREW AND ARAMAIC transliterations

I. HEBREW ALPHABET

א = ^o	ה = h	ט = t	מ(ם) = m	פ(ף) = p, ph	ש = s, sh
ב = b, bh	ו = w	י = y	נ(ן) = n	צ(ץ) = ç	ת = t, th
ג = g, gh	ז = z	כ(ך) = k, kh	ס = s	ק = q
ד = d, dh	ח = h	ל = l	ע = ^o	ר = r

II. MASORETIC POINTING

Pure-long	Tone-long	Short	Composite sh^owa
ַ = ā	ָ = ā	ֿ = a	ֿ = ^o
ִ = ē	ֵ = ē	ֿ = e	ֿ = ^o
ֶ = i	ַ = i	ֿ = i	ֿ = ^o
ֹ = ō	ֻ = ō	ֿ = o	ֿ = ^o
ֺ = ō		ֿ = u

NOTE: (a) The pāthah furtive is transliterated as a hateph-pāthah. (b) The simple sh^owa, when vocal, is transliterated ^o. (c) The tonic accent, which is indicated only when it occurs on a syllable other than the last, is transliterated by an acute accent over the vowel.

TABLE OF CONTENTS

VOLUME I

GENERAL ARTICLES ON THE BIBLE

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY	Herbert H. Farmer	3
THE FORMATION AND TRANSMISSION OF THE OLD TESTAMENT
THE CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT	Arthur Jeffery	32
TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT	Arthur Jeffery	46
THE FORMATION AND TRANSMISSION OF THE NEW TESTAMENT
THE CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT	Edgar J. Goodspeed	63
TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT	Ernest C. Colwell	72
THE ENGLISH BIBLE	Allen Wikgren	84
HISTORY OF THE INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE:
I. ANCIENT PERIOD	Robert M. Grant	106
II. MEDIEVAL AND REFORMATION PERIOD	John T. McNeill	115
III. MODERN PERIOD	Samuel Terrien	127
CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.	Georges Augustin Barrois	142
THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE	George Arthur Buttrick	165

GENERAL ARTICLES ON THE OLD TESTAMENT

THE BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

THE LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT	William A. Irwin	175
THE GROWTH OF THE HEXATEUCH	Cuthbert A. Simpson	185
THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE	Hughell E. W. Fosbroke	201
THE WISDOM LITERATURE	William A. Irwin	212
THE LANGUAGE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT	Norman H. Snaith	220

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

THE MEANING AND SIGNIFICANCE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD	William F. Albright ...	233
THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL	Theodore H. Robinson ..	272
THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL	James Muilenburg	292
THE FAITH OF ISRAEL	G. Ernest Wright ...	349

THE APOCRYPHA AND PSEUDEPIGRAPHA

THE LITERATURE AND RELIGION OF THE APOCRYPHA. ...	Robert H. Pfeiffer	391
THE LITERATURE AND RELIGION OF THE PSEUDEPIGRAPHA. ...	Robert H. Pfeiffer	421

THE BOOK OF GENESIS

INTRODUCTION	Cuthbert A. Simpson ..	439
EXPOSITION	Walter Russell Bowie ..	458
TEXT		465
EXEGESIS	Cuthbert A. Simpson ..	465

THE BOOK OF EXODUS

INTRODUCTION	J. Coert Rylaarsdam ...	833
EXPOSITION	J. Edgar Park	849
TEXT		851
EXEGESIS	J. Coert Rylaarsdam ...	851

MAPS

JERUSALEM IN OLD TESTAMENT TIMES		2
THE ANCIENT WORLD		174
PALESTINE—I AND II MACCABEES		390
THE WORLD OF I AND II MACCABEES		420
CANAAN		438
THE NATIONS OF THE ANCIENT WORLD		558
EGYPT AND SINAI		832

GENERAL ARTICLES

on

THE BIBLE

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

by HERBERT H. FARMER

- I. Normal or Essential Christianity
 - A. God's Action "into" History
 - B. God's Continuing Action in Christ
- II. The Essence of the Faith Harmonious with the Content and Structure of the Bible
 - A. Continuity-Discontinuity in the Old Testament
 - B. Continuity-Discontinuity Between the Old and New Testaments
 - C. Continuity-Discontinuity in the Person of Christ
- III. The Normative Function of the Bible Within the Church
 - A. The Bible as Essential to the Normative Relationship of the Living Christ to the Church
- 1. The Trustworthiness of the Gospel Records
- 2. The Gospels as Faith Documents
- 3. How Written Records Enter into Christ's Living Relationship to the Church
- B. Limits of the Canon
- IV. The Nature of the Authority of the Bible
 - A. The Authority of the Bible Not Different from That of Christ
 - B. Some Principles of Discrimination and Interpretation
 - C. The Bible as the Word of God
 - D. The Bible as the Authoritative Basis of Preaching
- V. Selected Bibliography

From the earliest period of its history the Christian church has regarded the Scriptures as being in some sense the special revelation of God, and therefore as being in some sense the final standard or norm of Christian truth. The Old Testament seems to have been accepted from the beginning as an authoritative revelation of God, and it was not very long before the writings which came ultimately to form the New Testament were also in circulation, carrying a similar, though not precisely assessed, authority. No consistent or unanimous answer has, however, been given by the church to the question in what sense exactly the Scriptures are the revelation of God and the standard of truth. This article is intended to be a contribution to the answering of this question as it confronts the Christian believer today. It is written from the angle of Christian faith and experience as these are shared and known within the fellowship of the Christian church: that is to say, it accepts as a datum the uniquely normative status which the church has always assigned to the Bible, and it endeavors to explore its meaning and bearings in relation to the Christian faith taken as a whole. In other words, the question of the Bible is here considered as a theological question; the answering of it involves raising the question as to what the Christian faith essentially is, for only on that basis can we determine the essential significance and authority of the Bible.

It is, of course, possible to approach the Bible from other angles, in relation to other interests and beliefs. The books of the Bible are so various, and cover alike in their origin and content so vast a period of time, that they provide invaluable material for the historian, the archaeologist, the anthropologist, and many others. Each of these, in using the biblical material, in effect asks and answers the question of the significance and authority of the Bible for his particular study. Such different approaches may provide important material for the Christian theologian inquiring into the significance and authority of the Bible for the Christian faith; indeed, there is no reason why the Christian theologian himself should not on occasion study the Bible, not as a theologian, but as a historian, an archaeologist, or an anthropologist. The question whether in pursuing such studies he should seek to divest himself of his Christian convictions and presuppositions we need not explore. The point is that however much the various ways of studying the Bible may interact, the special interest of the Christian theologian as such, and the one which governs this article, remains quite distinct: we raise the question of the significance and authority of the Bible as part of the wider theological question of the essence of the Christian faith which the church is commissioned to proclaim to the world.

This being the line of approach, we are immediately confronted with a difficulty. As has been said, we can determine in what sense exactly the Bible has the pre-eminent normative status in the church's life, which has always been given to it, only on the basis of our general understanding of the Christian faith. But, it may be said, if the Bible has such a status, how can we reach a general understanding of the essence of the Christian faith prior to and independently of our understanding of that status? We appear to be involved in a circle. If the Bible is the final standard, then we can know nothing for certain concerning the essentials of the Christian faith apart from it; yet if we know nothing for certain about the essentials apart from the Bible, how can we know for certain this particular "essential," namely, that the Bible is such a standard, and how can we know the right way to use it as such a standard? It is obviously no way out of the difficulty to quote the Bible itself as an authoritative witness to its own supreme normative status, for apart from the fact that it makes no claim to such a status, it is clear that even if it did, to concede the claim on the ground of its own ipse dixit would be to beg the whole question. (The statement made in II Tim. 3:16 cannot be taken as such a claim, for it gives no indication as to what exactly is meant by the words "inspired by God," or what writings are to be regarded as so inspired. Furthermore, the verse does not do more than declare that inspired scripture is "profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, and for training in righteousness"—a statement which nobody would wish to question, whatever his views on the Bible might be. To declare that certain writings are profitable, and to declare them to be in some sense a final standard or norm, are two very different things.)

The difficulty, however, is more apparent than real, and arises out of a failure to distinguish between two types of standard or norm. There are what may be called extrinsic or static norms, and there are what may be called intrinsic or organic norms. An example of the former is the measuring rod or yardstick, which exists independently of the objects it measures: it is brought to the objects, or they are brought to it, and the transaction being concluded, the two continue to exist independently. An example of the latter is the indwelling normative principle which informs a living organism, so that it grows to and is preserved in its distinctive maturity amidst the changes and challenges of its environment. An organism has within it something which can only be thought of as a kind of "spirit of the whole," which keeps all the various biochemical processes in a specific unity or balance with one another. Such a normative principle obviously has no existence apart from the organism, and the organism has no existence apart from it: the organic processes, and the normative principle which informs them and binds them into a unity, though distinguishable in thought, constitute a single, indivisible reality. A better example, for our purpose, of an intrinsic norm (better because it takes us into the realm of the personal) is that impalpable and indefinable, but very real, something which we think of as the spirit of a nation or an institution. Such a statement as "It is un-American, or un-English, to do so-and-so" (despite the deplorable misuse to which it is sometimes put) rests on the recognition of a normative factor within the national life which is really "there," impossible though it be to give it either precise definition or exact location. It is an immanent or intrinsic norm, dwelling within and informing a people in a characteristic way, and having no existence whatever apart from them. This is not to say that there are no explicit formulations of the norm to which appeal can be made when occasion demands. The laws of a people, the constitutional practice (written or unwritten) which directs the form and process of its government, its recorded history, its highest and most distinctive cultural products, especially its literature—all these are in large degree permanently and publicly accessible, just as the yardstick is. Nevertheless the norm, even in its written expression, never becomes—like the yardstick—extrinsic to the things it informs and measures, for nobody can understand it, still less rightly interpret and use it, who does not share in the spirit of the people, the esprit de corps, which it not only expresses but also creates and fosters.

The normative relation of the Bible to the faith and life of the church is clearly of the intrinsic kind. It is, we must insist, not the less a true norm for being intrinsic; indeed, it is not the less a final norm, in the sense that no question of faith or conduct can be deemed to be rightly determined which is not thought out with the Bible, as it were, being present throughout the discussion and taking a dominant and authoritative part in it. Nevertheless, what the Bible says can be rightly interpreted only by those who livingly share in the distinctively Christian life within the fellowship of the church; for this life, though it could not arise or be preserved without the Bible, always includes far more than is or ever could be contained in or expressed through a written record. These are matters which will be more fully explored in the course of this article; it is enough at the moment to insist that if we think of the Bible as exercising an intrinsically normative function within the life of the church, the difficulty about circular reasoning disappears. If it is true that we cannot rightly apprehend the essentials of the Christian faith and life without using the Bible as an authoritative source and norm, it is equally true that we cannot apprehend the Bible as such a source and norm, still less rightly use it, apart from a living participation in the church's faith and life. This is not to argue in a circle, because the Bible, in its function as norm, and the church's faith and life are organically one, and form a single, indivisible whole.

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

This suggests the plan we may follow in seeking to grasp and expound the significance and authority of the Bible. We shall start from the thought just indicated, that the Christian faith and life as manifested within and sustained by the fellowship of the church constitute an organic whole which, in spite of its many variant developments in the course of the centuries and its many aberrations from its own ideal, has persisted in a recognizably distinct form throughout—a whole in which we ourselves now share, and within which the Bible has an immanently normative place and function. The task of the Christian will then be so to expound faith that (a) it is seen to be in harmony with the actual content of the Bible itself, for clearly if what is set forth as "normal" Christianity (in the sense of being "regular or usual or not deviating from the common type") is not in harmony with what is acknowledged to be "normative" (in the sense of setting up a standard), then the unity of the organism of Christian faith and life is seriously broken; (b) the normative function of the Bible within the whole is fully preserved and explained; and (c) the way in which that normative function is to be exercised is made clear.

The plan will be to speak first of the essence of the Christian faith, and then to develop this in relation to points (a), (b), and (c) in turn.

I. Normal or Essential Christianity

The necessity of starting from the thought of the Christian faith and life within the church as an organic whole might suggest that nothing less than an exposition of the whole content of the faith is required if we are to understand the significance and authority of the Bible within it. Fortunately that is not so. Just because we are dealing with an organic whole, and are particularly interested in the normative factors within it, all that is required is a grasp of that central and controlling truth which imparts and preserves to the whole its specifically Christian character, distinguishing it once and for all from other religious "wholes," no matter what partial identities or similarities there may otherwise be.

There can hardly be division of opinion as to what this central and controlling "essence" of Christian faith and life is. It is belief in the Incarnation—the conviction that God himself came, and comes, into human history in the person of Jesus Christ. Jesus Christ is God himself in action within history "for us men and for our salvation," in a way that is unique, final, adequate, and indispensable. "There is none other name under heaven given among men, whereby we must be saved" (Acts 4:12); "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son" (John 3:16); "God was in Christ, reconciling the world unto himself" (II Cor. 5:19). There have, of course, been great differences among Christians as to the precise significance and implications of this central affirmation of the Incarnation, the grounds for making it, the way in which the divine action it describes is wrought out in men's lives; and some have interpreted it in ways that have seemed to others to be destructive of its distinctively Christian meaning. But it hardly can be questioned that unless a man is prepared to make the affirmation in some sense or other, then, no matter how much he may in fact owe to Christian teaching, or may accept and exemplify Christian moral values, any claim he may make to be a specifically Christian believer, with a specifically Christian gospel to preach, is, to say the least, extremely dubious. This is not a merely personal view; on the contrary, it is hardly more than a report of evident historical truth. However much and rightly we may dislike heresy hunting, and whatever difficulty may arise in border line cases, the fact remains that the belief in the Incarnation has been the central, distinctive, all-controlling belief of the Christian movement all down the ages; it is the heart and center of what may be called "historic" Christianity, meaning by that simply Christianity as a movement having a distinctive character and being identifiable as such, in spite of all its variant and even conflicting forms, throughout the centuries.

The statement of the dogma of the Incarnation just made—that God himself came, and comes, into human history in the person of Jesus Christ—does not, however, suffice without further explication to bring out the distinctive essence of the Christian faith as this is determinative of the significance and authority of the Bible within it. To do this we must concentrate on two things in the statement—the word "into" and the phrase "came, and comes." We shall take each in turn.

A. God's Action "into" History.—There are two ways in which the word "into" might be interpreted. These may be made plain by a somewhat fantastic illustration. Suppose that I am dropped from an airplane into the midst of a savage people, with the commission to transform their life into something very much higher, and suppose that I am given power to effect whatsoever I will. I am, as it were, a savior come down "for these men and for their salvation." How shall I go to work? I can do either of two things.

In the first place, I can, if I choose, put into operation at once the higher civilized life which I represent. Using the unlimited resources at my disposal, I can break up the tribal organization of these people, pour scorn on their traditions, prohibit their low moral codes, annihilate their primitive culture—in one gigantic upheaval and revolution pound everything to pieces and then force the pieces into the mold of my own plans and ideals. Suppose that, impossible though it is, I succeed in doing this. Is it not clear that while in one sense I have acted into their history, in another sense I have not acted into their history at all? For what I have done is to negate and annihilate their history and put something radically discontinuous and new in its place. To make what may seem a fine distinction—though it is really an important one and exactly expresses the point—my coming as their savior has been into their history, but not in and through it: it has been, as it were, down the vertical, but not along the horizontal. In a similar way, a bomb which drops from the sky and destroys my house, while in one sense it is an event in the history of the house, in another sense it is not, for it is in fact the end of the history of the house. There is "before" but no "after"; indeed, strictly speaking, there is no "before," for nothing in its previous history had anything to do with the coming of the bomb. That dropped from the skies, a bolt from the blue.

The alternative line of action has already been indicated by contrast. Instead of annihilating the tribe's whole manner of life, I may take the trouble to "get inside" it, to make myself one with it, to work from within it, to re-create it on the basis of whatsoever there is of good in it, whatsoever is usable in relation to the higher mode of life to which I am commissioned to lift it. The effect of this will be that the new mode of life, though new, will still have the impress of the tribe's own distinctive history and character upon it. It will be saving action not merely into their history, but also in and through it. There will be continuity between the new life and the old—the pattern will, so to speak, run on, the fabric will come off the loom in one piece; it will still be their history. And yet at the same time there will be radical discontinuity, for my dropping from the airplane, and all that I bring with me, will not have been anything that their previous history could have produced by itself. If I had not dropped from above, their history would have continued indefinitely on its former degraded level. There is continuity, yet also discontinuity.

To return now to the fundamental Christian affirmation of the Incarnation. The Christian faith, when it has been true to itself, has always maintained that God's saving action in Christ was along the line of the second alternative in our fantastic parallel. It was action into history in that Christ's coming was something radically new, an irruption "vertically" from above, something which, without God's deliberate intention thus personally to come among men, could not have happened, something utterly beyond the resources of human history to bring forth. On the other hand, it was also action in and through history—along the "horizontal": there was real continuity with what had gone before in the ordinary web and texture of human affairs, and with what came afterward. The Incarnation was real history, yet not merely history: there was real continuity, yet also radical discontinuity.

The phrase "when it has been true to itself," which was used at the beginning of the last paragraph, may sound somewhat question-begging. But if we allow Christianity to define itself by its own dominant historical manifestations, there can be no question that the insistence on both the "into" and the "in and through" aspects of the Incarnation—the repudiation on the one hand of any tendency to assert discontinuity at the expense of continuity, and on the other hand of any tendency to assert continuity at the expense of discontinuity—has characterized the main tradition of the faith. And this is the more clear when we realize that this main tradition has had continually to assert itself against the two opposed tendencies just referred to, both in their obvious and more subtle forms—just as in the compass the holding power of the magnetic north is most clearly evidenced by the oscillations of the needle on either side of it. Thus the distinction usually drawn between the Antiochian and the Alexandrian schools of christological thought in the early centuries obviously represents in a broad way the two sides of the antithesis. The Antiochian school tended to lay the major emphasis on the humanity of Jesus—that is, on his continuity with history. The extreme wing of this school was adoptionism, with its teaching that Jesus was merely an unusually good man in whom the divine Spirit was able to dwell in greater degree than in other men, though not in a way that was essentially different—which comes as near to denying discontinuity as is compatible with making any plausible claim to a distinctively Christian gospel of the Incarnation. The Alexandrian school tended to lay the major emphasis on the divinity of Jesus, that is, on his discontinuity with history. On the extreme wing of this school was Docetism, with its assertion that the human side of Jesus was mere "seeming," a phantasm of humanity—which comes as near denying continuity as is compatible with making any plausible claim to a distinctively Christian gospel of the Incarnation. In the end the problem defined itself (as the Formula of Chalcedon indicates) as the problem of asserting both the continuity and the discontinuity—the genuine humanity rooted in history and the genuinely divine irruption "into" history—without impairing the unity of the Savior's person. In our own day it is possible to discern the same tension between continuity and discontinuity. Labels can be very unjust to individual thinkers, but broadly speaking, the reaction of the movement associated with the name of Karl Barth, against what is vaguely called liberal Protestantism, as represented, say, by Ernst Troeltsch or Adolf von Harnack, is, especially in the realm of Christology, the vigorous reassertion of discontinuity against a too exclusive emphasis on continuity; of the "into" or "vertical" against a falsifying preoccupation with the "in and through" or "horizontal" (see below, p. 11).

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

B. God's Continuing Action in Christ.—It was said above that God came, and comes, into human history in the person of Jesus Christ. The phrase "and comes" is important.

The Christian faith affirms that God's saving action "into" and "in and through" history in Jesus Christ did not come to an end with the death of Jesus on Calvary. The action still continues. It is still going on through the church, of which Christ is the living head, and in which he is present through the Holy Spirit as the creative and constitutive principle of its being and life. There are deep theological problems involved in this affirmation, into which it is not our business to enter here; but there can be no question that this conviction of the continuing, redeeming presence of Christ in the world is axiomatic in the Christian faith and life. It is only in relation to this belief that the meaning and the centrality of the Resurrection in the Christian gospel can be understood. The essence of the Christian faith concerning the Resurrection, as it is set forth in the New Testament, is not that Christ survived death according to some general capacity for survival inherent in the human soul as such, but rather that God raised him up; that is to say, the Resurrection was part of God's mighty act of redemption to save mankind and establish his kingdom. Furthermore, it is part of the same act of redemption that Christ thus raised up has not passed into the "beyond," out of touch with men except as an inspiring memory. On the contrary, he has been raised to "God's right hand," and this means that he is now accessible, as a living, active presence mediated through the Holy Spirit, to all who give themselves to him in discipleship and faith.

We may put it like this: the Resurrection and the Ascension constitute the link between two periods in the continuous "biography" of the Redeemer—the period in which he dwelt among men in the flesh, subject to the limitations of time and space, and of which the culmination was his crucifixion and burial, and the period in which in some mysterious way he transcends those limits and becomes the unseen and living Lord and Savior of all who hear his call and seek to obey it in penitence and trust and in mutual love. It would be misleading, if natural, to say that the first period was the earthly period while the second is the heavenly, for in both the sphere of his saving work, of God's saving action in him, is human life and human history. From this point of view it is legitimate to say that the Christian church as the fellowship created and sustained in history by Christ through the Holy Spirit is the extension of the Incarnation. In this sense the church is part of the historical biography of Christ.

In the light of this understanding of the essential Christian faith we can now take up the question of the significance and authority of the Bible within the total organism of the church's life. Each of the three points (a), (b), and (c), set forth above, will be considered in turn:

II. The Essence of the Faith Harmonious with the Content and Structure of the Bible

It was said that our task must be so to understand the Christian faith that we can see it to be deeply grounded in and harmonious with the content of the Bible, for otherwise typical Christianity would not be in accord with its own acknowledged norm, and the unity of the organism of Christian faith and life would be seriously disrupted.

If then we concentrate on the central truth of the Incarnation, and in particular on its dual aspect of continuity-discontinuity, we find that this is in fact very deeply grounded in the whole structure and content of the Bible. Indeed, the Bible might be said to be built up throughout, in a way that is quite without parallel, on the continuity-discontinuity theme, the theme beginning with ancient Israel and reaching its consummation (at the same time disclosing its deep, underlying meaning) in the divine saving action in Christ. This may be expounded under three heads.

A. Continuity-Discontinuity in the Old Testament.—The picture of the people of Israel with which the Old Testament presents us through the wide variety of its contents—historical narratives, legal and liturgical codes, poetry, hymns, proverbs and maxims, utterances of great prophetic souls speaking in the name of God—is obviously the picture of a people whose life is continuous with the life of mankind generally. This is true in the first place in respect of the ordinary human nature of the persons concerned. To enter into the world of ancient Israel as it is disclosed to us in the pages of the Old Testament is to enter the same world of human actions and motives, loves and hates, passions and sins, hopes and fears, as we ourselves know: the people and the situations which confront them are recognizably “everyman” and the situation of “everyman.” This is one reason why the Old Testament can still come alive for—and speak to—the perceptive and receptive mind today; and one reason also why it can always be read, if anyone chooses, simply as great literature. In the second place, it is true in respect of the forces which play upon Israel as a nation and determine the course of its history. To understand the history of Israel it is as necessary to take note of the economic, social, political, international forces which were operating in the ancient world as it would be to understand the history of any other people of that time: we must know something of Egypt, Assyria, Babylon, Rome, of Sennacherib, Cyrus, Darius, and Alexander. The history of Israel thus takes its place in and is continuous with what may be called the wider secular history of mankind, and can be studied by the methods of ordinary historical inquiry.

On the other hand, the picture is equally, and indeed much more, the picture of a people whose life is profoundly discontinuous with the life of the rest of mankind. This profound discontinuity comes to expression in the quite distinctive religious idea and experience of “the covenant.” Covenant signifies a relationship of a personal and ethical kind which God, who has all peoples and all history in his grasp, has entered into with Israel, and with Israel alone, in order to fulfill his purpose in the world. God himself has taken the initiative in setting up this relationship, which, because it is set up with Israel only, puts that people, in respect of the forces which determine its history, in a position of radical discontinuity with the rest of the world. It is a people apart, the chosen people, marked out by God for signal honor and responsibility. By great acts of deliverance and disciplinary judgment, and through the mouths of prophets and teachers whom he inspires to interpret those acts, God calls and continually recalls the people of Israel into obedience to and trust in himself, promising them, as they respond to the call, his blessing and guidance so that they may in turn be a blessing and a guide to men. This strange, deep notion of the covenant relationship thus focuses in itself four elements which taken together form the heart and kernel of Old Testament religion: the apprehension of the one God as (a) personal, (b) actively working out a purpose in history, (c) taking the initiative in making himself known to men, so that they can in some measure co-operate with and understand his activity in history, and (d) calling a particular community into a unique relationship with himself so that it may be his agent in the world.

B. Continuity-Discontinuity Between the Old and New Testaments.—There is a second and even more deep-going continuity-discontinuity which the Bible exhibits to us: it comes into being, as it were, within the first. The covenant community of Israel, which God called out from and so made discontinuous with the rest of mankind, is set before us as failing to respond fully to that call. In varying ways and degrees, with recurrent backslidings after partial and temporary recoveries, it goes counter to the divine purpose, so that if it serves the divine purpose at all it does so very imperfectly, and then not so much as a willing agent as an unwilling, and even unwitting, instrument. Nevertheless, the divine purpose of saving the world through the elect people of Israel, being divine, cannot really be frustrated. By a new initiative in the coming of Christ, God brings into being in the midst and out of the midst of the old covenant people a new covenant people, a new Israel, to be what the old Israel had been called, but had failed, to be (except in the prayers and hopes of a remnant of elect souls): namely, the servant and medium of his redeeming purpose toward mankind—to be “a chosen race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, God’s own people,” that they might “declare the wonderful deeds of him who called [them] out of darkness into his marvelous light” (I Pet. 2:9; cf. also Exod. 19:5-6). This new divine initiative and its decisive significance are emphasized in the sharpest possible way by the break in the Bible between the Old and New Testaments. “Testament” means “covenant,” so that the Old Testament should in strictness be called the scriptures of (that is, the writings and records concerning) the old covenant, and the New Testament should be called the scriptures of (that is, the writings and records concerning) the new covenant.

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

Here, it may be repeated, is a new and even more deep-going continuity-discontinuity. Let us develop each side of the antithesis in turn.

First, the continuity: That the word "testament" or "covenant" is used of both main sections of the Bible indicates the continuity of the one with the other. It indicates that the story runs on, that the Bible throughout is concerned with essentially the same community—the covenant community, constituted as such by the redeeming purpose of God, conscious of itself as set apart in the midst of mankind, though otherwise continuous with it. This gives the Bible, despite the multiplicity and variety of its contents, and above all, despite the break between the Old and New Testaments, a singular and indiscernible unity. The New Testament writings do indeed set forth the church as the distinctively new Israel of God, the people of the new covenant, but if the main emphasis is on the word "new," that is because the unbroken continuity with what has gone before, which is implicit in the words "Israel" and "covenant," is not felt to need any emphasis. Unostentatiously and without discussion, the writers assume themselves heir to the "commonwealth of Israel" and "the covenants of promise" (Eph. 2:12).¹ The church, the new Israel, is not a substitute for the old covenant community, brought in, as it were, from elsewhere; rather it springs from the loins of the old community. It is its true heir; it carries, so to speak, its heredity; it is the evidence not of its having ceased to be, but of its unbroken and unbreakable persistence. It is all this because the divine purpose and call which laid hold of Israel in the beginning, and constituted it the covenant people for the salvation of mankind, still grasps it, only now under the form of the church.² In what then does this "newness" consist?

This brings us to the second point, the discontinuity: the "newness" of the new covenant community, according to the New Testament, is radical and manifests itself in the following main ways:

(a) It manifests itself in the way in which the covenant community is established and maintained in its relationship to God. As the New Testament writers look back on the previous history of the covenant people, they see a dense shadow lying across it—the shadow of men's sinful disobedience to God and consequent alienation from him. They see, of course, other things as well: as we have said, they assume themselves heirs to the hopes and promises of what they recognize to be a unique and glorious past, a past which has prepared the way for the coming of the Savior. But the unsolved problem of sin stands out in somber relief, for it is because of sin that the covenant people has failed to be the effective servant of the divine purpose in the world. In the new covenant relationship this problem is solved, the shadow removed, not indeed by the members of the new community being made sinless, but by their being put as sinners into an entirely new relationship to God in respect of their sin. This is brought about by God's new action in Christ. God reconciles sinful men to himself, makes them "at one" with himself through Christ, and supremely through his death at Calvary; and the new covenant community consists of men and women who are thus reconciled to him. But this is not all. The New Testament faith, as has already been said, is that Christ is the risen, living, and ever-present Lord of the new covenant community; as such he is, through the Holy Spirit, ever operative in the hearts and lives of its members. The new community lives and moves and has its being in Christ, its divine Savior and Lord, in a way that the old covenant community never lived and moved and had its being in the prophets through whom the divine word came to it. The word of God, formerly uttered by a person, has now become the living, saving person himself. (See p. 29 on the use of the phrase "the word of God" and on its application to Christ.) This is indeed a new sort of covenant, constituting a new covenant people. There is still a further point: while the new relationship to God is a community relationship, it is also a relationship of an intensely individual and personal kind between each member and God through the Savior. Repentance, forgiveness, faith, growth in Christian character, all these spring out of the living encounter with God in Christ within the innermost places of each man's heart; nevertheless—it must be reiterated at once—even as individual transactions with God they become possible only because the word of the gospel meets the believer through the new covenant community and calls him to and establishes him in its fellowship. The New Testament is at one and the same time the most individualistic and the most community-conscious book in the world, which is some evidence perhaps of the richness and adequacy of the truth it contains. (Most of this theme is contained in two key passages of scripture: Jer. 31:31-34, where the new covenant relationship is promised and its nature defined; I Cor. 11:25—see also Matt. 26:28; Mark 14:24; Luke 22:20—where the establishment of the new covenant is associated through the Last Supper with the death of Christ and the forgiveness of sins.)

¹ It is important to note that among the promises was the promise of a new covenant with Israel, so that the very newness of the church constituted a significant element in its unity and continuity with what had gone before. See Jer. 31:31-32.

² See C. H. Dodd, The Bible Today (Cambridge: University Press, 1946), ch. 1.

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

(b) The newness manifests itself in the scope of the covenant community. It is no longer a community whose membership is defined in any sense whatever in terms of race or nation; it is now defined in terms only of a man's—that is, any man's—relationship to God through Christ. It is, therefore, in principle a universal society in which every social and national boundary or cleavage is broken through. It is perhaps difficult for those reared in the Christian tradition to realize how radically new this universalism was. There are, to be sure, a number of striking utterances in the Old Testament concerning the universal mission of Israel: she is called to be the agent of the divine purpose in history toward all mankind, and through her the nations of the earth will be brought to the true knowledge and worship of the Most High.³ But the Old Testament never succeeded in universalizing the notion of the covenant community itself. That remained essentially bound up with Jewish national feeling, with the inevitable result—since national feeling, especially under the stress of national misfortune, is one of the most powerful to which men are subject—that the universalistic elements in the prophetic teaching were almost completely overriden.⁴ That the church of the New Testament broke away from this narrow nationalism, while at the same time defining itself in covenant terms and exulting in its continuity with the people of the old covenant, is a most remarkable thing, and is explicable only as the result of the impact of the transcendent personality of Jesus Christ.

(c) The newness manifests itself in the finality of the covenant community. Throughout the New Testament the conviction rules that the church is something final, conclusive, in the working out of God's purpose in the world through the covenant community. The old covenant was succeeded by the new covenant in Christ, but the latter cannot be succeeded by one still newer, and so itself in course of time become old—it is "once for all." A full explication of the finality of Christianity, such as would exclude the many possible misinterpretations of it, is beyond the scope of this article; it is sufficient to point out three things:

³ The relevant passages may be found conveniently brought together in H. H. Rowley, The Missionary Message of the Old Testament (London: The Carey Press, 1945).

⁴ See C. R. North, The Old Testament Interpretation of History (London: The Epworth Press, 1946), p. 178: "The Jews were unable to shake themselves entirely free from the principle of nationalism in religion. Even Jeremiah, for all his New Covenant oracle, did not succeed in doing that. He conceived of the future kingdom of God as somehow bound up with the restoration of His own people."

First, finality is necessarily involved in the New Testament view of the person and work of Christ. The categories applied to him cannot be used of one concerning whom the possibility can be even theoretically entertained that he might be superseded.

Second, the finality is not a completed finality. This has the sound of self-contradiction, but it does no more than express the conviction which runs throughout the New Testament, that God's action in history through Christ is not yet a completed action. It has assuredly begun in what is a radically new initiative, but the consummation of it in the fully realized kingdom of God is yet to be, "according to his purpose which he set forth in Christ as a plan for the fullness of time, to unite all things in him, things in heaven and things on earth" (Eph. 1:9-10).

Third, the finality lies in the fact that the new covenant fulfills the old covenant. It is important in this context to give the notion of fulfillment its proper meaning. It might be taken to mean simply that under the old covenant the Jews developed certain religious longings and aspirations which were never fully satisfied, but which under the new covenant were fully satisfied. Or it might be taken to mean that in course of time certain religious and theological problems or tensions emerged in the old covenant period which were not then resolved, but which were later resolved by the coming of Christ. Both these thoughts are valid and important aspects of the full notion of fulfillment as applied to the work of Christ (see p. 27). But they do not express the distinctive New Testament idea of Christ as fulfillment which is here in mind. It might be said that taken by themselves they are too anthropocentric. The primary emphasis of the New Testament is much more theocentric: that is to say, the emphasis is not so much on Christ as meeting the unsatisfied aspirations, or resolving the outstanding problems, of religious men, as on Christ fulfilling God's purpose. He is God's fulfillment before he is man's. God had planned and intended from the beginning to come in Christ; his dealings with the old covenant people from the call of Abraham onward were in pursuit of that plan and intention; the plan and intention were fulfilled when "in the fullness of time" he did in fact come in Christ. In all his dealings with the covenant people God, so to say, had Christ in mind. Christ came and died and rose again "according to the definite plan and foreknowledge of God" (Acts 2:23). "He was destined before the foundation of the world but was made manifest at the end of the times"

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

(I Pet. 1:20). In other words, there comes to expression in the New Testament idea of Christ as fulfillment the characteristic biblical thought of God as purposively active in history, and above all in the history of the covenant people. It is this that lies behind the frequent application by the New Testament writers to Christ's advent and life and death of such phrases as "according to the scriptures" or "spoken of by the prophets" or "according to the promises". There is no hint in such phrases, it is superfluous to say, of a fatalistic or mechanical necessity. Nor is there any suggestion that the Old Testament writings thus referred to resulted from some occult gift of clairvoyance in those who wrote them. The controlling thought in such phrases is, once again, the thought of God actively at work in history, and more particularly of his making his mind and purpose known, in some way and in some degree, to prophetic souls. This making known is indeed part of the working out of his purpose, for the work and witness of the prophets are part and parcel of the historic process itself. The interpretation of events that they proclaim in the name of God is itself a creative event. The phrase "in some way and in some degree" has been used because the New Testament writers offer no information as to how or to what extent the divine purpose was made known; this is because their emphasis is primarily on the fact of the divine activity in the history of the covenant people and in the witness of the prophets, preparing the way for Christ, and only secondarily on the human agents whom he chose to speak to and to use "at sundry times and in divers manners" (Heb. 1:1).

C. Continuity-Discontinuity in the Person of Christ.—What, then, is the source and ground of this radical newness in the covenant relationship which constitutes the church the new Israel of God? The answer which the New Testament gives to this question is implicit in what has just been said: the newness derives from the radical, the incommensurable, newness of Jesus Christ. The New Testament unequivocally teaches that—to repeat the words used at the beginning of this article—God himself came, and comes, in Jesus Christ in a saving self-giving and self-disclosure which are unique, final, adequate, and indispensable. The point, however, which should be emphasized here is that there is in the New Testament the clearest testimony to both the continuity and the discontinuity, both the "in and through" aspect and the "into" aspect, of the person of Christ. It is here that the continuity-discontinuity theme of the Bible reaches its profoundest depth, and at the same time its central point —that which holds together and gives a unitary meaning to the whole biblical history.

On the one hand, Jesus Christ is emphatically and unreservedly set forth as a fully human and historic individual. He is a Jew, his whole being and life rooted in, fashioned, and conditioned by the history and tradition, the distinctive religious, moral, cultural character of the Jewish people, including in this, above all, its consciousness of being called of God to a special place in his purpose. And even as the life of the Jewish community was conditioned by the wider secular events and circumstances of the time, particularly those connected with the imperial activities of Rome, so also was his life. Much of his teaching can only be fully comprehended when it is taken in the context of the Roman occupying power and of the relation of the Jews to it; his death is brought about by the co-operation of the Jewish and Roman authorities. There is a wealth of meaning in the fact that Luke dates the beginning of the active ministry of Jesus with the words "in the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, Pontius Pilate being governor of Judea, and Herod being tetrarch of Galilee, and his brother Philip tetrarch of Iturea and of the region of Trachonitis, and Lysanias the tetrarch of Abilene, Annas and Caiaphas being the high priests" (Luke 3:1-2).

On the other hand, with equal emphasis Jesus Christ is set forth as being not merely historic and human: his person and work cannot be comprehended in their essential nature simply in terms of the history of the old covenant people and of the interplay of this with the wider history of mankind. He is not even set forth as the last and greatest of the great prophets with whom had been so closely bound up, in the past, God's dealings with Israel. On the contrary, he is presented throughout as one who, by virtue of his unique and mysterious office as the Messiah, is the redeeming God himself in action to set up his kingdom, in a way for which there is, and in the nature of the case can be, no parallel. In accordance with this he is made the object of religious devotion, of utter faith and obedience, such as the writers would normally direct only to God himself.

It is hardly necessary to say that the New Testament makes no attempt to work out this paradoxical faith concerning the Jewish and human "continuity" and the divine "discontinuity" of Christ into a theoretical doctrine of his person; the deep, underlying theological problems are not raised, for example, how this religious devotion to Christ and a strict monotheism are to be reconciled. There is little in the New Testament to suggest the christological doctrines which were later wrought out in the discussions of the Greek fathers and are enshrined in the Nicene and Chalcedonian formulas. Indeed, it is perhaps a trifle misleading to describe the New Testament belief concerning Christ as a doctrine of the Incarnation, unless the word "Incarnation" is carefully interpreted to mean that Christ in his divine-earthly life was veritably a man in the wholeness of a man's being as an embodied and historic person—which was the sense in which the word was used at the beginning of this article and the sense which the phrase "became flesh" bears in the first chapter of the Fourth Gospel (John 1:13). Apart from such careful use, the word "Incarnation" is perhaps a little apt, for etymological reasons, to suggest the underlying dualism of Greek thought, with its readiness to think of the Incarnation as the ingress of a divine principle into a mortal envelope of flesh essentially alien to it. Nothing could be farther from the thought of the New Testament than that. We could keep much nearer to the New Testament thought if we had an abstract noun in English corresponding to the Greek word ἐκσάρωσις, or if we could coin a word and speak of the divine "inhumanization" or even "inhistorization," rather than of the Incarnation.

The purpose of the first main section of this article should be now evident: to show that the central Christian affirmation of the Incarnation, with its insistence that the divine action in Christ is both "in and through" and "into" history, both continuous and discontinuous with history, is intimately and indissolubly bound up with the whole distinctive content and structure of the Bible. Normal or typical Christianity is thus seen to be profoundly and organically one with what it has always asserted to be in some sense its standard and norm. By the same argument, the assertion made at the beginning, that the normative relation of the Bible to the faith and life of the church is of the intrinsic or organic kind, is illustrated and reaffirmed. The faith and life of the church as centered in God's unique action in Christ can in fact no more be torn apart from the Bible and remain their distinctive selves than a plant can be torn from the soil and remain a living plant.

The close connection between the central and distinctive Christian affirmation concerning Christ and the view taken of the Scriptures can be illustrated from the early history of the church. Thus it is significant that Marcion, who had strongly Docetist leanings (i.e., emphasized the "into" aspect of the divine action in Christ at the expense of the "in and through" aspect, the divine at the expense of the human), also rejected the Old Testament. On the other hand, the adoptionists (those who emphasized the

"in and through" aspect at the expense of the "into," the human at the expense of the divine) find their first representatives among the Ebionites, who had no awareness of the essential newness of the Christian revelation which ultimately found expression in the idea and the compilation of a New Testament. The mission of Jesus was held to be merely to purify and revive the old revelation. Thus Paul of Samosata was acutely characterized by some of the fathers as "neo-Jewish" and "Ebionitic."

Before proceeding, it may be worth while, in order to avoid misunderstanding, to emphasize that in setting forth the biblical conception of the church as the new Israel, the new covenant people, we have inevitably thought of the church in terms of its ideal as this is defined by God's intention and purpose toward it and toward mankind through Christ. That is to say, we have inevitably thought in terms of the true church, which does not necessarily coincide exactly with this or that institution in history which has in fact called itself a church or the church. There are difficult problems here with which every Christian thinker is familiar, but the line of thought which has been pursued is not really affected by them. We must believe that somewhere within the empirical and institutional churches the true church of God is always in being; and the thesis of this article is that its essential and distinctive nature, purpose, and message, and particularly the relation of these to its own acknowledged norm in the Bible, can be rightly comprehended only on the basis of what has already been said above, and along the lines of thought which we now go on to pursue.

III. The Normative Function of the Bible Within the Church

This central section of the inquiry can be begun with the statement made in connection with the phrase "and comes," namely, that the creative and constitutive principle of the church is the living Christ himself, who in all things rules and directs its faith and life through the Holy Spirit (see p. 7).

This statement clearly involves that Christ is the final and absolute authority for the faith and life of the church, and therefore for the faith and life of every individual member. To say this does not in any way depart from the truth that God is the sole absolute authority for men, but rather expresses it in its specifically Christian form; for, as we have seen, it is precisely the distinctive Christian affirmation that Christ is the personal self-manifestation of God to men. But we have also accepted as the datum of this inquiry that the Bible is in some sense the supreme standard and norm. Obviously our task is to relate these two statements, which, in their apparent assertion of two finalities, seem at first sight to be contrary. As a matter of fact, as will be seen, it is only by relating them to one another that we can rightly understand in what sense the Bible is the supreme standard and norm, and on what its authority rests. But before going on to this, it is necessary to insist on the importance of being once and for all clear that whatever place may be assigned to the Bible as standard and norm, the truth that Christ, the living Christ speaking through the Holy Spirit, is the supreme authority must not be qualified in any way whatsoever. Only by holding firmly to this truth can the essential and unique quality of the Christian faith and life be preserved. It is a faith and life centered in the person of Christ, apprehended as God himself personally and livingly encountering us and dealing with us. It is not centered in a book, as in Islam; or in a code of behavior, as in Confucianism; or in a system of philosophical or theological truth, as in Vedantic Hinduism; or in a rigidly authoritarian institution such as the Christian church in its Roman form has in large measure become. It is, of course, unhappily true that Christianity has often been set forth in a way that moves far too much in the direction of one or other of these possibilities. Thus it has been presented in a way to give the impression that it is essentially a religion of a book (as when unquestioning acceptance of the inerrancy of the Bible has been made de fide);⁵ or that it is merely a matter of living according to the ethical teaching of the New Testament, particularly of the Sermon on the Mount, other distinctive New Testament beliefs being relatively unimportant (as in some of the shallower forms of what is called liberal modernism); or that it is a matter of accepting an elaborate scheme of doctrines (as in certain forms of "scholastic" Protestantism); or, in the way already indicated, of submitting to an authoritarian institution (as in Roman Catholicism). One may venture to think, however, that the distinctive Christian relationship of personal trust in and obedience to the living Christ has usually lain within these faulty presentations and aberrations, and given them, in spite of themselves, a characteristically Christian vitality and power.

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

Let us turn now to the problem of the relation of the authority of the Bible to the authority of Christ. The position to be put forth is that we can only understand and justify the supremely normative status of the Bible within the church's life, while at the same time not qualifying in any way Christ's supreme authority, by doing two things. First, we must show that the biblical writings are indispensable to the present, living relationship of Christ to the church—the new covenant community—and its members: in other words, we must show that the normative relation of the Bible to the church is an essential part of the normative relation of the living Christ to it. The special problem here is to see how printed documents from the past can enter into a present, living, personal relationship, particularly in view of the fact that Christ himself left no written records. Second, we must show why nothing else but the Bible thus indispensably participates in the authority of the living Christ. The special problem here is to see why later writings, some of them on the highest level of inspiration, which have been produced as part of the ongoing life of the church throughout the ages, should not enter as indispensably into the living authority of Christ as those which are in the New Testament. The Roman Church maintains that they do, at least in so far as they help to form that ecclesiastical tradition which it expressly puts on a level with scripture as constituting, with the latter, the normative factors governing the authoritative and final pronouncements of the Papacy.⁶ If we reject this view, as the Protestant church has always rightly done, we must be clear why we do so, why we give only the biblical writings so unique a place. The two points will be discussed in turn.

A. The Bible as Essential to the Normative Relationship of the Living Christ to the Church.

—We can understand the way in which the Bible, as a collection of documents and records from the past, enters indispensably into the present lordship of the living Christ only in the light of our general understanding of why a historic incarnation was necessary at all to God's saving work for men. In other words, the question is fundamentally a theological one, involving our whole doctrine of salvation, which in turn involves the doctrine of God, of man, of sin—in short, of the whole organism of Christian truth. The close connection between our view of the Bible and our view of salvation can be seen by reflecting that to assert the necessity for a historic incarnation is not the same thing as to assert the necessity for trustworthy records concerning it. One might hold a doctrine of salvation which established or presupposed the necessity for a historic incarnation, but which made superfluous a trustworthy record of the events associated with it: all that would be required on such a view would be credible witness of the bare fact that such incarnation had taken place. There have been doctrines of Christ's saving work of this type. Thus the view which finds expression in the writings of some of the Greek fathers, that the essence of Christ's saving work was that he introduced the divine, incorruptible life into the corrupt and perishing body of humanity, and that our benefiting from that work takes place through participation in the sacraments, while obviously asserting the necessity of the Incarnation, leaves no indispensable place for a collection of records like the Bible. Similarly, certain types of substitutionary views of Christ's saving work (particularly when the view is elaborated into a scheme of soteriological doctrine which every man must believe in order to be saved) do not seem indispensably to involve the sort of records we have in the Bible. The clearest example is once again afforded by the Roman Church, which makes the saving process rest essentially on a man's committing himself to the whole hierarchical and dogmatic system of the church in an act of fides implicita, or, as Luther dubbed it, "blind faith." In accordance with this, the Roman Church has not only never given the biblical records an indispensable place in its understanding of the work of Christ, but has also on the whole discouraged its lay members from acquiring knowledge of them.

⁵ Cf. William Chillingworth's famous dictum, "The Bible alone is the religion of Protestants."

⁶ See the decree concerning the canonical Scriptures in "The Canons and Decrees of the Council of Trent" in Philip Schaff, Creeds of Christendom (New York: Harper & Bros., 1877), II, 79. In practice, as has often been remarked, the Roman Church sets tradition above scripture as the authoritative source of truth, for scripture is acknowledged to require interpretation and exposition, whereas the teaching of the church concerning their interpretation and exposition is infallible and irreformable (that is, never to be examined in the light of Scripture itself). See "Dogmatic Decrees of the Vatican Council," 1870, ibid., II, 271.

If, however, we so understand God's saving work through Christ that it requires as an indispensable element in it the encounter, continually re-enacted, with the concrete individuality of the historic Savior, then we can see at once why the biblical documents become an indispensable factor in Christ's living relationship to the church. For without the Bible such encounter could not take place. It is obviously not possible fully to elaborate in this article such an account of the saving work of Christ; all that is possible, and indeed all that is necessary for our purpose, is to summarize what has been set forth elsewhere.⁷

The main point is what may be called the "radical personalism" of the Christian message, a personalism which is itself in profoundest harmony with the biblical revelation. According to this radical personalism, the essential nature of man consists in the fact that God has made him a finite person in order that he may enjoy personal fellowship with God and with other finite persons. It is this purpose of God which has brought the process of what we call "history" into being, for history is but another name for the sphere in which finite persons can live freely as persons, the sphere, that is to say, in which their decisions and deeds can have real significance either as co-operative with or as opposed to God's purpose for them and through them. Sin, on account of which God's saving action in Christ is made necessary, has to do with this profound relationship to God which lies at the root of man's whole distinctive nature as a personal being. By the word "sin" we indicate the fact that men have rejected and do reject God's claim upon them for their obedience and trust, and the claim of their fellows upon them for their love, this latter claim being itself part of God's claim. Men are able to make this rejection because in such a personal world there is real freedom; without such freedom to reject claims it would not be a personal world. Because sin has thus to do with the ultimate core and basis of man's distinctively personal life, its effects upon the personality are disastrous and inevitable. The worst and most disabling effect is blindness. Men become increasingly unable to see the truth concerning themselves, to discern the true meaning and direction of their life, and of history generally; they become increasingly unable to know what God's will for them and claim upon them are, and indeed to know that there is a personal God at all, still less one who may be joyfully obeyed and trusted. This is the worst and most disabling effect of sin because it is precisely the prerogative of a personal being to walk in freedom according to the light of truth within his own soul. It follows from this that only as the blindness is being continuously healed, only as a man is brought again and again to the light and kept in the light, can the evil of his sin-corrupted existence even begin to be set right. And by the same argument a man cannot cure his own blindness, for to cure it he would first require the capacity to see the truth about God and about himself which his blindness now denies him. If God does not act in a way that is effectively revealing, effectively healing of his blindness, there is no hope.

⁷ Herbert H. Farmer, God and Men (New York and Nashville: Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1947), chs. iii-iv.

All this indicates the conditions which the divine saving action in relation to sin, if it was to be effective, had to fulfill. It had to be action which lays bare to men the real nature of the personal—that is, the historical—world, in such a way that their blindness is overcome. Yet this must not be in a way that coerces and overrides their minds, for if it did that it would be false to the real nature of the personal world, and so far from unveiling it, would obscure it. It must be effective, yet not overriding—not overriding, precisely in order to be a truly effective way of dealing with men as persons.

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

It is difficult, to say the least, to see how a saving disclosure of the truth of the kind just indicated could take any form other than that which Christianity affirms it did in fact take in Christ, the form, that is, of a full and concrete embodiment in a human personal life, lived in the midst of, and confronting men in the midst of, those very events and relationships which constitute their historical existence as persons. Only thus could it deal with the corruption and darkness which sin causes, and only thus could it remain true to the personal world by continuously evoking in men a new inward perception and response. In particular, it was most necessary that it should thus confront us in the midst of and in closest relationship with human existence as corrupted and darkened and embittered by sin, for it is in the midst of human existence as thus corrupted and darkened and embittered that the saved man has to live the new life into which he is called, and for which he is empowered by God. Certainly the mere announcement of general truths or doctrines concerning the nature of God and his purpose for men, or concerning sin, could not effect these things, even if uttered with power and eloquence by some prophetic personality.

To suppose that it could—to suppose that it could be anything more than a merely ameliorative factor—would be to show a very inadequate grasp both of the nature of personality and of the effects of sin upon it. General truths cannot get right inside men, so to speak, and continue to get right inside them, in their sinful state and situation—challenging the will, stirring the deep springs of feeling, breaking up the obstinate resistances of pride and self-justification; general truths cannot pierce the hard crusts of egotism, with its fears and hates and insincerities, and when the crust reforms, pierce it again, letting in the light and again letting in the light, bringing men again and again to a true and deep penitence, making credible a divine pardon which will neither indulge nor yet be turned aside by their sinfulness. Only truth in unclouded personal embodiment and action, encountering and challenging men in the actual historical situations which are the real stuff of their personal existence, can work real redemption.

It is hardly necessary to point out that what has just been said is not offered as a full statement of the doctrine of our redemption by Christ. It is meant only to set forth a basic general principle which must underlie all our understanding of Christ's saving and sanctifying work, and which is especially relevant to the problem under discussion. The point is that if this general principle is valid, it makes clear why an encounter, continually renewed, with the concrete individuality of the historic Christ is an indispensable factor in his present relationship to the church and to its individual members. Furthermore, it makes clear why a historical record is indispensable also, for without a historical record such an encounter could not take place.

We may reach the same truth from a different angle. We have spoken of the risen and living Christ directing the faith and life of the church and of its members through the Holy Spirit. The significance of this statement, however, both theologically and for the Christian life, depends on the content we give to the term Christ: it depends on whether we can give it a content which differentiates it significantly from the meaning which we attach to the term Holy Spirit. If we mean by the living Christ merely the Spirit of God conceived as working for the realization of certain values vaguely called Christian, or even more vaguely called spiritual, then the proposition that Christ rules through the Holy Spirit becomes the meaningless tautology that the Spirit rules through the Spirit. Furthermore, it becomes all too easy, as experience shows, for the religious life to run out into a sentimental nebulosity, lacking all positive direction and drive, or else, if it achieves positive direction, to do so by becoming an unchecked individualism for whose merely private "hunches" the authority of the Spirit's leading is claimed. But if we mean by Christ as risen and living the same Christ as he who meets us in the pages of the Gospels, with all the sharp personal characterization and definition of concrete historic existence, then to say that Christ rules through the Holy Spirit is to say something highly significant. For on the one hand, the Spirit takes on the character of Christ, and so ceases to be merely a vague divine principle dimly conceived as indwelling human nature and lending sanction to any strong impulsion from the subconscious regions of the personality; and on the other hand, the rule of Christ becomes a truly personal rule operating through the quickened insight of the believer in relation to his personal situation, and not through a merely slavish imitation of or legalistic obedience to the deeds and words of Christ as recorded in the Gospels. The Spirit takes of the things of Christ and shows them to us, and the fruits of the Spirit are the virtues of Christ. But this means that there has to be a Christ—a historic Christ—for the Spirit to show us; and that in turn means that there has to be a historical record.

The argument so far might seem only to demonstrate the indispensability of the Gospels to Christ's saving and ruling presence in the church. But in view of all that has been maintained throughout this article concerning the divine action in Christ, it is clear that the gospel records of the life of the Redeemer could not possibly suffice by themselves to present us with the whole content and full import of that action. To suppose that they could would be to fail to give proper weight to that "in and through" or "continuity" aspect of the divine action which is essential to a truly historic incarnation and revelation. It would also be to display ignorance of the gospel records themselves, for it does not require much study of the Gospels to see that they cannot be understood apart from what went before in the history of the old covenant people, as set before us in the Old Testament, and apart from what came after in the coming into existence of the new covenant community, as set before us in the documents of the New Testament other than the Gospels. Once we grant the necessity of the gospel records to God's dealings with us through Christ, we grant in principle the necessity of more than just those records; we grant the necessity of a whole Bible. At the moment I say no more than "a" whole Bible, for the question of the limits of the canon of scripture is yet to be discussed. But, with that reservation, Luther's dictum stands, "the Bible is the manger in which Christ is laid."

There is, however, a latent assumption in the position which has been laid down which raises serious difficulties, and which therefore we must examine with some care. The assumption is that the Gospels are in fact such records that when we read them we can be sure that we are encountering the actual historic person of whom they claim to give an account. There was a time when this was not felt to be an assumption, for most Christians accepted without any question the doctrine of the inerrancy of the scripture writings. It was believed that God had so operated on the minds of the sacred writers that they did not write down anything which was not strictly accurate in every particular. Whatever was set down in the Gospels actually happened as therein set down. This is no longer a tenable view. It is untenable for two reasons.

The first has to do, once again, with the central Christian assertion of the Incarnation. A completely inerrant record could have been produced only if God had suspended the normal processes of memory and composition in the minds of the writers, and used the latter not as co-operating human persons, but as passive instruments like a pen. But to suppose that such a diminution of the full humanity of the evangelists was necessary to the working out of God's saving purpose in Christ is to deny the full historic humanity of the Savior himself: it is to deny the "in and through" aspect of God's action, and so is a partial denial of the Incarnation. For to assert the full humanity of Christ is to assert the full humanity of all the conditions affecting human life under which and in the midst of which he lived and died, under which he effected, and effects, his saving work. Among such conditions must be included the normal mental processes, both of those who kept company with him and whose memory made the writing of the Gospels possible, and of those who actually wrote the Gospels. This is not to deny that God gave these men guidance and inspiration in their work; it is merely to assert that the guidance and inspiration were given without impairing their full humanity as persons, and without setting up supernatural infallibilities in the midst of mankind—a truth far more honoring to the wisdom and patience of God than a statement like that of the Lutheran theologian Quenstedt to the effect that there is in Canonical Scripture no untruth, no falsity, no error, not even in the smallest particular, either in deed or word; but all and everything contained in it is of the highest possible truth, whether it be a matter of Dogma, Morals, History, Chronology, Topography, or Nomenclature. And no ignorance, no lack of thought, no forgetfulness, nor lapse of memory, either can or ought to be attributed to the amanuenses of the Holy Spirit in their recording of the sacred text.⁸

The second reason has to do with the evidence afforded by the Gospels themselves, and calls for fuller treatment. Scholarly research into the Gospels has convincingly shown that they cannot be accepted in detail as they stand. The evidence is clear that they contain inaccuracies, inconsistencies, interpolations, omissions, overstatements, and so forth—in short, precisely the sort of thing that normal mental processes produce. Moreover, it has become clear that the Gospels were written from the angle of an overmastering religious faith in Christ as the Savior sent from God; indeed, they were intended to convey that faith, and they were not composed as biographies in the modern sense. This immediately raises the question whether we must not allow for the possibility that this faith has colored and distorted the historical facts which the Gospels purport to describe. Where facts and interpretations of facts by religious faith are so inextricably bound up together, ⁸ Quoted by H. F. D. Sparks, The Old Testament in the Christian Church (London: Student Christian Movement Press, 1944), p. 18.

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

how can we have any assurance concerning the facts?

Before taking up these two sources of doubt, it will be worth while to digress for a moment to insist that the work of critical scholarship on the Gospels to which reference has just been made has no necessary connection with a certain view which has been characteristic of some schools of liberal thought. This is the view which rejects forthwith some elements in the Gospels (particularly the miraculous elements) on the basis of the alleged inescapable requirements of sound philosophy and sound science. It is not necessary to discuss these alleged inescapable requirements here; it is enough to state that not many competent authorities in this sphere of philosophical and theological thought would now find them anything like so inescapable as they have been asserted by some to be. Rather, it has come to be recognized that the rejection of the miraculous elements in the Gospels on this particular basis was a much too hasty surrender of the biblical and Christian outlook to what has proved to be in large measure merely a prevailing fashion of thought.⁹ Nevertheless, to admit, as we must, the general possibility and the historical actuality of the "mighty works" of Jesus does not commit us to the acceptance of every particular in the gospel account of them. There may be other reasons—as in some cases there certainly are—for rejection, or at least hesitation; reasons which arise out of that close and reverent study of the documents themselves which is demanded from us by the Christian faith in God's saving action "in and through" history. For as T. W. Manson has well said, this faith means "that history takes on a new significance, that the outstanding events in which the voice of God has been heard, or his hand discerned, must be studied with the same passion for accuracy that the scientist gives to a chemical analysis"¹⁰—though, it may be well to add, not by the same methods or on the same presuppositions. In biblical study we are now in a "postliberal" period, but we can never pass into a "postcritical" one, for the obligation to use every resource of scholarship upon our documents in order to know, so far as we are able, what really did happen, springs, it must be repeated, from the nature of the gospel itself as a gospel of God's action in history.¹¹

Let us return now to the two causes of doubt

⁹ See below, p. 26. For a general discussion of miracles in relation to science, see Herbert H. Farmer, The World and God (New York: Harper & Bros., 1935).

¹⁰ "The Failure of Liberalism to Interpret the Bible as the Word of God," in The Interpretation of the Bible, ed. C. W. Dugmore (London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1944), p. 104.

¹¹ See Dodd, The Bible Today, p. 26.

above mentioned concerning the capacity of the Gospels to confront us with the historic person of Jesus.

1. The Trustworthiness of the Gospel Records.—With regard to the first cause of doubt it can be said that the fact that critical scholarship lays bare in the Gospels as they stand a number of inconsistencies, inaccuracies, and so forth, is not able by itself to support the conclusion suggested, namely, that we cannot arrive at assured knowledge of the historical facts. It does not do more than define the task with which reverent critical scholarship is confronted, a hard enough task, to be sure, and one which requires the full and responsible use of all the resources available, but not a task which is foredoomed to failure. On the contrary, if we share the Christian faith about Christ, we are entitled to believe that since it is a task which God has laid upon us through the inevitable developments of scholarship, it is destined to succeed. There is no reason to think that the Holy Spirit does not take the things of Christ and show them to scholars as much as to other believers.¹² In any case, the question of success or failure must not be prejudged: it must be decided by the outcome of the enterprise itself. At this point, however, we are met by the allegation made by some that the outcome is already clear enough, that so soon as we surrender belief in the absolute trustworthiness of the gospel records, and begin to try, by methods of critical research, to establish what "really happened," we find ourselves lost in a quagmire of conflicting suggestions and theories. Every critical scholar, it is said, creates his own picture of Jesus and of the events of his life, selecting his material according to his own fancy, accepting this, rejecting that, explaining away something else, as his own sense of "what must have happened" may dictate. The real Jesus vanishes behind a cloud of conflicting theories and suppositions. The answer to this allegation is simply that it is not true, or in so far as it is true, it is true with the crucial qualification that it is so in the main only of those pictures of Jesus set forth by unbelieving and frequently not very well-equipped critics. Those who for one reason or another desire to retain the old view of the literal inerrancy and absolute trustworthiness of the records are always inclined to exaggerate the extent to which the modern critical study of the Gospels undertaken by Christian scholars has issued only in the multiplication of perplexities. In some ways the exact reverse is true. A fuller, more concrete, more consistent, and historically more credible portrait of Jesus than has been possible hitherto is now available to us, mainly as the result of the researches of modern scholars. To be sure, there is always a certain fluidity in the picture: it changes as this or that line of inquiry is pursued, this or that hypothesis is put forward, discussed, tested, modified, partially rejected, partially accepted and incorporated in the picture which is being formed; nevertheless, it remains substantially and recognizably the picture of the same transcendent Person. The process might be compared to the changes which pass over a landscape as the clouds float across the sky; the light falls first here, then there, partially obscuring, partially revealing, yet always disclosing the same landscape and its loveliness. In the oft-quoted words of Browning:

¹² See below, p. 18, about the value for the Christian life of the questions raised by modern research into the Gospels.

That one Face, far from vanish, rather grows,
Or decomposes but to recompose,
Become my universe that feels and knows.¹³

It may indeed be maintained, as it was years ago by Wilhelm Herrmann, that in so far as historical research raises questions as to what exactly happened in the earthly life of Jesus Christ, it does a real service to the Christian faith. It serves to shake the Christian again and again out of what Herrmann calls "the lazy acquiescence of the natural man," and to guard him against being arrested in some supposedly final resting place in his knowledge of God through Christ. Herrmann writes:

Historical work on the New Testament . . . destroys certain false props of faith, and that is a great gain. The Christian who imagines that the reliability of the records as historical documents gives certainty to his faith, is duly startled from his false repose by the work of the historian, which ought to make it clear to such a man that the possession of Christianity cannot be obtained so cheaply as he thinks.¹⁴

Furthermore, the fact that historical research is always raising questions about Jesus Christ continually compels the church and the individual believer to explore afresh the significance of Jesus Christ, continually compels us to ask ourselves whether we are really grasping "what He was, what He stood for, what He said, did and suffered," whether we are really entering into the riches which are offered us in him. A good example of this kind of service is the way in which many at the beginning of the twentieth century, who were inclined to settle down too easily in the liberal view of Jesus as a supreme teacher and exemplar of the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man and as such taking his place in the continuous upward "progress" of mankind to better things, were shaken out of that position by the work of scholars such as Johannes Weiss, Albert Schweitzer, and Alfred Loisy, who compelled attention to the dominant place of eschatological belief in the Gospels and in the New Testament generally. In view of all this, it is wrong to regard the tension between Christian faith and historical research as a burden of which, if it were possible, we would rather be relieved. On the contrary, one may think rather that it is of the good providence of God that the Gospels have come down to us in their present form, requiring ever-renewed study and exploration.

¹³ "Epilogue: Dramatis Personae"; cf. C. H. Dodd, History and the Gospel (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1938), ch. iii. Having discussed the various groups of material, as reconstructed by form criticism, which have gone to the making of the Gospels, Dodd concludes: "They do set Jesus before us as a clear-cut Figure in word and action. And although the points of view differ, we cannot avoid the impression that it is the same picture that we are seeing from them all" (p. 92). Again: "In the fourth decade of the first century the Christian Church grew up around a central tradition, which, however it is expressed—in preaching, in story, in teaching and in liturgical practice—yields a coherent picture of Jesus Christ, what He was, what He stood for, what He said, did and suffered" (p. 110).

¹⁴ The Communion of the Christian with God, tr. J. Sandys Stanton (2nd ed.; London: Williams & Norgate, 1906), pp. 76-77.

2. The Gospels as Faith Documents.—The second source of difficulty proves on examination to be of no greater weight, though it looks at first sight very formidable. The suggestion is that it is impossible for us to encounter the historic Jesus when we read the Gospels, because we have in them an account written from the angle of faith in him: that is to say, we are presented (so it is alleged) not with the facts as such, but with a religious interpretation of them, an interpretation which may well lead in places to distortion and misrepresentation.

In reply to this allegation it is necessary to consider whether there does not lurk behind it an untenable theory of knowledge. The error is to suppose that if we are really to get to know a reality of any sort, then we must somehow get to know it "in and for itself" as bare fact, that is, out of relation to the impression it makes upon us or upon anybody else. Thus—to take an example from another sphere—it is supposed, on this view, that when I look at a rose, the color, fragrance, and beauty of it are merely impressions in my mind which the rose causes, but which are not aspects of its essential being. The impressions are a sort of curtain behind which the real rose—the "rose in itself"—remains hidden. In so far as the real rose is pictured at all, it is pictured as merely a source of energy which, radiating from it, causes vibratory impulses to run up the nerves to the brain cells, where they are transformed into sensory and aesthetic impressions. The latter, however, are "no more like the real rose than the knock on the door is like the postman." It is out of place here to discuss this phenomenalist theory of knowledge: its deficiencies have often enough been discussed by the philosophers. It is sufficient to make the obvious point which this theory involves, that we cannot really know any object at all, for obviously we cannot know an object unless it makes some impact upon us; yet on this view, directly it makes such an impact, it goes into hiding, so to speak, behind it. It is much more satisfactory to suppose (as we do normally suppose) that it is the real rose which is given to us in its color, shape, scent, and beauty. It is part of the reality of the object we call a rose that it is in a world along with conscious minds which are in rapport with their world through a nervous system, and that when it encounters such minds it offers itself, as it were, to them as color, shape, scent, and beauty. It does not hide behind these, but rather completes itself in them, discloses its reality and significance through them.

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

Now a similar and equally unsatisfactory theory of knowledge may lie behind the notion we are considering, namely, that since we have in the Gospels a report and interpretation of Jesus and of the events of his life, written down by those who had a profound religious faith concerning him, therefore the real, historic facts are inaccessible to us. We are asked, in effect, to suppose that there was a Jesus "in and for himself" independently of the relations he entered into with other people and the impact he made upon them, and that this, and this alone, was the "real" Jesus. But the truth is that there are no persons "in and for themselves." To be a person in history is to be in relation with other persons, to act and react with them in a continuous interplay of reciprocal meanings, valuations, and interpretations. And the "reality" of a person can in greater or less degree be truly known through these relationships: he discloses himself, gives himself to others, through thus meeting with them. If he cannot be so known, then he cannot be known as a person at all. By the same argument, there are in history no such things as bare facts or events, for history is the sphere of persons in relationship with one another, and events, in so far as they are factors in history, and not merely in impersonal nature, are all events having meaning to, and interpreted by, persons. There is therefore no reason to think that because in the Gospels we are presented with an account of Jesus as he entered into the religious faith of men and women with whom he had the closest personal relationships, that we cannot encounter his historical reality through that account. If we do so suppose, it can only be on grounds which make it impossible to know the world of history at all, either in the past or in the present; and the labors of historians, in so far as they go beyond the merely external cataloguing of dates, become a perpetual chasing of what can never be attained.

It may be said, however, that even if all this is granted, the interpretation of Jesus that lies behind and within the Gospels and the New Testament generally may, for all we know, be false and distortingly imposed upon the facts, so that while it cannot be denied that we may know the real Jesus through them, nevertheless we can never be sure that we do. The answer to this is to point out that it has never been maintained by the Christian faith that it is possible to know with growingly unassailable conviction the reality of Jesus as he is apprehended by that faith merely by reading and studying the Gospels and the New Testament in a completely detached way, if indeed that is ever possible. It is part of the faith that a transcendent factor is involved, namely, the risen Christ working through the Holy Spirit in the Christian community. All we have been concerned to show is that if it is true, as we have maintained it to be, that it is an essential part of Christ's work for us that we should encounter and continually re-encounter him in his historic self-manifestation, then the difficulty which some feel that we cannot so encounter him because of the nature of the records is not a reasonable one, for it rests on very questionable epistemological presuppositions. It is clear, indeed, that if the Christian faith is valid and Christ does in fact have the transcendent significance claimed for him, then only an account written from the angle of that faith could convey a historically trustworthy impression of him. Furthermore, this impression will not be nullified by the fact that doubtfully accurate statements enter here and there into the account—the total impact of the man Jesus Christ, as he evokes and sustains faith in himself, will still remain unimpaired. On the other hand, even if the Christian faith were false, it would still not follow that because the Gospels are written from the angle of such a mistaken belief, they therefore cannot convey to us a good deal of the real historic quality of Christ's personality and life. For this at least we know for certain, that Jesus Christ was the historic person who evoked that faith. Nothing can alter that remarkable fact and all that has flowed from it; and no study of Jesus Christ which claims to be historically grounded, but which does not earnestly seek to do justice to that fact, is worth consideration. In that fact more than in any other the real Jesus is disclosed. It is at this point that many studies of Jesus Christ made by skeptical minds fail, and must be judged unscientific. They seek to appraise the story of Jesus without giving due weight to the faith he evoked and to the Christian movement which sprang from him. It may be stated as a definite principle for the study of the Gospels that those reconstructions of the life of Jesus Christ, which, if true, would leave the Christian movement and its faith, as it were, in mid-air, must be false.

This leads to a word on the question of how written records from the past, or rather the reading and exposition of them, can be taken up into, and share in, Christ's present living and ruling relationship to the church.

3. How Written Records Enter into Christ's Living Relationship to the Church.—It might be considered sufficient answer to the question to say, as has already been implied, that it is the work of the Holy Spirit to bring this about; but to say that and nothing more carries perhaps too much the suggestion of a merely incomprehensible and miraculous tour de force. We get a little light on the matter by looking at it from the angle of the whole Christian faith concerning Christ, even though in the last analysis the way of the Spirit's working must remain a mystery. To look at it from this angle has the further advantage of enabling us to see once again how the significance and authority of the Bible are inseparably bound up with the whole organism of Christian faith and experience, and cannot rightly be understood apart from it.

If the Christian faith concerning Christ is true, then he stands in his historical and human self-manifestation, despite the ever-lengthening interval between that manifestation and those who come after him, in a peculiarly deep relationship of contemporaneousness to all men. This is true in three ways:

In the first place, if the Christian faith concerning him is valid, then the Christ who encounters us in the pages of the New Testament, while he has the concrete individuality of historic personality, is the true universal of human nature. We implicitly recognize this in the way in which we believe it to be possible and desirable for any man to be Christlike without losing his distinctive individuality. This means that Christ is profoundly and uniquely related to the inner being of every man in every age. He is the realization in concrete, historical reality of that norm which God made constitutive of human nature when he created man, and which, though it is frustrated and perverted by sin, can never be entirely destroyed.

In the second place, if the Christian faith concerning him is valid, the Christ who meets us in the pages of the New Testament, being the Incarnation of the very nature and purpose of the personal God, is profoundly and uniquely related to the outward environment of all men, particularly the environment of personal relationships which constitutes what we call history. The ultimate reality with which men have to deal in their present situations and tasks is a personal order, deriving its essential nature and meaning from a personal divine will whose character and direction are manifested fully in the person of Christ. Christ is, as it were, a clear and focused, a "concreted," revelation of that of which the historical existence of men—life as they have every day to live it and meet it—is a clouded and distorted one.

These first two points might be expressed together by saying that Christ is every man's contemporary because the whole of reality, particularly in its relation to the world of persons—both in its inward and its outward manifestations—is Christ-grained, Christ-patterned (John 1:1-18; Col. 1:15-19).

In the third place, if the Christian faith concerning him is valid, Christ is men's contemporary, not merely because he is the expression in concrete individuality of the "essence" of man and of the personal order, but also because he is a living, personal purpose and presence who, through the Holy Spirit, is seeking actively and personally now to encounter men and claim them.

All these aspects of what has been called the contemporaneousness of Christ, which are implicit in the Christian faith concerning him, shed at least a little light on the way in which the Gospels and the New Testament cease to be "dead" and "dated" documents from the past, and become part of the present saving ministry of the Redeemer. It is not a question of leaping over a gap of almost two thousand years out of Britain or the United States of today into first-century Palestine, and sitting at the feet of one who, however impressive, is alien to us. That would be the situation if Jesus were an ordinary man with no unique significance. But it is the Christian faith and experience that he is not an ordinary man: rather, there is incarnate in him the divine will and purpose which lie behind and are at work in every human life and all history.

We may give other expression to the same truth—the truth that Christ's relationship to the Christian man is at one and the same time that of a historical figure in the past depicted in the Gospels and that of a contemporaneous reality deeply related to his inward being and his outward environment—by insisting, as Christianity has always insisted, that Christ's saving work and presence are mediated through the

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

Christian fellowship, through the new covenant community. The Christian fellowship is a community which is as fully contemporaneous with the believer as are the living men and women who constitute its membership and meet him in day-to-day "I-thou" relationships; but at the same time it is deeply and consciously rooted in and continuous with a past which runs back through the centuries to the historical Christ himself. And both these aspects are inseparably involved in its function as mediating Christ. When I participate in the life of the church, I encounter Christ actively disclosing himself to me now in and through an order of living personal relationships which, despite its faults and failings—nay, in some measure because of its faults and failings, or rather, because of the opportunity for distinctively Christian forbearance and forgiveness which these afford—manifestly bears the mark of his mind and spirit. Christ looks at me, as it were, through the eyes of contemporary men and women in whom he dwells. But I also encounter the historic Christ of long ago; for the church's long past, which goes right back to the first disciples whom he gathered around him in Palestine, and without the explicit consciousness of which it would not be what it is, now becomes my past, my memory, my history.¹⁵ This is why the study and exposition of the Scriptures, particularly the New Testament, within the worshiping fellowship of the church, is something so very different from the study of them by one whose interest is merely in historical or antiquarian research. Such study and exposition are integrally one with the life of the fellowship itself: they illumine and are reciprocally illumined by the whole organism of redeemed personal relationships which the New Testament calls the body of Christ. Perhaps the supreme illustration of these truths is the sacrament of the Last Supper. In the symbolism of this solemn and central rite the church deliberately goes back through the centuries to the Redeemer's earthly life; it obeys his direct injunction spoken by his human lips so many hundreds of years ago; it re-enacts his words and deeds as recorded in the Scriptures, which are read at the rite itself. Nevertheless, it is the faith and experience of the church that the rite is never a mere recalling of the past; it is not mere commemoration. In and through it there is a present communion with the risen and living Lord.

B. Limits of the Canon.—We now turn to the second of the two questions which arise in connection with the understanding of the normative place of the Bible within the church, namely, why the writings which are essential to the present efficacy of Christ's saving and ruling office in the church should be limited to the present contents of the Bible. This is to raise—from the theological angle—the question of the limits of the canon.¹⁶

So far as the Old Testament is concerned, the question is not a difficult one in principle, nor an important one in practice. In principle, it would be impossible to deny a place in the Old Testament to any writing which was manifestly important as participating in and witnessing to, and so enabling us more fully to grasp, the divine activity in the history of the old covenant people preparing and leading up to the coming of Christ. In practice, the question has no importance because the advent of Christ itself put a final limit to the old covenant history considered as preparatory to that advent. There cannot, therefore, be any more candidates for canonicity, except in the extremely remote contingency of a new manuscript belonging to the Old Testament period being discovered. Though this is an eventuality so improbable as to be hardly worth considering, nevertheless it is clear that if it did happen, the church would have to consider the claim of the writing in question to be included in the canon. The only question which might be considered to remain open is that of the Apocrypha, or rather, of those books in the Apocrypha which help to bridge the gap between the two Testaments, and therefore to give knowledge of the history of the old covenant people immediately prior to the Incarnation itself (e.g., I and II Maccabees). In principle, there is no reason why the churches which now exclude the Apocrypha from the Bible should not at any time reconsider the matter from this angle; but there does not appear to be any reason why they should do so, for the books are in any case available to Christian scholars and thinkers, and none of them is so strong a candidate (though some might well be thought stronger candidates than, say, the Song of Songs or Esther) as to make it worth while to open up what would probably prove a thorny and divisive question.

The question of the limits of the canon is not so easily disposed of in relation to the New Testament. The church as the new covenant community is still going on, so that there is not, as there is in the case of the Old Testament, an inevitable chronological limit to the writings which might be considered to be candidates for canonicity. Why, then, should not later writings than those at present comprising the New Testament, some of them on a very high level of inspiration, which have been produced as part of the ongoing life of the church throughout the ages, enter as indispensably into the present living relationship of Christ to his people?

¹⁵ Cf. Nicolas Berdyaev, The Meaning of History, tr. George Reavey (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1936), p. 16.

¹⁶ See also articles "The Canon of the Old Testament" (pp. 32-45); "The Canon of the New Testament" (pp. 63-71).

To answer this question we must go back once again to the central Christian affirmation of the Incarnation. We must again insist that the divine saving action in Christ was "in and through" as well as "into" history. This "in-and-through-ness" implies that we must include in the scope of that action more than the human person of Christ. We must include in some measure the other human persons and events in immediate relation to which his life, death, and resurrection were wrought out and the new revelation made. If we do not thus widen the scope of the divine action, we must suppose either that it was a matter of chance whether the revelation in Christ would prove effective as a revelation, or that its effectiveness was independent of genuine historical conditions—in other words, that there was no real historic Incarnation at all.

The question is: In what measure must we include the human persons and events in relation to which the life of the Redeemer was wrought out? This raises some formidable problems, as, for example, in what sense must we include the betrayal by Judas and the rejection by the Jerusalem authorities in the divine plan to enter history and save mankind through Christ. Such questions run out into some of the oldest and most intractable problems of philosophical theology, but fortunately there is no need to consider them here. Our interest is simply in God's bringing into existence the new covenant community of saved men and women which should be both the first fruits and the agent of God's saving purpose toward mankind in Christ. Clearly, if this was to be accomplished, it was necessary that the divine action should include the provision of men who would not only keep company with Christ in the actual unfolding of his historic life, death, and resurrection, but also discern the transcendent meaning of these events, and be sent forth to bear witness to it. The calling of such men, and the continual quickening of their minds and hearts to fulfill the calling, we can think of only as the mysterious work of the Holy Spirit. As Christ himself said, when Peter confessed that he was the Christ, "Flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven" (Matt. 16:17). But whatever the mystery of the divine working, the indispensability of these men is obvious. Only in their response does the divine intention and act of revelation complete itself. Had there been no such men, the story of Jesus would not have become a revelation to humanity; it would not have become the Word of God. It would have echoed and re-echoed, like a sound which passes unheard in a primeval forest. It would have been like a bridge which had been begun from one side of a river, but which never reached the other side.¹⁷

So the first apostles come into view as essentially and indispensably involved in the process of a historic incarnation and revelation.

The word "apostle" in New Testament usage is nowhere exactly defined, but it seems clear that in essence it signifies precisely those who were called to play this crucial part in the totality of the divine action in Christ. Perhaps the best description of their function is given in the words: "That which . . . we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life. . . . That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you" (I John 1:1, 3; cf. I Cor. 9:1, "Am I not an apostle? . . . have I not seen Jesus Christ our Lord?") There is, however, an important element to be added to this description, the element indicated by the word apostle itself. It is an essential part of the content of the divine revelation, and of its apprehension by those whose eyes saw and whose hands handled the Word of life, that these last should be sent, and be conscious of themselves as sent, to declare it to the world. In the sending of the apostles, and through the sending of the apostles, the purpose of God as manifested in Christ is set forth as a redemptive purpose which is impelled by its essential nature to go out to all mankind. "As my Father hath sent me, even so send I you" (John 20:21). Obvious as this may appear to be, it is of the greatest importance for a right doctrine of redemption and of the church. Christian thought has been too much dominated by what someone has called "the ark" view of salvation, the view, that is, that being saved consists in being rescued from something, whereas it consists just as much in being sent to do something; the "being-sent-to-do" is essentially part of the "being-rescued-from." "Apostolicity" or "being-sent-ness" lies therefore at the very heart of the Christian revelation, springing as it does from what one may perhaps venture to call the "apostolic" activity of God—God in his saving purpose sends the Son, and the Son sends those who respond to his revelation and call.

The first apostles, then, stand in a distinctive

¹⁷ Emil Brunner, Revelation and Reason, tr. O. Wyon (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1946), p. 122. My thought at this point is indebted to Brunner.

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

position within the divine saving revelation in Christ, and in the bringing into existence of the new covenant community. They participate in the historic actuality of the Incarnation, and it is an essential element in the participation that they are sent into the world to bear witness to it. The bearing witness had to be in the first instance oral—the preaching of the gospel—but it is evident that if any of the apostolic circle gave any sort of expression to the message in writing, or was the immediate source or inspiration of such writing, the writing in question would have a special significance and status. It would itself be part of, an immediate deposit of, the great originative historic event itself, and no writing subsequently produced by others could possibly have the same significance and status.

That it was not long before written documents (especially compilations of the incidents and sayings of the Master's life) appeared and were being circulated within the new community is easily understandable; there is no need to try to analyze the process here. And it is as easily understandable that in due course, when the young community moved out into the Greek world, when the many currents of thought in that world began to play upon it, and when at the same time Christian writings—some of them of secondary and doubtful value—began to multiply and gain currency, the need was felt to establish a select body or canon of writings which should express and preserve once and for all, in as pure a form as possible, the story of the originative events of the Savior's life and death and resurrection, and the apostolic testimony concerning them. Such a collection of writings would inevitably be thought of as the completion of the Old Testament canon which was already in use, and would act both as a continuous source and a corrective standard of the church's teaching and life. But the process in its broad outline—much of its detail is obscure—is not only easy to understand; it must be judged to be wholly right and justified. The necessity for authoritative writings of some sort is implicit in the idea of a historic revelation and redemption; without such writings the historic events, along with their crucial significance for men, would have been lost in alien systems of thought, or in embroidered legends, or in theosophical and mystical speculations, if indeed the knowledge of them had not faded away altogether into oblivion, their memory and influence gradually dissipated and dissolved into the unregenerate life of mankind.

Furthermore, it was right instinct which led the church in course of time to formulate the principle that from among the writings which the general mind of the community had already,

by the unconscious selection of use, declared to be valuable and worth preserving, only those should be finally admitted to the canon which were apostolic in origin, for as we have seen, the apostles do stand apart: they are within the circle of the divine revelation in Christ, within the process of the Incarnation itself, and any testimony of theirs shares in the same distinctive status. The criterion of apostolicity, however, having been thus justifiably laid down, the task of applying it correctly was no easy one, and the question still remains whether in point of fact it was so applied. This is a large question, involving matters of New Testament scholarship and research into which it is not necessary to enter. But the judgment seems warranted that if we do not identify apostolic origin with direct apostolic authorship, and if we frankly allow for legitimate doubt in respect of some of the writings included in our New Testament (e.g., II Peter, James, Jude, Revelation), the church on the whole decided well. Broadly speaking, the New Testament is an apostolic book and therefore shares in the unique status of the apostolic circle in relation to the Incarnation. And in the New Testament we do find ourselves confronting the historic person of the Redeemer in his unique creative and re-creative impact upon men, bringing into existence the new covenant community and sending and empowering it to bear witness to him throughout the world, in a way in which we do not confront him in other early writings of the church, even the most beautiful and helpful. While it is obviously impossible to maintain that the New Testament would not have played a part in the life of the Christian community and in the lives of its individual members if it had included some writings which it does not now include, or had excluded some it now contains, it is beyond question that the New Testament, taken as a whole, has been and is indispensable to God's giving to every new generation the riches which are in Christ. On the principles here laid down, the exact boundaries of the New Testament canon may be held to be debatable, yet the distinctiveness and indispensability of what lies centrally and solidly within those boundaries remain quite clear and undeniable. In a similar way, although the precise limits of the sun when it rides the heavens at noon cannot be discerned with our eyes, there is no doubt in what part of the heaven it is, or that it gives light and warmth and healing to mankind.

The absence of boundaries which we can exactly define and justify might perhaps be looked upon as bearing witness once more to the thoroughgoing historical reality of the revelation which lies at the center of the Christian faith. It bears witness once more to the "in and through" aspect of it. The same witness is borne by the nature of the writings comprised within the New Testament. None of them, of course, was written for the purpose of finding a place in an authoritative canon defined in accordance with a prior idea as to what such a canon should be and should provide. They were written simply to meet the actual situations which confronted the new faith as it went out into the world in the persons of those who committed themselves to it. As such they are rooted in the historic process itself, even as is the Incarnation with which they are integrally bound up.

IV. The Nature of the Authority of the Bible

This article has maintained that there is only one final and absolute authority for the faith and life of the church, and therefore for the faith and life of the individual members within it: namely, the living Christ speaking through the Holy Spirit. It has sought to show that the reason why the New Testament participates indispensably in the authority of the living Christ is that the faith and witness of the apostolic circle are part of the original act of divine revelation "into" and "in and through" history. If we desire to hear God's word to us in Christ and to be kept from straying again into the darkness from which he came to deliver us, we must always begin with the New Testament and to it we must ever return, for that is but to begin with Christ and to return to him. This commits us to the study of the Old Testament as well, for the coming of Christ, and the bringing into existence of the new covenant community through him, are continuous with the life and history of the old covenant community and cannot be fully comprehended apart from them.

The question to which we now address ourselves is how, in view of all that has been said, the Scriptures are to be used so that their normative function may be rightly exercised.

A. The Authority of the Bible Not Different from That of Christ.—The first thing that has to be said is that the authority of the Bible, being bound up with the authority of the living Christ himself, cannot be a different sort of authority from his. If, then, we ask what sort of authority Christ seeks to exercise over men, the primary appeal must be to the New Testament. This is in accordance with the principles already laid down. In any case, to ascribe to the biblical writings, and particularly to the New Testament, a kind of authority which it is not even hinted that Christ ever claimed for himself, or wanted to claim, would be to put a contrariety at the very sources of our faith.

When we examine the Gospels, we find that at no point did Christ attempt to exercise an external, overriding authority, to whose pronouncements men are required to submit without investigation or criticism, and altogether apart from any inward endorsement and response within their own minds. On the contrary, we meet the exact reverse—a steadfast refusal to do so, and even a deliberate avoidance of any relationship which might perhaps wear that coercive appearance. This characteristic of Christ's life and teaching is so manifest throughout the Gospels that illustration is hardly necessary. It is indeed so characteristic of him, and at the same time so contrary to the natural instincts of men, that it constitutes one of the evidences of the truth of the record. One may refer only to his refusal to provide a sign from heaven, when asked so to do; to his refusal to answer the question on what authority he did "these things," on the ground that his questioners were not sincere; to such sayings as "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear," and "Why do you not judge for yourselves what is right?" In John Oman's words:

The great demonstration of the Christ is just that He never sets Himself, as the absolute external authority of the perfect truth, in opposition to the imperfect authority of the finite and sinful spirit within, but that He has only one appeal, which is to the likeness of God and the teaching of God within. Jesus speaks indeed with authority. He is not as the Scribes. They had authorities, but no authority. They had nothing to speak from direct, and nothing to appeal to direct. Jesus, on the other hand, speaks from man to man the truth He has seen and to which his hearers cannot be blind, unless they close their eyes. . . . His "I say unto you" did not end inquiry, but begin it. Hear something, it said, which the humble heart will recognise as true, and which the experience of obedience will confirm. And surely herein is the weightiest proof of the perfect truth. It does not dominate and silence the inward voices, but awakes them and makes them its chief witness.¹⁸

The rest of the New Testament is in harmony with this. In the Acts the apostles are plainly set before us as men of authority in the infant church, yet their authority is not of the magisterial kind working by dictation and coercion, but rather of a kind which works by persuasion through love, as can be seen in the proceedings of the so-called Council of Jerusalem recorded in Acts 15. The same note appears in the epistles of Paul, wherein the writer, though ready to speak with great force and conviction, nevertheless seeks to persuade his readers by argument and exposition, appealing to them to "judge ¹⁸ Vision and Authority (new and rev. ed.; London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1928; New York: Harper & Bros., 1929), pp. 107, 112. Used by permission.

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

for yourselves what I say" (I Cor. 10:15), and commending the truth "to every man's conscience in the sight of God" (II Cor. 4:2).

It follows that it is a most grave disloyalty to Christ, and to the Scripture which he uses to speak to men, to turn the latter into an overriding authority of the extrinsic, "yardstick" sort, whether by ascribing to it a miraculous infallibility whose statements none may question or investigate, or by forcing it—usually by strained exegesis—to stand sponsor for a system of doctrine the acceptance of which is demanded as essential to salvation (as in some types of Protestant orthodoxy), or by using it as a kind of sortes Vergilianae or means of divination (as in certain kinds of foolish, intense piety we all know).

By the same argument, we are brought to see what is the right use of the Scripture, and what is true loyalty to it. We betake ourselves to the Scripture as part of our betaking ourselves to the feet of Christ, in the humble faith that in him, and therefore in the Scripture through which he chooses to encounter us, is the final truth for our lives; yet well knowing that only as this truth becomes veritably our truth, the truth which compels our allegiance through our own sincerest thought in relation to our own contemporary world, is Christ's purpose—and therefore the Scripture's purpose—fulfilled in us.

There are, however, two possible objections to this position which must be faced.

First, it is sometimes urged that thus to understand the authority of Scripture is in effect to destroy it altogether; for, it is said, if we accept in the Scripture only what compels our own assent, we are exposed to the danger of an unchecked individualism by which each takes or leaves what his own judgment may dictate. The answer to this is to insist once again on the double truth that Scripture is a norm which is intrinsic to the life of the whole Christian community, and that its normative function is inseparable from the ever-present ministry of the living Christ through the Holy Spirit. It is to the insight of the individual that Christ speaks, but to picture the individual Christian to whom Christ thus speaks as an isolated and self-contained unit shut up within the circle of his own mental processes is to deny in effect the two truths just stated. The Christian man who is being brought by Christ into the new life of reconciliation with God is by that fact incorporated in the new covenant community, and it is only as such that he can properly understand and use the Scriptures. This is itself a continuous and effective check upon eccentric individualism. But in addition, the Christian man, along with the community of which he is part, is under the promised guidance of the Holy Spirit. To fear an uncontrolled and destructive individualism is therefore to express an ultimate unbelief in the effectiveness of God's revelation in Christ and in his power to authenticate that revelation to any who seek to open their minds to it. (The truths contained in this paragraph are implicit in Eph. 4:11-16.)

In this connection it is perhaps not without significance that it was during the era when Protestantism generally assumed the literal inerrancy of Scripture, and used it in an externally authoritarian way, that it broke up into a multitude of sects; whereas it has been in more recent times, since biblical scholarship released us from this bondage and gave us the true freedom of the Scripture, that the process has shown a marked tendency to be reversed. The various churches have begun to draw together, and have increasingly discovered a fundamental unity of belief. Post hoc, ergo propter hoc is no doubt a precarious argument, but these facts certainly suggest that the view that an authoritarian use of Scripture is necessary to preserve us from a divisive individualism is not borne out by experience.

Second, it may be said that thus to throw the Christian believer back upon his own inward sense of truth is to fail to take account of his actual situation as a weak and sinful man, who, because of his weakness and sinfulness, needs an authoritative guidance and direction transcending his own powers. To adapt some words written elsewhere, the cry for firm and trustworthy direction as to what a man should do and believe springs from the reality of the human situation. Sin is always with us, and sin obscures God. Terrible things happen, and the soul begins to doubt the truth of its highest vision. Testing situations arise when a man is called to stake even his life, and then he begins to waver and to ask for some other assurance than his own inward conviction that the sacrifice he is called upon to make is really worth while. It is these facts of man's spiritual immaturity and spasmodic and erratic growth into the truth, his muddled insights, his shadowed and chaotic life, his sinful failures and disloyalties—everything in his nature which clouds and obscures vision—which evoke the cry for an authority which shall tell him once and for all what he must believe, what he must do, and what he may hope for.¹⁹ If the Scriptures do not answer this cry and meet this need, of what essential value are they to him? But how can they do so if he is thrown back in the end on his own feeble understanding of them?

¹⁹ See Herbert H. Farmer, The Servant of the Word (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1942), pp. 83-84.

The answer to this can only be to reaffirm what has already been said, namely, that in Christ God has in fact given the truth in such a form that it is able to reach men even in the darkness and weakness of their sinfulness, without, however, overriding their minds in an impersonally authoritarian way. In this work of Christ, as we have seen, the Scriptures play an instrumental and indispensable part in cooperation with the Holy Spirit. This is fundamentally a matter of faith; but it is also in sufficient measure a matter of proved experience. And this further should be added: The clamor for an authoritarian direction which shall dispel all our doubts and perplexities, exempt us from ever making mistakes, and therefore from learning from them humility and patience and charity for others, relieve us of any necessity to make up our own minds, or to venture on decisions of faith which take us out, like Abraham, into the unknown—such clamor may itself be a manifestation of our unregenerate state, of that anxiety and unbelief which lie somewhere at the heart of sin. Indeed, we may assert that it is such a manifestation, for certainly there is no evidence, either in Scripture or in experience, that that sort of direction is in fact provided for us. Nevertheless, there is always a true succor for our need, even if it is at times not so much the succor of clear vision as of faith renewed, faith in the overshadowing and pardoning love of God from which nothing can separate us, not even our sin, still less our perplexities, immaturities, and mistakes.

B. Some Principles of Discrimination and Interpretation.—When once we have set to one side the infallibility of the Scriptures, and have fully admitted that the Christian believer or theologian in his use of them must be guided in the last resort by his own conviction of truth, we admit in principle the right to set to one side some of the biblical content. But on the other hand, if the Bible is the record of the divine revelation in history, and as such part of the revelation, there must be within it that from which the Christian is not at liberty to depart without gravely imperiling, if not destroying, the notion of an objective historical revelation available in an accessible and relevant form. It is the task of theology, and that which gives its work vitality and value in every new generation, to keep these two things—the critical discrimination of the content of the Bible, and the faith that there is within that content that which is objectively and finally given—in continuous tension with one another.²⁰ Though this is a tension which can never be completely overcome, some broad principles may be laid down in relation to it on the basis of the general position set forth in this article.

²⁰ Cf p 18 regarding the value of the questions raised by the historical criticism of the Bible.

(a) It is perhaps hardly necessary to say at this time of day that the Christian is free to reject beliefs concerning the facts of the natural order which find expression in the Bible, but which are contrary to the established and tested findings of competent scientific research. To suppose that we must accept every biblical belief about the facts of nature would be to ignore both the historic character of the Christian revelation and the distinctive content of it: the historic character of it requires, as has been said so often already, that it should be "in and through" human life, that is, at the level of general knowledge and culture obtaining at the time it is made; the content of the revelation, on the other hand, being Christ the redeemer and reconciler, is plainly unaffected by the question whether a man is, say, a medieval Christian believing, with the biblical writers, that the earth is flat, or a modern Christian believing, contrary to the biblical writers, that it is round. No doubt we have always to be on our guard against accepting too easily and uncritically the views of scientists on this or that matter. It is especially necessary to discriminate between experimentally established facts and those theoretical interpretations of facts which at best are never more than probable hypotheses, and which in many cases fall outside the scope of strict science and become essentially philosophical in character. But the obligation to be thus cautious in the interest of truth is a general one and rests upon all men, not merely on the Christian believer, though no doubt the Christian believer has an added incentive to watchfulness because of his concern that the essential truth of the biblical revelation shall not be set to one side by speculations falsely claiming the authority of science. However difficult it may be in some cases to determine the boundary between fully accredited fact, probable hypothesis, and philosophical speculation, particularly when, as is sometimes the case, they are intertwined with one another, the general principle that has been laid down is clear and indubitable, namely, that scriptural views on such matters as natural science is competent to investigate and determine cannot be regarded, on a right view of the Scriptures, as binding.

(b) The distinction must be made, whenever appropriate, between the content of the biblical revelation and the symbols through which it is expressed. The latter may belong, like views on the facts of nature, to the culture and thought forms of the time, and we are free, if we will, to set them to one side and find other symbols and forms of expression. It is another of the great services of the historical approach to the Bible that it often enables us to recover, in a way that was not possible before, the meaning which a particular form of expression had to those who used it and to those to whom it was addressed. This gives us a firmer grasp of the meaning intended (guarding us against reading into it our own meanings), and at the same time it releases us from bondage to the symbol itself. A notable example of this is the understanding we now have of the symbolism of the book of Jonah, an understanding through which the full force of its teaching has been recovered, releasing us once and for all from the preposterous notion that acceptance of the fish episode as historic fact is somehow part of a sound Christian faith. Another illustration is the understanding we now have of the metaphorical element in such key words of Paul's thought as "justification" (a symbol from the law courts), "adoption" (a symbol from contemporary social custom), and "redemption" (a symbol from the institution of slavery).²¹

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

(c) That the revelation set forth in the Bible is a developing revelation is implicit in the idea of the New Testament as the fulfillment of the Old and is plainly evident from the content of Scripture itself. This means that we have not merely the right but the duty to discriminate within the scripture records between different levels in the apprehension of God's nature and purpose and to reject the lower levels once and for all in favor of the higher. For only by so doing can we once again be loyal to the notion of a revelation which God has given through the medium of historical events, and to the faith that Christ himself is the final source and norm of all truth in this sphere.²²

At the same time it must be recognized that it is not always easy to make such a discrimination between lower and higher levels. Difficulty arises for two reasons.

The first is that though we may rightly speak of development in the apprehension of God set forth in the biblical history, nevertheless the development is not a straight linear advance, such as it has sometimes been represented to be by thinkers too much dominated by the uncritical nineteenth-century notion of an inevitable and always mounting progress in human affairs. In the biblical history we do not see depicted the "evolution of religion," but the wrestling of the living God with real human persons, who have wills of their own and are liable to all the perversities of mind and heart which characterize human persons. The earlier is therefore not necessarily on a lower level than the later: there is retrogression as well as progression; and the task of discrimination can never be simply a matter of establishing, if we can, a chronological sequence. Something of direct religious insight and evaluation has also to come into play, enabling us to differentiate between what is essentially sound and of permanent value, even though relatively undeveloped, and what is essentially unsound, even though otherwise on a much higher cultural level. The Bible itself justifies us in making such a differentiation and helps us to make it, for it is an essential part of the witness of the prophetic minds, whose message it preserves, to recall their contemporaries from their perpetual wanderings into error and darkness to, as it were, the highway of God's unfolding disclosure of himself to them through the working out of his purpose in their history. It is indeed part of the value of the Bible to us that it thus mediates the purpose of God to us through a record of men's continual disloyalties to and departures from it, for the same tendencies to stray into error are always present within the human soul. And it is also part of its value that though what we have called the highway of God's revelation of truth is indicated, there is always need for our own insight and discrimination to be brought into play if we are to discern it and find in it a directive for our own life.

²¹ Cf. Adolf Deissmann, Paul, tr. William E. Wilson (2nd ed.; New York: George H. Doran, 1926), pp. 167 ff.

²² Christ's "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time, . . . but I say unto you" is a clear recognition of different levels in the divine revelation to and through the covenant people. That history must be a development process in order to be a true meeting place between God and men as persons, I have sought to show in my book The World and God, p. 300.

The second reason has to do with the ambiguity in the meaning of the term "fulfillment," to which reference was made earlier (see p. 10). When we say that the New Testament fulfills the Old we may mean that it provides answers to certain fundamental religious questions which the Old Testament leaves unanswered or answers unsatisfactorily. Clearly such fulfillment supersedes the Old Testament so far as the answers to these questions are concerned, though the Old Testament record in relation to such questions may still have great value in making clear what they are and how they arise, and in warning against those partial or false solutions which the New Testament once and for all sets to one side. C. H. Dodd, in a chapter headed "The New Testament as the Fulfillment of the Old," lists five such fundamental questions.²³

On the other hand, we may think of the New Testament as fulfilling the Old in such a way that what is fulfilled is not completely set to one side, but, on the contrary, is validated and its true significance and value preserved and made plain. Moreover, that which is thus fulfilled may in a measure reciprocally illumine and illustrate that which fulfills it. An example will help to make this clear. In Hosea's loyal and tender relationship with his erring wife, and in the new discernment of God's nature and purpose which came to him through that tragic experience, we can see, as we look back on it from the standpoint of the New Testament revelation, both a true likeness to Christ and at least a partial discernment of the truth which was fully disclosed in him. And because of this continuity of truth between the two, because the incomplete and the partial, so far from being abrogated, is taken up and reaffirmed in that which fulfills it, we can even use the story of Hosea (as many a preacher must have done) to illustrate, and by illustrating to illumine, the truth which is in Christ. In a similar way, the faith of Abraham, the sympathetic and pitiful imagination of David, the deep concern of the Mosaic law for the weak and needy, the penitence of the psalmist, the "servant passages" of Isaiah, and much else in the Old Testament, can be understood in a new way in the light of Christ; and they may even help us to apprehend and appropriate that light more fully.

²³ The Authority of the Bible (New York: Harper & Bros., 1929), pp. 205-23.

It is along these lines that we can find room in our use of the Old Testament for something that might be called a "typology," but it is obviously a very different typology from that which can be amply illustrated from the history of scriptural interpretation—namely, that which fancifully and ingeniously reads into almost anything in the Old Testament oblique Christian references and meanings, without any regard to what a sound exegesis would show to be the real meaning and intention of the text. The hold which typological and allegorical methods of interpretation (seldom clearly distinguished from one another) have had on the minds of students of Scripture all down the history of the church can be sympathetically regarded as an endeavor to assert the continuity of the Old and New Testaments and the divine unity of Scripture. But it too often rested on what we now see to be (i) an inevitably inadequate exegetical equipment; (ii) a defective sense of the meaning of a historical revelation, which made it seem necessary to find an equal place in the divine revelation for everything in the Old Testament (even for the voluptuous love lyric called the Song of Songs—usually interpreted as an allegory of the relation of Christ to the church); and (iii) a failure to realize that if there is continuity between the Old and New Testaments, there is also a radical discontinuity between them.

(d) It is important in discriminating the biblical material to be sure that we are not doing so on the basis of theological or philosophical presuppositions and principles which have been adopted on grounds extraneous to the biblical revelation, which have never been thoroughly scrutinized in the light of that revelation, and which may in fact be contrary to it. Thus—to give some examples—whatever we may make of the difficult question of the miracle stories in the Bible, we must seek to be sure that the position we adopt in regard to it is not based on a general philosophical position which not only starts elsewhere than in the fundamental biblical view of God as personally active in the world he has made, but must also, if logically wrought out, gravely impugn that view. Or again, whatever we may make of the eschatological elements in the New Testament, we must seek to be sure that we are not bringing to the interpretation of them a view of history which owes much more to current notions of evolution and progress than to serious wrestling with the distinctively biblical view of the relation of time and eternity. Or again, we must take care that the very somber view which is taken throughout the Bible of man's status as a sinner before God is not unconsciously toned down and reinterpreted, if not almost completely explained away, on the basis of an optimistic, semipantheistic humanism which, if it is true, really takes the heart out of the distinctive biblical message of man's redemption.

The problem of rightly relating to one another the special interests and problems of philosophy and a theology which is seeking to be true to the Bible is a difficult one, and affords another of those tensions which keep theological work alive. It is not possible to avoid the use of philosophical categories (such as time, eternity, cause, purpose, personality) in building up a systematic theology; moreover, the general cosmological framework into which the Christian theologian, and even preacher, inevitably seeks to fit his Christian convictions is bound to contain elements of which the Bible knows nothing, on which it sheds little direct light, and to which in some measure a philosophical evaluation must be applied if they are to be rightly assessed (as the facts of biological evolution). Nevertheless, the general principle, however difficult to apply, remains clear, namely, that we must be continually interrogating ourselves to see whether we are allowing the Bible in its basic affirmations to be determinative of our thinking, or whether we are making some other view the criterion to which (perhaps unconsciously) we compel all else, including the Bible itself, to submit. The point may be put another way by saying that the principles by which we discriminate the biblical material must be supplied by the Bible itself, or at least be in fundamental harmony with it, and not be taken over uncritically from elsewhere.²⁴

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

(e) A special word may perhaps be said concerning the application to the Gospels and to the New Testament epistles of the principles which we have discussed. The view herein set forth certainly implies that we are not under obligation to accept without question every belief and teaching which is ascribed to Christ, or finds place in the epistles, as though a quotation from these were sufficient to settle every problem, or at least to supply the quite indisputable premise of every argument. Many, however, will feel a particular shrinking from claiming the right to exercise such a discriminatory judgment on the New Testament; it seems like tampering with the very springs of Christian truth. This feeling must certainly be honored to the extent of insisting most strongly that the work of discrimination within the New Testament requires always the greatest care and humility of spirit, and a constant readiness to review one's judgment, lest aught of the new and challenging truth be lost. But if the feeling is allowed to issue in a total prohibition against setting to one side anything in the New Testament, we are in effect back in that wrong view of the authority of Scripture which in fact involves a far greater disloyalty to it than the possible errors against which such a view is alleged to give protection.

The duty and the right to discriminate (always, it may perhaps be well to say again, from within the fellowship of the church and under the promised guidance of the Holy Spirit) are perhaps not so difficult to affirm in relation to the epistles as in relation to the Gospels, for the writers of the epistles, great as they were and commandingly unique as is their function in the economy of God's revelation in Christ, were in their degree sinful and fallible men. They were seeking to appropriate and express, in relation to their own historical situations and under a divine guidance which certainly did not confer either infallibility or sinless perfection, the riches given in Christ; and it is obvious that what they say does not provide us with a perfectly harmonious system of thought and belief, though there is, of course, a deep underlying unity. In the Gospels, however, we believe ourselves to encounter the perfect One, the incarnate Son of God. Therefore, if we feel led to question beliefs and teachings ascribed to him, it can never be in such a way as even distantly to hint or imply that we know better than he concerning the deep things of God. It can only be for one or both of two reasons: (i) because we see that the belief in question is not integrally part of the saving truth Christ came to disclose, but is rather part of the mental furniture of any first-century Jew, and so enters indispensably into his historic humanity, or (ii) because we have good reason to think that Christ's teaching has been inadequately or inaccurately reported. An example of (i) might be found in the belief held in demons and demon possession, which Christ apparently shared. Some Christians today reject this belief, and whether we agree with them in this or not, it must be conceded that they are within their rights so to do, provided only that they are prepared to maintain the position that belief in demon possession is not integral to "saving truth," and that the holding of this belief was part of Christ's historic humanity as a first-century Jew. An example of (ii) might be found in some aspects of Christ's reported eschatological teaching. There is evidence to suggest that contemporary apocalyptic ideas and schemes of thought have entered more or less distortingly into the reports given us in the Gospels. The so-called Little Apocalypse of Mark 13, for example, has a symmetry which makes it more than a little dubious whether it can be accepted as it stands and in its entirety as an authentic utterance of Christ.

C. The Bible as the Word of God.—It may well be asked, in view of all that has been said, in what sense, if any, we can properly speak of the Bible as the Word of God. When the Scriptures were regarded as literally inerrant, the writers being passive instruments in God's hands, there was a clear and definite sense in which the Scriptures could be called the Word of God. God wrote the Scriptures, and they were therefore his written Word. But when this view is rejected, and we regard it as both a right and a duty to exercise a discriminatory judgment on the Scriptures, the time-honored phrase, the Word of God, if we continue to use it, obviously calls for fresh exposition and definition. The need becomes the more evident when inquiry reveals that both in the Bible itself and in theological usage the phrase, the Word of God, has had a number of variant though not unrelated meanings.

In the New Testament the concept of the "word" (used simpliciter, or in variant phrases such as "Word of God" or "word of the Cross" or "word of the Gospel," etc.) seems to bear the following main meanings: (a) the content of the gospel message, as disclosed to mankind by God through Christ, and as witnessed to in the preaching of the apostles—see Mark 4:14-20; Acts 16:6; Rev. 1:2; Acts 15:7; I Cor. 1:18; Phil. 2:16; (b) the total truth for life, conduct, and belief, which is implicit in the gospel proclamation, and which must be accepted if the full riches of the gospel are to be enjoyed—see Col. 1:5; Tit. 1:9; I Pet. 2:8; 3:1; Jas. 1:22; II Cor. 4:2; (c) God's active power as manifested in the creation and preservation of the world—see II Pet. 3:5; Heb. 1:3; (d) God's activity in salvation, both within the hearts and minds of believers and in the church—see Heb. 4:12; 6:5; Jas. 1:18; Eph. 5:26; Col. 3:16; and finally (e)—the distinctively Johannine thought—the expression of God's eternal being in an eternally outgoing activity of creative reason, which creates the world, gives life and understanding to men, and finally becomes incarnate in Jesus Christ—see John 1:1-4, 14; I John 1:1; Rev. 19:13.

²⁴ See Herbert H. Farmer, "Some Reflections on Professor Wieman's New Book," Journal of Religion, XXVII (1947), 114.

It is not difficult to see what is the dominant and unifying thought of all these usages: the Word of God signifies the revealing activity of the living and personal God in creation and toward men, particularly as this is manifest and operative in the gospel—"gospel" being here used as an all-inclusive term to signify (a) the content of the gospel, namely, that God himself came in a supreme, saving act of self-giving and self-disclosure in Christ, (b) the declaration of the gospel through the preaching and teaching of its primary witnesses, and (c) the making of the gospel effective in the hearts and lives of those who believe. To this wealth of meaning—all of it centering in the thought of the revealing activity of God toward men—the symbol of the Word is singularly appropriate; it would be difficult to think of one more compendiously adequate. For the spoken word springs from, is sustained by, and directly expresses the personality of the speaker in his purposeful activity, as nothing else does—his reasoned thought, his desire to unveil his mind, his intention to challenge and draw a response from the mind and will of another person. And speech can be most deeply penetrative in its effects on those who hear it. No doubt the symbol of the Word becomes somewhat strained when it is applied, as in the Johannine literature, to the divine Redeemer himself, for "word" normally signifies the expression and act of personality, not the personality itself. The strain is evidenced by the fact that this usage stands rather apart in the New Testament, and by the fact that many people find the conception of Christ as "the Word of God" (particularly as expounded in John 1) somewhat mystifying. But when once the meaning is grasped, the sense of strain in calling Christ himself the Word is lost in the appropriateness of the symbol along the lines just indicated. Moreover, to call Christ himself the Word of God has this advantage: that it emphasizes the point already insisted on so much, that the supreme source and norm of Christian truth are not words written down and preserved between the covers of a book (important as these are, for the reasons which have been given), but Christ who is the living Word.

It was much later in the history of Christian thought that the tendency arose to equate the Scriptures with the Word of God. The tendency was especially manifest in Protestant circles after the Reformation, though it should be noted that in these circles the phrase the "Word of God" was also used in the New Testament sense indicated above, as a study of the various confessions shows. It is noteworthy that Calvin never identified Scripture with the Word of God. It is broadly true to say that in the Protestant tradition the New Testament usage of the phrase is preserved alongside the increasingly dominant usage of it to indicate the Scriptures as such, the two usages not being very clearly related to one another.

It follows from this brief inquiry that it would not be in the least contrary to Scripture itself but rather in harmony with it, nor would it be contrary to anything essential in the Christian faith, if we ceased altogether to speak of the Scriptures as the Word of God, and if we reserved the phrase, as the New Testament does, for God's great saving act of revelation in Christ and for the gospel message proclaiming it to mankind.

However, the course of thought which has been pursued in this article may perhaps be taken to afford sufficient ground for adhering to what has become the Protestant tradition of speaking of the Bible as the Word of God, though it at the same time defines the sense in which we may do so. For we have maintained that the Scriptures do enter indispensably into that revealing and saving activity of God in the incarnate Redeemer and in the gospel message concerning him, which is what the symbol of the Word of God properly denotes. God, as it were, continually takes the written word of the Bible up into his own living Word, so that it becomes vitally one, though not identical, with it. To speak of the Scriptures as the Word of God, for all the misrepresentation and misuse to which such a usage is admittedly exposed, does at least forbid us to minimize or overlook this vital union and its necessity. Nor, it must be emphasized again, is this indispensable union of the Scriptures with the saving Word of God in Christ and in the gospel message impaired in the least by the fact that we must use our own best knowledge and judgment to interpret them. On the contrary, our freedom to do this is used by God, in his patience and wisdom, to turn the littera scripta into a living encounter with us as persons, whom he must save as persons, if we are to be saved at all.

THE BIBLE: ITS SIGNIFICANCE AND AUTHORITY

D. The Bible as the Authoritative Basis of Preaching.—The proclamation of the gospel through preaching has from the beginning been recognized to be an indispensable factor in God's saving activity toward men in Christ. This necessity of preaching arises primarily out of the nature of the gospel itself as a message concerning God's coming into the world in a historic event, a historic Incarnation. An event can become known only by being borne witness to, by being proclaimed, by the story being told. Nobody can come to the knowledge of an event by his own reflection, by excogitation. And if the significance of the event is that in it God comes to encounter men as persons in the challenge and the succor of redeeming love, then another reason for preaching can be seen: namely, that preaching is in a superlative degree the deliberate challenge of one person to another, the encounter of one person with another. God takes the human personal encounter involved in bearing witness to the Event up into his own personal encounter with men through the Event. Here also he makes the human word vitally one, though not identical, with the divine Word. Once again the appropriateness of the symbol "Word" to indicate the total divine activity in Christ toward men becomes apparent.²⁵

It follows from this that preaching in its essential idea is not necessarily required to be based upon scriptural texts or passages. All that is required is that it should be, in whatever form is appropriate to the occasion, a bearing witness to, a setting forth of, the Word of the gospel, the Word which is Christ. However, this requirement, when taken along with all that has been said concerning the part played by Scripture in mediating the Word of God, does make the deliberate yoking of the preacher's message to the content of the Scripture indispensable to the effective prosecution of his task, whether or not in fact he starts from, or indeed makes any explicit reference to, a scripture text or passage. The long tradition of the church that preaching shall as a rule be "from the Scriptures" is therefore justified. But, of course, by the same argument it must be genuinely "from the Scriptures." The danger earlier referred to is always present, that even when the preacher does "take a text," he fails really to submit his mind to it, but rather reads into it contemporary conceptions and beliefs, using the scripture words merely as a perch on which his own ideas, like a lot of twittering birds, may alight and preen themselves.

²⁵ For a further exposition of this see Farmer, The Servant of the Word.

The basing of preaching on Scripture imparts to it a weight and authority which the preacher in himself could not hope to command. This authority, it must be insisted once more, is not of the external, overriding kind; always it makes itself felt through the testimonium spiritus sancti internum working through the quickened insight of the hearer. But it is nevertheless a real authority. It derives from the inherent and proved power of the Scriptures to disturb the heart of a man with a renewed sense of sinfulness and need, to challenge him with a sense of the seriousness of the issues which are at stake in human existence, to solemnize him with a sense of the living God coming to him in the majestic person of the Redeemer. It derives too from the fact that Scripture comes to the hearer as an inseparable part of the total life and witness of the Christian church, and so carries with it the authority of the church's agelong experience and testimony. By taking his stand upon the Bible and preaching thence, the preacher utters the prayer, and expresses the faith, that the thin, shallow trickle of his own words will be taken up into the living Word of him, concerning whom it was said that his voice was "as the sound of many waters."

V. Selected Bibliography

- BRUNNER, EMIL. Revelation and Reason, tr. Olive Wyon. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1946.
- CUNLIFFE-JONES, HUBERT. The Authority of the Biblical Revelation. London: James Clarke & Co., 1945.
- DODD, C. H. The Authority of the Bible. New York: Harper & Bros., 1929.
- . The Bible Today. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1947.
- DUGMORE, C. W., ed. The Interpretation of the Bible. London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1944.
- LILLEY, A. L. Religion and Revelation. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1932.
- PHYTHIAN-ADAMS, W. J. The People and the Presence. London: Oxford University Press, 1942.
- RICHARDSON, ALAN. Christian Apologetics. New York: Harper & Bros., 1947.
- ROBINSON, H. WHEELER. Redemption and Revelation in the Actuality of History. New York: Harper and Bros., 1942.
- . Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1946.
- ROWLEY, H. H. The Relevance of the Bible. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1944.

THE CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

by ARTHUR JEFFERY

- I. The Christian Inheritance of the Hebrew Scripture
- II. Growth of the Hebrew Writings
- III. The Word Canon
- IV. The Various Witnesses of the Canon
 - A. Hebrew Scriptures
 - B. The Hellenistic Bible
 - C. The Samaritan Pentateuch
 - D. Ben Sirach (ca. 180 B.C.)
 - E. Simeon ben Shetach (ca. 75 B.C.)
 - F. The Books of Maccabees (ca. 90-50 B.C.)
 - G. Philo Judaeus (ca. A.D. 40)
 - H. The New Testament (ca. A.D. 50-150)
 - J. Josephus (ca. A.D. 100)
 - K. II Esdras (IV Ezra, ca. A.D. 90-120)
 - L. The Rabbinical Tradition
- M. The Apostolic Fathers
- N. Melito of Sardis (ca. 170)
- O. Origen (185-254)
- P. Athanasius (365)
- Q. Jerome (329-420)
- R. The Eastern Churches
 - 1. The Syriac-Speaking Church
 - 2. The Armenian Church
 - 3. The Abyssinian Church
 - 4. The Coptic Church
- V. Conclusion
 - A. Preparation for Canonization
 - B. Official Canonization
 - C. Resistance to Official Canonization
- VI. Selected Bibliography

Readers of the Bible are usually inclined to take for granted the contents of the Book as it comes to them in its printed form, without thinking to ask why it contains just so many books, arranged in what seems to be an invariable order. Some readers are aware that in certain churches lessons are at times read from the Apocrypha, which, however, are not contained in most of the printed editions they see, but why this should be they do not know. The answer is that the various churches recognize a canon of Scripture which decides for them what books are to be included or excluded and in what order they are to be arranged.

I. The Christian Inheritance of the Hebrew Scripture

Part of the inheritance of Christianity from Judaism was a scripture. Jesus in his preaching constantly referred to this scripture, and the disciples followed him in this practice. They accepted as a religious fact which directly concerned them the existence among the Jews of a body of writings received as sacred and authoritative.

This body of writings did not profess to include all the religious books that had appeared during the history of the Jewish people. It did not include all the religious documents which were in circulation among the Jews at that period. It was a body of writings which had been brought together by a process of selection, given an authority not possessed by their other religious literature, and invested with a sanctity which set it apart as in some particular way connected with the official religious life of the people.

In this there was nothing unique. We find the same factors at work among other peoples producing the sacred books of other religions. Save in such cases as the Manichaean scriptures or the Qur'an, which were produced in conscious imitation of an earlier canonical scripture, we find that the "scripture" of a religion consists of a body of writings of different age and authorship, formed by a gradual process of selection, and little by little acquiring sanctity and authority. The writings assembled in such sacred books are of various kinds, some historical, some didactic, some hortatory, some perhaps magical, but they gain their authority because the community feels that in them is enshrined something that is of vital significance for the practice of the religion whose sacred books they are.

When New Testament writers use such phrases as ἐν ταῖς γραφαῖς, or γραφαὶ ἁγίαι, or (τὰ) ἱερὰ γράμματα, and Jewish writers such as Josephus, Philo, and the author of I Maccabees, speak of αἱ ἱερὰ βιβλία, or τὰ βιβλία τὰ ἁγία, or τὰ ἱερὰ γράμματα, they are testifying to the existence of such a collection among the Jews. The same idea of a well-recognized collection is implicit in the Talmudic expression miqrā', "reading," used of writings publicly read in the synagogue services. The Christians took over from the Jews this collection of "sacred writings," and later formed an additional collection of their own, which in turn came to acquire sanctity and authority. With the development of the church, and the use of these documents as standards of doctrine and discipline, Christian writers began to make use of the Greek word κανών in a technical sense, and to speak of a canon of scripture.

Though the use of the word "canon" in connection with an authoritative body of scripture is of Christian origin, the conception which it crystallized in a convenient technical term was in operation long before any precise term was used. We have the conception wherever in a religious community there comes into existence a collection of writings marked off as especially sacred and authoritative, and so in modern books we speak of the Zoroastrian canon or the Taoist canon, and distinguish in Buddhism between the Sanskrit, Pali, Tibetan, and Chinese canons. In none of these religions is the term used in the native sources, but the conception is there. When in any religion the stage is reached where the community is conscious that the authentic voice of religious authority is no longer heard, the writings which had been produced in that past in which such an authentic voice had been heard and recognized tend to be marked out by that fact and so to be set aside as the writings sacred to the community. This would not preclude the possibility of adding to them at some future time other writings in which once again the sure voice of religious authority was heard, nor indeed of the adding to them of historical records, or memorials of the past of the community, without which much of the meaning of "the word of prophecy" might be lost. Furthermore, the conception is not incompatible with some diversity of opinion as to the extent of such a corpus of sacred writings, as to what should be included and what omitted.

While Christian theologians may recognize in the process of scriptural canonization the official act of the church and the providential work of the Holy Spirit (see article, "The Bible: Its Significance and Authority," pp. 3-31), historians can merely state that a canon of scripture is not something given, but something humanly devised. From the historical point of view the canon is the result of human decision as to which among the religious writings existing in a community are those in which it recognizes the authentic voice of religious authority speaking to man. It is likewise clear that canonization is something entirely apart from the process of collection, and that it is not necessarily connected with the public use of a body of writings. We have ample evidence of the collection and use in a community of religious writings which have never become part of any canonical collection of scripture. In general it is the effort to preserve the community from some threat to its religious life, whether from heresy or false teaching or some such calamity, that leads it to place the seal of its approval on certain writings to the exclusion of others, already collected and in use, as being those alone in which it recognizes the authentic voice of authority. It is possible to think of a wider and a narrower sense of the word "canonization." It may be argued that a collection of writings may come into use in a religious community and by custom and general recognition come to be regarded as of religious authority, without there ever having been any formal pronouncement as to its canonization. In this wider sense we could speak of a growing canon, as at different periods we find different groups of writings attaining an authoritative position. In the stricter sense, however, canonization means a definite formulation whereby a body of writings is set aside because those writings are recognized as authoritative.

II. Growth of the Hebrew Writings

The story of the growth of Hebrew literature is in no fundamental way different from that of the growth of literature among other peoples. Everywhere the beginnings of national literature are oral. As the people attain to literacy there is the tendency to put this national literature—the tales of origins, the annals of the kings, the deeds of the heroic age, the oracles of the shrines, the priestly liturgies, the popular religious songs, the wisdom of the sages, and so forth—into written form. These types are common to many peoples in the ancient world. Among the Israelites we can recognize several such types of literary endeavor slowly developing to form a body of writings preserved in a fixed form: (a) fragments of early song; (b) archives and chronicles; (c) laws; (d) prophecies; (e) history; (f) cult books; (g) wisdom books. Parallels to all of these types can be found in the literature of the surrounding peoples. Not all the literature that was produced in ancient Israel is contained in the Old Testament as we know it, nor even in the wider range of the apocryphal and pseudepigraphal books. Some of it was produced as early as the tenth century B.C., and some of it as late as the last century before the Christian Era. Some of it has survived only in very fragmentary form. Most of it is anonymous, some of it pseudonymous, and even that which appears under a definite name is commonly found to be interpolated with material from other sources. Some of it is definitely religious, and some of it would not strike us at first as being religious literature at all. Two main questions should therefore be asked: How and why did the various books of the present Old Testament come to be considered as having such religious authority as to be included in a canon of scripture, and how and why did other books come to be excluded from that canon?

III. The Word Canon

The Greek word κανών comes from a Semitic word meaning "reed." The reed was one of man's earliest measuring instruments, so that κανών, whose earliest meaning in Greek was "straight rod," came to designate specifically "measuring rod" such as was used by carpenters, and then metaphorically, like the Latin norma or regula, came to stand for that which regulates, rules, or serves as a norm or pattern for other things. Later in literary criticism the Alexandrian grammarians referred to their collection of ancient writings as a κανών, because this collection was the standard for pure language and the model for composition. From this, by an easy step, came its use in ethics for the standard of good living. It is in this ethical sense that the word is used in the New Testament (Gal. 6:16; II Cor. 10:13-16) as the rule for conduct or doctrine, and in the early church for the "rule of faith and conduct." As the rule of faith was based on the scriptures we find the word associated with scripture as early as Origen. According to the usage of the early ecclesiastical writers, however, there is some confusion among three meanings of the words "canonical scripture." Sometimes it seems to mean that the books were constituted into a standard, that is, they were the κανών by which other things were to be judged. Sometimes the idea seems to be that they were books which corresponded to a standard, namely, the standard of faith. And sometimes it would appear to mean that these are the books which have been taken up into an authoritative catalogue. In all three cases, however, there is the recognition of a definite body of literature considered to be canonical.

IV. The Various Witnesses of the Canon

While the Christians took over a scripture from the Jews, they did not take over any well-defined collection. In fact, in the latter part of the second century we find a Christian bishop, Melito of Sardis, puzzled as to the exact number and order of the Old Testament books, and undertaking a journey to the East "accurately to ascertain" what the truth of the matter might be. In the early Christian centuries, indeed, there was some dispute among the Jews themselves as to the extent of the canon, though Jewish consensus was in favor of the collection we have in our Protestant Bible. The earliest Christian communities had largely followed Alexandrian usage, but after Origen's labors on the text, the Greek-speaking churches tended to follow the Jewish consensus, and this attitude was supported by Jerome. In the Latin-speaking churches, however, the authority of Augustine drew the communities away from Jerome to the wider canon that had been current in Alexandria, and the Greek churches soon followed. With the Reformation, the Protestant groups swung back again to the Jewish consensus, and, in opposition, the Council of Trent formally declared in favor of the Alexandrian usage as sanctioned by Augustine.

The question of the extent of the canon can thus be approached historically only by considering what evidence is available concerning the assembling of these writings which were considered to have religious authority.

A. Hebrew Scriptures.—The Hebrew text of the Old Testament presents a corpus of writings already selected and arranged. There are in it some indications of the way in which these writings came to be set aside as sacred and authoritative:

(a) The law codes in Israel, as those of Hammurabi in Babylon and of Manu in India, were placed under religious sanction (Exod. 20:1; cf. 24:3-8), and we have references to the tablets on which the law was written being placed in association with the ark and especially venerated. Since it was customary among the surrounding peoples to deposit at shrines documents of an official nature, there is nothing improbable in the accounts of Moses (Deut. 31:9 ff.), Joshua (24:25-26), and Samuel (I Sam. 10:25) writing covenants and laying them up at the sanctuary.

(b) In II Kings 22:3 ff. we read how in the reign of Josiah, Hilkiah the high priest came upon such a book of law in the sanctuary, the reading of which caused great consternation, resulting in wide reforms and a solemn covenant of king and people to abide by the words written in this book, which they were conscious of not having followed. We have here a clear account of a document being regarded as a regula.

(c) The writings of the later prophets and the psalmists show acquaintance with the books of their predecessors, and give us good evidence that during and after the Exile there were in circulation some literary pieces regarded as those in which the authentic voice of religious authority was heard.

THE CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

(d) In the account of the return from the Exile we read of how Ezra came with the law of his God in his hand (Ezra 7:14, 25), a law which he was to administer among the people; while in Neh. 8-10 we have an account of how the law was read aloud by Ezra in popular assembly, and solemnly sealed and accepted as the authoritative regula for community life.

In all of this there is no hint of a canon of scripture, but there are some of the elements out of which such a canon could arise. We find writings considered as sacred and tending to be collected, though there was no fixed body of them, since the Chronicler made use of some which were not preserved in the final collection. We find the sense of writings being authoritative as a regula. We find official pronouncement of certain writings as authoritative, though what Ezra is said to have "canonized" was a body of laws, and so not the Pentateuch as we have it, which contains much besides law and indeed includes material from a time later than that of Ezra. The canon of scripture had not yet come into existence.

B. The Hellenistic Bible.—As early as the third century B.C. the Jews of the Diaspora needed a Greek version of their religious writings, and finally came to have a Hellenistic Bible known to us as the Septuagint. Different parts of it were translated at different times and under different circumstances, but we have actual fragments of it from as early as the middle of the second century B.C., and considerable manuscripts from the fourth century A.D., whereas we have no considerable manuscripts of the Hebrew Bible earlier than the ninth century A.D. The Hellenistic Bible contains all the writings that are in our Hebrew Bible, though it arranges the material somewhat differently and adds some material not found in any Hebrew manuscripts of the Bible.

The additional material in the Septuagint consists of (a) translations of other Hebrew writings, e.g., Ecclesiasticus (Ben Sirach), Judith, I Maccabees; (b) works composed in Greek, e.g., I Esdras, Tobit, Wisdom of Solomon, Baruch, II Maccabees; (c) supplements in Greek to certain of the Hebrew writings, e.g., the additions to Esther, Susanna, the Song of the Three Children, and Bel and the Dragon, which are supplements to Daniel; (d) a fringe of writings which appear in some manuscripts but not in others, e.g., Prayer of Manasses, III and IV Maccabees. It is possible that such books as Enoch, II Esdras (IV Ezra), the Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs, and the Psalms of Solomon, also once belonged to this fringe.

The witness of the Septuagint is important on account of its age and because it shows quite clearly that there was as yet no fixed canon. It treats its extra writings as on a level with those in the Hebrew Bible, and in its manner of translating suggests clearly that its translators were not working on a text which they considered as fixed ne varietur. Its fringe also reveals the fact that there was as yet no certainty as to the exact range of books that should be included in the collection.

C. The Samaritan Pentateuch.—The Samaritans have a Pentateuch, in their own script, which for the most part agrees closely with the Pentateuch in the Hebrew Bible, though it has certain peculiarities of its own, and certain curious resemblances to the text of the Septuagint. We have no actual evidence as to when and where this text was formed, but it is a reasonable inference that the Samaritans provided themselves with such a text after their breach with the Jews. It is furthermore reasonable to infer that at the time they made their copy the Pentateuch was a writing not only recognized officially as authoritative but already approaching a fixed form. The question is the date at which the Samaritan copy was made.

The usual assumption is that it was made somewhere around 432 B.C., when Manasseh, the son-in-law of Sanballat, went off to found a community in Samaria, as related in Neh. 13:28 and Josephus Antiquities XI. 7. 2; 8. 2. Josephus himself, however, dates this event in the days of Alexander the Great, and though there is a notorious confusion in Josephus at this point, he may be right about the Gerizim temple dating from 332, and that may have been the date of the copying of their Pentateuch. Recent scholarship, however, is inclined to think that the real schism between the peoples did not take place till Hasmonean times, when the Gerizim temple was destroyed in 128 B.C. The script of the Samaritan Pentateuch, its close connections at many points with the Septuagint, and its even closer agreement with our present Hebrew text, all suggest a date about 125 B.C.

In any case, the Samaritan Pentateuch, while it constitutes evidence that the Pentateuch, in a form not very different from its present one, was at that time a document having official sanction which could be taken over as something recognized as authoritative is, however, no evidence that there were not other collections of writings also in existence which were equally regarded as authoritative, but which the Samaritans felt no need to take over.

D. Ben Sirach (ca. 180 B.C.).—The Wisdom of Jesus ben Sirach, or Ecclesiasticus, seems to have been written in Hebrew about 180 B.C., and fragments of the text in the original language have been recovered. In its complete form, however, it exists only in the Greek translation made in Alexandria about 130 B.C. by the author's grandson. Ben Sirach seems to regard himself as writing a genuine continuation of the Prophets and of the books of Wisdom (Ecclus. 24:32-34), and to have no consciousness of the existence of a scripture collection that is closed and to which no additions can be made. He knows of the Law as something quite apart and to be regarded in a very special way, but whether the Law as he knows it is to be identified with our Pentateuch is something which cannot be determined. In chs. 44 and 49 he makes a survey of the national heroes, and it is significant that he mentions them in a particular order. In chs. 44-45 he follows the Pentateuch; in 46:1-12, Joshua and Judges; in vss. 13-20, Samuel. Ch. 47 begins with a list drawn from the books of Kings and Chronicles, and this combination continues to 49:6. In 49:7 we meet with Jeremiah, in vss. 8-10, Ezekiel and the Twelve, while vss. 11-13 depend on Ezra-Nehemiah, and vss. 14-16 may indicate a knowledge of some of the books on the fringe of the Septuagint. There is no mention of Daniel, Esther, or Ezra, but Ben Sirach knows of certain praises of David (47:8), songs, proverbs, and parables of Solomon (47:17), and prophecies of Isaiah (48:22 ff.). He may be merely reproducing a list from oral tradition, but his order suggests that he is using source material from a collection very similar in arrangement to that in the Hellenistic Bible, a collection which is not yet on the same level of authority as the Law, but is in a sense parallel to it.

The witness of the grandson who translated the book is more definite. He composed a prologue to his translation in which he thrice refers to the sacred books of his people:

- (a) Since many great things have been communicated to us by the Law and the Prophets and the others who followed in their steps. . . .
- (b) My grandfather, Jesus, having long devoted himself to the reading of the Law and the Prophets, and the other books of our fathers, and having gained great familiarity with them, was led himself to write somewhat. . . .
- (c) And not only these things, but the Law itself, and the prophecies, and the rest of the books, have no small difference when spoken in their originals.

Here we have quite definite testimony to the existence of collections of writings which are regarded with particular reverence as having been handed down from the fathers. Moreover, there are three groups of these, the Law, the Prophets, and the other Writings, which is significant inasmuch as in our Hebrew Bible the various books are arranged in three groups labeled the Law, the Prophets, and the Holy Writings (Hagiographa). Yet this writer does not feel that there is anything to hinder his grandfather's work from being added to the religious literature of his people. As a matter of fact, it is claimed that there is Maccabean material in our Hebrew Bible which was written later than the time of Sirach.

E. Simeon ben Shetach (ca. 75 B.C.).—If the evidence of the Talmud can be trusted, this celebrated Pharisee, who lived in the first half of the first century B.C., quoted Eccl. 7:12 with the introductory formula, "it is written," a phrase used only in quoting scripture; quoted Prov. 23:25 with the words "scripture saith," and perhaps quoted Sirach the same way. If this is not just a case of later usage being attributed to Simeon, it means that certain books in the Hagiographa were being quoted as scripture at the beginning of the first century B.C., and that perhaps Sirach was included among them.

F. The Books of Maccabees (ca. 90-50 B.C.).—Our interest in I Maccabees, which seems to have been written in Hebrew somewhere between 90 and 70 B.C., is that it depicts the whole Maccabean struggle as due to zeal for the Law. For this author and his contemporaries the Law was not only a regula but something for which men would fight and die. He knew the Law as something in written form and in the hands of the people, for in 1:56 he tells us that whenever the officials of Antiochus found copies of the book of the Law they tore them up and burned them, and in 3:48 he says that when the people gathered together at Mizpeh "they unrolled the roll of the Law." Whether this Law coincided with our Pentateuch we have no means of knowing. Beyond the Law he shows acquaintance with stories from Exodus, Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, and he is familiar with the story of Daniel. These he may have known, however, from oral tradition, though the words in 12:9, "We find encouragement in the sacred books that are in our keeping," suggest that other sacred writings in addition to the Law were in circulation among the people. He seems to quote from Ps. 79:3 in 7:17, and has reminiscences of other psalms and of Jeremiah. There is no evidence, however, that he knew the Psalter and the Prophets as we have them.

II Maccabees is a Greek writing apparently of Alexandrian origin, dating from the middle of the first century B.C., or maybe earlier, and while it is so rhetorical as to be of very little use for historical purposes, its author's ideas of scripture probably reflect those of his milieu. As to the extent of scripture known to him, we note that: (a) the law of Moses is to him fundamental to the whole social and religious life of his people; (b) he is acquainted with the narratives of Kings; (c) he is familiar with the custom of singing psalms, though we have no evidence that he used our Psalter; (d) Jeremiah is to him a writing prophet; (e) he is familiar with the stories of Nehemiah and of Esther. As to his evidence in regard to collected scripture we may note that: (a) in 8:23, when Judas was assembling and encouraging his followers to resist Nicanor, after dividing them he "read out of the holy book," which obviously must be some scripture; (b) in 15:9, Judas encouraged his men "from the Law and the Prophets," which are clearly regarded as valuable documents of national importance, and of course may be the "book" of 8:23; (c) in 2:13-15, we have the following passage: "The same things were reported also in the writings and memoirs about Nehemiah, how, in forming a library, he gathered together the books about the kings and prophets, and those of David, and epistles of kings about gifts. In like manner also Judas gathered together for us all those [books] that had been scattered because of the war that had come to pass, and they are with us."

THE CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

A great deal more has at times been drawn from this passage than it will warrant, but one cannot resist the conclusion that we have here a more advanced conception of a canonical collection than we have met hitherto. The "holy book" of 8:23 is clearly a writing held sacred, which is one prime requisite of canonicity. The author uses the phrase "the Law and the Prophets" precisely as does the New Testament, and he probably knew these as two collections, though it does not follow that they included what we now have in these sections in our Hebrew Bible. The reference to the work of Nehemiah and Judas also suggests that there existed at that time a collection of "writings" of the type that we know in the Hebrew Bible, though there is no reference to canonization, nor can we assume that what he meant by "David" or "kings and prophets" coincided with what we mean by them.

G. Philo Judaeus (ca. A.D. 40).—Being an Alexandrian, Philo normally used the Septuagint, though he seems to have known the Hebrew text. His evidence is to be dated about A.D. 40, and the free and easy way in which he deals with scripture is clear evidence that to him the text is not sacrosanct, though it may be sacred. He quotes from or refers to every book of the Hebrew Bible save Ezekiel, Daniel, Ruth, Esther, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs. For him the Law is definitely our Pentateuch, and he actually refers to four of its five parts by their names. All scripture, however, not only the Law, is inspired, and he speaks of "most holy scriptures," "sacred oracles," "sacred word," and so forth, in a way that leaves no doubt that these were writings in collected form having a definite place of religious authority in the community. It is significant that he never quotes from the extra books of the Hellenistic Bible, or from those which were disputed in the rabbinical schools.

The commonly adduced passage from The Contemplative Life III, which makes Philo bear witness to the threefold division of Law, Prophets, and other writings, is no work of Philo, but a tractate of the third or fourth century A.D.

H. The New Testament (ca. A.D. 50-150).—There are abundant references to scripture in the New Testament. That these scripture books were regarded as sacred is evidenced not only by the fact that they are called "holy writings" (Rom. 1:2; II Tim. 3:15), and referred to as God-given (II Tim. 3:16; Matt. 22:43; Acts 4:25), but also by the fact that their character is such that it is sufficient to say "it is written" (Matt. 4:6; Gal. 3:13; etc.). That they were regarded as authoritative is equally clear from the way in which appeal is made to them (Matt. 21:42; Rom. 11:2). This authority applies to all parts of the Old Testament. In Heb. 3:7 it refers to Exodus and Numbers, but in Heb. 10:15 the reference is to Jeremiah, in Acts 2:16 to Joel, in Rom. 9:25 to Hosea, while in Acts 4:25; 13:34; Heb. 13:5 it is to the Psalms. Yet here again, scripture though sacred is not sacrosanct. Quotations are given inaccurately, passages from different books are run together in one quotation, and passages are given as quotations from scripture which cannot be found in our Old Testament, not even the extra books, and are best regarded as Old Testament reminiscences (e.g., Luke 11:49; John 7:38; Eph. 5:14; Jas. 4:5). As to the extent of scripture, we find that the Law is scripture in a special sense, so that it may stand for the whole Old Testament, and the Psalms and Isaiah may be quoted as the Law. The Law and the Prophets are frequently mentioned together and are apparently of equal authority, both seeming to be read regularly in the synagogues (Acts 13:15). In Luke 24:44 we find the Psalms on a level with the Prophets and the Law. Quotations or reminiscences of all the books in the Old Testament have been recognized, except from Obadiah, Nahum, Zephaniah, Esther, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ezra, Nehemiah, and Chronicles. There are also references to or reminiscences of I Maccabees, Enoch, Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, the Martyrdom of Isaiah, the Assumption of Moses, and the Apocalypse of Elias. These writings, both of the regular Hellenistic Bible and of those on the fringe, seem for the most part to be known as written sources, and to be treated in no fundamental way differently from the books of the Hebrew Bible. The writers of the New Testament could thus not have been conscious of the existence of any fixed canon of such writings. The special treatment accorded to the Law would suggest that it was recognized as having some special sanctity and authority, but not that its authority was different in nature from that of the other books. The evidence frequently adduced to prove that the New Testament knows the tripartite division of our Hebrew Bible is insufficient to prove this.

The evidence of the New Testament thus points to the existence of a recognized collection, but one wider than that of the Hebrew Bible. Its quotations are most commonly, but not exclusively, from the Hellenistic Bible. It regards scripture as sacred but not yet sacrosanct, though it treats it as something that has long been held as sacred, and is apparently all of equal inspiration, not, as sometimes held, of three degrees of inspiration.

J. Josephus (ca. A.D. 100).—The witness of Josephus is contemporary with that of parts of the New Testament, and like its writers, he prefers the Hellenistic Bible, utilizing Esdras, I Maccabees, and the additions to Esther as readily as he does the books of the Hebrew Bible. It is in his Against Apion I. 8 that he makes his important contribution to the question of the canon:

There are not with us myriads of books disagreeing and contradicting one another, but only two-and-twenty books containing the record of all time, and which rightly are believed in. Of these, five are those of Moses, which contain the laws and the tradition as to the origin of mankind till his death. This period falls little short of three thousand years. From the death of Moses till Artaxerxes, who was king of the Persians after Xerxes, the prophets who came after Moses wrote of the things that came to pass in their times, in thirteen books. The remaining four [books] contain hymns to God and maxims of life for men. From Artaxerxes to our own time all things have been recorded, but not esteemed worthy of like credit with those which preceded them, because of there not being an exact succession of prophets. There is practical proof of how we treat these same writings, for though so long a time has now elapsed, no one has dared either to add to them or to make any change. But it is natural to all Jews straightway from the day of birth to consider these as the teachings of God, and to stand by them, and if needful gladly to die on their behalf.

It is immediately clear that Josephus speaks with two voices. As a historian presenting his case to a Hellenistic public, he uses the whole range of writings in the Hellenistic Bible, claiming that the whole history of his people is contained in τὰ ἱερὰ γράμματα (Preface to Antiquities III), and that he has written his history ὡς αἱ ἱερὰ βιβλῖα περὶ πάντων ἔχουσιν τὴν ἀναγραφὴν (Antiquities XX. 11. 2), but he knows that there is a narrower acceptance of the range of scripture, and when speaking as a pious Jew, he confines scripture to the range of the twenty-two books in the Hebrew Bible. With regard to this narrower range we notice that:

(a) He considers the process of selection among the writings as having already come to an end, the community possessing a collection of sacred writings limited in number, to which no further additions can be made. Moreover, the textual form of this collection is fixed, so that no one would dare to make any change therein.

(b) The writings in this collection have more than human authority, must be believed in and stood by, and if necessary one must be prepared to die for them.

(c) A principle had governed the selection of these writings, for only such were included as were considered to have been written in past days when the genuine voice of prophecy could still be heard. Josephus defines the period as from Moses to Artaxerxes, and apparently regards the historical works as written by the prophets.

(d) While his division of the parts is the Hellenistic division, he nevertheless clearly recognizes a tripartite division of scripture—law, prophets, hymns and maxims.

K. II Esdras (IV Ezra, ca. A.D. 90-120).—The main portion of this writing seems to date from about A.D. 90, and in it the Law is the essential part of scripture, though it knows of Daniel, Enoch, Job, Isaiah, and Jeremiah, and enumerates the Twelve in the Septuagint order. Ch. 14, however, is a later insertion, perhaps to be dated at A.D. 120, and in vs. 19-48 we have a strange story of Esdras complaining that the law of Moses has been burned so that no man knows what things were done of God, and he prays that the Holy Spirit may come upon him so that he may write out again the things that were in the law. He is instructed to go into seclusion for forty days, taking many tablets and five good scribes. Then after drinking from a mystic cup, he spends the days dictating to the scribes some ninety-four books, the first twenty-four of which he is to publish, and the other seventy to reserve as occult books which will be shown only to the wise. This story had immense popularity in the Christian church, but its interest to us is that it testifies to the fact that there was a collection of twenty-four writings recognized as having authority and as such in public religious use, in contradistinction to other writings which, while equally religious, were not considered proper for such public use. The number twenty-four is interesting, as it is the number of the books in the Hebrew Bible as against the twenty-two of Josephus.

THE CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

L. The Rabbinical Tradition.—The Mishnah of the two Talmuds might be expected to contain the rabbinical tradition concerning their canon of scripture, but though the Mishnah was assembled by R. Yehuda Hannasi at the end of the second century A.D. (between 180 and 200), we can never be sure that in any given passage there has not been later interpolation, so that its witness to the canon can be consulted only under reserves. In the Mishnah there are quotations from every book of the Hebrew Bible save Nehemiah, Daniel, Obadiah, Nahum, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah. The tripartite division of the writings is clearly recognized, though all parts are equally scripture. The extent of the collection, however, was not decided, for there was still discussion as to whether certain writings should be included or rejected, though the Mishnah itself, while it records the discussion, is satisfied that the disputed books are true scripture. From the Gemara we gather that in some quarters the discussion regarding certain books was still dragging on in the fourth century.

In the classical passage Yadayim 3:5 there is evidence of a dispute over the inclusion of Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs in the list of accepted books, and from the Gemara we learn that some did not admit Proverbs, Esther, Ezekiel, and Ruth, though the Mishnah includes them all. Whether the rabbis also included any of the books in the wider list of the Hellenistic Bible is both affirmed and denied. Ben Sirach certainly seems to be quoted as scripture in Erubin 65a and Baba Kamma 92b, and the very violence of Akiba's language against Ben Sirach in Yer. Sanh. X. 28a shows that many in his day must have been using it as if it were accepted scripture. In Origen's time the book of Baruch was also apparently recognized, at least in some rabbinical circles, for he includes it in his list of the twenty-two books recognized as making up the Hebrew Bible. In Baba Bathra 14b we have a Baraita which may date from as early as A.D. 180, and which, besides taking for granted in all its discussion the tripartite division into Law, Prophets, and Hagiographa, contains statements concerning the order of the books in these latter groups:

Our masters teach—the order of the Prophets is this: Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, the Twelve, . . . and the order of the Hagiographa is this: Ruth, the book of Psalms, Job and Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Lamentations, Daniel and the roll of Esther, Ezra and Chronicles.

Here we have the order of our Hebrew Bible, and as the early form of these writings would have been on individual rolls where the order is of no importance, this Baraita suggests the beginning of arrangements in codex form, or at least of large rolls, where writings necessarily have to be placed in a certain order.

In the rabbinical discussions over the disputed books there is constant recurrence of the phrase "defiling the hands." The handling of books recognized as authoritative scripture causes such defilement, whereas that of other religious writings does not cause it. There has been much discussion concerning the meaning of this phrase, but the essential point is that it implies a recognition of special sanctity for some writings but not for others, and such special sanctity is a mark of canonicity. Yadayim 3:5 indicates the date at which the decision was made regarding what writings possessed this mark and what writings did not:

R. Simeon b. Azzai [ca. A.D. 100] said, I have heard a tradition from the seventy-two elders, on the day when they made R. Eleazar b. Azariah head of the college, that the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes both defile the hands.

The reference is to the temporary deposition of Gamaliel II from the headship of the "college," when Eleazar b. Azariah was elected for a time to his place—an event that is often referred to as "that day." The "college" was sitting at the time at Jabneh (Jamnia), and it seems to have been under the brief presidency of Eleazar when the influence of Akiba and Joshua was so strong that many hitherto undecided points were settled. The reference above suggests that this question of the disputed books came up at that time and a decision was reached concerning the extent of the canon. This decision finally prevailed in spite of some rumblings of dissent which were still heard occasionally in later years. This decision is usually dated as about A.D. 90, but may have been nearer A.D. 100, and we must remember that it was only the decision of an "academy" and not an official ratification such as that of a "council," even though the weight of authority of the "academy" gained general acceptance for it.

M. The Apostolic Fathers.—We have no scripture lists recorded in any of the works of the Apostolic Fathers, but from their writings we can perhaps estimate the extent of their canon. They quote from or refer to as scripture: Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, I, II, III, IV

Kings, I, II Paralipomena, Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Jonah, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Zechariah, Malachi, II Maccabees, Judith, Tobit, Sirach, Wisdom of Solomon, II Esdras (IV Ezra), and Enoch. There are no quotations from Ruth, Ezra-Nehemiah, Lamentations, Obadiah, Micah, or Haggai, nor are there any from Baruch or I Maccabees. It is at least notable that out of eight Old Testament books from which there is no quotation, six are also books not quoted in the New Testament. The extra books of the Hellenistic Bible, even Enoch, are used with apparently no feeling that they are not genuine scripture, and in this also the Apostolic Fathers are in harmony with the New Testament.

N. Melito of Sardis (ca. 170).—It is somewhat curious that the Christian bishop of an important city like Sardis, in the second half of the second century, did not know the extent of the Jewish canon and undertook a journey to the East to discover the truth of the matter. Possibly the explanation is that he used the Hellenistic Bible but was conscious of Jewish criticism directed against it and wished to learn what range of scripture the rabbis accepted. The result of his inquiry is recorded by Eusebius (Church History IV. 26. 14) in a list commonly known as the Canon of Melito:

When, therefore, I went to the East, and came as far as the place where these things were proclaimed and done, I accurately ascertained the books of the Old Testament, and send them to thee here below. The names are as follows: Of Moses, five books—Genesis, Exodus, Numbers, Leviticus, Deuteronomy. Jesus Nave, Judges, Ruth. Four of Kings. Two of Paralipomena. Psalms of David. Proverbs of Solomon and the Wisdom, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs, Job. Of Prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah. Of the Twelve Prophets one book. Daniel, Ezekiel, Esdras. From these I have, therefore, made the selections which I have divided into six books.

This order is strange in that it agrees neither with the Hebrew nor with the Septuagint though it is closer to the Hellenistic usage. That Melito should put the disputed Ezekiel along with Daniel, and omit Esther altogether, suggests that he obtained his list from circles aware of the disputed position of these books, though he does not say that he received it from Jews, and he may have been quoting only from an Antiochene source.

O. Origen (185-254).—Origen's witness is of peculiar significance because he was instructed by Jewish teachers. That scripture was recognized as a body of authoritative religious writing to be used as a regula is apparent throughout his writings, and the extent of this body of authoritative scripture recognized by him is quoted by Eusebius Church History VI. 25. 2 from his exposition of Ps. 1, where, after remarking that the writings of the Hebrew canon are twenty-two according to the number of letters in their alphabet, Origen says:

These twenty-two books, according to the Hebrews, are as follows: that which is called Genesis, but by the Hebrews, from the beginning of the book, Bresith, which means "in the beginning." Exodus, Welesmoth, which means, "these are the names." Leviticus, Waikra, "and he called." Numbers, Anmesphekodeim. Deuteronomy, Elle addebarim, that is, "these are the words." Jesus the son of Nave, in Hebrew, Joshua ben Nun. Judges and Ruth in one book, with the Hebrews, which they call Sophetim. Of Kings: the First and Second, one book, with them called Samuel, "the called of God." The Third and Fourth of Kings, also in one book with them, and called, Wahammelech Dabid, which means "and King David." The First and Second Book of the Paralipomena, contained in one volume with them, and called Dibre Hamaim, which means the words, i.e. "the records of days." The First and Second of Esdras, in one, called Ezra, that is, "an assistant." The Book of Psalms, Sepher Tehillim. The Proverbs of Solomon, Misloth. Ecclesiastes, Coheleth. The Song of Songs, Sir Hasirim. Isaiah, Iesaia. Jeremiah, with the Lamentations and his Epistle, in one, Jeremiah. Daniel, Daniel. Ezekiel, Jeezel. Job, Job. Esther, also with the Hebrews, Esther. Besides these there are also the Maccabees, which are inscribed "Sarbeth sarbane el."

His order is that of the Hellenistic Bible, but obviously he had before him the Hebrew text. He says the number is twenty-two, but he enumerates only twenty-one, so that the omission of the Twelve is probably a scribal error. Baruch seems to have been included with Jeremiah, and it is perhaps significant that Esther is mentioned last of all. Maccabees is separated from the list but why it should be mentioned at all is strange.

P. Athanasius (365).—In the Festal Epistles for the year 365 Athanasius gives an enumeration of the canonical books of the Old Testament:

According to their order these are the names. First Genesis, then Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy. These are followed by Joshua son of Nave, Judges and then Ruth. Afterwards four books of the Kingdoms, of which they make the first two one book, and the third and fourth one book. After them Paralipomenon, two books as one. Then Esdras, first and second as one, likewise. After this the Psalms, then Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs. Then Job and afterwards Prophets, of whom Twelve make up one book, and besides Isaiah, Jeremiah, with which are Baruch, Lamentations and an Epistle. Then Ezekiel and Daniel. So far the books of the Old Testament.

THE CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

This list is clearly dependent on the Hellenistic Bible, though it enumerates only the writings of the Hebrew Bible, save that, like Origen, it knows Baruch as going with Jeremiah. Again we find Esther missing, and this time it can be no oversight, for a little later on Athanasius gives another list of books which it is edifying to read, but which are not authoritative, that is, not canonical, and among these are Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Esther, Judith, and Tobit.

Q. Jerome (329-420).—The place of honor as an authority on scripture was held in the Latin-speaking church by Jerome who, like Origen, had Jewish teachers. In his commentary on Ecclesiastes he shows his awareness of the fact that the position of this book was disputed, though he records no objections to Esther. In his preface to Daniel he writes:

I call attention to this, that, among the Hebrews, Daniel is not reckoned with the Prophets, but with those who wrote the Hagiographa. For all Scripture is by them divided into three portions, the Law, the Prophets, and the Hagiographa, that is, into five, and eight, and eleven books.

This is precisely the division of the Hebrew Bible as we have it. Then in his Prologus Galeatus prefaced to the books of Samuel-Kings he gives his famous catalogue:

First among them is a book called Bresith which we call Genesis. Second, Hellesmoth, which is called Exodus. Third, Vaicra, that is, Leviticus. Fourth Vaiedabber, which we name Numbers. Fifth, Ad-dabarim, which signifies Deuteronomy. These are the five books of Moses which are properly called the Torah. They make a second order of the Prophets, and begin with Hiesu, son of Nave, who among them is called Josue ben Nun. Then they add Sophtim, that is, book of Judges, and with that they include Ruth, because it narrates a history that took place in the days of the Judges. Third follows Samuel, which we say to be the first and second books of Kings. Fourth Malachim, that is, Kings, which continue the third and fourth books of Kings. . . . Fifth, Esaias. Sixth, Hieremias. Seventh, Hiezecihel. Eighth, the book of the Twelve Prophets, which among them is called Thare-asar. The third order has the Hagiographa. And first it begins with the book of Job. Second, David, comprising five groups of Psalms in one volume. Third is Solomon, having three books, Proverbs, which they call Masaloth, and Ecclesiastes, that is, Accoeleth, and Song of Songs, which is named Sir-assirim. The sixth is Daniel; the seventh, Dabre-iamim, that is, words of the days, but which we can more significantly call the chronicles of all divine history, and which among us is known as the first and second of Paralipomenon. The eighth is Ezras, which, as among the Greeks and Latins is divided into two books. Ninth, Esther. Thus the books of the Old Testament make up twenty-two books—five of Moses, eight of Prophets, and nine of Hagiographa.

Nevertheless not a few reckon Ruth and Lamentations among the Hagiographa, and consider these two as being outside the number, making up the number of books to twenty-four.

Here again we have the tripartite division recognized as fundamental, but the arrangement of the books is influenced by that of the Hellenistic Bible, and again Esther comes last. Later on Jerome mentions Wisdom of Solomon, Sirach, Judith, Tobit, and I and II Maccabees, but acknowledges that they are not in the canon. He freely uses the word canon, so that we are quite sure that his lists represent his understanding of what was in his day regarded as canonical in the strict sense.

R. The Eastern Churches.—The churches of Eastern Christendom were as a rule much closer to Jewish communities than the Greek-speaking or the Latin-speaking churches, but in this matter of the canon they have preserved considerable independence as to the extent of canonical scripture, though they differ not at all from either the Jews or the churches of Western Christendom regarding the authority of canonical scripture as a regula.

1. The Syriac-Speaking Church.—Some Syriac-speaking groups which remained in communion with Constantinople accepted the Septuagint as used in the Byzantine church, but those which stood independent, whether Monophysite or Nestorian, accepted the Peshitta as their official scripture version. The Peshitta represents a revision of earlier versions into Syriac, and may be dated in the fourth century. Originally it would seem to have had only the books of the Hebrew Bible, for Isho'dad of Merv in his commentaries knows that the number of books in the Old Testament must be twenty-two, and two authors of the latter part of the fourth century, Aphraates and Ephraem Syrus, though they know the extra books, do not quote from them or comment on them as they do in the case of the others. Early in the fifth century Theodore of Mopsuestia—who, though himself Greek-speaking, was regarded especially by the Nestorians as the great expositor of scripture—divided scripture into three classes, books perfectae auctoritatis, books mediae auctoritatis, books nullius auctoritatis. The latter included numerous works of piety which circulated in the Eastern churches, but in the second we find Job, Tobit, I Esdras, Judith, Esther, Wisdom of Solomon, II Maccabees, Song of Songs, Chronicles, and Ezra-Nehemiah. Chronicles, indeed, seems to have been omitted from the original Peshitta, and in the Syrian Masorah there are no Masoretic notes for Chronicles or Ezra-Nehemiah, nor in the Nestorian Bibles for Esther. There is considerable variety in the Syriac manuscripts, both Jacobite and Nestorian, as to the extra books that are included. As late as the end of the thirteenth century, in the Nomocanon of Bar-Hebraeus, we have a quotation from Canon 81 of the Canons of the Apostles regarding the scripture which all clergy and laymen ought to have, and the list runs for the Old Testament as follows:

Five books of Moses, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, Judith, four books of Kings, two of Chronicles, two of Ezra, Esther, Job, David, five of Solomon, and sixteen Prophets. Of books without there is to be Bar Sira for the teaching of the young.

2. The Armenian Church.—There is quite a variety of lists of scripture to be found in Armenian ecclesiastical literature, and the oldest manuscripts differ considerably as to the books which they contain. We have, however, a synodal statement on the extent of the canon recognized in the Armenian church, which perhaps ought to be taken as the norm rather than the richer variety to be found in the manuscripts or in later lists. At the Synod of Partav in 768 we find in Canon 22:

As holy books of the Old Testament shall be reckoned—Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, Deuteronomy, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, four books of Kings, two books of Paralipomenon, two books of Esdras, Tobit, Judith, Esther, Maccabees, four books of Solomon (that is, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Wisdom and Canticles), Job, Psalms of David, the Twelve Prophets, Isaiah, Jeremiah with Baruch, Ezekiel, Daniel, and the Wisdom of Sirach.

3. The Abyssinian Church.—An even greater variety of books is to be found in the early biblical manuscripts in Ethiopic, and the Abyssinian church has a wider range of scripture than any other Eastern church. Fundamentally its version depends on the Septuagint, but other influences have come in with later revisions. There seems to have been no authoritative decision in this church as to the extent of its canon, but the selections of the scribes of the biblical manuscripts seem to have been always from the following list:

Eight books of the Octateuch; Kufale or little Genesis, one book; five books of Kings and Chronicles; Job; five books of Solomon; four books of greater Prophets; twelve books of minor Prophets; two books of Ezra; one book of Maccabees; Tobit; Judith; Asenath; Esther; Ecclesiasticus; the Psalter; Uzziah; Enoch; Baruch; third (or fourth) Ezra.

4. The Coptic Church.—We have no early lists of the books received as canonical in the Coptic church, but from the Nomocanon of the thirteenth-century writer Ibn al-'Assal it is clear that the Copts accepted the authority of the above-mentioned Canons of the Apostles. The text of the relevant canon therefrom differs somewhat in the various Coptic and Arabic sources available to us, but a comparison of them gives us the following list as that generally accepted in the Coptic church:

Pentateuch, five books; Joshua; Judges with Ruth; four books of Kings; two books of Paralipomena; Ezra and Nehemiah; Job; the Psalms; Proverbs; Ecclesiastes; Song of Songs; the twelve minor Prophets; the four greater Prophets (i.e., Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel); Wisdom; Judith; Tobit; Esther; three books of Maccabees; Ecclesiasticus.

This list is derived from the Hellenistic Bible, whose wider range of writings, as might have been expected, has in general prevailed in the various areas that were formerly under the control of the Byzantine church. There has been at times discussion, e.g., in the Russian church, regarding the authority and canonicity of the so-called Deuterocanonical writings, and the various lists of books of scripture in the early Byzantine writers differ considerably, but the prevailing usage in the Greek and Russian churches has been to accept the Hellenistic Bible, and it was one form of the Hellenistic Bible that was formally pronounced as canonical in the Roman Catholic Church.

V. Conclusion

The result of examining these various witnesses may be summarily stated.

A. Preparation for Canonization.—There was a preparation for canonization by a progressive assembling of religious writings in which the community felt that the voice of religious authority could be heard, and this assembling among the Jews crystallized in three stages:

(a) The Law, which at first meant merely the codes embodying the social and religious rules to be obeyed by the community, came to include the narratives of the early history and antiquities of the people, which were felt to be necessary to make the codes meaningful, and the whole was called Torah, or instruction. This later came to be divided into five sections, giving us the Pentateuch. That the Law was recognized as an entity, though not necessarily as a canonized entity, earlier than the other writings, is suggested by the facts (i) that the Samaritans took over only the Law; (ii) that the word Torah could later be used to cover all scripture; (iii) that among the Jews it has a place of unique regard; (iv) that it seems always to have been given first attention in the various translations. Some of the material now in our Pentateuch may have come to be regarded as sacred and authoritative at a fairly early date, but the Septuagint shows that some little additions were made to the Hebrew text later than the date of its translation into Greek, about 250 B.C., so that its text could not have been sacrosanct then. The Mishnah, however, about A.D. 200 assumes the present Hebrew text as something given. Much of the halakah therein is based on a text substantially that of our Pentateuch, so that we are driven back to about 200 B.C. as the date when the text must have been for all practical purposes fixed. This date is confirmed by the fact that the New Testament regards the Law as something known as a definite regula long held to be authoritative, no jot or tittle of which could be lightly changed. The end of the third century B.C., therefore, may be considered to be the date of the fixing of the text of the Pentateuch.

THE CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

(b) The Prophets is the group of documents including the writings of the prophets themselves and the history within whose framework the prophets lived and labored. We have no means of telling when the writings of this second group began to form into a collection. The citation of earlier prophets by later ones is evidence that there were little collections in circulation earlier than the final collection. Ben Sirach certainly knew of scripture writings other than the Law in circulation about 200 B.C., and his grandson knew of a collection named "Prophets." The books of Maccabees know of a collection of "Prophets" besides the Law, and in the New Testament we have evidence of the custom of public reading of sections from the Prophets at synagogue services. This, however, does not necessarily presuppose the existence of a fixed body of writings from which nothing could be subtracted nor anything added. By the time of Josephus, however, the limits of such a collection had been set and a theory elaborated as to when true prophecy had come to an end. If we have to date Zech. 12-14 in 135 B.C., the collection could not have reached its final form before that date, and yet the semiofficial character of the undertaking evident in the Septuagint version of the Prophets would point to the existence of some generally recognized body of prophetic writings when that translation was made.

(c) The Hagiographa is a collection of miscellaneous writings, some of which may have begun to win recognition as early as parts of the prophetic collection. The New Testament quotes the Psalms as scripture, Ben Sirach knows of a collection besides the Law and the Prophets, and his grandson actually mentions such a group. So also the books of Maccabees refer to religious books in circulation which are neither Law nor Prophets. Josephus knows a fixed list of them. That this collection grew from small beginnings is clear. The Psalter is made up of smaller collections, and several documents have gone into the making of Proverbs. Some of this material may be dated as early as the sixth century B.C., but much of it is later, coming from a time when there was a general feeling that the creative period was past, so that these books are for the most part (i) paraphrase or elucidation or continuation of older texts, (ii) works put forth in the name of some great figure of the past, (iii) midrashim on some particular events in the past history of the people.

B. Official Canonization.—Older writers on the canon frequently speak of three separate canonizations, corresponding to the three stages in the collection of the writings, but we have no actual evidence that any one of these three parts was ever regarded as alone canonical. As collections, they were formed and limited at different times, and one part may have come to have a reputation as authoritative earlier than others, but the official pronouncing of them as canonical was a pronouncement that covered all three parts. Josephus knows that the officially received canon was a collection of twenty-two books, a figure which occurs again in Origen and is known to Jerome. II Esdras (IV Ezra) says it was of twenty-four books, which is the rabbinical number and the number given by Jerome in his preface to Daniel; the difference, Jerome says, depending on counting or not counting Ruth and Lamentations as separate. This official pronouncement was made at the Assembly at Jamnia, although it was not universally accepted.

C. Resistance to Official Canonization.—The Hellenistic Bible continued to perpetuate a larger collection, and the various translations from the Septuagint—the Coptic, the Armenian, the Ethiopic—carried yet further this larger collection. On the other hand, we find that some books admitted in the Jewish tradition (twenty-two or twenty-four) were not included elsewhere, for example, Esther and Chronicles in the earlier Syriac tradition. Even among the Jews, quite apart from the echoes in the Talmud of discussions over the standing of certain books, we know from Yadayim 4:6 that the Sadducees did not accept without demur this limitation of the books, and we are told that the Essenes had books of their own which the postulant for admission to their sect had to swear to preserve.

When we inquire more carefully into the canonization of the twenty-two or twenty-four books among the Jews, we discover the following facts:

(a) It bears traces of the handiwork of the scribes, the Sopherim. The whole discussion regarding the "defiling of hands" in connection with the scrolls of the scriptures, whether they defiled when written in Aramaic or only when in Hebrew, whether the spaces above and below the letters defile, or the erasures, or the blanks at the end, all these things show the preoccupation of the Sopherim, and it was apparently their work that led to official action regarding sacred scripture.

(b) It was a Pharisaic ordinance and regulation which the Sadducees did not accept without protest, and which they actually accused the Pharisees of inventing.

(c) It originated in Palestine. The oft-suggested antithesis between the Alexandrine and the Palestinian canon is fictitious. There never were two canons. In New Testament times we find such a book as Enoch in use both in Alexandria and in Palestine. In Palestine there came about a definite narrowing of the range of the books to be included in the finally fixed collection, and this was the only official canonization of the books of the Old Testament.

The discussions regarding the inclusion or noninclusion of certain books show that the idea of a canonization of a limited number of books must have been in the minds of the rabbis for some time. That it was not a settled question in 130 B.C. is clear from the prologue of the grandson of Ben Sirach, nor could it have been settled in 114 B.C. when Lysimachus of Jerusalem translated Esther into Greek, for had there been a recognized collection he would hardly have felt at liberty to add to that book the legendary embellishments we find there. As the question of the disputed books divided the schools of Hillel and Shammai, it must have been a live question in the first century A.D., and probably was so fairly early in that century.

When we ask why the question should have arisen in an acute form just at that time, we find two answers given:

(a) When men felt that the genuine voice of religious authority was no longer to be heard, it was a matter of some importance to assemble those writings in which the community agreed it had been heard. This feeling, however, had long been present in Israel, and there must have been something that made it suddenly a matter of urgency to settle for the community the question of canonicity. One theory is that it was the rise of apocalyptic. The apocalyptic books with their grandiose visions of the future tended to wean men's minds from the past in which the religious life of the community was rooted, and in a subtle way to supersede the older literature. The law had been given through Moses, but these books went behind Moses to supposed writings of Enoch and Seth and Noah, to testaments of Adam and Abraham, which as such laid claim to be superior books. II Esdras (IV Ezra) boldly asked that the seventy extra books that Ezra produced be kept apart and delivered only to those who were wise among the community, "for in [such books] is the spring of understanding, the fountain of wisdom, and the stream of knowledge" (II Esdras 14:47). To check this apocalyptic the Sopherim elaborated a theory of inspiration; they said that inspiration belonged to the prophetic office, which began with Moses, and ended, as we learn from Josephus, in the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, or according to the rabbinical writings, in the time of Alexander the Great. Therefore all books supposed to have been written before Moses, or those written later than the period of the prophets, were to be excluded. Thereafter the writings which were accepted into the canon gained their place only because they were supposed to have been written during the period of prophetic activity. This theory excluded Ben Sirach and the books of Maccabees, but Maccabean pieces included in the Psalter got in because they were covered by the name of David. Daniel and Job were considered to be of prophetic origin, and all that was ascribed to Isaiah and Zechariah found a place in the collection, however much later some of this material may be. Song of Songs, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes were covered by the name of Solomon, and the exclusion of Wisdom and the Psalms of Solomon, which also bore the name of Solomon, can be explained only on the ground of language, since Greek was known to have been a language that was not used in the prophetic period. Esther, however, being in Hebrew, was considered to have come from that period. Lamentations found a place because of its association with Jeremiah, and Baruch must have been excluded for the same reason that excluded Wisdom of Solomon.

(b) The other theory is that the question assumed so acute a form as to demand immediate resolving at that particular time, because of the rise and circulation of a body of Christian writings. Just as the necessity of excluding Gnostic writings led to the formulation of a canon of the New Testament books, so the rise of what in Jewish eyes was the Christian heresy brought about a Jewish formulation of a canon of scripture in a definite attempt to exclude those Christian writings which were exercising a dangerous fascination for many Jews. With the attempt to exclude these books came the necessity of settling on a standard for canonicity, and by the selection of the criterion of prophetic inspiration, which ceased in the time of Artaxerxes, there followed automatically the exclusion of such books as Sirach, Maccabees, and so forth, and of course the new Christian books which were making their claim to be inspired books and to speak with the same note of religious authority. This second theory would seem to be supported by the fact that the earliest pronouncement on what does and what does not defile the hands specifically mentions the Gospels. This passage is the Tosephta Yadayim 2:13:

THE CANON OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

The Gospels and the books of the Minin do not defile the hands. The books of Ben Sira and all the books that have been written since his time do not defile the hands.

With this may be associated the discussion in Tosephta Shabbath 12(14):5, on what things may legally be rescued from a burning building on the sabbath day, where we read that scriptures may be rescued but not Gospels or the books of the Minin (i.e., heretics), even though they contain names of God. It has been pointed out that while the earliest mention of an ordinance against Christian and heretical books dates from between A.D. 70 and 90, it is in the years 100 to 130 that we find all the Jewish leaders inveighing violently against the heretics and their books. Suddenly, in the second half of the second century, polemic against the Christians abruptly ceased, so that when the Mishnah was redacted at the end of the century, it included none of the defensive ordinances against Christianity such as are in the Tosephtas and Baraitas. The distinction had been made so clear between Jewish scripture and Christian scripture that the latter had become of little danger to the Jewish community, and thus from now on we hear nothing within Judaism concerning the canon of scripture save some echoes of controversy as to whether some of the books included when the canon was defined had not better have been left out. Christians continued to use the larger collection, but when Jewish revisions of the Greek were made, they limited themselves to those books in the now definitely fixed Hebrew canon.

VI. Selected Bibliography

- BENTZEN, AAGE. Introduction to the Old Testament. Copenhagen: G. E. C. Gad, 1948. Vol. I, pp. 20-41.
- BUDDE, KARL. Article, "Canon, Old Testament," in T. K. Cheyne, ed., Encyclopaedia Biblica. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1899. Vol. I, pp. 649-74.
- BUHL, FRANTS. Canon and Text of the Old Testament, tr. John Macpherson. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1892.
- EISSFELDT, OTTO. Einleitung in das Alte Testament. Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1934. Pp. 614-30.
- MARCOLIS, M. L. The Hebrew Scriptures in the Making. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1922.
- OSTBORN, GUNNAR. Cult and Canon: A Study in the Canonization of the Old Testament. Uppsala: A.-B. Lundequistska, 1951.
- PFEIFFER, R. H. Introduction to the Old Testament. New York: Harper & Bros., 1941. Pp. 50-70.
- RYLE, H. E. The Canon of the Old Testament. 2nd ed. London: Macmillan & Co., 1925.
- SMITH, W. ROBERTSON. The Old Testament in the Jewish Church. 2nd ed. rev. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1892.
- STRACK, H. L. Article, "Canon of Scripture," in S. M. Jackson, ed., The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1908. Vol. II, pp. 388-93.
- WILDEBOER, G. The Origin of the Canon of the Old Testament, tr. B. W. Bacon. London: Luzac & Co., 1895.
- WOODS, F. H. Article, "Old Testament Canon," in James Hastings, ed., A Dictionary of the Bible. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1900. Vol. III, pp. 604-16.
- ZEITLIN, S. An Historical Study of the Canonization of the Hebrew Scriptures. Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society of America, 1933.

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

by ARTHUR JEFFERY

- I. Primitive Documents
- II. The Early Collection
- III. The Completed Collection
 - A. Textual Markings
 - B. Verse and Sense Divisions
 - C. Peculiarities of Orthography
- IV. The Masorettes
 - A. Statistical Masorah
 - B. Exegetical Masorah
 - C. Text-Critical Masorah
- V. The Printed Text

- VI. The Ancient Versions
 - A. The Samaritan Pentateuch
 - B. The Aramaic Targums
 - C. The Greek Versions
 - D. The Syriac Versions
 - E. The Latin Versions
 - F. The Coptic Versions
 - G. The Armenian Version
 - H. The Arabic Versions
 - J. The Ethiopic Version
 - K. The Georgian Version
 - L. Conclusion
- VII. Selected Bibliography

Modern English versions of the Old Testament are based in the first instance on the Masoretic text of the canonical Hebrew Scripture (see articles, "The Canon of the Old Testament," pp. 32-45, and "The English Bible," pp. 84-105). The Masoretic text was established from the fifth to the tenth centuries of the Christian Era by several generations of Jewish scholars, most of whom were called "Masorettes" (from the word Masorah, "tradition").

Of none of the documents received into the canonical collection of Hebrew Scripture do we possess the original autograph; nor do we possess the original text of the collection as it was written out at the time of its acceptance as canonical. Thus a history of the text of the Old Testament, however we may divide it for convenience of study, falls chronologically into three periods: (a) the history of the text of the original documents before the time of their definite acceptance into a canonical collection; (b) the history of the text of this canonical collection till the time of its receiving a fixed form at the hands of the Masorettes; (c) the history of the Masoretic text from the date of its fixing till the appearance of the printed editions we now use. It will never be possible to write the complete history of the text, with all the changes it underwent throughout this long period of transmission, for history must be based on evidence, and at all too many places in our survey the evidence available to us is too fragmentary and uncertain to permit more than conjectures.

I. Primitive Documents

Some of the material that is now contained in the canonical books of the Old Testament was doubtless handed down orally from generation to generation for a considerable time before any attempt was made to set it down in writing. In the case of other religions also we know of sacred poetry and legend, sacred laws, liturgies, and rituals being handed down and preserved throughout many generations in unwritten form. In all such cases there can be no doubt that during the period of oral transmission the text underwent many modifications. Sometimes a given text has been transmitted in two or more parallel forms, and this fact enables us to see how various types of error and change may occur. The claim has been made that a special providence preserved the documents of the Old and the New Testaments from all contamination by the various types of corruption which normally affect documents during the long process of their transmission. Precisely the same claim is made by other religions for their scriptures, but the evidence in our hands makes it quite clear that in all cases such claims are baseless. The text of the Old Testament in its written form has demonstrably been subject to alteration and modification in the process of transmission, and there is no reason to think that it did not suffer similarly during the period of oral transmission before it was recorded in written form. This does not necessarily mean that the text has been altered with evil intent. The correctors may have meant well. Obsolete words tend to be replaced by words in more common use; expressions which the taste of a later day finds objectionable tend to be toned down or replaced; explanatory glosses come to be added as an aid to understanding a text. Although such modifications are made with good intent, they constitute a tampering with the text and must be technically considered as cases of textual corruption.

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

How early any of the Old Testament material was written down, or in what form, we cannot say with certainty. Written material of a religious nature was found in the Near East at an early period, perhaps as early as the fourth millennium B.C. The Pyramid texts of the early dynasties in Egypt present material which strongly suggests that it is derived from written material of the predynastic period. Temple records in Mesopotamia may be even earlier than this. A publication by Maurice Dunand¹ suggests that in Canaan pictographic script may have been in use, at least at Byblos, not very much later, while a pseudo-hieroglyphic script was certainly in use there before the end of the third millennium B.C. There is thus nothing inherently impossible in the suggestion that written religious documents may have been in circulation in Palestine during the patriarchal period. The alphabetic use of cuneiform signs in the Ras Shamra texts, the alphabetic adaptation of Egyptian signs in the Sinai inscriptions from Serabit el-Khâdem, the possibility that the acrophonic system of reading hieroglyphs in Egypt may have given rise to an alphabetic system of signs there earlier than the Eighteenth Dynasty, and the evidence adduced by Dunand in the above-mentioned book, suggesting that the Phoenician alphabet may go back as far as the fifteenth century B.C., make it not only possible but even probable that in Mosaic times an alphabetic script would have been used in Palestine for recording religious documents. It is thus beside the point to discuss whether our Old Testament may in places present features of documents transcribed from originals which Moses wrote in cuneiform on clay tablets, or from documents on papyrus, in some form of hieratic script, in which he brought from Egypt the story of the bondage and recorded the tale of the desert wanderings and the laws given at Sinai. Literary criticism suggests that the earliest material we actually have in our Old Testament documents dates from the tenth century B.C., and as we have several examples of writing in an alphabetic script from Palestine of the early Iron Age (ca. 1200-900 B.C.), examples which suggest that writing was then used for everyday purposes, it is reasonable to assume that if our documents took written form in this period, they would have been written in the same way.

References to writing in the Old Testament are not numerous. In Genesis there is no allusion to writing, but in Exodus the JE document represents Moses as practicing the art (Exod. 17:14; 34:28). The more frequent references in the Prophets indicate that writing was common in their time. The oft-quoted "pen of the writer" in Judg. 5:14 is no evidence, for ספר שכתב means rather the scribe's staff of office. The יכתב of Judg. 8:14, however, may be proof that youths in Gideon's time were taught to write, while David is described not only as having secretaries on his staff (II Sam. 8:17; 20:25; cf. II Kings 12:11 [Heb. 10]), but also as himself writing and sending a message (II Sam. 11:14-15). The Gezer calendar of the ninth (or perhaps the tenth) century B.C., the Meshah' inscription in Moabitish of the ninth century, and the business documents on ostraca from Samaria of the eighth century, all of which are in dialects closely related to biblical Hebrew, show us what the script in use in this age was like. The earliest documents in Hebrew at present known are the Siloam inscriptions of the eighth century, the Ophel ostracon of the seventh century, numerous stamps on jar handles, seals from various sites and dates between 650 and 500 B.C., and the Lachish letters on ostraca from the sixth century. All these use that same type of script.

The Siloam inscriptions are incised on stone, as are the Gezer calendar and the Moabite inscription. Religious inscriptions carved on stone are known from very early periods in the Near East. In the Old Testament itself we read of Moses having his laws on tables of stone (Exod. 31:18; 34:1, 28), while laws written on stones were set up beyond Jordan (Deut. 27:2-3; Josh. 8:30-32). Inscriptions carved on wood and metal are also known from early times. The לוח of Isa. 30:8 and Hab. 2:2 was doubtless of wood, and perhaps the גליון of Isa. 8:1 was of metal. The cuneiform religious texts are commonly on clay, and that such a material was used for writing in Israel is evidenced not only by the stamped jar handles and seals, but also by the notice that Ezekiel was directed to draw his plan of Jerusalem on a tile (לבנה, Ezek. 4:1). Writing that is painted, not incised, is known from quite early times in Egypt, and on a variety of materials. This method of writing served to introduce new materials such as linen, leather, ostraca, and papyri, and with these developed the use of ink. Ostraca were used mostly for nonliterary documents. We have representations on both Mesopotamian and Egyptian monuments of scribes using leather or parchment scrolls. The Letter to Aristaeus (ca. 110 B.C.) assumes that it was customary for scripture books to be copied on parchment. The story of the cutting and burning of the roll of which we read in Jer. 36:23 suggests papyrus rather than leather, and indeed the Greek translation assumes that it was a papyrus roll. Papyrus was used in Egypt at an early date. The story of Wen Amon (ca. 1110 B.C.) shows that large quantities of this writing material were being imported into Byblos, a fact which suggests its common use in other centers also. As a matter of fact, a number of seals in the collection of the Palestine Museum bear evidence of having been impressed on papyrus documents. It is probable that the early documents of the Old Testament would have been written on papyrus. The sense that we have in some parts of the Old Testament of dealing with dismembered fragments whose arrangement and piecing together had presented difficulties to the collectors has its parallel in the difficulties scholars have in dealing with the Greek papyri, and perhaps can best be explained by the assumption that much of the original material came to the collectors written on this type of perishable material.

¹ Byblia Grammata (Beyrouth: 1945).

The kind of writing instrument employed would depend on the material being used. Metal implements were used for incising inscriptions on stone and metal. Job 19:24 speaks of an "iron pen" (עַט בַּרְזֵל) with which he would engrave his words, and the same expression is used in Jer. 17:1 for the pen which is to engrave the sin of Judah. The חַרְטֹם, or "graving tool," which in Exod. 32:4 is the instrument whereby the golden calf was fashioned, in Isa. 8:1 is used for the "pen" with which the prophet was to write his message. The stylus (στυλός) was a pointed instrument for writing on clay or wax. A brush could be used for writing on various types of material with either paint or ink. The popular instrument for writing, however, was the reed pen, such as is pictured in the hands of scribes in early Egyptian tombs. This is the κάλαμος (III Macc. 4:20) for which the Hebrew equivalent is עֵבֶר (Ps. 45:2 [Heb. 1]; Jer. 8:8). The point wore down and had to be recut, whence comes the importance of the "scribe's knife" (Jer. 36:23), which he also used for making erasures. The Samaritan ostraca and the Lachish letters are written with ink, and Baruch tells how he wrote the words of the prophet in ink (Jer. 36:18). Along with his knife, the scribe carried in his girdle the ink-horn (Ezek. 9:2).

Though individual oracles or poems, records or literary pieces, would be written on convenient papyrus sheets, the normal book form at the time of these early Old Testament documents was the scroll or roll, whether of papyrus, leather, or parchment. Such are represented on Egyptian and Mesopotamian monuments, and in the well-known scene on the Arch of Titus a man is pictured carrying one of these rolls. That the Hebrew סֵפֶר, "book," was a scroll is clear from Isa. 34:4, where we read that the heavens are to be rolled up like a סֵפֶר. So the מְגִלָּה of Jer. 36:14 is in Ezek. 2:9 called "the roll of a book." In ancient times such scrolls or rolls were usually small in size, and it may be that the dividing of certain parts of the Old Testament is due to the fact that only so much writing could be contained conveniently in a normal-sized roll. The cursive character of the writing on the ostraca, which is also reflected in the style of the writing in the Siloam inscription, suggests extensive practice of writing, so that we may think of the early documents we are considering as having been written in cursive fashion by professional or semiprofessional scribes. In Jer. 36:18 the prophet pronounces the words with his mouth and Baruch writes them in the scroll, but it is by no means unlikely that some of the early documents whose content was later incorporated in the Old Testament may have been written by their authors and not dictated. The three words for "scribe" used in the Old Testament, סֹפֵר, שֹׁטֵר, and טַפְסָר, all seem to be words borrowed from Mesopotamia, and to be used as the titles of officials, but this does not prove that private writers may not have been common.

The oldest specimens of Hebrew writing that we possess are all in what we may call the Canaanite characters, such as were used in the old Phoenician inscriptions and on the Moabite stone. These are also used in the writing on the Samaritan ostraca and in the Lachish letters, and would doubtless have been used for writing the originals of the Old Testament documents of the earliest period. These characters continued to be used on coins as late as the Jewish revolt of A.D. 132-35, and in a modified form are still used by the Samaritans for their religious books. When the Aramaeans came into Asia Anterior and began to write their Aramaic language, they also made use of these Canaanite characters, but in their hands the characters underwent certain modifications. We can see the earlier forms in the inscriptions from Zendjirli of the eighth century B.C., but by the time we reach the Elephantine papyri of the fifth century, these Aramaic characters have a definite style of their own. A little before the time of Christ we find some inscriptions in Hebrew, such as that at 'Araq al-Amir, which are written in this Aramaic form of the script, and in the early centuries after Christ the writing on the Jewish ossuaries and the inscriptions, such as that of the mosaic at 'Ain Dūk, are also in this script. The Elephantine papyri were written for, if not actually by, Jews, and there is reason to believe that with the increasing use of the Aramaic language in Palestine this Aramaic form of script gradually superseded the older Canaanitish form in documents for official usage, though the survival of it in Samaritan and the fragments of Leviticus from the 'Ain Feshka cave suggest that the old script for long continued in popular use alongside it. Every manuscript of the Old Testament that has survived, including the Nash papyrus and the Dead Sea scrolls, which are our oldest specimens of biblical manuscripts in Hebrew, and may be pre-Christian, are written in a variety of this Aramaic type of script known as the "square script." There are in the Bible certain passages that are in the Aramaic language, and it is not improbable that they, along with some of the postexilic material in Hebrew, may have been originally written in the Aramaic script. It seems certain that by the time our documents were gathered together in a form ready for canonization, they would all have been written in this script. Some readings in our present text are due to the confusion of letters which are similar in the square script but not in the older script and are not represented in the Septuagint which fact points to the same conclusion.

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

At the time the Pentateuch was first translated into Greek it was still in the older style of script. This is clear from the fact that certain of the mistakes of translation in that version are best explained as due to the confusion of letters which are much alike in the old script but which would not have been likely to be confused in the Aramaic script. Outside the Pentateuch, however, there are mistakes of translation in the Septuagint which seem to be due to confusion of those letters which are similar in form in the Aramaic script. Josephus at one place² speaks of copies of the Law in the old script, though elsewhere³ he seems to know of books in the Aramaic character. That the Samaritans made their copy of the Pentateuch in the old characters suggests that about 122 B.C. manuscripts of the Pentateuch were still circulating in that style of script. In the Gospels, however, we find the yōdh referred to as the smallest letter (Matt. 5:18), which it was in the Aramaic square script but not in the old script. As this is the period when we begin to find Jewish inscriptions appearing in the Aramaic characters, we may perhaps date the complete change-over into this type of script as having taken place in the first century B.C. Later Jewish writers found it necessary to explain this change in script to the square, or what they called the "Assyrian" script, and so we have the curious passages in the Talmud, B. Sanhedrin 21b, Yer. Meg. I. 71b-c, and Tosephta Sanhedrin 4:7-8.

The text at this early period would have been a bare consonantal text, though with a beginning of the use of the matres lectionis. Some of the inscriptions, such as the Mesha' stone and the great Siloam inscription, have a dot as word divider, and this is found in the Samaritan ostraca. No such device, however, is used in the Lachish letters, and the fact that numerous translations in the Septuagint depend on a different word division from that in our present Hebrew text makes it fairly certain that the earliest manuscripts would have had neither marks for word division nor signs of verse division, though they may have had some simple form of paragraphing such as may be seen in the Dead Sea scrolls. The inscriptions reveal the practice of abbreviation, and there are certain phenomena in our present text which suggest that various types of abbreviation were used in earlier copies, which later generations of scribes did not fully understand.

II. The Early Collection

In the wider sense the history of the text commenced when the first material came to be composed. Some of this, as we have seen, may have circulated in oral form long before it was written down, and even when reduced to written form may have had considerable circulation before it came to be regarded as scripture material, and as such copied for community use. In the narrower sense, therefore, the history of the text, as a text of canonical scripture, begins only when a group of documents comes to be copied as a collection of writings of religious authority. Even then there will normally be a long period of transmission before any attempt is made to fix the text in a definite form. Some documents in the collection may circulate in a contracted, or maybe in an expanded, form. Owners will correct, interpolate, or annotate their copies. Some will order to be copied for them only those portions which have interest to them, or may have portions from different sources copied into one and the same manuscript. The characteristic of this period is the free and uncontrolled transmission of the text by copyists who took liberties with their text in a way that was not possible after canonization. Also with continuous copying over a long period it was inevitable that there would creep into the text the usual types of textual corruption.

² Antiquities XII. 2. 4.

³ Ibid., XII. 2. 1.

A study of the parallel passages in the Old Testament reveals the freedom with which the text was then treated. A comparison of II Sam. 22 with Ps. 18, of Ps. 14 with Ps. 53, of Ps. 31:2-4a [Heb. 1-3a] with Ps. 71:1-3, of Ezra 2 with Neh. 7:6 ff., or the parallel accounts in Samuel-Kings and those in Chronicles, shows us not only the wording of statements, but even names and numbers, differing in a way that can be explained only as alterations made during transmission. Curious repetitions within certain books suggest that the text we have is a copy based on two or more manuscripts which the copyist had at his disposal, while other mistakes suggest repeated copying at different times. Some corruptions would seem to have arisen from the process of transcribing texts from the old style of writing to the new square script. Others arise from the usual sources of copyists' errors—confusion of letters or groups of letters, wrong repetition or omission, transposition, false writings under the influence of neighboring words or sentences, incorporation of glosses, and so forth. Some are due to a copyist's exercising his own judgment instead of merely copying, as when he introduces wrong word division or word connection or a false vocalization, or when he corrects passages, either by attempting to fill out abbreviations, or replacing words by synonyms, or making alterations on the ground of etymology. Sometimes explanatory glosses are added, sometimes the text is expanded by the citation of parallel passages, and occasionally there are tendential alterations, such as the interchange of the names Gerizim and Ebal during the Samaritan controversy. In the poetical and prophetic books we are frequently conscious of dislocation in the text. One cause of this may well be that in such books, where there was no such guide as is present in narrative material, copyists working at the task of copying deteriorated scrolls often had difficulty in recognizing the order of the leaves and fragments lying before them, and so tended to join pieces together on the ground of catchwords, with the result that in places quite unrelated materials are joined and related materials separated.

As the collection grew in importance to the community because of its religious significance, there inevitably came into being a body of men who in a special way interested themselves in the care of the material in the collection. We find this happening in the case of other religions, for example, in the growth of the group of the Qur'ān' in early Islam, who devoted themselves to caring for the text of the Qur'ān. Among the Jews this group of men came to be known as Sopherim, that is, bookmen or scribes. Tradition associates the name of Ezra with the formal organization of the Sopherim, but it is fairly certain that for long they would have had no formal organization, being simply individuals interested in scripture, who were thus drawn together, until presently they found themselves regarded by the community as in some special sense the guardians and custodians of scripture. They were by no means mere copyists, as the name scribe might seem to imply, but were "bookmen," interested in everything that concerned the preservation and interpretation of the national and religious literature of their community. It is possible that they came to be recognized as a more or less organized body during the experience of the Exile, but it was later, when the community had come to recognize that its religion, both in belief and practice, was founded on the authority of scripture, that they really came into prominence and had that special position which is reflected in the New Testament references.

From the material in our hands it is possible to indicate some aspects of their various labors in connection with the text. It was under them that the change-over from the old style writing to the new was completed, and in their hands the manuscript form of the "square" script developed. With them the collection began to take shape as a body of religious literature. The text as we have it bears manifold signs of the hand of "the redactor," so it is evident that pious men were exercising great care in selecting, arranging, and editing material to form a body of scripture that would one day be officially canonized. No thought of such canonization was in their minds, but they were doing the necessary work preliminary to such canonization. The earliest versions of the Old Testament were also doubtless due to members of this class. Though the Greek and Syriac translations were later revised by Christians, the underlying work on them was done by Jews, and like the Aramaic Targums, they seem at first to have been quite unofficial undertakings which arose from the needs of communities to whom the Hebrew original was not easily intelligible. Different sections of these versions were translated at different times and in different places, and they vary considerably in both accuracy and style, but their translators would certainly have come from among those individuals whose special interest was the text. If we admit the possibility that some of the documents in our Hebrew Bible are translations from Aramaic originals, the task of rendering them into the sacred tongue would also have been the work of members of this group.

The rise of the synagogue presented a special problem, for numbers of copies of the Torah, and to a lesser extent of the Prophets, would be needed for the synagogues. Great care had to be taken to ensure the correctness of the text thus copied and the Sopherim came to be more and more occupied with textual details. First there was the question of orthography, of improvements such as the introduction of final forms for certain letters, of the increased use of the matres lectionis to ensure correct readings, of perfecting the manuscript hand with its "tittles" and other small peculiarities. Then there was the choice of a standard text to be read in all centers of the community. Along with this came the task of marking clearly the larger and smaller sense divisions in the text, since a correct interpretation would often depend on such marking.

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

Increased reverence for the scriptural books led to a certain amount of correction made in the interests of piety. To safeguard the divine name little alterations were made, names of heathen deities were disfigured, small changes were introduced in order to avoid anthropomorphisms, and euphemisms were substituted for words and expressions which the Sopherim considered offensive or inelegant. One special class of these euphemisms is that known as the Tiqqânê Sôpherim, to eighteen of which attention is called by marginal notes in some of our oldest manuscripts (Gen. 18:22; Num. 11:15; 12:12; I Sam. 3:13; II Sam. 16:12; 20:1; I Kings 12:16; II Chr. 10:16; Jer. 2:11; Ezek. 8:17; Hos. 4:7; Hab. 1:12; Zech. 2:12 [Heb. 8]; Mal. 1:12; Ps. 106:20; Job 7:20; 32:3; Lam. 3:20). It is probable also that the curious uniformity of language in the Old Testament, which is quite extraordinary in a collection of documents of such varied dates, is due to an attempt by the Sopherim to secure linguistic uniformity in their text, just as in the case of the Qur'ân we read how Uthman's committee was appointed expressly to secure such uniformity in the final redaction. It has been suggested that the Sopherim of this period, conscious of numerous variant readings from manuscripts other than that which they chose as their standard text, and desiring to record these variants, simply inserted them into the text, thus producing the very curious redundancies often evident in the present Bible, and which in modern days should be indicated by brackets.

III. The Completed Collection

With the closing of the canon (ca. A.D. 100), we enter the period of the later Sopherim, the chief feature of whose work is the "stereotyping" of the text. The closing of the canon defined what books the Jews accepted as having authority, and it must have become evident soon thereafter that a closer definition of the text was also necessary. The New Testament quotes scripture often from the Septuagint, sometimes from what is virtually the present Hebrew text, and sometimes in a form that agrees with neither. Likewise, the early Christian writers handled the text very freely, so that the controversy with the growing Christian church was doubtless one factor contributing to the sense of need for a text fixed ne varietur. It would seem that much of the work directed to this end was accomplished under the direction of R. Akiba and his colleagues. By the middle of the second century A.D. the text of the Hebrew Bible, as regards the consonants and the first stage of vowelizing represented by the introduction of consonantal letters indicating vowel sounds, was probably very little different from that which we have today. While the old Greek version of the Septuagint shows in a great many passages that it was translated from a text which differed considerably from ours, the new Greek versions of Aquila, Theodotion, and Symmachus, that were made between A.D. 120 and 200 rarely show readings based on a consonantal text different from that of our Hebrew Bible. Moreover, the quotations in the rabbinical writings, though they do occasionally have variant readings, show that the text used by the rabbis was in all essentials the text we have today. Thus with the closing of the canon there was also a fixing of the text. A uniform text necessarily depends on the choosing of a standard exemplar to which all copies must conform, and this choice was probably the work of the Sopherim. We have no tradition, however, as to how or where this standard copy was selected. It was a text that had a number of peculiarities, some of which must be relatively old since they are referred to in the Talmud, and all these were now faithfully transmitted as part of the uniform text, precisely as all the peculiarities of Uthman's standard exemplar of the Qur'ân are still preserved in modern editions.

Any such exemplar chosen as the standard would represent only one form of text tradition. We may assume that in the eyes of the Sopherim the text chosen represented the best tradition available to them, but it was not the only tradition. The Samaritan Pentateuch in many passages seems to be following a different tradition, particularly where its numerous differences in orthography, in the minutiae of grammar, in names and numbers, and in the way its redactor takes over the results of exegesis into the text, have external attestation. The earlier parts of the Septuagint version were certainly translated from a text that differed in many particulars from that chosen as standard by the Sopherim, but even in the parts that were translated much later there is similar evidence. The text of some books, for example, Ezekiel and Job, is shorter in the Septuagint than in the present Hebrew text, while in other books it contains passages which have dropped out of the Hebrew original. Its tradition on numbers frequently differs from the Hebrew, and in places it has preserved a better form of proper names. Its arrangement of material also in some places is considerably different. On the other hand, many little details, such as tendentious changes in name (e.g., משיבשה to מריבעל; LXX: Μεφιβόσθε), show that the text underlying the Greek had undergone somewhat the same process of revision as had the Hebrew. In the rabbinical writings also we occasionally hear of other codices whose reading did not always agree with those of the standard text. Thus we have a number of striking variants quoted from a codex said to have belonged to R. Meir, and a list of variants from a codex of the Pentateuch said to have been brought from Jerusalem to Rome and there housed in the synagogue of Severus. In both the Mishnah and Gemara we find quotations from the Old Testament whose wording differs from that in our present text, and the further we move back historically in the rabbinical writings the greater becomes the divergence from the present text. It is therefore possible that the research initiated by Blau and Aptowitzer in this field may reveal further traces of an earlier type of text. The text of the Nash papyrus, already mentioned, is closer to that followed by the Septuagint than to that of the Masoretes. In Yer. Ta'anith 4:2 we have reference to three codices known as Me'oni, Za'atuti and Hi', but it is doubtful if these can be considered traces of variant text tradition.

Even though the Sopherim of this period were working on a text that was accepted as standard, the technique of perfect transmission was not attained immediately. They seem to have recognized that it was not a perfect text, and modern scholarship suggests that we can detect certain euphemistic and dogmatic revisions, conflations, eliminations of unpropitious names, corrections of unfulfilled prophecies, due to their hands, as well as scribal alterations resulting from a failure to distinguish clearly the guttural letters, exchange of consonants, and perhaps some changes due to the universal scribal fondness for wordplay. As their technique improved, however, they learned to leave the text as it was and simply mark it to suggest corrections or emendations.

A. Textual Markings.—Various classes of textual markings have been preserved.

(a) The Puncta extraordinaria. Fifteen words in the printed Bible, following the manuscripts, are marked by being dotted, viz., וביניך in Gen. 16:5; אליו in Gen. 18:9; ובקומה in Gen. 19:33; וישקהו in Gen. 33:4; את-צאן in Gen. 37:12; ואשרן in Num. 3:39; רחקה in Num. 9:10; אשר in Num. 21:30; ועשרון in Num. 29:15; לנו ולבנינו in Deut. 29:28; יצא in II Sam. 19:20; הנה in Isa. 44:9; והיכל in Ezek. 41:20; מוקצעות in Ezek. 46:22; and לולא in Ps. 27:13. This dotting of letters is a well-known scribal method of indicating erasures, and the rabbinical notes on these words in Sifre (Num. 9:10) and Midrash Rabba (Num. 3:39) make it clear that later authorities thought these words were spurious additions to the text. It is probable that many other words were so marked in old manuscripts.

(b) The Miqrā' Sōpherim, and 'Ittār Sōpherim, referred to in Nedarim 37b, which were directions to the reader as to the correct pronunciation of words or groups of words in the text.

(c) The Pisqā', or blank space left in the text, apparently to mark omissions. Some twenty-eight of these have been noted in the manuscripts, e.g., at Gen. 35:22; I Sam. 14:19; Ezek. 3:16.

(d) The Qerē wā-Kethibh where a mark in the text refers the reader to the margin which gives the correct reading to be used in place of what is written in the text.

There are three groups of material in this class:

(i) Qaryān wā-lō' Kethibhān—words which are to be read though they are not in the text; that is, they mark scribal omissions, e.g., Judg. 20:13; Ruth 3:5, 17; II Sam. 8:3; 16:23.

(ii) Kethibhān wā-lō' Qaryān—words which though written in the text must be omitted in the reading; that is, they mark mistaken scribal additions to the text, e.g., Ruth 3:12; Jer. 38:16; 51:3.

(iii) Qerē—where nothing is omitted and nothing added, but the reading in the margin is suggested as an improvement on what is written in the text. Sometimes the Qerē is suggested from motives of piety, sometimes it is a grammatical correction or a supplementing of the older orthography, sometimes it is a critical emendation of what was considered a mistake in the text, and sometimes it seems to be a variant reading, either a reading from a parallel passage or a variant that has come down in another tradition. Some of these Qerē are quite ancient but others would seem to be very late and belong to the period of the Masoretes.

B. Verse and Sense Divisions.—Another feature of the work of the Sopherim of this period was the completion of the task of marking verse and sense divisions in the text. Some simple form of paragraphing had appeared earlier, but to this period belongs the consistent carrying through of word division, and with it the consistent use of the final forms of letters ך, ם, ן, ף, ץ. The fact that not only the Syriac version but also the Targums sometimes agree with the Septuagint word division and not with that of our printed Hebrew text indicates that this fixing of the word division was a gradual process. Verse divisions are assumed in the rabbinical prescription (Megillah 4:5) that in public reading the translator is to translate only one verse at a time from the Pentateuch, but may translate three verses at a time from the Prophets. Some system of marking verse endings was probably devised, and although the sôph-pâsûq sign of the printed text is mentioned only in late writings, it may have been used at an early period.

It is clear that there was considerable difference between the verse divisions used in Babylonia and those current in Palestine, and there may have been differences among the various schools within those countries, just as we find later in the schools of Baṣra, Kûfa, and Damascus over the verse division of the Qur'ân. The Hebrew text used by Jerome had certain larger sense divisions marked by some form of paragraphing, probably like that of the pârâshuyyôth mentioned in the Mishnah as subdivisions of the Law and the Prophets. The practice of reading regular "lessons" in the synagogue gave rise to liturgical divisions of the text—divisions which might or might not coincide with some of the natural paragraphing divisions. The passage in Luke 4:16-21 does not prove that there were fixed pericopes from the Prophets read as lessons in the synagogue beside the lessons from the Law, though it suggests that there was a recognized portion for the day, and this suggestion is strengthened by the fact that the earliest Midrashim seem based on a system of fixed lessons from both the Law and the Prophets. Since the Mishnah does not regulate this matter, it may be that there was considerable latitude in the selection and arrangement of these pericopes. They would, however, tend to be marked in the text.

C. Peculiarities of Orthography.—Certain peculiarities of orthography the Sopherim apparently inherited with their standard copy and transmitted as an essential part of the text they had received. Some of these eccentricities seem to have existed at an early age. They include:

(a) Anomalous forms, for example, הוּוּ instead of הוּוּ in nearly two hundred places, mostly in the Pentateuch; some defective writings, and some cases of the wrong insertion or omission of matres lectionis, as in Ps. 140:13; I Kings 8:48; Deut. 22:23, 28; 32:13; Hos. 4:6; 8:12; 9:16; Mic. 3:2.

(b) Literae majusculae et minusculae, for example, the extra large ץ in Deut. 32:4, or the extra small ן in Gen. 2:4. There are said to be thirty cases of such majusculae and thirty-two cases of minusculae. Sometimes the use of the large letters resembles our use of capitals, but frequently they seem to be nothing more than scribal peculiarities.

(c) Literae suspensae, where certain letters are written above the line, that is, are as it were suspended, as in Judg. 18:30; Ps. 80:14; Job 38:13, 15.

(d) Inverted nun, where the letter ן is inverted and reversed, in Num. 10:35, 36; and seven times in Ps. 107.

(e) Oddities, such as a final ם in the middle of a word in Isa. 9:6; a ן cut off in the middle in Num. 25:12; an initial ן instead of a final in Neh. 2:13; an adhering ן in Exod. 32:25; Num. 7:2; an initial ן instead of a final in Job 38:1.

Similar orthographical peculiarities may be noticed in the standard text of the Qur'ân, and the simplest explanation of them is to take them as scribal peculiarities in the ancient standard exemplar which later scribes regarded as sacrosanct, and therefore to be transmitted faithfully even in its peculiarities.

IV. The Masoretes

According to Aboth 3:13, R. Akiba used to speak of מסורה as a fence to the Torah, and this word has given a name to those scholars who succeeded to the Sopherim, and who from about A.D. 500 onward concerned themselves with the safeguarding and transmission of the traditional text. They are the בעלי המסורה, the Masoretes. The name Masoretes is sometimes used to include all the work of the Sopherim, but is more commonly used in a narrower sense as a name for those who took up where the Sopherim left off, codifying and arranging what had already been done on text, and compiling the great apparatus of critical, comparative, interpretative, and statistical annotations that go under the name of the Masorah. Their labors led to several achievements.

A. Statistical Masorah.—There was a rabbinical conceit (Kiddushin 30a) that the Sopherim were so called because they counted the letters of the Torah. Though this derivation is unsound, it shows that the rabbis were aware that these scribes were using statistical devices as a help in checking the accuracy of transcription. The Indian scribes who copied the Vedas and the Moslem scribes who copied the Qur'ân used the same device. They counted the number of words, the number of letters, marked middle words and middle letters of passages or books, noted places where anomalous forms or noteworthy phenomena occurred. This practice may have begun early, but it was the Masoretes who gave it its definite form. They marked the middle verses of books, as at Josh. 13:26; Judg. 10:8; Isa. 33:21; etc.; they indicated that the middle verse of the Old Testament is Jer. 6:7; they stated the number of letters in the various books; they marked with a ה the hapax legomena; they noted the number of times the divine name occurs; they made lists of places where a word is written fully or defectively; they recorded the number of occurrences of certain grammatical peculiarities, and so forth. These annotations were later gathered together under special rubrics and recorded in the manuscripts. They are of textual importance not only because they served as checks to the scribes who were writing copies, but also because they preserve evidence of these curious features of the text that was accepted as standard.

B. Exegetical Masorah.—Since the Scriptures were read not as dead documents, but as part of the living religion of the people, an important task of those who cared for the transmission of the text was to ensure correct interpretation of the text as it was read. Various devices were used to secure this aim:

(a) Text division. The paragraphing that had been introduced earlier was now systematized. The pārāshuyyōth are carefully marked, the "open" by a פ (פתוחות), and the "closed" by a ס (סתומות); the "open" having a large blank space left before it commences, and the "closed" a small blank space. The manuscripts are uniform in the marking of these in the Law, though there is less regularity in the case of the Prophets and the Hagiographa. The Masoretes made lists of these sections with catchwords to indicate the beginning and closing of each. With the systematization of the form of worship in the synagogue came the custom of reading regular "lessons" from the Law and the Prophets. Those from the Law were called Sedhārim; in Babylonia they were so arranged that the whole Pentateuch would be read through in a year, in Palestine for a three-year cycle. The schools differed somewhat as to where these divisions should fall, but marks were made in the manuscripts to indicate them. It was to be expected that they would correspond with some of the paragraphing divisions, and where they coincided with an "open" section they were marked by פפפ, and when with a "closed" section, by ססס. These signs stand in the printed text.

The verse divisions, which had been fluid at the time that the Greek and Syriac versions were made, the Masoretes attempted to fix, and they marked them with the Šillūq and Šōph pāsūq. The schools, however, differed on this matter, for we read in Kiddushin 30a that the Palestinians had shorter verses than the Babylonians. As early as the Septuagint translation there were rubrics at the beginnings of some books and parts of books, and these the Masoretes systematized. They also noted on the margins of the manuscripts the haphtārōth, or lessons from the Prophets, which were to be read in connection with each pārāshāh of the Law.

(b) Vocalization. The first step toward vocalization of the text had appeared in the use of the matres lectionis, or vowel letters, and this, when consistently carried through, was sufficient for an intelligent reading of the text. The modern Hebrew newspapers and printed books, just as the vast majority of Arabic and Syriac books, have no vocalization other than the vowel letters, and are familiarly read by anyone acquainted with the language. The scriptures, however, were sacred, and piety felt itself under obligation to avoid any possibility of misinterpretation by inserting signs to mark the complete vocalization of each word. Jerome had felt the need for such signs, and apparently it was felt also in the schools of Babylonia. As early as the fifth century A.D. the Nestorians had worked out a system of pointing for their Syriac Bible, and their system was later adapted for use with the Arabic script. It was apparently in Babylonia in the sixth and seventh centuries A.D. that the Jewish schools, under the same influence, began to work out their system of vocalization, with the intention of preserving the traditional pronunciation current among them. The Qaraites, who arose in the eighth century, presuppose in their controversy with the rabbinical schools a system of pointing known and observed, but we have no rabbinical tradition as to how it arose, save the later attempts to prove that the vowel points were given to Moses on Sinai.

Three systems of vocalization are known to us: (i) a Palestinian, whose signs closely resemble the Nestorian signs. It is known from manuscripts ranging from the sixth to the tenth centuries, and is a supralinear system, used at first only to point ambiguous words; (ii) a Babylonian, which is also a supralinear system, with signs that have certain points of contact with the Jacobite system used for Syriac, and may be a development from the Palestinian; (iii) a Tiberian, an infralinear system, probably of Mesopotamian origin, which is the system now in common use. Once the system of vocalization had been fixed, there grew up for it a statistical Masorah similar to that in use for the consonantal text.

(c) Accentuation. A further system of signs was devised in order to show the reader correct pronunciation, and later, correct cantillation of the text. These signs mark the stress or accent where that is necessary, and serve, like our marks of punctuation, to guide the reader to the logical or syntactical relations of one part of a sentence to another. There are two traditions with regard to this accentuation, a Babylonian and a Palestinian, the latter having two systems, one for the poetical and another for the prose books. They seem to be of the same age as the signs for vocalization, and their forms suggest that they were derived from similar signs used in Greek biblical manuscripts to regulate the public reading of the text. Later there grew up a statistical Masorah for the accents.

(d) Admonition. At places admonitory signs were placed in the text for the guidance of the reader. Thus where the words אלה; אלו; אלה; אלו occur in senses other than that of the divine name, e.g., Gen. 19:2; 31:53; Deut. 32:17, 21; etc., a sign חול is set to call the attention of the reader to the fact that here the words are secular and do not demand the reverent treatment accorded to the divine name. At the conclusion of Isaiah, Malachi, Lamentations, and Ecclesiastes the sign יתקק occurs, preceded by the beginning of the last verse but one, to warn the reader to go back and read that verse again so as to avoid finishing a pericope with something of bad omen.

C. Text-Critical Masorah.—Other classes of notes in the Masorah are in the nature of critical remarks on the text, indicating that though the Masoretes felt that they were committed to the transmission of a certain text tradition, they were aware that their text was not perfect, and knew that there were other text traditions whose readings sometimes differed from theirs. These notes are of several kinds:

(a) The Qeryān. We have already noticed that some of the Qeré notes are ancient, but a goodly proportion of those in our manuscripts seem to come from this later period of the Masoretes. In any case, their present arrangement and detail are due to the labors of the Masoretes.

(b) The Šebhīrīm. C. D. Ginsburg collected some 350 of these from the manuscripts, and many are marked in our printed texts, e.g., Gen. 19:8, 33; 49:13; Exod. 22:24; Num. 8:4; 9:6; II Kings 9:19. It is clear that they refer to variant readings, but whether they are intended to mark emendations to be adopted by the reader, or suggested emendations the reader is warned to avoid, or variants from other codices, is still a matter of dispute.

(c) Variants. When the standard exemplar was chosen it was only one among many copies then existing, and variant readings from other early manuscripts would continue to be remembered, just as in the parallel case of the Qur'ān. Moreover, even the greatest care taken with regard to transmission did not prevent variants from appearing in copies which were supposed to follow the standard exemplar, nor suppress the memory that there had been various traditions on how the text should be voweled. The variants from the manuscript of R. Meir and from that in the Severian synagogue have already been mentioned. The Masoretes collected and tabulated these variants, and listed other variants from famous old copies such as the Mahzōrā' Rabbā', the Mūgāh, the Hilleli, the Zanbūki, the Jericho Pentateuch, the Sharqī (or Babhli), and so forth. There were differences in tradition between the Babylonian and the Palestinian schools, and certain of their readings are recorded as Madinḥay (Eastern) and Ma'arbāy (Western). Curiously enough, some of these variants have crept into the text where they can be recognized by the anomalous spellings.

(d) The Pāsēq (divider). This sign occurs almost five hundred times in the printed text, and seems to belong to this class of Masoretic signs, though its origin and significance are still disputed.

(e) Curiosa. Marks were also used by the Masoretes to call attention to various things they thought of interest in the text, such as the occurrence of redundant letters, the number of years covered by the events mentioned in a section, the fact that in Ruth all the verses save eight begin with the letter י.

These Masoretic notes were written in the manuscripts, sometimes in the space between the columns, sometimes on the margins, and only later were they systematized. One form of systematization was to group the notes in the text. This took three forms: (i) Initial Masorah, that is, tabulations placed before the text proper begins, sometimes written in fantastic forms around the large initial letter of a book. (ii) Marginal Masorah, comprising the masora parva, a system of symbols written on the side margins, or between columns, or more rarely between the lines, and unintelligible without the key; and the masora magna, written on the upper and lower margins. (iii) Final Masorah, made up of tabulations, often arranged alphabetically, placed at the end of the text. A second form of systematization was to digest these Masoretic notes into manuals such as the Oklāh wa Oklāh, or the Diqdūqē ha-Ṭ'e'amīm, or the Minhath Shay.

Since no two manuscripts ever have precisely the same collection of Masoretic notes, it is evident that the Masorah never reached the stage of fixation. Various strata within it can be recognized. There is an old period where the language is Hebrew, a middle period where the language is Aramaic, and a later period where the notes are again in Hebrew. Most of our Masoretic material is from the Palestine schools, but the work of Paul Kahle and his students has in recent years brought considerable accessions to our knowledge of the Masorah of the Babylonian schools. It was the school of Tiberias which finally came to dominate these textual studies. In the first half of the tenth century the tradition of the Tiberian school was embodied in two rival codices, one of Moses ben David ben Naphtali, the other of Aaron ben Moses ben Asher. The latter of these finally won acceptance, in spite of opposition from Babylonia, and provided the textus receptus with which for all practical purposes the period of the Masoretes comes to a close. Later small improvements and additions by the Naqdanim made in the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries are of minor importance. Here we reach the printed text. Jacob ben Ḥayyim ben Adonijah, who edited the second edition of the Bomberg Bible (Venice, 1524-25), collated a great number of manuscripts and systematized their Masoretic notes in an attempt to provide a definitive edition of this textus receptus. His critical method, however, was not faultless, and the Ben Asher text he produced is contaminated in places by that of Ben Naphtali.

V. The Printed Text

Jacob ben Ḥayyim based his text on relatively late manuscripts. We have an abundance of manuscripts of the Hebrew Old Testament, some of them synagogue rolls, but the majority in codex form. The Dead Sea scroll of Isaiah may prove to be from the first century B.C.; otherwise the earliest manuscripts bear dates of the ninth and tenth centuries A.D., but there is doubt whether some of these are as old as they claim to be. Considerable collections of variants from these manuscripts have been gathered by Benjamin Kennicott, G. B. de Rossi and C. D. Ginsburg. In spite of their late date they are the basis for the printed text. The earliest printed part of the Bible was the Bologna Psalter of 1477. The early prints, however, have only a typographical interest. Then we come to the Bomberg Bible printed at Venice in 1524-25. Jacob ben Ḥayyim's work on that edition has been the foundation on which most later printed editions have been based. Ginsburg's texts, both that of 1894 and that of 1926, and the first and second editions of Rudolf Kittel's Biblia Hebraica, started from the Ben Ḥayyim text. The first Christian edition of the Hebrew text was that in Cardinal Ximenes' Complutensian Polyglot of 1520. The Amsterdam editions of Athias (1661) and Leumden (1667) were based on a comparison of the Complutensian text with the Ben Ḥayyim text. A new edition of the Amsterdam text by Van der Hooght in 1795, and revised by Letteris in 1852, is the commonly used text that has for the last century been circulated by the British and Foreign Bible Society. For the third edition of Kittel's Biblia Hebraica, Paul Kahle used the Leningrad manuscript, which is a very accurate copy of the ben Asher type of text, and presents the best Hebrew Bible so far available. N. H. Snaith is at present engaged in preparing for the British and Foreign Bible Society a new text to replace the Letteris edition, and which will seek both to get behind the Ben Ḥayyim model to a more correct Masoretic text, and at the same time avoid the too great reliance on one manuscript, which some scholars feel is a defect in the work of both Baer and Kahle. A large edition of the Hebrew Bible is also being planned by a group of scholars at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

VI. The Ancient Versions

The early versions are important for the history of the text in so far as they provide evidence of the type of text from which they were translated. In the case of the Old Testament we are in the position of having manuscripts of certain of the versions considerably older than the majority of our manuscripts of the Hebrew text. The versions, however, present their own problem. Each of them has its individual textual history. In the process of transmission they were subject to the same sources of textual corruption as was the Hebrew text, were redacted, emended, interpolated, so that the recovery of their original forms, which alone would be evidence of the type of text from which they were translated, is a critical problem of great delicacy. These versions, moreover, are more often than not the work of several hands, and translators vary enormously in their method of translation, a fact which in its turn affects the possibility of restoring the original underlying the translation. We still lack satisfactory critical editions of most parts of all these early versions.

A. The Samaritan Pentateuch.—The Samaritan Pentateuch is not really a version, being the Hebrew text written out in Samaritan characters, and so only a Samaritan recension. It differs from the text of our printed Hebrew Bibles in some six thousand places, in about a third of which it agrees with the Septuagint, and in some cases with the Syriac and Latin versions. Many of the variants are nothing but scribal errors, and of these a goodly number are due to confusions among those letters which the Samaritans no longer distinguished in pronunciation. Some are brought about by a fuller use of the matres lectionis, and so are also merely orthographic variants. Others arise from the desire of the copyist to avoid anthropomorphisms, to remove anomalous forms, to harmonize passages, to make grammatical corrections or to correct mistakes in the Hebrew text, or to express the meaning more clearly or forcefully. Some variants represent a deliberate tampering with the text in favor of Samaritan views, for example, the substitution of Gerizim for Ebal in Deut. 27:4, and other such changes and interpolations intended to emphasize the importance of their shrine in Samaria as against that in Jerusalem. Other interpolations are due to material being supplied from parallel passages. When allowance has been made for all such variants, there still remains a body of readings where the Samaritan text presents a different textual tradition. In some cases we may be dealing with glosses that represent a traditional exegesis within the community, and it is possible that some cases represent dialectal peculiarities. There remain, however, a good many passages where the textual critic must take into consideration the possibility that the Samaritan presents a better and more likely original reading than the Masoretic text, particularly where such readings agree with one of the other versions. No one of the manuscripts of the Samaritan Pentateuch appears to be older than the thirteenth century, but they would seem to represent a text current in the second century. The best edition is the five-volume work of August von Gall (1914-18).

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

The Samareitikon, quoted some fifty times in the scholia to Origen's Hexapla, would seem to refer to a Greek rendering made in Egypt of material from the Samaritan Pentateuch. The Samaritan Targum is a version of the Pentateuch in Samaritan Aramaic. It cannot be earlier than the fourth century A.D. It has striking agreements with the Targum of Onkelos, but also striking differences, and so is probably a local rendering of a common oral Palestinian tradition. It has no great value for textual studies. The Samaritan book of Joshua is not the Hebrew Joshua but an apocryphal work.

B. The Aramaic Targums.—In the true sense, the earliest versions of any portion of the Old Testament were Aramaic translations. They were produced to meet the needs of Jewish communities whose knowledge of Hebrew was insufficient to make fully intelligible to them the scripture as read in public or in private. Aramaic is a language closely akin to Hebrew but sufficiently different from it to make documents in the one language unintelligible to people who spoke colloquially only the other. From the eighth century B.C. Aramaic had begun to spread widely in the Near East and gradually to supersede the other Semitic languages both in popular and in official use. We find it appearing even in the text of the Hebrew Bible in certain chapters of Ezra and Daniel. The documents surviving to us from the Jewish community that dwelt at Elephantine in the Persian period are in Aramaic; a number of Aramaic expressions are used in the New Testament, and it is the language of the Gemara of the Talmud. Where Jewish communities were predominantly Aramaic speaking there would arise the need of translation from Hebrew into the locally spoken Aramaic. Perhaps we may see a beginning of this practice in Neh. 8:8, where it says, "They read the book of the law of God distinctly, and they gave the sense so that they understood the reading."

The word Targum means "translation." In early cuneiform inscriptions we read of the targamānū who interpreted for foreigners at the court, and who was the forerunner of the modern consular dragoman. His translations were for the most part oral, and it would seem that in Jewish circles the Turgemān or Methurgemān at first stood by the reader, and as the scripture was read, gave the sense in the local Aramaic dialect. Before long the office became so important as to need regulation. The regulation is recorded in Megilla 4:4, which says the translation is to be verse by verse for the Law, and section by section for the Prophets. This practice died out only when Aramaic itself ceased to be the vernacular of the congregations. The Targums which have survived are all of Palestinian origin. Undoubtedly the rendering was at first quite free, each Methurgemān making his translation as he went along. In time, however, conventional ways of translating various passages would come to be recognized as the accepted Targum. For long there was a strong prejudice against writing these Targums, and when they did come to be written down, they represented the labors of many minds, even though the actual fixing of the form may have been the work of one man. Neither Origen nor Jerome seems to have known of any written Targum, though we have reference to a written Targum on Job in the days of Gamaliel I. The most important Targum was that on the Pentateuch. There seems to have been an old paraphrastic Targum to the Pentateuch of the second century A.D., which has come down to us in two forms. In Babylonia it was worked over both in language and in form, and under the name of Targum of Onkelos became the official Babylonian Targum. It is on the whole a literal translation, turning to paraphrase only in the poetical portions, but it was brought into conformity with the text fixed by Akiba's school, and edited to remove all anthropomorphisms and expressions thought to be unseemly. A Masorah grew up in connection with this Targum. In Palestine itself the older Targum had a final redaction in the seventh century to form the Targum of pseudo-Jonathan. Both in diction and content this more closely resembles the older Targum than does that of Onkelos. It was the Jerusalem Targum. Fragments of another Jerusalem Targum have survived, though it is difficult to say whether it represents a separate Targum or another recension of some of the pseudo-Jonathan material. The chief Targum to the Prophets also received its final form in Babylonia, though it originated in Palestine. It is probably of the second century, and goes under the name of Jonathan ben Uzziel, though in its present form it cannot be earlier than the fifth century. Portions of a Jerusalem Targum to the Prophets are also extant. The Targums to the Hagiographa seem to be of Palestinian origin. Those to Psalms and Job are early and contain a number of variants from the Masoretic text, some of which agree with the Septuagint or the Peshitta. That on Proverbs is but a working over of the Peshitta version. To Esther there are two Targums which, like those to the Megilloth in general, are in the nature of haggadic paraphrase. There is a haggadic Targum to Chronicles, but apparently none to Ezra-Nehemiah or to Daniel.

C. The Greek Versions.—Although the history of the Greek versions is for the most part a history of their use in the Christian church, they were produced in the first instance to serve Jewish groups, particularly those in the Diaspora, whose language of daily intercourse and of literary expression was Greek. That such groups normally used Greek in connection with their religious life is made evident by the number of tombstone and synagogue inscriptions that are in Greek. Paul on his missionary journeys addressed congregations of Jewish people in Greek. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, like the writer of the encyclical letter of I Peter, in addressing Jews of the Diaspora uses Greek. Doubtless in all these communities there would have been some who understood Hebrew, but there would also have been many who would need a translation of the Hebrew scriptures into the locally used Greek. As in the case of the Aramaic Targum this need would in all probability have been met at first by someone standing up by the reader and making a running translation verse by verse, or section by section, as the scripture was read. The Greek version would thus have begun as a Greek Targum. Since Alexander's time, however, Greek had come to be more and more a world language, and we cannot set aside the possibility that some Jewish groups, quite apart from practical considerations within the community, might have wished to have their scripture made available to non-Jews in the Greek, which was the cultural language of their day.

It would seem that the need for a Greek version of the Hebrew scriptures first became apparent in Egypt, for it is there that from about the middle of the third century B.C. we begin to come upon traces of such versions. They were not official versions, and at times they seem to be somewhat paraphrastic renderings of the Hebrew. Apparently the Law was the first section to receive attention and to be translated with considerable care. Different translations of the Law circulated in written form, and about the middle of the second century B.C. an attempt was made to supersede them by an official version of the Law in Greek. The Letter of Aristeas (ca. 110 B.C.), which purports to be an account of the way in which a translation into Greek was made by seventy-two learned elders from Palestine for the royal library of Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-247 B.C.), is really an account of this later venture. It makes quite clear (a) that there were in use among the Jews of Egypt certain Greek versions of the Law which for one reason or another were considered to be unsatisfactory; (b) that at Alexandria a "revision committee" had made a concerted effort to produce a more satisfactory version; and (c) that a serious attempt was made to have this revised version generally accepted.

From the story of the seventy-two translators this version later came to bear the name Septuagint (LXX). Both Philo and Josephus speak of it in words of high praise; Philo, indeed, goes so far as to say that its authors were not mere translators but could justly be called prophets. Not so long after this, however, we find the rabbis asserting that the day on which the elders wrote out the Law for Ptolemy in Greek was disastrous for Israel. There are two reasons for this change of opinion. The first is that meanwhile, under the influence of Akiba's school, a new recension of the Hebrew text had been made, so that the Greek whose fidelity to the older form of Hebrew text had filled Philo with amazement was now outdated. Second, the Christian church had taken over the Greek translation as its own text of the Old Testament, and had applied the name "Septuagint" (previously used only for the Law) to all parts of the Greek Bible, including the books which had received no place in the Hebrew canon fixed at Jamnia. Moreover, the church in its preaching was insistent that this Greek text was the authentic word of God. As a result of these developments, the Jews made new Greek translations which followed the newly established Hebrew text, and since they took no further interest in the Septuagint, the history of this Greek version from then on became that of a text transmitted in the Christian community by the hands of Christian scribes.

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

Though the Law was the first part to be translated into Greek, and may have been circulating as early as 250 B.C., we have evidence of a Greek version of other parts of the Old Testament early in the second century B.C., and the grandson of Jesus ben Sirach, writing about 130 B.C., mentioned "the Law, and the Prophets, and the rest of the books" as current in a Greek version. To judge by the Septuagint that has come down to us, the historical books were translated with much more freedom than had been the case with the Law, and the translators of the Prophets frequently gave a mere paraphrase of the text. The Psalter has been well translated, though an extra psalm was added to the collection. The rest of the Hagiographa give the impression of having been translated as individual books at different times and by different hands. A number of details suggest that though the Law and most of the Hagiographa were translated in Egypt, the Prophets may have been translated in Asia.

As the Septuagint continued to be copied by Christian scribes, it did not escape the usual types of scribal corruption. In places, indeed, there was a little tampering with the text in the interests of Christian teaching. For example, in Ps. 96:10 (LXX 95:10) some scribes added ἀπὸ ξύλου to the words ὁ κύριος ἐβασίλευσεν to make it clear that the reference is to the Messiah ruling from the cross. What is more important, however, is that no uniform text of the Septuagint circulated in the early church. Origen was well aware of this, as well as of the fact that the texts used in the church by no means represented the Hebrew text in the hands of the Jews, whereas there were other Greek translations which did follow that text. Origen, therefore, set himself to gather materials as a basis for providing a uniform text of the Greek Old Testament for use in the church. This was his great Hexapla, in whose six columns he assembled the Hebrew text used by his Jewish teachers, a Greek transliteration of the same, the versions of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion, and a text of the Christian Septuagint with his own critical emendations. For some of the books, where he had the material, he added a fifth, sixth, and even seventh Greek version. His own work was in the fifth column, and he carefully marked his emenda-tions and his critical work on the text. This was not his critical edition of the Septuagint, but only his preparation for such an edition. Later scribes, however, most unfortunately treated this fifth column as though it were a true Septuagint text, and copied it without including the critical signs. Thus, we do not know what manuscripts Origen used for the text of his fifth column. Moreover, except for those passages where we have help from the Syro-Hexapla or some other source, we are unable to distinguish with certainty between his text and his emendations.

Origen was not the only scholar who attempted a revision of the Septuagint. When Jerome took up his work in the fourth century, there were four types of text of the Greek Old Testament in circulation: (a) the unrevised text as it had been circulating in various forms before Origen's day; (b) the hexaplarian text that had been derived from Origen's fifth column; (c) a recension made by Lucian of Antioch, about 300, which appears to have been much used in the area between Antioch and Constantinople; and (d) a Hesychian revision, of approximately the same date as that of Lucian, which was in use in Egypt. Manuscripts of the Septuagint are numerous, but it is only in modern times that research has reached a point where it is possible to classify them according to their type and lay the foundation for a critical edition.

Of the three versions made from the revised Hebrew text of the first century A.D., and utilized by Origen in his Hexapla, only fragments survive. That made by Aquila of Pontus, about 130 A.D., apparently under the influence of the school of Akiba, was an extremely literal translation, so literal that it is not Greek but jargon, rendering the Hebrew into Greek word by word with no regard for Greek idiom. That of Symmachus the Ebionite, made about 170, is in good Greek, and was highly regarded by Jerome. Both Symmachus and Aquila translated directly from the Hebrew text, but the new version of Theodotion, about 185, was rather a revision of an earlier Greek translation in the light of the current Hebrew text. What survives of these was printed by Frederick Field in his edition of Origen's Hexapla, and only small fragments have come to light since that time.

D. The Syriac Versions.—Just as Greek-speaking Jews and Christians needed an Old Testament in Greek, so Syriac-speaking Jews and Christians came to need a version in their vernacular. All the early Syriac manuscripts represent a version which has been known since the ninth century as the Peshitta ("common" or "simple"). These manuscripts come from the fifth and sixth centuries, but the quotations in Aphraates and Ephraem Syrus represent the same version, which was clearly the text commonly used in the Syriac-speaking churches from the fourth century onward, and may have originated as early as the second century. Of its origin we know nothing. Even so great a scholar as Theodore of Mopsuestia (d. 428) did not know when or by whom it was made. Nor do we know whether its name means "common" in the sense of a vulgate edition, or "simple," in contrast with the Syro-Hexapla. Its manuscript tradition is not uniform, but the version gradually took on a stereotyped form in the language of Edessa, which was used for a great proportion of Syriac ecclesiastical literature. A number of details suggest that it was originally a Jewish version, perhaps at first a Syriac Targum, but it was taken over by the Syriac-speaking Christians, and in its transmission has been influenced by the Septuagint. The translation is by different hands and varies considerably in the different books. The translation of the Pentateuch is fairly literal, whereas that of Ruth is a mere paraphrase. There is a Masorah to the Peshitta which, however, differs somewhat in Jacobite manuscripts from what is given in Nestorian manuscripts. There is no Masorah to Chronicles, Ezra-Nehemiah, or Esther, a fact which suggests that they were later additions to the Syriac Bible. The text of Chronicles, indeed, resembles a Targum. The text of the Peshitta has been more than once revised but never in a systematic fashion.

The manuscripts present considerable variety in the number of books and in the order in which they are placed. Some manuscripts have, after the Pentateuch, a Liber Sessionum, comprising the books of Joshua, Judges, Job, Samuel and Kings, Proverbs, Ecclesiasticus, Ecclesiastes, Ruth, and Song of Songs. In other manuscripts Ruth, Esther, Judith, and Susannah are grouped together as the Book of Women. The Psalter is commonly found divided into twenty sections. Many manuscripts contain as well a variety of pseudepigraphic works.

The Peshitta was translated from the Hebrew, but all the other Syriac versions were made from the Septuagint. Paul of Tella in 616-17 translated into Syriac Origen's Hexapla, which is the above-mentioned Syro-Hexapla. Of these other versions, whether Nestorian or Jacobite, and of the Melkite version known as the Christian-Palestinian, we have only fragments.

E. The Latin Versions.—Very little is known about the origin of the Latin versions save that they were translated from the Septuagint. Latin was the vernacular of the church in North Africa westward from Cyrenaica, and apparently a number of Latin translations of various parts of the Old Testament were produced in the second century for the use of Christian communities in this area. Only fragments of these remain. The text underlying them has some striking resemblances to the type of text we find in Lucian's recension of the Greek. Jerome made a revision of this Old Latin translation. At first he labored at revising it from the Septuagint, but later he worked from the Hebrew text. His Vulgate, however, is not a direct translation from the Hebrew, for he felt obliged to consider the feelings of a church used to the Old Latin translations, and consequently he used the Old Latin and the Greek versions as well as the Hebrew, and thus produced a curiously mixed text. It met with considerable opposition when it appeared, but by the seventh century it had become the Bible of the Roman Church. It has undergone several recensions, and a truly critical edition of it is now in progress.

F. The Coptic Versions.—The Christians of Egypt, like the Egyptian Jews, used the Greek Bible. With the spread of Christianity among communities less familiar with Greek there came the need of a translation into the vernacular of the people. In the third and fourth centuries a number of translations of portions of the Bible were made into different dialects of Coptic. The first to attain a fixed form was that in the Sahidic dialect of Upper Egypt. It was made from the Septuagint, perhaps from the Hesychian recension, though there has been revision from the Hebrew, or from some source that knew the Hebrew. As various books were translated at different times by different hands, we should perhaps speak of the Sahidic versions. Later came a translation into the Bohairic dialect of Lower Egypt. This is the version which is used today in the Coptic churches. There are fragments of translations into other dialects, such as the Fayyumic of Middle Egypt, and the Akhmimic, formerly spoken around Akhmim in Upper Egypt.

G. The Armenian Version.—This is a uniform version made from the Septuagint in the fifth century for the use of the national Armenian church. Legend tells of early saints laboring at a translation from the Syriac, but the current version is clearly a translation from Greek manuscripts of the hexaplarian type, though this has been revised from the Peshitta so as to supplement and correct the Septuagint. In places it supports the Septuagint against the Peshitta, and in places it follows the Masoretic text against both, so that some have thought that its revisers must have used the Hebrew also.

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

The manuscripts differ widely in extent and arrangement. Various groups of apocryphal and pseudepigraphic material are included in most manuscripts, and commonly the manuscripts have prefaces to the various books.

H. The Arabic Versions.—It is not certain that any portion of the Bible was translated into Arabic before the Moslem conquest in the seventh century. After the Moslem conquest Arabic translations were needed by both Jewish and Christian communities, and we have a bewildering variety of translations of various portions of the Bible, some made directly from the Hebrew, others from the Greek, Syriac, Coptic, Samaritan, and even from the Latin. We read of John I, Jacobite patriarch of Antioch (d. 648), laboring at such a translation; and another John, bishop of Seville in Spain (ca. 724), is said to have made one for Arabized Christians and Moors in the West. Moslem writers refer to a number of Arabic versions made in the ninth and tenth centuries. For the Jews, Saadia Gaon (d. 942) made a translation of most of the books of the Old Testament. It is a free translation, frequently following the Targums, and is curious in that it has a tendency to use Arabic technical terms, and to replace biblical place names by others more familiar to his contemporaries. Saadia's version was used by the Samaritans in making their Arabic version from the Samaritan Pentateuch; the Qaraites, however, rejected it, and made numerous translations of their own. The translations from Greek, Syriac, and Coptic are all Christian, some Nestorian, some Jacobite, and some Melkite. The most famous of them is that which bears the name of Ibn al-Assal. Critical work on the Arabic versions has only begun.

J. The Ethiopic Version.—This is a Christian version made originally from the Septuagint for the use of the native church of Abyssinia. Some translation work would seem to have been done as early as the fifth century, but the texts we have represent later translations by several hands, some of whom used the Syriac, and perhaps also the Hebrew, as an aid in their endeavor to give a faithful rendering of the text. The work was probably completed before the eighth century, but was afterwards revised on the basis of Arabic versions, so that all the extant manuscripts present a mixed text. This version has, even from early times, included a number of writings, such as Jubilees and Enoch, not usually included in the canon of the Old Testament.

K. The Georgian Version.—In its early days the Georgian church depended very largely on the Armenian church. For this reason its Bible is a translation from the Armenian, though it has been influenced by the Syriac in revision even more than the Armenian itself. The translation dates from the fifth century and is by many hands. There have been various later recensions, at least of some of the books, but too little critical work has been done on this version to permit any certain conclusions as to its history.

Other versions in these various languages, as in other languages of the East and the West, are too late to be of any interest for the recovery of the text.

L. Conclusion.—In spite of these defects the older versions are useful tools to the student of the Old Testament, providing him with valuable evidence on such important matters as text, exegesis, and canon.

(a) A translation presupposes a text from which it has been translated, and it is often possible to reconstruct with a fair degree of accuracy the original text from which a passage has been translated. Manuscripts, even of books of Scripture, are subject in transmission to accident, to interpolation, to alteration, and to various types of textual corruption. In the case of the Old Testament, many manuscripts of the versions, which are much older than most of the manuscripts of the Hebrew text, at times reveal places where lacunae, conflation or transpositions, and other kinds of scribal confusions and alterations have affected the present Hebrew text.

For example, in Josh. 15:59; Judg. 16:13 ff.; I Sam. 12:8; 14:42, lacunae in the Hebrew text, due apparently to homoeoteleuton, can be supplied from the Greek. In Gen. 4:8, the words of Cain are not given, though the ויאמר leads us to expect them. The Samaritan text supplies, "Let us go into the field," and this is the reading in the Septuagint, the Targum, the Peshitta, and the Latin of both the Vulgate and Jerome. In II Sam. 24:6, "unto the land of Tahtimhodshi" is meaningless, but the Greek, "unto the land of the Hittites, even to Kadesh," enables us to correct החתיים קדשה to החתיים חרשי. In Job 7:20, we have a scribal alteration of the text from motives of piety, which makes our text represent Job as saying, "I am a burden to myself." The Greek ἐγὼ εἰμι, however, shows that the present awkward עלי was originally עליך, "unto thee." In Ps. 16:2 our text reads אמרת, "thou hast said," and so the King James Version has to supply "O my soul" to explain the feminine singular. The Septuagint (15:2) has εἶπα, "I said," that is, אמרת, which gives us the original reading. In Prov. 10:10b, "but a prating fool shall fall" has been copied by the scribe from vs. 8b in mistake for the original ending of this verse. The original ending, however, is preserved in the Septuagint, ὁ δὲ ἐλέγχων μετὰ παρρησίας εἰρηνοποιεῖ.

Both the Septuagint and the Peshitta show in many passages that the text before their translators was in scriptio continua without word separation, for the translator has divided in a way which makes sense (sometimes better sense) but which is different from the way in which the words are separated in the standard Hebrew text. For example, in Jer. 46.15 our text reads הָרָדוּ נָסוּ, but the Septuagint ἔφυγεν ὁ ἄπισ shows that they divided it הָרָדוּ נָסוּ, "why hath Apis fled?" In Ps. 44.4 our text reads צוּחֵי אֱלֹהִים, but the Septuagint ὁ θεός μου, ὁ ἐντελλόμενος shows that they divided it צוּחֵי אֱלֹהִים, as did the Peshitta.

There are also many places where the versions show that in the text before the translator the matres lectionis were used differently from the way in which we find them in our present Hebrew text. For example, in Job 19:18 our text has יְלֵימָי, "young children," but the Septuagint εἰς τὸν αἰῶνα assumes a text עוֹלָמָי. In the superscription to Ps. 5 we have אֱלֹהֵי הַרוּחֹת, "on wind instruments," but the Septuagint ὕπερ τῆς κληρονομώσεως, "for an inheritance," assumes a text אֱלֹהֵי הַרוּחֹת.

(b) A translator is endeavoring to give the meaning of the text before him, so that his translation shows how he himself understood the text and possibly how it was generally understood in his day or in his area. As he stands many generations nearer the original than we do, his understanding of the text before him can often aid us in matters of exegesis. For example, in Dan. 10:1 the King James Version follows the later Jewish commentators in translating גְּרוּלָא as "but the time appointed was long." The Greek versions, the Peshitta, and the Vulgate, however, show that גְּרוּלָא was taken in their day to have its usual meaning of "force," and the Revised Standard Version has gone back to this by translating "great conflict."

(c) Finally, a version is useful in throwing light on such questions as the arrangement and order of books within the collection, the presence or absence of certain books in one locality or another, and at times can give us evidence as to the type of text in use in different areas at different periods.

VII. Selected Bibliography

- BUHL, FRANTS. Article, "Bible Text," in S. M. Jackson, ed. The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1908. Vol. II, pp. 94-99.
- . Canon and Text of the Old Testament, tr. John Macpherson. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1892.
- DRIVFR, S. R. Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Samuel. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1890.
- GEDEN, A. S. Outlines of Introduction to the Hebrew Bible. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1909.
- GINSBURG, C. H. Introduction to the Masoretic-Critical Edition of the Hebrew Bible. London: Trinitarian Bible Society, 1897.
- GORDIS, ROBERT. The Biblical Text in the Making. Philadelphia: Dropsie College for Hebrew & Cognate Learning, 1937.
- GOTTHEIL, RICHARD. Articles, "Bible Editions" and "Bible Translations," in The Jewish Encyclopedia. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1906. Vol. III, pp. 154-62, 185-97.
- KAHLE, PAUL. The Cairo Geniza. London: British Academy, 1947.
- KENNEDY, JAMES. An Aid to the Textual Amendment of the Old Testament. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1928.
- KENYON, FREDERIC GEORGE. Recent Developments in the Textual Criticism of the Greek Bible. London: British Academy, 1933.
- . The Text of the Greek Bible. London: Duckworth, 1937.
- NAVILLE, E. H. The Text of the Old Testament. London: British Academy, 1916.
- NESTLE, E. Article, "Bible Versions," in S. M. Jackson, ed., The New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia. New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1908. Vol. II, pp. 115-29.
- OTTLEY, R. R. A Handbook to the Septuagint. London: Methuen & Co., 1920.
- REIDER, JOSEPH. Prolegomena to a Greek-Hebrew and Hebrew-Greek Index to Aquila. Philadelphia: Dropsie College for Hebrew & Cognate Learning, 1913.
- ROBERTS, B. J. The Old Testament Text and Versions. Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1951.
- STRACK, H. L. Article, "Text of the Old Testament," in James Hastings, ed. Dictionary of the Bible. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1904. Vol. IV, pp. 726-32.
- SWETE, H. B. An Introduction to the Old Testament in Greek. Cambridge: University Press, 1914.
- WEIR, T. H. A Short History of the Hebrew Text of the Old Testament. London: Williams & Norgate, 1899.

THE CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

by EDGAR J. GOODSPEED

- I. Early Collections
- II. The First New Testament
- III. Early Alexandrian Canons
- IV. The Times of Origen
- V. Eusebius of Caesarea
- VI. Egypt in the Fourth Century
 - A. The Clermont Manuscript List
 - B. Athanasius
 - C. Coptic New Testaments
 - D. Greek Uncial Codices
- VII. The Syriac New Testament
 - A. Tatian
 - B. Afrahat and Efreem
 - C. Rabbula and the Peshitta New Testament
 - D. Later Syriac Versions
- VIII. The Work of the Councils
- IX. Further Developments
- X. New Testament Apocrypha
- XI. Selected Bibliography

Christianity originated and developed in the presence of the Jewish scriptures, or what we know as the Old Testament, first in their original Hebrew but very soon in the Greek version of them which we call the Septuagint. It was this Greek form of the Jewish scriptures, including as it did the books known as the Apocrypha, that became the basis of the Bible of the early church, and was gradually supplemented by a collection of Christian writings which we know as the New Testament. How did this Christian collection arise? What steps can we trace in its origin and growth? These books were written in Greek at various stages of the progress of the Greek mission, and they came to be accepted as a standard list or canon of Christian authorities. But what led to their collection into a definite body, and their association with the older Jewish scriptures in what we know as the Bible? The story of their collection and authorization is called the history of the canon.

I. Early Collections

That the early church should have made itself an authoritative scripture and placed it side by side with the Old Testament is from some points of view strange. It already had an extensive literature in the Jewish scriptures, which did not yet form a single book, as with us, but took the form of twenty-five or thirty separate scrolls. The basic conviction of primitive Christianity, moreover, was that it possessed an inner guide, the Spirit of God, the mind of Christ, far superior to written rules and records. Yet despite these facts, it gradually came to acknowledge a Christian collection of books, which it revered just as much as it did the old Hebrew scriptures, and even more, for as Adolf von Harnack observed, the Old Testament was always interpreted to agree with the New, not the New to agree with the Old.

The books of the New Testament were not recognized as scripture from the moment of their origin, but came only gradually to such recognition. The letters of Paul were written to meet definite acute situations in the life of the Pauline churches, and when those situations had passed the letters lost interest for the next generation. It is a striking fact that the Gospels of Matthew, Mark, and Luke and even the Acts of the Apostles show no acquaintance with the letters of Paul. But the Revelation of John reflects them in a startling manner, for though it is an apocalypse it opens with a collection of Christian letters to churches, seven in number, preceded by a general letter to all seven. These letters were not really sent individually to the churches addressed in them, and then later reassembled by the writer through an afterthought; they were frankly and obviously written as a collection, and published as the portal of the Revelation. The writer has evidently seen the Pauline collection of seven letters to Christian churches and has been so impressed that he makes that literary device the façade of his apocalypse. The fact that he begins with a general letter to all seven strongly suggests that the Pauline collection as he knew it, toward A.D. 95, began with a general letter to all seven of the churches Paul wrote to; and indeed Ephesians is most naturally understood as just such a general letter. (See Vol. IX, pp. 356-58 and on Ephesians, Vol. X.)

The letter of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians, written about A.D. 95, also gives clear evidence of acquaintance with a collection of Paul's letters, which probably included Ephesians, Romans, I and II Corinthians, Galatians, Philippians, Colossians, I and II Thessalonians, and Philemon, the last being included as a church letter to the Laodiceans. This made a collection of ten letters to seven churches, Ephesians being the introductory letter to Christians generally. This letter collection was not thought of as scripture. It was read for its religious value, with no thought as yet that it was authoritative or inspired.

The rise of the Synoptic Gospels—Mark and the Gospels of Matthew and of Luke so largely based upon it—between A.D. 70 and 90 was followed soon after A.D. 100 by the Gospel of John, in which the gospel narrative was strongly colored by ideas gathered from the collected letters of Paul. The new Gospel was designed to meet the religious needs of the Greek public which had become the field of the Christian mission, and soon after its appearance, certainly by A.D. 120, it was combined with the three earlier Gospels into the great quartet we know so well. The primary object of making and publishing this collection was to bring the immense religious values of all the Gospels freshly to the attention of Greek Christianity, but in the course of a generation they won a place in Christian worship side by side with the Jewish Bible, and by A.D. 150 these "memoirs of the apostles," as they were called, were read at services of public worship in Rome along with the writings of the prophets.

A few years earlier Marcion, an original and energetic layman of Sinope in Pontus, anxious to unite the scattered churches and shake off Judaism, had undertaken to replace the Jewish scriptures in Christian worship by a Christian scripture made up of the Gospel of Luke and the ten letters of Paul. Partly as a result of this Marcionite usage the letters of Paul came to hold a place side by side with the four Gospels in public worship. This stage is reflected in Athenagoras, the Athenian apologist (ca. A.D. 177), who makes use of the fourfold Gospel and the ten letters of Paul as Christian authorities, though for him they fall a little short of being inspired scripture like the prophets. Theophilus of Antioch (A.D. 180-90) goes a little further in his esteem for the Gospels, though even he does not quite admit them to what he calls the Holy Scriptures. He highly valued the letters of Paul, but not quite so highly as he did the Gospels. So in his day in Antioch the Jewish scriptures were still pre-eminent, though the Gospels too were considered inspired, and to a less degree the letters of Paul. With Theophilus we are in fact on the threshold of the New Testament.

The martyrs at Scilli in North Africa, in A.D. 180, say that they kept the letters of Paul in their church chest, with their church "books" (βιβλία, or "Bible"), by which they must have meant the Jewish scriptures and the four Gospels. We gather thus that the Gospels were in their Bible and that Paul's letters were not; but these letters were in the chest, and therefore were evidently read in church from time to time. In the Scilitan chest, in fact, we can see Paul's letters actually entering the Bible. They were not yet in the "books," but they were in the chest which contained the books.

In A.D. 170-80 Melito of Sardis speaks of the Jewish scriptures as the books of the Old Covenant, or Testament, being evidently on the verge of using the phrase "Old Testament" in a literary sense just as we do. From that use it would seem a short step to using the phrase "New Testament" in the same sense. How did that step come to be taken?

II. The First New Testament

The series of sectarian movements that successively obscured the sky of second-century Christianity—Docetism, Marcionism, Gnosticism, Montanism—led at length to a powerful effort on the part of general, nonschismatic Christianity to exert and express itself. Marcion had attempted to organize the churches, but in too drastic and partisan a spirit. A generation after his day the pretensions of Montanism, with its exaggerated claims of prophetic gifts, precipitated a general movement toward standardization and co-operation among the churches. Types of polity, doctrine, and scripture which had established themselves in historic churches were now recognized as standard and were adopted by all. The Gospels and the letters of Paul were already being read in public worship; now they are definitely recognized as forming the core of a New Testament scripture to stand side by side with the Old. The two collections are supplemented and bound together by the book of Acts and two or three or four letters which bore the names of apostles, Peter, John, Jude. The new scripture was concluded by one or two apocalypses—John, Peter, Hermas.

The sources of our information at this stage of the development of the canon are Irenaeus, Tertullian, and a document containing a list of New Testament books which is known as the Muratorian Fragment. Irenaeus of Lyons wrote his Refutation of Gnosticism probably between 180 and 189. He accepted I Peter and I John (the latter including II John and probably III John as well, which are after all little more than covering letters for I John). He accepted the Revelation of John and the Shepherd of Hermas. Tertullian of Carthage wrote his voluminous works between A.D. 197 and 223. He used I Peter, I John, and Jude as scripture, and accepted the Revelation of John, and at first the Shepherd of Hermas, though later in life he rejected it with the utmost scorn. The Muratorian Fragment on the canon, so called after the Italian scholar who first published it from a Milan manuscript in 1740, is of unknown authorship, though it may be from the hand of Victor, bishop of Rome about A.D. 200. At any rate it seems clearly to be a Roman canon of about that period and has an authoritative ring. It includes two letters of John and one of Jude, and the Revelations of John and of Peter, but admits that some will not have the Revelation of Peter read in church.

It is clear that Lyons, Carthage, and Rome were not wholly agreed toward the end of the second century upon the precise contents of their New Testaments, though the major bodies of scripture making it up were well recognized, and all contained I John and the Revelation of John. It is most striking that with all of them the letters of Paul included the letters to Timothy and to Titus (but not the Epistle to the Hebrews). It seems clear, however, that Timothy and Titus were written in the second century to disclaim Marcion and contemporary schisms, just as the baptismal confession now adopted (the "Apostles' Creed") disavowed the main items in Marcion's heretical views.

III. Early Alexandrian Canons

The end of the second and beginning of the third centuries witnessed the activity of Clement of Alexandria, the head of the famous Christian school there. Egypt was the home of the early apocryphal gospels of the Hebrews and of the Egyptians, which were evidently in use in Egypt by A.D. 150, before the four Gospels were introduced there and gradually superseded them. The loss of his famous work called the Outlines, which contained accounts of the books of scripture, impairs our view of Clement's position on scripture, but from his other works we can see that he accepted a larger list of New Testament books than was accepted at Rome. He knew the four Gospels and regarded them as scripture; but he was also acquainted with the gospels of the Hebrews and of the Egyptians and the Traditions of Matthias, though he did not think of them as scripture. His list of Paul's letters included not only the ten of the original list and the three Pastorals, I and II Timothy, and Titus, but also the Epistle to the Hebrews. This raised the number of Pauline letters to fourteen.

Besides the four Gospels and these fourteen letters of Paul, Clement also accepted an enlarged body of general letters, for he accepted not only I Peter, I and II John, and Jude, but also I Clement and Barnabas, as works of apostolic authority. We remember that I and II Clement stand at the end of the New Testament in the Alexandrian manuscript of the fifth century, and that Barnabas follows the Revelation of John in the Sinaitic manuscript of the fourth. These are our oldest complete manuscripts of the Greek New Testament. They evidently reflect Egyptian canons of the fourth and fifth centuries.

Clement has a striking list of apocalypses in his scripture, for he accepted not only the Revelation of John, but also that of Peter and the Shepherd of Hermas. The Shepherd had been written in Rome and was at first highly prized there; but the prophetic pretensions of Montanism soon led to its eclipse. What Clement thought of the Acts is not entirely clear. He used it freely and spoke of it as the work of Luke. In fact, he used it very much as he did the general letters, taking its acceptance for granted.

But Clement also made free use of the so-called Preaching of Peter, perhaps the earliest of Christian apologies. "Peter says in his Preaching" is the way Clement quotes it. He once quotes a line from the Teaching of the Apostles as scripture, and cites as scripture other ancient sayings which are otherwise unknown. So we are unable to define his canon sharply. He had no such rigid list of New Testament books as the churches of Rome and Africa had in his day. He shows the New Testament scripture not yet fully formed in Egypt, but in process of formation.

IV. The Times of Origen

Severus' persecution in A.D. 202 forced so many Christian leaders out of Alexandria that a youth of eighteen named Origen became head of the Christian school there, and for more than fifty years he wrote and taught, first in Alexandria and later in Caesarea. A rich friend named Ambrosius in later years provided him with such a number of stenographers and copyists that everything he wrote was immediately published, and so Origen became the most voluminous of Christian writers. He realized the confusion in the churches about the precise contents of the New Testament, and while he did not seek to settle the problem, he analyzed it by classifying the canonical books as "accepted" or "disputed." The accepted or ac-knowledgeed books—that is, accepted by all churches—were twenty-two in number: the four Gospels, fourteen letters of Paul, the Acts of the Apostles, two general letters (I Peter and I John), and one apocalypse (the Revelation of John). We know that Hebrews was not yet accepted in the West, but Origen included it in his list of acknowledged books nevertheless.

Origen's own New Testament, however, was larger than this; it included also the "disputed" books, that is, some books which he knew some churches did not accept. These were James, II and III John, Jude, II Peter, and Barnabas. James and II Peter appear first in the New Testament in this "disputed" list. And to the Revelation of John, Origen added the Shepherd of Hermas, so that the contents of his own New Testament, comprising both the acknowledged and the disputed books, were therefore exactly those of the Sinaitic manuscript, the oldest complete Greek Testament known, written about a century after Origen's death, which ends with Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas.

Origen's Roman contemporary Hippolytus (ca. 235), however, was more conservative. Like his teacher Irenaeus, Hippolytus accepted as his New Testament only twenty-two books. He did not accept Hebrews as one of the letters of Paul, and included only three general letters (I Peter, I and II John) and one apocalypse, that of John, in his New Testament. Yet Hippolytus knew and used a number of other Christian books which were sometimes included by others—Hebrews, the Shepherd, the Revelation of Peter, II Peter, the Acts of Paul, James, and Jude.

The Roman church had always been a Greek church, and it was so still in the days of Hippolytus. But he was the last Roman father to write in Greek. About the middle of the third century we find Novatian of Rome and Cyprian of Carthage writing to each other in Latin, and Latin remained thenceforth the language of the church at Rome. Their letters and treatises show that they, like Hippolytus, still held the primitive Roman canon of twenty-two books, unshaken by the example of the Alexandrian fathers, Clement and Origen.

Origen was driven from Alexandria by his own bishop in A.D. 230, and withdrew to Caesarea; a year later Dionysius became head of the famous school at Alexandria, continuing in that position until A.D. 247, when he became bishop of Alexandria. His episcopate lasted for seventeen years, A.D. 247-264, and he met the troubled situation of his times with such skill and vigor that he came to be considered Dionysius the Great. He wrote about the Revelation of John with such penetration and force that he considerably modified Eastern opinion of it; for while he had the highest esteem for the book, he could not agree that it was written by the author of the Gospel of John. This keen perception of his led to the rejection of the Revelation by a large part of the Eastern church; of the manuscripts of the Greek Testament extant today about two thirds omit it.

V. Eusebius of Caesarea

A few years later the Christian library established at Caesarea by Pamphilus was visited and studied by Eusebius, who afterward became bishop of Caesarea, attended the Council of Nicaea in 325, and wrote a life of Constantine. In his great Church History, completed in A.D. 326, he fortunately included an account of the principal writers and writings of the three preceding centuries, particularly where they spoke on the books of the New Testament. He was well aware of the wide disagreement among churches and Christian leaders as to just what books should be included in the canon, and he followed Origen in seeking to organize the whole body of such literature in such a way as to do justice to all sides. But while he followed Origen's division of the books into "acknowledged" and "disputed," he divided the latter class into those that he accepted and those that he rejected. In order to find his own New Testament list, therefore, we must take his "acknowledged" list and add to it the books in his "disputed" list which he did not call "rejected."

Eusebius accepted the four Gospels and the Acts, fourteen letters of Paul (including Hebrews), I John, I Peter. Of the disputed books, Eusebius accepted James, Jude, II Peter, II and III John, and as he put it, "if it really seem proper," the Revelation of John. This lingering doubt about the Revelation echoes the suspicion Dionysius had raised two generations before. It means much, however, that Eusebius admitted the Revelation to his "acknowledged" list. These built up his own New Testament to just the proportions of ours today.

The disputed books which Eusebius listed as "rejected" were the Acts of Paul, the Shepherd, the Revelation of Peter, the Letter of Barnabas, the Teaching of the Apostles. In referring to the Revelation of John, after acknowledging it "if it seem proper," he adds, "which some reject, but which some class with the accepted books."

He has another list of books definitely heretical, such as the Gospel of Peter, the Gospel of Thomas, the Traditions of Matthias, the Acts of Andrew, and the Acts of John. His objection to these books was that they were not of apostolic origin, such origin being decided on the basis of use by earlier church writers and freedom from schismatic bias.

THE CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

VI. Egypt in the Fourth Century

A. The Clermont Manuscript List.—In the Codex Claromontanus, a sixth-century Greek-Latin manuscript of Paul's letters, some scribe inserted, just before Hebrews, a Latin list of the books of the Old and New Testaments. One gathers from its contents that it must have been translated from a Greek list of the books recognized as scripture in Egypt about A.D. 300. It includes the four Gospels and ten letters of Paul (evidently skipping Philippians, I and II Thessalonians, and probably Hebrews by mistake). It goes on with eight general letters (I and II Peter, James, I, II, and III John, Jude, and Barnabas). The list ends with three apocalypses and two books of acts—the Revelation of John, the Acts of the Apostles, the Shepherd of Hermas, the Acts of Paul, the Revelation of Peter. But a later hand has put a dash before I Peter (probably to indicate that the general letters began with it), and before Barnabas, the Shepherd, the Acts of Paul, and the Revelation of Peter (probably on the ground that these four were of questionable canonicity). Here we have plainly reflected a time when there was a group of books on the very edge of the New Testament, about which agreement had not been reached.

B. Athanasius.—This great bishop of Alexandria, in his annual Easter letter to the churches of his diocese in A.D. 367, gave a list of the books of scripture. His New Testament consisted of the four Gospels, the Acts, seven general letters, James, I and II Peter, I, II, and III John, and Jude; fourteen letters of Paul (including Hebrews), and the Revelation of John. This is just our canon today. But Athanasius adds a supplementary list of books "to be read by those just coming forward to receive oral instruction in religion." Of these, five are from the Apocrypha, the others being the Teaching of the Apostles and the Shepherd of Hermas. Athanasius had made use of the Shepherd in his early writings, but by 367, when he was more than seventy years old, he had given up the idea that it could be regarded as scripture. Athanasius' visits to the West had restored his confidence in the Revelation of John, though even there the Gothic New Testament of Ulphilas, a younger contemporary of Athanasius, did not include it.

C. Coptic New Testaments.—Of the Coptic versions, the oldest, the Sahidic, which began to take shape between A.D. 250 and 350, contained all the books of Athanasius' canon. But the Shepherd and I Clement also passed very early into Sahidic, and may have been regarded as scripture in Sahidic circles. The Acts of Paul was also translated into an Akhmimic-Sahidic version, which was until recently the chief source of its text.

D. Greek Uncial Codices.—Our three oldest and most complete manuscripts of the Greek New Testament also throw some light on the New Testament in Egypt in the fourth and fifth centuries. The oldest of them, the Vatican Codex, unfortunately breaks off at Heb. 9:14, so we cannot tell what books it may have had at the end. The Sinaitic Codex, written around A.D. 350 or soon after, ends with Barnabas and the Shepherd of Hermas, breaking off about one fourth of the way through the Shepherd. The Alexandrian Codex of the fifth century contains I and II Clement after the Revelation of John, but breaks off a little past the middle of II Clement. There was evidently uncertainty in Egypt about the precise contents of the New Testament even after the statement of Athanasius in A.D. 367. But later manuscripts settled down on the Athanasian list, except for the Revelation, which only about one third of the Greek manuscripts of the whole New Testament included.

VII. The Syriac New Testament

A. Tatian.—No less ancient in its origins than the Latin New Testament was the Syriac version, which had grown up and come to be accepted in the native church of Syria. There Tatian, soon after A.D. 170, had put forth a Syriac harmony of the Gospels called the Diatessaron. The Greek church of Antioch took measures a generation later to introduce the four separate Gospels into Syriac Christianity, but the Diatessaron maintained its ascendancy for almost two centuries longer. We know this because it is the form of the Gospels in the New Testament set forth in the fourth century Teaching of Addai. This work regards as also canonical only the letters of Paul and the Acts of the Apostles. Syriac Christianity was evidently behind the Greek and Latin churches in the forming of its New Testament.

B. Afrahat and Efrem.—About the middle of the fourth century Afrahat accepted the Diatessaron, the fourteen letters of Paul, with perhaps also the apocryphal III Corinthians, and the Acts of the Apostles. In the third quarter of the fourth century Efrem, a great figure in Syriac Christianity, had the same New Testament canon, and wrote a commentary on the Diatessaron and the fifteen letters of Paul, including III Corinthians. In fact this last book was carried over from Syriac into the ancient Armenian canon. Efrem knew other books accepted elsewhere as canonical, as well as the four separate Gospels, but the seventeen books listed above formed his New Testament. That the four separate Gospels, however, were gradually coming into favor in the Syrian churches is confirmed by a Syriac canon list of about A.D. 400, which consists of the four separate Gospels, the Acts, and fourteen letters of Paul, and ends with the words, "This is all." Evidently the Diatessaron and III Corinthians are on the way out.

C. Rabbula and the Peshitta New Testament.

—A marked revision of the text and contents of the Syriac New Testament took place after A.D. 411, when Rabbula became bishop of Edessa (411-35). The result was the Peshitta New Testament, which from that time on was the authorized form in Syriac circles. It exists in many manuscripts, some from the fifth and sixth centuries, and includes the four Gospels, the Acts, three general letters (James, I Peter, I John) and fourteen letters of Paul. The substitution of the new scripture for the old was systematically carried out. When Theodoret became bishop of Cyrrhus on the Euphrates in 423, he made it his business to collect two hundred copies of the Diatessaron from his churches and put the four separate Gospels in their place. This work of substitution was so complete that no copy of the Syriac Diatessaron has yet been found. As a result, the Peshitta became almost at once the prevalent New Testament in Syria, for in the Syrian schisms of 431 and 489 it was accepted by both sides, and in all the subsequent centuries the Syrians have carried it with them in their migration over the world.

D. Later Syriac Versions.—To be sure the Peshitta underwent a series of revisions, the first of them (the Philoxenian) made in A.D. 508 by a certain Polycarp for a west Syrian bishop named Philoxenus, for whom the version was named. Being based on Greek manuscripts, it conformed to the Greek New Testament canon, and included all seven general letters and even the Revelation of John. Again in A.D. 616, this version was itself revised at Alexandria by Thomas of Harkel, on the basis of the Greek text. He naturally retained the Greek canon of scripture which he found in Philoxenus' version. In the sixth century another Syriac version was made, probably through agencies sponsored by Antioch, the Greek center of Syrian Christianity. The new version appeared in the Palestinian dialect of Syriac which prevailed about Antioch, and while we know it chiefly from the readings given in church lesson books, it is clear that it contained not only the four Gospels, the Acts, and fourteen letters of Paul, but also I and II Peter and I John, and hence probably all seven of the general letters. It did not contain the Revelation, however. The version was revived in the eleventh century, and from this period most of the surviving manuscripts of it come. In the twelfth century Dionysius bar Salibi wrote a commentary on the Revelation, but in spite of this tacit acceptance of that book, and despite the three versions just mentioned, the Peshitta continued to prevail among the Syrians as they scattered over the world, and it has never admitted the other four general letters nor the Revelation to its canon.

VIII. The Work of the Councils

The church councils did not so much form the New Testament canon as recognize views about it that had taken shape in church usage. In A.D. 363 the Synod of Laodicea in Asia Minor forbade in Canon 59 the reading of uncanonical books. Canon 60, giving a list of canonical books, is probably a later addition, though from the fourth century. It contains all the books of our present New Testament except the Revelation. The Council of Hippo in Africa in A.D. 393 gives exactly our present list of twenty-seven books as scripture. The Synod of Carthage in A.D. 397 gives our present list of New Testament books, but adds that on martyrs' days their martyrdoms may be read. The next Council of Carthage, A.D. 419, repeats the list previously given, simply shifting Hebrews into the Pauline list.

The fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries differed among themselves about the unsettled status of Hebrews, the general letters, and the Revelation. Chrysostom (fl. 407), the greatest of the Greek preachers, the presbyter of Antioch who became patriarch of Constantinople, reflects his Syrian origin in his canon, which includes only the twenty-two books of the Peshitta canon. Theodoret of Cyrrhus (A.D. 386-458) had the same Antiochian canon as Chrysostom. But another man of Antioch, Theodore of Mopsuestia (fl. 428), had no general letters (as well as no Revelation) in his New Testament, standing with the Syriac canon of about A.D. 400 already mentioned. Gregory of Nazianzus (A.D. 329-89) accepted the seven general letters, but not the Revelation, agreeing with the (supposed) Canon 60 of the Synod of Laodicea, and the later list of sixty canonical books. Amphilochius of Iconium (fl. 394) accepted four Gospels, the Acts, fourteen letters of Paul; his statement continues: "Of general letters, some say seven, others only three, one of James, one of Peter, and one of John. . . . The Revelation of John some accept but the majority call it uncanonical." It was in his day that the first Latin father we know of accepted Hebrews—Hilary of Poitiers (fl. 367). But Amphilochius concurs with Chrysostom, Theodore, and Gregory in refusing to accept the Revelation. As we have seen, this is the position of the great majority of Greek manuscripts of the New Testament.

THE CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

In fact, the Revelation divided the church in the East late in the fourth century, when Basil (fl. 379), Gregory of Nyssa (fl. ca. 394), and Epiphanius of Constantia in Cyprus (fl. 403) followed Athanasius in accepting the Revelation. Of the four "doctors" of the Eastern church (Gregory of Nazianzus, Athanasius, Chrysostom, and Basil), two accepted the Revelation and two rejected it. Even today the Greek church uses no readings from the Revelation in its church lessons.

The West meanwhile questioned not the Revelation but Hebrews. In the middle of the third century, as we have seen, Western Christianity was still refusing Hebrews and all but three general letters—I Peter, I and II John. The Eastern churches were going on, especially in Alexandria, to a larger New Testament; and this fuller canon gradually penetrated the West as well. A North African list of about A.D. 359, a hundred years after Cyprian, contained all of our New Testament except Hebrews, James, and Jude. Hilary of Poitiers (fl. 367), Ambrosiaster (the times of Damasus, 366-84), Lucifer of Cagliari (fl. 371), and Priscillian of Saragossa (fl. 385) accepted Hebrews as part of the New Testament. Pelagius of Britain (ca. 410) did not include it among Paul's letters, but the authority of Ambrose, Rufinus, Jerome, and Augustine assured its acceptance in the West. For Jerome put it into his Vulgate Latin version, begun in A.D. 382, though he admitted that "the custom of the Latins" did not accept it. Augustine was doubtful about its being the work of Paul, but admitted that he was following the Eastern churches in accepting it. It was his influence that led the councils of Hippo (393) and Carthage (397, 419) to put it into their New Testaments.

IX. Further Developments

The full list of seven general letters was even more reluctantly accepted in the West. Hilary, Lucifer, and Ambrose accepted three or four of these letters, while Rufinus, Augustine, and Jerome acknowledged all seven. The work of Jerome in producing the authoritative Vulgate version at the instance of Pope Damasus I had of course the effect of fixing the New Testament canon of twenty-seven books for Latin Christianity.

The papal decretals of Damasus, Gelasius, and Hormisdas, all now known to be from the sixth century, reflect this Vulgate canon, though in A.D. 560, Cassiodorus found and copied from some old book a New Testament list of twenty-two books just like that of the Peshitta—a fact to be accounted for perhaps by the origin of his family in Syria.

Improvements in book forms in the Latin world helped to establish this canon, for while the Greeks very seldom produced a one-volume New Testament, Latin scribes had no difficulty in doing so, and such manuscript copies of the New Testament in Latin became very numerous. In Greek, however, the Gospels were likely to form one volume, the letters of Paul another, the Acts and general letters a third, and the Revelation a fourth. Indeed, Leontius of Byzantium, lecturing in Jerusalem in A.D. 530, says the New Testament consists of six volumes—Matthew-Mark, Luke-John, Acts, the seven general letters, the letters of Paul, and the Revelation. In both Greek and Latin churches the Athanasian canon of twenty-seven books had prevailed.

While the Syrian church steadfastly maintained its short canon of twenty-two books, the influence of Alexandria had made itself felt in the Ethiopic canon of thirty-five books, our twenty-seven being supplemented by the so-called "Clement" and the Synodus—"Clement" including among other things an expanded form of the Revelation of Peter, which, as we have seen, had found a place in the Muratorian canon, in that of Clement, in the Clermont list and in other ancient canons. A somewhat similar appendix to the New Testament is mentioned in a Greek list (ca. A.D. 400) of New Testament books which contained eight books of the Apostolical Constitutions—condensations of church law which it was convenient to have copied with the New Testament scriptures. But after the sixth century nothing more is heard of this appendix in Greek circles.

The Middle Ages made no changes in these three standard canons, Greek-Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic, though some incidents are of interest. In the sixth century Andreas of Caesarea in Cappadocia wrote a commentary on the Revelation of John, which he evidently considered a New Testament book. This was the first commentary on Revelation written in the East. In the same century Cosmas, called Indicopleustes because of his voyages to the shores of India, reported that in Syria only three general letters were accepted, and he himself regarded all seven with suspicion. A ninth-century list bearing the name of Nicephorus (fl. 828), which gives the number of lines (stichoi) in each book, has the Revelation in its "disputed" list. On the other hand, Photius, patriarch of Constantinople in the ninth century, in the collection of 280 book reviews known as his Bibliotheca, accepts the Revelation as part of the New Testament.

Another ninth-century figure, Arethas of Caesarea, who played his part like Photius in the Greek revival of the period, expanded Andreas' commentary on the Revelation. His commentary accompanies the Revelation in many manuscripts, for example in the Elizabeth Day McCormick manuscript.

In the West Jerome's Vulgate version, supported as it was by Augustine, came slowly into use, not establishing its supremacy over Old Latin texts until the ninth century. The oddest variation the Western canons exhibit is the inclusion in about a hundred manuscripts of the spurious letter to the Laodiceans, a meaningless string of Pauline phrases, probably composed in Greek, but extant only in translation. It is found in Old Latin texts as well as Vulgate copies from the sixth century down. Jerome said that all rejected it; but the Spanish Priscillian (fl. 385), his contemporary Philaster of Brescia, and Pope Gregory the Great (ca. 900) thought it a genuine work of Paul, though not scripture. The British Alfric, abbot of Cerne (989), regarded it as a fifteenth letter of Paul. John of Salisbury (1165) too held it to be Paul's. It was translated into Old English and German, and followed Galatians in all the High German Bibles from 1466 until Luther, while even later the French scholar Faber Stapulensis (fl. 1536) listed it among the letters of Paul.

Other eddies in the stream of scripture transmission may be mentioned. The Visigoths brought Ulfilas' version of the New Testament to Spain, where its omission of the Revelation was denounced in the fourth Council of Toledo in A.D. 633. Some Latin New Testaments on the other hand included the Shepherd of Hermas in Latin. But in 1441 Pope Eugene IV reaffirmed the canon of Augustine and Jerome, including the Revelation and omitting the Shepherd.

In the Middle Ages the Latin Bible passed still more definitely into the hands of the clergy. Translations into the vulgar tongues were generally forbidden in the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth centuries, the church presuming to be the sole interpreter of scripture. Nevertheless, a German Bible translated from the Latin in the fourteenth century began to appear in print in 1466, and Wycliffe's English version was completed in 1382. Problems of authenticity and canonicity were neglected until at length in 1546 the Council of Trent definitely shut the door on any further inquiry. It was Erasmus who in the preface to his Greek Testament in 1516 broke sharply with the church position and called for translations of the Bible into all the vernaculars, thus inviting the work of Luther (1522) and Tyndale (1525).

X. New Testament Apocrypha

The term Apocrypha—"secret" or "hidden"—strictly applies only to the books of the Greek Old Testament which Jerome did not find in the Hebrew Old Testament, and which Luther actually separated and printed in a group by themselves in his translation of 1534, being followed in this by all the Protestant English Bibles from Coverdale to the King James Version. There is no such appendix to the New Testament, but the term may be applied to a number of books, one or more of which have been included at one time or another in New Testament manuscripts or in lists of New Testament books.

The Shepherd of Hermas and the Revelation of Peter found place in some lists or manuscripts. The Shepherd of Hermas in a Latin version influenced even Dante around 1300. From the time of its completion at Rome about A.D. 100, the Shepherd was very popular. It was accepted then as scripture. In Alexandria too Clement and Origen held it to be scripture, as did the maker of the original of the Clermont list in Egypt about A.D. 300. Eusebius classed it among the disputed books which were rejected. Athanasius recommended it for use by new converts, but did not admit it to the New Testament. Yet it found a place at the end of the New Testament in the Sinaitic manuscript about A.D. 350. In the West Irenaeus held it to be scripture, as did Tertullian at first, though he later repudiated it. The Muratorian writer definitely excluded it, as recently written and not apostolic. But it was translated early into Latin, and in the Middle Ages was often copied as part of the Latin Bible.

The Revelation of Peter was accepted as scripture by the Muratorian writer and by Clement of Alexandria, but not by Hippolytus at Rome. Eusebius placed it among the disputed and rejected books. Sozomen (ca. 450) says it was read annually on Good Friday in the churches of Palestine in his day. It stood in the Clermont list, but with a dash, perhaps to cancel it. Another work bearing the name of Peter, the Preaching of Peter, was accepted by Clement of Alexandria and Heracleon, but not by Origen or Eusebius.

The Teaching of the Apostles was also treated as scripture by Clement, but not by Origen or Eusebius. Athanasius said it might be read, like the Shepherd, by new converts. The Letter of Barnabas was accepted by Clement and Origen as scripture and stands after the Revelation of John in the Sinaitic manuscript. The Clermont list has it as the end of the general letters. The "Stichometry of Nicephorus" (850) put it among the disputed books. Jerome thought it was written by Barnabas but was not scripture.

The letter of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians was accepted as scripture by Clement of Alexandria, and with the so-called II Clement found a place at the end of the Alexandrian manuscript of the New Testament and in a twelfth-century Syriac manuscript of the New Testament. The Acts of Paul found a place in the Clermont list, though marked off with a dash. Laodiceans appeared in some Latin New Testaments, and III Corinthians was in Efrems' Syriac New Testament in the fourth century. But no ancient list included all these different documents.

THE CANON OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

XI. Selected Bibliography

- GOODSPEED, EDGAR J. The Formation of the New Testament. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1927.
- GREGORY, C. R. The Canon and Text of the New Testament. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1907.
- HARNACK, ADOLF VON. The Origin of the New Testament, tr. J. R. Wilkinson. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1925.
- JACQUIER, EUGÈNE. Le Nouveau Testament dans l'Église chrétienne. Paris: Victor Lecoffre, 1911. Vol. I, "Préparation, formation, et définition du canon du Nouveau Testament."
- LEIPOLDT, JOHANNES. Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons. Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1907-8.
- MOORE, E. C. The New Testament in the Christian Church. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1904.
- SOUTER, ALEXANDER. The Text and Canon of the New Testament. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1913.
- WESTCOTT, B. F. A General Survey of the History of the Canon of the New Testament. London: Macmillan & Co., 1866.
- ZAHN, THEODOR. Forschungen zur Geschichte des neutestamentlichen Kanons. Erlangen: A. Deichert, 1881-1900.

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

by ERNEST C. COLWELL

- I. The Nature and Origin of Variant Readings
 - A. Amount of Disagreement in Variant Readings
 - B. Variations Created by Scribes
 - 1. Harmonization
 - 2. Removal of Heresy
 - 3. Clarification
 - 4. Unintentional Variation
 - 5. Change of the Rare to the Familiar
 - C. Variations Created by Editors
 - D. Variations Created by Translators
 - E. Standardization of the Text
- II. Choosing Between Variant Readings
 - A. Methods Not Now Generally Approved

- 1. By Custom
- 2. By Majority Vote
- 3. By Date
- 4. By Quality
- 5. By Genealogy
- 6. By Agreement with Church Fathers
- 7. By Geographical Distribution
- B. The Best Method a Triple One
 - 1. External Study
 - 2. Internal Evidence
 - 3. Conjectural Emendation
 - 4. Two Illustrations

III. Summary

IV. Selected Bibliography

When the modern minister wishes to use a New Testament, he turns to a printed book. This is true whether he reads the New Testament in English, French, Russian, or Greek. He knows—if he stops to think about it at all—that the early Christians had no printed books but used handwritten copies of the New Testament. He may not know that the early Christian use of handwritten books is reflected even today in variations in the content of the various printings of the New Testament.

I. The Nature and Origin of Variant Readings

The easiest way to get rid of variations and to attain accuracy would be to print from the original copy of each book of the New Testament, and to get universal agreement to use that printing. But the original documents are all gone—sunk without a trace in the vast and misty sea of the past. From time to time the claim is made that an “original” has been found. St. Mark’s Church in Venice claimed to possess the original of the Gospel of Mark. Investigation revealed that what it had was a copy of Jerome’s fourth-century revision of a Latin translation of the Gospel of Mark.

The falsity of these claims to possess an “original” can easily be demonstrated by competent scholars. Edgar J. Goodspeed of the University of Chicago was once offered the “original” of Pilate’s report on the Crucifixion to the Emperor Tiberius. It had been “discovered” in an Italian city, and came into the hands of an Italian living in Schenectady, New York. Inspection showed that the parchment on which it was written had served as the cover of a modern book, that the scribe used all the modern marks of punctuation, that the ink was still on the surface of the parchment, that the alphabet employed was taken from modern Greek printing and was one which had never been employed in Greek handwriting, least of all in the first century A.D.

The originals of each book of the New Testament have vanished. There is nothing surprising in this. Many of these books were in all probability written on papyrus, which is no more durable than modern paper. Moreover, they were written to be read at group meetings, not to be deposited in archives. They were read and reread until they were worn out. Then they were discarded. The originals had been discarded before they became canonical.

But before the originals were discarded, they were copied. Before the originals were worn out, their copies had been copied, some of them many times. Not all Christians could read, but the size of the reading public of the Gospels, for example, was not limited to the number of literate Christians. In that ancient world reading meant reading aloud, and scores of illiterate Christians could hear the gospel read. The

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

"lessons" from the Old and New Testament in our church service today go back to this ancient custom. By the second half of the second century this custom was well established.

Almost all the early Christians were traveling salesmen for their religion, and this increased the demand for copies of the New Testament books. Imagine a citizen of Carthage converted to Christianity while on a trip to the city of Rome. As he starts back to Carthage, the members of the church—his new-found brothers—equip him with helps for the maintenance and spread of his faith. These helps may have included some books of the "Bible" (which for them was the Old Testament in Greek) and a copy of the Christian Gospel written in Rome by one of their own number, John, who was also called Mark. This last would be copied by amateur scribes whose zeal surpassed their ability. To them, as to modern ministers, it was the gospel that mattered, not the exact wording. Thus the man from Carthage went back home with a copy of Mark which differed somewhat from its source.

The Christian convert from Carthage is a product of imagination, but the disagreement of one handwritten copy of the New Testament from another handwritten copy is not imaginary. No two of these manuscripts agree completely. In some cases the disagreement is extensive. These variations, or "variant readings," create difficulties for the modern publisher who would like to print an edition of the New Testament. Before he begins printing, he must decide which of the handwritten copies he will follow as regards those points where they disagree with each other. The editor might escape this arduous task if these disagreements were insignificant in number or in nature. It does not take long to show that they are not.

A. Amount of Disagreement in Variant Readings.—To start at the bottom of the list with the least significant variants we note those which are unique. Each manuscript has some readings of its own ("singular readings"). If we were to compare one human being with all the rest of the human race, we would find some details in which he differed from all other human beings. The best known of these singular items is his fingerprints. Thus one manuscript, when compared with all other manuscripts in existence, has some singular readings, as distinctive as fingerprints. One of the manuscripts at the University of Chicago contains only the Gospel of Mark. But in this Gospel it has 181 variant readings which do not occur in any other manuscript.¹

Or take another approach to the question of

¹ University of Chicago MS 972, Gregory's 2427.

the amount of difference between these New Testaments. Any person compared with any other person will differ from that person in various ways. Mr. A will be tall, skinny, dark, and handsome. Mr. B will be short, fat, blond, and ugly. The range of difference when two people are compared will be greater than that found when one person is compared with the human race. Generally speaking, two members of the same family differ less than two members of the same tribe, and these differ less than inhabitants of different continents. As with people, so with manuscripts. Every manuscript in existence differs from any other specific manuscript in a large number of passages. The range of this variation is quite wide.

Two specific manuscripts that are members of a closely related family differ from each other in matters other than spelling 25 times in Mark, the shortest of the Gospels.² Two other manuscripts that belong to the same type of text but not to a family are the manuscripts 2427 and Vaticanus (B), members of the Beta text type. In the Gospel of Mark these two have no closer kin, yet they differ in that one Gospel 873 times. Again, two manuscripts that belong to different text types may differ from each other as much as 14,040 times in the four Gospels.³ Although reduction in these totals might be required to compensate for errors in computation, the totals are still impressive. The amount of variation is large enough to fatigue the memory of the student, and to appall the prospective editor.

There is a third method of estimating the amount of differences between copies of the New Testament. Suppose one wanted a record of all human variations from some one standard without regard to the number of people exhibiting each variation. In manuscript study this means taking some one form of the New Testament as the base or "text" and recording all known variations from it in what is called a "critical apparatus." This is not done very often. Konstantin von Tischendorf did it in 1869. Again, in 1913 Hermann von Soden printed the variations from his Greek New Testament. The listing required 893 pages. Since the number of variations listed per page ranges from 39 to 61, and averages more than 50, one estimates that von Soden knew about 45,000 different readings in the New Testament which he regarded as worth printing.

The extant manuscripts, most of them as yet unstudied in detail, must contain several times that number. The vast majority of these will be rejected by any editor. This may console the pious, but it does not help the editor who has to winnow the chaff from such a vast heap before he begins printing his New Testament.

² 1219 and Π, members of "Family Pi."

³ Bezae (D) and 2427 differ in Mark 11 a total of 117 times. The figure given in the text is an estimate based on the assumption that the same rate of variation would hold throughout the Gospels.

B. Variations Created by Scribes.—Before the publisher can make an intelligent decision between these numerous variants, he has to study them carefully and extensively. To help him appraise these variants scholars group them in various ways. Some of these classifications are technical, complicated, and obscure to the beginner. To make as clear as possible the nature of these variants, we may classify them here on the basis of the cause of the particular variation.

1. Harmonization.—The desire for consistency created many of these variant readings. The Christian scribe expected one Gospel to agree with another; he anticipated that a New Testament book would agree with an Old Testament book. Where he found disagreement or inconsistency in the manuscript he was copying, he automatically assumed that it was in error and "corrected" the error by bringing the divergent passages into harmony. This harmonization is found in varying degree in almost all manuscripts, and in almost all the books of the New Testament. It is commonest in the first three Gospels because they have the largest amount of parallel material.

The objective situation in this area can be described as follows: 92 per cent of the Gospel of Mark appears in the Gospel of Matthew, and much more than half of it appears also in the Gospel of Luke. In some copies of the Gospels there are striking variations from Gospel to Gospel in these parallel passages. In other copies of the Gospels all three of the Gospels agree. Since we know from a study of the church fathers that Matthew was much more popular than Mark, we would expect to find Matthew's form of a story affecting Mark's form of the same story. Actually examples of this are numerous.

In the account of the healing of the man with the withered hand, Matthew's Gospel (12:13) reads, "Then he said to the man, 'Stretch out your hand.' And the man stretched it out, and it was restored, whole like the other." None of the copies of Matthew conclude otherwise than "restored, whole like the other." In Mark's Gospel (3:5), most copies, including all the earliest ones, read, "And said to the man, 'Stretch out your hand.' He stretched it out, and his hand was restored." Other copies of Mark, including eleven dating from the seventh to the ninth centuries, add "whole like the other." Thus they agree with Matthew. In Luke's Gospel (6:10) some copies read, "And he did so and his hand was restored." Many copies add the word "whole"; still more copies add the words "like the other." Since there is no variation in Matthew, we assume that we have Matthew's original wording, "restored, whole like the other." In Mark and Luke we assume that the text originally lacked these words and that they were added to harmonize these Gospels with Matthew. If the long form of Mark and Luke is assumed to be original, no good reason for the widespread omission can be found. If it is said that omission by error needs no explanation, the answer is that the error did not occur in any of the copies of Matthew, and that this same difference between copies of Matthew and the copies of Mark and Luke occurs in scores of other passages.

In the prediction of the last days, Mark's Gospel (13:14) reads, "But when you see the desolating sacrilege set up where it ought not to be (let the reader understand), then let those who are in Judea flee to the mountains." The verse appears in this form in the two fourth-century copies (B and \aleph) that Westcott and Hort favored, in the fifth-century Washington manuscript of the Gospels (W), in the contemporary but frequently divergent Codex Bezae (D), in the oldest copy in Syriac, in some Old Latin copies, in most copies of Jerome's Latin Vulgate, in the two major Egyptian versions, in the Armenian and the Old Georgian, in an explicit statement by Augustine, and in a few other copies. But the overwhelming majority of the copies of Mark add the words "spoken of by the prophet Daniel" after "sacrilege." In Matt. 24:15-16 all copies agree in reading "sacrilege spoken of by the prophet Daniel." In passages where Matthew has no parallel in Mark, he makes frequent reference to Old Testament prophecy. This supports the judgment of manuscript students that the appearance of Daniel in some copies of Mark 13:14 is due to harmonization with the parallel in Matthew. The student of the English Bible can observe the difference by comparing the King James Version in these passages with the Revised Standard Version or Goodspeed's American translation.

In these examples of harmonization we see the intentional creation of variants. This is not to say that the scribe intended to create a new reading; what he intended was the correction of what he mistakenly identified as an erroneous reading. Reverence for scripture was a help rather than a hindrance to such action. The "errors" which harmonization removed were inconsistencies or disagreements between the parts of scripture. More serious alleged errors were weeded out just as ruthlessly by many scribes.

2. Removal of Heresy.—A Christian scribe copying the Gospel of Matthew was surprised to find Jesus quoted as saying that the exact date of the end of the world was a secret from him, "But of that day and hour no one knows, not even the angels of heaven, nor the Son, but the Father only" (Matt. 24:36). The scribe knew that "the Son" referred to Jesus; he knew that Jesus was omniscient; therefore he knew that someone had made a mistake in writing this sentence. So he corrected it by omitting the words "nor the Son." In making this change he felt sure that he was restoring the original reading. Scholars today would disagree with him. They regard the absence of the words "nor the Son" as a variation—albeit an early one—from the original text of Matthew.

In Luke's account of the arrest a statement is made which wounded the sensibilities of some devout Christians. "Also other criminals, two, were led away to be put to death with him" (Luke 23:32). This statement is made in a very different and completely innocuous form in the Gospels of Matthew and Mark. The Lukan wording with its implication that Jesus was a criminal was regarded as erroneous by some scribes. They avoided this implication by changing the word order of the Greek so that it read, "Two others also, who were criminals, were led away to be put to death with him." Still other Christian copyists made the "correction" sure by omitting the word "criminals" altogether, so that the verse reads, "Also two others were led away to be put to death with him."

3. Clarification.—Reverence for the Gospels supported the creation of another class of variations: the explanatory notes. These may have started in the margins of the book, or in parenthetical expressions written between the lines. From either of these positions they could easily move into the text itself. One scribe who mistook the explanatory note for a "correction" of the text would be enough to introduce the new reading. In fact, explanation and correction often appear in the same position on the page; thus the scribe's mistake was an easy one to make.

In Mark 4:11-12 the American Standard Version reads: "Unto you is given the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all things are done in parables: that seeing they may see, and not perceive; and hearing they may hear, and not understand; lest haply they should turn again, and it should be forgiven them." The vague reference of the impersonal pronoun "it" in "it should be forgiven them" is no less vague in the Greek, which has the verb without a subject. A fair number of Greek copies of Mark have the passage in this obscure form, but some scribes added the words "their sins" to clear up the passage. This clearer form occurs in the majority of the copies, and may be seen in the King James Version: "and their sins should be forgiven them."

In John 5 the story is told of a healing at the pool called Bethesda. In the form of the story which appears in a score of early witnesses (including the earliest versions and some very early patristic evidence) the sick man's answer to Jesus refers to things which were undoubtedly clear to both him and Jesus but could not possibly be clear to later generations of readers: "The sick man answered him, 'Sir, I have no man to put me into the pool when the water is troubled, and while I am going another steps down before me'" (John 5:7). Up to this point nothing has been said as to the nature of the troubling of the water or the importance of being first. The obscurity is cleared up in the vast mass of later copies by the addition of the following explanatory note early in the story (KJV; RSV mg.): ". . . waiting for the moving of the water; for an angel of the Lord went down at certain seasons into the pool, and troubled the water: whoever stepped in first after the troubling of the water was healed of whatever disease he had."

4. Unintentional Variation.—The three causes of variation discussed so far (harmonization, removal of heresy, and clarification) are all the result of conscious changes; these are what are called intentional variations. But scribes who copied the New Testament were as liable to human weakness as scribes who copied Homer. Like Homer himself, they occasionally nodded. One very common error of the eye led to the omission of a passage by mistake. If two successive lines began with the same word, the scribe's eye might slip from one to the other with the consequent omission of a line of text. This occurred in very early manuscripts, and in late medieval copies. In most copies, Mark 10:46 reads, "And they came to Jericho; and . . ." In a fourth-century New Testament, the famous Codex Vaticanus (B), "And they came to Jericho" would fill one line. The scribe's eye jumped to the "and" which began the next line; so "and they came to Jericho" is omitted by this manuscript. This copy also contains examples of the omission of a line due to the identity of its ending with that of an adjacent line (homoeoteleuton).

Sometimes the scribe skipped over a word but caught his error before he reached the end of the sentence. In Greek, word order is very free. Thus the scribe could insert the omitted word as soon as he discovered it was missing. In this way he created a variation in word order. These variations are often without significance for meaning, but occasionally affect the sense vitality. Even when they do not drastically affect the sense, they cause difficulties for the printer who wants to publish an exact copy of the New Testament.

The fallibility of the scribe's eyesight led him to duplicate passages as well as to omit them. These variations are usually easily identifiable as errors. The scribe who wrote the Four Gospels of Karahissar, a thirteenth century copy of the Gospels in Greek, duplicated one line of the genealogy in Matt. 1:15-16. In his copy we read, "And Matthan begat Jacob; and Jacob begat Jacob; and Jacob begat Joseph. . . ." The frequent repetition of the verb "begat" misled him into the repetition of "begat Jacob; and Jacob."

In a few passages the variation is of such a nature that it can be explained either as omission by error, or as addition by error. In Matt. 27:17, the Revised Standard Version reads: "Pilate said to them, 'Whom do you want me to release for you, Barabbas or Jesus who is called Christ?'" In a few copies of this passage we find, "Whom do you want me to release for you? Jesus Barabbas? or Jesus who is called Christ?" Let us assume that the original did not read the word "Jesus" before "Barabbas." It could have been created there by the erroneous duplication of the last syllable of the Greek word "you." This word in this passage would be YMIN, and IN is an abbreviation frequently employed for "Jesus." If a scribe by error wrote YMININ, the result would be ". . . for you? Jesus Barabbas?" But let us take the other position and assume that the original read the word "Jesus" before "Barabbas." Then the scribe could easily by error have omitted the second IN and thus created the reading ". . . for you? Barabbas? . . ." In such circumstances either additional data or other criteria for judgment are needed before the printer can decide which form to follow.

Variations between copies of the New Testament were created also by scribes who were poor spellers. In this regard ancient stenographers resemble their modern counterparts at their worst. Quite a few vowels and diphthongs were pronounced alike in Greek, and not until the printing press was invented did uniform spelling become possible. In the Four Gospels of Karahissar there are 271 of these misspellings.

The presence of these "ear-spellings" in a copy has often been claimed as evidence that it was written from dictation. But one's confidence in this claim may well be shaken by the discovery that when composing on the typewriter, one can easily think "their" and write "there," etc., or by the observation of similar errors made by typists who are following clear copy. Slight variations of this and similar types account for almost fifty per cent of the variant readings found in the ordinary handwritten copy of the Greek New Testament.

5. Change of the Rare to the Familiar.—Modern psychologists have taught us that we often see what we expect to see, the familiar object, even when it is not there. The scribes who copied the New Testament were subject to this failing also, and because of it, created variations in some copies of the New Testament. This is strikingly illustrated in Mark 6:20, in the story of John the Baptist's imprisonment. One of the commonest words in Greek, as in English, is the verb "do." Relatively rare in Greek, as in English, is the verb "to be perplexed." It occurs only six times in the New Testament. In the Greek these two verbs look much alike in the third person singular of the imperfect tense of the indicative mood. "He did" is ἐποίησεν; "he was perplexed" is ἐπρόκειτο. On the one hand, the famous manuscripts Vaticanus, Sinaiticus, Koridethi, and a few others with the Egyptian version read, "When he [Herod] heard him [John], he was much perplexed; and yet he heard him gladly." This is to be seen in the Revised Standard Version, also in Goodspeed's translation. On the other hand, the overwhelming majority of copies read with the King James Version, "And when he [Herod] heard him [John], he did many things, and heard him gladly."

There can be little doubt that the scribes misread the rare word "perplexed" as the familiar word "did." This can be seen actually happening in a copy of the Gospel of Mark at the University of Chicago. This manuscript, called "The Archaic Mark," originally read "perplexed," but has been "corrected" to read "did."

C. Variations Created by Editors.—Up to this point we have been considering variations caused by scribes. Two other classes of people worked their will upon the New Testament: editors and translators. At times the results of their work included the creation of new variants. Scribes were discussed first because they are more numerous, but not because the time sequence is scribes, editors, translators. Only the first few scribes preceded all editors and translators; after that they all overlap in time. Thus, for example, in the fifty years from A.D. 150 to 200, the New Testament was being translated, edited, and copied.

Much of what has been said about scribes is true also of editors. An editor is just a super-scribe who hires other scribes to multiply copies of the New Testament under his direction. An editor would differ from a scribe in the rigor with which he applied his principles throughout the text of the New Testament. If he preferred participle and verb to verb and verb, the editor would choose the former rather consistently. If he felt that a short form was primitive, he would take it whenever he could. An editor who favored smoothness would add expletives throughout the work. As will be seen later, we have in existence groups of manuscripts which exhibit some of these characteristics so consistently that we are constrained to attribute them to the work of editors.

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

An editor would differ also from a scribe in the degree of conscious purpose with which he changed particular copies or particular passages. In that purpose most editors would certainly include a desire for unity. This desire might express itself as a concern for the widest possible circulation of the new edition, or for the destruction of rival editions. Yet this very desire might lead to the use of several previously distinct strains in the production of the new edition. A New Testament of one type might be corrected by one of a very different sort. This led to the creation of new readings when the editor blended the readings of the two manuscripts.

Westcott and Hort called such a hybrid a "conflate reading," and identified eight of them as the work of the editors who produced a fourth-century edition which they called "Syrian." In Mark 9:49 these editors created the reading, "For every one shall be salted with fire, and every sacrifice shall be salted with salt." Earlier editions of the passage are known. One reads, "For every one will be salted with fire"; another, "For every sacrifice shall be salted with salt." We have seen that editors resembled scribes, and we find individual scribes occasionally blending readings in this same fashion. In Acts 6:8 many copies read "full of grace"; many others "full of faith." But one copy reads, "full of grace and faith."

D. Variations Created by Translators.—By the time the apostle Paul came to his martyrdom, the overwhelming majority of the Christians spoke Greek, either as a native tongue or as a second language. But as Christian missionaries pushed beyond the cities into small provincial villages, the demand for a New Testament in the native tongue of these new converts increased. By A.D. 200, the New Testament was available in Latin, in Egyptian, and in Syriac. The gradual decline in knowledge of Greek among Christians contributed to the development of particular forms of the New Testament in several languages.

Translating the New Testament, even when it is done with care, creates new variations in its content. Many of the early translations were not made with much care. Augustine says of the making of the early Latin translations:

For the translations of the Scriptures from Hebrew into Greek can be counted, but the Latin translators are out of all number. For in the early days of the faith every man who happened to get his hands upon a Greek manuscript, and who thought he had any knowledge, were it ever so little, of the two languages, ventured upon the work of translation.⁴

It is interesting to note that one of these Latin versions is probably the longest form of the Gospels in existence while an equally ancient Syriac translation is the shortest form in existence.

Sometimes the translator creates a reading unwittingly. In the account of the Lord's Supper in the King James and the American Standard Version (Matt. 26:27) the Lord says to his disciples as he hands them the cup, "Drink ye all of it." Sermons on this text have sometimes expounded it as an exhortation to complete devotion, devotion unto death, as though the meaning were, "drink the cup to the dregs." To avoid such a misunderstanding, Weymouth reads "Drink, all of you"; the Twentieth Century New Testament translates "Drink from it, all of you"; Goodspeed reads "You must all drink from it"; and the Revised Standard Version has "Drink of it, all of you."

When Tyndale translated a Greek verb meaning "wrapped up" in Luke 2:7 as "wrapped hym in swadlynge clothes," he created a new reading for the New Testament. For it survived through the King James Version to the English Revised Version and the American Standard Version. "Clothes" is a survival of the old spelling of "cloths"; thus the "swaddling-cloths" were not garments, and the passage is much more accurately translated in the modern speech versions as "wrapped him up." The Revised Standard Version reads "swaddling cloths."

Other variants created by translators are less innocent. The Revised Standard Version often smooths out the language of the original beyond recognition; especially is this true in the Gospels of Mark and Luke. The "and . . . and . . . and" of Mark's Gospel is polished up to suit sensitive English ears and leaves no trace of the style of the original for the student of Mark. Likewise, the "and it came to pass" of the older version—which actually exists in the New Testament itself—was dropped.

E. Standardization of the Text.—Editors and translators create "standard" editions which spread a particular pattern of variations widely but check the development of new variations.

⁴ On Christian Doctrine II. 11.

A few editors tried to standardize the New Testament as early as the second century. A Greek-Latin manuscript from the fifth century, which is supported by some copies of second-century Latin translations, contains one of the earliest standard texts. This particular type is harmonized and inclusive—long, rather than short. It is a part of what used to be called the Western Text. But standardization began to succeed about the end of the fourth century, progressed unevenly through the Middle Ages and found its period of greatest success from the invention of printing in the fifteenth century to the middle of the nineteenth century. The earliest datable standard version was the revision of the earlier Latin versions made by Jerome at the request of Pope Damasus I about A.D. 380. Jerome claimed that when he began his work there were as many different forms of the Latin New Testament as there were individual copies. To reform the Latin New Testament by making a new revision was one thing; to get it universally used, another. The triumph of this Latin Vulgate New Testament was gradual and partial; it reached its climax in the days of the Counter Reformation. In A.D. 1546, by a vote of the majority of the clerics assembled at Trent, it was decided that Jerome's Latin revision was the New Testament.

Early in the fifth century A.D. an energetic leader of the Syriac-speaking church, Rabbula, prepared a new form of the Syriac New Testament. With the aid of the hierarchy in Syria, earlier forms of the New Testament were collected and destroyed. One bishop reported that he found and destroyed over two hundred copies of Tatian's harmonized gospel (the Diatessaron). In this liquidation of competing forms of the Bible, and in the care with which the new standard version was copied, the Syrian Christians are very similar to the Jewish scribes who worked on the standard form of the Hebrew Old Testament. This fifth-century Syriac New Testament, called Peshitta or vulgate, won its victory rapidly and maintained its dominance effectively. The manuscripts in which it appears differ from one another very little.

In Egypt the form of the New Testament which won a dominant position owed much to the scholarly achievements of Christians at Alexandria. Here under Clement and Origen, the young Christian movement learned much of the lore of the Greeks. At Alexandria the study of the manuscripts of the pagan classics reached its peak. It is not surprising, therefore, that Alexandrian Christians are given credit for developing the version which is today the preference of most scholars. "Develop" is the exact word, for its witnesses are seldom unanimous. By the fifth century this New Testament, called variously the Alexandrian or the Beta or the Neutral, held a dominant position in Egypt. Its career was cut short by the Mohammedan conquest of Egypt in the seventh century.

Long before the seventh century, the leadership of the Greek world had passed to Constantinople. Here there emerged a form of the New Testament distinct both from that of Alexandria and from that known in the West before Jerome. Today we know but little of its origin, and very little more of the steps by which it developed into the form in which we find it in the tenth century ruling all Greek Christendom. Like the Latin and Syriac vulgates, like the Alexandrian New Testament, there is little in this Byzantine New Testament that is distinctive; and there is relatively little that was created by the makers and revisers of this revision. Most of its readings existed in the second century. The pattern in which earlier forms were mixed at Constantinople is, however, a distinct pattern. From the tenth to the fourteenth centuries, at least four distinguishable revisions of this Greek vulgate were produced. One of its forms appears in the first printings of the New Testament (notably in those of Erasmus, Elzevir, and Stephanus), and through them determines the content of the sixteenth-century translations into English, which in their turn determined the content of the King James Version and the English New Testament down to A.D. 1880.

II. Choosing Between Variant Readings

The individual Christian, or the translator or editor or printer who is his deputy, must choose a New Testament from a bewildering variety of New Testaments. How shall he choose?

A. Methods Not Now Generally Approved.

I. By Custom.—For three centuries after the printing of the first Greek New Testament in A.D. 1525, the choice of a New Testament was decided by custom. The content of the earliest printings was based largely on what lay at hand. These editions became the source of the popular versions, including all the great English translations of the sixteenth century. The long-continued vogue of the King James Version sanctified the Greek text from which it was made. When, therefore, in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, scholars found ancient manuscripts that differed widely from the received text and challenged its supremacy, the answer was that the text which the church was using was the correct New Testament. Its champions voted for the customary, but they found other arguments to support their position.

The Protestant champions argued (a) that the Holy Spirit would not permit the church to accept an inferior or corrupt New Testament;

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

(b) that other New Testaments smelled of heresy; (c) that no record exists of the making of this text or of its adoption by the church—an indication that it is primitive in origin and in its use by the church; and (d) that more manuscripts in Greek and in other languages, and more church fathers support this New Testament than support any other.

2. By Majority Vote.—The one objectively supported argument was the claim that this New Testament had the largest number of adherents among the manuscripts. This is the argument from recent usage in another form. Why is it that the type of New Testament published by Erasmus and his successors in the sixteenth century is generally supported by hundreds and hundreds of copies of the New Testament? Because Erasmus chose the current form of the New Testament to print. That form had won a dominant position by the tenth century; most of the manuscripts in existence today were written after the tenth century. Thus if the selection of a New Testament is determined by majority vote of the copies in existence, the decision would inevitably be in favor of a late medieval form of the Greek New Testament. This New Testament indeed deserves to be called the Greek Vulgate. (It has other names as well: "the Syrian Text," "the Ecclesiastical Text," "the Koine," "the Textus Receptus," "the Byzantine Text," "the Traditional Text," and "the Received Text.") Is not the sheer weight of the witnesses to this commonly used New Testament decisive in its favor?

This was the one question which the champions of other forms of the New Testament had to answer. Their answer was a resounding negative.

The opponents of the Greek Vulgate forced its rejection by turning a spotlight on the significance of the family tree, of genealogy, in the world of manuscripts. Suppose that there are only ten copies of a book and that nine are all copies from one; then the majority can be safely rejected. Or suppose that nine of the ten are copied from a lost manuscript, and that this lost manuscript and the other one were both copied from the original; then the vote of the majority would not outweigh that of the minority. These arguments show clearly that a majority of manuscripts is not necessarily to be preferred as correct.

It is the quality of a New Testament that counts, not the quantity of its adherents. Witnesses should not be counted but weighed. Scribes could recopy a poor New Testament a hundred times without making it a good New Testament. In the scales of judgment this majority text (from which the King James Version was translated) has been shown to be a relatively corrupt New Testament, outweighed by others with fewer adherents. It is a harmonized text, a polished text, an annotated text.

3. By Date.—Another simple solution to the difficulty is to choose the oldest manuscript and follow it faithfully. If the history of the New Testament were a record of steady deterioration, this could be done. But the opening period in the transmission of the New Testament is marked by a splurge of deterioration, and that period (to A.D. 150) is older than the oldest manuscript in existence. If we had a New Testament from the second century, we could have no assurance that other second-century manuscripts were like it or any confidence that it was like the original New Testament.

4. By Quality.—If the oldest is not certainly the best, since age and virtue are not co-ordinates, why not select the best manuscript or text type—whatever its age may be—and follow it? This cannot be done because no manuscript or text type is of the same quality throughout. All the manuscripts and text types are the result of crossbreeding and a consequent mixture in ancestry. No text or document is homogeneous enough to justify judgment on the basis of a part of its readings for the rest of its readings. Some manuscripts and text types can be justified in part of their readings even when they have to be generally repudiated.

The mixture in quality in manuscripts is due partly to the absence of single-volume New Testaments in the first two centuries. At the beginning each book was copied as a single book and circulated alone. By A.D. 200, or soon after, the four Gospels probably were copied together, as were the letters of Paul. But it is doubtful that any single book contained Gospels, Acts, and Paul much earlier than A.D. 300. When these books were put together into one book, they had various separate ancestries. Thus the fourth-century New Testaments resemble a freight train in which one car is New York Central, one is Pennsylvania, one is Chesapeake and Ohio, one is Atlantic Coast Line, etc. This is mixture by distinct blocks of text, the quality of one section being quite different from that of another.

This type of mixture occurred even in the four Gospels. The celebrated Washington manuscript, "the Freer Gospels," from the late fourth or early fifth century in Egypt has this type of content. Matthew has the Byzantine text type; the Gospel of John has the "Neutral" text type; Mark 1:1-5:30 has an "African" text type; Mark 5:31 to the end has the so-called Caesarean text type; Luke 1:1-8:12 has the "Neutral" text type; and Luke 8:13 to the end has the Byzantine text type. This is mixture in large blocks.

But it is simple and unified compared to another and more common type of mixture which could be called repair shop mixture. Suppose some wooden Chesapeake and Ohio freight cars were growing old; some of the slats that make up the sides of the cars were broken, some rotted, etc. The cars go to the shops. In the shops are a number of old freight cars bought from the Pennsylvania Railroad. These are dismantled and used to patch the Chesapeake and Ohio cars, which are returned to service. Again they wear out; again they go to the shops. This time the supply of repair parts comes from some old New York Central box-cars. The Chesapeake and Ohio cars are repaired and go back into service. After this has happened four or five times, no railroad detective could trace the ancestry of the train.

5. By Genealogy.—This mixture in ancestry and quality blocks the path to another solution—the retracing of the genealogy from children to parents to grandparents and so on all the way back to the original. Multiple or mixed ancestry is the rule in these large groups. Most of the manuscripts are no closer than forty-second cousins or great-great uncles. This combination of promiscuity and gaps in the generations baffles the constructor of family trees. In short, we are dealing not with a family, close-knit in intimate relationships, but with a nation, a nation to which immigrants have come from many countries. Genealogy will help us reach some of the way stations, but it will never take us back through the jungle of mixture to the original New Testament.

6. By Agreement with Church Fathers.—Nor can one appeal from confusion in the New Testaments themselves to the testimony of the earliest church fathers. What has been said above about the "oldest manuscript" can be said also about the oldest fathers. They disagree with one another, and even with themselves. Many of them can be quoted on both sides of the question in passage after passage. Even as late as the end of the second century, scholarly Christians are treating the scriptures with considerable freedom. In the Miscellanies I. 19 Clement quotes I Cor. 13:12 simply as, "For now we see as in a mirror," rather than as, "For now we see as in a mirror darkly." Consistently throughout both the Instructor and the Miscellanies he omits "darkly" when quoting this passage. There is evidence, however, that he knew the verse in its longer form. The word translated "darkly" means "a dark saying" or "a riddle." The omission probably grows out of Clement's reluctance to assert that the Christian, the true gnostic, now sees only in riddles or enigmas. In general, this freedom in quotation makes it difficult to determine just what form of the New Testament the early fathers were using. It is as necessary to check the fathers by the manuscripts as it is to check the manuscripts by the fathers.

7. By Geographical Distribution.—One of the great students of manuscripts cast a wistful eye at the possibility of geographical evidence as a clue to the original. F. C. Burkitt used to say that where the Old Syriac from the eastern end of the Christian world agreed with the Old Latin from the western end of the world, the original New Testament brought them together. This argument rests on the assumption that Syria and Africa were isolated from each other in so far as the copying of the New Testament was concerned. But we cannot be sure of this isolation; the Greek forerunner of the Old Syriac—itsself not the original New Testament—could have been carried to the West to influence the making of the Old Latin Version.

No single or simple answer is possible. We cannot choose our New Testament by counting noses, or by venerating age, or by the selection of a paragon, or by constructing a family tree, or by preferring an early Christian who commented on the New Testament to one who copied it, or by assuming the independence of voters who live in distant towns.

B. The Best Method a Triple One.—The answer is complex. We choose our New Testament by taking three steps. First of all we study the relationship of one New Testament to other New Testaments. This is sometimes called the external study of manuscripts. Then we study the relationship of one particular form of a passage to the alternative forms of the passage. This is the internal evidence. Finally, if neither of these helps us and the passage still does not make sense, we make the shrewdest guess we can as to the original form of the passage. This is conjectural emendation.

1. External Study.—It may seem silly to say that family trees cannot solve our problem and then say that we begin the solution with family trees. For the student of textual criticism the making of family trees is not wisdom, but it is the beginning of wisdom. He starts his investigation with a particular manuscript of the New Testament. Either members of its family still survive or they do not. If they do, he charts the family tree. Then he can forget the individual members of the family and quote only the family from there on. This clears out a lot of underbrush. But if the other members of the immediate family have not survived, the student profits from comparing his manuscript with others—even though he cannot reconstruct the family tree. Although exact location cannot be recovered, more general locations within larger groups of manuscripts are a real possibility. The study of these larger and looser kinships illuminates the history of the transmission of the New Testament. In the second place, the study of the relationship of the first manuscript to others educates the student in the habits of scribes and in the characteristics of individual manuscripts.

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

2. Internal Evidence.—Variant readings have been appraised by the experts through the generations of scholarly study according to longer or shorter lists of rules, or "canons of internal criticism." These rules were supposed to guide the student in choosing between alternative forms of the same passage. But they furnish no sure guide. One scholar tells us to prefer the shorter and less elegant reading. But if the shorter reading should be more elegant than the longer reading, what can the poor student do? No rule will save him.

These lists of rules have shrunk steadily in the last one hundred and fifty years. Tischendorf was content with five. Hort has been followed by many moderns in emphasizing only two. These two are: (a) that reading is to be preferred which best suits the context, and (b) that reading is to be preferred which best explains the origin of all others. Fenton John Anthony Hort was never satisfied with short words if he could find a long one; so he called these rules: (a) "Intrinsic Probability," and (b) "Transcriptional Probability."

These two rules are nothing less than concentrated formulas of all that the textual critic must know and bring to bear upon the solution of his problem. The first rule about choosing what suits the context exhorts the student to know the document he is working on so thoroughly that its idioms are his idioms, its ideas as well known as a familiar room. The second rule about choosing what could have caused the other readings requires that the student know everything in Christian history which could lead to the creation of a variant reading. This involves knowledge of institutions, doctrines, and events. This is knowledge of complicated and often conflicting forces and movements. Christianity from the beginning was a vital and creative movement. It outran the formation of patterns and fences. It experienced the love of God first and formulated it afterward. No single line can chart its course; no one orthodoxy encompasses it.

In this complexity the student is guided not by rules, but by knowledge and judgment. He is guided by his knowledge of scribes and manuscripts, of Christian history and institutions and theology, and of the books whose textual form he is striving to perfect. He is guided also by his own judgment, a quality through which the application of reason to knowledge becomes an art.

3. Conjectural Emendation.—The quality of judgment is needed in the decision as to the use of conjectural emendation in the study of the New Testament. If after external and internal evidence has been studied, the passage in question still yields no sense in any of the forms preserved in the manuscripts, a shrewd guess as to the nature of a possible primitive error is legitimate.

The careless use of conjecture is as indefensible as the refusal to use it at all. There can be no doubt that some readings preserved in our manuscripts were created by the conjectures of ancient editors. To use their conjectures in various passages because they are recorded in manuscripts and are therefore objective, and to refuse to make our own best guess when the situation requires it, is not a case of good judgment. Those scholars whose stubborn devotion to objectivity and the evidence of the manuscripts leads them to reject all conjecture deserve A. E. Housman's indictment: they "use MSS as drunkards use lamp-posts,—not to light them on their way but to dissimulate their instability." ⁵ In general, the students of the manuscripts and the translators have used conjecture parsimoniously; it is seldom that a modern edition of the New Testament will contain more than two or three conjectures. For in view of the wealth of manuscript evidence, it is probable that the original reading has survived.

4. Two Illustrations.—No statement of theory is complete unless it contains examples of its application. The larger variations are the easier to describe, and a review of these suggests the choice of the story of the adulterous woman found in some New Testaments in John 7:53-8:11. Was this or was it not a part of the original Gospel of John?

The Freer Gallery of Art in Washington contains a justly famous Greek manuscript of the four Gospels from the fourth or fifth century A.D. It is the habit of the gallery to provide souvenir postcards for interested visitors. For some time they distributed a postcard of this manuscript of the four Gospels. The photographed page begins at John 7:46 in the middle of the word "servants" and ends in 8:16 with the word "sent." On the back of the card appears a translation of John 8:3-11. This translation is sensational because not a word of it appears on the other side of the card. The Washington Gospels do not contain the story of the adulterous woman anywhere. The treacherous character of ignorance is shown by the fact that the maker of the card chose this page to photograph because the story of the adulterous woman was one of his favorite scripture passages. He chose the page of the manuscript that began before it and ended after it, assumed that it contained it, and copied the story from a printed King James Version.

⁵ M. Manilii Astronomicon; Liber Primus (2nd ed.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1937), p. liii.

The external evidence on this passage is as follows:

(a) It is absent from all Greek manuscripts earlier than the ninth century, with the exception of a fifth-century Greek-Latin manuscript.

(b) No Greek commentator before the twelfth century comments on this passage, although many comment on its context.

(c) It appears in the majority of Greek manuscripts after the tenth century.

(d) It appears in various locations: (i) after John 7:53 most frequently; (ii) after Luke 21 in Family 13; (iii) after John 7:36 in MS 225; (iv) at the end of John in a dozen Greek and many Armenian manuscripts; (v) in the margins of many manuscripts at John 7:53.

(e) It is marked as an insertion in scores of Greek manuscripts.

(f) It appears in widely varying forms. The student who is comparing the Gospel of John with a printed text is usually amazed at the amount of variation that begins as soon as he enters this story. Nine distinct forms of it are well attested in Greek.

(g) It is known in the Latin West earlier than the fourth century; known to Ambrose, Augustine, and Jerome, who said that many Greek and Latin manuscripts contained it; it appears in half a dozen pre-Vulgate Latin manuscripts and in the Latin Vulgate.

(h) It is known in some form in Syria by the middle of the third century. It is quoted in the Syriac Teaching of the Apostles and in the Apostolic Constitutions which are based on that.

This external evidence is best explained by the assumption that this story was no part of the original Gospel of John but entered the Greek New Testament through the Latin versions. This assumption is supported by the internal evidence.

If we apply the test of suitability to context, the vote is still negative. This woman is the only sinner in the Fourth Gospel. Sin defined as immorality does not exist in this Gospel. Nowhere else does the Fourth Evangelist suggest the quality of pity, mercy, or compassion. There are no "publicans and sinners" in John's gospel. John had no repentance or forgiveness of sins. No person of notorious character is introduced. Nowhere is any group of sinners mentioned as companions of Jesus.

Detailed studies of vocabulary and style show that this story is as alien to John in form as it is in idea.

Furthermore, the story does not fit the context because it interrupts the narrative. If this story is absent, then the great day of the feast of Tabernacles is signalized by Jesus' twin declarations that he is the Water of Life and that he is the Light of the World. These sayings correspond to two symbolic acts performed on that day: the pouring of the water, and the lighting of the golden lamps. If the story of the adulterous woman is interposed, the first passage alone falls within the time of the feast, and the second is deferred till the day after its conclusion. Moreover, the two sayings are then separated by an unrelated incident.

The second test has little force here. Does its presence or its absence in the original best explain the other? It is hard to imagine a good reason for its wholesale omission. But Augustine's imagination was strong enough to think up a reason:

Some of little faith, or rather enemies of the true faith, I suppose from a fear lest their wives should gain impunity in sin, removed from their manuscripts the Lord's act of indulgence to the adulteress.⁶

The generality of the "omission" in early Greek sources can hardly be explained this way. Nor is Augustine's argument supported by the evidence from Luke's Gospel, where even greater acts of compassion are left untouched by the scribes who lack this story in John. The external evidence and the evidence from intrinsic probability show that this story was no part of the original Gospel of John.

As an example of conjectural emendation, we may consider a suggested correction of John 19:29. In this account of the Crucifixion the King James Version and the Revised Standard Version agree in the use of the word "hyssop." "A bowl full of vinegar stood there; so they put a sponge full of the wine on hyssop and held it to his mouth." Goodspeed translates this "on a pike," and gives the following commentary:

Matthew and Mark speak of a reed or stick . . . being used for the purpose. But hyssop was a low grassy plant, seldom over two feet high, and how it could be used for such a purpose is hard to see. It is mentioned in I Kings 4:33 as the most insignificant of plants. . . . Modern scholars are inclined to dismiss the word "hyssop" as a graphic error (Souter) for the Greek word ὑσσώ [hyssō], a pike, which would be the most practical and natural thing to use in such a situation. If this . . . was the original reading, it must have been changed very early to hyssop, under the influence of the use of hyssop before the Passover to sprinkle the blood of ⁶ Ad Pollentium de Adulterinis Conjugiis II. vii. 6.

TEXT AND ANCIENT VERSIONS OF THE NEW TESTAMENT

the Passover lamb upon the doorposts (Exod. 12:22).⁷

In such a case the reader must judge whether John, who had read Mark, would care more for accuracy in historical detail or more for symbolic allusion. In other words, is the nature of the Fourth Gospel in general such as to support or reject this conjecture?

With these brief examples we leave the discussion of method. The method begins by the comparison of manuscript with manuscript—a study of external relationships. But since the student cannot accurately reconstruct the archetype or source of each large group, he turns to the appraisal of variants in specific passages. Here he tries to select that reading which best suits its context and best explains the origin of the other readings in the same passage. Beyond this, the student must make the best-informed and most judicious guesses possible to him.

III. Summary

The problem that confronts the printer or translator of the New Testament is one of selection from variant readings of the same passage. A lengthy study of the causes of these variants illuminates the history of the New Testament in the period when it was written by hand and also illustrates the method by which the problem is solved in particular passages. The method is basically one of reversing the flow of history. In history, as manuscript begets manuscript the number of variant readings is increased. In manuscript study (textual criticism to the scholar) variant readings are decreased until a reading is selected which may be regarded as the original with a high degree of probability.

The raw materials for this work are the handwritten copies of the New Testament, whether in Greek or in other languages, plus the copies of the fathers who quote the New Testament. Most essays of this sort devote considerable time to summary catalogues of these documents. In this article no effort has been made to present such a catalogue. The handbooks noted in the bibliography, especially those by Kenyon and Vaganay, provide extensive though not comprehensive information on these "materials of New Testament criticism." Since the discovery of hitherto unknown materials proceeds apace, all such lists are out of date within five years of publication. Only the specialist can be expected to keep abreast of this flood.

⁷ Problems of New Testament Translation (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1945), pp. 115-16. Used by permission.

The minister and the educated layman cannot learn anything comprehensive and accurate about the manuscripts themselves from brief statements. Here of all places a little knowledge is exceedingly dangerous. The nonspecialist should know that we have several thousand manuscripts of the New Testament in Greek and other thousands in more than half a dozen important translations into other languages, with at least a score of church fathers to be studied either in printed "critical" editions or in handwritten copies. Beyond this the nonspecialist must clearly understand the nature of the problem and the methods by which we are steadily though slowly arriving at more accurate solutions.

[Other helpful discussions of the text of the New Testament can be found in the Introduction to the several New Testament books. See especially Vol. VII, pp. 244-46; Vol. VIII, pp. 19-22.]

IV. Selected Bibliography

- COLWELL, ERNEST C. The Study of the Bible. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1937. Chs. ii-iii.
- GOODSPEED, EDGAR J. The Making of the English New Testament. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1925.
- KENYON, FREDERIC GEORGE. The Text of the Greek Bible. London: Duckworth, 1937.
- LAKE, KIRSOPP. The Text of the New Testament, ed. Silva New. London: Christophers, 1928.
- PRICE, IRA MAURICE. The Ancestry of Our English Bible: An Account of Manuscripts, Texts, and Versions of the Bible, ed. W. A. Irwin and Allen Wikgren. New York: Harper & Bros., 1949.
- VAGANAY, LEO. An Introduction to the Textual Criticism of the New Testament, tr. B. V. Miller. St. Louis: B. Herder Book Co., 1937.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE

by ALLEN WIKGREN

- I. Beginnings
- II. The Wycliffite Bible
- III. Early Translation into Other Languages
- IV. William Tyndale and the First Printed New Testament
- V. George Joye
- VI. Miles Coverdale and the First English Bible
- VII. The First Licensed Bible, 1537
- VIII. The Taverner Bible of 1539
- IX. The First Authorized Bible: The Great Bible of 1539
- X. The Geneva Bible
- XI. The Second Authorized Bible: The Bishops' Bible of 1568
- XII. The First Roman Catholic Bible in English
- XIII. The King James Version of 1611
- XIV. The Revised Version
- XV. The Modern Speech Versions
- XVI. Jewish and Roman Catholic Versions
- XVII. The Revised Standard Version
- XVIII. Story Without End
- XIX. Tables of Illustrative Readings
- XX. Selected Bibliography

The Bible is by far the most translated book in the world. The Jews translated their scriptures into Greek and other languages, and the early Christians naturally felt the need of bringing the biblical message to every people in its own tongue.¹ The modern missionary movements continued and expanded these efforts until now the Bible has been rendered into well over a thousand languages and effectively circulated in printed form throughout the entire world.

I. Beginnings

The story of the English Bible begins with the introduction of Christianity into Britain. When and how that happened are obscure, but in the early third century Tertullian and Origen witness to the existence of British Christianity, the former stating that there were places in Britain subject to Christ which Roman arms could not penetrate. Initial gains by the church were wiped out by the Teutonic invasions of the fifth century, but significant advance began again with the coming in A.D. 597 of missionaries sent out by Pope Gregory, and Christianity became firmly established.

In Britain, as elsewhere, missionary work proceeded at first almost entirely by means of the spoken word. Any translation of the Bible consisted of a free and extemporaneous treatment of the Latin text in vernacular speech. In sermon and minstrel song the Scriptures thus first became known in the earliest English form, that is, Anglo-Saxon; and soon partial translations and paraphrases were put into writing in homilies, commentaries, and glosses in Latin manuscripts. A complete translation, however, is unknown in this Anglo-Saxon period. No real popular demand for such a production existed since few people could read, and manuscripts were too expensive for the average person to buy. A Bible for laymen was also unthinkable in the medieval church, which saw in the wide use of the Bible a threat to unity and to ecclesiastical control over the interpretation of the text, as well as a profanation of the Scriptures through such rough dialects as the Anglo-Saxon. Yet much of the biblical contents was made known through ritual, art, religious drama, and Bible picture books, the so-called Biblia pauperum or "Bibles of the poor."

In the earlier period, therefore, we have hardly more than a number of interesting traditions. A certain Caedmon, a seventh-century cowherd of northern England, overnight became divinely inspired and commissioned to sing versifications of the biblical stories as they were translated for him into Anglo-Saxon. Remains (although later) of such metrical paraphrases are to be found. In southern England at the same time, that is, about A.D. 700, Abbot Aldhelm is reported by King Alfred the Great to have used the minstrel technique effectively to procure an audience, and Cynewulf, greatest of Anglo-Saxon poets, also contributed numerous biblical allusions. The Venerable Bede is supposed to have translated the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed for the benefit of priests who were a bit weak in their Latin, and to have urged a contemporary churchman, Egbert, to similar activity. To Egbert is ascribed a translation of the Gospels, and a disciple, Cuthbert, credits Bede with a version of the Gospel of

¹ See pp. 32-83 in this volume.

John, the work being dramatically completed in Bede's dying moments. By the middle of the eighth century, then, probably all the Gospels existed in Anglo-Saxon. In the late ninth century King Alfred apparently promoted biblical study and translation, and to him is attributed among other things an Anglo-Saxon version of the Decalogue, which headed his "Book of Laws," and an unfinished version of the Psalter.

Of extant Anglo-Saxon versions the earliest is probably the British Museum's Vespasian Psalter, a ninth-century Latin text with a crude, interlinear gloss representing middle England speech. A similar manuscript in the Bibliothèque Nationale, the Paris Psalter, contains a southern gloss. It has been ascribed to Alfred the Great, but in its present form appears to be a century or two later. About a dozen such Psalters are known from the ninth and tenth centuries. Other early remains consist of a tenth-century partial gloss of Proverbs and eight copies of the Gospels in various dialects. One of these, the famous Lindisfarne Gospels, is a British Museum manuscript copied by Eadfrid, bishop of Lindisfarne, about A.D. 687 and glossed in northern speech. It is also beautifully illuminated. A similar tenth-century text, named the Rushworth Gospels after its donor, is in the Bodleian Library at Oxford. The other extant manuscripts are all probably copies or descendants of a West-Saxon document of about A.D. 1000, ascribed by a note or colophon to Aelfric, later Archbishop of Canterbury, who is known at about this time for his activity in making the Scriptures available in English. These Gospels contain only the Anglo-Saxon text and deserve rather to be called translations. Aelfric did make a condensed version of the Pentateuch and translations of several Old Testament books in a free and idiomatic style. His sermons and commentaries also contain translation of scriptural text, and he claims to have made use of earlier Anglo-Saxon versions. Similar sermonic efforts of this and later periods also exist in such works as the Blickling Homilies.

Further translation was discouraged by the Norman Conquest in 1066. But some metrical paraphrases based on Genesis and Exodus circulated in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and a similar version of the Gospels and Acts is preserved in an Oxford manuscript of some twenty thousand lines known as the "Ormulum," after the author, Orm, an Augustinian monk who gave as the motive for his efforts, "that all young Christian folks may depend upon the gospel only, and may follow with all their might its holy teaching, in thought and word and deed."

In the face of the French usage of the time the Anglo-Saxon persisted, and re-emerged, though greatly changed, in the fourteenth century, when political events had produced a new national unity and consciousness, and literary activity blossomed forth in Chaucer and others. The language was now less confused by dialectal variations.

In this new era we have a Psalter in Latin and English dated about 1320 and doubtfully attributed to the poet William of Shoreham; and from perhaps a few years later comes a gloss found in another Latin Psalter and accredited to Richard Rolle, the "Hermit of Hampole." The latter was copied several times for a century or so. Other ventures of some popularity were the translation (ca. 1360) of a French text and commentary on Revelation, and a little later a French-Latin collection of gospel narratives which were formed into a kind of harmony of the life of Jesus and used as late as the fifteenth century.

The language of these early versions, especially of the pre-Norman period, is of course quite strange to us, being as close or closer to modern Germanic languages than to modern English. If these versions exerted any influence upon the later English Bible, it was mostly in simplicity and directness of tone and expression.

II. The Wycliffite Bible

So far as we know, the first complete English Bible was due to the influence and activity of John Wycliffe (1324?-1384), the able and eloquent Oxford scholar called the "morning star of the Reformation" because of the religious convictions which he developed and propagated. In common with later Protestantism he emphasized the necessity of providing the layman with the opportunity of reading the Bible. Since he was also active in efforts for social justice, his appeal was widespread among the common people. After his forced retirement to Lutterworth in 1382 and his death in 1384, his followers, the "poor priests" or "Lollards," carried on his work in an influential traveling ministry of teaching, preaching, and distribution of the Scriptures. Wycliffe managed to survive the attack of his enemies and to die a natural death. But his writings were banned, and the Council of Constance in 1415 officially ordered his body as well as his books burned. The cause of religion was thus "advanced" by the digging up and burning of his bones in 1428, the ashes being thrown into the river Swift.

The dispersal of Wycliffe's remains was symbolic, however, of real religious progress through the spread of the Scriptures which he brought about. The Wycliffite Bible has justly been described as an event rather than merely a book, both on this account and because of its effect upon English prose style. While Wycliffe's exact part in the project is obscure, he nevertheless appears to have been the moving spirit behind it. A pupil and colleague, Nicholas of Hereford, may have done most of the work, assisted perhaps by another friend, John Purvey. The latter also is credited, though uncertainly, with the revision which appeared about the year 1388 or later and became the popular and standard form. The original seems to have been completed in 1382, or a little later, and was more literal than the revision. The translation was made from the current Latin text, and so included the Old Testament apocryphal books.

A definitive attempt to distinguish the original Wycliffite Bible from the "Purvey revision" was not made until 1850, when J. Forshall and F. Madden published the complete text of both in four volumes, representing the result of twenty-two years of work and the examination of 170 manuscripts.² Strangely enough, this also was the first printing of the complete version, only the New Testament having been previously so published, the Purvey form in 1731 and the earlier form in 1848. Printing had been introduced into England in 1477 by William Caxton, and much scripture circulated in other publications, for example, in his own translation of the Golden Legende, which contained the first printing in 1483 of portions of the English Bible. But an edict of 1408 forbidding unauthorized translation and publication in English or other languages appears effectively to have discouraged printing of the Bible as such in the fifteenth century.

The fact of the survival of so many manuscripts of the Wycliffite Bible in spite of opposition and destruction indicates its widespread influence. Some of its diction and phraseology and much of its spirit lived on in the mainstream of subsequent translation and revision.³ Replacing a number of similar and fragmentary attempts at translation made in the same period, it remained the only English Bible until the sixteenth century.

III. Early Translation into Other Languages

In the manuscript era a development of vernacular versions similar to that in England occurred also in the other countries of western Europe. Early French activity seems to have culminated in a Norman-French Bible made at the University of Paris and used in northern France around 1250. In Germany early fragmentary translation is exemplified by the ² The Holy Bible, Containing the Old and New Testaments, with the Apocryphal Books, in the Earliest English Versions Made from the Latin Vulgate by John Wycliffe and His Followers (Oxford: University Press, 1850).

³ E.g., "compass sea and land," "son of perdition," "God forbede," "peradventure."

Monsee fragment of Matthew, by a gospel harmony, and by an old Saxon poem Heiland ("Savior"), of the ninth century. Translations multiplied so rapidly that before the time of Luther about fifty complete German editions had been produced! In most of the Western countries, owing doubtless to the earlier impact of the Reformation, printed editions of the Scriptures appeared sooner than in England. Beginning with the Strasbourg German Bible of Mentel in 1466, there were eighteen printings in German before the important Luther New Testament of 1522 and Bible of 1534. In French the first printing, a New Testament, occurred about 1478 at Lyons, and the complete Bible appeared in 1487. Even before this, the Italians (1471) and Dutch (1477) had their Bible in the printed vernacular. Swedish, Bohemian, Slavonic, Russian, and Danish printing in whole or in part preceded English. Other subsequent editions of non-English scripture will be mentioned in connection with the English versions upon which they exerted an influence.

IV. William Tyndale and the First Printed New Testament

With the sixteenth century we enter into the most creative period in the history of the English Bible. It was a time of bitter Protestant-Catholic conflict, of widespread ignorance of the Scriptures, even among the clergy, and of initial opposition to vernacular translations in England by both Catholic and Anglican alike. But forces were at work in the Renaissance and Reformation which in a very few years led to the legal dissemination of the Bible in English. The momentous discovery of printing took place. The Scriptures were made known in their original languages, the first printed Hebrew Bible appearing in 1488 and the first Greek New Testament, the edition of Erasmus, in 1516. Scholars like Erasmus and reformers like Luther spoke and worked for the right of all to read the sacred text. The vernacular languages, including English, had developed to the point where they could be used as literary mediums. They, as well as Hebrew and Greek, were studied in the newly founded universities. These and other factors combined to set the stage for the production of the first printed English Bible.

At this time William Tyndale, born about 1492 or earlier, and educated at Oxford and Cambridge, came upon the scene. His experience as chaplain and tutor led him to the conviction that "it was impossible to stablysh the laye people in any truth, excepte the scripture were playnly layde before their eyes in their mother tongue.”⁴ And to a prominent churchman of his time he addressed his well-known words: “If God spare my lyfe, ere many yeares I wyl cause a boye that dryveth the plough shall know more of the scripture than thou doest!”⁵ For the task which he set himself Tyndale was well qualified both by an excellent knowledge of Greek and Hebrew and by an ability to write English of such felicity of phraseology and simple, graceful style that it has become immortalized in the English Bible.

Another necessary quality which Tyndale possessed was perseverance in the face of opposition, calumny, and persecution. For the clergy, with government support, were still opposed to translation in general, and in particular disliked Tyndale’s developing Protestant views. His vigorous denunciation of the clergy did not help his cause. His own account tells of inability to find support for his project in England from Bishop Tunstall of London, and of the necessity of going to the Continent to pursue the work. He was befriended by a London merchant, Humphrey Monmouth, in whose home he apparently began his translation. There also he may first have become informed about the tenets of Lutheranism, and been led to realize “not only that there was no rowme in my lorde of londons palace to translate the new testament, but also that there was no place to do it in all englonde.”⁶

In 1524, therefore, Tyndale left for Hamburg, and by the middle of 1525 his New Testament was complete and printing was begun at Cologne. A quarto edition was interrupted by the authorities at the instigation of a bitter enemy of the reformers, Cochlaeus (Johan Dobneck). From it only a thirty-one leaf fragment of Matthew in the British Museum is extant, although it is believed that three thousand copies were published after the work was resumed at Worms. Here also an anonymous octavo edition of the same size was first published. So vigorous was the opposition of the English authorities, however, and so zealously did king and bishops collaborate to destroy the Tyndale publications as they were smuggled into England, that only two copies of this octavo issue survived, and one of these is very fragmentary. One, lacking only the title page, is in the Baptist College at Bristol, England. The other is preserved in the library of St. Paul’s Cathedral, London. Tyndale, however, was enabled to continue for some time by the support of certain London merchants, in particular of one Augustine Packyn-ton, who contrived to raise money by selling New Testaments to the Bishop of London for burning, thus keeping both Tyndale and the bishop’s bonfire going.

Tyndale’s association with Luther at Wittenberg and his manifest indebtedness to Luther’s German New Testament were special reasons for official condemnation. The single-column, Gothic black-letter type, the prologue, prefaces, and marginal notes showed the influence of the reformer’s edition. The authorities were also provoked by the substitution of new terms for certain ecclesiastically sacred ones, such as “elder” for “priest,” “repentance” for “penance,” “congregation” for “church,” etc.

A revision by Tyndale was issued in 1534; and another corrected edition published in 1535 became the basis for all later revision. The Greek text underlying the work remained close to the Erasmus editions of 1519 and 1522, unfortunately for the accuracy of the English New Testament for years to come.

Tyndale also undertook to translate the Old Testament and made a significant contribution to that end, although unable to complete the work before his death. He published the Pentateuch in 1530 and Jonah in 1531. But the authorities finally apprehended him through the treachery of a friend, and after an imprisonment of a year and a half near Brussels (during which he probably completed the text through Chronicles), he was strangled and burned at the stake on October 6, 1536. His famous dying prayer, according to Foxe, was “Lord, open the King of England’s eyes.”⁷ Meanwhile, the situation in England had already changed for the better under Cromwell, who had even sought Tyndale’s release, and a complete English Bible was now in relatively unimpeded circulation.

The creative nature of Tyndale’s work cannot be overestimated. Though he freely consulted the Vulgate, Luther, and Erasmus’ new Latin version, and was doubtless influenced here and there by the current Wycliffite English, his production is characterized by great originality and vigor. It became, in fact, a foundation for all subsequent efforts of revision, so much so that 80 per cent or more of the English down through the Revised Version has been estimated to be basically his in those portions of the Bible in which he wrought with such skill and devotion.⁸

⁷ Op. cit., p. 544.

⁸ Recent special studies include Henry Guppy, William Tyndale and the Earlier Translators of the Bible into English (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1925); J. F. Mozley, William Tyndale (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1937); S. L. Greenslade, ed., The Work of William Tyndale (London: Blackie & Son, 1938).

⁴ Alfred W. Pollard, Records of the English Bible (Oxford: Henry Frowde, 1911), p. 95.

⁵ John Foxe, The Acts and Monuments of the Church (ed. M. Hobart Seymour; New York: Robert Carter & Bros., 1855), p. 542.

⁶ Pollard, op. cit., pp. 97-98.

V. George Joye

A former friend and collaborator of Tyndale's, George Joye, deserves mention at this point as a contributor to the growing number of biblical books printed in English. Joye had incurred Tyndale's disfavor by bringing out unauthorized revisions of the latter's New Testament in 1534 and 1535, and a sharp controversy ensued between the two. He should apparently be credited, however, with the translation and publication of a portion of the Old Testament extending from Psalms through Lamentations. This includes a rendering of Isaiah from the Latin (1531) which exerted some influence upon Coverdale's version of 1535, a translation of Jeremiah and Lamentations (1534) which included the "Song of Moses" to "magnify ye our Lorde for the fall of our Pharao the bishop of Rome," probably an edition of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes (1535), and a Psalter (1534), some readings of which have continued down through the King James Version. He has recently been credited with the possible authorship of the first Psalter printed in English, a translation from Latin pseudonymously published in 1530.⁹ Joye's style is rather free, a reflection of his attitude appearing in a declaration that "as for me I had as lief put the trwthe in the text as in the margent," and "I wolde the scripture were so purely and playnly translated that it neded nether note, glose nor scholia, so that the reder might once swimme without a corke."¹⁰

VI. Miles Coverdale and the First English Bible

The completion and publication of the first complete printed English Bible was, however, the work of Miles Coverdale (1488-1568). Coverdale had studied at Cambridge, had become a priest and friar, and had apparently also found it discreet to spend some years outside of England because of Protestant convictions. He became acquainted with Tyndale and his work, and may have been encouraged to attempt a complete edition, of the English Scriptures, while still abroad, by statements of King Henry VIII favorable to an English Bible "by great lerned and Catholyke persones," and by activities of similar import by Archbishop Latimer and Thomas Cromwell. The edition which he published in 1535, printed perhaps at Cologne or Marburg, was not authorized in any way, but ⁹ Charles C. Butterworth, The Literary Lineage of the King James Bible (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1941), pp. 64-70, 87-91. The version was fairly popular, especially in connection with various devotional books known as "primers," and together with an independent version of the Psalter, found in the latter, it represents frequent literary linkage between the Wycliffite and later forms.

¹⁰ Pollard, op. cit., pp. 194-95.

Coverdale dedicated it to the king and queen in polite and flattering phraseology, and it met with no serious opposition. (The elaborate woodcut title page by Holbein shows the king handing out the Bible to the clergy.) This toleration is particularly noteworthy because Tyndale's translation was the basis of the work in the New Testament and Pentateuch.

Hostility toward the version was doubtless lessened by Coverdale's mild disposition and tractable attitude. In his dedication he declares, "I have nether wrested nor altered so moch as one worde for the mayntenance of any maner of secte." In notes and prologues he eliminated controversial data, and in the text he restored most of the ecclesiastically favored terms which Tyndale had altered. It is quite possible also that the first edition was anonymous, and that the dedicatory "Epistle unto the Kynges hyghnesse," signed by Coverdale, first appeared in a 1537 reprinting by James Nicolson. The original title page read: "Biblia: The Bible / that is, the holy Scripture of the Olde and New Testament, faithfully and truly translated out of Douche and Latyn in to English. M.D.XXXV." Other editions of the same year printed in England omitted the reference to Dutch (i.e., German) and Latin, which implied Lutheran and Catholic connections, and modified a prefatory reference to dependence upon Luther.

Actually, Coverdale did translate from the Latin and German in those sections of the Old Testament in which he did not use Tyndale. It is generally doubted that he knew much if any Hebrew, but his acquaintance with German was good. He states in his dedication that he translated out of "fyve sundry interpreters"; and besides Tyndale, these have been identified as the Vulgate, Luther, Pagninus' rather literal Latin translation of 1528, and the Zurich Swiss-German Bible of 1527-29 by Leo Juda, Zwingli, and others. The Vulgate rather than the Hebrew order of books was used in the Old Testament, and the Apocrypha are included, although their authority is questioned. The format and type resembled Tyndale's, but the text was set in double columns and decorated with sixty-eight woodcuts, and chapter summaries were introduced.

In general, the Tyndale portions of the edition are superior in quality, but Coverdale often improved the phrasing by reason of a special aptitude for euphonious English and for a fluent, although frequently diffuse, form of expression. While the work is uneven in this respect, some permanent contribution was thus made to the language of the English Bible, here as well as in later improvements of his which appeared in three editions of the Latin-English New Testament (1538) and in the Great Bible of 1539. In particular, his version of the Psalter, as it appears in the latter, has remained a part of the Anglican Prayer Book to this day. Phraseology appearing here first with Coverdale included "Thou anyontest my heade with oyle"; "the valley of the shadowe of deeth"; "but the way of the vngodly shal perishe" (see also table on pp. 101-4).

THE ENGLISH BIBLE

VII. The First Licensed Bible, 1537

Developing opinion in favor of an English Bible available to all without fear or favor now appeared in the renewal of a request to the king by the bishops. With a new translation by the bishops in mind, an injunction was actually drawn up in 1536, but not published until 1538, instructing the clergy to provide both a Latin and English Bible for every parish church. Meanwhile, two Bibles were published in 1537 which claimed to be licensed by the king. One, the printing of Coverdale by James Nicolson, probably merely assumed this status; the other, of obscure origin, but published under the name of Thomas Matthew, perhaps at Antwerp, obtained official support.¹¹

Although this version largely followed Tyndale, incorporating also here for the first time his Old Testament translations of Joshua through Chronicles, and even reintroducing his prologues and notes, Cranmer, in his intercession with Cromwell to obtain royal approval, intimated that this was a "new Bible, both of a new translacion and of a new prynte," and claimed that "so farre as I have redde thereof I like it better than any other translation heretofore made." Rather than cast aspersions upon Cranmer's Bible reading, we may suppose that he was motivated by the desire to have something to serve until the production of the projected bishops' version, which in his appeal to Cromwell he pessimistically dated at "a day after domesday." Whether king or counselors were acquainted with the facts about the revision is uncertain, but the mysterious circumstances of its origin may reflect an attempt to cover up the rather embarrassing approval of a Bible so largely the work of a man whose translations were officially condemned and who himself had just been burned at the stake as a heretic.

Although a Thomas Matthew of Colchester is known in connection with earlier biblical study, the work on the Bible of 1537 is generally attributed to John Rogers, a Cambridge graduate and friend of Tyndale, who in 1555 became the protomartyr in the persecution of Protestants under Bloody Mary. There is little departure from the Tyndale text, but the influence of Olivétan's French Bible of 1535 and Lefèvre's French Bible of 1534 is evident in the marginalia, in a new preface to the Apocrypha, and in the added "Prayer of Manasses." Whatever the true circumstances of its origin and publication, the Matthew Bible is notable for its official status, for its use of the heretofore unpublished Tyndale portions of the Old Testament, and for the fact that it became the chief basis for future revisions.

¹¹ The title page read: "The Byble, which is all the holy Scripture: In whych are conteyned the Olde and Neue Testament, truly and purely translated into Englysh by Thomas Matthew . . . M.D.XXXVII. Set forth with the Kinges most graciously licence."

VIII. The Taverner Bible of 1539

In 1539 a revision of the Matthew Bible, minus most of the notes and polemic data, was issued by Richard Taverner at the instigation of Cromwell or of the king's printer, Thomas Barthlet. The title was as follows: "The Most Sacred Bible: Whiche is the holy scripture, conteynyng the old and new testament, translated in to English, and newly recognised with great diligence after most faythful exemplars, by Rychard Taverner. . . . Prynted at London in Fletestrete. . . . by Iohn Byddell, for Thomas Barthlet. . . . M.D.XXXIX." Taverner was a Cambridge and Oxford student who had been interested for some time in the English Bible. He knew Greek well, and especially therefore in the New Testament he introduced some independent renderings of real merit, several of which entered into subsequent English revisions. But this version was soon superseded by another revision and therefore exercised relatively little influence within the mainstream of the English Bible. It does have the honor of being the first to be printed completely in England.

IX. The First Authorized Bible: The Great Bible of 1539

A more significant revision appeared in the same year with the "Great Bible," so called from its size, or "Cranmer's Bible," from a preface to the second edition (1540) written by the archbishop. It may owe its origin mainly to a reaction of the clergy against the Matthew Bible, whose true content they had discovered. Yet it was undertaken by Coverdale at Cromwell's request. There was some episcopal supervision in the fourth and sixth of the seven editions which were published, and the title page refers the work to "dyverse excellent learned men." Who these were is unknown, unless the reference is to those responsible for the various earlier translations and other sources used in the revision. For, in particular, use was made of Munster's Latin Old Testament (1534-35), the Vulgate, and especially in the 1540 edition, of Erasmus' Latin New Testament and the Complutensian

Polyglot.¹² As the first and, in fact, the only formally "authorized" English Bible, it is of special significance in our story. The 1540 and subsequent editions carried on the title page the explicit words: "This is the Byble apoynted to the use of the churches."¹³

Except for its larger size, the Great Bible does not differ much in format from previous revisions. However, the reactions against controversial prologues and marginalia now resulted in the removal of all such adjuncts to the text. Coverdale himself had projected explanatory notes for the first edition and was very much disappointed, as he wrote to Cromwell, that "the darck places of the text (vpon the which I haue allwaye set a hande) shulde so passe vndeclared."¹⁴ The pointing hands actually appeared in the margins of the first three editions, but the notes were never made. There was no dedication, but a special feature serving the same purpose was an elaborate title page woodcut, often wrongly attributed to Holbein,¹⁵ which shows King Henry VIII receiving and distributing the "Word of God" through his ministers Cranmer and Cromwell to the people amid their shouts of Vivat Rex and "God save the King." Private interpretation of the Bible was still feared, however, as indicated by statements in the preface and in royal proclamations of 1541 and later. The reference of difficulties to men of higher judgment in the Scriptures was recommended, and disputations were forbidden, especially in taverns and alehouses. The people now had a certain access to the Bible in the church and they were making the most of it; the authorities thought they were making too much of it.

Beginning about this time, however, and extending to the end of the reign of Henry VIII, a Catholic reaction set in which effectively halted the publication of the Bible in England for some years. The year 1540 saw the execution of Cromwell and the burning of both Protestants and papists for heresy. In 1543 restrictions were placed upon the reading of the Bible, and in ¹² A Hebrew-Greek-Latin edition of the Bible (Latin-Greek in the New Testament) published in four volumes at Complutum (Alcalá de Henares), Spain by Cardinal Ximenes in 1522-26.

¹³ The original (1539) title page read: "The Byble in Englyshe, that is to saye the content of all the holy scripture, bothe of ye olde and newe testament, truly translated after the veryte of the Hebrue and Greke textes, by ye dyligent studye of dyverse excellent learned men, expert in the forsayde tonges. Prynted by Rychard Grafton and Edward Whitchurch. Cum privilegio ad imprimendum solum. 1539."

¹⁴ Pollard, op. cit., p. 245.

¹⁵ This is the conclusion of H. R. Willoughby's careful investigation as recorded in a quatercentennial publication, The First Authorized English Bible and the Cranmer Preface (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1942).

1546 a general burning of Bibles commenced. The authorized Great Bible alone was allowed, and its reading was limited to the upper classes. Although the brief reign of Edward VI afforded the Protestant forces some opportunity for recovery and advance, and the restrictions on the Bible were removed, the intemperate form of some of the Protestant iconoclasm of the period, when added to the previous Cromwellian "terror," made inevitable the continuation of reaction upon the accession of Mary Tudor in 1553. The situation was again reversed. A severe Catholic persecution ensued, which resulted in some three hundred martyrs, including men like Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer. Many, among them Coverdale, took refuge on the Continent, and not a few gathered in Geneva, where they found a sympathetic welcome. Among these refugees the next great contribution to the promulgation of the Scriptures in English was made in the preparation and publication of the so-called "Geneva Bible."

X. The Geneva Bible

The purpose and character of the new Geneva revision reflect this geographically concentrated Protestantism. Calvin, Knox, Beza, and for a time Coverdale were in touch with the work. Important contacts were probably made with a group of scholars revising the French Bible of Olivétan.¹⁶

Although no names appear on the New Testament, which was published in 1557, the work is mainly credited to William Whittingham, a brother-in-law of Calvin, who was an able scholar and the successor of John Knox as minister to the English congregation at Geneva. The Old Testament was done by a group including Anthony Gilby, Thomas Sampson, and others of uncertain identity.

Notwithstanding the valuable contribution of those who participated, the result was definitely a revision of previous work. In the New Testament, Tyndale's 1534 edition was the chief basis, with important suggestions from Beza's Latin text and commentary of 1556.¹⁷ The Old Testament consisted of a revision of the Great Bible by a careful reference to the Hebrew and with the guidance of the Latin editions of Pagninus, Münster, and Leo Juda. The Old Testament was published together with a careful revision of the New Testament in 1560, the first edition of the complete Geneva Bible, or, as it is sometimes called from the translation in Gen. 3:7, the "Breeches Bible."¹⁸ The title page of the 1560 Bible read: "The Bible and Holy Scriptures conteyned in the Olde and Newe Testament. Translated according to the Ebrue and Greke, and conferred with the best translations in divers languages. With most profitable annotations vpon all the hard places, and other things of great importance as may appeare in the Epistle to the Reader. At Geneva. Printed by Rouland Hall. M.D.LX." To Queen Elizabeth, who had succeeded to the throne in 1558 and had re-established the Church of England, the Geneva Bible was optimistically dedicated, along with some pious exhortation on building the church and putting all papists to the sword.

¹⁶ So David Daiches, The King James Version of the English Bible (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1941). He shows that it was the model for a table on Hebrew names and on "the chief and principal matters of the whole Bible."

¹⁷ B. F. Westcott, A General View of the History of the English Bible (3d ed., rev. W. A. Wright; London: Macmillan & Co., 1905), has shown that in I John at least two thirds of the new renderings are from Beza.

The new revision was the most scholarly and accurate English Bible so far produced, and represented the most creative development since Tyndale. The revisers themselves in their preface modestly explain how "in respect of this ripe age and cleare light which God had now reueiled, the translations required greatly to be perused and reformed," and give a strong Protestant statement of the importance of an English Bible for the common man. The understanding of the text was furthered by a profuse marginal commentary, again of strongly Protestant, even sometimes Calvinistic, tenor. "I have endeuered so to profit all therby," ran the preface of the 1557 New Testament, "that both the learned and others might be holpen. . ."

The marginal notes contributed greatly to the popularity of the version among Protestants in general. Royalty and clergy, however, and especially Roman Catholic circles, were disturbed by certain of the interpretations. A note on Exod. 1:19 approving of the midwives' lying to Pharaoh was considered a reflection on royal prerogatives. The Pope naturally objected to being identified with "the angel of the bottomless pit" (Rev. 9:11), as "Antichrist the Pope, king of hypocrites and Satan's ambassadour." But not all notes were polemic, and their apparent bias can rarely be said to extend into the text itself. Alternative translations, exposition, and explanations of various kinds all made up the "most profitable annotations vpon all the hard places."

Several other novel features contributed to the usefulness and popularity of this Bible. Roman type was used for the first time. Division of the chapters into verses first appeared in English and became the basis of all versification in later English Bibles. The Hebrew Old Testament had long been divided (by Jewish scholars, the Masoretes) into sections or paragraphs but these were supplanted in the Complutensian Polyglot of 1522-26 by the Vulgate chapter division, probably devised by Stephen Langton in the thirteenth century for Old and New Testaments. This appeared in all English Bibles. The versification of Old Testament and Apocrypha, originating with the Masoretes, appeared in Pagninus' Latin of 1528, and was taken over by the Geneva version in substantially the same form in which it is given in a later (1556-57) edition. The New Testament versification was made by Robert Estienne for his Greek edition of 1551, from which it was probably incorporated into the Geneva via Beza's Latin of 1556. The practice of italicizing English words not represented in the original text was introduced from Pagninus and Beza, a practice which was to continue down through the Revised Version. The convenient quarto size and consequently cheaper price also contributed to its popularity; and besides the marginal commentary, a variety of "helps," including maps, tables, woodcuts, chapter summaries, running titles, and, after 1579, a Calvinistic catechism, added to its usefulness.

¹⁸ The term "breeches" had occurred here, however, in Wycliffe and in Caxton's Golden Legende.

As a result of these various features and the superior and attractive character of the version itself, the Geneva Bible enjoyed an immediate and widespread reception and usage. It soon became the household Bible of English-speaking Protestantism and so remained for nearly a century. It was the Bible of Shakespeare, of John Bunyan, of Cromwell's army, of the Puritan pilgrims, and of King James himself. It even colors a scripture quotation in the preface of the King James Version! About 180 editions of various sorts, 96 complete, were published, 8 of them appearing after the publication of the King James Version in 1611. Although never officially endorsed, it exerted a fundamental influence upon its "authorized" successors.

XI. The Second Authorized Bible: The Bishops' Bible of 1568

The popularity and superiority of the Geneva Bible were irksome to the church and state. Elizabeth's policy of toleration also had made it possible for all previous versions to circulate, and the Great Bible was unable to maintain a position commensurate with its official prerogative. An attempt was made, therefore, to produce a revision which might supplant the Geneva and other competing editions. Archbishop Parker, who became the leader of the undertaking, really a revival of Cranmer's project, formed a committee of revisers in 1564;¹⁹ and since the majority were bishops, the new version was naturally called "The Bishops' Bible."

¹⁹ A fairly accurate, although not quite certain or complete, list has been compiled from an account by Parker and from the revisers' initials affixed to the various parts of the work. A reconstruction is given by Pollard, op. cit., pp. 30-31, and in some handbooks.

After about four years of effort by the members of the committee to whom the work had been parceled out, the first edition was published in 1568 in a very large and impressive folio. The title was simply "The holie Bible conteyning the olde Testament and the newe." Although there was no dedication, a woodcut portrait of Queen Elizabeth appeared on the title page. The Cranmer preface to the Great Bible was reproduced and another long one added by Parker. Extensive external equipment included tables of content, a chronology, genealogies, maps, pictures, an almanac, numerous decorative woodcuts, two engravings, and marginal annotations. The customary black-letter type was employed, but Roman type served the function of the italics which had been used in the Geneva Bible.

Officially the revision was to be based on the Great Bible and there was to be only such necessary variation from it as was demanded by the Hebrew or Greek. This purpose is stated in a set of "Observacions respected of the Translators," which also enjoined the use of the Latin of Pagninus and Münster as guides. It was suggested too that unifying text like genealogies should be marked for possible omission in public reading, that "all such wordes as soundeth in the Olde Translacion to any offence of Lightnes or obscenitie be expressed with more convenient termes and phrases," and that no "determinacion in places of controversie" or "bitter notis vppon any text" be included.²⁰ The real result was a revision of very uneven character, due to the exercise of individual freedom by the translators without adequate editorial supervision of the whole work. While some sections are therefore close to the Great Bible, especially in the Old Testament and Apocrypha, others depart freely from it. In some of these the influence of the Geneva Bible is apparent; even many of its marginalia were taken over. John Eadie²¹ found that out of fifty notes in I Corinthians all but seven were from the Geneva. In Galatians twenty-two notes, all but two alternative translations, are used. The notes in general are explanatory or historical with some alternative renderings and some exhortation. The most famous is doubtless that on the gold of Ophir in Ps. 45:9: "Ophir is thought to be the Islande in the west coast, of late founde by Christopher Columbo: from whence at this day is brought most fine golde." The preface attributes the verse division to the Pagninus Bible. But the version was in general unprogressive, and ignored many improvements in the Geneva text. Nor was the phraseology as simple and direct as in the latter, although Parker had been asked to avoid "ink horn terms."

In spite of its defects, the Bishops' Bible became the second "authorized" English version, for, although never so officially designated by the queen, it was endorsed by a convocation which in 1571 ordered its possession and use by every bishop and archbishop. While this injunction does not seem generally to have been obeyed, the version eventually displaced the Great Bible as the one "appoynted to be read in the Churches," and from 1577 on "as set forth by authoritie." As has been already intimated, however, it failed to oust the Psalter of the Great Bible. The second edition of 1572 gave both in parallel columns, the preface rather timidly inviting the reader to compare the two. But in all subsequent printings except one, the Psalter of the Great Bible alone was retained!

Although the Bishops' Bible was thus ecclesiastically acceptable, and about twenty editions of it were printed over the period from 1568 to 1606, it failed to replace the Geneva version in popular esteem and usage. The second edition served, however, as the official basis of the revision which was destined to do so, and in this way a number of readings which originated with the Bishops' Bible were perpetuated.

XII. The First Roman Catholic Bible in English

Meanwhile, another influential achievement occurred in the form of a Roman Catholic Bible in English. Back of this startling venture were Catholic refugees from England led by William Cardinal Allen, president and founder of the English college at Douai, France, then temporarily removed to Reims. The reasons for such a translation were given by Allen as Protestant distortion of the meaning of the text and the fact that Catholic preachers were at a disadvantage in quoting the Bible in English without a version of their own. Approval of lay use of the Bible was definitely not intended. In fact, the undertaking was not at first officially sanctioned by the church at all, but was doubtless a part of the Jesuit program of recapturing England for Catholicism.

The translation was made chiefly by Gregory Martin, and revised by Allen, both Oxford men. Although completed by 1582, only the New Testament was then published at Reims, the Old Testament being delayed until 1609-10 by lack of funds. By this time the college had moved back to Douai, and the version is therefore known as the Douay or Reims-Douay Bible. A complete Bible was not issued until 1633-35 at Rouen. Roman type and marginal versification are used, and the text is paragraphed, but not by verses as in the Bishops' and Geneva Bibles. Annotations by Allen in the form of marginalia and notes at the ends of chapters rival the Geneva in profuseness and exceed it in polemic nature. The Protestant "hereticks" and the Genevan commentators in particular are constantly, though not lovingly, in mind. The note on Matt. 6:24, for example, gives as the first interpretation of "two masters": "Two religions, God and Baal, Christ and Calvin, Masse and Communion, the Catholike Church and Heretical Conventicles."

²⁰ Pollard, op. cit., pp. 297-98.

²¹ The English Bible (London: Macmillan & Co., 1876).

The title page of the version proclaims it to be translated out of the "authenticall Latin," referring, of course, to the Vulgate. The preface was to a certain extent right in claiming that this preserved a less corrupt text than the late Greek which lay behind the English translations to this time. The reading in Luke 2:14 ("and in earth peace to men of good will") and the omission of the doxology in Matt. 6:13 are conspicuous examples (see tables on pp. 102-3). Here and elsewhere there is coincidence with the Wycliffite version, since it too was made from the Vulgate. As the title page suggests, the Greek, Hebrew, and "other editions in divers languages" were also consulted. This is especially true in the New Testament, where even the influence of Geneva readings is apparent. But the version was often a slavishly literalistic rendering, at times merely a transliteration, of the Latin. To be understood it needed itself to be translated in such passages as "Give us today our supersubstantial bread" (Matt. 6:11), or, "But he exinanited himself" (Phil. 2:7).

The version was not without improvements, especially in its treatment of the Greek article, and it exerted a considerable influence upon the King James revision, in which many of its Latinisms were adopted. Its chief significance lay of course in Roman Catholic circles, where it was not only the first translation into English, but was eventually accorded official recognition and became the basis of all subsequent revision.

XIII. The King James Version of 1611

The climax and culmination of these early efforts in translation and revision was reached in the King James Version of 1611.

A number of factors combined to set the stage for the undertaking. The long reign of Elizabeth (1558-1603), with its partial settlement of the Protestant-Catholic controversy and defeat of the Spanish Armada (1588), ushered in a period of comparative peace and quiet that became notable for intellectual and literary effort. When James I came to the throne in 1603, he brought with him pronounced Protestant views and a personal interest in biblical study and translation. The Bishops' Bible had failed to displace the Geneva, and the Puritans were objecting, among other things, to the "authorized" versions. It was to hear their complaints that James called the Hampton Court Conference of 1604, which became the immediate occasion for the new revision. For when the Puritans gained little in other matters, the criticism of the English Bibles was broached, and John Reynolds, Puritan president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, moved that there might be a new translation of the Bible. Although there was no immediate action on this petition, the idea appealed to the king, and as the preface to the version itself puts it, "yet even hereupon did his Maiestie beginne to bethinke himself of the good that might ensue by a new translation, and presently after gave order for this translation which is now presented unto thee." Whatever his motives, King James supported the project so vigorously that by July, 1604, a translation committee of fifty "learned men" and a list of rules of procedure had been provided.²²

Although our knowledge of the earliest period of the work is vague, the purposes of the revision may be learned from the rules of procedure and from the preface. The latter, a long and learned document by one of the revisers, Miles Smith, is unfortunately omitted from the version as usually printed.²³ Its presence would clear up many misunderstandings about the character and intent of the revision. The reader would learn that an English Bible still needed justification and that strong opposition was expected to any revision of the current version:

Many mens mouths haue bene open a good while (and yet are not stopped) with speeches about the Translation so long in hand . . . : and aske what may be the reason, what the necessitie of the employment.

They would learn that the new version was a scholarly revision of previous work with a modest hope of improvement and no thought of finality:

Truly (good Christian Reader) wee neuer thought from the beginning, that we should neede to make a new Translation, nor yet to make of a bad one a good one, . . . but to make a good one better, or out of many good ones, one principall good one, not ²² About fifty of the group are known. But our fullest list has forty-seven names. It may be found in Pollard, op. cit., pp. 49-53; Butterworth, op. cit., pp. 208-9. A full statement of the rules of procedure may be found in Pollard, pp. 53-55, and in various handbooks.

²³ It is reproduced in Pollard, op. cit., pp. 340-77. E. J. Goodspeed has published it with a facsimile and introduction: The Translators to the Reader (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1935).

justly to be excepted against; that hath bene our ideauour, that our marke. . . . So, if we building vpon their foundation that went before vs, and being holpen by their labours, doe endeouour to make that better which they left so good; no man, we are sure, hath cause to mislike vs; they, we perswade our selues, if they were aliuie, would thanke vs.

The rules of procedure more specifically indicated that the Bishops' Bible was to be followed and "as little altered as the Truth of the original will permit"; that certain other translations should be used where they agreed better with the text, viz., "Tindoll's, Matthew's, Coverdale's, Whitchurch's [the Great Bible, so named from a printer], Geneva"; that "the old Ecclesiastical words [were] to be kept," and that no marginal notes were to be used except for necessary explanation of the Hebrew or Greek. Most of the remaining fifteen rules dealt with method of procedure, providing that the committee be divided into six companies operating two each at Oxford, Cambridge, and Westminster on allotted sections of the text, that they should confer on the results, and that a special committee should make a final review of the work. It is questionable whether the last two of these provisions were adequately carried out. Although its beginning was unaccountably delayed for about four years, the revision was completed within three years and ready for publication by 1611.

The historic edition which issued from the press of Robert Barker was a large folio volume very similar to the Bishops' Bible in appearance. The type and the chapter and verse division were essentially the same. Running titles and prefatory chapter summaries were included, many reflecting the influence of the Geneva Bible. There were several tables and charts. The Apocrypha were given without any distinguishing comments. A flattering dedication to King James was naturally a feature, and an elaborate engraved title page described the version as "The Holy Bible, Conteyning the Old Testament and the New: Newly Translated out of the Originall tongues; & with the former Translations diligently compared and revised, by his Maiesties speciall Commandement. Appointed to be read in Churches."

A second edition partly printed in the same year and published in 1613 has caused some confusion as to priority because of the use of leaves of the earlier edition in copies of the later. The editions differed in over four hundred readings and in other features. (They are sometimes called the "He Bible" and "She Bible" from their respective renderings of the reference in Ruth 3:15.) Although the King James Version has come to be known as the authorized version, no official action of authorization is known to exist. Either the record of such an act was destroyed by fire or, as with the Bishops' Bible, the official sponsorship was considered sufficient recognition. The King James Bible therefore became the third "authorized" English Bible.

Although officially a revision of the Bishops' Bible, especially of the second edition of 1572, the King James Version derived comparatively little from that except as it contained the cumulative result of previous work. The other translations mentioned in the rules, especially the Tyndale and Geneva versions, contributed much more, and among unnamed sources the contributions of the Reims New Testament, Luther's German Bible, and various Latin translations such as Pagninus, Münster, Tremellius-Junius, and Beza are very apparent. In general, however, the total result is still basically the inherited Tyndale-Coverdale text. The Geneva was of next greatest influence. In the Lord's Prayer the two are identical except for two minor words.²⁴ The revisers, of course, added their own improvements, centering particularly in the choice of words, enrichment of vocabulary, and the enhancement of the rhythmic quality of the text. While this contribution varied greatly from place to place, the result was a version generally superior to its predecessors in accuracy of translation and refinement of literary style.

But the revision had also its weaknesses, several of them a part of its inheritance. The underlying text was still far from satisfactory. There was no standard edition of the Hebrew Masoretic text of the Old Testament. In the New Testament the late and corrupt text of Erasmus as popularized and slightly modified by Stephanus and Beza was necessarily used, since nothing better was available. The variety introduced into the rendering of the same words was often unnecessary and misleading, especially when extended to proper names and to identical passages in the Synoptic Gospels and elsewhere, where literary relationships were thus obscured.²⁵ Conversely, certain real distinctions were not observed, a famous example being the inherited translation in John 10:16 of two different Greek words as "fold," where the second should have been "flock," apparently, as in the Vulgate, in the interests of one church. No systematic representation of measurements is used, several of differing quantity being rendered simply as "measure." Coinage is generally resolved into British equivalents, but again, indefinite terms such as "pieces of silver" (Luke 15:8) or "piece of money" (Matt. 17:27) are often used where the original is definite. "Lamp" and "lampstand"—to cite another example of modernization—had long been translated as "candle" and "candlestick." Failure to give proper recognition to certain Greek usages is attributable to the still unsatisfactory knowledge of the original languages. Other defects included obscurities, archaisms, solecisms in the English, failure to recognize and represent all Hebrew poetical forms, and, especially in the earlier editions, many printing errors. A famous misprint still remaining in the version is "at" for "out" in "strain at a gnat" (Matt. 23:24). Obscure or archaic expressions abound, e.g., "prevent" for "go before"; "to wit" for "to know"; "damnation" for "judgment"; "cleanness of teeth" for "famine" (a Hebraism); "carriage" for "baggage"; etc. Lists of dubious readings of all sorts may be found in Philip Schaff, A Companion to the Greek Testament and the English Version (New York: Harper & Bros., 1883), and elsewhere.

²⁴ A good treatment of the varied literary relationship will be found in Butterworth, op. cit. In the latter part of the Old Testament he found that "often as much as half the text is taken word for word from the Geneva Bible" (p. 165).

²⁵ Cf., e.g., Isa. 35:10 and 51:11; Matt. 26:41 and Mark 14:38; etc. The bewildering variety in proper names still remains, e.g., Elijah and Elias; Jeremiah, Jeremias, and Jeremy; Judas, Judah, and Jude; Luke and Lucas; etc.

But no one reads the King James Version in its original form. Many archaisms, misspellings and other errors were corrected in subsequent editions.²⁶ Criticism of the version, as anticipated, was severe, and led to several revisions. That of 1629 first omitted the Apocrypha. (The fortunes of the Apocrypha would require too much space to relate here. An ordinance of 1615 threatened a year's imprisonment to printers who omitted them. But after sporadic omission for two centuries, they were generally dropped as of supposedly inferior value and no part of the original—i.e., Hebrew—canon.) The most extensive revisions were made by Thomas Paris at Cambridge in 1762 and by Benjamin Blayney at Oxford in 1769. The latter became the standard form, and after this few changes were made. The original edition, in spite of the stricture on marginalia, had included about 9,000 cross references and some 8,000 other notations, mostly the literal Hebrew and Greek, but some explanatory, as the preface indicated and sought to justify. The revisions added to this number constantly, so that by the time of the Blayney edition the notes, increased especially by an indiscriminate multiplication of cross references, totaled about 65,000. Archbishop Ussher's chronology was added in Lloyd's 1701 edition. The various editions, of which about 50 were published by 1640, differed in size and format, and as early as 1612 both a folio and quarto were issued in Roman type.

²⁶ Later editions often added their own errors, however, and several have been nicknamed after some particular slip. A list of such "Queer and Interesting Bibles" may be seen in Laura H. Wild, The Romance of the English Bible (New York: Doubleday, Doran & Co., 1929), Appendix II. All of the changes from the 1611 edition are noted in The Cambridge Paragraph Bible (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1873).

With the gradual improvement of the version the clamor against it died down to a great extent. Officially it replaced the Bishops' Bible, and after fifty years or so the Geneva Bible, in popular use. Political strife served also to distract attention from biblical revision for some time. The result was that the King James Bible remained for two and a half centuries the Bible of English-speaking Protestantism and exerted a wide and lasting influence not only in religion but also in literature and every other area of contemporary culture.²⁷

The version also became widely recognized for its own intrinsic literary value, and many came to regard it as the greatest monument of English prose. A good part of its appeal is attributable to the literary genius exemplified in the original writings, and to the reproduction of much of the flavor of the vivid and concrete word-picture character of Semitic expression, with its striking imagery, metaphors, personifications, proverbs, parables, etc. These have often become a part of our speech, as in terminology like "lick the dust," "skin of his teeth," "salt of the earth." And long familiarity fails to dull the beauty of such natural imagery as is found in Ps. 23, or the human appeal of a parable like that of the prodigal son.²⁸

XIV. The Revised Version

But great progress was made after 1611, especially in the nineteenth century, both in the discovery and publication of better Hebrew and Greek texts and in fields such as archaeology, linguistics, comparative religion, etc., with the result that new light was thrown upon the understanding of the biblical text and its proper translation. Discovery or first real use of such early manuscripts as Vaticanus, Alexandrinus, Beza, and Sinaiticus had marked influence. The ²⁷ For its pervasive influence in literature see the discussion and bibliographies in Margaret B. Crook, ed., The Bible and Its Literary Associations (New York: Abingdon Press, 1937); A. S. Cook, Biblical Quotations in Old English Prose Writers (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1898); The Bible and English Prose Style (Boston: D. C. Heath & Co., 1892).

²⁸ Many good treatments of this aspect of the subject exist; e.g., Josiah H. Penniman, A Book About the English Bible (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1919); C. A. Dinsmore, The English Bible as Literature (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., 1931); W. O. Synerd, The Literature of the English Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1938).

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

s.eady accumulation of thousands of variant readings in the New Testament, many of which were obviously older and better, led eventually to the first total disregard of the "received" text by Karl Lachmann in 1831. Great advance was made by the work of Konstantin von Tischendorf, Samuel Tregelles, and others, and after nearly thirty years of labor, Westcott and Hort in 1881 published a text of the fourth century or earlier. The Old Testament text had been vocalized and standardized by the seventh or eighth century A.D. in what was not a truly critical form. A tenth-century copy of it by Ben Asher became the prevalent text and mainly underlies the English and other translation to this time as well as to the present. But variation in text was publicized in the earlier period through the polyglots, which gave the Latin, Greek, Syriac, Aramaic, and other versions, and through such editions as those of Benjamin Kennicott (Oxford, 1776-1780) and J. B. de Rossi (Parma, 1784-88).²⁹ Advance in the other areas mentioned frequently threw doubt upon the accuracy of the translation. The lapse of time had rendered many more words and expressions obsolete or generally unintelligible. Bishop Robert Lowth's lectures on Hebrew poetry in the middle eighteenth century first revealed the true literary character of much of the biblical text. The decipherment of hieroglyphic and cuneiform writing in the first half of the nineteenth century had made possible for the first time the reading of the ancient records of Medes, Persians, Babylonians, Assyrians, and Egyptians, with consequent illumination of Hebrew history and literature.

The effect of these influences appeared in renewed agitation for a revision of the King James Version and in numerous attempts on the part of private individuals and groups to anticipate such an undertaking by issuing new translations and revisions of their own. From about the middle of the eighteenth century these became increasingly numerous, and every sort of experiment was tried with style and format. One scholar estimates that nearly 100 such editions, mostly of the New Testament, were produced in the 259 years between 1611 and the beginning of work on the Revised Version, over half of them in the nineteenth century.³⁰ These ventures served to call attention to such defects in the current Bible as have been already briefly indicated, and some of them were of real merit as illustrative of the possibilities involved in a new revision. Among the most interesting and valuable are the following (New Testament and British, unless otherwise indicated): W. Mace (1729), William Whiston (1745), John Wesley (1755), Philip Doddridge (1765), Edward Harwood (1768), William Newcome (1796), Anthony Purver (1764), Gilbert Wakefield (1789-91), Nathaniel Scarlett (1798), Charles Thomson (a translation of the Greek Bible, Philadelphia, 1808), Noah Webster (New Haven, 1833), Granville Penn (1836-37), Asahel Kendrick (1842), Alford, Moberly, Humphrey, Ellicott and Barrow (Gospel of John and Pauline Epistles, 1857-61), Thomas J. Conant (New Testament and parts of the Old Testament, editions of the American Bible Union, 1860-71), G. R. Noyes (Boston, 1869), Henry Alford (1870), Julia Smith (Bible, Hartford, 1876). The Bible of Thomson, who was secretary of the Continental Congress, was the first complete English translation by an American.

²⁹ See p. 56.

³⁰ E. J. Goodspeed, The Making of the English New Testament (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1925), p. 78.

Scholars also published lists of the deficiencies in the Authorized Version and sought to estimate the probable nature and amount of revision that would be necessary. While defenders of the current version were not lacking, and efforts to find official support for revision failed in 1856, the tide of opinion could not be stayed much longer.

The first official step was taken on February 10, 1870, when at a meeting of the convocation of Canterbury, Bishop Samuel Wilberforce of Winchester proposed the appointment of a committee to report on the desirability of a revision of the New Testament. This, as amended to include the Old Testament, was approved, and the committee named soon brought in a favorable report in the form of five resolutions which suggested the general purpose and procedure of the work. It is clear that the revision was considered to be mainly textual (including the margin), that only necessary changes were to be adopted, and that the style of the King James Version was to be retained. Another committee was then authorized to proceed with more detailed plans for the project and its personnel. Nucleus sections for Old and New Testament were quickly formed, a list of rules of procedure for guidance was drawn up, and by June 22, 1870, the work on the New Testament had got under way with an initial meeting at Westminster Abbey.

The men who undertook the task of revision constituted an able and distinguished group,³¹

³¹ For a list of the members see H. Wheeler Robinson, The Bible in Its Ancient and English Versions (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1940), pp. 243-45. The twenty-four to twenty-eight members who were active in the ensuing ten years included for the Old Testament group T. K. Cheyne, A. B. Davidson, S. R. Driver, F. Field, C. D. Ginsburg, J. McGill, A. H. Sayce, R. Payne Smith, W. Wright; and for the New Testament, H. Alford, J.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE

and included representatives of various denominations other than the Anglican. Co-operation with American "divines" was also invited from the beginning, and an American group of about nineteen active members was formed under the leadership of Philip Schaff, arrangements being made for collaboration with the British.³² The rules of procedure adopted added certain specifications to the original resolutions. The text was to be gone over twice, decisions in doubtful places depending upon a majority in the preliminary revision and by a two-thirds vote in the second. Rejected readings of the King James Version were to be placed in the margin; the headings of chapters and pages, paragraphing, italics, and punctuation were to be revised; and reference was to be made when desirable "to Divines, Scholars and Literary Men, whether at home or abroad, for their opinions."

The work continued for ten and a half years on the New Testament and about fourteen on the Old. A much needed revision of the Apocrypha was also made. The expenses were borne by the university presses of Cambridge and Oxford, the publishers and copyright owners; but the revisers themselves received no remuneration.

The New Testament was published on May 17, 1881, and met with an enthusiastic initial reception. People stood in line for copies. A million copies had been ordered in advance, and some three million were sold in England and the United States within the first year. The book was first put on sale in the United States on May 20, and two days later two Chicago newspapers printed the complete text for their readers. The Old Testament appeared, with less demonstration, as a part of the whole Bible on May 19, 1885. The Apocrypha were published in 1895.

Purchasers found themselves in possession of a text in which the number of changes far exceeded all previous estimates. Of some 180,000 words in the New Testament, for example, alterations amounted to an estimated 30,000, or an average of four and a half per verse. While the revisers did attempt to retain the style and flavor of the King James Version, they did not hesitate to remove obscurities, archaisms, and inconsistencies in the text. Wide variation was due to the increased accuracy of Angus, J. Eadie, C. J. Ellicott (chairman), F. J. A. Hort, B. H. Kennedy, J. B. Lightfoot, W. Milligan, W. F. Moulton, R. Scott, R. C. Trench, B. F. Westcott.

³² The American committee included T. J. Conant, W. H. Green, C. M. Mead, Josiah Strong, Ezra Abbott, Timothy Dwight, J. Hadley, A. C. Kendrick, M. B. Riddle, J. H. Thayer, and T. D. Woolsey. M. B. Riddle published The Story of the Revised American Standard Version (Philadelphia: Sunday School Times Co., 1908).

the underlying text which they used, especially in the New Testament. Hort persuasively urged upon the committee the text upon which he and Westcott had labored so many years, and it exerted a great influence, though far from being consistently followed. Many of its rejected readings, however, were placed in the margin.

The English was given in two columns, improved by division into sense paragraphs and with verse numbers in the margin. Poetry was better represented; italics were reduced in number and systematized. Chapter summaries and headings were omitted entirely. At first the marginal cross references were also dropped, but popular demand led to their restoration in 1898 and in subsequent editions. The usual marginal notes appeared, the textual variants and alternative renderings occupying a much larger space. The enormous amount of new evidence which could be brought to bear upon the problems of translation made the marginalia of value to the student interested in accuracy and comprehension. The better text was often represented in the margin. A list of about three hundred readings preferred by the American Committee, but not adopted by the English revisers, was given in an appendix.

It was not long, however, before the number and character of the changes in the revision provoked a strong reaction. The work had already been under attack before publication, but now criticism became more specific as well as voluble. Members of the revision committee itself joined in denouncing the results, as the merits and demerits of the version were argued. Charges of unnecessary departure from the familiar phraseology, undue literalism, elaborate overcorrection, destruction of beauty and rhythm, impoverishment of the English language, and the like, flew thick and fast. Prime Minister Gladstone spoke against its authorization, and it was coolly received by its sponsor, the convocation of Canterbury. Champions of the enterprise were numerous, however, and not a few felt that the revision did not depart sufficiently from the traditional text either in the choice of readings or in the modernization of the English.

It is quite true that the revisers went beyond their expressed purposes. Charges of overliteralism and overconsistency could often be substantiated. The total effect was frequently to spoil a certain natural vigor and beauty without rewriting the translation in a really creative fashion. This resulted in an artificial product for the day in which it was made. Yet the vast number of improvements in accuracy, clarity, and consistency are undeniable, and much opposition to the revision must be attributed to traditional associations. Certain alterations in the text, such as the omission of the doxology at the end of the Lord's Prayer (Matt. 6:13), were very disconcerting to those unacquainted with the facts about textual study. Examples of greater accuracy and clarity are legion. Cf., e.g., II Cor. 8:1 KJV "We do you to wit."

RV "We make known to you."

Luke 3:23 KJV "And Jesus himself began to be about thirty years of age."

RV "And Jesus himself, when he began to teach, was about thirty years old."

Isa. 9:1 KJV ". . . and afterward did more grievously afflict her."

RV ". . . in the latter time hath he made it glorious."

In spite of opposition the Revised Version eventually became widely used, especially in church schools and for purposes of study, and particularly in the United States. It officially displaced the King James Version at Canterbury and Westminster. After a stipulated wait of fourteen years, an American edition was published on August 26, 1901, incorporating the readings of the American appendix in the text and making an equal number of other changes. In general, these show more progress away from traditional and archaic forms of expression, and they substitute American for British idiom where the two differ. The American committee also restored (revised) running headlines, included a new set of sensible marginal references, and further improved the use of italics and punctuation.³³

The Revised Version, however, failed to displace the King James Version to a degree comparable to that in which the latter had overcome rival versions. This was due to the defects which have been mentioned, to the disadvantage of copyright restrictions which made the revision more expensive to buy, and to the fact that it faced the formidable opposition of a version which had been hallowed by religious usage and literary associations for well over two centuries. To overcome the last circumstance alone only a phenomenal production could have sufficed. The Revised Version was not such: it went too far to be acceptable as a mere revision of the King James Version; it did not go far enough to be accepted on its own merits as a new and modern translation.

XV. The Modern Speech Versions

The recognition of the defects in the Revised Version and the continuing increase of knowledge in the areas pertaining to translation led to renewed efforts to provide more satisfactory, and in particular, more modern, results. Several new manuscript discoveries, such as the Sinaitic Syriac, together with progress in textual study served further to discredit the traditional Greek text. In Egypt especially, at the turn of the century and in subsequent years, great numbers of papyrus documents were unearthed, which reflected every aspect of the life of the people of the ancient world in which much of the Bible and particularly the New Testament was written. These discoveries were a special stimulus to translation activity, since the documents revealed that the New Testament was written in general in the ordinary, everyday Greek of the time and indicated the true or exact meaning of many of its words and idioms for the first time. The new knowledge was soon incorporated in grammatical and lexical works, and modern speech translations began to appear, which not only sought to exploit the new information on specific points, but tried also to exemplify in their English the fact that the New Testament books were originally written to be understood by ordinary folk and ought to be kept in the language of the people. This conviction was fortunately extended to cover the Old Testament too, where archaeological discoveries and study had also opened up new vistas for the understanding of the Hebrew text.

³³ The title page read identically with the English except for the date, "Revised A.D. 1881-1885," and the following lines: "Newly Edited by the American Revision Committee, A.D. 1901, Standard Edition. New York: Thomas Nelson & Sons." The text was copyrighted by the publishers.

Only a few of the outstanding versions produced in this modern period can be mentioned. Ferrar Fenton published a Bible (1883-1900) in the modern English of Great Britain which enjoyed considerable popularity. A pioneering effort was the Four Gospels of F. A. Spencer, published in 1898. The rest of the New Testament was translated in 1937. F. S. Ballentine first sought to employ American idiom in an 1898 Bible, which in the preface he described as "a plainer Bible for plain people in plain American." From the same viewpoint, and consistently good, was the Twentieth Century New Testament published anonymously by a group of scholars in a tentative form in 1898-1901 and in a definitive edition in 1904. British idiom is represented in a New Testament translation made by R. F. Weymouth, a competent Greek scholar, from his own Resultant Greek Testament, and issued posthumously in 1903. Couched in modern, dignified but often diffuse English, and furnished with an extensive apparatus of notes, it became especially popular in England, and a fourth edition revised by three English scholars was published in 1924. One of the most popular of the new versions has been that of James Moffatt, who translated the entire Bible into modern speech of free style. The New Testament (1913), based on von Soden's text, was of greater value and vogue than the Old. The latter was issued in 1924, and a complete Bible in 1926. William G. Ballantine issued a translation in 1923 (rev. ed., 1934) based on the Nestle text and known as the Riverside New Testament. It is closer to the traditional English than most modern versions but has a number of independent readings of merit. A two-volume edition of the New Testament ably and rather conservatively translated by Helen Barrett Montgomery was issued to commemorate the one-hundredth anniversary of the American Baptist Publication Society in 1923-24, and is known as the Centenary New Testament. Rivaling the Moffatt New Testament in value and popularity is the edition of Edgar J. Goodspeed. His is again a fairly free rendering and represents, as its subtitle indicates, An American Translation. The New Testament was published in 1923, a translation of the text of Westcott and Hort; and a revision of it by Goodspeed is in process. The Old Testament was likewise, but more conservatively, rendered into American idiom by a group of scholars under the leadership and editorship of J. M. P. Smith and published in 1927.³⁴ The complete Bible appeared in 1931, and a new translation of the Apocrypha prepared by Goodspeed was incorporated into an edition issued in 1939. Independent readings of merit often occur in other modern speech versions, such as Verkyl's New Testament (1945) and the Jehovah's Witnesses' edition of the New Testament (1950).

Besides using modern diction, these various editions generally sought to incorporate improvements in format and mechanics. The text is often logically paragraphed, chapter and verse numbers are returned to the margin, poetry is distinguished from prose, Old Testament quotations in the New Testament are differentiated, cross references are much reduced in quantity and relegated to the bottom of the page, direct speech is sometimes paragraphed. Marginal notes are usually few, if any. A free, idiomatic rendering is not concerned about literal meanings. Most modern speech versions could be improved, however, by a few marginal annotations on important textual variants and problem passages.

Translation and revision have continued for a variety of reasons. Some of it reflects the prolongation of efforts to improve the King James Version. Thus the American Bible Union work was carried forward until the whole Bible had been completed, a third revision of the 1864 New Testament being published in 1891 by Hovey, Broadus, and Weston, and a revised Bible being issued in 1912. Charles F. Kent produced a meritorious translation of parts of the New Testament for his Shorter New Testament, published in 1919; and in the same year the "Concordant Version" of all except the Gospels was issued, based upon a text reconstructed from the three manuscripts, Vaticanus, Sinaiticus, and Alexandrinus. The Gospels appeared in 1924. Several translations of individual manuscripts have also been published. We cannot deal with these or with the many extant translations of parts of the Bible. In 1933, George Lamsa and C. C. Torrey each issued versions of the four Gospels, supposedly reflecting new insights into the meaning of the text arising out of a fuller knowledge of its Semitic backgrounds and of Semitic documents hypothetically lying behind the Greek, especially of the Gospels, the first half of Acts and Revelation. Lamsa's translation was really nothing but a rendering of the late (Peshitta) Syriac, itself a translation from Greek; Torrey's was a more or less ingenious attempt to reconstruct and translate an underlying Semitic text. In 1941 a group of British scholars produced the New Testament in Basic English. In spite of obvious defects due to the limited vocabulary of less than a thousand words, the work was well done. But one is disturbed—thinking of the children whom the volume was in part supposed to serve—by passages such as "Happy are the sad." A similar translation of the Old Testament was produced subsequently and the two were published together in 1949 as The Basic Bible.

³⁴The other collaborators were Leroy Waterman, Theophile J. Meek, and Alexander R. Gordon.

XVI. Jewish and Roman Catholic Versions

Work has also continued in non-Protestant areas. Jewish efforts in Old Testament translation began in England with versions of the Pentateuch by Isaac Delgado and David Levi in 1785 and 1787 and complete editions more or less in the King James style by Benisch (1851-56) and Friedlander (1884). They continued in the United States with the 1853 editions of Isaac Leeser, widely used in both countries, and culminated in the version published by the Jewish Publication Society in 1917. The last was the work of a committee of scholars which began operations in 1892 and which took full account of the various English versions previously mentioned.³⁵

Among Roman Catholics the Reims-Douai version was soon subject to several revisions, the most important of which was that of the Douai scholar, Richard Challoner. His revision, which practically amounted to a new translation, was published in 1749-50 and showed extensive influence of the King James Version. It became the standard text, especially in the Old Testament. A revision of Challoner by McMahon (New Testament, 1781; Bible, 1791) was approved by Archbishop Troy of Dublin. Archbishop F. P. Kenrick of Philadelphia also edited a revised text (New Testament, 1851; Bible, 1862), and a committee of about twenty-seven scholars, under the patronage of the "Episcopal Committee of the Confraternity of Christian Doctrine," completed, after five years of work, a revision of the New Testament which was published in 1941. This, although retaining much of the traditional language and style, makes some concession to modern speech. A similar but more independent and effective result was attained in the 1944 New Testament of Ronald A. Knox, a British scholar. In his free style he also published in 1948 Vol. I (Genesis to Esther) of the Old Testament. Vol. II (Job to Maccabees) appeared in 1950. While these revisions take account of the Hebrew and Greek texts, their official basis remains the Latin Vulgate. Independent translations, however, have been made directly from the original languages, the most important of which is the Westminster Version edited by C. Lattey and J. Keating. This was published serially between 1913 and 1935, and a one-volume edition, reduced in format and slightly revised, was issued in 1948. The Confraternity Committee has also undertaken a complete retranslation from the original languages, following the pattern of its New Testament but giving up "deliberate compromise with earlier usage." Genesis (1948) and the Psalms and Canticles (1950) have already appeared.

³⁵A fuller account of Jewish efforts is given in Max L. Margolis, The Story of Bible Translations (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1917).

XVII. The Revised Standard Version

The effect of the new data bearing upon translation eventually found expression also in the institution of "official" projects both in the United States and England for a revision of the Revised Version. The defects of the latter had been highlighted by the modern speech publications, and with the lapse of time new progress was made in all disciplines bearing upon accuracy of translation. New manuscripts such as the Washington and Koridethi Gospels and the Chester Beatty papyri were discovered and published. Scholars began to show some diminution of confidence in Hort's textual theories and results, at least so far as they pretended to restore the most primitive text of the New Testament. Great progress was made in the study of the Septuagint text of the Old Testament. Significant linguistic study and archaeological discovery continued. In the United States, when the American Standard Version copyright expired, it was transferred by the publishers to the International Council of Religious Education, and through this representative Protestant organization, two committees of scholars, with Luther A. Weigle as chairman of both, were appointed to undertake revisions of the New and Old Testaments respectively.³⁸

The work was begun in 1930 and, except for a few lean years (1932-37), had continued to the time of publication. The New Testament was published in February, 1946, and the Old Testament will have only just appeared when this article is published (1952). Recognizing the deficiencies of the Revised Version, the new version aims not only to be a clear, idiomatic, and "readable" translation based on the best available text, but also to preserve the great values of the Tyndale-King James tradition for use in public and private worship. If the whole can be judged by the New Testament part (which alone is available at the moment of writing), the revisers have gone far toward the achievement of these purposes. The modern format and the dropping of the antique forms of the personal pronouns and verbal endings except in address to the deity and a few other places give the impression of a modern speech version, and this is borne out frequently by the phraseology; but in general, and especially in the familiar passages, the Revised Version is closely followed and modernized. An occasional reading is adopted from the King James Version. Opinion of critical readers has differed on a number of specific passages, both as regards text and translation, but not on the general acceptability of the work. Some feel that the revision did not go far enough in its adoption of modern idiom; others, replying, contend that great progress has been made in that direction without the sacrifice of so much of the traditional English as to alienate the majority of readers and to render the volume unacceptable for ecclesiastical usage. The fact that the committee of scholars which prepared the Revised Standard Version will continue, with necessary changes in membership, as a permanent committee of the National Council of the Churches of Christ in the U. S. A., into which the International Council of Religious Education has merged, makes provision for progressive revision to eliminate such deficiencies as may still remain in it.

In England, also, a movement for a revision designed for modern readers has been initiated. The matter was discussed in the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland; and the upper house of the convocation of Canterbury on May 20, 1947, authorized the appointment of an interdenominational committee to work with the Cambridge and Oxford presses upon such a project. The books of the Bible (including the Apocrypha) have been allotted to translators. The present secretary of the committee is J. K. S. Reid, and the work is under the general direction of C. H. Dodd. It is unfortunate that the British and American revisions are, apparently, entirely independent of each other.

³⁸ A statement of the purpose and circumstances of the work, of the committee members and denominational representatives, etc., will be found in a pamphlet written by the revisers: An Introduction to the Revised Standard Version of the New Testament (Chicago: International Council of Religious Education, 1946). A good summary of the progress in areas related to translation is here given.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE

XVIII. Story Without End

This brings us to the end of a story which has no end, for the task of revision will never be completed. We have mapped out some of the main tributaries and sources which have poured into the mainstream of our English Bible. We have had a glimpse of the devoted efforts which have given it to us both in the traditional text in which especially it has permeated our English-speaking culture, and in the subsequent forms which have sought to bring it to us in the most accurate and intelligible representations of its original thought. As certainly as the Bible remains the great classic of the Judeo-Christian faith and, indeed, the pre-eminent religious classic of all faiths, so surely will go on the work of making it known to all men, "each in his own tongue."

XIX. Tables of Illustrative Readings

KEY TO ABBREVIATIONS

Lin	Lindisfarne Gospels
Sh	Shoreham Psalter
Lu	Luther's New Testament (1522)
W1	First Wycliffite Bible (ca. 1382)
W2	Second Wycliffite Bible (ca. 1400; Purvey revision?)
T	Tyndale's New Testament (1525-26)

C	Coverdale Bible (1535)
Ma	Matthew Bible (1537)
Ta	Taverner Bible (1539)
Gr	Great Bible (1539)
Ge	Geneva Bible (1560)
Ge ²	Geneva Bible (1579)
B1	Bishops' Bible (1568)
B2	Bishops' Bible (1572)
R-D	Reims-Douay Bible (1609-10)
KJV	King James Version (1611)
ERV	English Revised Version (1881-85)
ASV	American Standard Version (1901)
RV	Revised Version (English and American)
RSV	Revised Standard Version (1946-52)
We	Weymouth New Testament (1903)
M	Moffatt New Testament (1913), Old Testament (1924)
G	Goodspeed New Testament (1923)
Am	American Translation, Old Testament (1931)

SOURCES OF THE READINGS

The readings in the following tables have been taken directly from actual copies of the Bibles listed, with the following exceptions: The Wycliffe and Shoreham Psalter passages are from the edition of Forshall and Madden; the Tyndale Lord's Prayer is from the photographic facsimile of the quarto fragment published by the Clarendon Press in 1926; the other Tyndale passages are from the "verbatim" edition of Samuel Bagster (London, 1836); the Lindisfarne selection is reproduced from J. I. Mombert, A Handbook of the English Versions of the Bible (2nd. ed.; New York: D. Appleton & Co., 1890), p. 7. The original form is reproduced, except that commas are substituted for virgules, and italicized words are not so indicated.

Thanks are accorded to the libraries of the University of Chicago and to the Newberry Library, Chicago, for the generous opportunity afforded of consulting the rare Bibles in their respective collections.

PSALM 23:1-3a

Sh	Our Lord gouerneth me, and nothyng shal defailen to me; in the stede of pasture, he sett me ther.
W1	The Lord gouereneth me, and no thing to me shal lacke; in the place of leswe where he me ful sette.
W2	The Lord gouerneth me, and no thing schal faile to me; in the place of pasture there he hath set me.
C	The Lorde is my shepherde, I can wante nothyng. He fedeth me in a grene pasture,
Ma	The Lord is my shepherde, I can want nothyng. He fedeth me in a grene pasture,
Ta	The Lord is my shepherde, I can wante nothyng. He fedeth me in a grene pasture,
Gr	The Lorde is my shepherde, therefore can I lack nothyng. He shall fede me in a grene pasture,
Ge	The Lord is my shepherd, I shal not want. He maketh me to rest in grene pasture,
B	God is my sheepearde, therefore I can lacke nothyng: He wyll cause me to repose my selfe in pasture full of grasse,

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

- R-D Our Lord ruleth me, and nothing shal be wanting to me: in place of pasture there he hath placed me.
KJV The Lord is my shepheard; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie downe in greene pastures:
ERV The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures.
ASV Jehovah is my shepherd; I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures;
RSV The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want; He makes me lie down in green pastures.
Am The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want; In green pastures he makes me lie down;

PSALM 23:1-3a

- Sh He norissed me vp water of fyllnge; he turned my soule fram the fende W1 Ouer watir of fulfilling he nurshide me; my soule he conuertide.
W2 He nurschide me on the watir of refreischyng; he conuertide my soule.
C and ledeth me to a fresh water. He quickeneth my soule,
Ma and ledeth me to a fresh water. He quickeneth my soule,
Ta and leadeth me to a fresh water. He quickeneth my soule,
Gr and leade me forth besyde the waters of comfote. He shall conuerte my soule.
Ge and leadeth me by the stil waters. He restoreth my soule.
B and he wyll leade me vnto calme waters. He wyll conuert my soule.
R-D Vpon the water of refection he hath brought me vp, he hath conuerted my soule.
KJV He leadeth mee beside the still waters. He restoreth my soule:
ERV He leadeth me beside the still waters. He restoreth my soul.
ASV He leadeth me beside still waters. He restoreth my soul.
RSV He leads me beside still waters; he restores my soul.
Am Beside refreshing waters he leads me. He gives me new life;

PROVERBS 15:17

- W1 Betere is to be clepid to wrtis with charitie, than to a fat calf with hate.
W2 It is betere to be clepid to wortis with charitie, than with hatrede to a calf maad fat.
C Better is a meace of potage with loue, then a fat oxe with euell will.
Ma Better is a messe of potage with loue, then a fat oxe with euell wyll.
Ta Better is a messe of potage with loue, then a fat oxe with euyl wyll.
Gr Better is a measse of potage with loue, than a fat oxe with euell will.
Ge Better is a dinner of grene herbes where loue is, than a stalled oxe and hatred therewith.
B Better is a dynner of hearbes with loue, then a fat oxe with euyll wyll.
R-D It is better to be called to herbes with charitie, then to a fatted calfe with hatred.
KJV Better is a dinner of herbes where loue is, then a stalled oxe and hatred therewith.
RV Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith.
RSV Better is a dinner of herbs where love is than a fatted ox and hatred with it.
Am Better a dish of herbs, where love is, Than a fatted ox, and hatred with it.
M Better a dish of vegetables, with love, than the best beef served with hatred.

THE LORD'S PRAYER: MATTHEW 6:9-13

- Lin Fader uren thu in Heofnas, Sie gehalgud Nama thin; To Cymeth ric thin; Sie fillo thin Lu Unser vater ynn dem hymel. Deyn name sey heylig. Deyn reych kome. Deyn wille geschehe W1 Oure fadir that art in heuenes, halwid be thi name; thi kyngdom cumme to, be thi wille don T O oure father, which art in heven halewed be thy name. Let thy kyngdom come. Thy wyll be fulfilled, KJV Our father which art in heauen, hallowed be thy name. Thy kingdome come, Thy will be done,

-
- Lin Suae is in Heofne and in Eortha. Hlaf userne oferwirtlic sel us to daeg; and forgev us scyltha urna, Lu auff erden wie ynn dem hymel. Unser teglich brott gib vnns heutt, und vergib vns vnsere schulde, W1 as in heuen so in erthe. Ziv to vs this day oure breed ouer other substaunce; and forgeue to vs oure dettis,

THE ENGLISH BIBLE

T as well in erth, as hit ys in heven. Geve vs this daye oure dayly breade. And forgeve vs oure treaspases, KJV in earth, as it is in heauen. Giue vs this day our daily bread. And forgiue vs our debts, Lin suae we forgefon scylgum urum. And ne inlead writh in Cosnunge. Al gefrigurich from evil.

Lu wie wyr vnsern schuldigen vergeben, vnnd fure vnns nitt ynn versuchung, sondern erlose vns von dem vbel, W1 as we forgeue to oure dettours; and leede vs nat in to temptacioun, but delyuere vs fro yuel.
T even as we forgeve them whych treaspas vs. Lede vs nott in to temptacion, but delyvre vs from yvell, KJV as we forgiue our debtors. And lead vs not into temptation, but deliuer vs from euil:

LUKE 2:14

W Glorie be in the higeste thingis to God: and in erthe pees be to men of good wille.
T Glory to God an hye, and peace on the erth: and vnto men reioysynge.
C Glory be vnto God an hye, and peace vpon earth, and vnto men a good wyll.
Ma Glory to God on hye, and peace on the erth, and vnto men reioysing.
Ta Glorye to God on hye, and peace in the erth, in men reioysynge.
Gr Glory to God on hye, and peace on the erth. and vnto men a good wyll.
Ge Glorie be to God in the high heauens, and peace in earth, and towards men good wil.
B1 Glorie to God on hye, and peace on the earth, and vnto men a good wyll.
B2 Glorie to God in the hyghest, and peace on the earth, and among menne a good wyl.
R-D Glorie in the highest to God: and on earth peace to men of good vwill.
KJV Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good wil towards men.
RV Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men in whom he is well pleased.
RSV Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men with whom he is pleased!
We Glory be to God in the highest heavens, And on earth peace among men who please him!
M Glory to God in high heaven, and peace on earth for men whom he favours!
G Glory to God in heaven and on earth! Peace to the men he favors!

ROMANS 3:25a

W1 Whom God purposide an helpere by feith in his blood,
W2 whom God ordeynede forgyver bi feith in his blood,
T whom God hath made a seate of mercy thorow faith in his blood,
C whom God hath set forth for a Mercy seate thorow faith in his bloude,
Ma whom God hathe made a seate of mercy thorow fayth in hys bloud,
Ta to whome God hathe made a seate of mercye, thorowe fayth in his bloude,
Gr whom God hath set forth to be the obtayner of mercy thorow fayth, by the meanes of hys bloude,
Ge whom God hathe set forthe to be a reconciliation through faith in his blood,
B whom God hath set fourth to be a propitiation, through fayth in his blood,
R-D Whom God hath proposed a propitiation, by faith in his bloud, KJV Whom God hath set forth to bee a propitiation, through faith in his blood,
ERV whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith, by his blood,
ASV whom God set forth to be a propitiation, through faith, in his blood, RSV whom God put forward as an expiation by his blood, to be received by faith.
We whom God put forward as a Mercy-Seat, rendered efficacious through faith in His blood,
M whom God put forward as the means of propitiation by his blood, to be received by faith.
G For God showed him publicly dying as a sacrifice of reconciliation to be taken advantage of through faith.

I CORINTHIANS 13:4-5a

W1 Charite is patient, it is benynge or of good will, . . . , it doth not gyle, it is not inblownyn with pride,
W2 Charite is patient, it is benynge; . . . , it doeth not wickidli, it is not blowun,
T Love suffreth longe, and is corteous. . . . Love doth nott frawdardly, swelleth not,

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

- G Loue is pacient and curteous, . . . , loue doth not frowardly, is not puft vp,
Ma Loue suffreth longe, and is corteous. . . . , Loue doth not frowardly, swelleth not,
Ta Loue suffreth longe, is curteous. . . . , Loue doth not frowardely, swelleth not,
Gr Loue suffreth longe, and is curteous. . . . , Loue doth not frowardly, swelleth not,
Ge Loue suffreth long, it is bountiful: . . . : loue doeth not boast itself; it is not puffed vp;
B1 Loue suffreth long, and is curteous. . . . , loue doth not frowardely, swelleth not,
B2 Charitie suffereth long, and is curteous: . . . , charitie doth not frowardly, swelleth not,
R-D Charitie is patient, is benigne: . . . , dealeth not peruersly: is not puffed vp, KJV Charitie suffereth long, and is kinde: . . . : charitie vaunteth not itselfe, is not puffed vp,
RV Love suffereth long, and is kind; . . . ; love vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up,
RSV Love is patient and kind; love is not . . . boastful; it is not arrogant or rude.
We Love is patient and kind; . . . Love is not forward and self-assertive, nor boastful and conceited.
M Love is very patient, very kind. . . . Love makes no parade, gives itself no airs, G Love is patient and kind. Love is not . . . boastful. It does not put on airs.

HEBREWS 11:1a

- W1 Forsothe faith is the substaunce of thingis that ben to be hopid, W2 But faith is the substaunce of thingis that ben to be hopid, T Faith is a sure confidence off thynges which are hoped for,
C Faith is a sure confidence of thinges which are hoped for,
Ma Fayth is a sure confydence of thinges which are hoped for,
Ta Faith is a sure confydence of thynges whiche are hoped for,
Gr Fayth is a sure confydence of thynges, whych are hoped for,
Ge Fayth is that, which causeth those things to appeare in deed which are hoped for,
Ge2 Now faith is the grounde of things, which are hoped for,
B Fayth is the grounde of thynges hoped for,
R-D And faith is, the substance of things to be hoped for,
KJV Now faith is the substance of things hoped for,
ERV Now faith is the assurance of things hoped for,
ASV Now faith is assurance of things hoped for,
RSV Now faith is the assurance of things hoped for,
We Now faith is a well-grounded assurance of that for which we hope,
M Now faith means we are confident of what we hope for,
G Faith means the assurance of what we hope for,

HEBREWS 11:1b

- W1 and an argument or certaynte of thingis not apperinge.
W2 and an argument of thingis not apperynge.
T and a certayntie of thynges which are not sene.
C and a certaynte of thinges which are not sene.
Ma and a certayntie of thynges whych are not sene.
Ta and a certaynte of thinges whiche are not sene.
Gr and a certayntie of thynges whych are not sene.
Ge and sheweth evidently the thinges which are not sene.
Ge2 and the evidence of things which are not sene.
B the evidence of thynges not seene.
R-D the argument of things not appearing.
KJV the evidence of things not seen.
ERV the proving of things not seen.
ASV a conviction of things not seen.
RSV the conviction of things not seen.
We and a conviction of the reality of things which we do not see.
M convinced of what we do not see.
G it is our conviction about things that we cannot see.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE

XX. Selected Bibliography

- BUTTERWORTH, CHARLES C. The Literary Lineage of the King James Bible. Philadelphia: University of Philadelphia Press, 1941.
- DAICHES, DAVID. The King James Version of the English Bible. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1941.
- DARLOW, T. H., and MOULE, H. F. Historical Catalogue of the Printed Editions of Holy Scripture in the Library of the British and Foreign Bible Society. London: The Bible House, 1903-11.
- EADIE, JOHN. The English Bible. London: Macmillan & Co., 1876.
- GOODSPEED, E. J. The Making of the English New Testament. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1925.
- GUPPY, HENRY. A Brief Sketch of the History of the Transmission of the Bible. Manchester: Manchester University Press, 1936.
- KENYON, FREDERIC GEORGE. Our Bible and the Ancient Manuscripts. New York: Harper & Bros., 1940.
- PENNIMAN, JOSIAH H. A Book About the English Bible. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1919.
- POLLARD, ALFRED W. Records of the English Bible. Oxford: Henry Frowde, 1911.
- PRICE, IRA MAURICE. The Ancestry of Our English Bible. Ed. W. A. Irwin and Allen Wikgren. New York: Harper & Bros., 1949.
- ROBINSON, H. WHEELER, ed. The Bible in Its Ancient and English Versions. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1940.
- SCHAFF, PHILIP. A Companion to the Greek Testament and the English Version. New York: Harper & Bros., 1883.
- SIMMS, P. MARION. The Bible in America. New York: Wilson-Erickson, 1936.
- WEIGLE, LUTHER A. The English New Testament from Tyndale to the Revised Standard Version. New York and Nashville: Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1949.
- WESTCOTT, B. F. A General View of the History of the English Bible. 3rd ed., rev. W. A. Wright. London: Macmillan & Co., 1905.
- WILD, LAURA H. The Romance of the English Bible. Garden City: Doubleday, Doran & Co., 1929.
- An Introduction to the Revised Standard Version of the New Testament*. Chicago: International Council of Religious Education, 1946.

HISTORY OF THE INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE

I. ANCIENT PERIOD

by ROBERT M. GRANT

- I. Sources
- II. Beginnings
- III. The Second Century and the Problem of Authority

- IV. Alexandria and Antioch
- V. Jerome and Augustine
- VI. Handbooks

During the early centuries of the life of the Christian church, its Bible was the Greek version of the Old Testament known as the Septuagint. According to legend, it had been translated entire by seventy-two Hebrew scholars whose results were completely in agreement. The translation, like the original Hebrew text, was regarded as verbally inspired by God. Only in the course of the second century did the Greek New Testament come to possess a status equivalent to that of the Septuagint. The Greek Old Testament remained basic. But the religious ideas of the Old Testament, even in Greek dress, were not entirely in harmony with those of the New Testament or of early Christian theology. The experience of the children of Israel in the distant past, in nomadic or agricultural cultures, was different from the experience of Christians in the crowded half-Hellenized cities of the Roman Empire. The Christian, striving to express the meaning of his faith, might have abandoned the Old Testament, admitting that "time makes ancient good uncouth"¹ had he not possessed a boundless veneration for the mysterious wisdom of the past, as well as methods of reinterpreting that wisdom and of making it comprehensible for his own times.

I. Sources

Some of these methods of interpretation were traditional in the Judaism out of which Christianity arose; others were gifts of the Hellenistic schools; and others were standards of interpretation ultimately developed within the church itself. Let us first consider Jewish methods of exegesis. Within the Old Testament we can trace the reinterpretation of the cardinal events of religious history. Along with a progressive revelation went a progressive interpretation,² especially in the writings of the prophets. Still later the prophets themselves were reinterpreted in the works of the apocalyptic writers of Judaism. Not the Old Testament as we view it in the light of historical research, but the Old Testament explained by apocalyptic interpretation, was the Bible of the earliest church.³ The earliest Christians did not understand the Bible from its text alone, but from the mass of legends and legal decisions which had gathered about it in the previous two or three centuries. The stories are usually called "haggada"; under this heading may be classified all the nonlegal interpretations of scripture.⁴ Beside them stood the "halakah," interpretations by which the Scriptures could be made to govern every detail of Jewish civil and religious life.⁵ Both types of exegesis are found in early Christianity. Both are based on the literal meaning of a text, usually taken out of context, but never con-

² J. A. Bewer, "Progressive Interpretation," Anglican Theological Review, XXIV (1942), 89-100.

³ Ethelbert Stauffer, Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1947), pp. 1 ff.

⁴ See Louis Ginzberg, The Legends of the Jews (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1908-38).

⁵ See Herbert Danby, The Mishnah (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1933); also Vol. VII, pp. 109-12.

¹ See Robert M. Grant, "The Place of the Old Testament in Early Christianity," Interpretation, V (1951), 186-202.

ANCIENT PERIOD

tradicted. For in Jewish eyes the whole Bible was verbally inspired by God. There could be no question of contradiction or error.

Not all Jews, however, were completely true to their inherited tenets. Those who lived outside Palestine had a tendency to make the Bible say what their more enlightened neighbors said. They admired the "assured results" of Greek philosophy and wanted to enjoy a synthesis between philosophy and religion. The most prominent "modernist" of ancient Judaism was Philo of Alexandria. While he once called Jerusalem his native city,⁶ his intellectual life was largely centered in Hellenistic Alexandria. It was there that forerunners whom he occasionally mentions had learned to interpret the Old Testament allegorically.

The allegorical method is as old as the rise of Greek philosophy, and probably owes its existence to it. With the development of the Ionian philosophy of nature, it became impossible for an intelligent man to continue to take myths literally. It was especially difficult to accept Homer and Hesiod, in whose writings the immoralities of the gods were described.⁷ And from the sixth century B.C. until the end of antiquity—and in the Renaissance—there were many writers who attempted to get rid of the difficulties by claiming that the poets were really writing about something else. This "something else" was usually thought to be the nature of the physical universe (Iliad, Theogony) or of ethics (Odyssey, Works and Days). Plato or Epicurean literalists might criticize mythology; it could be claimed that this criticism was due to misunderstanding. Among Stoic writers, who combined a fairly complete rationalism with a cautious enthusiasm for the status quo, the allegorical method was especially popular. In the first century of our era one of them set forth his underlying principles as follows:

You, O son, can refer the mythical traditions concerning the gods to the elements which are typified, in the belief that the ancients were not ordinary men, but that they too were able to understand the nature of the world and were disposed to philosophize about it through symbols and dark sayings.⁸

So also a Jew, reading his Greek Old Testament and finding it full of anthropomorphic expressions, might come to believe that God had spoken to men through symbols and dark sayings. And he would observe the fact that the heroes of the Old Testament, like those of Homer, lived on a different plane from men of his own time. Their lives seemed simpler. They must have been types or examples. And an etymological analysis of their names might prove to the analyst (if to no one else) that they were really personified virtues. Philo makes such a study, and it is so unconvincing that recent critics have doubted his knowledge of the Hebrew language.⁹

The allegorical method has very little rational justification, but it was highly popular in antiquity. It made possible the retention of Homer as a schoolbook in spite of the criticism of the intelligentsia. Within Christianity and Judaism it was the first line of defense for the Old Testament. Even as early as the first century the method is used at least twice. The first and more famous instance is found in Gal. 4:21-24: "Tell me, you who desire to be under law, do you not hear the law? For it is written that Abraham had two sons, one by a slave and one by a free woman. But the son of the slave was born according to the flesh, the son of the free woman through promise. Now this is an allegory: these women are two covenants." Here Paul, interpreting the history of the Old Testament as full of types or examples for us—"whatever was written in former days was written for our instruction" (Rom. 15:4)—goes so far as to use the Greek word for "allegory." These things, he says, were meant allegorically by the writers of scripture. Modern readers may doubt the accuracy of Paul's exegesis; but in its day it made the Old Testament meaningful for many Greek-speaking Jews and Christians.

The other example is in the Revelation of John. As a whole, this apocalypse is written in a style and form intentionally enigmatic. In a description of the fall of the great city Jerusalem, the author explains that allegorically it is called Sodom and Egypt, for the Lord was crucified there (Rev. 11:8). He knows that in his Old Testament Jerusalem is sometimes called Sodom because of its wickedness (e.g., Isa. 1:9); he himself contributes the identification with Egypt.

II. Beginnings

In the New Testament allegorical exegesis is not ordinarily used. Most of the New Testament writers stand close to Judaism and interpret the Old Testament literally. Nevertheless there is a certain air of freedom about their exegesis which is not found among the rabbis. Where does this freedom come from? It comes from Jesus himself. Jesus was the creator of Christian biblical interpretation. His exegesis has within it a double attitude to his Bible,

⁶ Legation to Gaius 278

⁷ Fritz Wehrli, Zur Geschichte der allegorischen Deutung Homers im Altertum (Basel: 1928), p. 88.

⁸ Cornutus, Theologiae graecae compendium 31.

⁹ Edmund Stein, Die allegorische Exegese des Philo aus Alexandria (Giessen: Alfred Topelmann, 1929), pp. 20 ff.

though later interpreters develop only single aspects of his thought.

This double relationship to the Old Testament has troubled commentators on the Gospels since ancient times. On the one hand, Jesus takes the Old Testament as it stands and insists on its permanent authority. On the other, he ventures to criticize it, to reinterpret it, to attack not only traditional interpretations but even scripture itself. Is not such an attitude paradoxical? By critical methods can we get rid of one or the other aspect of Jesus' interpretation? Unfortunately, only an arbitrary criticism can water down the difficulty which we face.

Well-attested sayings of the Lord prove that his relationship to the Jewish scriptures was bipolar. Brought up in a conservative Jewish family, he respected the authority of the law. To a man who wanted to "inherit eternal life" Jesus quoted the second table of the Decalogue (Mark 10:19).¹⁰ He could attack the tradition of the Pharisees by claiming that they abandoned the "commandment of God" (Mark 7:8-9). While there were those who argued that he was destroying the law, he could be remembered as saying that he intended only to reinterpret it. His aim was revitalization, not destruction. David was not the only writer of scripture to speak "in the Holy Spirit" (Mark 12:36); Moses and the other prophets must have spoken or written in the Spirit as well. The testimony of the Spirit could not be rejected.

At the same time, Jesus freely criticized the Old Testament. His reinterpretation of the sabbath (Mark 2:27; 3:4) is at least implicitly contradictory to the fourth commandment (Exod. 20:8-11). And in his rejection of the possibility of divorce he stands opposed to Deut. 24:1 (Moses' bill of divorcement), claiming that it is based on the "hardheartedness" of the people. He relegates the verse to a secondary place compared with Gen. 2:24 ("they shall be one flesh"). He contrasts the word of Moses with the word of God. For the normal Jewish interpreter such a contrast was inconceivable. Again, in the Sermon on the Mount we find a whole series of such contrasts: "You have heard that it was said to the ancients . . . but I say. . ." Jesus speaks with the authority of a prophet, and of one greater than a prophet.

Above all, in the Last Supper Jesus interprets the Old Testament idea of a covenant, and of a new spiritual covenant, in relation to himself and his disciples. It is this interpretation which provides a seed for the growth of the later Christocentric exegesis of the Old Testament. Paul, for example, not only repeats the words of the Lord at the Last Supper (I Cor. 11:24-25), but goes on to take the whole experience of Israel at the Exodus as typical of the later experience of Jesus and his church (I Cor. 10:1 ff.). At a later date the evangelist John interprets the Eucharist in terms of the "bread of heaven," the manna which the Israelites ate in the desert.

One book of the New Testament is almost entirely devoted to interpretation of the meaning of Jesus in terms of the Old Testament. This book is the Epistle to the Hebrews. It finds its starting point in the resemblances between Jesus and the mysterious Melchizedek of Gen. 14:18-20. Unlike the other actors on the stage of the patriarchal histories, Melchizedek suddenly appears and as suddenly disappears. He comes only to bless Abraham. And in his career, "without beginning of life or end of days," the author of Hebrews could find pretypified the work of Jesus. Again, he can compare this work with the sacrificial cultus of the Levitical priesthood, and see how closely related both sacrifices are—and how much more efficacious that of Jesus is.¹¹

In the New Testament as a whole, the Old Testament is treated as a book of hope. Christians, following the example of Jesus and building upon it, gradually came to reject the Jewish law as law. But since it was the inspired word of God, it must (they believed) contain a deeper meaning. This meaning they found in types of Christ and of his church. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, so must the Son of Man be lifted up" (John 3:14). And the author of I Peter expresses the normal Christian belief that the prophets could not be understood without the spirit of Christ (I Pet. 1:10-11; cf. II Cor. 3:12-18).

III. The Second Century and the Problem of Authority

As the Christian church expanded into the world of Hellenistic culture, there were many within it who hoped that its Jewish chrysalis could be discarded. Most of the heretical minority groups of the second century were militantly anti-Jewish. Marcion, for example, was convinced that he could distinguish between the essence of Christianity and the additions which the Jewish disciples of Jesus had made. He accepted only one gospel, that of Luke, and with the scissors of criticism removed what he considered the interpolations of Judaizers. Such a man naturally attacked the Old Testament with vigor. It was irrational and immoral. When defenders of the book tried to interpret it allegorically, their attempts were greeted with derisation. But in the second century allegorization was inevitable if Christianity was to be preserved and not transformed. And in upholding allegorization it became necessary to insist on the right of the church to interpret the true meaning of scripture. Only those who had received the apostolic teaching through the apostolic succession could be trusted as interpreters. There is a considerable measure of truth in this contention. Without sympathy, there could be no possibility of understanding. Those who did not share the life of the main stream of Christianity could not understand the books which came from an earlier level of the same river.

¹⁰ See Robert M. Grant, "The Decalogue in Early Christianity," Harvard Theological Review, XL (1947), 1-17.

¹¹ R. K. Yerkes, "Atonement," Anglican Theological Review, XXIX (1947), 28-33.

Late in the second century Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons, set forth this principle in his work against heresies. It was a principle not so much invented as developed and defended in the heat of controversy.

When they are refuted from the scriptures, they shift their ground and censure the scriptures, declaring that they are wrong or are not authoritative, or that there are various readings, and that the truth cannot be discovered from these by those who do not know the tradition.¹²

By "tradition" the Gnostics meant their own secret oral tradition, unknown to the church as a whole. Irenaeus replies that the church is the guardian of scripture, that the orthodox tradition is known to all, and that it alone is true. The same point of view was espoused at Carthage by Tertullian and expressed in the language of Roman law. When questions of interpretation arise, the church can enter a "prescription," a petition based on the fact that the Scriptures are the legal property of the church. The prescription is intended to make the position of heretics so precarious that their case will never come to court. Why argue with them when it is not always certain that we are to be victorious?

They put forward the scriptures and by their audacity make an immediate impression on some people. . . . If their strength consists in the fact that they are able to possess them, we must see to whom the scriptures belong, so that no one is admitted to them who is not legally competent.¹³

By this argument Tertullian seeks to transfer the battle to a ground where the church can feel more confident of success.

A Christian might well admit that heretics did not have the right to interpret the Bible. But how were those within the church to interpret it? What standard were they to use? Irenaeus and Tertullian agree in answering that the only correct exegesis is to be made according to the "rule of faith"—essentially the common Christian creed. And in the subsequent history of interpretation the rule of faith plays a prominent part. Indeed, theology and exegesis were never divorced in antiquity. The best example of their union is found in the Commonitorium of Vincent of Lérins (fifth century), where the rule is laid down that interpretation must be made according to the Catholic faith. What is the Catholic faith? It is what has been held "everywhere, always, and by everyone."¹⁴ Obviously this definition represents an ideal rather than an actuality; and in practice it eventually proved unworkable. But it represents an ancient attempt to base interpretation by authority on the rational ground of universal consent.

Such an appeal to external authority, even though Bible and church were not regarded as independent entities, was not altogether satisfactory. It did not give any guidance in internal disputes. In the quarrels between the exegetical schools of Alexandria and Antioch it could not be employed. Many passages in scripture received little illumination from the rule of faith, and therefore some other standard was necessary. The lack of such a standard, among other things, accounts for the inconclusiveness of the disputes between Alexandria and Antioch.

IV. Alexandria and Antioch

The conflict between Alexandria and Antioch was not entirely a matter of exegetical theory. The two cities were respectively second and third in the Roman Empire;¹⁵ and one may suspect the existence of a rivalry like that between New York and Chicago. Again, the theological viewpoints of the two churches were quite different. Their emphases were divergent especially in matters of Christology.¹⁶ Alexandria may be called Platonist, while Antioch was Aristotelian. To say this is to oversimplify the situation, but the statement is essentially true.

In the biblical interpretation the two schools were divided over the problem of the allegorization of scripture. To the Alexandrians it seemed that God had intentionally placed stumbling blocks in the Bible in order to awaken men's minds. There were hidden truths behind the literal meanings. Following the Jewish exegete Philo, Clement of Alexandria finds hidden meanings throughout the Old Testament.

The gnostic [or, as Clement uses the term, true Christian] does not merely lend his ear to the words of scripture; he opens his very soul to what is hid-

¹⁴ Commonitorium II. 3.

¹⁵ K. O. Müller, Antiquitates Antiochenae (Göttingen: 1839), p. 2.

¹⁶ See R. V. Sellers, Two Ancient Christologies (London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1940).

¹² Against Heresies III. 2. 1.

¹³ Prescription Against Heretics 15.

den under the words: realities to know and actions to do.¹⁷

But Clement was no systematizer. Indeed, his longest extant work is called Scrapbooks or Miscellanies. Any genuine theoretical analysis of allegorization had to be supplied by his successors at Alexandria. And it is in the On First Principles of Origen that we find this analysis set forth:

Wherever in the narrative [of scripture] the accomplishment of some particular deeds did not correspond with the sequence of the intellectual truths, the scripture wove into the story something which did not happen, occasionally something which could not happen, and occasionally something which might have happened but in fact did not.¹⁸

Therefore the difficulties of scripture themselves suggest the existence of a deeper meaning. Origen gives examples of such difficulties from the Old Testament. There are days described in Genesis before the creation of sun and moon; obviously this is impossible; equally obviously there must be a hidden meaning. Surprisingly, he finds these difficulties also in the New Testament: "Even the gospels are full of passages of this kind, as when the devil takes Jesus up into a high mountain. . . ." ¹⁹ The devil shows Jesus all the kingdoms of the earth (Matt. 4:8); obviously again, there is no mountain from which all the kingdoms can be seen; therefore the story does not mean what it says. Furthermore, the Gospels disagree among themselves in regard to the order of events in Jesus' life. In theory, scripture is entirely self-consistent and accurate. The history it seems to portray is not consistent or accurate. Therefore there must be an allegorical meaning. In fact, because in the Septuagint Prov. 22:20-21 reads, "Do thou thrice record them . . . that thou mayest answer with words of truth," there is a threefold meaning in scripture. This meaning is literal, moral, and spiritual (allegorical).

Some of the difficulties which Origen finds in the Gospels are rather naïve. He claims that several of the Lord's commandments are impossible to obey, and gives as examples the admonitions to salute no one on the road (Luke 10:4), to turn the other cheek (Matt. 5:39), and to pluck out the right eye (Matt. 5:29). How can you tell which eye offended? ²⁰ At the same time, he is not always true to his own principles. He insists on the historicity of the story of the witch of Endor (I Sam. 28), and

¹⁷ Miscellanies VII. 11. 60. 3-4; Claude Mondésert, Clément d'Alexandrie (Paris: Aubier, 1944), p. 110.

¹⁸ IV. 2. 9.

¹⁹ Ibid., IV. 3. 1.

²⁰ Ibid., IV. 3. 3.

relies on the Septuagint, which called her a ventriloquist. The story in scripture cannot be false. Samuel really appeared.²¹ The reason for his opponent's caution is that unless he can attack the veracity of the witch on historical grounds, it will seem that she, a demon, has authority over the soul even of a prophet. But if Origen is not willing to allegorize this difficult story, on what grounds can he allegorize other stories which are no more difficult? Eustathius of Antioch was not slow to point out this inconsistency.²²

The real purpose of Alexandrian allegorization was avoidance of the anthropomorphisms of the Old Testament, which simple-minded Christians took literally. Here the aim of the school was twofold. The Alexandrians were eager to defend Christianity from the criticisms of its cultured despisers. For centuries, philosophers of every school had been pointing out the nonanthropomorphic character of God. Surely Christianity, the true philosophy, was in harmony with their teaching. But by presenting Christian theology in apologetic form, the Alexandrians actually altered its teaching. Biblical allegorization was one of the principal methods of this theological movement.

The theological bias of Alexandrian theology was clear to ordinary Egyptian Christians, one of whom wrote a work called Refutation of the Allegorists.²³ At the same time, Tertullian and others like him fought for the corporeality of God in an effort to avoid the excessive spiritualization characteristic of Alexandria. But the most important adversaries of Origen and his school were the exegetes of Antioch.

The school of Antioch was noted for its literal and grammatical interpretation of the Bible. The earliest representative of it whom we know is Theophilus, bishop of Antioch about 180, whose second and third books dedicated to a certain Autolycus are full of literal exegesis of the Old Testament. Later Antiochians were expert in the study of Hebrew or of the Greek text of the Old Testament. Their exegesis, under the influence of the prominent Jewish community of the city, was ordinarily soberly literal. The great period of the school came late in the fourth century, when Diodorus of Tarsus taught his pupils, Theodore of Mopsuestia and John Chrysostom of Antioch, later metropolitan of Constantinople.

Theodore was less orthodox and more original than his master or his fellow disciple. And it must be admitted that where he is original ²¹ Albert Jahn, Des h. Eustathius . . . Beurtheilung des Origenes betreffend die Auffassung der Wahrsagerin (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1886), p. 5.

²² Ibid., pp. 21 ff.

²³ Nepos, in Eusebius Church History VII. 24. 2.

ANCIENT PERIOD

he is usually wrong; where he is right he simply reproduces the general outlook of the Antiochian school. As a whole, the school rejected allegorization. In commenting on Gal. 4:24, Theodore takes the opportunity to attack Origen for his misuse of scripture. He contrasts Origen's denial of the reality of the events described in Genesis with the apostle's use of events as examples. On Origen's view, he claims, the reality of the fall of man is denied, and so is the reality of redemption. Paul, on the other hand, interpreted all these events as historical. Theodore also wrote five books "On Allegory and History Against Origen." These are lost, as is the work of Diodorus called "What Is the Difference Between Theory and Allegory?" (By "theory" the school of Antioch meant the genuine meaning of the text.)

To the Alexandrians the literal meaning of a text did not include its metaphorical meaning. The literal meaning of "the arm of God" is that God really has an arm. Such an interpretation is an example of what Whitehead has called "misplaced concretion." The Alexandrians used this concretion as a means for introducing their own theological views. At Antioch, on the other hand, the meaning of a passage, its "theory," included both metaphor and simple statement. Obviously their analysis is the more natural of the two. The literal meaning of scripture cannot exclude metaphor. It is to Theodore's credit that he insisted on this position. In his view every passage of the Bible is provided with a literal meaning, whether proper or metaphorical. To deny this would be to suppose that the Holy Spirit would sometimes have spoken in order to say nothing. . . . Consequently, according to Theodore, all the biblical narratives, all the laws, even the ceremonial laws, must be interpreted in their simple literal meaning.²⁴

With a similar emphasis on literalism, Theodore declared that most of the prophecies of the Old Testament had a reference to future events within Jewish history, and not to Christ. Only Pss. 2; 8; 45; 110 are psalms which predicted Christ.

Theodore's actual results in exegesis are not so different from those of the Origenists as one might expect. One reason for this similarity is to be found in the fact that typology, which he frequently employs, is not entirely unlike allegorization. Again, he constantly stresses the metaphorical meaning of passages of scripture, while continuing to regard this meaning as literal. At the same time, his use of genuine allegorization is extremely limited.

²⁴ Louis Pirot, L'oeuvre exégétique de Théodore de Mopsueste (Rome: Pontifici Institutii Biblici, 1913), p. 180.

Chrysostom, on the other hand, as a popular preacher, feels more free to interpret the Bible allegorically. He too avoids the excesses of Alexandria.

We are not irresponsible exponents of the laws on this matter, but may only apply the system of allegorical interpretation when we are following the mind of Scripture. . . . And this is the universal law of Scripture when it speaks in allegories, viz., to supply the interpretation of the allegory.²⁵

But Chrysostom does not propose to employ a simple literalism:

We must not examine the words as bare words, else many absurdities will follow, but we must mark the mind of the writer.²⁶

Thus he endeavors to steer a middle course between the fancies of allegorists and the absurdities of simple literalists. He lays emphasis on the metaphorical language of scripture.

In this connection it may be appropriate to refute a dictum of Cardinal Newman. In discussing his theory of development in Christian thought, Newman said, "It may be almost laid down as an historical fact that the mystical interpretation and orthodoxy will stand or fall together." But the Alexandrians were led astray by their exegetical method quite as often as the Antiochians. The second-century Gnostics were ardent allegorizers. The fathers of Antioch, on the other hand, had a sounder understanding of the Bible than most of their rivals.

V. Jerome and Augustine

The greatest exegete of the ancient church, Jerome, derived much of his method from Antiochian sources.²⁷ Jerome's most important accomplishment, the translation of the Old Testament from Hebrew into Latin, testifies to the interest in the original text which he shared with the school of Antioch. Like the Antiochians, he was vigorously attacked. Augustine, for example, regarded the Septuagint as inspired and authoritative, and viewed Jerome's work as mistaken. Eventually the new version won its way, however, and for centuries it was the only translation authorized by the Roman church. Most new versions are opposed by backward-looking Christians, but few are greeted with the abuse which the Vulgate at first encountered. Jerome was called a forger and a betrayer of his religion.

Jerome's development as an interpreter of scripture is of considerable interest, for originally he was a convinced Origenist. His first exegetical work, a commentary on Obadiah, was thoroughly allegorical. Later, however, when he studied Hebrew and lived in Palestine, he came under the influence of Jewish teachers and of the school of Antioch, and he turned to a more sober and literal exegetical method. This change was also due in large measure to the concentration on the text of scripture which his work of translation required. In his later writings he constantly insisted on the "Hebrew truth" of the Old Testament, although with the Antiochians he held that there were spiritual and typological meanings which his Jewish opponents failed to understand. He believed that a bare literalism was barren. At the same time, he refused to interpret the Bible against the letter. "There are many things in scripture which sound incredible and yet are true."²⁸

²⁵ F. H. Chase, Chrysostom (Cambridge: Deighton, Bell, & Co., 1887), p. 61.

²⁶ Ibid., p. 157.

²⁷ A. Vaccari, "I Fattori Della Egesesi Geronimiana," Biblica, I (1920), 457-80.

When historical questions came to his attention, he was not remarkably at ease in handling them. The most striking instance of this difficulty is to be found in his correspondence with Augustine over the dispute between Peter and Paul at Antioch.²⁹ Following Origen, Jerome held that Peter and Paul had simply staged a dispute in order to give dramatic proof to Gentile Christians that the law had been abolished. If Paul ever observed the law, it was merely for convention's sake. A lengthy controversy arose when Augustine declared that such a staged dispute would have been dishonest. Historical criticism was rare in the ancient church,³⁰ and neither of the fathers should be blamed too severely for lack of interest in something they considered irrelevant.

There is a considerable difference between Jerome and his contemporary, Augustine, as far as attitude to the interpretation of scripture is concerned. Jerome is a scholar, and while his outlook lacks the range of Augustine, he is ordinarily more accurate in matters of detail. Augustine, on the other hand, is a theologian, and in his comments on the meaning of the Bible there is greater depth and religious insight than in those of Jerome. On questions such as the correctness of the new translation of the Old Testament, Jerome's judgment is superior. In general, Augustine goes to the heart of scripture. He takes account of critical problems but does not consider them all-important.³¹

²⁸ Letters LXXII.

²⁹ J. Schmid, SS Eusebii Hieronymi et Aurelii Augustini Epistulae Mutuae (Bonn: P. Haustein, 1930), pp. 14 ff.

³⁰ See Robert M. Grant, "Historical Criticism in the Ancient Church," Journal of Religion, XXV (1945), 183-96.

³¹ A. A. Gilmore, "Augustine and the Critical Method," Harvard Theological Review, XXXIX (1946), 141-64.

Augustine's entire early career may be regarded as a search for a tenable exegetical method. Only when he discovered and accepted allegorization, under the guidance of Ambrose, was he able to enter into traditional Christianity. Before that time he was a halfhearted Manichaean. Like Marcion, his Manichaean teachers insisted on a literal interpretation of the Old Testament in order to prove its absurdity. They emphasized anthropomorphic expressions in order to ask ironically whether God has hair and nails. They criticized the morality of the patriarchs. As for the New Testament, they again followed Marcion in their claim that the text had been interpolated by Judaizers.³² Augustine began to suspect their veracity when they proved unable to provide a copy of the original, genuine text. But Old Testament problems continued to disturb him. Only the sermons of Ambrose of Milan were able to bring him to a fresh view of the Old Testament. Ambrose constantly quoted II Cor. 3:6; "The letter kills, but the spirit gives life." This justification of the allegorical method was not intended by Paul, who was discussing the law of Moses as contrasted with the free Spirit of God. But the exegesis of Ambrose made Christian faith possible for Augustine.

Once within the church, Augustine believed that he ought to set down the principles of an exegesis which would be at the same time scholarly and also centered in theology. In the year 397 he composed most of his Christian Doctrine. This work is an attempt not only to insist on the importance of sound learning for the interpreter, but also to stress the primacy of a single theological principle running throughout scripture:

Whoever seems to himself to have understood the divine Scriptures in such a way that he does not build up that double love of God and neighbor, has not yet understood.³³

This is the fundamental principle. If there remain unsolved questions of exegesis, the interpreter is to consult the rule of faith, the orthodox teaching of the church, as well as the context of scripture. He must also beware of taking figurative language literally, or literal language figuratively. The authors of scripture made use of all the rhetorical forms known to grammarians.

In his The Harmony of the Gospels Augustine makes a suggestion to explain the differences in the order of events in the Gospels. This suggestion, if consistently applied, would have undermined the ancient theory of verbal inerrancy. The reason for the differences, he says, is to be found in the nature of memory. What comes into our mind is not what we will, but as it is given. Therefore each evangelist gives the events in the order which God desired for him; these orders need not be the same.⁸⁴ Obviously, then, we cannot tell—and we should not try to tell—which order is the historical order of events. Augustine's entire book shows how little he, or the ancient church generally, was interested in historical questions.

³² Augustine Confessions III. 7; V. 11.

³³ I. 36.

With Jerome and Augustine the history of interpretation in the ancient church really comes to an end. Jerome makes use of the insights of the school of Antioch, combines them with his own phenomenal learning, and produces the Vulgate. In this translation are summed up the achievements of the Antiochian fathers. Augustine, on the other hand, modifies the allegorical method of Alexandria while retaining its fundamental point of view and its emphasis on systematic theology. Both Jerome and Augustine, writing in Latin, point the way forward to the Middle Ages. But ancient exegesis had not come to a full stop. There remained the task of assimilation.

VI. Handbooks

In the third book of his Christian Doctrine, Augustine makes use of a book of seven rules composed by a certain Tyconius. The rules are intended to cover every situation in which an allegorical interpretation might seem to be demanded. Like their contemporary Jewish equivalents (e.g., the thirty-two rules of Rabbi Eliezer, son of Rabbi Jose), they are rather far-fetched. Their chief purpose is to give some rational ground for allegorization. Thus the first rule, "Of the Lord and his body," shows that often in scripture what is said of Christ applies also to his body, the church. Another rule, "Of times," is really an attempt to solve difficulties without recourse to criticism. If one Gospel says the Transfiguration was eight days after the scene at Caesarea Philippi, while another says it was six, the difference can easily be explained. The first gives the whole period of time, while the second gives only a part. The same rule takes care of the difference between "on the third day" and "after three days" in the resurrection narratives. Another rule, "On recapitulation," provides the traditional explanation of the double account of creation in the book of Genesis.

Perhaps the most interesting feature about these rules lies not in the rules themselves, but in the fact that Augustine thought it worth while to use them. As the great period of ancient exegesis draws to its close, biblical interpretation, like other manifestations of intellectual life, is becoming more and more stereotyped. It is becoming fixed in rules. To be sure, the works of the great commentators like Origen are preserved, but most interpreters read them in "catenas," chains of exegetical materials in capsule form.⁸⁵ The freshness of early exegesis has gone. Theodore of Mopsuestia is condemned not so much for being wrong as for being original. It is noteworthy that his commentaries survived only in the Syriac language and in Latin under the name of Ambrose.

Through manuals of interpretation, perhaps more than in any other way, the exegetical outlook of antiquity was able to influence the thought of the medieval church. When Cassiodorus in the sixth century compiled an introduction to sacred studies, he recommended five earlier writers. They were Tyconius, Augustine (Christian Doctrine), Adrian, Eucherius, and Junilius.⁸⁶ Augustine and Tyconius have already been mentioned. Let us now consider the last three names.

Eucherius of Lyons, who died about 450, wrote a handbook on the interpretation of scripture which summed up for the Western church the methods of Origen without his theological acumen. This book was called Rules for Allegorical Interpretation. Eucherius begins with an introduction in which he sets forth his theory of exegesis. First he proves the existence of symbolic language in scripture. Next he justifies its existence by the necessity of keeping pearls from swine; for this reason anthropomorphisms are found in the Bible. He finds a three-fold meaning in scripture: historical, tropological, and analogical. This division, found in various forms as early as Origen, is sometimes made fourfold, as Eucherius says, by the addition of allegory.⁸⁷ "Tropology" involves a moral meaning, while the "anagogical" refers to a secret and heavenly meaning. As an example, he offers "And the waters which are above the heavens shall praise the name of the Lord" (Ps. 148:4). "Heaven" historically or literally means the sky, tropologically, heavenly life; "waters" allegorically mean baptism, analogically, the angels. Most of Eucherius' work is devoted to explaining away anthropomorphic expressions and to giving the allegorical meaning of animals and forces of nature in the Bible. He is perhaps farthest from reality in his last chapter, on numbers. But the text of his work as printed in Migne has been interpolated by ⁸⁴ See G. Heinrici, "Catenae," New Schaff-Herzog Encyclopedia of Religious Knowledge (New York: Funk & Wagnalls, 1908), II, 451-53.

⁸⁵ Institutiones I, 10.

⁸⁷ Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, XXXI, 5. See Ernst von Dobschutz, "Vom vierfachen Schriftsinn," in Harnack-Ehrung (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1921), pp. 1-13.

⁸⁴ II, 21.

ingenious number-allegorists of later times. His own work, recovered by Wotke, does not do much more than give biblical examples of the use of some numbers between one and one hundred.

The two other handbooks reflect not the school of Alexandria, but that of Antioch. The Introduction to the Sacred Scriptures of Adrian seems to have been written shortly before Eucherius' work.³⁸ It is divided into three parts because there are three characteristics of Hebrew expressions, based on meaning, phraseology, and composition. "Meaning" involves the problem of anthropomorphisms; "phraseology" is concerned with metaphorical expressions and explains them in terms of biblical usage; "composition" considers rhetorical forms in relation to the interpretation of scripture. Adrian concludes his work with a brief general discussion of holy scripture and interpretation. In this the influence of the school of Antioch is clear. He states that there are two forms in the divine scripture: prophetic and historical. Each of these deals with past, present, and future. While literal exegesis is primary, we must go farther, beyond the mere unsymbolical analysis of the letters. Like other Antiochians, Adrian is not content with simple literalism. He stands close to Chrysostom.

Finally we have the Rules for the Divine Law of Junilius Africanus, written about 550, in which the peculiar ideas of Theodore of Mopsuestia concerning the canon of the Bible are combined with a systematic treatment of exegesis. This analysis is made on the basis of the Aristotelian rhetoric which flourished in sixth-century Syria. Junilius nods in passing to the Augustinian principle of love of God and neighbor, but he makes little use of it. His rules were widely influential in the early Middle Ages.³⁹ At the end of his work he sets forth an Aristotelian principle which doubtless made his theories palatable to scholastic-minded Christians. After proving the divine inspiration of scripture from the truth and consistency of the ³⁸ Friedrich Goessling, Adrians ΕΙΣΑΓΩΓΗ ΕΙΣ ΤΑΣ ΘΕΙΑΣ ΓΡΑΦΑΣ (Berlin: H. Reuther, 1887), p. 13.

³⁹ Heinrich Kihn, Theodor von Mopsuestia und Junilius Africanus als Exegeten (Freiburg im Breisgau: Herder, 1880), pp. 302 ff.

Bible, he finds that he has left little place for faith. The reason for this is that our religion is superrational, but not irrational: "What reason teaches, faith understands, and where reason fails, faith leads the way." Faith and reason are never opposed to each other. The separation of exegesis from theology has begun.

The study of the interpretation of the Bible in the ancient church is a vast field. We have skimmed the surface, but enough has been said to make plain the fact that the problems of ancient interpreters were much like our own. The debate between Alexandria and Antioch is a perennial one, now to some extent by-passed by the idea of development within biblical thought, but never entirely settled. Yet at the end of antiquity little fresh investigation of the meaning of scripture was being made. Interpreters were content to regard themselves as dwarfs on the shoulders of giants, and to seek all their inspiration in the past. The vigor and originality of Origen or Theodore of Mopsuestia had been lost; the authoritarianism of Vincent of Lérins had taken its place. Even Augustine felt that toward the end of his life he ought to publish New Treatments of any points, exegetical or theological, in which he might have slipped into heterodoxy. Satisfactory exegesis could not be carried on in such an atmosphere.

At the same time, enough of the exegetical work of the earlier fathers was preserved so that their disagreements could be seen. There was almost no exegetical point on which they unanimously agreed. And this measure of difference helped, when learning once more flourished, to keep the interpretation of the Bible alive. In the writings of the fathers we find no enduring exegetical method. We find attempts to solve difficulties by means of the best tools available. But the fathers rarely if ever considered the possibility that a passage of scripture meant something different to its writer from what it meant in their own day. For this reason the tools employed by the fathers are not those which later interpreters were to find most useful.⁴⁰ ⁴⁰ A selected bibliography on the history of biblical interpretation will be found on p. 141. Editors.

HISTORY OF THE INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE

II. MEDIEVAL AND REFORMATION PERIOD

by JOHN T. McNEILL

I. The Middle Ages

- A. The Period of Gregory and Bede
- B. Development of Allegory
- C. Toward a More Historical Exegesis
- D. Tension Between History and Allegory
- E. The Scholastic Age
- F. Rashi and Nicholas of Lyra

II. The Reformation

- A. Martin Luther
- B. John Calvin
- C. Other Reformation Interpreters

The purpose of this article is to mark a few guideposts on the course of Bible interpretation through the centuries from Vincent of Lérins to Luther and Calvin and their contemporaries. The conception of the Bible as holy writ, resting upon divine authority, and entirely distinct from other human writings, had been increasingly affirmed from the second century to the fifth. The canon of Scripture was defined in controversy with Gnostics who were inventing their own scriptures. The process involved for the Catholic church the assertion of the principle of tradition as the basis of selection of authoritative books. As the test of canonicity, tradition tended to assume an authority superior to that of Scripture itself. But once the canon was established, the accepted books were held in peculiar reverence, and the balance of authority between the Scripture and tradition seems to have been in some degree altered in favor of the former. During the decade that followed the death of Augustine (430), Vincent of Lérins in his Commonitorium (434) asserted the primacy of Scripture, but stressed the necessity of interpreting it in accordance with tradition. Vincent would defend the church against heretics and fortify Christian faith, "first, by the authority of the divine law [Scripture], and secondly by the tradition of the Catholic church." The canonical Scriptures are admittedly "sufficient for everything," but they are variously misinterpreted. He therefore holds it urgently necessary "that the rule of interpretation of the Prophets and Apostles be laid down in accordance with the norm of ecclesiastical and Catholic understanding [sensus]." This is the position that was to have general adherence in the medieval church.

Already, then, the Bible, as delimited in the canon, was fully recognized as the Book of God. In the language of the church fathers it was "the sacred writings," "the divine law," "the sacred page," "the word of God." In accordance with this conception it afforded the chief public reading in church and monastic services, and the series of lections for public worship was already substantially determined. Furthermore, the Scriptures furnished the principal inspiration of those Christians who seriously engaged in the cultivation of their own personal piety. Searching the Scriptures for edification became a feature of life in the early monastic communities. The lectio divina (divine reading) was a common exercise of monks before and after Benedict. It involved an intensive devotion to the study of Scripture. The Rule of Benedict itself, almost from beginning to end, offers remarkable evidence of the functioning of scriptural knowledge and suggestion in the monastic mind. In his last chapter Benedict speaks depreciatively of what he has written by comparison with the Scriptures and the fathers and monastic writers; and here he asks rhetorically: "For what page or what word of divine authority of the Old and the New Testament is not a perfect norm [rectissima norma] of human life?"

Benedict's use of scripture passages is direct and practical. It is noteworthy that he does not follow his master and Vincent's contemporary, John Cassian, in utilizing allegorical or other nonliteral senses. Cassian, explaining the true meaning of scripture, had compared the spiritual sense with the literal by reference to the son of the free woman and of the bondwoman in the Abraham story, and to the "double garments" referred to in the Vulgate rendering of Prov. 31:21. Cassian also subdivided the spiritual interpretation much in the fashion of medieval writers. From I Cor. 14:6, "What shall it profit except I speak either by revelation or by knowledge or by prophecy or by doctrine," he deduces the four senses, allegorical, tropological, anagogical, and historical.¹ There are, of course many passages in Cassian which employ simply the historical or literal sense in the manner of Benedict. In a well-known epigram Gregory the Great commends Benedict's lack of schooling. In using the Bible for simple direction the good abbot may have been unaware that his writing favored the Aristotelian Antiochian literal interpreters against the Platonic-Philonic Alexandrian allegorists.

I. The Middle Ages

A. The Period of Gregory and Bede.—The allegorists, to be sure, had not carried all before them in the ancient church, and though allegory flourished in most of the medieval Latin commentaries, it was, as we shall see, frequently criticized and sometimes completely abandoned. Moreover, a change was coming over the spirit of interpretation as the institutions and doctrines of the church became more rigid. Allegory would no longer be used with the originality and ecclesiastically dangerous freedom that marked some passages of Origen and even of Ambrose, but rather, in the spirit of Vincent's canon, under the governing idea of the ecclesiastical tradition. This tradition was now enshrined mainly in the writings of the fathers. Through the period of Gregory the Great and the Venerable Bede some measure of originality and independence remains. Thereafter, for six or seven centuries, the dominant type of biblical interpretation rested upon direct or indirect quotation of the patristic literature and was equally dependent and repetitious. In some quarters, however, freedom and originality were not wanting.

Gregory the Great lent his influence to the side of the spiritual as opposed to the literal exegesis. Five centuries after him Guibert de Nogent found in Gregory's writings "the keys to this art," that is, the art of expounding spiritual senses. "Allegory," says Gregory, expounding the Song of Songs, "makes a kind of machine for the soul far off from God by which it may be raised up to him."² His use of the method may be illustrated from the Moralia, his lectures on the book of Job. In the dedicatory epistle to Leander which precedes this work, he states that he is responding to the request that I would not only expound the words of the history in allegorical senses, but that I would direct the sense of the allegories into an exercise in morality, adding to this something more difficult, that I would surround the several meanings with testimonies and that the testimonies presented, if perchance they should seem involved, should be untangled by the insertion of additional expositions.³

¹ Conferences XIV. 8. Corpus Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Latinorum, XIII, ii, pp. 404 ff. See above, p. 113 and below, p. 121.

In the preface to this work Gregory gives us his high conception of the authorship of scripture. He refuses to become involved in an investigation of the human authorship of the book of Job, since it is the work not of a man, but of the Holy Spirit:

But who was the writer, it is utterly useless to ask; since at any rate the Holy Spirit is trustworthily believed to have been the Author of the book. He, therefore, who dictated the things to be written, himself wrote them. He himself wrote them who was both the Inspirer in that writer's work, and by the utterance of the writer has passed on to us his acts for our imitation. If we were reading the words of some great man whose letters we had received, yet were to ask by what pen they had been written, it would truly be ridiculous, to know the author of the epistles and understand his meaning, and yet to make search to know with what sort of pen the words were set down. Thus when we understand the matter, and hold that the Holy Spirit was its Author, in seeking out the writer, what else are we doing than in reading a letter to inquire about the pen?⁴

We are soon plunged into a maze of Gregory's spiritual expositions. We learn that the three friends of Job are the heretics, and that when they come to Job, they are returning to holy church; Job himself maintains a semblance to the Redeemer to come. His name means "grieving," a forecast of the Mediator's passion and of the travails and afflictions of holy church in this life. Job's seven thousand sheep are innocent thoughts; the three thousand camels are high and vain notions; the five hundred oxen are virtues, and the five hundred she-asses are wanton inclinations. In the words of Job, "My sighing cometh before I eat," we see the groaning of sorrow before the gladness of contemplation. Arcturus, Orion, the Pleiades, and the chambers of the south in Job 9:9 represent respectively the church, the martyrs, the doctors, and the Holy Spirit. One might go on enumerating countless instances of what seems a needless insistence upon the items of ecclesiastical life, and in some cases sheer wresting of scripture meanings; but there is no doubt of the deep sincerity of the author's mind in these matters. He was not merely indulging a wayward imagination. Like other serious allegorists, he is deeply concerned for the reader's ethical and spiritual enrichment and the support of the orthodox faith. He is never far from the demands of practical piety. "What," he asks, "are the sayings of truth if we do not take them as food for the nourishment of the soul?"

² Exposition of the Song of Songs. Prologue, 2. Jacques P Migne, Patrologia Latina, LXXIX, 473.

³ Migne, op. cit., LXXV, 512.

⁴ Ibid., 517.

The dogmatic control of the spiritual senses of scripture was to be more fully developed in later times. It would result in a long series of scripture commentaries which contain extended catenae of quotations from accepted church fathers. The Venerable Bede is one of the first to profess in his interpretations a substantial dependence upon the fathers. He speaks of scripture study as medicine for the soul. In his exegesis the purpose of edification is completely dominant. He rests his Commentary on Luke upon the works of Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, and Gregory. But while Bede patiently seeks out tradition as conveyed by these fathers, he exhibits also a considerable body of independent interpretation, and at least regards it as legitimate that he should express his own judgments. In the letter to Acca, bishop of Hexham, that accompanies his Commentary on Luke, he adds to his expression of reverence for the fathers the modest statement:

A few items, too, which (as I may say in the words of your Holiness) the Author of Light disclosed to me, I have added, as seemed appropriate, by my own labor. Even though I am not able to spend (as you yourself phrased it) days and sleepless nights in meditation on the Divine Law, yet I have no doubt that I have devoted myself to the Scriptures with no slight zeal, and that I have been able to see, that is, to perceive and discern, not in this book alone, but in every passage, only those things which the Author of Light deigned to show me.⁵

This sense of something of the nature of a direct illumination in Bede may remind us of the teaching of John Calvin regarding the testimony of the Holy Spirit enlightening the devout reader. It was from Ambrose and Augustine that Bede derived his interpretation of the parable of the prodigal son in Luke 15. The prodigal is worldly philosophy which, unsatisfied, having deserted its true master, Christ, yet hungers after truth, while the faithful Christians receive the bread of the word in the father's house, which is identified with the church. Glunz points out that the Vulgate text was affected by this type of interpretation. Some interpreters, applying Alcuin's realistic principle substantia commune est nomen omnium rerum quae sunt,⁶ felt that the text itself ought to contain a reference which could be directly used to signify "church," and so interpolated the phrase in domo in the text of Luke 15:17. The father's "house" is the church from which the prodigal son has departed. Thus hermeneutic presuppositions were forcing alterations in the text itself. Glunz connects this interpolation with the attention given to the interpretations of Ambrose and Bede in the school of Alcuin, whose study of the Bible marks the beginning of the more typical medieval exegesis.

⁵ Ibid., XCII, 305. H. H. Glunz has called attention to this passage, and gives a condensed translation of it in History of the Vulgate in England from Alcuin to Roger

B. Development of Allegory.—Alcuin represents a type of interpretation which not only relies upon the fathers but sincerely attempts to restrict itself to patristic authority. He explains that as physicians do not create their medicines but procure them from a variety of sources, so he proposes to use Augustine, Ambrose, Gregory, Bede, and other holy fathers. Originality is confined to selection. He "wanders through the blossoming fields" of the patristic literature with a humble heart and a bowed head, and culls passages in reliance upon his own judgment, being cautious to set down nothing contrary to the interpretations of the fathers.⁷

Many followed Alcuin's method of interpretation. Rabanus Maurus, his most distinguished pupil, searched the fathers with even more diligence than Alcuin, and favored spiritual interpretations calculated to support the structure and dogma of church tradition. Thus the four wheels of Ezekiel's chariot are the Law, the Prophets, the Gospels and the Apostles.⁸ He Bacon (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1933), p. 80.

⁶ "Substance is the common name of all the things that are." Migne, op. cit., VI, 418; cf. Glunz, op. cit., pp. 87 ff.

⁷ Commentary on the Gospel of St. John, Migne, op. cit., C, 743, and Glunz, op. cit., pp. 81 ff. Alcuin was deeply concerned to combat the prevailing neglect of the Scriptures in the schools. In 797 he wrote to the church of Canterbury urging the appointment of competent teachers, "lest the Word of God be lacking among you." "Ignorance of Scripture," says Alcuin, "is ignorance of God." Migne, op. cit., C, 250.

⁸ Migne, op. cit., CX, 525 ff.

tells us that the book of Esther contains in manifold ways the sacraments of Christ and the church. Esther, as typifying the church, frees her people from peril; Haman stands for iniquitas, and Ahasuerus is a type of Christ.⁹ In such interpretations the typology of Rabanus is only remotely similar to that employed by the Protestant reformers: it relies largely upon etymologies, many of which are erroneous. Rabanus is, however, an exponent of the four senses of scripture. These are, he explains in the preface to his book Allegories on Holy Scripture, four daughters of one mother, Wisdom. He here refers to the historical interpretation as milk, the allegorical as bread, the anagogical as savory nourishment, and the tropological as exhilarating wine. Elaborating numerous comparisons, he observes: "In the house of our soul history lays the foundation, allegory erects the walls, analogy sets on the roof, and tropology provides the ornaments."¹⁰ With his dependence upon the church fathers, he is harsh toward the exponents of fresh opinions.

Walafrid Strabo (d. 849), who became abbot of Reichenau, carried on the Alcuin tradition after Rabanus. The Glossa Ordinaria, a universal commentary on scripture, was assumed in the later Middle Ages to be the work of Walafrid. In fact it was substantially of later origin, but it well illustrates the tendency of the Alcuin school. It is a compilation of extracts from the fathers, usually with the name of the original author indicated. Many Bible passages are left unnoticed, but a large body of material is presented.¹¹ The Glossa Ordinaria was one of those useful works which, while possessing no claim to originality, have exercised great influence. It is a mark of weakness in the later scholastics that they recognized this anthology as an authoritative work of interpretation. Thomas Aquinas honors it with countless citations.

Not only the monastic scholars but, as we should expect, the zealous reformers of monasticism in the early Middle Ages, have much to say about the Scriptures and urgently seek to give reality to the lectio divina. Benedict of Aniane (d. 821) seizes upon the passage in the final chapter of the Rule of Benedict of Nursia which has been quoted above (p. 115), and sets it in the first paragraph of his Concordia Regularum.¹² The brilliant leadership of Odo of Cluny (d. 942) gave a new impulse to monasticism in the early tenth century. Odo undertook in early life, even before he had become a monk, to labor upon interpretations of the Bible. But he felt serious scruples, and under the criticism of his clerical associates at Tours, shrank from independent opinions. His chief contribution was his Epitome Moralium, a condensation of Gregory's work on Job. In another work, the Collationes, he gives further evidence of his interest in the Bible. In the opening section of this work Odo says, "If there is anything which can keep a wise man steadfast amid worldly turmoil, it is most of all, I believe, meditation on the Scriptures. . . . Indeed, the intention of all scripture is to restrain us from the depravity of this life."¹³ This is the true spirit of monastic injunctions regarding the Scriptures. It does not directly conduce to technical study of the text or to independent intellectualizing of its meaning. The monk is a seeker after spiritual security. Similar is the attitude of Gerard de Brogne (d. 959), a reformer of monasticism in the region of Ghent in the Netherlands. Gerard became a preacher, thereby attracting recruits to his movement. His early biographer tells us that he sought "by opening the fountain of the Scriptures to water their dry minds," and to induce the spiritually weak brethren to "take the life-giving herb of the divine word" for the healing of their vices.¹⁴

The Norman monk and prelate, Lanfranc (d. 1089), who played an important part in the church of England, like Alcuin and his followers relied upon the patristic writings and resented any attempt to evade that authority. Thus he was a determined opponent of Berengar (d. 1088), who in a dialectical manner introduced new interpretations of the passages of scripture concerning the Lord's Supper. This to Lanfranc was "pertinacious arrogance." Lanfranc, however, exhibits a great interest in improving the Vulgate texts, and the copying of the Scriptures flourished in the monasteries that fell under his influence.

C. Toward a More Historical Exegesis.— There were other authors, however, who were nonconformists with respect to the senses of scripture and to the fashion of dependence upon the fathers. This is true of the illustrious Irishman, Johannes Scotus Erigena (d. in or after 877). The philosophical mind of Erigena is not satisfied with the sharp distinction between the word and its spiritual meaning assumed by the Alcuin school. What is needed is sound intellectual understanding of the text. The language itself has everything in it if only the mind is taught to draw it forth. This position encourages the labor of interpretation and at the same time the effort to obtain the best

⁹ Ibid., CIX, 635 ff.

¹⁰ Ibid., CXII, 849.

¹¹ The work occupies about two thousand columns in Migne, op. cit., CXIII, CXIV.

¹² Migne, op. cit., CIII, 718.

¹³ Ibid., CXXXIII, 520.

¹⁴ Glunz, op. cit., p. 38; text in Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores (Hannover: Hahn, 1888), XV, 671.

possible text. Erigena himself examined textual variants, seeking a fuller understanding of scripture.¹⁵

The gifted monk of St. Gaul, Notker Balbulus (d. 912), also favored a more critical interpretation and was somewhat disinclined to allegory. In a sort of bibliographical guide to commentaries on the Scriptures, Notker dryly remarks that the Venerable Bede, in his comments on Tobias and Esdras, wrote what was pleasant rather than what was required and tried to turn a simple story into allegory.¹⁶

Christian of Stavelot (d. 850), commonly called Druthmar, at the beginning of his commentary on Matthew, wrote:

I have studied to follow the historical more than the spiritual sense because it seemed to me irrational to seek for spiritual knowledge in any book and to be utterly ignorant of the historical, since history is the foundation of all knowledge [quum historia fundamentum omnis intelligentiae sit].¹⁷

Druthmar does not revel in allegory, but he likes to offer brief historical notes on place names, and simple expositions of unusual words. On the other hand, he takes a great interest in edifying etymologies and typological identifications. In Matthew's genealogy, for example, Abraham "signifies" the Father, Isaac the Lord Jesus Christ.¹⁸

In the twelfth century we have a number of commentators who show a marked departure from the current methods of exegesis. Among these is Rupert of Deutz (d. 1135). This learned abbot commented on many Old and New Testament books, and wrote a quite remarkable treatise, On the Victory of God's Word (1127). Christ, for Rupert as for Luther, is the center of all scripture. On Rev. 12:21 and Eph. 2:20 he remarks that the prophets are foundations, the apostles foundations of foundations, and Christ the foundation of all foundations.¹⁹ In his Victory of God's Word he argues that "the Word of God is the Son of God," and that the Scriptures are necessary to salvation and sufficient for faith. In our natural ignorance of God they are our one light, and the guide to theology. The Scripture is not a book of dark mysteries, but essentially simple, and suitable for the unlearned. The teacher of the Word should be one taught of God, and trained for ¹⁵ Glunz, op. cit., pp. 108 ff.

¹⁶ De Interpretibus Divinarum Scripturarum. Migne, op. cit., CXXXI, 997.

¹⁷ Migne, op. cit., CVI, 1262; the commentary has been examined by M. L. W. Laistner, "A Ninth-Century Commentator on the Gospel According to Matthew," Harvard Theological Review, XX (1927), 129-49, with attention chiefly to text.

¹⁸ Migne, op. cit., CVI, 1268.

¹⁹ Ibid., CLXIX, 1198.

the combat like Job's war horse. We receive the Word as from the mouth of God.²⁰ In the preface to his Commentary on John's Gospel Rupert rejects the view that Augustine is a sufficient authority, and affirms the right of other Christians to expound the books. Nor is it necessary to rest on the authority of Gregory for Job.²¹ He is more typically medieval when he makes the seven days of creation a forecast of the seven gifts of the Holy Spirit. He laid a novel emphasis in his soteriology upon the work of the Holy Spirit, and his doctrine of the Eucharist was under suspicion as a reflection of the heresy of Berengar.²²

The work of the Victorines was also startling. Both Hugh (d. 1141) and Andrew (d. 1175) of St. Victor profited by the Old Testament scholarship of the new school of French rabbis who followed Solomon Rashi (d. 1105) of Troyes. Half a century ago Nicholas of Lyra was regarded as the first Christian greatly indebted to Rashi. Recent scholarship has shown a powerful leaven of Rashi's literal, rational exegesis upon the Christian scholars of the twelfth century. Beryl Smalley's revealing book, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages,²³ strongly supports this view, and also reinforces the evidence that, from Rabanus Maurus down, Jewish scholars were frequently consulted by Christians. In view of what is now known of Rashi's Jewish and Christian influence in many lands, it would be difficult to name a more important writer in the whole history of interpretation. Herman Hailperin²⁴ has clarified this matter further. He points out that amid the anti-Jewish enactments and riots of the early thirteenth century, when the Talmud and Rashi's commentaries were burned at Paris, Christians were busy translating parts of both. A century earlier Bernard of Clairvaux was anxious about this intellectual traffic with Jews. He rebuked a young scholar for "gnawing crusts with the lettered Jews": "crust" is here the letter of the bread of scripture.

Of the three great Victorines, Hugh was a Saxon, Richard a Scot, and Andrew an Englishman. Hugh went for help to the rabbis and worked mainly on the Old Testament. He rebuked those who despised the letter. "Subtract the letter, and what is left?" he cogently asks. He advises, "Do not despise what is lowly in ²⁰ De Victoria Verbi Dei, chs. i-iv. Migne, op. cit., CLXIX, 1217-29.

²¹ Migne, op. cit., CLXIX, 201-2.

²² A. J. Macdonald, Berengar and the Reform of Sacramental Doctrine (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1930), pp. 399-400. For Rupert's theology see the article on him in Dictionnaire de Théologie Catholique (Paris: Letouzey et Ané, 1903), XIV, 169-205.

²³ Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1941.

²⁴ "The Hebrew Heritage of Mediaeval Christian Biblical Scholarship," Historia Judaica, V (1943), 133-54.

God's Word." He criticizes the interpretation of Isa. 4:1, "seven women shall take hold of one man," as referring to the seven gifts of the Spirit, without acknowledging that the prophet means something literal as well. Hugh would select among patristic commentaries "that which has been certainly intended by the author," or if that is unclear, what is admissible and in accord with the faith. On Ecclesiastes he blames those who "strive superstitiously to find a mystical sense and a deep allegory where none is." Possessed of a fine imagination, he was able to illuminate the literal meaning without "toiling after tropologies." Beryl Smalley writes, "His great service to exegesis was to lay more stress on the literal interpretation relatively to the spiritual."²⁵ In *De Arca Noe Morali*²⁶ he explains his classroom drawings designed to show the ark just as Noah built it. But Hugh is no mere literalist. He employs with the Alexandrians the allegorical and tropological as well as the literal sense. "The Ark signifies the church," he here observes, "and the church is Christ's body; so I have drawn the whole person of Christ, head and members. . . ."²⁷

Richard (d. 1173) and Andrew had more knowledge of Hebrew than Hugh. Richard, like Bernard of Clairvaux, wrote against the Jewish literal, and to him therefore false, interpretation. Richard asks his readers not to be surprised if something has escaped the fathers. What has escaped them is the value of the literal meaning. He implies that Gregory was mistaken in saying that the second vision of Ezekiel had no meaning according to the letter. Yet this independence is asserted with great deference to the patristic authors. The earlier reapers who have filled their volumes with corn have left gleanings for the poor! We honor the fathers by seeking the truth beyond their reach. "Do not ask whether what I say is new, but whether it is true." Richard will not be misled, however, by Jewish tradition to question the authority of the Scriptures. In a slap at Andrew, he warns that Josephus is not to be taken as authoritative simply on the ground that he is a Jew.²⁸

Andrew was the most radical of the champions of rational literalism. He was the Abélard of Bible scholars. Beryl Smalley even calls him a humanist. He writes with no interest in a theological pattern but in joy of the perusal of these revered documents of antiquity. "A pleasant toil, a toilsome pleasure," he esteems the task, and he is sustained by a hearty assurance that there is truth yet to spring forth from the Word. With perfect freedom he may set down phrases like these: "We follow the Jews and Josephus rather than Bede," or "Men of great authority give this opinion; . . . they are misled." The historical method may involve historical speculation and conjecture. How could Moses know what happened at Creation? Conceivably by revelation of the Holy Spirit. Possibly, however, the history was handed down from Adam, and Moses obtained it by painstaking research (diligenter investigare curavit). Andrew makes the most of the fragmentary biographical details furnished by Old Testament books about their authors. Isaiah is distinguished for seven things: his noble race, polished eloquence, dignified office, royal connection, worth of character, constancy, and holiness. This approach is far removed from Gregory's estimate of the human author of Job as of the same importance as the pen that wrote the book. It is probable that if Andrew could have stepped into the study of Lorenzo Valla, he would have been intellectually at home; while in the company of his elder contemporary, Bernard of Clairvaux (d. 1153), he would certainly have been embarrassed.²⁹

D. Tension Between History and Allegory.— Bernard's sermons on the Song of Songs exhibit the exegesis of edification unalloyed by history. With the eloquence of free discourse, they gather into a loose relation to the text of the book a body of mystical reflections upon God, angels, and human life. Allegory prevails, but ascetic morality is often, if sometimes tardily, introduced. "I thought," says Bernard, wearied with his own lucubrations, "that we should quickly traverse this forest shady with allegories and reach the level ground of moral meanings." Bernard's allegorical exuberance carries him far indeed from the embarrassing literal sense of the book. The words, "the virgins love thee," send him off to elaborate the diverse reasons why God is loved by angels, archangels, virtues, powers, principalities, dominations, cherubim, and seraphim. The phrase, "go forth and pasture thy kids," causes him to shed "a torrent of tears": the bride is being rebuked and sent away in anger under a command to indulge the fleshly desires. "But whither are we being borne?" he not inappropriately interjects.³⁰

Bernard in his exhortation to Pope Eugenius III presents a doctrine of the two swords of Luke 22:38. Alcuin had used this passage, giving both swords to Charlemagne, not yet emperor, for defense of Christendom from without and from within. In Bernard the swords are "spir-

²⁵ Smalley, op. cit., p. 77.

²⁶ Migne, op. cit., CLXXVI, 617 ff.

²⁷ Ibid., CLXXVI, 622.

²⁸ Smalley, op. cit., p. 84.

²⁹ On Andrew see Smalley, op. cit., ch. iv. Miss Smalley has used MS sources.

³⁰ Sermons on the Canticles, XVI. 1; XXXIV. 3, 5; XXXV. 2. Migne, op. cit., CLXXXIII, 849, 959 ff.

itual" and "material," and they are wielded respectively by the church and by the soldier at the bidding (nutum) of the clergy and at the command (iussum) of the emperor.⁸¹ This passage was to be habitually invoked in support of papal claims by Innocent III and his successors. Here it may be said that a study of the use of scripture passages in asserting papal authority through the period from Pope Gregory VII to the Reformation would certainly reveal an important current in the history of interpretation. The texts principally relied upon were the "dominical charge" in Matt. 16:17-19; the commission of Jeremiah, "I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms" (Jer. 1:10); the two lights set in the firmament at creation (Gen. 1:16-18), of which the sun is the papacy and the moon is the secular ruler; and the "two swords" passage. The last two represent pure allegory. Many other passages were employed to give scriptural basis to the papal claims. But these interpretations were disputed by opponents of the papacy, notably by Dante in De Monarchia (ca. 1309).

Reference has been made above to the different senses of scripture recognized by our authors. Guibert de Nogent (d. 1124), in a book on the construction of sermons, speaks of the four senses as the rules by which every page of scripture turns as on so many wheels:

That is to say: history, which speaks of things done; allegory, in which one thing is understood by another [ex alio aliud]; tropology, that is, the moral way of speaking, in which the ordering of morals is treated; anagoge, or the spiritual understanding by which, discussing what is lofty and heavenly, we are led to things above.⁸²

Hugh of St. Cher wrote: "History tells what happened; allegory teaches what is to be understood; anagogy, what is to be sought after; tropology, what is to be done."⁸³

The main tension seems to have been between allegory and history, and most writers were partisans of one or the other of these. Joachim of Floris (d. 1202) carried allegory to an extreme, presenting a revolutionary doctrine of the church. But the moral sense emerged into new prominence in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Even before the Vic-

⁸¹ De Consideratione IV. 3. 7; Migne, op. cit., CLXXXII, 776.

⁸² Quo Ordine Sermo Fieri Debet. Migne, op. cit., CLVI, 25-26.

⁸³ Opera (Venice: Nicolaus Pezzana, 1703), I, 2. The mnemonic verses quoted by Nicholas of Lyra, and very frequently by later writers, that call to mind this "four-horse chariot" (quadriga), as Luther called it, ran thus:

Litera gesta docet quid credas allegoria moralis quid agas quo tendas anagogia.

torines, Guibert remarked that the need of the age was no longer for allegory but rather for tropology, the moral sense. The great commentators, Peter Comestor (d. 1179?), chief author of the Historia Scholastica, Peter Cantor (d. 1197), and Stephen Langton (d. 1228), constitute what Grabmann and Beryl Smalley have called the "biblical moral school." The lectures of these professors were taken down in shorthand and afterward polished, as Beryl Smalley shows in her discriminating chapter on the three. The *Historia Scholastica*⁸⁴ is a Bible with extensive comments; it was very widely circulated, and was printed in 1473 at Augsburg. At the outset Peter Comestor says: "Holy Scripture is God's dining room, where the guests are made soberly drunk."⁸⁵ The foundation is history, which divides into annals, calendars, and ephemera (the records of years, months, and days); the walls are allegory, which makes one event the figure of another; the roof is tropology, which from what has been done suggests what we ought to do. This passage may be compared with the language of Rabanus Maurus quoted above. With a similar view Langton makes the words, "Thy silver is become dross" (Isa. 1:22) apply to the work of scholars who turn from tropological and moral to "curious" questions.⁸⁶

E. The Scholastic Age.—We are now in the age of the universities, the friars, and the great Scholastics. Robert Grosseteste (d. 1253) taught the young Franciscans of Oxford to love and labor over the Scriptures. Dominic was himself an intense Bible student; and Ray C. Petry has shown that Francis of Assisi searched the Scriptures for testimony of Jesus, while he found there also the justification of the Friars Minor. Francis uses very effectively the literal sense. But Petry in his chapter on "The Last Times and the Kingdom of God" exhibits what is really the Franciscan appropriation of anagogy.⁸⁷ Certain of the Spiritual Franciscans were to carry this eschatological strain, with the aid of Joachim, to a fanatical pitch, while others in a more literal apocalypticism identified in the contemporary scene the enemies of God. At Oxford and Paris a sober and rational interpretation was carried on by Franciscan and Dominican professors. We are not here concerned with the work of the Paris correctors, such as William de la Mare and Gerard of ⁸⁴ Migne, op. cit., CXCVIII, 1053-1722. Hans Vollmer has edited Latin and German versions: Materialien zur Bibelgeschichte . . . des Mittelalters (Berlin: Weidmann, 1912-16), II, i, ii.

⁸⁵ Migne, op. cit., CXCVIII, 1053.

⁸⁶ Smalley, op. cit., p. 199.

⁸⁷ Francis of Assisi, Apostle of Poverty (Durham: Duke University Press, 1941), chs. iv, v; cf. Ernst Benz, Ecclesia Spiritualis (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1934), Part III.

Huy: but their rather unsuccessful attempts to purge the text are evidence of the importance of the problem of Bible text in the Scholastic age. The chapter general of the Dominicans in 1256 complained of their lack of success. Roger Bacon thought they did more harm than good, and at the same time criticized the weakness of academic study of Scripture. But the fact is that the Scholastics had something of a new scholarly power of biblical interpretation; and it is contrary to fact to say that Aristotle crowded the Scriptures out of their thoughts.

It is doubtful whether any theologian has ever surpassed Thomas Aquinas in familiarity with the language of the Latin Bible. There is a legend that he memorized it throughout while detained by his brothers from entering the Dominican order. In the Summa Theologica, before taking up the doctrine of God, he presents a doctrine of sacred Scripture. Here he examines the question "Whether Scripture has more senses than the literal," and after references to Augustine and Gregory, responds (condensed):

God is the Author of Holy Scripture. He has given a meaning not only to the words but to the things they signify, so that the things signified in turn signify something else. Primarily, words signify things, which is the historical sense; secondarily, the things signify other things, and we get the spiritual sense. The latter is of three sorts. The Old Law is allegorically interpreted in the New Law, but the interpretation of matters affecting Christ and our obligation is tropological, and that which deals with the eternal glory is the analogical or celestial sense. The literal sense is that which the author intends, but God being the Author, we may expect to find in Scripture a wealth of meaning.³⁸

Thomas here quotes with approval Augustine's statement, "On the literal sense alone can we base arguments," and this principle is habitually observed in the Summa. But his Catena aurea, or Commentary on the Four Gospels Collected Out of the Works of the Fathers,³⁹ an assemblage of quotations from numerous authors ranging from Origen to the twelfth-century Interlinear Gloss, shows how highly he prized the nonliteral senses. The locusts and wild honey that nourished John the Baptist (Matt. 3:4) point to the fact that his speeches were sweet as honey but of short flight, like that of locusts, and his camel's hair garment represents the church of the Gentiles. In Matt. 8:20 the foxes and the birds are respectively deceitful and proud demons, or (by another authority) they signify heretics and Jews. The four thousand of Mark 8:9, 20 are men perfect in the four virtues; the five thousand of Mark 8:19 are men enslaved to the five senses. Similar interpretations abound in the Meditations of Thomas, where many Old Testament passages are employed to sustain medieval doctrines.⁴⁰ For Thomas the teaching of the church is to be adhered to "as an infallible and divine rule."⁴¹ As a commentator the Angelic Doctor too often plays a role of conservative dependence on less competent minds than his own.

F. Rashi and Nicholas of Lyra.—Resistance to allegorical excess seems to have owed much to Rashi and his Christian disciples. The age of Aquinas produced an anonymous Christian commentary on the Song of Songs which follows Rashi closely, and except at the very end makes no reference to Christ.⁴² Rashi was given Christian reincarnation in Nicholas of Lyra (d. 1340), a Norman Franciscan and Sorbonne doctor. His great commentary, Postillae Perpetuae in Vetus et Novum Testamentum, reflects on almost every page of its fifty books the opinions of Rashi ("Rabbi Solomon"). Lyra makes no profession of novel purpose. He recites respectfully the now traditional description of the four senses, and quotes the passage of Aquinas on this topic, to which reference has been made. But he labors to bring out the historic meaning of the Hebrew and Greek. Herman Hailperin, in a study of Rashi's influence on Lyra,⁴³ rates highly his appreciation of the nuances of Hebrew and interest in Bible customs, in which he followed Rashi. Sometimes he rejects Rashi's view and goes over his head to the Targums. More often he prefers Rashi to Jerome or some other Christian authority. Yet in doctrinal matters Lyra, much more than Andrew of St. Victor, stands on guard for the Christian tradition.

It is of interest that the Waldenses, who long before Nicholas had taken their stand on the Scriptures literally understood as sufficient for salvation, and had condemned as "Pharisees" the conventionally allegorical commentators who supported "idolatry" by their interpretations, made considerable use of the Postillae.⁴⁴ In this they were followed by the Reformers. Lyra calls Rashi the commentator "whose teach-⁴⁰ The Meditations has been edited in Latin and English by P. D. Mezzard and E. C. McEniry (Columbus, Ohio: 1940). See pp. 37, 63 ff., 154, 438, 482.

⁴¹ Cf. Hugh Pope, "His Principles of Biblical Interpretation" in Aelred Whitacre et al., St. Thomas Aquinas (Oxford: Basil Blackwell, 1924), pp. 125-39.

⁴² Smalley, op. cit., p. 262.

⁴³ "Nicolas de Lyra and Rashi: The Minor Prophets," Rashi Anniversary Volume (New York: American Academy for Jewish Research, 1941), pp. 115-47.

⁴⁴ Louis I. Newman, Jewish Influence on Christian Reform Movements (New York: Columbia University Press, 1925), pp. 74-78, 213-39.

³⁸ Part I, question I, Art. 10.

³⁹ Oxford: James Parker & Co., 1874.

ing is reported most authentic among modern Jews." Luther refers to Lyra as "an excellent man, a good Hebraist, and a steadfast Christian."⁴⁵ The unknown author of the immortal jingle

Si Lyra non lyrasset
Lutherus non saltasset

oversimplifies the relationship. As Lyra was indebted to others than Rashi, so Luther was indebted to many interpreters besides Lyra. But in both cases the debt to the predecessor named was primary. Many sixteenth-century commentators besides Luther, humanist, Roman Catholic, and Protestant, used the Postillae with appreciation.

The way to the Reformation interpretation of scripture was led not only by Lyra but by the work of Lorenzo Valla (d. 1457), Gianozzo Manetti (d. 1459), John Wessel Gansfort (d. 1489), John Colet (d. 1519), Jacques Lefèvre (d. 1536), Erasmus (d. 1536), and other humanists who by their Greek and Hebrew studies laid the foundation for a philological understanding of the Scriptures. The effect of their work—not always its purpose—was to give a new prominence to the literal and historical sense. By the time of Luther's early commentaries the shackles of tradition were already weakened.

II. The Reformation

A. Martin Luther.—In his Address to the German Nobility (1520) Luther vehemently denounced the view that the interpretation of scripture belongs to the pope alone. It belongs, he says in effect, to pious and competent Christians. It is, moreover, a task that is never completed. In the Commentaries on the Psalms (1519-21) he states the matter thus:

I came to this opinion, that no man's interpretation, (assuming it to be pious) ought to be rejected unless by the law of retaliation one chooses to be rejected in turn. He is lacking in some things, you in more; I see many things missed by Augustine, and I know men will see many things that I myself do not see. . . . Our life is a beginning and a going forward, not a consummation.⁴⁶

Interpretation is thus in a degree fluid, and it cannot be held static by ecclesiastical authority. "The Church," says Luther, "is a daughter born of the Word, not the mother of the Word."⁴⁷ He many times insists that he is doing nothing final either in translation or in interpretation.

⁴⁵ Sämmentliche Werke (Erlangen: Carl Hender, 1845), XXXVII, 4.
⁴⁶ Werke (Weimar: Hermann Böhlau, 1892), V, 23.
⁴⁷ Lectures on Genesis, 7:16-24. Werke, Weimar edition, XLII, 324.

Yet he is assured and unyielding on the main principles by which he is guided, and which form the bases of his theology. Thus in his Preface to Romans, having stressed the priority of faith to works and the Pauline meaning of "flesh" as sin and unbelief, he adds:

Without such an understanding of these words you will never understand this letter of St. Paul, or any other book of Holy Scripture. Therefore, beware of all teachers who use these words in a different sense, . . . even Jerome, Augustine, Ambrose, Origen and men like them or above them.⁴⁸

Luther has praise and blame for many commentators. He recognizes the indispensable service of humanism to interpretation:

As for me, I am persuaded that without skill in literature genuine theology cannot stand, just as hitherto in the ruin and prostration of letters it too has miserably fallen and been laid low. Indeed I see that the remarkable disclosure of the Word of God would never have taken place had He not first prepared the way by the rediscovery of languages and sciences, as by Baptist forerunners.⁴⁹

But his reported saying, "The inseparable companion of Holy Scripture is the Holy Spirit,"⁵⁰ reveals what is really the governing, if somewhat intangible, principle of authority. Again, Luther strongly affirms and constantly exemplifies the view that Christ is the center around which all Scripture revolves—the punctus mathematicus sacrae scripturae,⁵¹ and that the entire Bible has meaning by virtue of, and in proportion to, its emphasis upon the gospel of Christ. His prefaces to the Old Testament, and to its several books, bring out this point clearly, and in his commentaries on Genesis, Isaiah, and the Psalms we are never long unreminded of it. Thus in Ps. 2 "the kings of the earth" are Herod and Pilate; Christ speaks of the church in "my holy hill of Zion"; the "rod of Iron" is the gospel, an opinion which he labors to illustrate with allegorical detail.⁵²

Luther frequently expresses a preference for the grammatico-historical interpretation, or literal sense, but it would be a basic error to suppose that he was always content to follow it. Indeed we find him often quite hospitable to the stock allegories of the fathers, and fertile ⁴⁸ Works of Martin Luther, tr. C. M. Jacobs (Philadelphia: Muhlenberg Press, 1932), VI, 453. Original in Luther's Werke, Weimar edition, Deutsche Bible, VII (1931), 12.

⁴⁹ Letter to Eoban Hess, March 29, 1523. Werke, Weimar edition, Luthers Briefwechsel, III, 50.
⁵⁰ Werke, Weimar edition, Tischreden, V, 397 (No. 5904).
⁵¹ Ibid., II, 439 (No. 2383).
⁵² Werke, Weimar edition, V, 47 ff.

in inventing his own. There are sections of his commentaries that are surprisingly medieval in this respect. In his Lectures on Genesis (1535-45) he inserts (at ch. 9) a disquisition on allegories and his use of them. He had been led, he tells us, into allegorical interpretations by Origen, Jerome, and Augustine, but finding that he was following a vain shadow, began to detest allegories. Müntzer and the Anabaptists have been wrong in turning everything into allegory. Allegories are to be permitted only if they observe the analogy of faith. Some of the fathers leave out faith; and it is rash impudence and ambition to assert papal supremacy on the allegory of the sun and moon. When Luther here adopts from the ancients the view that the ark of Noah typifies Christ, with whom we are saved from the flood, and points with approval to their observation that the ark like the human body is six times as long as it is wide, we fear that he is still pursuing the "shadow." But he sums up his thought on the subject in a lucid and revealing statement:

I have often said what theology was when I entered upon this kind of study. They used to say, "The letter killeth" (II Cor. 3:6). Therefore I disliked Lyra most of all interpreters because he followed so diligently the literal meaning. But now, in commendation of this very thing, I prefer him to almost all interpreters of Scripture. And I admonish you with the utmost earnestness, seek to be diligent in appraising historical matters. But if ever you wish to use allegory, do so observing the analogy of faith; that is, accommodate it to Christ, the church, faith, and the ministry of the Word.⁵⁴

Despite inconsistencies and traditional and unfruitful interpretations, Luther's powerful mind produced a new and vitalizing presentation of scripture in which the Old Testament is made to support the teaching of the New. In his doctrine of salvation the law, nevertheless, stands in dramatic antithesis to the gospel: it convinces us of sin, for which the gospel offers forgiveness. Thus the whole Bible becomes significant as a testimony to those central convictions that he regards as the essentials of Christianity. Luther's theology dominates his evaluation of the scripture books. He feels free to hold certain of them in far higher esteem than others. In the ⁵⁴ Werke, Weimar edition, XLII, 377. Luther has here indicated broadly what he means by the "analogy of faith," a term employed by Augustine. In Rom. 12:6, κατὰ τὴν ἀναλογίαν τῆς πίστεως, certainly a different sense is intended than that understood in hermeneutics. In the latter the term was used as a cable by which interpretation could be moored to orthodox belief. On the progress of Luther's thought concerning the senses of scripture there are some valuable pages in J. M. Reu, Luther's German Bible (Columbus, Ohio: Lutheran Book Concern, 1934), pp. 124 ff.

New Testament itself he has little use for James and Revelation, since they fail to supply corroboration of the gospel as he understands it. According to a passage in the Table Talk, it was his habit to read the Bible through twice a year.⁵⁴ At any rate, he was completely familiar with all of it. With great readiness he can match passage with passage. His sermons flash with insights that are the fruits of eager study and reveal the resources of scripture for the Christian life.

B. John Calvin.—Calvin's masterly knowledge of the language and thought of the Bible is the key to his power as a theologian. His commentaries form the major portion of his writings; and virtually all his treatises proceed by a series of references to scripture passages. He omitted from formal exposition only one book of the New Testament and eight of the Old. He makes some use of every scripture book, though he almost completely neglects the Song of Songs and Revelation. Of the latter he is reported to have said that he was totally unable to find its meaning.⁵⁵ In the Institutes he quotes the New Testament 3,098 times, the Old 1,755 times.⁵⁶ Henri Clavier, in a careful examination of Calvin's biblicism, finds a distinction between the Word and the Scripture. The Word is God's communication of himself: in the Scripture it becomes precise.⁵⁷ For Calvin, as for Aquinas, "the Author of Scripture is God": he affirms its "complete credit and authority." He would like to assert the inerrancy of the Scriptures, but in fact admits minor errors. In Eph. 4:8 Paul misquotes Ps. 68:18, even seeming to reverse the psalmist's meaning. Calvin argues that the apostle is not repeating the words but pursuing the matter itself, and he uses other verses of the psalm to enforce his point.⁵⁸ From Ps. 8:6 and Heb. 2:7 "we see with what freedom the apostles permitted themselves to quote scripture passages."⁵⁹ The apostles were not so scrupulous (in quotations) as to decline to accommodate their language to the uninformed.⁶⁰ Praiseworthy as is the teaching of II Peter, its inferior style may be explained on the ground that the apostle in his old age dictated it to some disciple.⁶¹ Classical authors are employed to give perspective on the lan-

⁵⁴ Tischreden, II, 244 (No. 1877).

⁵⁵ Jean Bodin, Method for the Easy Comprehension of History, tr. Beatrice Reynolds (New York: Columbia University Press, 1945), p. 291.

⁵⁶ Henri Clavier, Études sur le calvinisme (Paris: Fischbacher, 1936), p. 87.

⁵⁷ Ibid., p. 108.

⁵⁸ Opera, Corpus Reformatorum (Brunsvig: C. A. Schwitschke, 1863), LI, 194.

⁵⁹ Ibid., XXXI, 92.

⁶⁰ Ibid., LV, 159. On Heb. 11:21.

⁶¹ Ibid., LV, 441.

MEDIEVAL AND REFORMATION PERIOD

guage of scripture. For example, on καλοῦ ἔργου in I Tim. 3:1 he remarks:

I doubt not that he alludes to the ancient Greek proverb, often quoted by Plato, δύσκολα τὰ καλά, which means in Greek, "Those things that are beautiful (pulchra) are also arduous and difficult."⁶²

Thus, he is sometimes led, though not willingly, to the view that it is not the letter of scripture, but the substance of doctrine in it, that is verbum Dei. His oft-quoted designation of the apostles as "authentic amanuenses of the Holy Spirit,"⁶³ and his statement that the Scriptures are "given to us by the very mouth of God"⁶⁴ must be read in the light of his commentaries, which exhibit no such assumption of verbal infallibility as these words seem to imply. The Bible authors are inspired indeed; they are inspired personalities writing out of their conscious experiences and in historic settings that are significant to the interpreter.

In his handling of scripture Calvin habitually draws together both Testaments. So much is this the case that many expounders of his thought have overlooked his repeated affirmations of a progressive revelation in the Bible. God, Calvin argues, has employed an order and economy in dispensing his covenant of mercy, making additional revelations "from day to day." The promise to Adam was as a feeble spark; the light enlarged in course of time until the coming of Christ, the Sun of Righteousness, who illumined the whole world.⁶⁵ Calvin sometimes represents Bible writers as accommodating their messages to the mental capacities of their original readers. Thus Moses in Gen. 1:16 implies that the moon is next in size to the sun among the heavenly bodies. Astronomy, in denying this, is not to be reprobated, nor did Moses mean to condemn that admirable science. But he was a teacher of uneducated people, and descended to the level of their understanding. Meanwhile the splendor of moonlight should teach us the beneficence of God.⁶⁶ Calvin presents at length the evidence of "the superior excellence of the New Testament over the

⁶² Ibid., LII, 279.

⁶³ Institutes, IV, 8, 9.

⁶⁴ Ibid., I, 7, 5. But compare his Homilies on I Samuel, Homily 42, where prophets and pastors in the church are referred to as "the very mouth of God." Opera, XXIX, 705.

⁶⁵ Institutes, II 10, 20; II, 2-5; cf. P. T. Fuhrmann, God-Centered Religion (Grand Rapids: Zondervan Publishing House, 1942), p. 84.

⁶⁶ Opera, XXIII, 22. There is a very similar passage in Aquinas (Summa Theologica, Part I, question 68, Art. 3): "But it is to be borne in mind that Moses was speaking to a rude people [rudi populo loquebatur] and, to condescend to their weak capacity, he set forth to them only what was clearly apparent to their senses [sensui manifeste apparuit]."

Old."⁶⁷ But he links the two intimately, and sometimes overstates the Christian element in the Old Testament, while on the other hand he sometimes employs the harsher passages of the early books to the detriment of the doctrine of grace.⁶⁸ Furthermore, he uses typology to mark the relationship between the Old Covenant and the New; for instance, in making the land of Canaan a figure of the eternal inheritance.⁶⁹ Apart from this discovery of "types" of the gospel in the rites and narratives of the Old Testament, he is firm in his avoidance of nonliteral meanings. Where it is necessary to explain a manifest allegory in the text, he handles the matter with circumspect precision, and minimizes the allegorical element. In his commentary on Galatians he points out that ever since the early fathers, men have by allegory "changed into curious shapes the sacred Word." Here he states that "the true meaning of scripture is the natural and obvious meaning"; to it we ought to adhere firmly. Paul, when in Gal. 4:22-25 he allegorizes Gen. 16, does not imply that Moses wrote with the purpose that his history should be turned into allegory.⁷⁰ Calvin objects to the traditional "frigid" interpretation that would identify the four chariots of Zech. 6:1-3 with the four Gospels.⁷¹ On the use of Isaiah's Trisagion (6:3) as an argument to quell the Arians, he remarks stiffly: "I should prefer to employ firmer evidence."⁷²

In the preface to his first commentary (Romans, 1539), Calvin reminds his friend Grynaeus of a conversation in which the two had discussed the qualities needed in an exegete. They had agreed that these were clearness and brevity, and that it was "his particular duty to exhibit the spirit of the writer." Calvin was not forgetful of these principles. "Brevity" is a relative term, but though his commentaries are extensive, they are written with economy of language. What is attempted is a searching out of the meaning of the text, as the scripture writer understood it. The resources of humanistic learning are employed, historical data are freely used, and at points of difficulty the opinions of earlier commentators are sifted. Doctrinal interest is keen, and we are made aware of what has been referred to above as the "analogy of faith." For Calvin this calls

⁶⁷ Institutes II, 11, 12. The treatment of this point by Rupert E. Davies, The Problem of Authority in the Continental Reformers (London: Epworth Press, 1946), pp. 111 ff., tends to minimize the differences noted by Calvin.

⁶⁸ See e.g., his Commentary on Joshua, 10:18; Opera, XXV, 502.

⁶⁹ Institutes II, 11, 1-4.

⁷⁰ Opera, L, 237.

⁷¹ Ibid., XLIV, 202.

⁷² Ibid., XXXVI, 129.

forth a great emphasis upon the scripture testimony to the sovereignty of God, and an exaggeration of the arguments for predestination. But this does not eclipse the objective of a clear understanding of the writer's meaning. In order to appreciate Calvin's commentaries one does not have to subscribe to his entire theology. Indeed, F. A. G. Tholuck remarks that he "is by no means solicitous to insist, in all cases, and with zeal, upon that meaning which tends most to the confirmation of Christian truths."⁷³ We may say that he follows the clues like a detective, until he is assured that he possesses the writer's secret. Philological and other aids are subordinated to the one purpose, the discovery and elucidation of the message. This is of course presented as in essence a divine message, with a bearing upon all history, and upon the reader's life. The task that he sets himself is by no means merely a verbal exercise. He keeps in view the book as a whole, the Scriptures as a whole, and to some degree the body of human thought. He can sum up the teaching of Romans in a sentence: "There is only one righteousness for men, the mercy of God in Christ; and this offered through the gospel is received by faith."⁷⁴ But if necessary, he will wrestle with a word through three paragraphs. He believes that at the best a "partial ignorance" will remain. Besides, no accumulation of rational argument without "the inward testimony of the Holy Spirit" can accredit the Scriptures to the reader.⁷⁵ It is "the spirit of the writer" that is to be discovered, and the Holy Spirit that inspired him to write must guide the inquirer. In one place Calvin remarks that the Holy Spirit is not mistakenly called "a spirit of discernment [discretionis]."⁷⁶ If we bear in mind the sweep of his conception, we may apply to Calvin's interpretation of scripture the canon of J. A. Ernesti: "Interpretation is the art of teaching the real sentiment contained in any form of words, or of effecting that another may derive from them the same idea that the writer intended to convey."⁷⁷

C. Other Reformation Interpreters.—On the Continent, scripture commentaries were numerous in the sixteenth century. Those of Melancthon, Bucer, Zwingli, Oecolampadius, and Bullinger won the measured approval of Calvin. He thought Melancthon too selective, Bucer too elaborate, Zwingli too discursive, ⁷³ "Calvin as an Interpreter of Holy Scripture" (1831), in Calvin, Commentary on Joshua, tr. Henry Beveridge (Edinburgh: Calvin Translation Society, 1854), p. 350.

⁷⁴ Opera, XLIX, 1.

⁷⁵ Institutes I. 7. 4.

⁷⁶ Opera, XLVIII, 401. On Acts 17:11.

⁷⁷ Principles of Biblical Interpretation, tr. C. H. Terrot (Edinburgh: Thomas Clark, 1832), I, 6.

Oecolampadius and Bullinger nearer to his own ideal.⁷⁸ The prodigiously productive pen of Matthias Flacius, in his Key to Scripture (1567), carried forward Lutheran biblical scholarship and urged fresh labor on the historical meaning of the text.⁷⁹ In England and Scotland the vernacular Bible flourished but few commentaries were written in the sixteenth century. Luther's views were reflected in Tyndale's prefaces. In a treatise of 1528 Tyndale states that "Scripture hath but one sense, which is the literal sense," and that the explanation of its "proverbs, similitudes, riddles, and allegories" falls within literal interpretation.⁸⁰ Anglicans of the period generally adopt this conception. Jewel's (posthumous) Commentary on I and II Thessalonians offers a good example of this method. In his Treatise on Holy Scripture (1570) Jewel stresses the simplicity of most of the Bible and its unique instructional value even for untrained minds.⁸¹ William Whitaker, in a learned treatise, reiterates Tyndale's position just noted, and enforces the reformers' contention for the unique authority and sufficiency of the Scriptures.⁸² Negatively applying a rigorous doctrine of scripture authority, Thomas Cartwright and the Elizabethan Puritans rejected all nonscriptural elements in Anglican worship and polity. Hooker assailed this position, and advanced the claims of reason. He holds that the perfection of scripture is limited by the purpose for which it is given. Not every act which it does not enjoin is sin. Hooker is dissatisfied with Calvin's teaching that scripture is authenticated only by the inward witness of the Spirit: too much is thereby left to private waywardness. We should test by reason what we are taught by the Spirit.⁸³ In his view that church polity is not prescribed in the Scriptures, and therefore mutable, Hooker is on the same ground as Luther: his subjection of interpretation to "reason" would have alarmed Luther and links him with later critical interpreters.⁸⁴

⁷⁸ Preface to Romans cited above, and letter to Viret, May 19, 1540.

⁷⁹ Clavis Scripturae Sacrae, Antwerp, 1567; cf. Wilhelm Preger's chapter on this work, Matthias Flacius Illyricus und seine Zeit (Erlangen: Theodor Blasing, 1859), pp 478-91.

⁸⁰ Doctrinal Treatises of William Tyndale. Parker Society Publications (Cambridge: University Press, 1848), XLII, 304.

⁸¹ Works of John Jewel, Vol. IV. Parker Society Publications (Cambridge: University Press, 1850), XXVI, 1162-88.

⁸² A Disputation on the Holy Scripture, 1588. Tr. William Fitzgerald, Parker Society Publications (Cambridge: University Press, 1849), XLV. See especially p. 405.

⁸³ Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity II. 4; III. 7.

⁸⁴ A selected bibliography on the history of biblical interpretation will be found on p. 141. Editors.

HISTORY OF THE INTERPRETATION OF THE BIBLE

III. MODERN PERIOD

by SAMUEL TERRIEN

- I. The Rise of Biblical Criticism (ca. 1650-1800)
 - A. Textual and Philological Research
 - B. The Rationalistic Principle of Interpretation
 - C. The Beginnings of Literary Analysis
 - D. The Deists' Explanations of Jesus
 - E. The Historical Approach to the New Testament
 - F. A New Appreciation of Hebrew Poetry
- II. Literary and Historical Achievements (1800-1925)
 - A. The Search for the "Jesus of History"
 - B. The Graf-Wellhausen School of Old Testament Criticism
 - C. New Sources of Knowledge
 - D. Modern Methods of Interpretation
- III. Biblical Exegesis at the Mid-Century (1925-1950)
 - A. Trends in Old Testament Study
 - B. New Testament Criticism in Transition
 - C. Toward the Formulation of a Biblical Theology
 - D. Discussions on Hermeneutics
- IV. Selected Bibliography

While Luther and Calvin in their respective ways approached the biblical text with a freedom and a critical acumen that were exceptional for their time, they did not concern themselves primarily with the literary and historical problems which are related to the scriptural documents themselves. Although the Protestant Reformation spurred in every land an unprecedented interest in the Bible, the dogmatic intolerance of the post-Reformation period was not favorable to the development of biblical studies. Energies of the Protestant divines were diverted into struggles for survival, as in France, or were spent in the most bitter controversies over doctrinal, ecclesiastical, and political matters, as in Switzerland, the Netherlands, the German states, England, and Scotland. In countries dominated by Roman Catholic power the canons of the Council of Trent (1546) made it clear that any interpretation of scripture had to be tightly fitted into the Procrustean bed of the official dogma.

Ever since the early days of the Renaissance, however, revolutionary ideas were in the air, and their force was bound to meet and ultimately to strike at the authority of the Bible itself. In the long run their impact had not only a destructive but also an unexpectedly constructive effect. It handed back the Bible to man and taught him how to recognize its uniqueness and its relevance.

I. The Rise of Biblical Criticism (ca. 1650-1800)

Three cultural developments have ushered in the modern period of biblical interpretation.

In the first place, the Ptolemaic conception of the universe, which had been quite satisfactorily harmonized with the biblical cosmogony, was undermined by the geographical discoveries of the Portuguese and others, and also by the astronomical observations of Copernicus (1473-1543), whose theory of the heliocentricity of the planetary movements was condemned by the pope as contrary to scripture. The various contributions of Giordano Bruno (1550-1600), Kepler (1571-1630) and Galileo (1564-1642) led in due course to the theory of universal gravitation as formulated by Newton (1642-1727). Thus, the natural scientists turned away from biblical teaching, and biblical interpreters could no longer claim with intellectual integrity that the Bible provided a scientifically accurate picture of the cosmos.

In the second place, the humanists' boldness in investigating the text, composition, and authorship of the ancient documents, as initiated by Lorenzo Valla's devastating work on the so-called "Donation of Constantine" (1440), received a new impulse from the epistemological reflections of philosophers like Bacon (1561-1626) and Descartes (1596-1650). The use of the experimental method, together with the dawn of rationalism, soon influenced the minds of the biblical interpreters themselves.

In the third place, the very intransigency of Lutheran and Calvinistic scholasticism produced exegetical reactions like those of Arminius (1560-1609), Grotius (1583-1645), Calixtus (1586-1656), and others, who in various ways doubted that the dogmatic orthodoxy of their time was based upon a correct appreciation of the scriptural meaning. Likewise, the mysticism of Böhme (1575-1624), the pietism of Spener (1635-1705), together with the stress laid by Cocceius (1603-69) on the progressive character of revelation, these and other factors played their respective parts in unshackling the minds of Protestant theologians from the strait jacket of bibliolatry. For more than three centuries thereafter, scholars have wrestled with the numerous problems of text, composition, sources, date, and occasion of the biblical books. Such investigations may have appeared at times to be irrelevant; yet they were indispensable to the task of interpretation.

A. Textual and Philological Research.—The emergence of the new era was marked by first attempts at discovering the exact wording and meaning of the scriptural text. In 1538, Elijah ben Asher (Elias Levita) had shocked the scholarly world by proving conclusively that the vowel points and accents of the Hebrew Bible were of considerably later date than the fixation of the consonantal text, none of them earlier than the sixth century A.D.² Several Protestant Hebraists, such as William Fulke (1538-89), John Lightfoot (1602-75), and John Owen (1616-83), accepted the thesis of ben Asher as valid and yet, like him, they continued to believe in the verbal inspiration of both Masoretic text and pointing. Others, such as Johannes Piscator (1546-1625) and Johannes Buxtorf the Elder (1564-1629), vainly tried to defend the high antiquity of the pointing. With courage and integrity, however, Louis Cappel (1585-1658), against the strong opposition of his co-religionists, succeeded in proving not only that the chronological conclusions of ben Asher were correct, but also that the consonantal text itself was far from reliable.² On the ground of his study of the Qeré and Kethibh, of the Oriental and Occidental texts, of the Samaritan Pentateuch, of the Septuagint version, of the Old Testament quotations in the New Testament, and so forth, Cappel deserves to be called the first textual critic of the Old Testament; in addition, his work considerably influenced the literary critics of subsequent generations.

² Massóreth hammassóreth (Venice, 1538).

A similar type of investigation was taking place at the same time in the field of New Testament scholarship. The first editions of the Greek text by Erasmus (1516), Ximenes ("Complutensian," 1522), and Simon de Colines (1534) revealed the fact that the various manuscripts differed widely among themselves. Robert Estienne, in his third edition of the Greek text (1551), collated for the first time not only variants from the fourth (1527) and fifth (1535) editions of Erasmus' Greek New Testament, together with the marginal readings of the Complutensian, but also the witness of fifteen manuscripts. In addition, Theodore of Beza utilized in his numerous editions of the Greek text (1565, etc.) the witness of several ancient versions, and Lucas Brugensis (1580) noted the importance of the citations of the New Testament found in the patristic literature. The wide acceptance of the Textus Receptus (an expression which in England referred to the 1550 edition of Estienne and in continental Europe to the 1663 edition of the Elzevir brothers) somewhat retarded the development of New Testament textual criticism, but the appearance in England of the Codex Alexandrinus (1628) provided a new impulse, and the contributions of Brian Walton (1657), Etienne Courcelles (1658), John Fell (1675), and especially John Mill (1707), prepared the ground for scientific attempts to recapture as accurately as possible the wording of the original text.

The development of textual criticism, which raised in the fields of both Old and New Testament problems of a specific and quite unrelated nature, profoundly impressed the minds of biblical interpreters, and not only destroyed belief in verbal inspiration but also opened the way to an empirical investigation into the authorship, date, composition, and meaning of each of the biblical books.

B. The Rationalistic Principle of Interpretation.—It is significant that an independent approach to the interpretation of the Bible was initiated not by biblical interpreters themselves, but by political philosophers like Hobbes and Spinoza.

² See especially Arcanum Punctuationis Revelatum (Leiden, 1623); Diatriba de Veris et Antiquis Hebraeorum Litteris (Amsterdam, 1645); Critica Sacra (Paris, 1650); Epistola Apologetica (Saumur, 1651).

In his Leviathan (1651), Thomas Hobbes implied that the Bible was not the Word of God but merely contained the record of some men who had been inspired by God. He wrote:

When God speaketh to man, it must be either immediately; or by mediation of another man, to whom he had formerly spoken by himself immediately. How God speaketh to a man immediately, may be understood by those well enough, to whom he hath so spoken; but how the same should be understood by another, is hard, if not impossible to know. For if a man pretend to me, that God hath spoken to him supernaturally, and immediately, and I make doubt of it, I cannot easily perceive what argument he can produce, to oblige me to believe it. . . . For to say that God hath spoken to him in the Holy Scripture, is not to say God hath spoken to him immediately, but by mediation of the Prophets, or of the Apostles, or of the Church, in such manner as he speaks to all other Christian men. . . . How then can he, to whom God hath never revealed his Will immediately (saving by the way of natural reason) know when he is to obey, or not to obey his Word, delivered by him, that says he is a Prophet?³

In using such language, Hobbes was in fact denying the theological authority of Scripture as it was then understood, and he was also formulating a rationalistic and subjective principle of interpretation. He still maintained that the canon referred to "the Rules of Christian life" (ch. xxxiii), but he was interested more in the relationship which should exist between the Bible and "a Christian Commonwealth" than in the biblical basis of Christian faith. However, the exegesis of Hobbes was often penetrating, as revealed, for instance, by his analysis of faith and obedience in their relation to salvation (ch. xliii) or by his statement that the immortality of the soul is a category of grace and not of nature (ch. xlv). On literary and historical matters he displayed a certain degree of independence when he expressed skepticism over the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch in its present form (ch. xxxiii); but on the whole he was traditionally conservative. "I see not . . . any reason to doubt, but that the Old, and New Testament, as we have them now, are the true Registers of those things, which were done and said by the Prophets, and Apostles."⁴

Baruch Spinoza, in his famous Tractatus Theologico-Politicus (1670), attempted to liberate the field of philosophical endeavor from the claims of theologians and to examine critically the way in which Christian dogmatists used the Bible in order to bolster their doctrinal speculations.

I grant that they are never tired of professing their wonder at the profound mysteries of Holy Writ; still I cannot discover that they teach anything but speculations of Platonists and Aristotelians, to which (in order to save their credit for Christianity) they have made Holy Writ conform; . . . showing conclusively, that never even in sleep have they caught a glimpse of Scripture's Divine nature. . . . Their belief in the Bible is a formal assent rather than a living faith.⁵

Thereupon, Spinoza pleaded for a right understanding of Scripture, which cannot be obtained without a careful examination and close criticism of the text, and is identical with our natural understanding. He concluded, "I found nothing taught expressly by Scripture, which does not agree with our understanding. . . . I became thoroughly convinced that the Bible leaves reason absolutely free."⁶ In order to grasp the thought of the Bible, the interpreter must look at any biblical book exactly as a naturalist observes the phenomena of nature, and when he has obtained every possible bit of information concerning its date, authorship, composition, occasion, and purpose of writing, he must then proceed to seek the sense of the words themselves without asking whether or not they express an acceptable truth. Man must listen to Scripture rather than appeal to it.

Although Spinoza's strictly rationalistic presuppositions constitute obvious limitations to his exegetical method and achievements, one must admit that a great many of his reflections are still valid in our time. Indeed, some of his remarks, such as those on the characteristics of Hebrew expression, and on the importance of understanding Hebrew manners of speech in order to interpret correctly not only the Old Testament but also the New Testament, are not yet fully appreciated.

Like Hobbes, Spinoza discussed freely the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch; he also examined objectively the literary incoherencies, historical contradictions, and especially the chronological difficulties of Genesis. But he was not merely a rationalistic exegete.

Those who look upon the Bible as a message sent down by God from Heaven to men, will doubtless cry out that I have committed the sin against the Holy Ghost because I have asserted that the Word of God is faulty, mutilated, tampered with, and inconsistent; that we possess it only in fragments, and that the original of the covenant which

³ Reprinted from ed. of 1651 (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1909), pp. 287-88.

⁴ Ibid., p. 298.

⁵ The Chief Works of Benedict de Spinoza, tr. R. H. M. Elwes (London: George Bell & Sons, 1883), I, 7-8.

⁶ Ibid., I, 9.

God made with the Jews has been lost. However, I have no doubt that a little reflection will cause them to desist from their uproar: for not only reason but the expressed opinions of prophets and apostles openly proclaim that God's eternal Word and covenant, no less than true religion, is Divinely inscribed in human hearts, that is, in the human mind, and that this is the true original of God's covenant, stamped with His own seal, namely, the idea of Himself, as it were, with the image of His Godhood.⁷

One may detect a certain element of philosophical naïveté and of theological shallowness in such a statement, but one must recognize at the same time that there is in it no trace of prejudice or hostility.

C. The Beginnings of Literary Analysis.—Four years after the publication of Leviathan there appeared anonymously a pamphlet called Prae-adamitae (1655), in which the bold thesis was presented that mankind had been created long before Adam, and that the Pentateuch was the work of more than one author. Isaac de la Peyrère, who later acknowledged authorship, was arrested by the Inquisition, and his book was publicly burned. But his ideas were not forgotten. In the subsequent generation the French Oratorian, Richard Simon, became the true father of biblical criticism. Theologically conservative, Simon did not attack the traditional views of revelation, but in a series of scholarly treatises⁸ he applied to the whole of Scripture the hermeneutic principles of Spinoza, and he claimed the right to investigate the Bible as one looks at any other literary piece of the ancient world.

None can doubt but that the truths contained in the Holy Scripture are infallible and of Divine authority; since they proceed immediately from God, who in this has onely made use of the ministry of Men to be his Interpreters. So there is no person either Jew or Christian, who does not acknowledge that the Scripture being the pure word of God, is at the same time the first principle and foundation of Religion. But as Men have been the Depositories of these sacred Books, as well as all others, and their first Originals have been lost, it was in some sort impossible, but that there must needs happen some changes, as well by reason of the length of time, as the carelessness of Transcribers.⁹

Thus, the study of the additions or corrections which may have been made in the original

⁷ Ibid., I, 165.

⁸ Histoire critique du Vieux Testament (Paris, 1678); Histoire critique du texte du Nouveau Testament (Rotterdam, 1689); Histoire critique des principaux commentateurs du Nouveau Testament (Rotterdam, 1689); and Nouvelles observations sur le texte et les versions du Nouveau Testament (Paris, 1695).

⁹ A Critical History of the Old Testament (London: Jacob Tonson, 1682), pp. 1-2.

writings is legitimate, although Simon insisted that these "alterations . . . are of as great Authority as the rest of the Text," and that "Spinoza has shown his ignorance, or rather malice in crying down the Authority of the Pentateuch, by reason of some alterations . . . therein, without considering the quality of the Authors of these alterations."¹⁰

Simon's purpose was mainly to study the Bible with objectivity. "As for the Writers of our times, whether Catholic or Protestant, I have found none that are wholly free from prejudice." Although he was not strictly speaking a biblical interpreter, he considerably influenced subsequent exegetes, and many of his views have been vindicated. For instance, he concluded rightly that the Old Testament did not receive its present form until after the Exile, and he defended the Hellenistic idiom of the New Testament against the attacks of the Greek purists.

The name of Richard Bentley deserves mention, for his Dissertations upon the Epistles of Phalaris (1699) taught biblical scholars how to apply with the strictest method the principle of internal evidence—the principle according to which characteristics of a document are induced from the observation of its contradictions, chronological allusions, literary inconsistencies, and the like. That principle had already been employed, perhaps unwittingly, by Vitringa in his Observationes sacrae (1683), and received notoriety when Henning Witter separated the two stories of creation in Gen. 1-2 by recognizing the presence of repetitions and contradictions within the two chapters, and the use of different names for designating the deity (see article "The Growth of the Hexateuch," pp. 188-90).

The same observation on the alternation of the names YHWH and Elohim was one of the clues which led the physician Jean Astruc to distinguish in Genesis two main sources, two secondary sources, and the traces of about twelve other documents.¹¹ Although many of Astruc's hypotheses were later abandoned, he must receive credit for initiating the documentary theory of Pentateuchal composition.

In spite of his claims to originality, Johann Eichhorn¹² was dependent upon Astruc's discoveries,¹³ and probably also upon the lectures of ¹⁰ Ibid., preface.

¹¹ Conjectures sur les mémoires originaux dont il parolt que Moyse s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genèse (Bruxelles: Fricx, 1753). The book appeared anonymously.

¹² "Ueber Mosis Nachrichten von der Noachischen Fluth," Repertorium für Biblische und Morgenländische Litteratur, V (1779), 188.

¹³ See discussion of Adolphe Lods, "Astruc et la critique biblique de son temps," Revue d'Histoire et de Philosophie Religieuses, IV (1924), 222 ff.

Johann Michaelis, his own teacher at Göttingen. Nevertheless, Eichhorn's work was epoch-making in the field of literary criticism.¹⁴ At the same time, Johann Semler, who was not only a literary critic but also a perceptive and extremely versatile historian, recognized the historical nature of the development of the canon,¹⁵ and anticipated the historical method of the nineteenth century by insisting on the importance of circumstantial environment for the correct exegesis of the biblical books.

D. The Deists' Explanations of Jesus.—Meanwhile, some of the English deists had attempted to explain the life and teaching of Jesus according to their views of "natural religion." Thomas Woolston (1670-1733) dismissed many of the miracle narratives as "most romantick tales." His purpose was clearly stated: "I will shew, that the Miracles of healing all manner of bodily Diseases, which Jesus was justly famed for, are none of the proper Miracles of the Messiah, nor are they so much as a good Proof of Jesus's divine Authority to found and introduce a Religion into the World."¹⁶ His comments on the resurrection narratives anticipated the rationalistic interpretations of Hermann Samuel Reimarus, whose work was first published by Lessing as Fragmente des wolfenbüttelschen Ungenannten in 1774-78. Lessing himself in Nathan der Weise (1779) sought to be objective and made pertinent remarks on the oral tradition which preceded the written Gospels, but he did not penetrate very far in his attempts to understand "the religion of Christ" as opposed to "the Christian religion." Many of the exegetical treatises of this period reflect the age of the Enlightenment, when faith was deemed to be irreconcilable with reason. It would be wrong to assume however that all the interpreters of the eighteenth century were representatives of the deistic and rationalistic trends.

E. The Historical Approach to the New Testament.—Already in 1730 Johann Wettstein, who had been under the influence of Richard Bentley in Cambridge, published anonymously his Prolegomena ad Novi Testamenti graeci editionem accuratissimam (Amsterdam, 1730), and finally the Greek text of the New Testament (Amsterdam, 1751-52). In addition to his significant contribution to textual criticism, he expressed in his Libelli ad Crisim atque Interpretationem Novi Testamenti brilliant views on the importance of the historical environment for the correct understanding of Jesus and of the apostles. He held that scriptural interpretation should always respect the thinking habits and the linguistic peculiarities of writers contemporary with the authors of the books under investigation, and that the exegesis of the Gospels is greatly helped by the study of the rabbinical literature.

¹⁴ Einleitung ins Alte Testament (Leipzig, 1770-73).

¹⁵ Abhandlung von freier Untersuchung des Canon (Halle, 1771-76).

¹⁶ A Discourse on the Miracles of Our Saviour (6th ed.; London: Printed for the Author, 1729), p. 7.

Like Wettstein, J. A. Bengel was a historical interpreter. The influence of Pietism had made him reject the wooden exegesis of dogmatic orthodoxy, but he was not a rationalist. He attempted to penetrate to the human warmth and the inner life of the biblical writers themselves. His Gnomon Novi Testamenti in quo ex nativa verborum vi simplicitas, profunditas, concinnitas, salubritas sensuum coelestium indicatur (1742), which influenced John Wesley's Notes on the New Testament (1755), is a work of merit based on strict textual and philological research and animated by a profound devotion to Christian faith.

F. A New Appreciation of Hebrew Poetry.—While the seventeenth-century scholastics looked at the Bible only from a dogmatic point of view and most of the eighteenth-century exegetes were concerned chiefly with matters of text, literary composition, and rationalistic explanations of scripture, a few men began to realize that a great deal of the Old Testament was written in a poetic style, and that an exegetical method which might be adequate for the prose sections of the Bible should be considered inadequate for the interpretation of the poetic books.

As early as 1753, Robert Lowth, bishop of London, opened a new path in this hitherto neglected field with his De Sacra Poesi Hebraeorum.¹⁷ Although Lowth may conceivably have been prejudiced in his approach by a profound knowledge of Greek and Latin poetry, he grasped amazingly well not only the technical aspects of Hebrew prosody, especially the use of parallelism, but also the spirit of the Hebrew poetic idiom. He appreciated "the sublime of [its] passion"; he recognized "the peculiar characters of the different prophets";¹⁸ in brief, he led the way to the historical concreteness which characterized biblical exegesis subsequently.

It was Johann Gottfried von Herder, nevertheless, who made in this domain the most outstanding contribution,¹⁹ for he showed that the Hebrew tongue was essentially a poetic medium of expression and that even the so-called prose books of the Bible had to be read as poetically written. His analysis of the traditions of Genesis or of the story of Jonah, in this respect, steers subtly away from traditional literalism without moving recklessly toward the rocks of rationalistic subjectivism. In spite of some exegetical limitations due to his illusions on human nature, Herder may still teach a great deal to biblical interpreters who have not begun to understand the deep interweaving which unites theological formulation and poetic diction. In addition, Herder's relationship to the romantic movement enabled him to appreciate the culture of the ancient Near East as it was known in his time and this made him a forerunner of the twentieth-century "school of comparative religion."

¹⁷ English tr., Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (London, 1787).

¹⁸ See his Isaiah, A New Translation (London, 1778).

¹⁹ Vom Geist der Ebräischen Poesie (1782-83); tr. James Marsh, The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry (Burlington: E. Smith, 1833).

II. Literary and Historical Achievements (1800-1925)

Theological thinking generally, and biblical interpretation particularly, at least as far as the New Testament is concerned, were dominated for many decades of the nineteenth century by the influence of Friedrich Schleiermacher, who combined in a subjective synthesis rationalistic principles of exegesis with a Christocentric faith. As the deists had done, Schleiermacher rejected the uniqueness of the Bible, both as a monument of literature and as the authority for theological formulation. He noted that after the first bloom of Christianity had withered, the sacred scriptures . . . were regarded as a finished codex of religion. . . . All who still feel the life of religion in themselves or perceive it in others, have ever protested against this unchristian proceeding. The sacred scriptures have, by their native power, become a bible, and forbid no other book to be or to become a bible. Anything written with like power they would willingly allow to be associated with themselves.²⁰

Biblical authority is thus superseded by "that which flows immediately from the person of Jesus Christ." Unfortunately, Schleiermacher's view of Jesus, as shown by his posthumously published Leben Jesu (1864), was chiefly a rationalistic truncation of the gospel record, in the line of the interpretation of Reimarus, and in some respects quite similar to that of Paulus (1828). Schleiermacher's theology was largely responsible for initiating "the quest for the historical Jesus." At the same time, his neglect and almost total ignorance of Old Testament religion and revelation²¹ may be one of the causes for which nineteenth-century interpreters allowed the Old Testament to stand at the periphery of their preoccupations and left it to the literary critics.

²⁰ Reden über die Religion (Berlin, 1799); tr. John Oman, On Religion (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co., 1893), p. 249.

²¹ See, e.g., the paucity of his remarks on the "biblical account of creation" (Der Christliche Glaube [1821-22], §40), or the prejudiced character of his views on the "Mosaic Law" as part of the "divine economy of salvation" (ibid., §13).

A. The Search for the "Jesus of History."—Although an erudite exegete like Wilhelm de Wette had warned that any attempt to seek a chronological and psychological structure in the life of Jesus was bound to end in failure on account of the very nature of the available sources, the biographical approach flourished almost until the middle of the twentieth century. Perhaps the amazing success of David Strauss's Leben Jesu (1835) is chiefly responsible for the emergence of this trend. Strauss's representation of Jesus as a wise man is the result of rationalistic oversimplification, but many of his views are remarkably sound and have become widely accepted. He understood the motives which played a part in the growth of the gospel tradition and the principle of selection by which some details rather than others were kept alive and amplified in the memory of the early Christians. He clearly saw the differences which separate the Synoptics from the Fourth Gospel, and he rightly observed the eschatological aspect of the teaching of Jesus. In many ways Strauss anticipated the work of twentieth-century critics.²² Moreover, the scandal produced by his Life of Jesus had one beneficial and lasting effect: it compelled scholars to evaluate anew the historical significance of the Gospels and their literary interrelationship. This type of study led to the formulation first of the Marcan hypothesis,²³ and later of the two-document hypothesis.²⁴ It also incited research on the origins of the whole New Testament literature.

Profoundly influenced by Hegel's philosophy of history, Ferdinand Christian Baur reinterpreted the birth of Christianity as the result of a conflict between a thesis (Jewish Christianity) and an antithesis (pagan Christianity) which resolved itself in a second-generation synthesis (Catholic Christianity).²⁵ This view of the de-²² F. C. Conybeare, History of New Testament Criticism (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1910), pp. 141-42. See also the comments of Joachim Wach, Das Verstehen. Grundzüge einer Geschichte der hermeneutischen Theorie im 19. Jahrhundert (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1929), II, 271-76.

²³ Initiated by Christian Hermann Weisse in Die evangelische Geschichte (Leipzig: Breitkopf & Härtel, 1838).

²⁴ Formulated chiefly by Heinrich Holtzmann in Die synoptischen Evangelien, ihr Ursprung und geschichtlicher Charakter (Leipzig: Wilhelm Engelmann, 1863), and Bernhard Weiss in Das Leben Jesus (Berlin: W. Hertz, 1882). See article "The Growth of the Gospels," Vol. VII, pp. 60-74.

²⁵ Paulus der Apostel Jesu Christi (Stuttgart: Becher & Müller, 1845); Kritische Untersuchungen über die kanonischen Evangelien (Tübingen: L. F. Fues, 1847).

velopment of the early church was not altogether wrong; unfortunately Baur used it as a criterion for determining the date and authenticity of the various New Testament writings, and this course led him to adopt a rather negative attitude toward the authenticity of the Pauline epistles, of which only Romans, I and II Corinthians, and Galatians he ascribed to the Apostle to the Gentiles. Consequently, Baur's reconstruction of Pauline theology was quite fragmentary.

In the meantime, the skeptical, imaginative, or merely "liberal" lives of Jesus appeared in an astoundingly large number throughout the second half of the nineteenth century.²⁶ The most popular among them was probably La Vie de Jésus (1863) by Ernest Renan—chiefly a sentimental romance. "There is a kind of insincerity in the book from beginning to end."²⁷ But some of Renan's later contributions²⁸ often reveal an interpretative perspicacity based on a profound knowledge of Jewish thought in the first century A.D.

The question of the Jesus of history seemed to float on stagnant waters until 1892, when Johannes Weiss analyzed Die Predigt Jesu vom Reiche Gottes and pointed out the eschatological, otherworldly, transcendental character of the kingdom of God as preached in the Gospels. The exclusively eschatological interpretation, however, was seriously qualified by Wilhelm Bousset,²⁹ who called attention to the diversity of forms in which Jewish apocalypticism presented itself to the popular mind in the New Testament times. Bousset maintained that hope in the proximate advent of a transcendental kingdom affects one's attitude to the present reality in such a thorough fashion that it becomes permissible to speak of a spiritualization of eschatology. Faith in God as a living and trustworthy father was combined in the teaching of Jesus with a genuine enjoyment of life upon this earth. This emphasis represents his main preoccupation more accurately than the admittedly eschatological bent of some of his sayings. In contrast with the Jewish apocalypticists and John the Baptist, Jesus fully lived in the present age, and he hailed the kingdom in his experience of filial communion with God and of brotherly fellowship with men.

Such an interpretation exercised a peculiar

²⁶ See Albert Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, tr. W. Montgomery (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1950).

²⁷ Ibid., p. 191.

²⁸ See particularly Les Apôtres (1866), Saint-Paul (1869), L'Antéchrist (1873), and Les Evangiles et la seconde génération chrétienne (1877).

²⁹ Jesu Predigt in ihrem Gegensatz zum Judentum (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1892).

appeal to the average nineteenth-century Protestant. It found brilliant exponents and popularizers, none more so perhaps than Adolf von Harnack, who in his famous lectures entitled Das Wesen des Christentums (1899-1900) reduced Christianity to the religion of Jesus and that, in turn, to an individualistic harmony between God and man.

The kingdom of God comes by coming to the individual, by entering into his soul and laying hold of it. True, the kingdom of God is the rule of God; but it is the rule of the Holy God in the hearts of individuals; it is God Himself in His power. From this point of view everything that is dramatic in the external and historical sense has vanished; and gone, too, are all the external hopes for the future. . . . It is not a question of angels and devils, thrones and principalities, but of God and the soul, the soul and its God.³⁰

In brief, Harnack was attempting to transform the gospel into a mere belief in "the fatherhood of God" and in "the infinite value of the human soul."

Reviewing critically the whole nineteenth-century attempt to recapture the "historical Jesus," Schweitzer sharpened the issue to an extreme degree. He maintained that the "liberal" search led to the "thoroughgoing skepticism" of Wilhelm Wrede.³¹ Wrede denied that Jesus ever thought of himself as the Messiah. After his death, however, the disciples, who had become convinced of his messiahship, created the fiction of the "messianic secret" in order to explain how it had happened that he never declared himself publicly as "the one who was to come." Against this view Schweitzer reacted violently by pushing Weiss's emphasis to a "thoroughgoing eschatology."³² He found it impossible "to suppose that Jesus could come to mean more to our time by entering into it as a man like ourselves . . . because such a Jesus never existed." He conceded that "historical knowledge can no doubt introduce greater clearness into an existing spiritual life," but he added that "it cannot call spiritual life into existence."³³ Schweitzer, nonetheless, paid high tribute to German research on the life of Jesus, and held it to be "one of the most significant events in the whole mental and spiritual life of humanity."³⁴ His implicit conclusion called for ³⁰ What Is Christianity? tr. Thomas Bailey Saunders (2nd ed.; New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1901), pp. 60-61.

³¹ Das Messiasgeheimnis in den Evangelien (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901).

³² Schweitzer, Das Messianitäts- und Leidensgeheimnis (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1901).

³³ Quest of the Historical Jesus, p. 399.

³⁴ Ibid.

a return to New Testament Christianity as a whole.

We are experiencing what Paul experienced. In the very moment when we were coming nearer to the historical Jesus than men had ever come before, and were already stretching out our hands to draw Him into our own time, we have been obliged to give up the attempt and acknowledge our failure in that paradoxical saying: "If we have known Christ after the flesh yet henceforth know we Him no more." And further we must be prepared to find that the historical knowledge of the personality and life of Jesus will not be a help, but perhaps even an offence to religion.³⁵

The religion of Jesus must make room once more for the religio de Christo.

B. The Graf-Wellhausen School of Old Testament Criticism.—The first documentary theory of the Hexateuch's composition as it was popularized by Eichhorn's Einleitung (1780-83) did not hold the field of scholarship without widespread challenge and much opposition. Rival hypotheses of various kinds were proposed, such as the conjecture of the fragments,³⁶ for example, and especially that of the complements and interpolations which was defended by Wilhelm de Wette.³⁷ The documentary theory, however, slowly regained ground under the various modifications introduced by Hermann Hupfeld,³⁸ who mistakenly continued to maintain that the First Elohists (later known as the Priestly Code) was the earliest of the documents. The postexilic dating of the Priestly Code was first recognized by Édouard Reuss in 1833, but was finally established by Karl Graf,³⁹ and endorsed by Abraham Kuenen and August Kayser.⁴⁰ The preparatory work was thus accomplished when Julius Wellhausen came on the scene and gave the classical exposition of the Hexateuch's literary origin and development.⁴¹

As a result of Wellhausen's lucid and in many ways brilliant demonstration⁴² which, like ³⁵ Ibid., p. 401.

³⁶ See article "The Growth of the Hexateuch," pp. 188-89; also, Joseph Coppens, The Old Testament and the Critics, tr. Edward A. Ryan and Edward W. Tribbe (Paterson, N. J.: St. Anthony Guild Press, 1942), pp. 11 ff.

³⁷ De Wette remained famous for having applied the formula of "pious fraud" to the seventh-century composition and discovery of the Deuteronomistic Code.

³⁸ Die Quellen der Genesis und die Art ihrer Zusammensetzung (Berlin: Wiegandt & Grieben, 1853).

³⁹ Die geschichtlichen Bücher des Alten Testaments (Leipzig: T. O. Weigel, 1866).

⁴⁰ Das vorexilische Buch der Urgeschichte Israels und seine Erweiterungen (Strassburg: C. F. Schmidt, 1874).

⁴¹ Die Composition des Hexateuchs (Berlin: G. Reimer, 1885; first published in the form of articles in 1876-77).

⁴² See especially Israelitische und Jüdische Geschichte (3rd ed.; Guttersloh: G. Reimer, 1897), Eng. tr., Sketch of the History of Israel and Judah (London: Black,

Baur's work on the early church, reveals the influence of Hegelian philosophy, a radically new conception of Israel's history dawned on the mind of the exegetes. While the Yahwist and Elohists documents were ascribed to a relatively early date, the Law as a whole came to be considered no longer as "the starting point for the history of ancient Israel," but rather as a priestly program conceived for the restoration of postexilic Judaism. It was felt that nothing could be known with certainty about the history and religion of Israel before the time of David. Ignoring the theological structure which undergirds the Yahwist's conception of history, critics assumed that Israel's faith in Yahweh began and developed according to normal evolutionary processes, such as those which are observable among all primitive societies. Consequently, traces of animism, totemism, polydaemonism, and polytheism were culled from the descriptions of rites and beliefs associated by the biblical writers with the Hebrew fathers, and this composite picture of "popular religion" was presented as corresponding adequately to the normative Yahwism of the early period. The "genius" of the eighth- and seventh-century prophets raised the practical monotheism of Yahweh to the level of a consciously formulated henotheism, which then was purified and made triumphant in the form of ethical monotheism under the impact of the Babylonian exile. The Psalter and the wisdom literature were ascribed en bloc to postexilic Judaism, at a time when religious individualism had at last conquered the consciousness of the Second Temple worshipers and teachers. Indeed, many of the psalms were thought to have been inspired by the Maccabean rebellion.

Such a reconstruction of the development of Old Testament religion, partial and unsatisfactory as it may have been at many points, produced a remarkable result: it created an unprecedented interest in the personalities of the prophets. For the first time the figures of Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, and their successors emerged concretely and powerfully against the vivid background of economic, political, psychological, and sociological forces. While the thunders and the flames of Sinai were lost in the dimness of the past, the prophets came into their own as living men of history.⁴³

To ignore or to underestimate the significance of the literary and historical achievements 1891); and Prolegomena zur Geschichte Israels (3rd ed.; Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1886), tr. J. Sutherland Black and Alan Menzies, Prolegomena to the History of Israel (Edinburgh: A. & C. Black, 1885). See also article "The Growth of the Hexateuch," pp. 189-90.

⁴³ See the works of C. H. Cornill, W. Robertson Smith, George Adam Smith, Bernhard Duhm, et al.

of the Graf-Wellhausen school would constitute a grievous error. In spite of many modifications of detail, the documentary hypothesis still stands in its general lines after years of minute analysis and inquiry. However, the conception of the origin and development of Israel's religion, and especially of the nature of the Yahwistic faith, which was proposed by Wellhausen and his disciples, soon suffered profound revisions.

C. New Sources of Knowledge.—Both in the field of the Old Testament and in that of the New Testament the acquisition of a vast amount of archaeological data produced a considerable enlargement of the picture of the ancient world, against which stood out in a new light the life of Israel and of the early church. Modern archaeology of the ancient Near East began when Napoleon Bonaparte brought a hundred artists and scholars to the sleeping ruins of the Nile Valley in 1798. The deciphering of hieroglyphics by Champollion in 1822, and of the cuneiform script by Rawlinson in 1846, inaugurated the manifold and complex work of interpreting thousands of texts which were soon being unearthed from the sands of Egypt and Mesopotamia. This development led to a new conception of the classical Orient. The Bible could no longer be considered as the earliest book of mankind's culture. Its religion could not any more be viewed in its "splendid isolation."

Meanwhile, in 1838 and 1852, Edward Robinson surveyed systematically the western lands of Asia Anterior and laid the foundations of biblical geography.⁴⁴ Scientific research in biblical Hebrew, which had been inaugurated by Wilhelm Gesenius,⁴⁵ was advancing steadily through the study of comparative Semitic philology which the archaeological discoveries of Mesopotamian and other documents made possible on a scale hitherto unknown.⁴⁶ Likewise, New Testament exegeses became aware of the Aramaic background of the language used in the Gospels and Acts, especially through the investigations of Emil Kautzsch and Gustaf Dalman.⁴⁷ From Adolf Deissmann⁴⁸ and others

⁴⁴ Biblical Researches in Palestine, Mount Sinai and Arabia Petraea (New York: J. Leavitt, 1841, etc.).

⁴⁵ Hebräisches . . . Handwörterbuch (1812, etc.); Hebräische Grammatik (1813, etc.); Thesaurus Philologicus Criticus Linguae Hebraeae et Chaldaeae Veteris Testamenti (1829-53).

⁴⁶ See article "The Language of the Old Testament," pp. 220-32.

⁴⁷ Grammatik des jüdisch-palästinischen Aramäisch (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1894); Die Worte Jesu (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1898).

⁴⁸ Bibelstudien (Marburg: N. G. Elwert, 1893); and especially Licht vom Osten (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1908), tr. Lionel R. M. Strachan, Light from the Ancient East (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1910).

they also learned to analyze the Greek of the New Testament in the light of a better appreciation of the dialects and especially of the Hellenistic tongue as it came to light through the discovery of papyri and ostraca.⁴⁹ Perhaps Deissmann's insistence on the popular character of the koine, necessary as this was, suffered from a certain degree of exaggeration and did not do full justice to the scholarly modes of expression common in the Jewish literature with which at least some of the New Testament writers were apparently acquainted.

The importance of the rabbinical teaching and preaching for the exegesis of the Gospels, which had been long ago sensed by John Lightfoot,⁵⁰ received in due course a wide and scrutinizing attention that led to the outstanding work of Hermann L. Strack and Paul Billerbeck.⁵¹

Finally, efforts to restore the primitive text of the Bible proceeded on a broad scope and at an accelerated pace. Tischendorf's discovery in 1844 of the Codex Sinaiticus and the labors of many other textual critics⁵² led to the establishment of scientifically edited texts of the Hebrew Bible, the Septuagint, and the Greek New Testament.

Thus, archaeological excavations, with their cultural and particularly their epigraphic yields, as well as research in comparative philology and textual criticism, brought interpreters more closely than ever to the literal meaning of the biblical writings. The addition of these new sources of knowledge was largely responsible for the inception of new methods of interpretative investigation.

D. Modern Methods of Interpretation.—In contrast to mere literary critics who were interested almost exclusively in the composition of the scriptural documents and the analysis of their respective sources and too little concerned with the meaning of their contents, several scholars felt the need of adapting or refining the old, and of devising new methods of approach to the Scriptures. They turned to the history of the oral tradition, the comparative study of religion or history of religion, and the analysis of form or form criticism. The cautious application of these methods produced a harvest of fruitful results which, in the mid-century, were still being formulated and evaluated.

In the field of Old Testament study Hermann

⁴⁹ See article "The Language of the New Testament," Vol. VII, pp. 43-59.

⁵⁰ Horae Hebraicae et Talmudicae (Cambridge and London, 1658-78).

⁵¹ Kommentar zum Neuen Testament aus Talmud und Midrasch (Munich: C. H. Beck, 1922-28).

⁵² See articles "The Text and Ancient Versions of the Old Testament," pp. 46-62; "The Text and Ancient Versions of the New Testament," pp. 72-83.

Gunkel,⁵³ followed by Hugo Gressmann,⁵⁴ Alfred Jeremias⁵⁵ and others, while paying high tribute to the accomplishments of literary criticism, realized that Wellhausen and his school were too passively subservient to the literary documents alone in their reconstruction of religious history. Gunkel rightly maintained that rites, customs, and even beliefs which are recorded in relatively late sources may actually belong to an extremely early age. He therefore endeavored to reach the contents and—when ever possible—the history of the oral tradition which lay behind the written documents themselves. In addition, just as Wellhausen had studied the religion of the pre-Islamic Arabs,⁵⁶ Gunkel and his disciples analyzed the Egyptian, Babylonian, and Persian religions in an attempt to discover the foreign influences which may have played upon the development of Old Testament religion. By so doing they brought sharply into focus the way in which Israel, as part of the ancient world, was constantly in danger of being corrupted by surrounding paganism and yet asserted against it the distinctive power of her own faith.

Finally, Gunkel paid particular attention to the literary forms of the Old Testament writings, and by initiating the method of form criticism made his most brilliant contribution. He showed conclusively that Hebrew literature followed precise aesthetic patterns or structures characterizing specific literary categories or genres (Gattungen), which did not emerge in vacuo but were born over the centuries from the requirements of a "life situation" (Sitz im Leben). Naturally, the method of form criticism or form analysis is not separate in its application from the method of "history of religion." Gunkel's study of the Psalter, for instance, revealed that an objective classification of the psalms into hymns, laments, royal songs, and so forth, may be obtained from the investigation of the poetic structure and also from a comparison with the cultic poems of Egypt and Mesopotamia. The combined application of the ⁵³ See especially Schöpfung und Chaos in Urzeit und Endzeit (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1895, etc.); Genesis übersetzt und erklärt (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901, etc.); Einleitung in die Psalmen, ed. J. Begrich (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1933).

⁵⁴ Altorientalische Texte und Bilder zum Alten Testamente (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1909, etc.); Der Ursprung der israelitisch-jüdischen Eschatologie (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1905); Der Messias (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1929).

⁵⁵ Das Alte Testament im Lichte des alten Orients (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1904, etc.), tr. C. L. Beaumont, The Old Testament in the Light of the Ancient East (London: Williams & Norgate, 1911).

⁵⁶ See especially Reste Arabischen Heidentums (Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1887, etc.).

two methods revitalized the exegesis of the psalms by showing that they answered precise needs in concrete environments.

Gunkel himself made it clear that his interest in the history of the ancient religions and in the form criticism of the Old Testament books was dependent upon his belief in the Christian significance of the Bible as a whole.

Before our eyes, uplifting us and bearing us onward, stood a wondrous picture—the Religion of the Bible in all its glory and dignity. We had come to see that such a phenomenon can be understood only when it is understood in its history, in its growth and becoming. It seemed to us to be a sublime task to understand this religion in its depth and breadth, to trace it through its winding course, to be present at the birth of its deepest thoughts.⁵⁷

The expression "to be present at" reveals a certain historical warmth, but also detachment, for it has nothing to do with "being personally involved in." Although Gunkel acknowledged that if "the Bible [ceased] to be the foundation of the Christian Church, Bible scholarship would also receive a fatal blow,"⁵⁸ he was not concerned directly with the theological relevance of the Hebrew Scripture for Christians.

Methods of comparative religion and of form criticism were soon applied also to the New Testament writings. The pioneering works of Franz Cumont⁵⁹ and James Frazer⁶⁰ on the transformations wrought in Greco-Roman culture by the seemingly irresistible attraction of the Oriental religions, together with the results of Richard Reitzenstein's research on the Hermetic literature,⁶¹ led to a re-evaluation of the way in which the Christian gospel, especially in its Pauline form, was preached to the Mediterranean world. Pursuing the superficial appearances of the parallels, such as in Paul's use of technical terms common in the mystery cults or in his emphasis on the rites of baptism and of a sacramental meal, some critics viewed the phenomenon of early Christianity as nothing more than another mystery religion. Wrote Alfred Loisy:

The scheme of Messianic salvation, of which the Galilean prophet thought himself the destined head, became a myth of universal salvation. . . . [Jesus] was a saviour-god . . . : like Adonis, Osiris, and Attis he had died a violent death, and like them

⁵⁷ "The 'Historical Movement' in the Study of Religion," The Expository Times, XXXVIII (1926-27), 533.

⁵⁸ Ibid., p. 534

⁵⁹ Les religions orientales dans le paganisme romain (Paris: Ernest Leroux, 1907).

⁶⁰ The Golden Bough, Part III, The Dying God, Part IV, Adonis Attis Osiris (London: Macmillan & Co., 1911, 1914).

⁶¹ Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen (Leipzig: B. G. Teubner, 1910).

he had returned to life; like them, he had prefigured in his lot that of the human beings who should take part in his worship, and commemorate his mystic enterprise; like them, he had pre-terminated, prepared, and assured the salvation of those who became partners in his passion.⁶²

Yet, many adherents of the religionsgeschichtliche Schule came to adopt a more balanced conception of the part played by Hellenistic syncretism in the New Testament interpretation of the death and resurrection of Christ, especially after Deissmann⁶³ re-emphasized cautiously the influence exercised over Pauline thought by the specifically Jewish element.

The need to study the forms of the oral tradition that lay behind the written Gospels had already been sensed by Eichhorn (1794), Krummacher (1805), and especially Gieseler (1818). It was, however, primarily on account of Gunkel's brilliant application of the form critical method to the study of the Genesis sagas (1901) that New Testament scholars turned their attention to the history of the gospel tradition.⁶⁴ Martin Dibelius, who had prepared the way in 1911 by his studies on John the Baptist,⁶⁵ applied the new method on an inclusive scale,⁶⁶ simultaneously with Karl Ludwig Schmidt,⁶⁷ and the work of these two scholars was soon followed by the contribution of Rudolf Bultmann.⁶⁸ Accepting the artificial character of the Marcan framework,⁶⁹ as well as the fragmentary, independent, and self-contained nature of the stories about Jesus which circulated among the early Christians, form critics attempted to classify these stories according to their respective "forms" as sayings, paradigms, wonder tales, legends, and myths. They showed how these forms arose and were preserved to satisfy the homiletical and practical needs of ⁶² "The Christian Mystery," The Hibbert Journal, X (1911), 51. See also Wilhelm Bousset, Kyrios Christos (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1913, etc.).

⁶³ Paulus (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1911, etc.), tr. Lionel R. M. Strachan, Paul (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1912).

⁶⁴ See Maurice Goguel, "Une nouvelle école de critique évangélique," Revue de l'Histoire des Religions, XCIV (1926), 114-60.

⁶⁵ Die urchristliche Überlieferung über Johannes dem Täufer (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1911).

⁶⁶ Die Formgeschichte des Evangeliums (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1919, etc.), tr. Bertram Lee Woolf, From Tradition to Gospel (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1935).

⁶⁷ Die Rahmen der Geschichte Jesu (Berlin: Trowitzsch & Sohn, 1919).

⁶⁸ Die Erforschung der synoptischen Evangelien (Göttingen: A. Töpelmann, 1925).

⁶⁹ A fact which had long been recognized by such scholars as Johannes Weiss (Das älteste Evangelium [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901]) and Maurice Goguel (L'Évangile de Marc [Paris: Ernest Leroux, 1909]).

the early communities (cf. Gunkel's Sitz im Leben). Furthermore, they claimed that the original tradition could be recovered through the study of the laws by which the forms were transmitted. Unfortunately the classifications proposed by the various leaders of the school are far from identical, and they are based not exclusively on considerations of form, but on the analysis of the contents as well. The claims to objectivity made by the exponents of form criticism are therefore somewhat exaggerated. In addition, form critics have made a number of gratuitous assumptions concerning the needs and social requirements of the various Christian groups. Finally, they have shown a tendency to neglect almost completely the results of literary criticism itself. In spite of these and other limitations,⁷⁰ the form critics have rendered a great service to exegesis by insisting rightly on the theological and especially kerygmatic, rather than the primarily historical, purpose of the gospel writers.

It was precisely at this same time that the theology of Karl Barth began to sweep Europe.⁷¹ While exegetes were slowly realizing that both the Old Testament and the New Testament were the products of faith, systematic theologians were suddenly returning to the Bible in an attempt to recover its authority by listening through its pages to the perennial "word of God." The confluence of these two originally independent trends characterizes the contemporary period of interpretation.

III. Biblical Exegesis at the Mid-Century (1925-1950)

Technical research in archaeology, in philology, in textual, literary, and form criticism produced in these years such an enormous amount of material⁷² that most biblical interpreters became extraordinarily specialized. Many of the most significant contributions dealt with fragmentary problems of translation and interpretation of isolated passages. It is thus difficult and somewhat reckless to characterize the prevailing trends. Still, it is possible to observe a threefold tendency: (a) for some books of the Bible, at least, a return to relatively conservative conclusions on matters of composition and date; (b) an increased readiness to accept the historical reliability of the documents; and (c) a reborn awareness of the primarily theological intentions of the biblical writers.

⁷⁰ See Vincent Taylor's critique of the form critical method in The Formation of the Gospel Tradition (London: Macmillan & Co., 1933).

⁷¹ Barth's Der Römerbrief (München: C. Kaiser, 1923), with its brilliant insights, is more an illustration of theological eisegesis than a monument of exegesis.

⁷² See among others Harold R. Willoughby, ed., The Study of the Bible Today and Tomorrow (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1947).

A. Trends in Old Testament Study.—The documentary hypothesis of Hexateuchal composition triumphantly survived the attacks of the previous four decades.⁷³ With minor differences as regards the contents, characteristics, and dates of the various strata,⁷⁴ the majority of scholars accepted on the whole the literary results of the Graf-Wellhausen analysis.⁷⁵ Most of the exegetes were pursuing the study of the oral traditions along the lines indicated by Gunkel, but they were also aware of the theological purpose which animated the editors and redactors of these traditions. Gerhard von Rad,⁷⁶ and to a limited extent Martin Noth,⁷⁷ have shown that the Yahwist, although he was the earliest writer of the Hexateuch (the date of J, incidentally, for various reasons was being pushed back from 850-750 to ca. 950 B.C. or even earlier), conceived his work as the history of the "grand design of salvation," and he tried to substantiate the old covenantal creeds—represented, for instance, by the archaic liturgy of Deut. 26:5-9—by collecting a multitude of originally independent traditions and by organizing them into a structure of Heilsgeschichte. He preached on the one hand the power of Yahweh, his saving grace and ethical requirements, and on the other hand, the sinful nature of man and the mission of Israel. The Yahwist's categories of thinking were therefore strictly theological, for he dealt first and last with God's purpose in mankind's history. In this respect exegesis in the mid-century divorced itself from the Wellhausenian reconstruction of Israel's religion, and while it recognized of course the existence of a development throughout the centuries of biblical life, it refused a priori to associate early expressions of belief with a so-called "primitive" theology which had to be superseded by the so-called "insights"

⁷³ Especially those of Klostermann (1908-12), Eerdmans (1908-12), Wiener (1910-12), Naville (1921), Sanda (1924), D. B. Macdonald (1933), Cassuto (1934), and Olmstead (1943). The existence of the Elohist, which Volz (1933) and Rudolph (1938) had tried to discard, appears to be vindicated.

⁷⁴ Proposed respectively by Eissfeldt (1922), Morgenstern (1927), and Pfeiffer (1930-41).

⁷⁵ See Aage Benzen, Introduction to the Old Testament (Copenhagen: G. E. C. Gad, 1948); Artur Weiser, Einführung in das Alte Testament (Göttingen: W. Kohlhammer, 1949); Adolphe Lods, Histoire de la littérature hébraïque et juive (Paris: Payot, 1950); also Cuthbert A. Simpson, The Early Traditions of Israel (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1948).

⁷⁶ Das formgeschichtliche Problem des Hexateuch (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1938); Deuteronomium-Studien (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1947); Das erste Buch Mose (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1949).

⁷⁷ Überlieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1948).

of the great prophets.⁷⁸ The tendency was to emphasize, not from dogmatic presuppositions, but from the understanding of the texts themselves in the light of the archaeological evidence,⁷⁹ the uniqueness of Yahwism as compared to the other religions of the ancient Near East, and the unity of the Old Testament revelation of God in spite of its diversity.

Likewise, if the antiquity of the oral traditions concerning the pre-Mosaic age, for instance, became apparent from an analysis of the forms in which they have been preserved, the question of their historical validity was reopened on a new basis. The exact chronology of the patriarchal age was still a matter of debate, but extensive research⁸⁰ tended to show that the patriarchal traditions are not the product of late imagination, for they correspond remarkably well to the Sitz im Leben which is revealed by extrabiblical documentation. Such views were by no means acceptable to all, but the very fact that they were presented seriously by responsible critics who were not prone to use archaeology for the sake of defending fundamentalism or any kind of dogmatic orthodoxy constituted a strong reinforcement of the trend toward historical conservatism. Moreover, it became increasingly clear that the covenantal requirements of early Yahwism were primarily of a theological and ethical nature in contradistinction to the ritual characteristics of the agrarian syncretism which corrupted the popular religion of Israel after the conquest.

The work of the prophets was thus brought into a new light. They inherited their "ethical monotheism" from their predecessors, but they deepened its implications under the stress of historical crisis. It seems that Amos and his successors built upon the theology of Yahweh's presence as it was made concrete within the people, and of Yahweh's lordship over nature and history.⁸¹ The basic agreement between ⁷⁸ "Only the most extreme criticism can see any appreciable difference between the God of Moses in JE and the God of Jeremiah" (W. F. Albright, "The Ancient Near East and the Religion of Israel," Journal of Biblical Literature, LIX [1940], 111).

⁷⁹ See G. Ernest Wright, "The Present State of Biblical Archeology," in Harold R. Willoughby, ed., Study of Bible Today and Tomorrow, pp. 92 ff.

⁸⁰ See W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2nd ed.; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1946); The Archaeology of Palestine (Harmondsworth: Pelican Books, 1949); R. de Vaux, "Les patriarches hébreux et les découvertes modernes," Revue Biblique, LIII (1946), 321-48, LV (1948), 321-47, LVI (1949), 5-36; H. H. Rowley, From Joseph to Joshua (London: Oxford University Press, 1950).

⁸¹ See G. Henton Davies, "The Yahwistic Tradition in the Eighth-Century Prophets," and N. W. Porteous, "The Basis of the Ethical Teaching of the Prophets," in H. H. Rowley, ed., Studies in Old Testament Prophecy (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1950), pp. 37 ff., 143 ff.

Yahwism and prophetism was stressed on various levels, one of which is the Glaubensideologie, which is found some fifty-two times before Amos; another, the covenantal emphasis on obedience; and a third, the da'ath 'elōhim, or knowledge of God, which became the keystone of Hosea's religion. The prophets were able to perceive their special "word" because they were steeped in the Yahwistic tradition.

Intensive research on the prophetic books, especially that pursued by Scandinavian scholars, was less intent than in the previous generation upon trying to isolate the ipsissima verba of the prophetic figures and more eager to interpret correctly the meaning of the books in their totality. All these studies revealed in various degrees the three characteristics of the period: they showed a new respect for the validity of the Masoretic text;⁸² they assumed a somewhat reactionary stand on the integrity of composition;⁸³ and they laid the exegetical emphasis on the theological meaning of the prophetic message. The work of Christopher R. North on the suffering servant⁸⁴ deserves special notice, for a strong case was made therein for a messianic-soteriological interpretation of the servant—although not in the Davidic sense of Isa. 9 and 11—along lines which lead directly to the New Testament application. North went so far as to state that Deutero-Isaiah was a "myth" prophet in the predictive sense, who pictured the servant not at all as Israel (which had failed), but as an individual figure who would come on this earth and whose chastisement would bring peace to the Gentiles. The theological interest of these exegetes is equally visible in monographs on the Hagiographa, particularly Job and the Psalms.

B. New Testament Criticism in Transition.—Spurred by the discovery of new fragments of manuscripts, particularly those of the Chester Beatty papyri, a considerable amount of work was accomplished in the textual criticism of the New Testament. The extremely complex relationship of the manuscript families was studied on an objective basis, and a scientific text superseding the editions of Tischendorf, of Westcott and Hort, and of Nestle, was in process of establishment. Linguistic studies were intensely carried forward, particular emphasis being laid on the theological keywords, as in Gerhard Kittel's Theologisches Wörterbuch zum Neuen Testament, a monument of invaluable information under the editorship of Gerhard Friedrich.

Synoptical exegesis appeared at the same time to avoid the excesses of literary criticism as well as the extremes of form criticism, while taking full advantage of the contributions which both methods may offer.⁸⁵ Such a fact as that the testimony of eyewitnesses lies at the origin of the oral tradition was increasingly recognized. The ecclesiastical nature and the theological purpose of the gospel literature were taken into serious consideration at every point of the exegetical analysis. Considerable attention was given to the Fourth Gospel,⁸⁶ the composition of which was now often ascribed to a first-century date. While the problem of the validity of the sources used by the Johannine evangelist remains extremely complex, the trend here also was in the direction of a qualified conservatism⁸⁷ and gave more confidence in the historical accuracy of the narrative.

Intensive studies were also pursued on the book of Acts and the early church,⁸⁸ and particular attention was given to the early sermons and to the historical value of the narratives concerning Paul. Although lives of Jesus were written between the two world wars,⁸⁹ scholars were slowly coming to recognize the impossibility of the merely biographical inquiry. The familiar and worn-out antitheses of the nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, like those of Jesus or Paul, Synoptics or Fourth Gospel, eschatology or earthly kingdom, and so forth, were overshadowed by more balanced views which were not reached from an artificially synthetic approach but were derived from conscientious sifting and evaluation of previous exegetical contributions.⁹⁰

⁸⁵ See, e.g., F. C. Grant, The Earliest Gospel (New York and Nashville: Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1943).

⁸⁶ See among others R. H. Strachan, The Fourth Gospel (London: Student Christian Movement Press, 1917); W. Bauer, Das Johannesevangelium (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1925); W. F. Howard, The Fourth Gospel in Recent Criticism and Interpretation (London: Epworth Press, 1931); Philip Menoud, L'Évangile de Jean d'après les recherches récentes (Paris: Neuchatel, 1943); E. C. Hoskyns and F. N. Davey, The Fourth Gospel (London: Faber & Faber, 1948); Rudolf Bultmann, Das Evangelium des Johannes (11th ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1950).

⁸⁷ A fact which had already been recognized by Maurice Goguel in his Vie de Jésus; see The Life of Jesus, tr. Olive Wyon (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1933), pp. 156-57 and, in the revised French edition, Jésus (Paris: Payot, 1950), pp. 107-10.

⁸⁸ The Beginnings of Christianity, ed. F. J. Foakes Jackson and Kirsopp Lake (London: Macmillan & Co., 1920-33). See also C. H. Dodd, The Apostolic Preaching and Its Developments (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1936).

⁸⁹ See Chester C. McCown, The Search for the Real Jesus (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1940).

⁹⁰ See, e.g., W. G. Kümmel, Verheissung und Erfüllung, Untersuchungen zur eschatologischen Verkündigung Jesu

⁸² The legitimacy of this attitude has received unexpected support from the discovery of the 'Ain Feshka MS of Isaiah.

⁸³ E.g., Artur Weiser accepted the authenticity of Mic. 5-6; 7:1-7 in addition to 1-3. See Das Buch der zwölf Kleinen Propheten (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1949), I, ad loc.

⁸⁴ The Suffering Servant in Deutero-Isaiah (London: Oxford University Press, 1948).

Several dangers arose, however, when radical form critics, such as Bultmann,⁹¹ were at times inclined to disregard the importance of historical research altogether, simply because the historical event of God's revelation in Jesus Christ is known and transmitted only through the kerygmatic word. On much safer grounds appeared to be such an interpreter as Oscar Cullmann,⁹² who squarely placed the Christian event in the whole biblical Heilsgeschichte, insisted upon the "temporally unique character of the central event," and at the same time pointed out the peril of the ever-recurrent heresy of Docetism. It is on account of this awareness that, in the words of C. H. Dodd, we turn back to the unfinished "quest of the historical Jesus"; for we cannot escape it, in spite of the flourishes against "Historicismus" with which our period opened. As the great tradition reveals itself afresh in its wholeness and essential unity, the yawning gap which earlier criticism left between the Jesus of History and the emergent Church disappears, and we begin to see that to make a separation between the historical and the theological understanding of the Gospel is to put asunder what God hath joined.⁹³

C. Toward the Formulation of a Biblical Theology.—Exegetes at the mid-century were thus aware of their theological responsibility. Old Testament scholars no longer apologized for the fact that the Hebrew Scripture is part of the Christian canon; they were not on the whole tempted to divorce a structural exposition of the various Hebrew formulations of faith from the historical account of the Hebrew religion in its development and diversity. Until 1950, no treatise had superseded Walther Eichrodt's inclusive explication of the way in which the Hebrew revelation of God, man, sin, and salvation is focused on the covenant;⁹⁴ however, several monographs on limited subjects⁹⁵ show that interpreters were cautiously beginning to (Basel: H. Majer, 1945; "Abhandlungen zur Theologie des Alten und Neuen Testaments").

⁹¹ At least in his extremely controversial remarks on the Christian myth in "Neues Testament und Mythologie," in Kerygma und Mythos; ein theologisches Gespräch, ed. Hans W. Bartsch (Hamburg: Reich & Hedrich, 1948), pp. 15-53. See the critique of Amos N. Wilder, "Mythology and the New Testament," Journal of Biblical Literature, LXIX (1950), 113-27.

⁹² Christus und die Zeit (Zurich: Zollikon, 1946), tr. F. V. Filson, Christ and Time (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1950).

⁹³ "Thirty Years of New Testament Study," Union Seminary Quarterly Review, V (1950), 12.

⁹⁴ Theologie des Alten Testaments (Leipzig: J. G. Hinrichs, 1933-39).

⁹⁵ Such as J. J. Stamm, Erlösen und Vergeben im Alten Testament (Bern: A. Francke, 1940); Christopher North, The Old Testament Interpretation of History (London: Epworth Press, 1946); H. H. Rowley, The Biblical Doctrine of Election (London: Lutterworth Press, 1950).

draw lines across the centuries in an effort to grasp the homogeneity of Israel's religious growth. The task could not be accomplished without further discussion on methodology.⁹⁶

Similarly, books were appearing with the title of "Theology of the New Testament,"⁹⁷ though many of them still treated the early Christian thought in fragmentary fashion—Paulinism, Johanninism, and so forth. There was, however, a real need for a presentation of the great themes—God, man, sin, salvation, kingdom, and church—in their "growth and variety" from Paul to Hebrews and II Peter, along the lines drawn by F. C. Grant, who insisted rightly that in spite of the diversity of expression, "the faith is one" and "the fundamental outlook of the primitive church was certainly consistent and increasingly homogeneous."⁹⁸

The next step was to be taken when a truly "biblical" theology, a theology of the Bible as a whole, should reveal how the unresolved tensions of Hebrew faith—particularism and universalism, grace and law, individual and community, church and world, history and eschatology—are displaced, overcome, and transfigured by what proved to be at once the scandal and the creativity of the Christ-event. The fulfillment of this task demanded a restatement of exegetical purpose and methodology.

D. Discussions on Hermeneutics.—One cannot review the history of biblical interpretation without observing that exegetes have been too often influenced in their work by epistemological presuppositions of which they themselves were more or less unaware. "Historical" exegesis, for example, which vehemently claimed to have reached the highest possible degree of objectivity was chiefly dominated by philosophical premises of a naturalistic type. Not only have the allegorical or "spiritual," and, to a lesser extent, typological interpreters practiced eisegesis rather than exegesis, but also many self-styled "exegetes" have done so: for instance, the "liberal" students who spiritualized the eschatological element in the teaching of Jesus or the "neo-orthodox" theologians who dismissed the "mythological frame" as alien to the New Testament.

⁹⁶ See James D. Smart, "The Death and Rebirth of Old Testament Theology," Journal of Religion, XXIII (1943), 1-11, 125-36; N. W. Porteous, "Towards a Theology of the Old Testament," Scottish Journal of Theology, I (1948), 136-49; Robert C. Dentan, Preface to Old Testament Theology (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1950).

⁹⁷ See Ethelbert Stauffer, Die Theologie des Neuen Testaments (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1947); Rudolf Bultmann, Theologie des Neuen Testaments (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1948-51).

⁹⁸ An Introduction to New Testament Thought (New York and Nashville: Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1950), p. 42.

It is unfortunate that much of the mid-century discussion on hermeneutic principles originated with men who disparaged the work of the historico-critical schools in a one-sided way and proposed in its stead a "suprahistorical," "dogmatic," "pneumatic," "ecclesiastic," or strictly "theological" exegesis.⁹⁹ In general, however, the sounder view was being maintained that the exegete must be concerned at all times with the philological, grammatical, literal meaning of the text as it is related to the historical framework of composition.¹⁰⁰ But his task does not end there. The exegete cannot and should not deny that the meaning of a text has grown in the whole scriptural context and needs therefore to be viewed in the light of that context. For instance, if the exegete analyzes the expression imago dei, he must realize that the priestly school which was originally responsible for it wrote at a time of grave national distress; he must remember that the final editors of the Pentateuch preserved this expression in a story which is now placed side by side with the J accounts of the Creation and the Fall, thereby suggesting a subtle equilibrium between contrasting emphases; he must also take into central consideration the fact that the New Testament places upon the famous text of Genesis its culminating, teleological interpretation. In other words, the exegesis of a passage includes not only "The determination of the text; . . . The literary form of the passage; . . . The historical situation, the Sitz im Leben; . . . The meaning which the words had for the original author and hearer or reader"; but also, ". . . The understanding of the passage in the light of its total context and the background out of which it emerged."¹⁰¹ This "total context" should mean "the total Scripture." The theologically-minded exegete will therefore enter into the biblical world through his participation in the κοινωνία of the people of God. Considering the object of his science, he will know that a neutral, detached, "objective" attitude would become in effect "unscientific." In this sense "theological" exegesis is not only legitimate but also indispensable; however, it cannot be divorced from the literal interpretation, which at all times must restrain the vagaries of subjective imagination too often "deified" as "the inner testimony of the Holy Spirit," and must resist even the pressure of a particular ecclesiastic tradition.¹⁰² In any event, the interpreter should study in considerable detail the history of interpretation, thereby obtaining a clear sense of his responsibility, and perhaps also some humility.

⁹⁹ See, e.g., Albrecht Oepke, Geschichtliche und über-geschichtliche Schriftauslegung (Gütersloh: C. Bertelsmann, 1931); see also Karl Barth's well-known stand, as reaffirmed in his Kirchliche Dogmatik (München: C. Kaiser, 1948), Vol. III, Bd. 2, pp. vii-ix.

¹⁰⁰ See, among many others, H. Cunliffe-Jones, The Authority of the Biblical Revelation (London: James Clarke & Co., 1945); Floyd V. Filson, "Theological Exegesis," The Journal of Bible and Religion, XVI (1948), 212-15; Oscar Cullmann, "La nécessité et la fonction de l'exégèse philologique et historique de la Bible," Verbum Caro, III (1949), 2-13.

¹⁰¹ From "Guiding Principles for the Interpretation of the Bible, As accepted by the ecumenical Study Conference, held in Oxford from June 29th to July 5th 1949." Studies on "The Bible and the Church Message to the World," as quoted by G. Ernest Wright, "The Problem of Archaizing Ourselves," Interpretation, III (1949), 458.

IV. Selected Bibliography

- BURGHARDT, W. J. "On Early Christian Exegesis," Theological Studies, XI (1950), 78-116.
- CARPENTER, J. ESTLIN. The Bible in the Nineteenth Century. New York: Longmans, Green & Co., 1903.
- COFFENS, JOSEPH. The Old Testament and the Critics, tr. Edward A. Ryan and Edward W. Tribbe. Paterson, N. J.: St. Anthony Guild Press, 1942.
- DUGMORE, CLIFFORD WILLIAM, ed. The Interpretation of the Bible. London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1944.
- FARRAR, FREDERIC WILLIAM. History of Interpretation. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 1886.
- GILBERT, GEORGE HOLLEY. Interpretation of the Bible. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1908.
- GLUNZ, H. H. History of the Vulgate in England from Alcuin to Roger Bacon. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1933.
- GRANT, ROBERT M. The Bible in the Church. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1948.
- ROWLEY, H. H., ed. The Old Testament and Modern Study. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1951.
- SCHWEITZER, ALBERT. The Quest of the Historical Jesus, tr. W. Montgomery. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1950.
- SMALLEY, BERYL. The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1941.
- SPIQ, C. Esquisse d'une histoire de l'exégèse latine au moyen âge. Paris: J. Vrin, 1944.
- WACH, JOACHIM. Das Verstehen, Grundzüge einer Geschichte der hermeneutischen Theorie im 19. Jahrhundert. Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1926-33.
- WASZINK, J. H. "Allegorese," Reallexikon für Antike und Christentum I. Stuttgart: Hiersemann, 1950. Pp. 283-93.
- WILLOUGHBY, HAROLD R., ed. The Study of the Bible Today and Tomorrow. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1947.

¹⁰² See article "The Bible: Its Significance and Authority," pp. 3-31.

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

by GEORGES AUGUSTIN BARROIS

- I. Chronology
 - A. From Creation to Abraham
 - B. From Abraham to the Exodus
 - C. From the Exodus to Solomon
 - D. From Solomon to the Exile
 - E. From the Exile to the Roman Conquest
 - F. From the Roman Conquest to the Destruction of Jerusalem
- II. Calendars
 - A. Hebrew Calendar
 - B. Hellenistic Calendar
 - C. Festivals
- III. Metrology
 - A. Measures of Length
 - B. Measures of Distance
 - C. Measures of Area
 - D. Measures of Capacity
 - E. Measures of Weight
- IV. Numismatics
 - A. Early Means of Exchange
 - B. Persian Period
 - C. Hellenistic Period
 - D. Maccabean Period
 - E. Roman Period
 - 1. Coinage of the Roman Administration (63 B.C.—A.D. 66)
 - 2. Coinage of the First Jewish Revolt (A.D. 66-70)
 - 3. Coinage of the Second Jewish Revolt (A.D. 132-35)
 - F. Appendixes
 - 1. Money in the New Testament
 - 2. Illustrations of Selected Coins Current in Ancient Palestine
 - a) Persian
 - b) Hellenistic
 - c) Maccabean
 - d) Roman

I. Chronology

A. From Creation to Abraham.—The genealogy of the early patriarchs (Gen. 5; 11:10-32) is cast into a chronological scheme whose figures according to the standard Hebrew text (followed by the King James Version) conflict with those in the Greek and Samaritan versions. In each division of Table I, column A shows the age of the patriarchs at the birth of their heir; column B, the number of their years thereafter; column C, their total lifetime.

The scheme of Gen. 5 and 11:10-32 is strictly genealogical. This means that the summation of the figures shown in column A should give the number of years elapsed since the Creation. Hence the dates, anno mundi, 1656 for the Flood (Noah's six hundredth year) and 1946 for Abraham's birth.

Such figures cannot be reconciled with the conclusions or hypotheses of modern science concerning the age of the world or the average life span of primitive man, unless it is assumed that the reckoning of times by the biblical authors or translators follows symbolical preconceptions whose nature or ratio cannot be ascertained. The analogy of early Mesopotamian dynastic lists may to a certain extent substantiate this assumption.

According to the Greek chronology, Methuselah survived the Flood by fourteen years, in contradiction to Gen. 7:23. The Hebrew dates his death in the year of the Flood. The fresh start to be made by Noah and his sons is further emphasized in the Samaritan, where Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech are made to die the year of the Flood, being presumably wiped out by the cataclysm.

The low figures in column A of the Hebrew chronology, from Arpachshad to Nahor, account for the abnormal fact that all the patriarchs from Noah to Terah were still alive when Abraham was born. According to the Greek and the Samaritan, all of Abraham's forebears had died when he started on his journey to Canaan, as if to stress the beginning of a new era in biblical history.

Events recorded in the biblical narratives covering this period cannot be synchronized with events of world history. However, the story of the Flood is paralleled in early Mesopotamian literature by traditions which became embodied in the epic of Gilgamesh around the eighteenth century B.C. The story of the Tower of Babel possibly refers to the construction or the restoration of the temple tower Etemenenki at Babylon, the age of which is not ascertainable, although it antedates the second millennium B.C.

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

B. From Abraham to the Exodus.—The biblical data consist of a few genealogical indications shown in Table II.

That the genealogies were regarded as complete is confirmed by the prophecy of Gen. 15:16, according to which the fourth generation after Jacob was to return to Canaan. However, the numerical indications recorded in column A of Table II are defective, and this makes it impossible directly to calculate the total length of the period, which has to be inferred from the following data:

Gen. 12:4—Abraham's entry into Canaan, at 75 years
 Gen. 47:9—Jacob's migration to Egypt, at 130 years
 Exod. 12:40 (Heb.)—Sojourn in Egypt, 430 years
 Exod. 12:40 (LXX, Samar.)—Sojourn in Canaan and Egypt, 430 years

Thus the years from the birth of Abraham to the Exodus can be tabulated as shown in Table III.

The abnormal longevity of the patriarchs and the excessive number of years assigned to the generations from Abraham to Moses point to

TABLE I. GENEALOGY OF THE EARLY PATRIARCHS

PATRIARCH	HEBREW			SAMARITAN			LXX (Ed. Rahlfs)
	A	B	C	A	B	C	A	B	C
Adam	130	800	930	130	800	930	230	700	930
Seth	105	807	912	105	807	912	205	707	912
Enosh	90	815	905	90	815	905	190	715	905
Kenan	70	840	910	70	840	910	170	740	910
Mahalalel	65	830	895	65	830	895	165	730	895
Jared	162	800	962	62	785	847	162	800	962
Enoch	65	300	365	65	300	365	165	200	365
Methuselah	187	782	969	67	653	720	167	802	969
Lamech	182	595	777	53	600	653	188	565	753
Noah	500	450	950	500	450	950	500	450	950
Shem	100	500		100	500	600	100	500
Flood	1656			1307			2242
Arpachshad	35	403		135	303	438	135	430
[Kainan]							130	330
Shelah	30	403		130	303	433	130	330
Eber	34	430		134	270	404	134	370
Peleg	30	209		130	109	239	130	209
Reu	32	207		132	107	239	132	207
Serug	30	200		130	100	230	130	200
Nahor	29	119		79	69	148	79	129
Terah	70		205	70		145	70		205
Abraham's birth	1946			2247			3312

TABLE II. GENEALOGY FROM ABRAHAM TO THE EXODUS

REFERENCE	PERSON	A AGE AT BIRTH OF HEIR	B TOTAL LIFETIME
			HEBR.	SAMAR.	LXX
			Gen. 21:5; 25:7	Abraham	100
Gen. 25:26; 35:28	Isaac	60	180
Gen. 47:28	Jacob		147
Exod. 6:16	Levi		137
Exod. 6:18	Kohath		133		130
Exod. 6:20	Amram		137	136	132
Deut. 34:7	Moses		120

TABLE III. YEARS FROM THE BIRTH OF ABRAHAM TO THE EXODUS

PERIOD	HEBR. (KJV)	LXX SAMAR.
From Abraham's birth to his entry into Canaan	75	75
From Abraham's entry into Canaan to Jacob's migration	215	215
From Jacob's migration to the Exodus	430	215
Total duration	720	505

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

ward the artificial character of the biblical chronology, which aims at making the sojourn in Egypt exactly the double of (Hebrew), or equal to (LXX, Samaritan), the sojourn in Canaan.

The symbolic nature of the chronology of the patriarchs from Abraham to Moses makes it inadvisable to use the figures of the Bible for the computation of historical synchronisms, lest results thus obtained should at best prove coincidental, and possibly misleading.

Most exegetes have abandoned the identification of Amraphel (Gen. 14:1) with Hammurabi. The once favored synchronism Abraham-Hammurabi is therefore uncertain, even though it might obtain some support from linguistic and onomastic parallels between the patriarchal stories of Genesis and the cuneiform texts of

TABLE IV. SYNCHRONISMS OF HEBREW AND ORIENTAL HISTORY

HEBREW HISTORY	ORIENTAL HISTORY
Hebrew Patriarchs in Canaan	Cuneiform documents of Mari, 18th century Hammurabi, 1728-1686 (dates revised after data from the Mari texts) Cuneiform documents of Nuzi, 15th century

TABLE V. SYNCHRONISMS OF HEBREW AND EGYPTIAN HISTORY

HEBREW HISTORY	EGYPTIAN HISTORY
Hebron built 7 years before Zoan (Num. 13:22) Migration of the Hebrews into Egypt [?]	THE HYKSOS (XV DYNASTY) * Capital Avaris (Zoan), founded 1675 Conquer Xoïs, 1594 Expelled by Ahmose, 1567
14th century; Jericho besieged twice and destroyed (Garstang) Hypothesis of a partial Exodus and settlement of tribes in central Palestine	XVIII DYNASTY, 1546-1319 Thutmose III, 1490-1436; campaigns in Syria Amenophis III, 1413-1377 Amenophis IV (Akhenaton), 1377-1360 (Cuneiform documents of Tell el-Amarna, 14th century)
The king "which knew not Joseph" (Exod. 1:8), possibly Seti I The Exodus, after 1300 Final destruction of Jericho (Vincent) and Joshua's conquest of Palestine, shortly after 1250	XIX DYNASTY, 1319-1200 Seti I, 1319-1301 Ramses II, 1301-1234 Merneptah, 1234-1227, defeats Israel in Palestine, the 5th year of his reign
The Philistines, hostile neighbors of Israel in the story of Samson (previous mentions of the Philistines in the Bible are anachronisms) David, king in Hebron, 1002-995 David, king in Jerusalem, 995-962 Reign of Solomon, 962-922 Construction of the temple, from the 4th to the 11th year of Solomon (I Kings 6:1, 38), 959-952	XX DYNASTY, 1200-1085 Invasion of Egypt by the Sea Peoples, defeated by Ramses III, 1195-1164, and settlement of the Philistines in the Palestinian lowlands

* Dynasties XVI-XVII are local (Theban) dynasties.

Chronology of the Hyksos according to H. E. Winlock, The Rise and Fall of the Middle Kingdom in Thebes (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1947). New Empire dates after Borchardt-Edgerton.

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

Mari (eighteenth century). On the other hand, the customs of the early Hebrews, as described chiefly in the Jacob narratives, conform best to the social and legal conditions revealed by the cuneiform documents of Nuzi (fifteenth century).

Synchronisms with Egyptian history are equally hypothetical. It is generally assumed that the migration of the Hebrews into Egypt may have occurred while the Hyksos kings of the Fifteenth Dynasty had their capital in the Delta, according to the tradition of Manetho, an Egyptian priest of the third century B.C. The Exodus most likely took place during the reign of Ramses II. The interval, which exceeds two and one half centuries, seems, however, not to be in harmony with the genealogical scheme of the Bible, which counts only four generations from Jacob to Moses.

Although archaeologists still disagree upon the circumstances and date of the destruction of Jericho, miscellaneous data support the dating of Joshua's conquest of Palestine shortly after 1250 B.C.

The hypothetical and provisional character of the dates shown in Tables IV and V should be kept in mind.

C. From the Exodus to Solomon.—Chronological indications from the historical books according to the Hebrew (followed by the King James Version), together with the Greek variants (Rahlfs' text of Septuagint), may be tabulated in years as shown in Table VI.

The chronology of the entire period tends to reckon with units, multiples, or fractions of 40 years. In I Kings 6:1 the period extending from the Exodus to the construction of the temple in the fourth year of Solomon lasts 480 years (Hebrew and King James Version), or 440 years (Greek), that is, respectively, 12 or 11 units of 40 years. However, this conflicts with the detailed chronology of the historical books recorded in the above table. The summation of the figures in the Hebrew column gives a total of 590 years from the Exodus to the death of Solomon, that is, 554 years to the construction of the temple, over against the 480 years of I Kings 6:1 in the Hebrew tradition. The last number may be explained as follows: The years of oppression, including the three years of Abimelech, who was never regarded as a legitimate ruler, amount to 114. There are therefore $554 - 114 = 440$ years of Hebrew rule from the Exodus to the construction of the temple, which is precisely the number read by the Septuagint in I Kings 6:1. The Hebrew adds 40 years to cover the unrecorded duration of the leadership of Joshua, and the reign of Saul, thus making up the sum total of 480 years.

The summation of the figures of the Greek

TABLE VI. BIBLICAL CHRONOLOGY FROM THE EXODUS TO SOLOMON

	HEBR.	LXX
A. The years of the Wandering (Num. 32:13)	40
Leadership of Joshua	?
B. Oppression. Cushan-rishathaim (Judg. 3:8)	8
Othniel (Judg. 3:11)	40	50
Oppression. Eglon, king of Moab (Judg. 3:14)	18
Ehud (Judg. 3:30)	80
Oppression. Jabin, king of Hazor (Judg. 4:3)	20
Deborah-Barak (Judg. 5:31)	40
Oppression. The Midianites (Judg. 6:1)	7
Gideon (Judg. 8:28)	40
Rule of Abimelech (Judg. 9:22)	3
Tola (Judg. 10:2)	23
Jair (Judg. 10:3)	22
Oppression. The Ammonites (Judg. 10:8)	18
Jephthah (Judg. 12:7)	6
Ibzan (Judg. 12:9)	7
Elon (Judg. 12:11)	10
Abdon (Judg. 12:14)	8
Oppression. The Philistines (Judg. 13:1)	40
Samson (Judg. 15:20; 16:31)	20
C. Eli, priest in Shiloh (I Sam. 4:18)	40	20
Samuel. Ark in Kirjath-jearim (I Sam. 7:2)	20
Saul, king	?
David, king in Hebron (I Kings 2:11)	7	} 40
David, king in Jerusalem (I Kings 2:11)	33
Solomon, king (I Kings 11:42)	40

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

TABLE VII. COMPARATIVE CHRONOLOGY OF THE KINGS OF JUDAH AND ISRAEL FROM SOLOMON TO THE EXILE

KINGS OF JUDAH	REGNAL YEARS	B.C.	DATED EVENTS	KINGS OF ISRAEL	REGNAL YEARS	B.C.
Rehoboam	8 (17)	922-915	Sheshonk of Egypt, XXII Dynasty (Lybian), raids Palestine, the 5th year of Rehoboam, ca. 918 B.C. (I Kings 14:25; II Chr. 12:2)	Jeroboam	22	922-901
Abijam	3	915-913		Nadab	2	901-900
Asa	41	913-873		Baasha	24	900-877
				Elah	2	877-876
				Zimri	7 days	876
Jehoshaphat	25	873-849	Omri builds Samaria after 6 years of reign in Tirzah, ca. 870 B.C. (I Kings 16:23-24) Shalmaneser III of Assyria, 859-824 B.C., fights Ahab and the Syrian confederates at Qarqar, ca. 853 B.C., Monolith of Shalmaneser	Omri	8 (12)	876-869
				Ahab	20 (22)	869-850
Jehoram	8	849-842	According to II Kings 3:7-27, the death of Jehoshaphat occurred some time after the accession of Joram of Israel, since both kings personally joined in the war against Moab	Ahaziah	2	850-849
Ahaziah	1	842	Ahaziah of Judah and Joram of Israel slain the same day by Jehu, 842 B.C. (II Kings 9:21-28)	Joram	8 (12)	849-842
Athaliah, queen	6 (7)	842-837		Ca. 841 B.C. Jehu pays tribute to Shalmaneser III of Assyria, 859-824 B.C. (Black Obelisk , and Annals)	Jehu	28
Jehoash	38 (40)	837-800	Ca. 738 B.C. Menahem pays tribute to Pulu (Tiglath-pileser III) of Assyria, 745-727 B.C. (II Kings 15:19, and Assyrian documents)	Joahaz	15 (17)	815-801
Amaziah	18 (29)	800-783		Joash	16	801-786
Azariah (Uzziah)	42 (52)	783-742		Jeroboam	41	786-746
Jotham, regent	8?	750-742		Zechariah	6 mos.	746-745
				Shallum	1 mo.	745
Jotham, king	8 (16)	742-735		Menahem	8+ (10)	745-738
				Pekahia	2	738-737
Ahaz	21±(16)	735-715	Pekah and Rezon of Syria besiege Jerusalem, ca. 734 B.C. (II Kings 16:5) Ca. 733-732 B.C., campaign of Tiglath-pileser III in Palestine (Annals) Hoshea, enthroned by Tiglath-pileser III, ca. 732 B.C.; pays tribute to Shalmaneser V of Assyria, 727-722 B.C. (II Kings 17:3); taken into captivity, ca. 724 B.C. (II Kings 17:4) 3 years' siege of Samaria (II Kings 17:5) ends between December 722, accession of Sargon II of Assyria, 722-705 B.C., and the spring of 721 B.C. (Assyrian documents)	Pekah	6- (20)	737-732
			Hoshea	9	732-724

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

TABLE VII. Concluded

KINGS OF JUDAH	REGNAL YEARS	B.C.	DATED EVENTS	KINGS OF ISRAEL	REGNAL YEARS	B.C.
Hezekiah	29	715-687	Sennacherib of Assyria, 705-681 B.C., invades Judah, the 14th year of Hezekiah, ca. 701 B.C. (II Kings 18:13, and Assyrian documents)
Manasseh	45 (55)	687-642	Taken prisoner by king of Assyria, possibly Esarhaddon, 681-669 B.C., or rather, Ashurbanipal, 669-626 B.C. (II Chr. 33:11)
Amon	2	642-640
Josiah	31	640-609	Deuteronomic reform, the 18th year of Josiah, ca. 622 B.C. (II Kings 22:3; 23:23; II Chr. 34:8; 35:19) 612 B.C., fall of Nineveh, beginning of Neo-Babylonian Empire; Assyrian kings fight till 609 B.C. Josiah killed in battle at Megiddo, against Necho of Egypt, XXVI (Saite) Dynasty (II Kings 23:29; II Chr. 35:22-24)
Jehoahaz	3 mos.	609	Taken into captivity by Necho (II Kings 23:33-34; II Chr. 36:3)
Jehoiakim	11	609-598	Enthroned by Necho (II Kings 23:34; II Chr. 36:4) 1st year of Nebuchadrezzar of Babylon, 605-562 B.C., 4th of Jehoiakim., ca. 605 B.C., prophecy on the ruin of Judah (Jer. 25:1) 7th year of Nebuchadrezzar, ca. 599 B.C., deportation of 3,023 Jews (Jer. 52:28)
Jehoiachin	3 mos.	598	Taken into captivity the 8th year of Nebuchadrezzar, ca. 598 B.C. (II Kings 24:12; II Chr. 36:10)
Zedekiah	11	598-587	Enthroned by Nebuchadrezzar (II Kings 24:27) 18th year of Nebuchadrezzar, 10th of Zedekiah, ca. 588 B.C., Jerusalem besieged (Jer. 32:1-2); deportation of 832 persons from Jerusalem (Jer. 52:29) 19th year of Nebuchadrezzar, 587 B.C., Jerusalem destroyed (II Kings 25:8; Jer. 52:12-13) 23rd year of Nebuchadrezzar, ca. 583 B.C., deportation of 745 Jews (Jer. 52:30) Jehoiachin received by Evil-merodach (Awel-Marduk) of Babylon, 562-560 B.C., in the year of his accession (Jer. 52:31)

gives a total of 580 years for the entire period, that is, 544 years from the Exodus to the construction of the temple, and consequently 544—114=430 years of Hebrew rule. The period from the Exodus to the construction of Solomon's temple is thus regarded as strictly equal to the sojourn of the Hebrews in Canaan and in Egypt according to Exod. 12:40 (LXX).

The above remarks demonstrate the conventional character of the biblical chronology of this period, and the inadvisability of using its figures for the computation of historical synchronisms. Attempts at relating the chronology of Joshua-Judges to the vicissitudes of the fast dwindling power of Egypt lead to highly questionable results.

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

The dates of David and Solomon, if one is to assume the historicity of the numbers of their regnal years, may be deduced from the chronology of their successors, the kings of Judah and of Israel.

Thus the period from the Exodus to the death of Solomon can be outlined as shown at the end of Table V.

The generally accepted date for the death of Solomon, and consequently Rehoboam's accession and the schism, is 933-932 B.C. Modern historians tend to depart from this date for the following reasons: II Chr. 16:1 states that Baasha was still reigning in the thirty-sixth year of Asa. If one were to follow the chronology of the author of Kings, the thirty-sixth year of Asa would fall after Baasha's death. If the indication of the Chronicler is to be taken into account, and if the number of the regnal years of the Israelite kings is not to be increased drastically, the reign of Rehoboam ought to be shortened by a decade or so. Thus the death of Solomon would have taken place ca. 922 B.C.¹

¹Cf. William F. Albright's discussion in "The Chronology of the Divided Monarchy of Israel," Bulletin of the American Schools of Oriental Research, No. 100 (1945), p. 20, n. 14.

D. From Solomon to the Exile.—The biblical data consist of a double set of chronological indications recorded in I and II Kings and parallels. (a) Regnal years of each king, sometimes with their age when enthroned. (b) Synchronisms between the kings of Judah and the kings of Israel, sometimes with synchronisms with the history of Egypt and Mesopotamia.

These data are drawn from official annals of the kingdoms and, on account of their historical character, can be used as the framework of the chronological succession of the kings of Judah and Israel, with reference to events known and dated from other sources such as the fall of Samaria, which occurred shortly after the accession of Sargon II of Assyria.

However, the interpretation of the data is made difficult for the following reasons: (a) There are occasional divergent readings in the Hebrew and the Greek. (b) There is also frequent disagreement between the synchronisms recorded in the Bible and the absolute numbers of regnal years.

Whereas Wellhausenian critics inclined to give up the synchronisms as purely conventional and therefore unreliable, Joachim Begrich has proved conclusively that most of the variants

TABLE VIII. COMPARATIVE CHRONOLOGY OF HEBREW AND PERSIAN HISTORY AFTER THE EXILE

PERSIAN KINGS	DATED EVENTS
Cyrus, 539-530 B.C. (counting from the conquest of Babylon)	Edict for the return of the Jews, the 1st (formal) year of Cyrus, ca. 538 B.C. (Ezra 1:1) Zerubbabel undertakes to restore the temple, the 2nd year after the return, ca. 537 B.C. (Ezra 3:8); work interrupted (Ezra 4:5, 24)
Cambyses, 530-522 B.C.	Jewish community established at Elephantine, before 525 B.C. (conquest of Egypt); papyri range from 500 to 400 B.C.
Darius I, 522-486 B.C.	Work at the temple resumed the 2nd year of Darius, ca. 520 B.C. (Ezra 4:24; Hag. 1:15); completed the 6th year of Darius, ca. 516 B.C. (Ezra 6:15)
Xerxes I (Ahasuerus) 486-465 B.C.	Opposition to the Jews (Ezra 4:6)
Artaxerxes I, Longimanus, 465-424 B.C.	Opposition to the Jews (Ezra 4:7-23) Return of Ezra, the 7th year of Artaxerxes, ca. 458 B.C. (Ezra 7:7, according to the actual order of the book) Nehemiah, governor of Judah, from the 20th to the 32nd year of Artaxerxes, ca. 445-433 B.C. (Neh. 2:1; 5:14) Nehemiah back to Persia the 32nd year of Artaxerxes, ca. 433 B.C., and 2nd mission to Palestine (Neh. 13:6)
Xerxes II, 424-423 B.C.
Darius II, 423-404 B.C.
Artaxerxes II, Mnemon, 404-358 B.C.	Return of Ezra, the 7th year of Artaxerxes, ca. 397 B.C. (Ezra 7:7, as suggested by several exegetes for reasons of internal evidence)
Artaxerxes III, 358-338 B.C.
Arses, 338-336 B.C.
Darius III, Codomannus, 336-331 B.C.

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

and of the so-called erroneous synchronisms resulted from several attempts at systematizing historical data, and had an objective value.² At the same time, he was successful in explaining rationaly the origin of many discrepancies. Yet his effort to fit all data goes too far, and the proportion of trivial errors in the transmission of the text is probably greater than he would admit.

² Die Chronologie der Könige von Israel und Juda (Tubingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1929).

Some of the difficulties are of a historical

TABLE IX. COMPARATIVE CHRONOLOGY OF HEBREW AND HELLENISTIC HISTORY TO THE ROMAN CONQUEST

HELLENISTIC KINGS		DATED EVENTS
PTOLEMIES (Egypt)	SELEUCIDS (Asia Minor and Syria)
(Alexander the Great, 336-323 B.C.)		(Fall of Tyre, ca. 332 B.C.)
Ptolemy I, Soter, 323-283 B.C.	Seleucus I, Nicator, 312-280 B.C.	Seleucid Era begins, October, 312 B.C.
Ptolemy II, Philadelphus, [285]283-246 B.C.	Antiochus I, 280-261 B.C. Antiochus II, 261-247 B.C.	In Alexandria, version of the LXX Papyri of Zeno, agent of Ptolemy II
Ptolemy III, 246-221 B.C.	Seleucus II, 247-226 B.C. Seleucus III, 226-223 B.C.
Ptolemy IV, 221-203 B.C.	Antiochus III, the Great, 223-187 B.C.	Following the battle of Panion, Palestine, lost to the Ptolemies, passes under the control of the Seleucids, 198 B.C.
Ptolemy V, 203-181 B.C.	Seleucus IV, 187-175 B.C.
Ptolemies continue under Roman protectorate until 30 B.C., when Egypt becomes a Roman province	Antiochus IV, Epiphanes, 175-163 B.C. Antiochus V, 163-162 B.C. Demetrius I, 162-150 B.C. Alexander Balas, usurper, 150-145 B.C. Antiochus VI, 145-142/1 B.C. Demetrius II, 145-139/8 B.C. Antiochus VII, Sidetes, 139/8-129 B.C. Seleucids continue amidst rivalries until Syria becomes a Roman province, 65 B.C.	Persecution of the Jews, pollution of the temple, 167 B.C. (I Macc. 1:57)
		THE MACCABEES
		Judas, 166-160 B.C.; temple purified, 164 B.C. (I Macc. 4:52)
		Jonathan, 160-142 B.C., high priest, 152 B.C. (I Macc. 10:21)
		Simon, 142-134 B.C.; recognized by Demetrius, 142 B.C. (I Macc. 13:41)
		John Hyrcanus I, 134-104 B.C.
		Judas Aristobulus I, 104-103 B.C.
		Alexander Jannaeus, 103-76 B.C.
		Alexandra, queen, 76-67 B.C.
		Aristobulus II, 67-63 B.C.
		Pompey takes Jerusalem, 63 B.C.
		Maccabean dynasty continues nominally: Hyrcanus II, 63-40 B.C. Antigonus Mattathias, 40-37 B.C.
		Antipater and his son Herod rise to effective power

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

TABLE X. NEW TESTAMENT EVENTS SYNCHRONIZED WITH ROMAN AND PALESTINIAN HISTORY AFTER THE ROMAN CONQUEST

ROME	PALESTINE			NEW TESTAMENT
	ITURAEA, TRACHONITIS, ETC	GALILEE	JUDEA
First Triumvirate, 60 B.C.: Pompey, Caesar, Crassus	Conquest of Jerusalem by Pompey, 63 B.C. Hyrcanus II, 63-40 B.C.			Jesus born before the spring of 4 B.C. Baptism of Jesus, the 15th year of Tiberius, A.D. 28/29 Crucifixion (year uncertain) Damascus controlled by Aretas, ca. A.D. 37-40; conversion of Paul (II Cor. 11:32) The apostles persecuted (Acts 12) Gallio proconsul in Achaia, A.D. 51- 52; Paul in Corinth (Acts 18:12) Paul arrested under Felix, in prison for 2 years, appears before Festus (Acts 24:27-25:27)
Second Triumvirate, 43 B.C.: Antony, Octavius, Lepi- dus	Antigonus Mattathias, 40-37 B.C.
Augustus (Octavius), 31 B.C.-A.D. 14	Herod the Great, nominated, 40 B.C.; be- gan to reign 37 B.C.; died, spring of 4 B.C.
Tiberius, A.D. 14-37	Philip, 4 B.C.-A.D. 34	Herod Antipas, 4 B.C.-A.D. 40	Archelaus, 4 B.C.-A.D. 6 Procurators, A.D. 6-41 (Pontius Pilate in office, A.D. 26-36)
Caligula, A.D. 37-41	Agrippa I, A.D. 34-44	Agrippa I, A.D. 40-44	Agrippa I, A.D. 41-44
Claudius, A.D. 41-54			Procurators, A.D. 44-66
Nero, A.D. 54-68	Agrippa II, A.D. 53-93	Agrippa II, A.D. 54/5-93	(Felix in office, A.D. 52- 60; Festus, in office, A.D. 61-62)
Galba, Otho, Vitellius, A.D. 68	First revolt of the Jews, be- gins A.D. 66
Vespasian, A.D. 69-79	Fall of Jerusalem, A.D. 70 Fall of Masada, A.D. 73
Titus, A.D. 79-81 Domitian, A.D. 81-96 Nerva, A.D. 96-98 Trajan, A.D. 98-117 Hadrian, A.D. 117-138	Second revolt of the Jews, A.D. 132-135 Foundation of Colonia Aelia Capitolina over the ruins of Jerusalem, A.D. 136

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

nature, such as the confusion of the period extending from the death of Baasha to the accession of Omri, or the obscurity of the circumstances which marked the accession of the kings of Judah from Jehoash to Jotham.

Technical difficulties are equally perplexing. Such is the relation of regnal years to calendar years. It is generally admitted that the Hebrew annalists practiced antedating—that is, counting as first year of the king the remaining portion of the calendar year in which his accession took place. Postdating, however, may have prevailed in Judah from Manasseh to Zedekiah, the first official year being then the full calendar year following the accession.

Another difficulty arises from the reckoning of New Year's Day. The year normally began with the autumnal equinox. One may question Begrich's affirmation that the practice of beginning the year in the spring was introduced in Judah before 620 B.C.

In Table VII the initial and final dates of reigns are borrowed from William F. Albright, who revised the chronology of Begrich in the light of intervening publications.³ In the columns of regnal years figures in parentheses are those of the Hebrew Bible (and King James Version), before adjustment. Horizontal lines mark interruptions in the normal succession of the kings. All dates are approximate.

E. From the Exile to the Roman Conquest.—Whereas the books of Kings and parallels constitute a suitable framework for the chronology of the Hebrew kingdoms, the documentation of the period extending from the Exile to the Roman conquest is scanty and discontinuous. The books of Ezra and Nehemiah, which may be described as a collection of miscellaneous documents without a strict chronological order, contain a few synchronisms with Persian history.

After a gap of more than two centuries, a few dates of interest for the history of the Hebrews under the rule or in the sphere of influence of the Hellenistic kingdoms of Egypt and Syria are available in the books of the Maccabees and in the writings of Josephus.

In Tables VIII and IX the chronology of the Persian and Hellenistic kingdoms is used as the framework for dated events from Hebrew history.

³ Op. cit., pp. 16-21.

F. From the Roman Conquest to the Destruction of Jerusalem.—The succession of events which brought about the overthrow of the republican institutions of the Romans and the list of the emperors, as well as of the local rulers appointed or recognized by Rome for the control of Palestine, constitute the framework of a chronology of the Gospels and early apostolic history.

Unfortunately, the chronological indications given by the Gospels and the Acts of the Apostles are few and of difficult interpretation. The date of the birth of Jesus is not known with certainty. Our Christian Era, derived from the chronology of Dionysius Exiguus, is several years late. According to Matt. 2:1, 19 Jesus was born some time before the death of Herod, which occurred in the spring of 4 B.C. Luke 2:2 dates the birth of Jesus with reference to a census taken by Cyrenius (Quirinius), governor of Syria. No precision can be obtained from this statement on account of unsettled difficulties of interpretation and even of translation.

The extensive synchronism recorded by Luke 3:1 dates the baptism of Jesus and the beginning of his ministry from the fifteenth year of Tiberius, that is, A.D. 28/29, depending on the reckoning of the first regnal year as A.D. 14 or, postdating, 15. A few exegetes, interpreting strictly the statement that Jesus was "about thirty years of age" (Luke 3:23), have suggested that the years of Tiberius be counted from the time when he was associated with the government of Augustus, ca. A.D. 11-12, and that the date of the baptism should be antedated accordingly. This manner of reckoning, however, finds little support in the literature of the age.

On the other hand, John 2:20 states that in the time of the (first) passover recorded (John 2:13, 23) forty-six years had elapsed since the beginning of the construction of the temple, in the eighteenth year of Herod (20/19 B.C.). If one starts from 19 B.C., the forty-sixth year is A.D. 27.

John's various references to Jewish festivals have been used to fix the duration of the ministry of Jesus, and consequently the date of his

TABLE XI. JEWISH FESTIVALS MENTIONED IN THE FOURTH GOSPEL

KJV	HYPOTHESIS 1	HYPOTHESIS 2	HYPOTHESIS 3
John 2:13 passover	passover 28	passover 28	passover 28
John 5:1 a feast			=passover 29
John 6:4 passover	text emended	passover 29	passover 30
John 7:2 tabernacles
John 10:22 dedication
John 11:55 passover	passover 29	passover 30	passover 31
Total duration of the public life	over one year	over two years	over three years

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

death. According to divergent interpretations, the interval between the Baptism and the Crucifixion is over one year, or over two years, or over three years.

On account of these variations, Table X records only those events from the Gospels or the Acts which can be synchronized objectively with the course of general history.

Table XI shows alternate arrangements of the recording of Jewish festivals during the public life of Jesus, the last Passover referred to by John 11:55 coinciding with the time of the Passion. The dates, entirely hypothetical, assume that the Baptism took place in the early months of A.D. 28.

II. Calendars

A. Hebrew Calendar.—The Hebrew calendar was based on the empirical observation of the phases of the moon. The year consisted of twelve lunar months, which were counted each from the first appearance of the crescent of the new moon (neomenia). The lunar year being approximately eleven days shorter than the solar year, it was necessary to repeat the last month every two or three years in order to keep calendar dates in accordance with the seasons. The scientific determination of the neomenias and of the leap year of thirteen months was probably not introduced until after the Talmudic period.

The Israelites first called their months by Canaanite names, four of which are recorded in the Bible. Postexilic and late Judaism adopted Babylonian names, which were transliterated in Hebrew, and are still in use in the modern Jewish calendar. Table XII gives both series. The correspondence with the months of the Julian calendar is only approximate.

The first day of nīsān marks the beginning of the year with regard to the computation of pass-over. For other purposes the year began in autumn, on the first of tishrī, which was solemnized as New Year's Day (rōsh hashshānāh).

The ancient Hebrews had no era for the recording of dates, which were computed by reference to some memorable event such as, under the monarchy, the accession year of the reigning king.

The sabbath or seventh day of the week now begins on Friday at dusk, since the days are counted from sunset to sunset. The periodic week replaced sometime before the Exile the ancient division of each month according to the phases of the moon.

B. Hellenistic Calendar.—A calendar of Macedonian origin was introduced by the Hellenistic rulers of Palestine, but was not generally accepted by the Jews. The lunar months of the original Macedonian calendar had been transformed in Egypt into months of thirty days, to which five days were added after the twelfth month to approximate the solar year. In the regions ruled by the Seleucids the Macedonian calendar was harmonized with the Neo-Babylonian calendar of twelve lunar months, and an additional month on leap years. Thus the correspondence of Seleucid and Neo-Babylonian dates can be established with some accuracy.

In Antioch, following the adoption of the Seleucidan Era (312 B.C.), New Year's Day was the first of Ὑπερβερεταῖος (= tishrī). During the Roman period, the Syro-Macedonian months were often equated to the Julian months, in this manner:

Ὑπερβερεταῖος	October
Δίος	November
Ἀπελλαῖος	December
Αὔδυναῖος	January
Περίτιος	February
Δύστρος	March
Ἐανθικός	April
Ἀρτεμίσιος	May
Δαίσιος	June
Πάνημος	July
Λῶφος	August
Γορπιαῖος	September

TABLE XII. HEBREW CALENDAR

CANAANITE	BABYLONIAN	JULIAN
'ābhībh ziw	nīsān 'iyyār šiwān tammūz 'ābh ''lūl	March-April April-May May-June June-July July-August August-September
'ēthāntm bāl	tishrī marheshwān kišlēw tēbhēth sh'bhāt ' dhār (repeated on leap years)	September-October October-November November-December December-January January-February February-March

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

In Babylon, however, the beginning of the year continued to be celebrated in the spring. In free cities having particular eras, the first of Δίος, which in Macedonia was regarded as New Year's Day, was often caused to coincide with the anniversary of the era.

C. Festivals.—In addition to the sabbath and the neomenia, the Jews kept the following festivals:

Pésah, Passover, 14th-15th of nîsân, and the following seven days

Shâbhû'ôth, Pentecost, the 50th day after pésah

Rôsh hashshânâh, New Year's Day, 1st of tishri

Yôm kippûr, Day of Atonement, 10th of tishri

Sukkôth, Tabernacles, 15th-23rd of tishri

H'anukkâh, dedication of the temple by Judas Maccabee (165 B.C.), 25th of kišlêw and the following seven days

Pûrim, commemoration of the events recorded in the book of Esther, 14th-15th of dhâr* (second dhâr* on leap years)

Table XIII gives by way of illustration the dates of the main festivals according to the standard computation of the modern Jewish calendar. Years are counted according to the so-called "World Era," introduced by the Talmudists. Leap years are marked with an asterisk.

III. Metrology

A. Measures of Length.—In the Old Testament standard units of length are named by reference to parts of the human body. (See Table XIV.)

Surveyors and architects used a measuring "reed," the length of which was expressed in cubits. In Judg. 3:16 the Hebrew גָּמַד (gômedh), otherwise unknown, is interpreted "cubit" in the King James Version.

The current ratio between the units of length is shown in the following chart:

1 cubit	= 2 spans
	= 6 handbreadths
	= 24 fingers
1 span	= 3 handbreadths
	= 12 fingers
1 handbreadth	= 4 fingers

TABLE XIII. JEWISH FESTIVALS

ANNO MUNDI	5713	5714*	5715	5716	5717*	5718	5719*	5720
Rôsh hashshânâh 1 tishri	Sep. 20 1952	Sep. 10 1953	Sep. 28 1954	Sep. 17 1955	Sep. 6 1956	Sep. 26 1957	Sep. 15 1958	Oct. 3 1959
Yôm Kippûr 10 tishri	Sep. 29	Sep. 19	Oct. 7	Sep. 26	Sep. 15	Oct. 5	Sep. 24	Oct. 12
Sukkôth (first day) 15 tishri	Oct. 4	Sep. 24	Oct. 12	Oct. 1	Sep. 20	Oct. 10	Sep. 29	Oct. 17
H'anukkâh (first day) 25 kišlêw	Dec. 13	Dec. 2	Dec. 20	Dec. 10	Nov. 29	Dec. 18	Dec. 7	Dec. 26
Pûrim (first day) 14 *dhâr	Mar. 1 1953		Mar. 8 1955	Feb. 26 1956		Mar. 6 1958		Mar. 13 1960
14 *dhâr II (on leap years)		Mar. 19 1954			Mar. 17 1957		Mar. 24 1959
Pésah (first night) 14 nîsân	Mar. 30	Apr. 17	Apr. 6	Mar. 26	Apr. 15	Apr. 4	Apr. 22	Apr. 11
Shâbhû'ôth 6 šiwan	May 20	Jun. 7	May 27	May 16	Jun. 5	May 25	Jun. 12	Jun. 1

TABLE XIV. OLD TESTAMENT STANDARD UNITS OF LENGTH

HEBREW	KJV	RSV
אמָה 'ammâh	cubit	cubit
זֶרֶת zêreth	span	span
תָּפַח tôphah, têphah	handbreadth	handbreadth
אֶצְבָּע 'eçba'	finger	finger

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

The cubit which was to be used in Ezekiel's new Jerusalem is described as equal to a "cubit and a handbreadth" of the current system (Ezek. 40:5; 43:13). This is not to be interpreted as an innovation, but rather as a return to a system of measures used for the buildings of Solomon (II Chr. 3:3) which may be restored as follows:

- 1 cubit = 2 spans
- = 7 handbreadths
- = 28 fingers
- 1 span = 3½ handbreadths
- = 14 fingers
- 1 handbreadth = 4 fingers

The value of the cubit cannot be determined directly, but only by deduction. The inscription of Siloam attributes to the aqueduct of Hezekiah a length of 1,200 cubits. The actual measurement of the aqueduct, from the spring to the pool, being 533.1 meters, or 1,749 feet, the value of the cubit is therefore 444.25 millimeters, or 17.49 inches. Hence the Hebrew system of linear measures may tentatively be expressed as shown in Table XV.

In the New Testament the following terms are used for measures of length:

πῆχυς, "cubit." Considered as equivalent to 1½ feet of the Hellenistic system of measures.
 ὄργυια, "fathom." Approximately 1.84 meters, or 72.44 inches.

B. Measures of Distance.—In the Old Testament distances are not measured directly, but are suggested by such expressions as "three days' journey" (Gen. 30:36), "seven days' journey" (Gen. 31:23).

Distance is measured in the New Testament according to the following:

στάδιον, "furlong" (KJV), "stadion," or an evaluation of distance in "miles" (RSV). The Alexandrine stadion equals 184.83 meters, or 606 feet 2 inches.

μίλιον, "mile." The Roman mile was usually considered as equal to 8 stadia, thus approximately 1,478 meters, or 4,879 feet. The Jews, however, regarded it as the equivalent of ¼ of a parasang (a Persian measure of distance), or 7½ stadia, thus approximately 1,386 meters, or 4,546 feet.

ἡμέρας σαββάτου, "a sabbath day's journey" (Acts 1:12). According to Josephus, this is a distance of 6 stadia, thus about 1,109 meters, or 3,637 feet.

C. Measures of Area.—Only one specific measure of area is found:

צמד, śemedh, "acre" (I Sam. 14:14; Isa. 5:10). As much land as a team of oxen (śemedh) can plow in one day.

The area of a piece of ground can also be determined by the quantity of seed required for sowing (I Kings 18:32).

D. Measures of Capacity.—Table XVI shows Old Testament measures of capacity.

Hōmer and kōr have the same capacity; also 'ēphāh and bath; ōmer* and 'issārōn are synonyms. In Ezekiel, and later, the kōr is reserved for liquids. In Isa. 40:12 שְׁלִישׁ, shālīsh, "one third" (of an 'ēphāh), is rendered by "measure" in the King James and Revised Standard Versions.

TABLE XV. HEBREW SYSTEM OF LINEAR MEASURES

MEASURE	COMMON SCALE		EZEKIEL'S SCALE
	millimeters	inches	millimeters	inches
cubit	444.25	17.49	518.29	20.405
span	222.12	8.745	259.14	10.202
handbreadth	74.04	2.915	74.04	2.915
finger	18.51	0.728	18.51	0.728

TABLE XVI. OLD TESTAMENT MEASURES OF CAPACITY

HEBREW	KJV	RSV	MEASURE
חומר hōmer	homer	homer	dry
כר kōr	measure, cor	measure, cor	dry and liquid
לֶתֶךְ lēthekh	half homer	lethekh	dry
אֵיפָה 'ēphāh	ephah, measure	ephah, measure	dry
בַּת bath	bath	bath	liquid
סֹמֶה s'āh	measure	measure	dry
הֵין hīn	hin	hin	liquid
עֹמֶר 'ōmer	omer	omer	dry
עֶשְׂרוֹן 'issārōn	tenth deal	tenth part (of ephah)	dry
קַב qabh	cab	kab	dry and liquid
לֹג lōgh	log	log	liquid

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

The ratio between the units of capacity is known from biblical and extrabiblical sources, mostly Hellenistic. It is shown in the following lists:

DRY MEASURES
1 hōmer (kōr)	= 2 léthehh = 10 'éphāh = 30 š'āh = 100 'ōmer ('issārōn) = 180 qabh = 720 lōgh
1 léthehh	= 5 'éphāh = 15 š'āh = 50 'ōmer = 90 qabh = 360 lōgh
1 'éphāh	= 3 š'āh = 10 'ōmer = 18 qabh = 72 lōgh
1 š'āh	= 3 1/3 'ōmer = 6 qabh = 24 lōgh
1 'ōmer ('issārōn)	= 1 4/5 qabh = 7 1/5 lōgh
1 qabh	= 4 lōgh

LIQUID MEASURES

1 kōr	= 10 bath = 60 hīn = 180 qabh = 720 lōgh
1 bath	= 6 hīn = 18 qabh = 72 lōgh
1 hīn	= 3 qabh = 12 lōgh
1 qabh	= 4 lōgh

The evaluation of the Hebrew measures of capacity in units of modern systems remains thus far uncertain. Two restored jars from Lachish, marked respectively with a royal seal and a private seal, have been assumed to contain one bath each, on account of their similarity with a jar stamped bath lammélekh, "royal bath," of which only fragments were recovered.⁴ The latter, however, was certainly smaller than the former two. William F. Albright has shown that the big Lachish jars were possibly twice as capacious as the jars labeled "royal bath."⁵

⁴ Charles H. Inge, "Post Scriptum on Ancient Hebrew Inscriptions," Palestine Exploration Quarterly for 1941, pp. 106-9.

The average volume of the two restored jars from Lachish is 2,806.096 cubic inches, equivalent to 45.982 liters, or 12.147 U.S. gallons. If, according to Albright's hypothesis, they represent a double bath standard, the system of Hebrew measures of capacity may tentatively be expressed as shown in Table XVII.

The hypothetical character of Table XVII must be kept in mind. It does not agree with evaluations of Hebrew measures in terms of Hellenistic or Roman standards, e.g., bath = μετρητής (approximately 39 liters, or 10.3 U.S. gallons), and lōgh = sextarius (approximately 0.53 liters, or 1.12 U.S. pints). Such evaluations, formulated by ancient authors, do not express a strict equivalence, but rather a comparison, as we assimilate the yard to the meter, or the quart to the liter.

Measures of capacity in the New Testament fall into two classes:

a) Names of measures transcribed from the Hebrew:

βάτος, "measure" = Hebrew bath
κόρος, "measure" = Hebrew kōr στάτον, "measure" = Hebrew š'āh

b) Hellenistic and Roman measures:

μετρητής, "firkin" (KJV); "measure" (RSV). Liquid measure. About 39 liters, or 10.3 U.S. gallons.
χοϊνίς, "measure" (KJV), "quart" (RSV). Dry measure. About 1.08 liters, or 0.98 U.S. dry quart. μῶδιος (Latin modius), "bushel" (Matt. 5:15). Dry measure. About 8.49 liters, or 7.68 U.S. dry quarts. ξέστης (Latin sextarius), "pot" (Mark 7:4). Dry and liquid measure. About 0.53 liter, or 0.96 U.S. dry pint, or 1.12 U.S. liquid pints.

In the last two instances, however, the stress is not on the metrological value of the units mentioned.

⁵ "The Excavation of Tell Beit Mirsim," Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research, XXI-XXII (1941-43), 58, n. 7.

TABLE XVII. HEBREW MEASURES OF CAPACITY

HEBREW	CUBIC INCHES	LITERS	U.S. LIQUID MEASURES	U.S. DRY MEASURES
hōmer = kōr	14,030.480	229.913	60.738 gal.	6.524 bu.
léthehh	7,015.240	114.956	30.369 gal.	3.262 bu.
'éphāh = bath	1,403.048	22.991	6.073 gal.	20.878 qt.
š'āh	467.682	7.663		6.959 qt.
hīn	233.841	3.831	1.012 gal.
'ōmer = 'issārōn	140.304	2.299		2.087 qt.
qabh	77.947	1.277	1.349 qt.	1.159 qt.
lōgh	19.486	0.319	0.674 pt.

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

E. Measures of Weight.—Old Testament measures of weight and their equivalents may be seen in Table XVIII.

The current ratio between the units of weight, as established from biblical and extrabiblical evidence, is shown as follows:

1 kikkār =	60 māneh
	= 3,000 shéqel
	= 6,000 béqa'
	= 60,000 gērāh
1 māneh =	50 shéqel
	= 100 béqa'
	= 1,000 gērāh
1 shéqel =	2 béqa'
	= 20 gērāh
1 béqa' =	10 gērāh

This system may have superseded another scale of weights, which Ezekiel would have restored in his ideal theocracy (Ezek. 45:12), and which may be expressed as follows:

1 kikkār =	60 māneh
	= 3,600 shéqel
	= 7,200 bēqa'
	= 72,000 gērāh
1 māneh =	60 shéqel
	= 120 béqa'
	= 1,200 gērāh
1 shéqel =	2 béqa'
	= 20 gērāh
1 béqa' =	10 gērāh

The value of the shéqel, which is the basic unit of both systems, can be determined inductively from stone weights discovered in the course of archaeological excavations. The following averages were obtained from lists of weights compiled in 1932, and from material recently discovered at Beth Zur, Ain Shems, Megiddo, Lachish, Tell Beit Mirsim, and Tell en-Nasbeh.⁶ Dubious or defective samples have been excluded.

A first series of weights bears the conventional sign for shéqel, followed eventually with an indication of the number of standard units. Frequent multiples are 2, 4, 8, and 16 shekels. Average weight: 11.424 grams, or 176.29 grains. Uninscribed weights are often slightly lighter.

Some weights marked עֵיִם, páyim, average 7.624 grams, or 117.65 grains. If páyim is correctly interpreted "two thirds," the corresponding unit would be 11.436 grams, or 176.47 grains. These weights, together with a few uninscribed samples, might therefore be regarded as current fractions of the shéqel standard.

A few weights marked בָּקָע, béqa', average 6.112 grams, or 94.32 grains. Some uninscribed weights come close to these figures. If the béqa' weights are considered as half shekels (see above), the corresponding unit would be a weight of 12.224 grams, or 188.64 grains, noticeably heavier than the units of the previous series. They seem to represent a different standard.

A few weights marked נֶשֶׁפֶת, néceph, average 9.875 grams, or 152.39 grains, and compare with some uninscribed material. They are considerably lighter than the shéqel weights, and probably belong to a different standard.

Table XIX gives the equivalents of the entire series of Hebrew weights in metric notation and in weights airoirdupois.

⁶ Georges A. Barrois, "Métrologie dans la Bible," Revue Biblique, XLI (1932), 50-76. O. R. Sellers, The Citadel of Beth Zur (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1933), p. 60. Elihu Grant and G. E. Wright, Ain Shems Excavations V (Haverford: 1939), p. 159, Pls. LII-LIII. R. S. Lamon and G. M. Shipton, Megiddo, Seasons of 1925-34, Strata I-V (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1939), Pl.

TABLE XVIII. OLD TESTAMENT MEASURES OF WEIGHT

HEBREW	KJV	RSV
כִּכָּר kikkār	talent	talent
מָנֶה māneh	pound, maneh	mina
שֶׁקֶל shéqel	shekel	shekel
בָּקָע béqa'	bekah, half a shekel	beka, half a shekel
גֵּרָה gērāh	gerah	gerah

TABLE XIX. EQUIVALENTS OF HEBREW WEIGHTS

HEBREW	COMMON SCALE (1 māneh = 50 shekels)		EZEKIEL'S SCALE (1 māneh = 60 shekels)
	Metric	Avoirdupois	Metric	Avoirdupois
kikkār	34.272 kg.	75.558 lb.	41.126 kg.	88.485 lb.
māneh	571.2 g.	20.148 oz.	685.44 g.	24.178 oz.
shéqel	11.424 g.	176.29 gr.	11.424 g.	176.29 gr.
béqa'	5.712 g.	88.14 gr.	5.712 g.	88.14 gr.
gērāh	0.571 g.	8.81 gr.	0.571 g.	8.81 gr.

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

Few allusions are made to weights in the New Testament. The words τάλαντον, "talent," and μῶδ (Hebrew māneh), "pound," refer, not to weights, but to sums of money (see below).

In John 12:3; 19:39, λίτρα is a Greek interpretation of the Roman libra, "pound," about 326 grams, or 0.719 pound avoirdupois.

IV. Numismatics

A. Early Means of Exchange.—Among the Canaanites and the Hebrews, largely devoted to pastoral life, the sheep, or its equivalent in precious metal, constituted the earliest standard for commercial transactions. Thus the Septuagint translates the Hebrew קשיטת, qesitāh, by ἀμνός, ἀμνάς, "lamb" or "ewe." The ingots of metal had to be weighed out in each transaction, since their value and purity were not officially guaranteed. Hence sums of money were counted according to standards of weight, as in Gen. 23:16. In the King James Version the rendering of קשיטת, qesitāh, and כסף, késeph, "silver," by "pieces of money," or "pieces of silver," constitutes an anachronism, inasmuch as it assumes the early use of coined currency, which was not extant among the Hebrews until after the Exile.

B. Persian Period.—Coins are mentioned for the first time in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, and in I Chr. 29:7, where their use is attributed to David by anachronism.

The Hebrew words אדרכונים, adharkônim, and דרכלמונים, darkemônim, "drams," probably refer to the Persian daric, a gold coin issued by Darius, weighing 8.41 grams, or 130 grains.

Silver coins weighing 5.60 grams, or 86.4 grains, corresponding to one twentieth of the weight of silver equivalent to the gold standard, were known as silver darics, or Median shekels. It is not clear whether Neh. 5:15 and 10:32 refer to these Median shekels or to weighed silver. The interpretation of מנה, māneh, "pound of silver" (Ezra 2:69; Neh. 7:70-72), as a sum of 100 Median shekels is also uncertain.

A few silver coins of uncertain denomination found in southern Palestine bear the Hebrew letters יהוד, interpreted Yehûdh, the Persian province of Judea.

C. Hellenistic Period.—Greek currency prevailed in Palestine after the conquest of Alexander the Great. The standard was the silver drachma, the weight of which was reduced from 4.32 grams, or 66.6 grains, to 3.41 grams, or 52.6 grains, in Egypt, Palestine, and the provinces

CIV. David Diring, "The Early Hebrew Weights Found at Lachish," Palestine Exploration Quarterly for 1942, pp. 82-103. W. F. Albright, "The Excavation of Tell Beit Mirsim," Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research, XXI-XXII (1941-43), 76-77. Chester C. McCown in Tell en-Nasbeh (Berkeley, Calif.: The Palestine Institute of Pacific School of Religion and the American Schools of Oriental Research, 1947), I, 259.

ruled by the Ptolemies. The usual denominations were:

tetradrachma	= 4 drachmas
didrachma	= 2 drachmas
drachma
hemidrachma	= ½ drachma

The gold stater, weighing approximately 8.60 grams, or 132.7 grains, equivalent in theory to 20 drachmas, was rated according to variable banking conditions.

Bronze currency in various denominations was issued to meet the needs of local trade. Its relative value with regard to silver was subject to frequent fluctuations.

When Palestine passed under the Syrian rule (198 B.C.), the coins of the Seleucids replaced Ptolemaic currency. However the mints of Askelon and Gaza continued to strike their own silver and bronze.

D. Maccabean Period.—In 142 B.C. the Palestinian Jews gained recognition as an autonomous community in the frame of the Seleucid state and were granted the right of coinage, apparently limited to bronze currency. Coins were struck in the name of the Hasmonaean high priests (the Maccabees) and of the community of the Jews, with legends in archaic Hebrew letters. Alexander Jannaeus and his widow Alexandra issued a currency with bilingual legends (Hebrew and Greek), in which they assumed the titles of king and queen.

E. Roman Period. 1. Coinage of the Roman Administration (63 B.C.—A.D. 66).—The introduction of Roman money followed the conquest of Palestine by Pompey (63 B.C.). The basic bronze currency was the object of frequent adjustments, and the silver coinage, introduced in the third century B.C., had continually deteriorated. The denarius, originally worth 4.53 grams, or 70 grains of silver, weighed 3.88 grams, or 60 grains, at the end of the third century B.C., to be reduced further to 3.43 grams, or 53 grains, under Nero. Gold was rare at all times, the official rate of exchange being 25 silver denarii for 1 aureus, or gold denarius.

The following charts show the relative value of usual silver and bronze coins in the time of Augustus:

SILVER COINS
denarius	= 16 asses
quinarius	= 8 asses
sestertius	= 4 asses

BRONZE COINS
sestertius	= 4 asses
dupondius	= 2 asses
as semis	= ½ as quadrans	= ¼ as

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

TABLE XX. HELLENISTIC CURRENCY MENTIONED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

HELLENISTIC CURRENCY		KJV	RSV	APPROXIMATE VALUE
τάλαντον	6,000 drachmas	talent	talent	$960 00
μνᾶ	100 drachmas	pound	pound	16.00
στατήρ	tetradrachma	picce of money	shekel
διδραχμον	didrachma (paid to the temple)	tribute money	half shekel
δραχμή	drachma	piece of money	silver coin	0.16

TABLE XXI. ROMAN CURRENCY MENTIONED IN THE NEW TESTAMENT

ROMAN CURRENCY		KJV	RSV	APPROXIMATE VALUE
δηνάριον	denarius	penny	denarius, coin	$ 0.20
ἀσσάριον	as	farthing	penny
κοδράντης	quadrans	farthing	penny

Whereas Rome reserved to itself the privilege of silver coinage, Palestinian mints were allowed to strike bronze coins of the usual denominations. This currency may be divided into three categories: (a) coins of the cities holding a charter of franchise; (b) coins of Herod and the Herodians, viz., the tetrarchs, Agrippa I and Agrippa II; (c) coins of the governors of Judea (the procurators).

2. Coinage of the First Jewish Revolt (A.D. 66-70).—Silver shekels of the average weight of 14.27 grams, or 220.2 grains, were struck together with half shekels and quarter shekels of the same type and standard. Owing to the increasing scarcity of silver, bronze tokens of half and quarter shekels were issued the fourth year of the revolt. These coins have been attributed erroneously to Simon Maccabee.

Coins commemorating the victory of Rome over the Jewish nationalists were struck in the name of Vespasian, with the legend Iudaea capta, "Judea conquered."

3. Coinage of the Second Jewish Revolt (A.D. 132-35).—The coins of the second revolt fall into three categories: (a) tetradrachmas, often restruck on imperial silver; (b) restruck silver denarii; (c) bronze coins, most of them restruck on imperial brass. This currency was issued in the name of the Jewish leader, Simon Bar Cocheba, who assumed the title of nāsī', or

"prince" of Israel. One denarius and several bronze coins bear the name and title of "Eleazar the Priest," of uncertain identity.

Local currency issued after the victory of Hadrian over the Jews (A.D. 136) bears the new name of Jerusalem, which had become officially Colonia Aelia Capitolina.

F. Appendixes. 1. Money in the New Testament.—References are made to Hellenistic and Roman currency, the denominations proper to Roman money being translated into Greek. Tables XX and XXI show the English translations and the approximate value of the currency mentioned in the New Testament.

According to the equivalence formulated in Mark 12:42, two lepta, "mites" (KJV), or "copper coins" (RSV), make up a quadrans. It is doubtful, however, whether or not the lepton belongs to the Roman series of bronze coins.

The values in American currency in the above tables are those given in the footnotes of the Revised Standard Version. They are not altogether consistent, and may be regarded at best as rough approximations. They seem to be based on the weight of the coins, but the variability and deterioration of ancient standards do not make a rigorous evaluation possible. Furthermore, the purchasing power of Hellenistic and Roman currencies cannot be determined to any reasonable degree of accuracy.

2. Illustrations of Selected Coins Current in Ancient Palestine

a) Persian

1. Persian daric, gold

Obv. Kneeling figure of king holding spear and bow.

Rev. Incuse square.

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

2. Local mint, bronze

Obv. Bearded head wearing crested helmet.
Rev. Male figure seated on winged wheel. יהד (Judea).

b) Hellenistic

3. Alexander: tetradrachma, silver

Obv. Head of Hercules.
Rev. Zeus Aetophoros. Βασιλεως Αλεξανδρου.

4. Ptolemy I: tetradrachma, silver

Obv. Diademed head of Ptolemy.
Rev. Eagle on thunderbolt. Πτολεμαιου Βασιλεως.

5. Antiochus III: tetradrachma, silver

Obv. Diademed head of Antiochus.
Rev. Apollo seated on omphalos. Βασιλεως Αντιοχου.

c) Maccabean

6. John Hyrcanus I: bronze

Obv. Wreath. יהוחנן הכהן הגדל וחבר היהוה(ו)דים (Johanan the high priest and the community of the Jews).
Rev. Pomegranate and cornucopias.

7. Alexander Jannaeus: bronze

Obv. Anchor. Βασιλεω[ς Αλεξανδρ]ου.
Rev. Lily. יהונתן המלך (Jonathan the King).

8. Alexander Jannaeus: bronze

Obv. Palm. יהונתן המלך (Jonathan the King).
Rev. Lily.

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

9. Alexander Jannaeus: bronze

Obv. Wreath. ינתן הכהן הגדל וחבר היהודים (Jonathan the high priest and the community of the Jews).

Rev. Pomegranate and cornucopias.

10. Alexander Jannaeus: bronze

Obv. Anchor. Βασ[ιλεως] Αλεξανδρου.

Rev. Wheel. יהונתן המלך (Jonathan the King).

11. Antigonus Mattathias: bronze

Obv. Cornucopias. מתתיה הכהן גדול וחבר היהודים (Mattathias the high priest and the community of the Jews).

Rev. Ivy wreath. Βασ[ιλεως] Αντιγονου.

12. Antigonus Mattathias: bronze

Obv. Unidentified object.

Rev. Seven-branched candlestick. [Βασιλ]εως Αν[τιγονου].

d) Roman

HEROD AND THE HERODIANS

13. Herod the Great: bronze

Obv. Tripod. Βασιλεως Ηρωδου.

Rev. Tiara surmounted by star and palms.

14. Herod the Great: bronze

Obv. Caduceus. Βασιλεως Ηρωδου.

Rev. Pomegranate with leaves.

15. Herod the Great: bronze

Obv. Wreath. Βασιλεως Ηρωδου.

Rev. Tripod and palms.

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

16. Herod the Great: bronze

Obv. Cornucopia. Βασιλ. Ηρωδ.
Rev. Eagle.

17. Herod Agrippa I: bronze

Obv. Umbrella. Βασιλευς Αγριππα.
Rev. Three ears of barley.

18. Herod Agrippa I: bronze

Obv. Head of Agrippa. Βασιλευς μεγας Αγριπ-πας Φιλοκαισαρ.
Rev. City goddess holding cornucopia, leaning on boat rudder. Καισαρια η προς [Σεβαστ]ω λιμενι (Caesarea on the Sea).

19. Herod Agrippa II: bronze

Obv. Head of Vespasian. Αυτοκρ. Ουεσ. Καισαρι
Σβαστω (sic).
Rev. Tyché holding cornucopia and ears of barley. Ετ ΔΙ (Year 14, era of Tiberias=A.D.
74). Βα. Αγριππα.

FREE CITIES. EMPERORS. PROCURATORS

20. Ascalon: hemidrachma, silver

Obv. Bust of city goddess.
Rev. War galley. Ασ. ιερας (Ascalon Holy) LBΣ
(Year 202, Seleucid era=111-110 B.C.).

21. Ascalon: tetradrachma, silver

Obv. Cleopatra VII.
Rev. Eagle on thunderbolt, dove. Ασκαλ[ωνος ιε]ρας ασυλου (Ascalon Holy, Sacred) LNE (Year 55, era of 84 B.C.=29 B.C.).

22. Ascalon: bronze

Obv. Bust of city goddess.
Rev. War galley. ΣΟΡ (Year 176, era of 104 B.C.
=A.D. 72) Ασ (Ascalon).

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

23. Tiberius: denarius, silver

Obv. Head of Tiberius. TI·CAESAR DIVI
AVG·F·AVGVSTVS.
Rev. Livia (?), holding scepter. PONTIF.
MAXIM.

24. Pontius Pilate, Procurator: bronze

Obv. Ladle. Τιβερίου Καισαρος ΛΙΣ (Year 16 of Tiberius=A.D. 29-30).
Rev. Three ears of barley. Ιουλια Καισαρος.

25. Pontius Pilate, Procurator: bronze

Obv. Augur wand. Τιβερίου Καισαρος.
Rev. Wreath. ΛΙΣ (Year 17 of Tiberius=A.D.
30-31).

26. Antonius Felix, Procurator: bronze

Obv. Palm. ΛΕ (Year 5 of Nero=A.D. 58-59)
Καισαρος.
Rev. Wreath. Νερωνος.

FIRST REVOLT

27. Shekel, silver

Obv. שקל ישראל (Shekel of Israel) א (Year 1=
A.D. 66-67).
Rev. Three pomegranates. ירושלם קדשה (Jerusalem Holy).

28. Half shekel, silver

Obv. חצי השקל (1/2 shekel) שב (Year 2=A.D.
67-68).
Rev. ירושלים הקדושה (Jerusalem the Holy).

29. Token, half shekel, bronze

Obv. Citron between two bundles of twigs. שנת ארבע (Year 4=A.D. 69-70) חצי (one half).
Rev. Palm tree, two baskets. לגאולת ציון (For the redemption of Zion).

CHRONOLOGY, METROLOGY, ETC.

30. Bronze

Obv. Amphora. שנת שתיים (Year 2=A.D. 67-68).
Rev. Vine branch. חרת ציון (Liberty of Zion).

31. Bronze

Obv. Bundle of twigs between two citrons. ארבע שנה (Year 4 =A.D. 69-70).
Rev. Cup. לגאולת ציון (For the redemption of Zion).

32. Imperial: sestertius, bronze

Obv. Head of Vespasian. IMP.CAES.VESPA-
 SIAN.AUG. P.M. TR.P. P.P. COS.III.
Rev. Judea guarded by soldier under palm tree.
 IVDAEA CAPTA S.C. Struck at Rome, A.D.
 71.

33. Imperial: bronze

Obv. Head of Titus. ΑΥΤΟΚΡ. ΤΙΤΟΣ ΚΑΙΣΑΡ.
Rev. Palm tree, Nike. ΙΟΥΔΑΙΑ ΕΣΤΑΤΑΥΤΑΙΣ (Judea conquered). Struck in Palestine.

SECOND REVOLT

34. Tetradrachma, silver

Obv. Star above temple (or Torah shrine ?)
 שמעון (Simon).
Rev. Citron and bundle of twigs. לחרות ירושלם
 (For the liberty of Jerusalem).

35. Denarius, silver

Obv. Wreath. שמעון (Simon).
Rev. Jug and palm. שב לחר ישא (sic) (Year 2 of the liberty of Israel=ca. A.D. 133).

36. Silver

Obv. Wreath. שמעון (Simon).
Rev. Three-stringed lyre. לחרות ירושלם (For the liberty of Jerusalem).

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

37. Silver

Obv. Bunch of grapes. שִׁמּוֹן [ע]וֹן (Simon).
Rev. Two trumpets. לְחֻרּוֹת יְרוּשָׁלַם (For the liberty of Jerusalem).

38. Bronze

Obv. Bunch of grapes. שְׁנַת אֶחָד לְגְאֻלַּת יִשְׂרָאֵל (First year of the redemption of Israel=ca. A.D. 132).
Rev. Palm tree. אֵלְעָזָר הַכֹּהֵן (Eleazar the Priest).

39. Bronze

Obv. Vine leaf. שְׁנַת אֶחָד לְגְאֻלַּת יִשְׂרָאֵל (First year of the redemption of Israel).
Rev. Palm tree. שִׁמּוֹן בְּרִיחַ (Simon Prince of Israel).

40. Bronze

Obv. Head of Hadrian. IMP. CAES. TRAI. HADRIAN. AVG.
Rev. Jupiter and two female deities in a distyle temple. COL(onia) AEL(ia) CAP(itolina).

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE

by GEORGE ARTHUR BUTTRICK

- I. Barriers to Bible Study
- II. Nature and Purpose of the Book
- III. The Meaning of Inspiration

- IV. Rewards of Bible Study
- V. Bible Study and Prayer
- VI. Yet More Light
- VII. Selected Bibliography

Perhaps this article is carrying coals to Newcastle, for presumably the man who buys and reads The Interpreter's Bible already knows how to study the Bible. But the presumption may not be justified. Preachers and teachers of the Book may come to the Scriptures by the wrong door: not always do they read it that it may read them. In any event, people who use The Interpreter's Bible are the very people who must guide others in the study of the Bible. So these lines, if rightly written, may have at least an indirect value.

I. Barriers to Bible Study

Sometimes the church has seemed intent to discourage the study of the Bible. It binds the Book in funereal black. It prints the text in type almost too small to read. It clutters the sacred page with side references and footnotes. It cuts its natural paragraphs, as if with ruthless shears, into verses—a violence from which apostle and evangelist would have recoiled. It makes its poetry look like prose. The years have gone far to defeat the Reformation hope that the Bible might become an open book for the "man behind the plow."

Even more serious failures must be laid on the church's conscience. The Bible is a library, and the library is itself an anthology. The library comprises religious interpretations of history, hymns, idyls, sermons, letters; and it covers a period of several centuries. Then why are its books arranged so as to hide true chronology? If the Old Testament were so printed that Amos and Hosea came first, with the Pentateuch in its place of comparatively late authorship, the reader could no longer assume that the books of the Law (whatever their elements of antiquity) came from the childhood of the race. If the New Testament set most of the epistles first, followed by Mark, and if Luke and Matthew were shown as the work of the church toward the end of the first century, the reader would not be misled into believing that the Synoptic Gospels are simple biographies of Jesus. Rather he would be prepared to study them for what they are, namely, primers for catechumens in the Christian faith.

Preachers have urged people to "read the Bible." People have tried, and have often been baffled. For though some passages are so clear that "he that runs may read," there are others (as in the Epistle to the Romans) so hard that to tell a beginner, "Read the Bible" is as unfair as if an elementary-school teacher were to say to his class, "Study Euclid." The Bible is not an easy book to read. Its gold is given sometimes in nuggets, as in the twenty-third psalm or the Sermon on the Mount; but more often it comes in ore to be dug, smelted, and refined. Books which give a brief introduction to each biblical book and place it in its approximate chronological order perform a necessary service and meet a claim long overdue, for they enable the reader to answer such questions as, "Who wrote this book, and why, and when, and where?" Surely the time has come to strike from the Bible the fetters which the church itself has wittingly or unwittingly forged.

II. Nature and Purpose of the Book

Then how should a man study the Bible? He must begin with the right presuppositions. To pretend that he can completely suspend judgment until the whole Bible has been read and pondered is just that—a pretense. Judgments, based on deepest experience, have long ago been formed, and are now part of widespread conviction. In any event, there is no adventure without an initial faith. Every reader must make some assumption about the Bible, if only that it is a book. Even in that assumption he would be wrong, for the Bible is both a library of books and the Book, as ages of experience have testified. The man who said of the dictionary that it "has great variety but little plot" is an instance of what happens when a book is read with wrong assumptions. A student who expected to find a historical romance in a book of mathematics, or sober history in a volume of Shakespeare's plays, would be both puzzled and affronted in the reading. So with any man who expects to find in the Bible what it was never intended to give.

The Bible is not merely "great literature." It has glowing passages that are supreme in the realm of letters, as many a pre-eminent literary artist has been quick to see. Nevertheless Bible authors would have been dismayed by the suggestion that they had a literary purpose. The danger of all books that treat the Bible as "literature" is precisely that they may distract the reader from the Bible's deeper intent. Indeed it could be argued that the Bible is on guard against literature, and against all other "words of man's wisdom" that might offer to the reader a refuge from the tremendous onsets of God.

The Bible is not a book of science. If this fact had been acknowledged and remembered, many a conflict that has brought discredit on both science and religion could have been avoided. The 139th psalm is true whether the earth is flat or round. The parable of the prodigal son is the history of men and man, though the Bible may seem to be falsified by "evolution," and though "evolution" may yield place to a doctrine of "contingency" not essentially different from Genesis! Science, however necessary, is sensate, and cannot sound the depths. It is of the analytic mind, and therefore cannot serve the wholeness of man's nature. It can give some answer to "How?" but none to "Why?" Only faith can say why, and every man must live by some faith. So the story of the Tower of Babel, though it is not a scientific account of the origin of languages, is tragic truth concerning that pride in man which destroys the work of man's own hands, whether in Babel or Berlin; and which always brings such confusion of tongues that Russia cannot understand the United States or Hitler's Germany comprehend the motives of Norway. The Bible is not a book of science. It has mightier business on hand. It will be read when our meticulous science has been forgotten.

The Bible is not a book of history, even though that fact may not be as readily acceptable as the two above cited. Such books as Samuel and Kings are frequently described as "historical books" and the Gospels are called "lives" of Jesus; but both titles, despite their measure of truth, are misnomers. For when the Bible authors write history they are not intent to provide an "objective story." It is doubtful if such objectivity would be desirable, even if it were possible; but in any event, the Bible does not covet it. Its "history" is written in such a way as to show how a certain nation and its individuals were apprehended by God. This fact holds not less, but almost more, of the Gospels; for manifestly these four priceless books are too scant and disjointed ever to pose as complete "biographies of Jesus." Rather are they central in the prime intent of all scripture revelation: with one voice they say, "Here God came and laid his hand on men!"

The Bible, despite frequent avowals, is not in original instance a book of "man's quest for God." Initially, in prime purpose it is intent to show that no quest on man's part is possible except under God's prompting. Our search for him is quickened by his prior finding of us. The Bible is not a book of "comparative religion," for it tells of a revelation that is precisely beyond compare: "The LORD our God is one LORD: And thou shalt love the LORD thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might"; and (in that love) "thy neighbor as thyself" (Deut. 6:4-5; Lev. 19:18). The one word of the Bible is: "Halts by me that foot-fall."¹ Its whole story is of the siege of Mansoul by "this tremendous Lover."² It is not an earth-bound book either of literature or science, history or human quest: its sole and all-comprehending purpose is to tell of the invasion of earth by heaven's succor and demand. The reader is not required in any dark coercion to believe this claim "sight unseen," but he should understand the claim. Moreover, it is fair to ask that he expose himself to it. So the study of the Bible requires him to say, whether neophyte or theologian, "Generations of people have said that God has found them through this Book. I will be neither servile nor embattled, but will give the Book its chance with me." A man must approach the study of the Bible with the right presuppositions.

III. The Meaning of Inspiration

This faith that the Bible is a book of God's self-revealing, and thereafter of man's search for God, does not demand the acceptance of any arbitrary doctrine of inspiration. But it does print the words "veritably inspired" over all Scripture. For the men who wrote the Bible contend that God found them: that is why they wrote. Likewise, hosts who have read the Bible testify that through it God has found them also: that is why they have continued to read. But none of this need be equated with the theory of verbal inerrancy. Of that latter doctrine, which has repelled thousands of youth who might otherwise have been won to eager study of the Scriptures, we had better say just what Jesus said of similar doctrines, "Ye [make] the word of God of none effect through your tradition" (Mark 7:12-13).

¹ Francis Thompson, "The Hound of Heaven."

² Ibid.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE

Anyone who will trouble to read in this Commentary the three articles on "The History of the Interpretation of the Bible" will understand that the doctrine of literal inspiration is an interloper in the "Interpreter's House," and far too weak to dispossess the proper tenant. What aberrations are invited by this rigid theory—belief in a flat earth, belief in a host of demons inhabiting the middle air! What crimes are condoned—all the way from killing witches to approving the institution of slavery! An unprejudiced reader would see, if left alone, that the doctrine of literal infallibility has been imposed on the Book. The writers do not write as men who are the blind and helpless instruments of God. Luke in his prologue tells of choosing his method and plan, and nobody could pretend that the respective personal traits of Matthew or Paul have been canceled by inspiration. Yet surely nobody could sincerely expose himself to these writings and deny inspiration—by whatever name. We must say of every Bible author what Browning said of Bunyan and The Pilgrim's Progress, and say it with profounder conviction: "'Tis my belief, God spoke: no tinker has such powers."⁸

Is the theory of literalism a fear? Perhaps it is a worthy fear. The creaturely mind seeks refuge in a simplicity. Marxism is a prime instance: man is the spawn of the economic system, so all that is needed is a changed system, and, presto, heaven on earth! So in religion also men have coveted an impossible simplicity. What could be simpler than the doctrine that here is the literal and explicit Word of God? Actually we show not reverence, but a mild blasphemy, when we assume that God turns a man into a typewriter; and certainly the theory is a disparagement also of human nature. But it seems simple and safe. It lifts from the mind a burden of painful study under the guidance of the Holy Spirit. Yet the theory has elements of worth, for how could it have come if men had not found God in scripture? And is not God the sovereign Lord? When a man sees God in the temple "high and lifted up," he may be forgiven for insisting that every stone now has inviolable sacredness—though the stones still crumble.

The emphasis in the phrase "literal inspiration" is not on the adjective, but on the noun; and there all Christian conviction finds common ground. The Old Testament tells of God choosing a nation to make covenant with them, not that they might bask in his favor, but that they might make his name and nature known among men. The history and songs of that nation are witness to the covenant, for through them God has found our race. The prophets tell of the national failure to keep the covenant, and of the holy grace that renewed it. The New Testament tells how the covenant, even God himself, came to earth in a Man—the mercy of the covenant being sealed in his death ("This . . . is the new covenant in my blood"), the power of the covenant being proved in his resurrection. The Book is a record of the self-revelation of God. Thus the record becomes one with the revelation, in even closer bond than the announcement of good news becomes one with the glad tidings it proclaims. In that fact, at long last, is the inspiration of the Scriptures. The surge of God's ocean moves through its pages: "That Voice is round me like a bursting sea."⁴ We need not try to define inspiration in terms more exact, whether "literal" or "plenary"; for if God could be defined by man, God would no longer be God. God is his own evidence. God is his own interpreter. So the Bible is the Book, the central sun from which all other books receive their light.

Now we can understand the reason why lowly folk find revelation in the Bible (or are found by revelation), despite all fetters of printing and verse-snippets and scrambled chronology which the church has fastened on it, and despite all ignorance in the reader. For God speaks through the Book: it is the voice of his self-revealing grace. It is his inbreathing (inspiration), more intimately than a man's voice is the breath and presence of the man. Yet the Bible is never to be confused with man's voice. So when a reader comes to the Book in humility saying, "For thee only do I wait," God finds him despite every barrier. The old-time boxes of Bible texts were not all folly. Many of us can remember them, a text on each tiny roll of paper, and how the godly in time of crisis would "draw a text," and thus consult the oracles of God. Of course the texts were chosen beforehand, from such shining chapters as Ps. 91; Isa. 40; John 14; and Rom. 8. Imagine the consternation and tumult had the texts been culled from the "begats," or from the Levitical laws, or from "Beware of dogs"! But even allowing for the carefulness of prior choice, the striking fitness of the counsel or comfort in the "drawn text" cannot be explained merely as "coincidence." That word is a description, not an explanation. The explanation goes back to the fact of inspiration. God had already found men in those passages from his Book. Therefore they were chosen for the box; therefore they "found" men again in the day of crisis.

So the way to study the Bible is to come to it with the right presuppositions. This does not mean "begging the question," but it does mean awareness of the fact that the Book is not primarily literature or science or history, or the record of man's search: men tell in the Book how God took them unawares. Men have claimed to find in it, with shining and martyred grace to support the claim, the very oracle of God. The reader, however skeptical, must at least make acknowledgment of that radiant claim.

⁸ "Ned Bratta."

⁴ Thompson, op. cit.

IV. Rewards of Bible Study

But though neither the barriers that have been built around the Book nor ignorance in the reader can stay the holy and redeeming onsets of God in scripture, the barriers and ignorance cannot be made a virtue. The stars can speak of God to people unversed in astronomy; but other factors being equal, the astronomer with his Mount Wilson observatory is likelier to bow before God's wonders in the sky. It must be granted that other factors are not always equal, and that the astronomer can miss the celestial woods in his absorbed study of the celestial trees. Is it not a word of T. E. Lawrence that though the Arabs know little of astronomical science, they can still find God between the stars? Knowledge is always under threat from pride of the mind, not least Bible knowledge. Thus even the study of the Scriptures can be the occasion, though not the cause, of a man's damnation. But knowledge and reverence are not antithetic terms: knowledge can lead to deeper reverence. Festus was mistaken when he said to Paul, "Much learning doth make thee mad" (Acts 26:24). There is no premium on ignorance. Granted that a Bible student continues to say, "For thee only do I wait," more knowledge will bring more godliness.

The Bible shines with brighter light if the reader knows the correct text of the Bible and its original meaning. For such knowledge we are dependent upon the lower or textual critic and the lexicographer. Their study is not criticism in the sense of carping. It is not scrutiny for the purpose of detecting error, but rather a study of manuscripts and a grateful exploring of the treasure of meaning in Bible word and phrase. The student should be quick to welcome the light that has thus broken from God's Book. Instances are legion. Ps. 139 is probably composite; and the main poem, when set free, gains in clarity and searching power, while the associated scripture reveals its own treasure. Isa. 53 has extra poignancy and power when it is understood in its context and its alternate phrases are read as a colloquy between Yahweh and the kings of the earth. The verb used in the phrase "They have their reward" in Matt. 6:5, concerning ostentation in prayer, was used in writing receipts, so that the phrase is equivalent to our "They have a receipt for it"; but the reward in Matt. 6:6, promised to sincere and lowly prayer, is represented by a different and more generous word (ἀποδώσει): "Thy Father shall render back [or grant] unto thee." When the student further finds that "openly" is a gloss (surely prompted by man's false pride?), the whole passage stabs the soul awake. The new commandment of Jesus is new in very truth when his word love (ἀγάπη) is properly construed, namely, not as any earth-bound sexual love (ἔρωσ) or friendship love (φιλία) which can decay or break under strain, but as God's own love come to earth in Jesus Christ. The word "keep" (the Greek φρουρήσει) becomes almost apocalypse when we understand its implications: something precious that must be kept in some sure and secret place, with a sentinel set to guard it; "The peace of God . . . shall keep [sentinel] your [precious] hearts and minds in [the sure and secret place which is] Christ Jesus" (Phil. 4:7). As for the importance of understanding the unity of a passage, let the reader reread I Cor. 13 from its proper beginning in I Cor. 12:27, and see if the meaning of that great hymn to Christian love does not glow with purer fire.

Similarly, the voice of God speaks more clearly in the Bible when the reader understands higher criticism. Again the term may be a misfortune, for we misconstrue "criticism" to mean censoriousness, whereas actually it means appreciation. Higher criticism enables the Bible reader to appreciate the background of a given Bible book. Do we not rightly ask of any other book: "Who wrote it? For whom—Chinese or Britishers? Is it old or new? What purpose prompted the book?" These questions are valid also for the inspired Book; for when God speaks through a man, God does not destroy the man, but employs the man's individual traits in divine humility, and awaits the man's consent. "Whom shall I send, and who will go for us?" (Isa. 6:8.) Job is dramatic poetry, surely mightier even than the Antigone, and should so be read. Ruth is an idyl, with just as much truth as if it had been history: did not Jesus tell stories, and so convict the world of truth? Daniel in its later chapters is apocalypse, a philosophy of past history cast into the form of visions, as springboard for the prediction and sure hope of the coming Deliverer; and honest study of the book should long ago have rescued it from calamitymongers who try to find in it cabalistic symbols of current events. Isaiah is not one book, as a cursory reading of the Bible would assume, for there is a gap of centuries between the end of ch. 39 and the beginning of ch. 40; and when chs. 1-39 and chs. 40-66 are treated as two separate units, and each is understood under its rightful authorship and era, new worlds open to the student of the Bible. The Gospel of Matthew must be dated perhaps as late as A.D. 95, and may have been written in the Syrian church. It reflects the turmoil of its time—the uncertain tenure of the new faith in the Roman Empire, for instance, and the strife between synagogue and church; and when the Gospel is thus read, it gathers fresh meanings and a fervent power. Each Bible book, such as an epistle of Paul, was first written for its own time, even though it holds truth for all time; and the study of the Bible requires a knowledge of the background of each book. This knowledge is an “opening” for God’s Word.

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE

Study of the meaning of word and study of the background of the book: these two realms, even though thoroughly mastered, are still only provinces of the total kingdom of Bible study. There are wider reaches of knowledge. Further study is indispensable as the knowledge of our world is indispensable to a student seeking to understand the United States. Let us take certain phrases to see how they carry questions into this wider realm. “In the year that king Uzziah died I saw also the Lord” (Isa. 6:1). Who was King Uzziah, and why should his death have been a mark deep-scored in Isaiah’s memory? That Bible passage, along with how much else in the Old Testament, cannot be understood without a study of the history of Israel. “And they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan” (Gen. 11:31). There we realize that the whole history of Israel, though held within the special covenant of God, was yet an emergent from the far vaster history of the ancient world. Abraham’s trek, his going out, “not knowing whither he went” (Heb. 11:8), in obedience to an imperious Voice, becomes for us an affair of more poignant courage when we trace his journeyings within and around the Fertile Crescent. “The abomination that maketh desolate” (Dan. 11:31; 12:11): that phrase leads directly to the desecration of the Jewish temple by Antiochus, and gives reminder that the history of Israel throughout its course was interlocked with that of surrounding lands. So with the New Testament. Who were the Pharisees, the Sadducees, the Zealots? Who was King Agrippa before whom Paul appeared, and how was Agrippa’s land linked with Judea? Why were the merchants of Ephesus so intent to defend the worship of Diana of the Ephesians against the inroads of the new Christian faith? What kind of praise and polity in the early church is implied in such a sentence as “They continued steadfastly in the apostles’ doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers” (Acts 2:42)? This Commentary offers concentric circles of knowledge to the student—understanding of the meaning of word and phrase, understanding of the book in which word and phrase occur, and understanding of the national and world history from which the book sprang to speak aloud the Word of God.

The Bible is far from easy reading. It can be understood, but “not without dust and heat.” Why should any man shrink from the task? So rich is the treasure, “a pearl of great price,” even the kingdom of God, that a man to gain it should count the pain all joy and the world well lost. A neighbor spends years to master the mechanics of the radio, and we do not laugh at him. Another devotes half a lifetime to Shakespeare or Beethoven, and we count him no fool. Then why is not all life well spent on the study of the Bible? This is the Book through which God moves in ocean might—now in the calm of a sunset sea, now in judgment storm, now in the tidal mercy that floats all our beached vessels. This is the only Book of Jesus Christ, whose life is the “master light of all our seeing,” whose tragic cross is the taking away of the sins of the world, whose resurrection is the hope of men aghast at death’s blight. Why is not all life well spent in the study of such a Book? If choice had to be made between this Book and all others, there would be no choice: who would not choose the sun against ten million candles?

V. Bible Study and Prayer

But this should be said, even at risk of seeming to disavow the foregoing plan for lifelong study of the Book: knowledge is not the prime essential in Bible study. Neither is ignorance: the church has been shamed, and men beyond the church alienated from the Book, by “proof texts” quoted to support a hundred aberrations—white supremacy, the prevalence of poverty, dire prophecies a thousand times falsified and a thousand times renewed. No man should offer suffrages to a darkened mind. Yet the reader should confront the fact that a professor erudite in the Scriptures may miss salvation, while the lowly saint on his knees before the Book may know the Presence and almost feel the Hand.

The dilemma of scholarship has become acute in our time, namely this: that knowledge must be pursued, but is always open to mistake and is never complete. Wisdom can tarry while facts multiply. Already in almost any field, including the field of Bible study, the glut of facts is such that no man can digest them. As for the meaning of Bible words and phrases, that study leads out into a study of languages—not only of Hebrew and Greek, but of cognate tongues. As for the study of the background of the Bible, that soon involves the student in archaeology, and that in its turn leads to anthropology and a dozen allied inquiries of like scope. This knowledge must be pursued; but it is constantly out-moded and never complete. Thus the study of the Gospels has moved somewhat as follows: simple records (as was supposed) became the Synoptic problem and the Johannine problem; and these led to a painful probing into questions of date, authorship, and sources; and that, in turn, to a realization that the church, instead of being simply and solely produced by the Gospels, also produced them under the very Spirit of Christ; and that recognition has led in our time to form criticism and an attempt to disentangle from all additions and redactions "the core of tradition." Only a naïve optimist could pretend that the process will end in some impregnable rock of knowledge. Yet only an equally naïve pessimist could pretend that the quest has been in vain, or that any man has honorable discharge from the study of the Bible. The inevitable incompleteness of Bible knowledge does not permit us to sell out to some obscurantism. It means rather that we should pursue the quest beyond the sunset, and the baths

Of all the western stars, until [we] die,⁵ accepting the burden of our finitude.

A man's reach should exceed his grasp,
Or what's a heaven for?⁶

But this impossibility of ever mastering all the facts, not to mention the distortion that besets all knowledge, still poses a dilemma for scholarship, including Bible scholarship. Must a man forever be cheated of Bible light? No, for there is another way of knowing, and this is the prime essential in Bible study: "I know whom I have believed" (II Tim. 1:12). Middleton Murry, in a glowing sentence, has quoted of Christ, "Look upon him, till he look back upon us again."⁷ It is reminiscent of an account given by a medieval saint of his prayers: "I look at Jesus, and he looks back at me." Every man looks on Christ. That is why every man knows of any painted picture of Christ that it falls far short of truth. "Look upon him": only in that rapt prayer can the Bible be studied. Thus lowly saints unversed in knowledge about the Scriptures are still found of God as they read, while "Bible scholars" may grope through a deserted shrine.

⁵ Tennyson, "Ulysses."

⁶ Browning, "Andrea Del Sarto."

⁷ Jesus, Man of Genius (New York: Harper & Bros., 1926), p. 372.

VI. Yet More Light

The study of the Bible is therefore, at long last, a meditation on the word and the paragraph, an exposing of the soul to the Book's healing light. The reader prays, "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law" (Ps. 119:18). He looks on Jesus meanwhile and asks, "What does this word mean for me?" He asks again and again, not shrinking from any cauterizing needle, not rejecting any proffered grace, not disobeying any commission. For if a man is unwilling to follow God's sign, why should God give it? Then the reader asks the wider question, "What does this mean for my land and era?" and thus sees his world, with all its raucousness, forgotten reverence, and yearning, under the judgment and mercy of God. Not without cause, and not without effect, have men found in every age that prayer and Bible study are necessarily joined. Necessarily—both by man's need and God's ordination. Age on age the church has wisely made demand of its catechumens that they be "faithful in prayer and in the study of the Scriptures."

So to this conclusion we have been led: the study of the Scriptures is under the light and leading of the Holy Spirit. That doctrine has of late been neglected in the church: therefore our gardens have become sand. Veritably at Pentecost the Spirit of Christ was given to his followers; veritably the gift is renewed to all who seek him. There are many words that Jesus had too scant time to speak during the days of his flesh; many words he could not speak because men were deaf; many words he had to keep until the occasion (our occasion) summoned them. All these words are hidden in God's Holy Word, but only his Spirit can call them into life: "When he, the Spirit of truth, is come, he will guide you into all truth; for . . . he shall take of mine, and shall show it unto you" (John 16:13, 15). Therefore we "look upon him"; therefore we pray, "Come, Holy Spirit"; for only through God's gift granted in worship and prayer can any man truly study the Bible or be found of its eternal verity.

Is there not a picture of Luther busy at his New Testament at the very moment when its light broke on him like morning after a weary night? Word by word he is tracing the Word—not without the discipline of a student, for he brought to the endeavor a close knowledge of Latin, Greek, and Hebrew; yet not without fervent prayer for the Spirit's guidance. The chain by which the Bible had once been bound to a lectern lies broken. Luther comes now to the moment of revelation. The sun's rays slant through the lattice, token of a deeper light that soon will pierce him. Then the word: "Therefore being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom. 5:1). Luther brought agony of soul to that quest, and he brought scholarship. But he brought more—the essential things; for he was in a cloister, and for every man the cloister is the place of prayer:

THE STUDY OF THE BIBLE

Come, Holy Ghost, our hearts inspire
And lighten with celestial fire.⁸

Thus the page glows. Thus God finds the longing soul through the Book which he alone could give. Thus is the joy once more fulfilled: "Thy word is a lamp unto my feet" (Ps. 119:105).

⁸ "Veni Creator Spiritus."

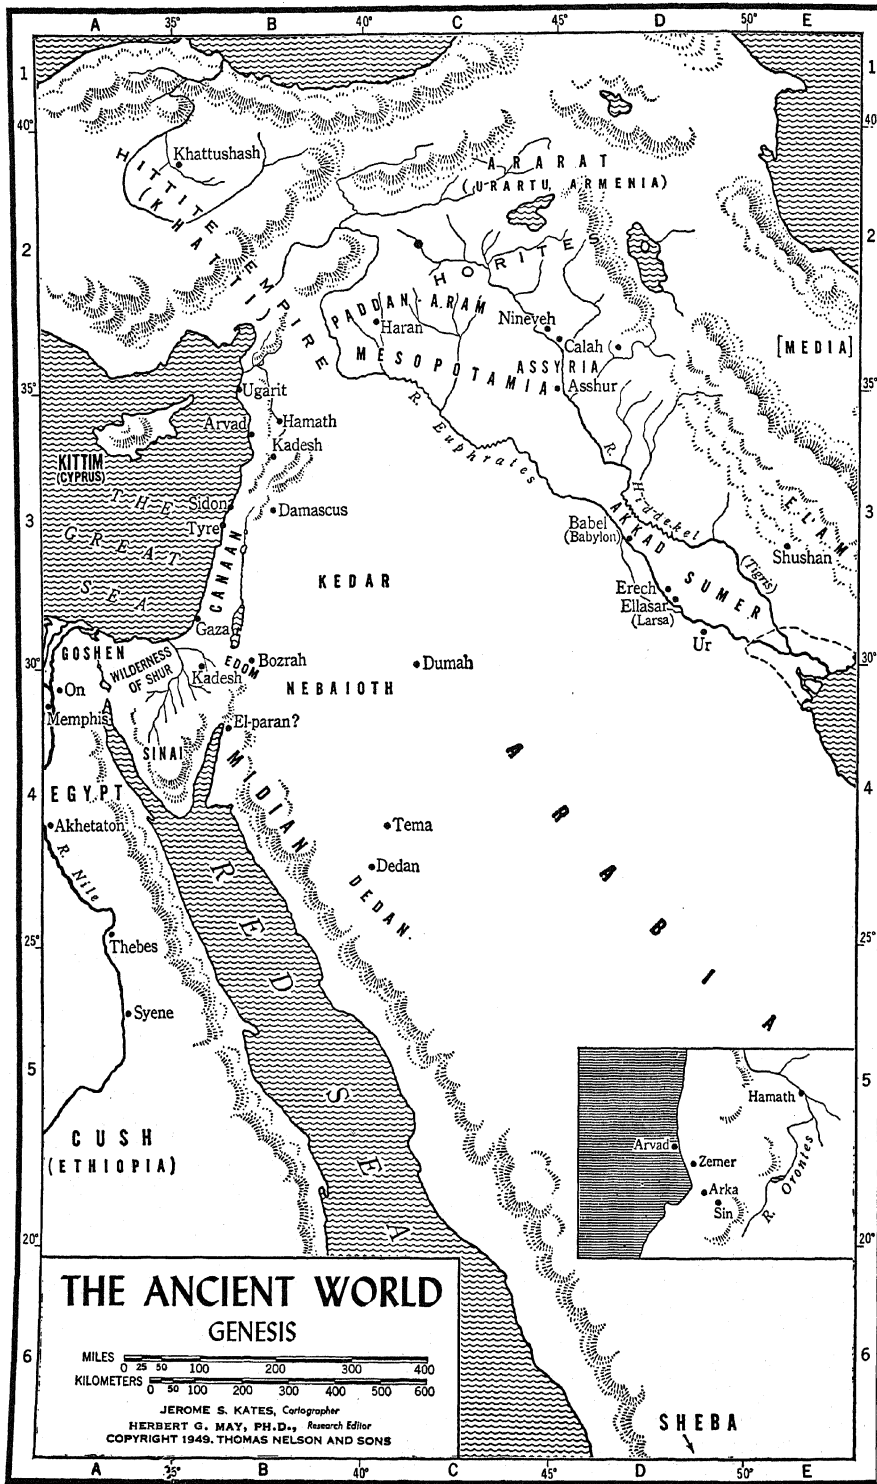

VII. Selected Bibliography

- CLARKE, WILLIAM NEWTON. Sixty Years with the Bible. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1909.
- COLWELL, ERNEST C. The Study of the Bible. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1937.
- DODD, C. H. The Authority of the Bible. New York: Harper & Bros., 1929.
- . The Bible Today. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1947.
- GOODSPEED, E. J. The Story of the Bible. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1936.
- PEAKE, A. S. The Bible: Its Origin, Its Significance, and Its Abiding Worth. 5th ed. New York: Hodder & Stoughton, 1914.
- RICHARDSON, ALAN. Preface to Bible Study. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1944.

GENERAL ARTICLES

on the

OLD TESTAMENT

THE LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

by WILLIAM A. IRWIN

- I. Ancient Near-Eastern Culture
- II. The Pre-Israelite Culture of Palestine
- III. Earliest Fragments of Hebrew Literature
- IV. Epics of the Conquest
- V. Canaanite Influence
- VI. Cultural Significance of the Monarchy

- VII. The Literary Prophets
- VIII. Deuteronomy and the Historians
- IX. The Exile and Its Sequel
- X. Style of Old Testament Literature
- XI. Selected Bibliography

When the Hebrew tribes broke into Palestine in the long series of incursions and infiltrations that reached flood tide sometime during the fourteenth or thirteenth century B.C., they projected themselves into a course of culture that was already very old. Of their own level of civilization little is known. At times they have been regarded as unspoiled nomads directly out of the Arabian Desert, and consequently possessed of a culture not far above the barbaric; again, they have been associated with the widely diffused Habiru peoples who then lived or had lived in varying status in several of the civilized lands of the ancient Near East. Probably the safest guess is a theory that provides room for a combination of these views. Nonetheless, the conquest of Palestine was epochal for their culture, as it was to prove also, in the long perspective of the centuries, for civilization as a whole. The little land to which they made claim lay right athwart the great highroads of the ancient world. Up and down its valleys and along its strip of coastal plain went the commerce as well as the pomp and circumstance of the empires of the time, rich argosies of products from the looms and shops of Egypt and Babylonia that bore also undeclared imports of spiritual treasures from the civilizations of "the gorgeous East."

I. Ancient Near-Eastern Culture

The great story of the achievements of the older Orient is not our present theme. We must restrain comment on the incredibly superb metalworking of Sumer, and the temples of Egypt and of Babylonia, different as they were in their architectural genius, yet alike in their housing of a ritual and liturgy that grew ornate and magnificent with the lengthening centuries. The palaces, the pyramids, the splendor of well-planned royal cities, the wealth and ease and the refinement that leisure can encourage—and much more may be recalled only as colorful and pregnant background possessed of immense relevance for the quasi-barbarian invaders of Palestine's narrow strip of fertility between the desert and the sea. It is more acute loss, however, that we may only allude to the slow dawning of a science that in some departments presently became empirical, and to the speculative thought of these lands that age after age wrestled with the persistent problem, in course of time to become Israel's obsession also—What is man? What is his place in a world of wonder and unfathomed mystery?

It was a very old and ripe culture into which the Hebrews came. More significantly still, it was a literate civilization. All literatures have their beginnings in oral traditions of one sort or another; and this unwritten heritage was of peculiar significance to the Orient. Note must soon be taken of its function in Israel. But by the time of the Hebrew conquest, the great lands of the Near East had long since passed beyond that stage of development. Business, government, law, ritual, and the outreach of thought had all invoked the art of the scribe for so many centuries that it had become normal and undeserving of remark. As the modern world has its classics, so then likewise, famous old poems and myths circulated afar, and won a renown which justly has revived in our own day. In the history of human culture they were documents of a very high relevance.

II. The Pre-Israelite Culture of Palestine

The immediate context of the emerging Hebrew nationality was also notable. The Canaanites have received less than their due. Religious practices which rightly shocked Israel's austere morality have through the medium of Old Testament condemnation provoked contempt and disregard for the pre-Israelite culture of Palestine, but accumulating facts compel more generous appraisal. The Canaanites were a people of unusual ability. Through more than a thousand years they had built up in Palestine a great civilization. The wealth and refinement of their cities astonished Egyptian conquerors. Their inventive genius originated three novel systems of writing; two of these were alphabetic, and of these one was destined to supplant the venerable systems of Egypt and Babylonia, and to become in its lineal descendants the medium of written record and communication for the entire Western culture even to this day. These alphabetic characters were ready, waiting when the Israelites arrived, tempting alert spirits to invoke them for expression and for annals. But stimulus and example were also at hand. It has long been recognized that a considerable portion of the Old Testament legal system, notably the social legislation in Exod. 21-23, was originally Canaanite but received Israel's characteristic stamp. The Canaanites shared also, it would appear, in the intellectual activity of the Orient known as "wisdom." Yet most astonishing is the group of documents uncovered at Ras Shamra on the northern coast of Syria in 1929 and subsequent years (see article, "The Old Testament World," pp. 259-61). They turned out on decipherment to consist largely of ancient religious poems, epics, and myths intimately related to the cultus—nothing less in fact than a portion of the long-lost literature of the ancient Canaanites! That the documents date from the period when the Hebrews were in the early stages of their thrust into Palestine is but incidental; the significant fact is that they give us an all too tantalizing glimpse of the intellectual and religious culture and practice that were to be Israel's pervasive atmosphere for centuries. Their actual influence is attested in the notable series of parallels, allusions, and even near-quotations steadily being recognized in the Old Testament down to its later portions.

The Hebrews, then, had august guides, and the stimulus of a great and ancient culture so all-comprehending as to constitute their native air, when presently they set out themselves to create a literature that was to prove itself one of the greatest achievements of the human spirit. Yet it would be an error to limit our perspective to non-Hebraic facts and forces. Basic to all was the inherent genius of the Hebrews themselves, although it is highly dubious that as yet any of them or of their contemporaries could have suspected the possibilities that lay in germ in these uncouth shepherds and desert wanderers whose immediate purpose was to dispossess the Canaanites, the legal owners of the land. The reality of national traits cannot be denied, even though their origin lies hidden in the mystery of human biology; and Israel's incomparable contribution to human culture will not be comprehended if it is not freely recognized that they were a people of remarkable endowments.

III. Earliest Fragments of Hebrew Literature

It is more directly to the point, however, to speak of fragments of the Hebrew literary heritage so old as apparently to antedate the settlement in Palestine. Poetic scraps such as the Song of the Well, the taunt against Heshbon, and the vivid bit of description of the boundaries of Moab, preserved in Num. 21, are placed by the narrator in the time of the Wandering, a date there is no good reason for disputing. How long before the Conquest the Song of Lamech (Gen. 4:23-24) and the curse of Canaan (Gen. 9:24-27) may have originated no one can say. But it is freely admitted that some nucleus of the Song of Moses (or Miriam?) in Exod. 15 was actually composed for the triumphant celebration it memorializes. Balaam's oracles (Num. 23-24) are other extended poetic traditions which can with reasonable confidence be assigned in greater or lesser bulk to the period with which the record associates them.

The earliest Hebrews also accumulated a body of traditions about the great figures and events of their history. To these we are indebted in some undetermined measure for our stories about the patriarchs. The superb character of these narratives is, consciously or otherwise, recognized by all; but the critical study of them is yet far from finality, indeed much farther than was once supposed. Even among prominent scholars opinions differ widely, all the way from a relative conservatism¹ to a belief that the stories have grown up in a way typical of most early traditions: a small nucleus of historic events—which cannot now be precisely determined—overlaid with legendary embellishments.² However this may be, the account of Abraham's successful pursuit of the four marauding kings who had carried off his nephew Lot (Gen. 14) has archaic features that indicate dependence on an actual historic source. The whole body of these narratives has indeed received in recent years small, quite indefinite, but significantly corroborative, support from various aspects of our growing knowledge of the ancient East. We can no longer doubt their factual basis, but he would be a bold spirit who would undertake to delineate that basis. Much the same is to be said of the stories of Jacob; they fit at numerous points what we know from other sources. Yet we wrong this whole body of literature when we appraise it primarily as history, for it was composed for a variety of purposes, most of them quite apart from systematic record of the past. Nonetheless it is apparent that the origins of these stories carry us far back in Israel's career, so that the traditions provided a significant portion of the nation's cultural heritage when at length the Hebrew tribes emerged into actual history. It is highly improbable that any of these various elements had been committed to writing before the Conquest; they existed rather as an oral literature, more accurately, as folk traditions. The art of writing was already very ancient and was widely diffused; it had long been practiced in Palestine. But such meager knowledge as we possess relevant to the point does not encourage the assumption that literacy was general at this time in Israel.

¹ See H. H. Rowley, From Joseph to Joshua (London: Oxford University Press, 1950).

² See Aage Bentzen, Introduction to the Old Testament (Copenhagen: G. E. C. Gad, 1948).

THE LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

IV. Epics of the Conquest

The heroic age of the Conquest and settlement added greatly to the people's store of subjects worthy of celebration in song and story. It was an age of precisely the conditions that have universally created ballads and hero tales, a protracted time of turmoil where battle lines were not drawn, but the enemy might be confronted at any chance turning: a time of notable victories against great odds, of common rustics who in emergency proved of such epic stuff that an otherwise unknown Shamgar ben Anath could slay of the well-armed Philistines six hundred men with an ox goad and so work deliverance for Israel; a time, too, of notable champions who, like Samson, grew legendary with the passing years. From some such source the account of Joshua's triumph was later composed. The old sources are still clearly visible in the book of Judges, although overlaid with the historical interpretation of later ages.

The most notable poetic monument of this time is the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5). It has suffered from subsequent editing; but its archaisms, its vivid realism and passion, and its obvious verisimilitude, carry conviction of the contemporaneity of its original. It is a stirring composition in which even yet one feels the anxious concern of the ill-armed tribesmen gathering for battle against Sisera's chariotry, and the excitement and thrill of the victory:

The kings came; they fought.
Then fought the kings of Canaan,
At Taanach, by the waters of Megiddo.
They took no spoil of silver.

From heaven fought the stars,
from their courses they fought against Sisera.
The river Kishon swept them away,
the river of the valiant, the river Kishon.

Fragments of folk poetry have survived in the tales of Samson: his riddle and his answer to the Philistine youths, and his boast of victory at Lehi (Judg. 14:14, 19; 15:18). They are the sort of popular jingle that comes naturally out of a rustic community; they could have arisen at any time, but it is best to relate them to this stage of Israel's development. Through this period, too, the heroic episodes of the nation's past were being recorded in poems that may very well have been chanted in popular gatherings, much like the medieval minstrelsy. It is not known how extensive these were, or whether they approximated the character of a national epic. Mere scraps of the total have been preserved as citations in some of the narrative books, where they are ascribed to the book of Jashar and the book of the Wars of the Lord. They were still receiving accretions as late as the time of Solomon, it would appear, but beyond that nothing is known.

Not less significant is Jotham's fable (Judg. 9:8-15) about the trees seeking a king but finding only the worthless bramble willing to waste time in politics! It is a characteristic piece of the plant and animal fables of the ancient East, of which we have little else from Israel, and along with a few other traces reveals that in this relatively early time Canaanite "wisdom" activity, however slight or extensive it may have been, was contributing to the literary development of the Hebrew people.

V. Canaanite Influence

Since the days of the biblical writers themselves it has been recognized that Canaanite religion made a powerful appeal to the Hebrews, so that the rival claims of pagan deities over against the worship of Israel's own God constituted a disturbing and to some extent a creative stress in religious thought for many centuries—indeed, until the triumph of normative Judaism subsequent to Ezra's reform. The Canaanite religion was old and rich in ritual and liturgy. In spite of features which Israel's better thought repudiated, it had much to teach the newcomers. And so it is that certain of the psalms, for example, which we use to this day, are really Canaanite religious poems taken over and adapted by Israel. It has been claimed likewise that the amazing group of love lyrics which make up the Song of Songs trace back through some undetermined process of adaptation to songs of the Canaanite cultus. Obviously no one can mark the point in the long centuries of Israel's exposure to Canaanite culture when any given poem was so appropriated by the Hebrews, but it is important to realize that here lay one of the potent stimuli to the nascent Hebrew literary genius, which in some way must have been felt as early as the days of the judges.

Yet it was not in hymns and songs alone that this pervasive influence was effective. There were numerous sacred places up and down the length of the land; several of these are mentioned in the Old Testament, and certain others have come to light through archaeological investigation. Each was a center of ritualistic procedure. Details of their interrelationship escape us. Certainly there was some general pattern of practice; but also it is more than probable that the atomistic politics of Canaan entailed a corresponding independence on the part of the priests in the several petty states. Then presently the Yahweh cult likewise came to recognize several places of worship. The old shrine at Shiloh was a center for the tribesmen so early that its origin is unknown: and apparently Shechem was still earlier in religious significance. In course of time another was established at Dan in the far north, and still others at Gilgal, Gibeon, Bethel, and Beer-sheba. The peasant Micah had a private sanctuary for Yahweh in his own home (Judg. 17-18), and there is no reason to suppose that his was unique. Indeed, after the destruction of Shiloh, we hear of just such local and personal places of worship. David provided quasi-national establishment for the cultus in Jerusalem. Yet numbers of Canaanite sacred places were still in some way revered by devout Israelites. Doubtless the situation was comparable with what still exists in Palestine, where very old, originally pagan, sacred places have been taken over as Moslem or Christian sites. Just so the Hebrews worshiped at numerous ancient holy places. In this diversity and wealth of ritual practice we are to see the origins of much of what now stands in the late Priestly Code. The characteristic conservatism and traditionalism of the priesthood evidently preserved in memory—perhaps also in small measure in written documents—generation after generation the ancient modes of worshiping its God, until at length the tragedy of national collapse aroused exiled priests to organize this diverse material in final form.

Something similar may be said of the legal corpus. Whatever rules and regulations the Hebrews possessed at the time of their entrance into Palestine, it is clear these would not fit the new circumstances. But the Canaanites had been for a millennium evolving codes for Palestinian life. What more inevitable than that this ancient legislation should continue, more particularly since the view must be revised that Israel practically exterminated the former inhabitants of the land? In the social upheaval of the troublous times of the settlement, when the two peoples were finding a somewhat tumultuous modus vivendi, it is more than probable that much of the Canaanite body of laws would be sloughed off and finally lost. Nonetheless, in the case law now found in Exod. 21-23 we are by common consent to recognize fragments of the Canaanite code, doubtless revised and adapted to Hebrew needs, but still patently Canaanite. Obviously we have no knowledge of the time and circumstance of the origin of this legislation; also the date of its full acceptance by Israel is so uncertain that scholars differ markedly. It suffices that here lay one more source of our Old Testament literature.

VI. Cultural Significance of the Monarchy

The establishment of the monarchy was epochal for Israel's culture to a degree not commonly realized; indeed, it may be said to mark the beginning of that culture, if defined in a narrower sense. Saul deserves more respect than he generally receives; it was he who first gave the Hebrew tribesmen a few years' experience of the security, even against the powerful Philistine menace, that was possible through political unity. Yet to the end he remained a rustic, ruling his domain in simple state, more like a landed squire than a king. It was the destiny of David to raise his people from abject conquest by the Philistines to near-imperial status as the first power on the eastern seaboard of the Mediterranean. More to our present interest, he established his capital in the ancient fortress city of Jerusalem, came into relations—not always wholesome—with the long-civilized people of the city, and doubtless unconsciously laid the foundations for all the subsequent refinement of Israel's life.

The urbanization went on apace through Solomon's reign. That this was a period of grandeur and wealth is freely recognized; the Hebrew historian himself was dazzled by it (I Kings 4:20-34). But there was much that does not immediately meet the eye. The visit of the queen of Sheba was a showy affair that roused the narrator to grandiloquence. He says little, however, about a quiet and perhaps embittered man, banished to his country estate on pain of death if ever he set foot in the capital. Yet this man, if the identification is proper—in any case, some man of the time while Solomon disported himself in gaudy show—was busy writing. Away from the pomp of the court, at work in some Palestinian home devoid of our simplest conveniences, doubtless equipped with a common reed pen and a roll of papyrus, he was writing the first real history ever composed by man. He may have entertained notions of the superiority of his methods over the annals and royal chronicles of former times; certainly he could not have dreamed of the consequences of his work. For he, and not Herodotus five hundred years later, was the real "Father of History." His theme was that of the kingship in Israel, perhaps the reign of Saul, but certainly that of David, which we have now in II Sam. 9-20. He told of events that he knew well from his own participation; and he related them with such superb skill as even yet might well set an example for historians. His selection of facts was much too narrow; there are hosts of questions that concern the modern historian of which he said nothing. But within the scope of his plan he wrote his narrative in lucid simplicity, with a compelling realism of the interplay of human personalities. Here was something new in Israel's literary career: so far as we know, the first continuous prose. It was Israel's first book.

THE LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

Yet this is but part of the real brilliance of Solomon's time. For it was the age of Israel's first thrilled experience of the delights of the mind. Solomon's far-famed "wisdom" is to be understood as in some way a part of a notable intellectual awakening, doubtless fostered and participated in by the king himself. His 3,000 proverbs and 1,005 songs (I Kings 4:32), however far a carping skeptic may discount them, were yet, on the background of the erstwhile rural culture of his people, indicative of a profound revolution. There was a new ferment stirring in the Hebrew consciousness such as to make this, in spite of the monarch's maladroit politics, a golden age of promise.

That promise did not long delay. The true mission of Israel had come to such self-consciousness that the political debacle of the following centuries could not dim or abate its vigor. The first great historian's work set a vogue. It must have been very soon after this that the hero tales of the "judges" were committed to writing and arranged in some sort of pristine ancestor of the present book of Judges. But still the historic instinct was not satisfied. The old tales and traditions of the nation's early days, its patriarchs, the oppression in Egypt from which the Lord had brought them out by a strong hand and an outstretched arm—all these called to an aroused sense of the meaning of the past. The still older stories of a remote past before Israel had its beginning likewise beckoned to historic research, tales of the great flood, of the antediluvian celebrities, of the beginnings of civilization, of the fabled tower in Shinar from which the human race was dispersed over the face of the earth. The information was gleaned in various ways from the great ancient cultures of Israel's world and passed current in a land through which flowed the tides of the best thought of the time. And all called to an aroused realization of the significance of the past, and quickened the insight that was to be one of Israel's great contributions, the sense of history.

The immediate result was the work now interwoven in much of our Pentateuch and commonly referred to as the J and E documents (see article, "The Growth of the Hexateuch," pp. 192-97). They were conceived on the grand scale, nothing less in fact than world history. And in this once more we come in touch with the revolutionary character of Israel's historians; for one goes far in the stream of historiography before uncovering other writers whose intellects attempted such scope. It may perhaps be objected that J and E were only histories of Israel in a world setting. Yet the long introduction beginning with the creation of the world and the dispersion of the races of man, as well as the steady consciousness of wider contacts that confronts one constantly in these histories, justifies the more challenging description. And like the nameless historian of David's reign, they tell their story with the high literary art which now we may recognize as one of the excellences of Hebrew writing.

Yet these qualities do not exhaust the astonishing character of these ancient Hebrew works produced in the midst of physical conditions that to sophisticated tastes seem little better than barbaric. They have lived to this remote day by their intrinsic worth alone, high among the treasures of man's heritage. For along with other merits they were theological philosophies of history, the first such undertaking that had ever dawned upon human thought. They set a model for subsequent Hebrew historians, so that it is scarcely an exaggeration to claim that the theme of the Old Testament throughout is a survey of human life sub specie aeternitatis. These Hebrew thinkers remained for many ages alone in their field, and when eventually speculation about meaning in history did seize the imagination of a wider circle of scholars, these paid unconscious tribute to the unknown philosophers of Israel who had begun the study. It is mildly amusing for the student of the Old Testament to observe current discussions tracing the course of this speculation only from Augustine onward, apparently oblivious of his dependence on the Bible, that is, ultimately on Israel's historians. There is a tendency to dismiss all this phase of thought as transcendently based, whereas the scope of the Hebrew historians' narrative should have indicated the factual ground of their conclusions. Actually they surveyed an expanse which only through the archaeological and anthropological discoveries of the past hundred years the modern world has been able to rival—and the significance of these newer facts has as yet very imperfectly made its impact upon the thought of this century. While it is true that the psychological sciences began with the Greeks, yet in a large way the Hebrews in their theological interpretation of history were first in the application of empirical methods to the processes of thought.

Israel had become pen conscious. Besides these two great documents, the years of the kingdoms witnessed the production of a diversity of books, temple records, national annals, architectural specifications, stories of the prophets such as those that have enriched us with copious tales of Elijah and Elisha, and a variety of works of transient relevance. Out of such sources the material of the present books of Kings was slowly growing, although it is doubtful that they were assembled until much time had passed, and certainly they did not reach final form until the Exile. Someone has counted twenty-four books mentioned by name in the Old Testament, all of which have disappeared except for such citation; most familiar are the books of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah or of Israel, mentioned in the books of Kings as supplementary sources. What a prize if only archaeology might turn up a copy of some one of these! But it is a vain hope; we must content ourselves with names that witness a vigorous literary activity in the days when monarchs sat enthroned in Jerusalem and in Samaria.

Nor may we overlook the temple in Jerusalem and other shrines of greater or less repute through the land. Allusion has already been made to them as centers of Canaanite literary stimulus; but their influence by no means waned with their growing orthodoxy. The ritual performed day in and day out, century after century, was one of the potent though generally unobtrusive aspects of ancient life. Hymns and liturgies were tested for their effectiveness, and gradually grew into a sifted body of religious lyrics, many of them in course of time to be preserved for us in that classic of the inner life, the book of Psalms. The "wise men" likewise had a continuing activity; we hear of them occasionally, and not always in flattering terms. The heading of Prov. 25 testifies that an organic group of them was engaged in the days of Hezekiah in something resembling the work of a present-day committee. The distilled wisdom of their sage observations on human life has also gone into the total of our heritage from ancient Israel.

A side light, pitifully small but priceless in its uniqueness, is provided by the documents written in ink on potsherds which archaeology has already turned up in Judah and on the site of Samaria. A single ostrakon from the hill of Ophel, at Jerusalem, half obliterated by the action of the centuries, appears to contain a list of commodities, perhaps for use in the cultus. The group from Samaria, dating from the eighth century B.C., likewise lists materials, constituting, it would seem, a sort of acknowledgment of payment of taxes in kind. But most remarkable are the ostraca from the site of ancient Lachish. They are a series of letters written by at least two officers of the garrison at the time of Nebuchadrezzar's advance to the attack on Jerusalem. They possess a genuine thrill for the student of the Old Testament, in part for the names they mention, some of which have been long familiar, but even more for turns of expression and idiomatic structure which seem to come right out of the Hebrew Bible, though in reality their significance is the reverse: the Bible was written in the living language of the time. But of all the ostraca alike, the importance for our present interest is their testimony to Israel's literate culture. The art of writing was a common acquisition.

VII. The Literary Prophets

With the line of prophets beginning about the middle of the eighth century, Israel's literature reached its maturity. The prophets brought Hebrew writing to such excellence that the period of approximately two hundred years, from Amos and Isaiah to Second Isaiah, is well considered Israel's classic age. They imparted an impulse that through several minor figures down to Second Zechariah (Zech. 9-14) was felt for many ages, and in the considerably modified form called now "apocalypse" passed over into Christian usage. Indeed, both this and true prophecy have continued potent forces to the present.

The study of the prophets is not easy, for practically all the books bearing their names are composite. Those of the great prophets, in particular, and several of the so-called minor prophets also in striking degree, are expanded with relatively large bulks of matter of diverse authorship, and generally of most indefinite origins. In the form in which they have come to us they are a deposit of Jewish piety through many centuries. Actually there are reasons to believe that the process of accretion was not complete until near Christian times. Within this diverse mass, then, precise identification of the words of the original prophet remains even yet a contentious issue. Nonetheless, on one basic matter there is full agreement. The prophets were poets. This does not preclude the possibility that as well they uttered prose oracles; but how much, if any, of the prose material now found in their books is genuine continues uncertain. Their poems are short—by comparison with some of the famous literature of later times, very short. There is an effort growing out of the study of literary types in the Old Testament to show that the critical process of fragmentation went too far, and instead certain shorter books, as Joel and Habakkuk, constitute complete, unified literary compositions of an established form. But granting whatever cogency one may to such contentions, it is uncertain how far this form is the work of later editors using composite materials, and how far it stems from the original prophet. In any case, it is incontestable that some at least of the prophetic oracles are and always have been no more than two, three, or four lines. From this minimum they range in bulk upward, admittedly in many cases to whole chapters or somewhat more.

THE LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

It is the habit to distinguish this line of prophets from their predecessors as "the writing prophets." Yet we shall fail to understand them if we overlook the fact that they were, prior to the Exile at least, just as truly concerned with oral utterance as were Samuel, Nathan, Elijah, and the rest. How their spoken words came into written form is an interesting but largely futile speculation. Certain Scandinavian scholars emphasize oral tradition, claiming that the oracles were so preserved for ages. It is a fruitful insight, but in grave danger of excess; for we know that Jeremiah had his words committed to writing while as yet he was but in midcareer (Jer. 36), and this book was certainly the lineal predecessor of the present book of Jeremiah. It has been pointed out also that Isa. 8:16 is susceptible of the meaning that in a similar time of menace Isaiah took the same course. But certainly, of the rest nothing more is known than can be deduced from the form and condition of the books themselves, which commonly evidence a long period of collecting and editing, but reveal nothing about the original writing. However, the question is for our present concern largely irrelevant. The prophets were great literary creators, whoever did the actual inditing of their words.

It will be apparent that the common description of the prophets as preachers is susceptible of grave perversion. Yet in one regard it provides real insight; the consciousness of an immediate audience lay ever upon the prophet; in prophecy's earlier stages at least, it was his impelling drive. And his oracles, however polished and finished, were poured out in an intense effort to sweep along and bring moving conviction to living contemporaries who sat or stood, listening and watching with various reactions. The prophetic poems have thus a common type; they are characterized by an impetuosity and intensity of utterance, a sense of terrible urgency: the issues of life and death hung in the balance, a mortal threat was already on the way—if only something might be done while yet there was time! The prophetic method then was not so much that of reasoned development of a theme to carry an audience by logical steps to a rational conclusion; it was rather to overwhelm and overawe, to impress by telling words, by skillfully turned expressions, by lines that would re-echo in memory till action was provoked. For the prophet's mission could brook no interruption. The awful majesty and holiness of God, over against the injustices, the paganisms, the political stupidities of contemporary society—these were the two poles between which his soul was racked in an agony of spiritual torment. As time passed, prophecy took on a more calm demeanor, yet its inner fervor was never abated, not even when it expressed itself in the apocalyptic visions of the book of Daniel.

It is tempting to pause over the majesty and finished art of Isaiah, the wistful, haunting beauty of Jeremiah's poetry, the rare occasions when Ezekiel's muse takes flight above common levels, and, as in his description of the imminent fall of Jerusalem (Ezek. 7), reveals that under stress even he can feel the touch of celestial fire. With the second Isaiah the prophetic poetry reached the highest level of exaltation, reasoned force and pure beauty (see article, "The Prophetic Literature," pp. 201-11).

VIII. Deuteronomy and the Historians

The book of Deuteronomy—everyone is familiar with the common view that the book found in the temple in 621 B.C. (II Kings 22) constitutes its major bulk—demonstrates afresh the growing literary self-consciousness of the nation. For while basically a book of laws, a sort of Revised Statutes of ancient Judah, it is set in a homiletic framework where the writer argues the claims of God upon Israel and the importance of national faithfulness. Its temper is a strange blend of prophetic and legal; yet unlike the works of the prophets it was clearly composed for private study. The author's subject parallels the theme of the prophets, but he differs from them in that he expounds and reasons. Here, and not in their oracles, is found Israel's first homiletic literature, for Deuteronomy is a great sermon, or series of sermons.

Writing of this sort implies, and to be effective entails, literary mastery beyond that of the narrator or oracular poet. It is the art of the essayist. Deuteronomy is Israel's first attempt at belles-lettres; and in the hands of this writer the attainment is high. The book has a notable style, which in fact set a vogue for a "school" of writers and editors. If one were obliged to characterize it in a single term, that word would be "flow"; it has a rounded fluency, a rhythmic dignity, that impart majesty and elevation. The author delights in words, in their cadences and overtones. He piles them up in synonyms, he entwines them in ornate patterns, he balances them in polished phrases, until at times, half entranced with their music, he almost loses his line of thought in their enchanting beauty. Yet ponderous as his style threatens to become, his greatness is apparent in the sustained interest and sheer beauty he attains. He may be charged with breaking the rules of good writing—and then he writes better than the masters. Through his balance and rhythm, his sense of form and proportion, and in his love of the allusive, pictorial quality of words, his prose becomes lyric.

IX. The Exile and Its Sequel

The Exile was the Great Divide in Hebrew history. It was at once the most terrible and the most transforming experience that befell ancient Israel. From this point onward all streams run in different and generally in deeper channels. The course of literature likewise was diverted, although not always for the better; what was gained in moral earnestness and religious fervor was not uncommonly lost in literary art. One of the notable features of this later time was the great editorial activity mentioned briefly above, the marks of which are apparent on most books of the Old Testament. It signifies the attainment of a complete literary self-consciousness; the Jews had now become "the people of the book." It was a labor which along its exegetical and homiletic lines produced later the Mishnah, the Midrashim, and a great bulk of other writing, indeed down to our own day. Acceptance of an ancillary relationship implies admission of inferiority; and notwithstanding flashes of creative writing by completely unknown authors, as for example the magnificent poetry of Isa. 60-62, we find ourselves here in the lesser light of the epigoni.

The best narrative of the postexilic period is in the books of Jonah and Ruth, granted that the latter is actually to be dated here; it in particular is a charming idyl of simple life in Judah in the days of long ago. The only work worthy of mention alongside these, until perhaps the time of I Maccabees, is the memoirs of Nehemiah, now incorporated in the book of his name. It is rich in unconscious character delineation, the account of the difficulties and endeavors of an intensely loyal, unselfish, and altogether high-minded Jew, who at the same time could be amusingly smug. The books of Chronicles are the most obvious historical narrative of the period, but of them as literary art the less said the better. The writer has forgotten how the times of the kingdoms produced authors even more intense than he in their moral convictions, yet by very reason of that intensity great as literary men.

A prime treasure of this time is the book of Psalms. Enough has been said of its remote origins; psalmody was very old in the Orient and expressed itself early in Israel. Of prior collections of such sacred lyrics we know nothing save as their presence in whole or in part is declared in the present Psalter; for the book of Psalms is an anthology of Israel's hymns and liturgies, which received its final editing into 150 poems somewhere in this long, indefinite period of which we are speaking. Activity was not confined, however, to externals: psalm writing continued, probably until the Maccabean period.

The wisdom books likewise were edited in postexilic times. And of their greatness, particularly that of Job, there can be no two opinions, yet we can afford to dismiss them with this brief mention, since they are dealt with elsewhere (see article, "The Wisdom Literature," pp. 212-19).

Much attention has been given in recent years to the forms of Hebrew literature. Beginning with a structural analysis of the Psalms, it has broadened out to the prophetic books and to the narratives. As a result we have discovered that there existed clearly recognized literary forms of a wide diversity: hymns, thanksgivings, lamentations, liturgies, wedding poetry, war poetry, peasant songs, imprecations, prophetic and priestly oracles, and a variety of tales. The form was of as precise a structure as that of the modern sonnet. The investigation contributes to an enhanced realization of the self-conscious art of Israel's writers. It promises to transform considerably the method of literary criticism.

X. Style of Old Testament Literature

A literature so diverse as that of the Old Testament may well baffle rational appraisal and in addition to its diversity of type and theme, it possessed also a wide range of merit. Nonetheless, the important matter is to realize its prevailing excellence. For those who possess historic perspective it stands out easily as the greatest literature of the ancient East. The writers of Egypt and of Mesopotamia, notwithstanding their indisputable importance in the history of culture, yet at their best only imperfectly approached the level where Israel's literary men moved easily as masters. Nor is this all. The Old Testament has continued to this day a high treasure of our cultural heritage by reason of its historical significance, it is true, but primarily through its literary beauty and power.

THE LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

After all that has transpired in more than two thousand years, we must yet appoint a place with the mighty for these unknown men of the rugged hills of Judah and the narrow vales of Israel. They lived in conditions of stark simplicity; but herein they are themselves a symbol of their own deepest meaning: man's life consists not in things, but "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks."

The Hebrew storytellers manifest an uncanny sense of the appropriate. They fall occasionally, it is true, into tedious repetition, which indeed may have been effective for ancient audiences; but apart from this, they are masters of the art of commanding and holding interest. Their compactness and speed of movement are remarkable. The tragedy of Queen Jezebel, with its shallow taunts, its cold brutality, its callous indifference, and the ghastly sequel, is all told in the brief compass of six biblical verses (II Kings 9:30-35). They know also the power of suspense and surprise. They can paint a picture with a few bold strokes so that it stands out clear as a vignette. And permeating all is the utter simplicity of their themes, and the realism and deep psychological insights of their flowing tale. An excellent illustration for study of Hebrew narrative is Gen. 24, a simple story of Abraham's servant going to Mesopotamia to find a wife for Isaac. What a picture is sketched when, having arrived at his destination, the servant "made the camels kneel down outside the city by a well of water at the time of evening, the time when women go forth to draw water"! Even more effective, for those who can apply a touch of disciplined imagination, is the conclusion where, leaving the servant slowly wending his way back to southern Palestine with Rebecca in his entourage, the scene shifts, and Isaac is depicted going out "to muse in the field at eventide; and he lifted up his eyes, and behold, the camels were coming"! What surprise too when the servant stood praying beside the well, and he had scarcely ended his prayer when down came Rebecca with her pitcher—and fulfilled his prayer to the letter! Rebecca's family brought the stranger home, made him comfortable with all the attention of Oriental hospitality, and set food before him. But he put it away with the remark, "I will not eat until I have told my errand." An errand to them? This stranger with every mark of wealth and distinction? And his first words are, "I am Abraham's servant"—Abraham, their kinsman who had gone out years ago; the West had swallowed him up with never a word come back to tell whether he was living or long since dead; and now—"the Lord has blessed my master greatly, and he has flocks and herds, and men-servants and maid-servants, and silver and gold."

But greatest is the Joseph story, which might well delay us long. To these other excellences it adds superb character delineation. The greatness of the story lies in the majesty and magnanimity of Joseph. Also the author manifests a skillful mastery of his plot. Joseph fell lower and lower in his troubles until with a change of fortune such as could be credible only of the Orient he found himself master of the greatest land of the time. Then presently he had opportunity for vengeance on the callous brothers who had sold him a slave into years of misery. But vengeance? It seems so; until we discover that Joseph has cleverly maneuvered them into a position where once again they can serve their selfishness at the expense of a little brother. What will they do? The answer is in Judah's plea, one of the most moving passages in the Old Testament. "And so Joseph could not restrain himself before those who stood by, and he commanded, 'Let every man go out from me'; and there stood no man with him while Joseph made himself known to his brothers. And he wept aloud . . . and he said, 'I am Joseph; is my father still alive?' " Ah! "that old man," his father, of whom he had inquired from the brothers as often as he had opportunity, would he yet see him after these long years of separation? Old peasant as he was, in the far land of Palestine: of him, in his magnificence, Joseph was not ashamed but introduced him proudly to Pharaoh himself. In Joseph's wistful longing for his father, in the deep satisfaction with which he gave directions, "Go up and tell my father, The LORD has made me master of all the land of Egypt," we see the golden thread of the narrative binding all together in the depth and nobility of Joseph's character.

Of other types of prose we may remark only their near-poetic quality. The authors' feeling for the resonance of words and their sense of form and rhythm are such that commonly they fall, unconsciously it would seem, into lyric. The rhythmic sentences of Deuteronomy have the cadence of music as the author warns of prosperous years in the land of promise (Deut. 6:6-12); his feeling for nature, his love of the marvelous little land that God had given to his fathers, and his literary instincts all combine in a gem of description, prose in form, but of purest poetry (Deut. 8:7-9). Yet perhaps this deep poetic feeling of the Hebrew writers is most strikingly illustrated by Koheleth, that "gentle cynic" (Ecclesiastes), who looked on life with a mildly blasé, certainly completely disillusioned, but withal amused, tolerance.

Little wonder then that the recognized poets of the Old Testament give us sheer lyric beauty. They reveled in the scenery of their little land, but they always made nature subservient to a higher theme—that of God's glory and will.

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

The device of parallelism proved in their hands an effective expression of that rounded measure lacking which an alleged poet writes at the best only exalted prose, and on lower levels, pure banality. They also used assonance and alliteration; occasionally they ventured a sort of rhyme; they played with words in a way that we might call "punning" were they not so solemnly serious; they employed refrains and measured reiteration; they grouped their lines also in simple strophic structures of twos, threes, fours, or in even larger units—a fact which adds to the sense of form and at times provides subtle overtones to the thought.

The curse of not a few contemporary writers is that with notable mastery of their art they yet have nothing to say! To their qualities of great expression the Hebrews added robust and profound thought. Their theme was one, whatever their immediate topic; and it is the greatest theme that can engage human thought. In some way the mystery of human life had been impressed upon them. What is man? Man in his deepest being, man over against and in relation to that supreme mystery of Being from which all things and all beings proceed? Here lay their interest, their obsession. Age after age, in varying mood, form and emphasis, the Hebrew writers discussed directly or through implication this and this only. Some lost the greatness in a petty selfishness; some were content to mouth ancient sentiments, and at best to stand on the gains of former ages. But on the whole they were creative thinkers of the highest order.

On the same theme much has been written in subsequent centuries by way of commentary or expansion, much too in quite other traditions. Yet it is no ex parte bias that would claim Israel's insights to be unrivaled in primacy and importance to this day. They were taken up, obviously, into rabbinical Judaism; they became the essential core of Christianity; along these two lines, and supported by Islamic thought likewise in its central impulse Hebraic, they have shaped the culture of all the West, and are at this day the vital impulse in our groaning and travelling toward a better world.

XI. Selected Bibliography

- BENTZEN, AAGE. Introduction to the Old Testament. Copenhagen: G. E. C. Gad, 1948.
- BEWER, JULIUS A. The Literature of the Old Testament in Its Historical Development. Rev. ed. New York: Columbia University Press, 1933.
- FRANKFORT, HENRI, et al. The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1946.
- GRAY, GEORGE BUCHANAN. The Forms of Hebrew Poetry. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1915.
- HEMPEL, JOHANNES. Die Althebraische Literatur und ihr hellinistisch-jüdisches Nachleben. Potsdam: Akademische Verlagsgesellschaft, 1930.
- MACDONALD, D. B. The Hebrew Literary Genius. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1933.
- PRITCHARD, J. B. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1950.
- PFEIFFER, ROBERT H. Introduction to the Old Testament. New York: Harper & Bros., 1941.
- ROBINSON, THEODORE H. The Poetry of the Old Testament. London: Duckworth, 1947.
- WILD, LAURA H. A Literary Guide to the Bible. New York: George H. Doran Co., 1922.

THE GROWTH OF THE HEXATEUCH

by CUTHBERT A. SIMPSON

- I. The Traditional Authorship of the Pentateuch
- II. The Beginnings of Pentateuchal Criticism
- III. The Composite Character of the Hexateuch
 - A. Parallel Narratives and Laws
 - B. Inconsistencies Within Narratives and Laws
 - C. Chronological Difficulties
- IV. The Rise of Scientific Criticism
- V. The Graf-Wellhausen Hypothesis
- VI. The Structure of the Documents
- VII. The Two Editions of the J Document
- VIII. The Purpose of J¹
- IX. The Purpose and Methods of J²
- X. The Tradition of the E Document
- XI. The Purpose of E
- XII. The Conflation of J and E
- XIII. The Origin and Purpose of Deuteronomy
- XIV. The Origin and Purpose of P
- XV. Summary
- XVI. Selected Bibliography

The term Hexateuch is of modern origin and designates the first six books of the Old Testament. It conveniently registers the fact, established by critical investigation, that the documents of which these six books are composed did not end with the death of Moses (Deut. 34) but continued with an account of the Israelite settlement in Palestine. The word Pentateuch, used in Origen's commentary on John 4:25, refers to the first five books only. In the Jewish tradition these books are called "Torah" or "Law" and they stand by themselves, while the book of Joshua is included among the "Former Prophets." That Joshua should have come to be regarded as the author of the book bearing his name as its title—a tradition first recorded in the pages of the Talmud (Baba Bathra 14b)—is easily understandable.

I. The Traditional Authorship of the Pentateuch

The ascription of the Pentateuch to Moses, explicit in the various English versions of the Bible, rests upon a tradition of obscure origin. The books themselves do not claim him as their author. Indeed, it may be argued that the attribution of certain specific passages to him—e.g., Exod. 24:4; 34:27; Num. 33:2; Deut. 31:9—rather suggests that these passages are unique in this respect, and that the Pentateuch as a whole does not come from his hand. It is not until we come to Chronicles, with its continuation in Ezra and Nehemiah, that we find reference to "the law of Moses," meaning the Pentateuch (II Chr. 23:18; 30:16; Ezra 3:2; 7:6; Neh. 8:1; cf. "the book of Moses," II Chr. 35:12; Ezra 6:18; Neh. 13:1). The tradition of Mosaic authorship thus appears to have been current about 250 B.C. In view of the absence of earlier testimony one can scarcely maintain that it took form much before that date, nearly a thousand years after Moses' death.

II. The Beginnings of Pentateuchal Criticism

Apart from Jerome's identification of Deuteronomy with the law book of Josiah, there appears to have been no challenging of the tradition on critical grounds¹ until the eleventh century, when two rabbis, Isaac and Ibn Ezra, ventured to question the Mosaic authorship of certain passages,² with, however, no immediate result. It was not until 1520 that the matter was raised again by Carlstadt, who, in his De Canonicis Scripturis, called attention to the fact that the style of the Old Testament narrative remained unchanged after the account of the death of Moses, and suggested that this might have some bearing upon the question of the authorship of the Pentateuch. In the two centuries which followed, a number of scholars raised further questions on other grounds, noting (a) the occurrences of two or more versions of what appeared to be the same incident, (b) the inconsistencies in the narrative, and (c) its recurring chronological difficulties.

III. The Composite Character of the Hexateuch

It will be convenient at this point to list some of the more outstanding instances of these

¹ The doctrinal and ethical implications of certain of the tales in Genesis did cause some searching of heart for the author of the Clementine Homilies, and led him to attempt a modification of the tradition; but this was not criticism as the word is now understood.

² For particulars see Cuthbert A. Simpson, The Early Traditions of Israel (Oxford: Blackwell, 1948), p. 19.

phenomena,^a not all of which, however, were noted by the critics of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries:

A. Parallel Narratives and Laws.—(a) Abraham twice met what appeared to be a dangerous situation by representing his wife to be his sister (Gen. 12:10-20; 20:1-18), and Isaac once resorted to the same expedient (Gen. 26:6-11). (b) Abraham three times received the promise of a son (Gen. 15:4; 17:16; 18:10), and (c) four explanations of that son's name, Isaac, meaning, "he laughs," are given (Gen. 17:17-19; 18:12-13; 21:6a, 6b). (d) Hagar is twice expelled from Abraham's household on account of Sarah's jealousy, to find herself at a well in the desert where she is succored by an angel who tells her that she is to be the mother of a great people (Gen. 16:4-14; 21:9-21). (e) Jacob twice gives the name Bethel to a place formerly called Luz (Gen. 28:19; 35:6, 15). (f) Jacob's name is twice changed to Israel (Gen. 32:28; 35:10). It might, of course, be argued that these phenomena can be accounted for by assuming that Moses had composed the book of Genesis from existing documents or divergent oral traditions. The fact that similar duplications occur in the record of events in which he was himself involved is less easily explained: (g) The name Yahweh is twice revealed to Moses (Exod. 3:14-15; 6:2-3). (h) On each occasion this revelation is accompanied by a promise that God would deliver Israel from Egypt (Exod. 3:7-8; 6:5-6) and (j) Moses is commissioned to this end (Exod. 3:10-18; 6:11). (k) Moses twice hesitates to accept this appointment (Exod. 4:10-13; 6:12), and (l) twice receives Aaron as his spokesman (Exod. 4:14-16; 7:1-2). While it is, of course, possible that Moses was reluctant to undertake the task assigned to him and that it was necessary for God to speak to him twice, it is, to say the least, curious that no reference whatever is made on the "second" occasion to the "former" experience. (m) Twice the quails are given (Exod. 16:13; Num. 11:4-6, 31-32), and (n) twice water is brought from the rock (Exod. 17:1-7; Num. 20:1-13).

The questions raised by the numerous repetitions in the legislation are less disturbing, for such repetitions could be accounted for on the theory that certain laws had, for whatever reason, been promulgated more than once. Nevertheless, it is curious that during the stay of the people at Sinai—a period of less than a year according to the present narrative (Exod. 19:1; Num. 10:11)—Moses should have found it necessary to command (o) three times the observance of the feasts of unleavened bread (Exod. 23:15; 34:18; Lev. 23:6), of weeks or harvest (Exod. 23:16a; 34:22a; Lev. 23:15), and of ingathering or tabernacles (Exod. 23:16b; 34:22b; Lev. 23:33-36; cf. Lev. 23:39-43), and (p) six times the keeping of the sabbath (Exod. 20:8-10; 23:12; 31:13-17; 34:21; 35:1-3; Lev. 23:3).

B. Inconsistencies Within Narratives and Laws.—(a) According to Gen. 1:26-27 man and woman were created together after the rest of creation, herbs, trees, fish, birds, and animals, had been completed; according to Gen. 2:7 man was created first, then the trees (vs. 9), then the animals (vs. 19), and finally woman, formed from a rib of the man (vss. 21-22). (b) According to Gen. 6:19-20 Noah was commanded to take into the ark with him one pair of each kind of animal, birds, cattle, etc.; contrast 7:2-3, where he is commanded to preserve alive seven pairs of clean beasts to one pair of unclean. (c) Gen. 7:12 records that the rain of the Flood was on the earth for 40 days; in 7:24 it is stated that the waters prevailed upon the earth 150 days. (d) According to Gen. 41:34 Joseph advises Pharaoh to prepare for the coming famine by storing up one fifth of the grain yield during the intervening plentiful years; according to vs. 35 he advised him to gather all the food. (e) Moses' father-in-law is named Reuel in Exod. 2:18, 21 and Num. 10:29—unless the name here is Hobab—and Jethro in Exod. 3:1; 4:18; 18:1-12. (f) According to Exod. 25:10-22 Moses, while on the holy mount, received directions for the making of the ark. These directions were carried out by Bezaleel (37:1-9) after Moses had brought down from the mount the second set of the tables of the law (34:29), which were placed in the ark (40:20) upon the completion of the tabernacle. According to Deut. 10:1-5 Moses himself made the ark after the incident of the golden calf, before going up the mount to have the ten words inscribed on a new set of tables, and these were placed in the ark immediately upon his return. (g) According to Num. 2 the sacred tent was in the midst of the camp, while Exod. 33:7 (cf. Num. 11:24-30; 12:4) states that it was pitched outside the camp. (h) According to Num. 13:27 the spies report to Moses that the land of Palestine is extremely fertile; yet in vs. 32 they say that it "eateth up the inhabitants thereof"—that is, that the people are weak and undernourished; yet, a further contradiction, the same verse describes them as "men of great stature." (j) According to Num. 22:20 God gave Balaam permission to accompany the princes of Balak, yet in vs. 22 it is stated that "God's anger was kindled because he went." (k) According to Josh. 2:15 Rahab's house was ^a With the permission of the publisher, considerable use, in this and the next three sections, has been made of Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 26-31, 38-40.

THE GROWTH OF THE HEXATEUCH

on the wall of Jericho, which (6:20) collapsed when the people shouted; yet (6:22) Joshua commanded the spies whom Rahab had befriended to go to her house and bring her out, which they did (6:23).

There are also numerous inconsistencies in the laws. These are, however, of another nature than the contradictions in the narrative, and are in themselves of little weight against the tradition of single, Mosaic authorship. For it could be held that the promulgation of a new law by implication repealed any earlier command to which it stood in contradiction, especially since the Pentateuch assumes that Moses' career as lawgiver extended over a period of forty years. Nevertheless, it must be said that adequate grounds for postulating such a legal development within this relatively brief period would seem to be lacking. And when it is found that certain of the laws have a marked affinity with certain parts of the narrative which, as regards both style and content, are clearly distinct from other parts of the narrative with which other laws are in agreement, it is reasonable to infer that the inconsistencies in the laws and the inconsistencies in the narrative point in the same direction.

As a concrete instance ⁴ Exod. 20:24 may be noted. Here the erection of an altar—and so the establishment of a sanctuary—is permitted in every place where Yahweh records his name. This is congruent with such passages as Gen. 12:7; 22:9; 26:25; 35:7. It is inconsistent with Deut. 12 where only one sanctuary is recognized as legitimate. If it be argued that the law in Exod. 20:24 was implicitly repealed by Deut. 12, reference need only be made to such passages as Judg. 6:24, 26; I Sam. 14:35 where the fact that the erection of altars is recorded without reprobation indicates that Exod. 20:24 was regarded as still valid—and therefore that Deut. 12 was unknown. Nor can it be held that Deut. 12 did not come into effect until the Jerusalem temple was built, for in the present form of the narrative a central sanctuary was provided by the making of the tabernacle (Exod. 40) which, it is recorded in Josh. 18:1, after the conquest of Canaan was set up permanently at Shiloh.

C. Chronological Difficulties.—(a) In Gen. 12:11 Sarah is represented as a woman of such physical attractiveness as to be an object of desire to the Pharaoh. Gen. 17:17 states that she was ten years younger than Abraham; she would therefore have been at least sixty-five at this time since it is stated in 12:4 that Abraham was seventy-five years old when he came to Palestine. (b) According to Gen. 25:26 Isaac was sixty years old when Jacob and Esau were born; by 26:34 he was a hundred when he blessed Jacob on his deathbed (cf. 27:2, 4), but according to 35:28 he did not die until he was a hundred and eighty. He was, accordingly, eighty years dying. (c) Jacob had returned to Palestine before his father died (33:18), and was present at his funeral (35:29); his stay with Laban had been for only twenty years (31:41); chs. 34–35, according to the present record, thus cover a period of some sixty years. Against this is the notice in 37:2 that Joseph was seventeen years old when he first began to annoy his brothers; he had been born nine years after his father, having served Laban seven years (29:20–30), had married Leah and Rachel (cf. 29:31–35; 30:9–21), that is, four years before the return to Palestine. In the light of this chronology the events in chs. 34–35 had not covered more than thirteen years. (d) If it is argued that the notice of Isaac's death has been misplaced, other difficulties result. For Joseph, sold into Egypt at the age of seventeen, was thirty years old when he came to power (41:46), spent seven years preparing for the famine (41:29–30), and brought his father to Egypt two years later (45:11), that is, twenty-two years after he had been sold to the Ishmaelites. Isaac would then be a hundred and fifty-five years old, with still twenty-five years to live. His name is not included in the list of those going into Egypt (46:8–27). If we admit that the notice of Isaac's death has simply been misplaced, then we must suppose that, according to the narrator, Jacob had returned from Egypt to be present at his funeral. But Jacob was a hundred and thirty years old when he went to Egypt (47:9), and died seventeen years later (47:28), and so eight years before his father.

(e) Chronological difficulties of a somewhat different nature are involved in Exod. 1–12. According to 12:40 the Israelites had been in Egypt for 430 years. Since according to the present narrative (as it has been seen) Joseph was thirty-nine when they arrived, only seventy-one years of this period had elapsed when he died at the age of a hundred and ten (Gen. 50:26). According to Exod. 7:7 Moses, whose birth is recorded in 2:2, was eighty years old at the time of the Exodus. Hence, allowing a good margin for the events recorded in 1:9–22, some two hundred and fifty years are "covered" in 1:6–8.

(f) According to Num. 10:11 the Israelites left Sinai in the second month of the second year, reckoning from the Exodus (cf. Exod. 19:1, where this reckoning is explicit). They arrived at Kadesh (Num. 20:1) in the first month, presumably of the third year, since no dates are mentioned between chs. 10 and 20. Aaron's death is recorded in 20:23-28, and 33:38 places this in the fifth month of the fortieth year after the Exodus. Thus a period of something more than thirty-seven years is "covered" by 20:1-22 (with this cf. Deut. 2:14; Num. 21:12-13).

⁴ In this connection see p. 190, where the legislation in Exodus—except that in chs. 20–23 and 34—Leviticus and Numbers is shown to be related to certain parts of the narrative in Genesis, and to be inconsistent with other parts of it.

It is the presence in the text of difficulties and inconsistencies such as these which makes it impossible to accept the traditional theory that the Pentateuch is the work of one man. The critics of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries were thus led to attempt the formulation of a theory of sources. They did not, however, discover the clue which ultimately was to make possible the isolation of those sources, and so the determination of their origin and character.

IV. The Rise of Scientific Criticism

In 1753, Jean Astruc,⁵ a physician of Montpellier, published a monograph on the sources of Genesis.⁶ He noted the alternating use of God and Y^hweh to designate the deity as an indication of diversity of authorship, and using this as his criterion, resolved Genesis into two main documents, postulating at the same time a number of minor sources.

Some twenty-five years later Johann Gottfried Eichhorn, who had independently reached the same general conclusions as Astruc, published his introduction to the Old Testament. He advanced a step beyond Astruc, however, in that he attempted to establish the existence of additional characteristics, both of style and content, marking each source. Nevertheless, he failed to recognize that the sources of which Genesis was composed were to be found underlying the remaining books of the Hexateuch.

In the century that ensued, investigation of the Hexateuch followed three main lines. One of them attempted to reconstruct the documents from which the books had been composed; the second rejected the theory of continuous source documents and instead developed, in one form or another, a "fragment-hypothesis," which maintained that the present narrative was a compilation of numerous brief, independent, and often contradictory units of tradition. The third theory, lying midway between the document-hypothesis and the fragment-hypothesis, was that of supplementation. According to this theory, underlying the present narrative there was but one continuous source document, which had, however, been supplemented from time to time by the insertion of fragments of diverse origin.

⁵ Astruc's conclusions had been anticipated by Vitringa (1683) and by H. B. Witter (1711), but their work seems to have remained practically unknown until attention was called to it by Adolphe Lods; see his Israel from Its Beginnings to the Middle of the Eighth Century, tr. S. H. Hooke (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co., 1932), p. 10, and his Jean Astruc et la critique biblique au XVIII^e siècle (Strasbourg: Istra, 1924).

⁶ Conjectures sur les mémoires originaux dont il paroît que Moïse s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genèse (Bruxelles: Frick, 1753).

The work of the century found a summing up in the "new document-hypothesis" of Hermann Hupfeld, who, in 1853, exactly one hundred years after the appearance of Astruc's Conjectures, published the results of his investigations into the sources of Genesis,⁷ following this a few years later with a similar analysis of the remaining books of the Pentateuch. In its developed form this new document-hypothesis maintained that the groundwork of the Pentateuch was a document which in Genesis referred to God as Elohim. This Hupfeld designated E¹ (today it would be symbolized by P). He believed (erroneously, as it will be seen) that this was the earliest of the component documents. Next in origin was the second E document, designated E²—roughly equivalent to the modern E. Still later a third document was written which used the name Yahweh, and which Hupfeld⁸ designated J. These three documents were combined by a redactor to form a composite work which would today be symbolized by PEJ (for Hupfeld, E¹E²J). The latest document of the four was Deuteronomy, which was added to this composite work in order to form the present Pentateuch.

It may be noted here that the solution of the problem of the growth of the Hexateuch involves two things: the books must be analyzed into their component sources, and the chronological relationship of the sources must be determined. In the century ending with Hupfeld the first of these tasks had been substantially accomplished—though subsequent investigation was to modify the results in certain details, and was to reveal a process of literary development within the sources themselves; little of value had been achieved as regards the second task. This was due to the fact that Hupfeld, like his predecessors, had approached the problem through Genesis. This book, being practically pure narrative, furnished of itself little or no indication as to the chronological order of the documents of which it was composed. It was therefore easy enough to assume that the document which furnished the opening chapter of the book, and also served as the framework into which the material from the other documents had been fitted, was chronologically the first of the series.

⁷ Die Quellen der Genesis und die Art ihrer Zusammensetzung (Berlin: Wiegandt & Grieben, 1853).

⁸ German scholars used J to represent the Hebrew letter yodh, the first letter of the divine name (יהוה) here transliterated Yahweh; hence the document using this name in Genesis is called J, not Y.

V. The Graf-Wellhausen Hypothesis

In 1865-66 Karl H. Graf published the results of his critical work on the historical books of the Old Testament.⁹ He approached the problem of the Hexateuch not by way of Genesis, but through a comparative study of the laws. He maintained that the Book of the Law "found" in the temple in the reign of Josiah (II Kings 22:8) was the Deuteronomic Code, D; that the laws in Exod. 13-23 and 34 were earlier than D, as was the "prophetic" narrative, JE, in which they were embedded; that the laws of the P Code—Hupfeld's E¹—were of post-exilic origin, but that the narrative of P was the oldest part of the Hexateuch. With it the Deuteronomist had combined JE and his own work. To this Ezra had added the P legal code, together with some supplementary narrative material.

The great Dutch scholar Abraham Kuenen immediately discerned both the strength and the weakness of Graf's hypothesis, and pointed out to him in a private letter that the narrative and the laws of P were so obviously interdependent that it was impossible to suppose that they had originated some centuries apart. Graf accepted this criticism and modified his theory accordingly, which at once received the public support of Kuenen,¹⁰ and, a few years later, of Julius Wellhausen.¹¹ The theory, which has come to be known as the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis, may in its broad outlines be stated as follows:

The Hexateuch is composed of four originally separate documents, of which the earliest is that known as J, so called because of its use of the name Yahweh in the narratives of Genesis. The second is E, so called because of its use of Elohim prior to the specific revelation of the name Yahweh to Moses, recorded in Exod. 3:14-15. These two documents were combined, with the necessary harmonization, to form a single narrative, JE, by a redactor, R^{JE}. The third document in point of time is Deuteronomy, D, which is identical in whole or in part with the lawbook found in the temple in the reign of Josiah. The combination of JE with D to form JED was effected by a redactor, R^D, who in the process added a considerable amount of material to the older narratives. While his additions to the account of the patriarchal and Mosaic periods are severely limited in scope, and are for the most part of a theological character, those to the narrative of the Conquest are of such a nature as to alter radically the representations of JE. For this and other reasons it is probable that the Deuteronomic redaction was carried through by different hands, possibly at different times. The fourth document is P, so symbolized because of the great amount of priestly legislation it contains. It is postexilic in origin, and was conflated with JED by a redactor, R^P, to form JEDP. This, allowing for the insertion of some supplementary legislative material, an occasional narrative, and possibly for some minor Deuteronomic additions, was substantially the present Hexateuch.

The evidence upon which this hypothesis rests can be only briefly summarized here. Some of the textual phenomena which led to its formulation have already been indicated, but it is in Exod. 6:2-3 that the key to the composition of the Hexateuch is found. There it is stated that God had appeared to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as El Shaddai, but had not been known to them by his name Yahweh. Gen. 17:1 and 35:11, recording God's revelation of himself as El Shaddai to Abraham and Jacob respectively—the analogous revelation to Isaac is missing, presumably dropped in the process of conflating the documents because of redactional exigencies—obviously belong to the same source as Exod. 6:2-3; and those stories in Genesis in which the name Yahweh is known to the actors must come from another source.

Gen. 17:1; 35:11; and Exod. 6:2-3 thus provide a point of departure. Gen. 17:1, with which the rest of that chapter is continuous, states explicitly that Abraham was at the time ninety-nine years old. Now we have already seen how the recorded ages of the patriarchs give rise to serious chronological difficulties in the narrative of Genesis, a fact which suggests that the passages in which their ages are given come from another hand than the stories thus rendered incredible. This points to the conclusion that the age verses, and the material inseparable from them, are from the same source as Gen. 17.¹² This material is sufficiently extensive to make it possible to discern something of the style of its author, to note many of his characteristic expressions, and to detect certain of his preconceptions, theological and other. Working with these criteria we are able to isolate from Genesis a body of material informed by a peculiar theory of revelation. In this material it is ¹² Gen. 12:4b-5; 16:15-16; 23; 25:7-10, 17, 19-20, 26b; 26:34-35; 35:28-29; 37:2a; 41:46a; 47:7-11, 28; 49:29-32; 50:12-13, 22b; Exod. 7:7; etc.

⁹ Die geschichtlichen Bücher des Alten Testaments (Leipzig: T. O. Weigel, 1866).

¹⁰ In The Religion of Israel, tr. Alfred H. May (London: Williams & Norgate, 1874-75). The original, entitled Godsdienst van Israels, appeared in 1869-70.

¹¹ In a series of articles in Jahrbücher für deutsche Theologie, XXI and XXII (1876-77), published in book form as Die Composition des Hexateuchs (Berlin: G. Reimer, 1885).

not once recorded that the patriarchs offered sacrifice. In view of the frequent and indeed casual reference to the practice in other parts of the book (e.g., Gen. 12:7; 22:9; 26:25; 35:7, cited above), it is not likely that this silence is accidental. Its significance becomes apparent when it is found that the books of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers contain a mass of detailed regulations concerning the modes and dates of sacrifices (Exod. 29:38-42; Lev. 1:2-5:19; Num. 15:1-41; 29:1-39). These regulations are promulgated de novo; that is, the assumption underlying them is that hitherto the institution of sacrifice had been unknown. It may reasonably be inferred that they are related to the material in Genesis in which sacrifice is not mentioned. Again, the concern for the proper performance of the cult which finds expression in the regulations regarding sacrifice is also characteristic of the great mass of legislation in Exodus—except that in chs. 20-23 and 34—Leviticus and Numbers. Furthermore, this legislation is cast in the same pedantic style as the material dealing with sacrifice. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that it comes from the same source.

It is this material which constitutes the P document. A comparison of its laws with those found elsewhere in the Pentateuch leaves no room for doubt that they form the latest stratum of the legal material. The document is thus the latest of the four of which the Hexateuch is composed.

When the P material has been removed from Genesis, the presence of duplications and inconsistencies, and the alternating use of the Lord (Yahweh) and God (Elohim), in the narrative remaining indicate that it comes in the main from two different sources. Using the names employed in referring to or addressing the Deity as our criterion—though allowance must be made for occasional redactional alteration, e.g., in Gen. 40-50 (see the Exeg. thereon)—and correlating passages which reveal similarities of style and identity of interest in certain localities, we are able to reconstruct, with, of course, numerous lacunae, two narratives, the documents J and E. An examination of the non-P material in Exodus-Joshua reveals the fact that these documents are component parts of the Hexateuch—with which Judg. 1:1-2:5 really belongs—as a whole. The dependence of E upon J, noted below, indicates the priority of the latter.

The evidence for the literary independence of Deuteronomy, D, is of a character similar to that for the once separate existence of J, E, and P: (a) The style of the book has marked peculiarities which set it off both from the natural simplicity of J and E and from the formal phraseology of P; and (b) the religious tone of the D legislation stands in marked contrast to the simple cult requirements and matter-of-fact secular enactments of the JE codes (Exod. 20:23-23:19; 34:10-27) on the one hand, and to the advanced ceremonialism of P on the other.

The peculiar style and the religious ideas which characterize D are found also in certain passages in the other books of the Hexateuch. These passages are not only unnecessary to the continuity of the reconstructed source documents, but frequently inject an element of inconsistency into their context. They are accordingly assumed to have come from the hand of a redactor, or redactors, belonging to the same circle as the authors of Deuteronomy—RD.

That D is later than JE—the narrative built up by R^{JE} through a conflation of the two documents, J and E—is indicated by the fact that the historical recapitulation in the opening chapters of Deuteronomy is dependent upon JE. Furthermore, D incorporates and frequently expands much of the legislative material now forming part of JE.

The priority of D to P is indicated not only by the fact that the laws of the latter are in many cases a development of those of the former, but especially by a comparison of their respective theories as to the priesthood. In D, Levite and priest are practically synonymous terms, and all priests are of equal rank. In P, the Levites are not priests, but ministers of subordinate rank; and at the head of the priesthood stands the high priest, unknown to D. Any suggestion that D is a simplification of P is contradicted by the known fact that the hierarchical system of P remained in force until the destruction of the temple in A.D. 70.

VI. The Structure of the Documents

The Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis has commanded the assent of the great majority¹³ of Old Testament critics for more than sixty years, and has served as the point of departure for investigation of the internal structure of the several sources. This investigation, indeed, began as soon as the hypothesis had been formulated. Wellhausen¹⁴ himself pointed out that the account of the rise of nomadism, of the discovery of music, and of the beginning of metalworking in Gen. 4:16-24, derived from the J document, was an account of the origin of certain skills which the author implies had continued in unbroken existence until his own day. This little narrative was accordingly irreconcilable with the story of the Flood (Gen. 6:5-9:19), one strand of which was also derived from J.

¹³ For the theories held by the dissenting minority see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 44-46; also Robert H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (New York: Harper & Bros., 1941), pp. 140-41.

¹⁴ In Die Composition des Hexateuchs mentioned above.

THE GROWTH OF THE HEXATEUCH

This is but one of the numerous internal inconsistencies which Wellhausen observed, not only in J but also in E and P. They were evidence that the original documents had, each of them, undergone elaboration before being combined into a single narrative. These successive strata of material Wellhausen represented by the symbols J¹, J², E¹, E², P¹, etc. He was, however, careful to insist upon the provisional character of his conclusions, and left most points of detail to be determined by future investigation.

Wellhausen was followed by Karl Budde,¹⁵ who argued that the J narrative in Gen. 1-11 was composed of two originally independent documents which had been woven together by a redactor. Kuenen¹⁶ likewise recognized divergent accounts of the earliest generations of men in the J material in these chapters, though he was inclined to dissent from Budde's theory of two originally independent documents. He was of the opinion that the inconsistencies, not only in these chapters but in the rest of the J document, were due to the systematic elaboration of one basic narrative. The E material in the Hexateuch, he maintained, had been similarly elaborated—a theory which was further developed by Otto Procksch¹⁷ some years later.

In the quarter of a century following the appearance of Kuenen's treatise on the Hexateuch the study of the separate documents did little more than confirm the fact to which Wellhausen had called attention—that before they had been combined into a single narrative the original documents had in each case been expanded by the introduction of secondary material. The historical circumstances which had given rise to these revisions, the purpose for which they had been undertaken, and the nature of the process by which they had been carried through remained, however, undetermined. A growing disagreement inevitably resulted, not only as to the extent of the supplementary material and, in some cases, as to its affinity, but also as regards the primary form of the documents themselves, the outlines of which, particularly of J and E, became less and less distinct.

Indeed, Hermann Gunkel, in his great and ¹⁵ Die biblische Urgeschichte (Giessen: J. Ricker, 1883).

¹⁶ An Historico-critical Inquiry into the Origin and Composition of the Hexateuch, tr. P. H. Wicksteed (London: Macmillan & Co., 1886).

¹⁷ Das nordhebräische Sagenbuch: die Elohimquelle (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1906).

epoch-making commentary on Genesis,¹⁸ explicitly maintained that it was impossible to answer such questions in detail. Following Budde, he distinguished two independent strands in the J narrative of chs. 1-11; similarly, he found two independent strands in the J material dealing with the patriarchs, though he was unable to decide whether or not these were continuous with the strands in the earlier chapters. He was inclined to regard the question as of little importance, for his interest was in the individual units—myths, legends, poems, genealogical tables, and notices—of which the documents were composed. It was to these that he directed his attention.

Through his brilliant and penetrating analysis Gunkel achieved certain results of fundamental importance: (a) he established once and for all the diverse and independent origins of the literary units which make up the source documents of Genesis; (b) he demonstrated that their present form was in most cases the result of gradual growth and adaptation; (c) he revealed the frequently intricate process by which legends of non-Israelite provenance had become an integral part of the Israelite tradition; and (d) he made clear the fact that the tradition in its final form was complex in the extreme—the product of centuries of assimilation and development of material drawn from many sources.

A few years later Hugo Gressmann,¹⁹ applying Gunkel's techniques to the account of the Exodus and the events which followed, threw fresh light upon the narrative of the remaining books of the Pentateuch.

Nevertheless, the work of these two scholars was not pure gain, for in reviving (albeit in modified form) the fragment-hypothesis and the supplementation-hypothesis of the late eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries, they inevitably tended to overlook the fact that the growth and development of the national tradition had been conditioned by political events—such as, for example, the formation and extension of intertribal confederacies—and to underestimate, therefore, the extent to which the articulation of the tradition had been a process consciously and deliberately undertaken.²⁰

Now, it must be realized that if the J and E documents should turn out to be not carefully articulated historical narratives—however legendary much of their content may be—but merely collections of legends and other material, so loosely put together that it is frequently doubtful to which collection a certain legend may belong, there would be little reason to hope that they would be of much value as source material for reconstructing the history of Israel, or for tracing the course of their religious development. In such a case the study of the narrative of the Hexateuch—the study of the laws is another matter—would be not much more than an academic exercise; it certainly could contribute little to the business of living. And this was precisely what seemed to be emerging from the critical efforts of twenty-five years. Scholars had lost their way in a kind of literary morass, their work was in danger of degenerating into pure irrelevancy, and seemed to the ordinary man to have brought little more than intolerable confusion.

¹⁸ Genesis übersetzt und erklärt (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1901; "Göttinger Handkommentar zum Alten Testament").

¹⁹ Mose und seine Zeit (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1913).

²⁰ For instances of Gunkel's failure in this respect see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 46-47.

It was in explicit revolt against this confusion that Rudolf Smend in 1912 published his work on the Hexateuch.²¹ In this he advanced the theory that the narrative, apart from the Deuteronomistic material contained in it, was the result of the conflation not of three, but of four documents, J¹, J², E, and P. Of these, J¹ and J² had first been combined by a redactor, R^J, whose narrative was then fused with E by R^E. To this, R^D had later added Deuteronomy. Finally, R^P had combined R^D's work with P.

Working with this apparatus, Smend was able to assign practically all the material to one or other of his primary sources; secondary material, whether elaboration of one of the component narratives or redactional harmonization and linking, he reduced to a bare minimum.

Smend's methods and conclusions, with certain minor modifications, were accepted by Otto Eissfeldt in his analysis of the narrative of the Hexateuch²² which he published ten years later. To avoid, however, any suggestion that the second source, J², was merely an elaboration of the first, he substituted the symbols L and J for Smend's J¹ and J², L signifying lay source (Laienquelle). In employing this symbol he was able to call attention to the fact that it was the least theological of the narratives, and also to place it in sharp contrast to the final one of the series, the Priestly Code.

The analytical work of these two scholars was characterized by an extraordinary penetration. Nevertheless, the order which Smend brought out of the confusion was artificial in the extreme. The narratives as he reconstructed them suffered in places from an internal inconsistency, so marked as to be impossible.²³ At the same time they were so similar in the ground they covered that they could only have been written by men depending upon a common tradition, the content and scope of which remained fixed for some four centuries. And there is a further point to be noted. In Smend's analysis the authors of the four documents, J¹, J², E, and P (in Eissfeldt's terminology, L, J, E, P), had effected an almost identical articulation of their material, so that it was possible for a redactor to conflate the first two with practically no adaptation or connecting links, and then for a second redactor, with the same ease, to combine this narrative with the third. The question inevitably arises, "Why, if they were indeed so similar, were the pre-exilic narratives ever combined?"

These facts suggest that Smend, troubled by the literary confusion which confronted him, allowed himself to be swayed by his desire to find a solution to the problem of the Hexateuch along the neat and orderly lines of a document-hypothesis uncontaminated by the heresy of supplementation, and so failed to allow sufficiently for the presence of material which does not belong to any of the narratives in their original form. He took little account of the steady and dynamic expansion to which the tradition had been subjected, even after it had first been committed to writing. As a result he failed, as Gunkel had failed, to discern the extent to which this process reflected, and had been conditioned by, political and religious developments. His analysis was, in short, a purely literary performance.

VII. The Two Editions of the J Document

All this seems to suggest that, for a solution of the problem of the Hexateuch, full account must be taken of the political and religious developments which Gunkel and Smend too easily ignored. To this conclusion Wellhausen was again the first to point the way when, arguing from certain duplications in the narrative of the Exodus and from the general impression of the crucial importance of Kadesh which the narrative nevertheless conveyed even in its present form, he maintained that the tradition of Israel had originally known nothing of a journey to, or of the lawgiving at, Sinai, but had told of the people going directly to Kadesh from the Red Sea.²⁴

The phenomena to which Wellhausen called attention did not of themselves necessarily point to this conclusion. But Eduard Meyer,²⁵ taking up where Wellhausen had left off, delivered him

²¹ Die Erzählung des Hexateuch (Berlin: Georg Reimer, 1912).

²² Hexateuch-Synopsis (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1922).

²³ Instances are given in Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 47-48.

²⁴ Prolegomena to the History of Israel, tr. J. Sutherland Black and Allan Menzies (Edinburgh: A. & C. Black, 1885), pp. 342-43.

²⁵ Die Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme (Halle: Max Niemeyer, 1906), pp. 1-103.

from a possible charge of undue impressionism. He established the existence in the Hexateuch of a document, J¹, which told of the Israelites journeying directly to Kadesh from the Red Sea, and showed that this document had been elaborated by a later writer, J², who added the material telling of the journey of Israel to Sinai and of the lawgiving there.

Having established this point, Meyer proceeded to argue that the southern tribes had entered Palestine not from the east by crossing the Jordan, but from the south.²⁶ His argument was based not upon a reconstruction of an early narrative of the Conquest—which indeed he believed to be irrecoverable—but upon the geographical position of the tribes of Judah and Simeon, cut off as they were from the north until the rise of the monarchy; upon the political situation in the time of Saul and earlier; and upon the narrative reflecting a movement northward from Kadesh in Num. 21:1-3, and its variants in Num. 14:39-45 and Exod. 17:8-16.

In analyzing the narrative of the Conquest,²⁷ beginning with Num. 13 and ending with Judg. 2:5, one may isolate what is probably the earliest account of an invasion of Palestine from the south (as postulated by Meyer). This appears to belong to the same stratum of the J material as the Kadesh narrative of the Exodus. We thus have an account of the Exodus and the Conquest which embodies the tradition of the southern tribes only.

Just as the Kadesh narrative of the Exodus was elaborated by the addition of material telling of the Israelites going to Sinai following the deliverance at the Red Sea, so the account of an invasion of Palestine from the south has been enlarged by the addition of material telling of all the tribes proceeding from Kadesh to the land of Moab, of their miraculous crossing of the Jordan at Jericho, and of their conquest, under the leadership of Joshua, of the land occupied in historical times by Ephraim and Benjamin. Following this the narrative reverts to the earlier account—now preserved in Judg. 1—of the conquest of the south, though with the order of events changed to make it fit the new representation that it was a movement not northwards from Kadesh, but southwards from Joshua's (supposed) headquarters in the vicinity of Jericho.

This secondary conquest material seems to belong to the same stratum of J as does the Sinai material, that is, J². Since it is concerned with Benjamin and Ephraim, one may tentatively infer that the specific tradition upon which J² had drawn in his elaboration of the southern J¹ narrative was the tradition of those two tribes.

Further support for this inference is furnished by an analysis of Genesis which takes full account of the duplications and inconsistencies in the J material noted by Wellhausen, Budde, and Kuenen, for which Smend and Eissfeldt sought to account by postulating two originally independent documents, both characterized by expressions and modes of thought which earlier critics had noted as indications of J.

By this analysis a narrative is isolated which contains traditions most of which bear the marks of having been current either in the vicinity of Hebron, the capital of the southern tribes, or in the land east of the Jordan. Significantly, the author of this narrative nowhere reveals any firsthand knowledge of the traditions of the Joseph-Rachel tribes, Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin. It is thus a southern document, with certain east-Jordan affinities, and it appears to belong to the same stratum of the J tradition as the Exodus Kadesh narrative and the related account of the conquest of the south.

This J¹ material in Genesis has been subjected to the same kind of elaboration as the J¹ narrative of the Exodus and the Conquest. There has been added to it a great deal of material which reveals for the most part an interest in legends which are rooted in the north. This material is from the same stratum as that dealing with Sinai and the conquest of the north.

The conclusion demanded by the observation of these phenomena would seem to be that the inconsistencies and repetitions within the J material of the Hexateuch, to which Wellhausen first called attention in 1876, are due to the fact that the document is based on a very simple narrative, J¹, embodying the tradition of the southern tribes; and that this was later elaborated by another writer, J², who added to it the tradition of the Joseph tribes, reconciling the two traditions as best he could.

The "second edition" of the J document itself received some further additions, but this elaboration did not have the systematic character which marks the work of J². It was the completed J document—J² plus supplements—which was ultimately conflated with the E document to form the narrative JE.

This conclusion, it may be noted, is within the framework of the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis, and indeed is in substantial agreement with the suggestions advanced, however tentatively, by Wellhausen himself. It rejects the theory—also congruent with the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis—espoused in different forms by Budde, Smend, and others, that the J narrative is the product of an interweaving of two originally separate and independent documents.

²⁶ Ibid., pp. 72-77.

²⁷ Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, pp. 230-329.

Pfeiffer's variant to this latter theory should also be noted.²⁸ He feels that the non-P material in Gen. 1:1-11:9 is so unlike the J stories of the patriarchs that it cannot originate from the same hand. He therefore derives it, together with certain other stories in Genesis, such as chs. 14; 19; 34; and 38, from a document of Edomite origin which he designates S (=South or Seir), and which he believes to have been added to JEDP ca. 400 B.C. When, however, it is clearly recognized (see Exeg. of Genesis) that the non-Israelite traditions taken over by the Hebrew writers were of widely diverse origin, the difference in tone and character in the material generally attributed to J is sufficiently accounted for; and, at the same time, the difficulty inherent in Pfeiffer's theory—that at so late a date as 400, stories of non-Israelite origin, and of such dubious morality as those in Gen. 34 and 38, should have been intruded into the national tradition—is avoided.

VIII. The Purpose of J¹

An examination of the narrative in the books of Judges and Samuel reveals the same structural pattern as that which appears in the pre-exilic narrative of the Hexateuch—J¹ elaborated by J² and E. It is significant, however, that evidence for two strata of material in J comes to an end with II Sam. 8:15, that is, shortly after David had moved his capital from Hebron to Jerusalem.²⁹

It may reasonably be inferred that the J¹ document was written about this time, that is, about the year 1000. Furthermore, in view of the interest of J¹ in Hebron,³⁰ David's first capital, it seems not unlikely that one of the author's purposes in writing history was a desire to record the events which brought greatness to that city and its sanctuary—a greatness now threatened by David's move to Jerusalem. His secondary aim was to bring into an ordered relationship the various local legends current at various holy places in Palestine,³¹ and to unify them with the tradition which Israel had brought from the desert. He had then gone on to record the feats of certain heroes (judges), leading up to the rise of the monarchy and David's accession to the throne.

²⁸ Introduction to O.T., pp. 159-67.

²⁹ It seems probable that the story in II Sam. 21:1-11 belongs to the earlier stratum. It is obvious, however, that this story, which tells of an incident that must have occurred early in David's reign, has been moved from its original position in the narrative, for whatever reason.

³⁰ See Exeg. of Genesis; note also the J material in the story of the spies (Num. 13:17-33) and the sequel to this in Judg. 1:10-20.

³¹ See Intro. and Exeg. of Genesis.

Underlying his whole narrative is one consistent theme, that of the relation in which Israel stood to the Lord, the God of Sinai. Yahweh had in his call of Abraham chosen Israel to be his people; he had delivered them from the oppression of the Egyptians; he had reaffirmed his choice of them through Moses, revealing his essential righteousness and demanding justice in all the relationships of life; he had settled them in the good land of Palestine, and had protected them against their enemies; and now he had made them into a nation, giving them David as their king to execute "justice and righteousness unto all his people" (II Sam. 8:15 ASV). It was the relationship in which they stood to the Lord that gave significance to Israel—that and nothing else.

IX. The Purpose and Methods of J²

The J¹ document was written when the future seemed filled with hope. Some seventy-five years later, ca. 930, the political unity of north and south which David had achieved was shattered, the people whom the Lord had chosen and brought into a peculiar relationship with himself were organized into two kingdoms, and the spiritual unity of Israel was threatened.

It may reasonably be assumed that the J material following II Sam. 8:15 comes in the main from the hand of J². Its concluding section is the account of the disruption of the kingdom,³² which ends with the words, "So Israel rebelled against the house of David unto this day" (I Kings 12:19).

This suggests that the literary activity of J² was, to some extent at any rate, motivated by this event. Furthermore, the content of his narrative shows that he was also eager to preserve the spiritual unity of Israel. He saw that the real unity of the people inhered not in the state, but in the will of the Lord who had brought them into a unique relationship with himself.

This had indeed been the theme of the J¹ narrative, but something more than this was needed to meet the situation which the disruption of the kingdom had brought about. For the J¹ document embodied only the tradition of the southern tribes, and stressed the fact of God's activity in the history of Israel with reference only to events in which those tribes had been involved—the Exodus, the deliverance at the Red Sea, the ministry of Moses at Kadesh, and the conquest of the south. The northern tribes had had no part in these events.

³² Gustav Hölscher, "Das Buch der Könige, seine Quellen und seine Redaktion," EYXAPIΣTHPION, Studien zur Religion und Literatur des Alten und Neuen Testaments, ed. Hans Schmidt (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1923), I, 181-82.

THE GROWTH OF THE HEXATEUCH

They had entered Palestine by an independent movement³³ from the east across the Jordan, not from the south. Their knowledge of Moses and his work was limited to what they had learned from the southern tribes in Palestine, for their ancestors had not come under his influence. Consequently, Kadesh had no place in their complex of associations; Sinai was for them the center of the Lord's activity (cf. Judg. 5:5), and the Lord was to them still primarily the God of the storm, the God of war. Their awareness of him as the God of justice and righteousness was less insistent than was the awareness of the southern tribes to whose ancestors this truth had been revealed through Moses.

J² accordingly undertook the task of revising the J¹ narrative so that it would appeal more directly to the people of the north, and bring home to them the fact of the spiritual unity of the nation as a whole—a unity which inhered in the will of God.

J¹ had begun the process of uniting legends long current in Palestine to the desert tradition of Israel. J² continued this process. He first dealt with certain tales which had originated centuries earlier in Babylonia—the Marduk creation myth,³⁴ the saga of Eden, the garden of God, and the story of the Flood. These had found their way to Palestine, and had long since become a part of the cultural heritage into which the Joseph tribes had entered—though the fact that J¹ made no use of them would seem to indicate that they were unknown in the south. J² could not ignore them without endangering the strong tendency toward monotheism, which even at this time characterized Yahwism. He therefore took them over, and, with the necessary theological and moral adaptation,³⁵ incorporated them into the J¹ narrative, with which he was working.

He then proceeded to expand and elaborate J¹'s relatively simple narrative of the patriarchs. His additions were made for various reasons: (a) to explain the relationship in which Israel stood to neighboring peoples—for example, the notices which form the nucleus of the much-expanded genealogical tables in Gen. 10, and the stories now preserved, along with parallel material from other documents, in chs. 16; 24; and 27; (b) to account for the existence of certain northern tribes which had apparently been unknown to J¹—the J material in Gen. 30:1-24, and 35:16-20; (c) to bring out the fact—of which J¹ appears to have been ignorant—of the connection of Joseph with Shechem, and to witness to the power and prestige of the tribes claiming descent from him—the material from J²'s hand in Gen. 37-50. Other minor additions were designed, (d) to make more explicit the fact of the Lord's care for the patriarchs; (e) to mitigate the somewhat dubious behavior which had been attributed to them in some of the older stories—for example, Jacob's tricky outwitting of Laban (Gen. 30:31-31:35) and Judah's relations with Tamar (ch. 38); and (f) simply to improve the literary quality of the narrative.

³³ Cf. A. T. Olmstead, History of Palestine and Syria to the Macedonian Conquest (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1931), chs. xv and xvii.

³⁴ No trace of this is found in the extant J material in Genesis. There can be little doubt, however, that, as Karl Marti has argued (Das Buch Jesaja [Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1900], pp. 338-39), the J² narrative opened with a version of this myth, which was later dropped by R^p in favor of the revision of it made by P, now contained in Gen. 1:1-2:4a; see Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, p. 491.

³⁵ For the details of this adaptation see Exeg. of Gen. 1-3; 6:5-8:22. It may be noted that the inconsistency in J between the flood story and Gen. 4:19-22 is in this way accounted for.

This revision of the earlier account of the primeval world and of the patriarchs was a relatively simple matter, and involved little change in the order of events as they had been there set down. J²'s elaboration of the story of the oppression in Egypt, the birth and commissioning of Moses, and the events preceding the Exodus was limited for the most part to making more explicit its religious significance. When, however, he came to deal with the life of Israel in the desert and the Conquest, he was compelled to subject his predecessor's narrative to more drastic treatment.

As has already been noted, the tradition of the Joseph tribes knew nothing of Kadesh; for them Sinai was the only desert center of the Lord's activity. If the southern tradition of Moses as the great exponent of Yahwism was to find something more than formal acceptance among the northern tribes—if, that is, it was to become a real and essential part of their religion—it was necessary that Moses should be connected with Sinai. J² accordingly revised the J¹ narrative by representing the Israelites as proceeding from the Red Sea, not at once to Kadesh, but first to Sinai, where, through the mediation of Moses, the Lord entered into a covenant with them. There can be little doubt that, as Eduard Meyer³⁶ has argued, the covenant idea in Israel was at least partly derived from the cult of Baal-berith—the Lord of the Covenant—the tutelary deity of Shechem. Hence, J² not only transferred the scene of Moses' essential activity from Kadesh to Sinai to make it definitive for the northern tribes; he also stated it in terms which related it dynamically to their own experience.

³⁶ Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, pp. 542-61.

J² then told of the Israelites moving to Kadesh, thus reverting to the J¹ narrative which he followed, with some minor elaboration, up to the departure of the tribes from Kadesh for the conquest of Palestine. At this point, since he was making basic to his history a tradition familiar among the Joseph-tribes, of an entry into the land near Jericho, he was compelled to abandon the J¹ account of a movement northward from Kadesh. Instead, he told of the people proceeding to the east of the Jordan. There, after the king of Moab had tried in vain to persuade the seer Balaam to curse Israel—J² is here incorporating into the national tradition a legend, probably of pre-Israelite origin, which had been taken over by the east-Jordan tribes—Moses died and Joshua succeeded him. Under his leadership the Jordan was crossed and the country conquered.

In writing this account of the conquest J² made use of various local traditions which may well have been preserved, as Martin Noth⁸⁷ suggests, in the sanctuary at Gilgal. He then reverted once more to the J¹ narrative, and told of the conquest of the south, continuing with the account (considerably elaborated) of the judges, of the rise of the monarchy, of the Davidic kingdom and its disruption, ending his history with I Kings 12:19.

This is the narrative from which, with some minor additions, the J material in the Hexateuch is derived. Written for a definite purpose—to preserve the spiritual unity of Israel from the dangers which threatened it consequent upon the disruption of the kingdom—it resulted from and reflects the political events of the eleventh and tenth centuries. It may accordingly be dated⁸⁸ about the year 900, one hundred years later than the J¹ document upon which it is largely based.

X. The Tradition of the E Document

The E document begins with the story of Abraham. In the sequence of the events which it records through the patriarchal period, the Exodus, and the Conquest, it is much the same as J², a fact which indicates that it is in some way dependent upon that document. There are, however, certain significant differences of representation. (a) The name Yahweh (the Lord) does not occur in the stories of the patriarchs. Instead E uses Elohim (God). According to him the name Yahweh was unknown until it was revealed to Moses (Exod. 3:14-15). (b) Hebron is never mentioned and Abraham is represented as having his home in Beer-sheba. It may be noted that J² had connected Abraham with this place, though at the same time preserving in a modified form the J¹ tradition which had associated him exclusively with Hebron. (c) The scene of the covenant between the Lord and Israel is not Mount Sinai, which is never mentioned, but Mount Horeb. Nor is it possible to hold that Horeb is merely another name for Sinai, for the implication of the E narrative is that it was situated much nearer to Egypt.⁸⁹ (d) Kadesh is never mentioned, and the work of Moses is associated exclusively with Horeb. (e) The crossing of the Jordan was made not at Jericho, as J² had represented, but at Adamah,⁴⁰ at the junction of the Jabbok and the Jordan. (f) Following the crossing of the Jordan the Israelites went straight to Shechem, where, in accordance with a command given by Moses before his death (Deut. 11:29-30; 27:2-8; note "on the day when ye shall pass over the Jordan," in 27:2), the covenant with the Lord was renewed (Josh. 8:30-35). It should be noted that neither of the passages here cited is in its original form.⁴¹ Both were tampered with because the Samaritans were appealing to them in support of their claim that Shechem, not Jerusalem, was the central sanctuary referred to in the Deuteronomic Code (e.g., Deut. 12:5). (g) The conquest of Palestine thus began not at Jericho, but at Shechem—though E says nothing of any fighting at Shechem—and so was a movement from north to south. (h) There are even greater differences in the material now preserved in Judges, and especially in Samuel, particularly in the account of the rise of the monarchy. The document seems to continue through the books of Kings.⁴² If, however, it first appeared about 700, as is suggested below, the material following II Kings 17 must be from a second hand.

⁸⁷ Das Buch Josua (Tubingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1938; "Handbuch zum Alten Testament"), p. xi.

⁸⁸ The date usually assigned is 850 B.C. See, however, W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2nd ed.; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1946), p. 190.

There can be little doubt that the group whose tradition forms the basis of the E document was of another origin than the group upon whose tradition J² had drawn in his elaboration of J¹. For the one, the holy mount was Horeb, for the other, Sinai. Up to a point, therefore, their history had been different. But in Palestine the Horeb group had come to know the southern tradition of the patriarchs, of Moses, and of the Exodus. This they had gradu-

⁸⁹ August von Gall, Altisraelitische Kultstätten (Gießen: J. Ricker, 1898), pp. 1-22. See also Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, p. 613.

⁴⁰ See Adam C. Welch, Deuteronomy, the Framework to the Code (London: Oxford University Press, 1932), pp. 175-82. Also Simpson, op. cit., pp. 285, 293, 316, 644.

⁴¹ See Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, p. 546; cf. Smend, Die Erzählung des Hexateuch, pp. 264-67.

⁴² See Hölzcher, "Das Buch der Könige."

ally made their own as they had come to have their part in the peculiar relationship with the Lord into which Israel had been taken. The result of this fusion of the southern tradition with their own remembered history would be a tradition, preserved at some point in the north—probably Shechem, in view of the unique position accorded to that sanctuary in E—which differed markedly both in form and content from the tradition created by J², and which, it may be assumed, had become (so to speak) the official history of Judah, Benjamin, and Ephraim.

XI. The Purpose of E

It seems unlikely that this new and composite tradition would, before it was committed to writing, have followed the J² order of events as closely as the E document does. That document would thus seem to have been written by one who had only recently come into contact with the earlier narrative, and had believed it to be inaccurate. Certainly it did not present the national tradition as he was familiar with it. He therefore undertook the task of recasting it to bring it into closer agreement with the tradition of Shechem. At the same time, he utilized the opportunity thus offered to soften some of the anthropomorphisms of J, and to remove certain tales which the conscience of the people, as it had developed over a period of some two centuries, now found to be morally objectionable (cf. J²'s treatment of J¹ in this respect).

It can scarcely be supposed that the author was motivated purely by an abstract concern for historical accuracy. Such an interest would have been impossible in his age and environment. He was, rather, dealing with a crisis in the life of the nation, and it seems probable that this was the fall of the northern kingdom.

The fact is sometimes overlooked that the destruction of the state, disastrous as it was, released the religious leaders of the north from certain responsibilities which had been growing more and more intolerable, and left them free to reconstitute the community on a religious basis—free to begin the transformation of North Israel into a church. Conscious of their common heritage, they will have at least attempted a rapprochement with the leaders in the south. How far they succeeded must remain doubtful. The priesthood of Jerusalem—the officials of an “established church”—may not, at the moment, have been particularly interested. It may indeed have been their intransigent refusal to meet the northerners halfway that led to the writing of the E document with its disregard of Kadesh and Hebron, and its attribution to Jacob of an importance, both political and religious,⁴³ equal to that of Abraham.

The E document thus appears to have been written about the year 700,⁴⁴ and to be the result of, and to reflect, the political events of the eighth century.

XII. The Conflation of J and E

When Jerusalem fell in 586, the religious leaders of the south found themselves in much the same position, and were confronted with much the same problems, as the northerners had been in 722. Once more a rapprochement was attempted; this time, it would seem, with greater success. The existence of two mutually contradictory histories of the nation was an obstacle to the desired unity between the north and the south, so the two documents, J and E, were conflated in such a way as to preserve the salient features of each. On the whole, however, the point of view of J predominated. This new document, JE, became the “official” history of Israel.

XIII. The Origin and Purpose of Deuteronomy

The opinion that Deuteronomy in whole or in part is identical with the Book of the Law found in the temple in the reign of Josiah (II Kings 22:8) was first advanced by Jerome, and again by Thomas Hobbes in the Leviathan some twelve hundred years later.⁴⁵ In the course of the nineteenth century, however, this identification became almost an axiom of Hexateuchal criticism. It has, nevertheless, been called into question in the past twenty-five years by Adam C. Welch,⁴⁶ Theodor Oestreicher,⁴⁷ Gustav Hölscher,⁴⁸ and others.

There can be no doubt that the redactor who put the account of Josiah's reformation (II Kings 22:3–23:25) into its final form intended to, and did, convey the impression that it was a carrying out of the provisions of Deuteronomy. Hölscher⁴⁹ has shown, however, that this account is not a unity, but is an elaboration of a ⁴³ See Exeg. of Gen. 48:22.

⁴⁴ The date usually assigned to E is 750. But the historical situation at that time seems to have held nothing which would account for the writing of a document departing so markedly and deliberately from the J tradition. Hölscher (“Das Buch der Könige,” pp. 205-6), it may be noted, believes that it was written during the Exile.

⁴⁵ See J. Estlin Carpenter and George Harford, The Composition of the Hexateuch (London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1902), pp. 35, 38.

⁴⁶ The Code of Deuteronomy (London: James Clarke & Co., 1924).

⁴⁷ Das deuteronomische Grundgesetz (Gütersloh: C. Bertelsmann, 1923).

⁴⁸ “Komposition und Ursprung des Deuteronomiums,” Zeitschrift für die alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, XL (1922), 161-255.

⁴⁹ “Das Buch der Könige,” pp. 206-13.

more simple narrative telling of Josiah's purging of the temple of the symbols of Assyrian influence which had been introduced by Manasseh (II Kings 21:4-5). In 621 the Assyrian Empire was breaking up, and Josiah recognized that the opportunity had come for a reaffirmation of the nation's ancient faith in the Lord, and acted accordingly.⁵⁰

If this is a valid reconstruction of the event, then Josiah's reform was not the implementation of the provisions of the Deuteronomistic Code, and the code itself must have had another origin than that usually assigned to it. Some light is thrown on this question by Welch, who both argues for the northern provenance of the code,⁵¹ and maintains that many of its provisions come from an earlier period than the time of Josiah.⁵²

A likely occasion for its compilation would seem to be the fall of Samaria in 722, and, like E, it may well have been a product of the movement for the reconstruction of the northern community already referred to. If this is the case, then it is reasonable to assume that the code was the fundamental law of the north at the time of the fall of Judah.

The extent to which this movement, with its insistence that the Lord was the only God for Israel (cf. Deut. 13; 17:2-7), had affected the south prior to 586 cannot be determined. But the present form of the account of Josiah's reformation, linking it as it does with Deuteronomy, may well echo a historical fact—that Josiah had been influenced by what the Deuteronomists had achieved in purifying the religious life of the north.

It has already been suggested that, following the fall of the state, the religious leaders of the south effected a rapprochement with the north. This involved ultimately their acceptance of the code of Deuteronomy, which was incorporated into the JE narrative, possibly displacing the code known as the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 20:22-23:19). This code, a compilation of enactments of diverse origin, seems to have been first incorporated into the national history just before the account of Moses' death; and later to have been moved to its present position to make room for the code of Deuteronomy. However that may be, the fact that the latter code was eventually integrated with the JE narrative is evidenced by the presence of E material in Deut. 11:29-30—adapted to make it part of the introduction to the code—and in Deut. 27:2, 5-8; of J material in Deut. 31:14-15, 23; and of both J and E in Deut. 34.

⁵⁰ See Oestreicher, Das deuteronomische Grundgesetz, pp. 9, 33, 37, 39-43.

⁵¹ The Code of Deuteronomy, pp. 185, 190-92.

⁵² Ibid., pp. 45, 51, 99, 113, 130-31.

This new document, JED, was then elaborated by a succession of editors, who added such parts of Deut. 1:1-11:25; 27:11-31:13; 31:24-32:47; 33, as had not already found a place in D prior to its conflation with JE. They may in this process of elaboration have dropped some earlier material. They also made other additions and changes of varying degrees of importance, both in the narrative and in the code.

JED is thus the product of the Exile, and became the official history, so to speak, of the Palestinian-Jewish community. In its final form—and perhaps considerably earlier—it contained the law of the central sanctuary. It may well be, in view of the implications of Deut. 11:26-31; 27:2-8; Josh. 8:30-35; 24:1-27,⁵³ that this originally referred not to Jerusalem but to Shechem. That is, during the Exile, following the integration of the north and south, Jerusalem fell into the background, and men looked to Shechem for leadership. For it was the priests and prophets of Shechem who had responded selflessly to the situation resulting from the fall of the state in 722, and, thus responding, had been able by the grace of God to rebuild a broken community. It was the priests and prophets of Shechem who played the role of the good Samaritan, and brought help and healing to the bewildered people of the south a century and a quarter later. Jerusalem had fallen despite its supposed inviolability, and its priesthood had been carried into exile. It is little wonder that the prestige of Jerusalem passed to the north—at least for a time.

XIV. The Origin and Purpose of P

In Babylonia the priests of Jerusalem were not idle. They assumed the leadership of the exiled Jews, and giving a new significance to certain ancient institutions—the observance of the sabbath, the practice of abstaining from certain foods, and the custom of circumcision—welded their community into a self-conscious unity. At the same time they brought together into a new code a number of pre-exilic laws, giving it a hortatory tone throughout, and insisting that "holiness" was the dominant element in the relationship between the Lord and his people. Holiness was demanded from Israel by the holiness of the God who had chosen them. Hence, this code, preserved with some secondary material in Lev. 17-26, has been called the Holiness Code.

The interest of this group was naturally focused upon Jerusalem, and it was due to their influence that, in the favorable circumstances which followed the rise of the Persian Empire, the temple in Jerusalem was rebuilt in 516, and the ancient cult restored.

⁵³ See Simpson, Early Traditions of Israel, ad loc.

THE GROWTH OF THE HEXATEUCH

It is difficult to recover the actual course of events during the next seventy-five years, so completely has the Chronicler confused the record now contained in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah. Nevertheless, a critical examination of the memoirs of Nehemiah⁵⁴ leaves one with the inescapable impression that when Nehemiah arrived in Jerusalem he found the city in a sorry state, divided in its leadership, largely controlled by a priesthood which was content to keep the temple going, but had lost its vision of the city as the dynamic center of a religion of world-wide significance.

Nehemiah's appointment as governor of Judah by the Persian king meant that Judah was made politically independent of Samaria. The governor of that province opposed Nehemiah's efforts to restore Jerusalem's self-respect. Nevertheless, the walls were rebuilt and measures taken for the security of the city (Neh. 2:17-6:15).

We have no way of knowing whether the political opposition to Nehemiah and his policy on the part of the governor of Samaria was reinforced by ecclesiastical opposition from the religious community finding its center in Shechem—the Deuteronomist community. This may have been the case. On the other hand, the hostility may have begun with the Jerusalemites, who saw in the continued prestige of Shechem a threat to their aim of making Jerusalem the center of the religion of Israel. However that may be, such hostility did eventually develop. The Priestly Code in its original form⁵⁵ was adopted as the manifesto of the Jerusalem group, backed by the influence of the Babylonian Diaspora. It contained the P narrative of Genesis, the account of the oppression in Egypt, the call of Moses, the plagues, the Passover and the Exodus, the passage through the Red Sea, the arrival at Sinai, the making of the tabernacle, the setting apart of the priesthood, the numbering of the people, the departure from Sinai, the sending of the manna and the quails, and the P narrative from Num. 13 through the account of the division of the land in Joshua. It thus provided divine sanction for the sabbath, the prohibition of eating blood, and circumcision. In its description of the tabernacle it is dependent upon the plan of the Jerusalem temple for the uniqueness of which it thus by implication claims divine authority. And it makes a similar claim for its priesthood.

⁵⁴ See Gustav Hölscher, "Die Bücher Esra und Nehemia," Die Heilige Schrift des Alten Testaments, ed. E. Kautzsch and A. Bertholet (4th ed.; Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1923), II, 491-562.

⁵⁵ See Gustav Hölscher, Geschichte der israelitischen und jüdischen Religion (Giessen: Alfred Töpelmann, 1922), pp. 141-43.

The adoption of the Priestly Code made clear and definite the points at issue between the south and the north. There can be no doubt that many were persuaded to transfer their allegiance from Shechem to Jerusalem. Evidence for this is provided not only by the general Deuteronomist editing of the history of the monarchy (cf. I Kings 15:14; 22:43; II Kings 15:35; etc.), which assumes that Jerusalem, not Shechem, was the place the Lord had chosen "to cause his name to dwell there" (Deut. 12:11), but particularly by the implied claim of the account of Josiah's reformation, in its final form, that Deuteronomy was a southern document, and that it was implemented by the suppression of all sanctuaries outside of Jerusalem (II Kings 23:8).

Nevertheless, this acceptance by the Deuteronomists (or a group of them) of the claims of the Jerusalem priesthood was by no means a simple act of submission. The Jerusalemites on their part seemed to have been forced to make a considerable concession when they accepted as authentic the sacred document of the north, JED. This was eventually conflated with the P Code, and the structural form of the present Pentateuch at last emerged. To this new document other laws, including the Holiness Code, were added from time to time as circumstances demanded. Indeed, it seems likely that additions had already been made to P in the interval between its promulgation and its fusion with JED. Other narratives were also inserted here and there, for instance, the story in Gen. 14.

The agreement between the north and the south which produced the Pentateuch did not, however, settle finally the fundamental point at issue. Shechem's claim to be the one legitimate sanctuary of the God of Israel continued to be voiced. Whether or not it issued in action—the offering of sacrifice at Shechem—formal schism was avoided for some time. But eventually the break occurred. In the reign of Darius III (338-32)⁵⁶ a temple was erected on Mount Gerizim at Shechem, where—according to E—Israel, as commanded by Moses (Deut. 11:29-30; 27:2-7), had offered the first sacrifice following their entry into Palestine (Josh. 24:1-25; 8:30-35; see above), and the tie with Jerusalem was broken.

Nevertheless, the Samaritans retained the Pentateuch as their scriptures. Joshua, however, was not accepted, perhaps because of the redactional transposition of Josh. 8:30-35. This passage in its present form substitutes Ebal for Gerizim as the place of sacrifice (vs. 30); and ⁵⁶ Josephus (Antiquities XI. 8. 2) ascribes the erection of the temple to Sanballat, Nehemiah's contemporary, who lived a century earlier. It seems likely that his error lies here, not in his placing of the event in the reign of Darius III.

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

in its present position places both mountains near Gilgal. It thus carries further the polemic against Shechem, begun by some Jerusalemite redactor who added to the command of Moses in Deut. 11:30 the words "in the land of the Canaanites that dwell in the Arabah, over against Gilgal" (ASV).

XV. Summary

The conclusions advanced in this article stand within the framework of the Graf-Wellhausen hypothesis. This as it was first formulated was primarily a literary analysis, but Wellhausen himself initiated the investigation which was to show how the documents, both in their origin and in their development, were related to the history of Israel as it is known to us. The results of this investigation may be summarized as follows:

(a) The primary material in the Hexateuch is the narrative of J¹, embodying the tradition of the southern tribes, and written about the year 1000 when the prestige of Hebron, their center, was fading before Jerusalem.

(b) About a century later this material was expanded and elaborated by J², who added to it certain traditions of the north. His purpose was to preserve the spiritual unity of Israel which had been endangered by the disruption of the kingdom.

(c) Around the year 700, following the fall of Samaria, this J² tradition was recast by E to bring it into closer agreement with the originally independent tradition of a group centering at Shechem.

(d) The rapprochement between the north and the south following the fall of Jerusalem made it desirable that these two forms of the national tradition should be unified. To this end the two documents J and E were conflated into JE sometime in the course of the sixth century, or perhaps early in the fifth.

(e) The code of Deuteronomy was the creation of the same movement as that which produced the E document. It was designed to provide authoritative guidance for the people of the north, left bewildered and broken by the catastrophe of 722. It was accepted by the south after 586, and was later combined with JE. This new document, JED, embodying the national historical and legal tradition, and centering upon Shechem, was eventually accepted as authoritative by the Palestinian community of Israel.

(f) The Priestly Code was the manifesto of those who, influenced by the ideas of the Babylonian Diaspora, were concerned to make Jerusalem the religious center of Israel. It was officially adopted in Jerusalem about the beginning of the fourth century, and was thus a part of the program developed to continue the work that Nehemiah had begun.

(g) To secure its acceptance by the group which looked to Shechem, P was eventually conflated with JED, and, allowing for certain relatively minor additions, the present Hexateuch, JEDP, was completed.

XVI. Selected Bibliography

- CARPENTER, J. ESTLIN, and HARFORD, GEORGE, eds. The Composition of the Hexateuch. London: Longmans, Green & Co., 1902.
- CHAPMAN, ARTHUR THOMAS. An Introduction to the Pentateuch ("The Cambridge Bible"). Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1911.
- GALLING, KURT. Die Erwählungstraditionen Israels. Giessen: Alfred Töpelmann, 1928.
- HARFORD, JOHN BATTERSBY. Since Wellhausen. Privately published, 1926. Reprint of articles appearing in The Expositor, Ser. 9, Vol. IV (1925).
- NOTH, MARTIN. Überlieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch. Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1948.
- PFEIFFER, R. H. Introduction to the Old Testament. New York: Harper & Bros., 1941. "The Pentateuch," pp. 129-289.
- RAD, GERHARD VON. Das formgeschichtliche Problem des Hexateuchs. Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1938.
- SIMPSON, CUTHBERT A. The Early Traditions of Israel. Oxford: Blackwell, 1948.
- SIMPSON, DAVID CAPELL. Pentateuchal Criticism. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1944.
- WELLHAUSEN, JULIUS. Die Composition des Hexateuchs und der historischen Bücher des Alten Testaments. 2nd. ed. Berlin: G. Reimer, 1889.

THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE

by HUGHELL E. W. FOSBROKE

- I. The Ministry of the Spoken Word
- II. The Beginnings of Prophecy
- III. Ecstatic Prophetism in Extrabiblical Sources
- IV. The Transformation of Ecstatic Prophetism
- V. The Note of Ecstasy in the Ministry of the Prophets
- VI. The Form of Prophetic Utterance
- VII. The Spoken Word Committed to Writing
- VIII. The Development of the Implications of Prophetic Prediction
- IX. Prophecies of the New Order
- X. In Many and Various Ways
- XI. Selected Bibliography

In the tradition of Judaism the Hebrew scriptures consist of three parts: Law, Prophets, and Writings. The second part is subdivided into Former Prophets, four books which in the English Bible appear as Joshua, Judges, I and II Samuel, and I and II Kings; and Latter Prophets, also four books, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and The Twelve (The Minor Prophets constituting a single volume). It is of this subdivision, Latter Prophets, that the term "prophetic literature" is used, a subdivision to which there corresponds in the English Bible the sequence of books from Isaiah to Malachi (except for Lamentations and Daniel, which Hebrew tradition places among the Writings).

I. The Ministry of the Spoken Word

It should be noted first of all that the very use of the words "literature" or "book" in this connection may easily give rise to a serious misunderstanding, for these terms would seem to suggest that the prophets were in the first instance literary figures. So, too, the phrase "writing prophets," which is widely current, lends color to the idea that a prophet's chief activity was the composition of a book. True enough, an Isaiah could and did commit to writing his memoirs of the two great crises of his ministry (Isa. 6-8; 28-31), but this he did evidently as an afterthought in the face of apparent failure. Jeremiah dictated his poems to Baruch (Jer. 36), but this only after some years of his ministry had elapsed. Even the shepherd Amos himself may have written down or dictated to another the visions now recorded in chs. 7-8 of the book that bears his name. But in all these cases writing is a secondary activity. The ministry of the prophets was in the first instance a ministry of the spoken word.

The phrase "spoken word" points, then, to what is of primary importance in any consideration of the work of the prophets. There is a vast difference between the language of sound and the language of sight. Writing is comparatively modern—its history hardly more than five or six thousand years—while speech is as old as human nature. The whole man expresses himself in speech as he cannot do in the written word. Over and above the meaning of what a man says there is conveyed by the voice a sense of the vague intimacies of existence, something of the very self. Again, the spoken word embodies, as the written word cannot, a "dominating reference to an immediate situation";¹ it is contemporary with the particular situation or experience of which it speaks. There is, for example, a tremendous difference in the effect of the phrase "a warm day" as it falls from the lips of a damp and drooping human being and as it appears in the impersonal abstraction of the weather report.

Now it is this spoken word that biblical scholarship seeks first of all to recover as it sets about tracing the growth and development of the prophetic literature. In this it is concerned with much more than any merely literary distinctions. It endeavors to enter into the specific immediacy of the situation in which the words were uttered, and to catch the overtones of feeling in which the something more than the surface meaning of the words declared itself.

II. The Beginnings of Prophecy

This effort to recapture the accents of the living voice of the prophet would be an almost impossible task if it were not for our knowledge of the beginnings of prophecy and the way in which these beginnings have given characteristic form to prophetic utterance. It is in the account of Samuel's choice of Saul to be king over Israel that the prophets as a group make their earliest appearance in the Old Testament. They are there pictured as a company of men coming down from a sanctuary to the accompaniment of lute, timbrel, flute, and harp, and responding to this abundant musical stimulus with ecstatic cries (I Sam. 10:5-6). The ecstasy of these prophets had so contagious an effect that Saul was caught by it and associated himself with them in their prophesying (I Sam. 10:10).

¹ A. N. Whitehead, Modes of Thought (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1938), p. 53.

That the word "prophecy" in this connection denotes the behavior of those who were beside themselves is clearly shown in the description of Saul's conduct later on. "The evil spirit from God came upon Saul, and he prophesied in the midst of the house"; and then, as the story unfolds, the king proceeded to cast his spear at David in an effort to pin the young musician to the wall (I Sam. 18:10-11). Again, a late legend describes a striking effect of contact with the prophets. Saul "stripped off his clothes also, and prophesied before Samuel in like manner, and lay down naked all that day and all that night" (I Sam. 19:24).

III. Ecstatic Prophetism in Extrabiblical Sources

The orgiastic character of early prophetism has of course long been recognized, though even now some scholars would minimize its significance. In modern times, however, the affinity of ecstatic prophetism with similar phenomena in other religions has been more closely studied. An Egyptian papyrus of the eleventh century B.C. speaks of the existence of such prophetism at Byblos, a Phoenician city on the coast of Canaan, an interesting fact in view of the appearance of the prophets of the Phoenician Baal in the Elijah stories. These "leaped upon the altar" and "cut themselves after their manner with knives and lancets, till the blood gushed out upon them" (I Kings 18:25-29).

There are references to the same phenomenon in classical and postclassical literature, e.g., Herodotus History II. 61, Lucian Asinus 37, Apuleius Metamorphoses VIII. 24-29. Significantly enough, these point to Syria and Asia Minor as the peculiar habitat of this form of religious frenzy. On the other hand, it has become increasingly clear that ecstatic prophetism did not originate in the ancient Semitic world. No traces of it are found among the pre-Mohammedan Arabs. Greek writers, so quick to observe the bizarre customs of barbarians, do not appear to have found it in Babylonia. Herodotus speaks of its occurrence in Egypt; he insists, however, that it is associated not with native Egyptians but with the Carians from Asia Minor. Islam adopted this strange form of mystic rapture only after Mohammedanism had made itself at home in the regions to the north and east of Arabia. All the evidence of geographical distribution therefore suggests that ecstatic prophetism was no part of Israel's desert life, but had established itself in Canaan before Israel's entrance into the land and was part of the heritage, religious and cultural, which the nomad tribes appropriated.

IV. The Transformation of Ecstatic Prophetism

In the biblical narratives, to be sure, ecstatic prophetism is pictured only as it is in process of being transformed by the spirit of Israel's religion. To feel the full force of the contrast between this spirit and the genius of the group ecstasy of which it made use, it is necessary to turn to descriptions of this phenomenon that are found in extrabiblical sources.

In the second-century romance popularly known as The Golden Ass, Apuleius gives an account of a strange group of men in attendance upon a Syrian goddess. He speaks of them as "shouting and dancing like mad persons to the sound of the pipe," as spinning "round so that their hair flew out in a circle," as biting their own flesh and wounding themselves while "one more mad than the rest . . . feigned a swoon and frenzy."² The writer is a satirist and he rightly insists on the exhibitionist and mercenary character of the performance, but perhaps makes too much of the note of pretense. In such matters the line between the simulated and the genuine cannot be sharply drawn even by the participants themselves, as Browning has clearly shown in "Mr. Sludge, 'The Medium.'" Characteristic, at any rate, of the group ecstasy are the frantic dancing to the sound of the pipe, the howling, the shouting, and the self-wounding; and especially significant is the conduct of the man who "feigned a swoon," not only because of the parallel with Saul lying naked all that day and all that night, but because the swooning was evidently one of the ways in which the mystic rapture could find its complete fulfillment.

Still further knowledge of this strange phenomenon of group ecstasy is gained by consideration of the worship of Dionysus, the god of vegetation and of the vine in particular. Belief in this deity came to Greece from Phrygia by way of Thrace, and the connection with Asia Minor may suggest that this region was the original home of ecstatic prophecy. In The Bacchae, Euripides gives the most vivid portrayal of the behavior of the Dionysus worshippers, and there are also references to their wild revels in other classical writings. Edwin Rohde's penetrating analysis of the mood of these devotees is especially illuminating:

² VIII. 27.

THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE

The worshippers, too, in furious exaltation and divine inspiration, strive after the god; they seek communion with him. They burst the physical barriers of their soul. A magic power takes hold of them; they feel themselves raised high above the level of their everyday existence; they seem to become those spiritual beings who wildly dance in the train of the god. Nay, more, they have a share in the life of the god himself; nothing less can be the meaning of the fact that the enraptured servants of the god call themselves by the name of the god.³

Now, it is true that in its desert days Israel had had its own experience of possession. The wild exultation of the battle frenzy speaks clearly through such a poem as the Song of Deborah. The power of the dread storm-god seized upon the warriors, lifted them to new levels of achievement as, careless of what might befall them, they hurled themselves upon the foe. A passage in the book of Amos puts in significant parallelism the prophets and the Nazirites, who were perhaps originally dedicated long-haired warriors (Amos 2:11).

But this fighting rapture differed from ecstatic prophetism in three important respects.

In the first place there was always about the coming in power of Yahweh, the God of Israel, an element of the incalculable. It was as unpredictable as the advent of storm or earthquake. But ecstatic prophetism could be induced by a definite technique of music, dance, and other forms of rhythmic movement. The presence of deity could be compelled from the human side, whereas in Yahwism the initiative lay with God and not with man. The spirit of Yahweh leaped suddenly and unexpectedly upon Samson and he rent the lion as he would have rent a kid (Judg. 14:6).

In the second place, in Yahwism the energy that seized upon men used them for ends beyond themselves. They became the instruments of the power that laid hold of them. Their activity was directed outward and issued in such definitely practical achievement as that represented by fighting in battle. Nor was fighting the only outlet for the heightened sense of power. Late, but thoroughly in keeping with the genius of primitive Yahwism, is the account of Bezaleel, one of the artificers of the tabernacle, "See, the LORD hath called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah; and he hath filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship" (Exod. 35:30-31). In the non-Israelite ecstasy, however, the energy was directed inward. The recipients became, as it were, the containers rather than the instruments of the divine energy. The enlargement and extension of one's own being was an end in itself. The experience of possession by deity was sought for its own sake. Psychologically, as well as in other respects, there is a world of difference between activity which issues in the rending of a lion and that which finds an outlet in wounding one's self. It is not fanciful to see in the prostrate swooning figure of a man sunk in cataleptic trance, or in the howling dervish achieving complete revolution round his own axis, fitting symbols of the way in which religious introversion can reach its climax.

Sometimes, to be sure, the abnormal visionary or auditory experiences which were thus induced could be regarded as forecasting the future; the ravings could become in part intelligible, or could be interpreted as if they were, and considered to have predictive value. But what thus found expression was simply a dominant wish of the group, "Go up to Ramoth-gilead, and prosper" said the four hundred prophets to Ahab (I Kings 22:12). "They speak a vision of their own heart" says the book of Jeremiah (23:16). Ecstasy meant not an escape from self, but imprisonment within the circle of one's own desires.

In the third place, what was sought in ecstasy was actual identification with the life of the god. The worshippers in their frenzied exaltation seemed to become one with deity. They are entheoi, god-indwelt. This is abundantly clear in the case of the Dionysus cult in Greece and its antecedents in Thrace. So, as Rohde points out, "The enraptured servants of the god call themselves by the name of the god."⁴ The worshippers of Bacchus are Bacchae. So participants in the Bacchus festival set horns upon their heads. The enthusiasts express their sense of identification with the god by assuming as far as possible his appearance. Now, this belief in the fusion of the human and the divine rests upon a conception of the relationship between god and man entirely foreign to Yahwism. In this the distinction between the two was from the beginning so absolute as to forbid the suggestion that even for a moment a human being could live the life of divinity. It is the spirit of Yahweh, not Yahweh himself, that comes upon Saul and joins him to the prophets. In him is God-given power, but not the being of God himself.

³ Psyche, tr. W. B. Hillis (New York: Harcourt, Brace & Co., 1925), p. 258.

⁴ Ibid.

On these grounds, then, as on the grounds of geographical distribution, it becomes increasingly clear that ecstatic prophetism, with its self-initiated effort to take possession of deity for its own enjoyment, was not a native product of Israel's religion, but like much else in Canaan was taken over by Yahwism and radically transformed. It is indeed a far cry from the bands of ecstasies to the great solitary figures of a Hosea, a Micah, or a Jeremiah; from the hardly intelligible ravings of enthusiasts to the terrible clarity of an Amos or an Isaiah; from the devotees who found a refuge from the actual in the vaporings of their own excited fantasy to the men who accepted fearlessly the dread impact of austere reality. One of the things which is not accounted for by those who would make the distinctive character of Israel's religion begin with the eighth-century prophets is the extraordinary dynamic needed to effect this transformation of ecstatic prophetism into the later prophecy.

V. The Note of Ecstasy in the Ministry of the Prophets

Yet along with this remarkable change certain characteristics of the older prophetism persisted in the ministry of the later prophets, and the recognition of these characteristics as giving form to their utterance has a very definite bearing upon the interpretation of the books that bear their names.

The visions of an Isaiah or an Amos are evidently born of ecstatic experience. Amos, for example, sees "a basket of summer fruit" (Amos 8:1-2). He finds himself staring at it, everything for the moment invested with enhanced significance. In his inner consciousness there sounds a voice, "Amos, what seest thou?" There is here something more than meets the eye. In Hebrew the word for "summer fruit" closely resembles that for "end," and to a heart charged with the sense of impending doom such a word has an ominous ring. There breaks upon his inner hearing the solemn pronouncement, "The end is come upon my people of Israel." This suggestibility resulting in the trancelike condition is that of the ecstatic. Again abnormal powers of sight and hearing, an intense emotional impressionability, the sense of compulsion from without—"The Lord spake thus to me with a strong hand" (Isa. 8:11)—alike reveal the kinship of the great prophets with the members of the earlier dervishlike companies. Jeremiah, announcing the coming of the invader, cries, "How long shall I see the standard, and hear the sound of the trumpet?" (Jer. 4:21.) His imagination is aflame with vivid anticipation of the terrors that are to come. There is a direct response to stimulus and the expression of that response is instantaneous and unreflecting. The prophet speaks of things immediately seen, heard, and felt. Very different in tone are passages which are the result of literary effort. Take the following from the book of Amos (1:2):

The Lord will roar from Zion,
And utter his voice from Jerusalem;
And the habitations of the shepherds shall mourn,
And the top of Carmel shall wither.

The passage is in part found also in the book of Joel (3:16); the reference to Zion and Jerusalem suggests that if God declares himself, there will be some association with the Holy City; the shepherd of Tekoa must speak, as it were, in the name of the church. For these reasons it is unlikely that the passage can be taken as coming from Amos himself. But it is almost as important to note that the imagery is confused. The first half of the verse uses the roaring of the lion and the thunder as symbols of God's majesty and power; but neither of these would produce the drought of which the second half of the verse speaks. The writer has not immediately heard or felt these things. His language is conventional. This is not to deny the great value of the expression of his conviction that the God who manifests himself with destroying power is none other than the God who is known in the ordered ways of the sanctuary.

A second notable sign of the ecstatic background of prophecy is the use of the pronoun of the first person singular for the divine utterance upon the prophet's lips:

I found Israel
Like grapes in the wilderness (Hos. 9:10).

And when ye spread forth your hands,
I will hide mine eyes from you;
Yea, when ye make many prayers,
I will not hear (Isa. 1:15).

I will bring evil from the north,
And a great destruction (Jer. 4:6).

God himself speaks through the prophet. The human "I" has for the moment been surrendered to the divine speaker. This experience is both like and unlike that of the earlier ecstatic. It is not a fusion of the human and the divine in which the subject loses all consciousness of anything but the sense of its own heightened existence. The prophet is a mediator between God and the world, the vehicle through which the dynamic word passes on to human life. As the initiative is not with a man's self but with Yahweh, so the end is beyond self. But this capacity for surrender to another has its very evident kinship with the intense emotional susceptibility of the ecstatic. The full significance of this astounding phenomenon of the immediacy of the divine utterance is hardly realized by the ordinary reader. It is assumed that the prophet is simply reporting verbatim a message previously conveyed to him. Color is lent to this interpretation by the prefatory formula, "Thus saith the LORD," which might often be better rendered, "Thus did the LORD say." But this clause is generally the contribution of those who have transmitted to us in writing the oracles of the prophets. For the original hearers there was no need of such an introductory statement. There was that about the look and bearing of the prophet and the content of his message which made it abundantly clear that Another than himself was speaking. What men felt as they listened was the actual presence and power of the living God. It is of course evident that at times the prophet speaks in his own person, though nonetheless as the messenger of God. Only it is in the moments of entire possession by the divine voice that the relation to the older ecstatic prophetism can be most clearly noted, while the quality of these utterances in which God himself speaks in the first person bears striking testimony to the transforming power of Israel's religion.

THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE

Again, the persistence of the ecstatic element had much to do with determining the form of prophetic utterance. It has long been recognized that the prophet was a poet, but this has often been taken to mean that the poetry was the result of his literary elaboration of his message. This, however, is to forget the spontaneous immediacy of the prophet's delivery. His word was the child of the moment of inspiration. He spoke under the compelling power of the Other than self. In strangely heightened emotional response to the invasion of his being, his improvisation took rhythmic form, was indeed poetry in the fullest sense of the word. But obviously the mood could not be prolonged to the production of poems of considerable length and involved structure. The typical prophetic utterance was therefore a brief oracle in which a single truth was expressed with direct simplicity and ravished intensity.

A good illustration of the contrast between the original brevity and directness of the prophet's speech and the language of the more deliberate and conscious development of his thought may be found in Jer. 2. Imbedded in the opening verses is a poem of characteristic tenderness:

I remember thee, the kindness of thy youth,
The love of thine espousals,
When thou wentest after me in the wilderness,
In a land that was not sown.
Israel was holiness unto the LORD,
And the firstfruits of his increase:
All that devour him shall offend;
Evil shall come upon them (Jer. 2:2-3).

Even in the translation the rhythm is unmistakable, three thought units followed by two. The rhythm can be discerned again in vs. 14 ff., as the prophet pictures the distressful fate that is to overtake the nation, "Israel a servant," "his land waste," "his cities . . . burned." The theme is a simple one, the pitiful contrast of then and now, of the days when Israel walked in loving loyalty with Yahweh, sheltered from harm amid the perils of the wilderness, and the desolation that is to befall a people that have forgotten their God. But between the parts of this poem there is a long passage which halts between prose and poetry, for while it has a certain rhythmic swing, no regularity of the rhythm can be discerned: "What iniquity have your fathers found in me, that they are gone far from me, and have walked after vanity, and are become vain? Neither said they, Where is the LORD that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, that led us through the wilderness, through a land of deserts and of pits, through a land of drought, and of the shadow of death, through a land that no man passed through, and where no man dwelt? . . . Be astonished, O ye heavens, at this, and be horribly afraid, be ye very desolate, saith the LORD. For my people have committed two evils; they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water" (Jer. 2:5-6, 12-13). The changes are rung effectively on the baseness and the folly of a people forsaking their God who has done so much for them. The author enforces his point with moving eloquence, but his style is that of the preacher rather than the poet. The treatment of the desert by the two writers is significant. The poet is content with the single revealing epithet, "a land that was not sown"; but that epithet seizes at once the essential feature of the desert, its oblivion of human effort, a land where none would ever speak of mother earth and where man remains a stranger and a wanderer. It is interesting to see the phrase recurring more than once in T. E. Lawrence, Seven Pillars of Wisdom.⁵ "The wilderness," says the biblical writer, "a land of deserts and pits, . . . a land of drought and deep darkness, . . . a land that none passes through, where no man dwells" (Jer. 2:6), and the method of enumeration has its own rhetorical adequacy, but it does not give the feel of the desert as the poet's single phrase does. The difference in tone and style of the prose passage would seem to justify the contention of some scholars that it is not from Jeremiah himself, but from a later writer on whom the prophet's message had made so profound an impression that he was inspired to translate it into the idiom of his own day.

VI. The Form of Prophetic Utterance

The prophets themselves did not compose speeches or even poems in which they developed a theme with some degree of logical consistency. Their utterances were brief, pregnant oracles charged with an emotional intensity which found expression in a rhythmic form probably maintained unchanged through any particular deliverance. That is to say, change in rhythm, in mood, in imagery, is a likely indication that a new oracle is to be reckoned with. Often, too, these changes will be found to coincide with the occurrence of the introductory formula "Thus did the LORD say," or the concluding phrase "saith the LORD," and it would seem likely that editors have thus preserved the tradition of the separate origin of the oracles. Some of these may have been afterward committed to writing by the prophet himself. This is certainly true in the case of Isaiah (30:8). Jeremiah, as has been noted, dictated his poems to Baruch (Jer. 36). But for the most part they would have lived in the memories of hearers who in the course of time recorded them on ostraca, parchments, or whatever materials were available. Such fragmentary records, generally associated with a significant name, would be cherished and, no doubt copied and recopied. A man into whose possession a small collection of these oracles came would take delight in adding to it other utterances reputed to be by the same author, and he would not question too curiously their source. Enough that the words rang true. Superimposed upon this first stage, the process of informal growth is the work of those who, feeling that the oracles were of timeless value, sought to relate them to the conditions of their own day and age, adding, therefore, interpretation, explanation, and commentary.

⁵ Garden City: Garden City Publishing Co., 1938.

VII. The Spoken Word Committed to Writing

No small part of the contribution thus made was concerned with the necessity of taking account of that difference between the spoken and the written word to which reference has already been made. For those who heard the prophet speak, the particular situation known to all would make abundantly clear the meaning of what he said. The later reader, unfamiliar with the circumstances, might easily be bewildered, and it is often with his need of enlightenment that the editors are concerned. For example, at a critical moment in the history of the little kingdom of Judah, Jeremiah delivered this oracle:

Weep ye not for the dead,
Neither bemoan him;
But weep sore for him that goeth away:
For he shall return no more (Jer. 22:10).

The good king Josiah had been slain in battle by Pharaoh-Necho, king of Egypt. By this same victor, Jehoahaz, Josiah's son, whom the people had placed upon the throne in his father's place, had been summoned to Riblah and there put in bonds. No one who heard Jeremiah speak could fail to understand the reference to this situation and the unequivocal announcement of the fate that was in store for the young king. But at a later time this oracle in the hands of a reader would be obscure. So there has been added in plain prose the explanatory statement:

"For thus saith the LORD touching Shallum [another name for Jehoahaz] the son of Josiah king of Judah, which reigned instead of Josiah his father, which went forth out of this place; He shall not return thither any more: but he shall die in the place whither they have led him captive, and shall see this land no more" (Jer. 22:11-12).

Or to take another illustration, there came a moment when the prophet Isaiah, finding himself in the presence of the wealthy landowners and nobles of his day, hurled in their teeth this bitter challenge:

Ye have eaten up the vineyard;
The spoil of the poor is in your houses.
What mean ye that ye beat my people to pieces,
And grind the faces of the poor? (Isa. 3:14b-15.)

Those who heard the prophet were in no doubt that the burning indignation was that of the great God himself. It was he who had spoken upon Isaiah's lips. But there is now prefixed to this oracle a four line verse in which Yahweh himself does not speak but is spoken of in the third person:

THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE

The LORD standeth up to plead,
And standeth to judge [his] people^o
The LORD will enter into judgment
With the ancients of his people, and the princes thereof (Isa. 3:13-14a).

The tone is rather different from that of the oracle. There is not the same effect of charged intensity. This and the change in person would seem to make it not unlikely that the verse was composed with a view to providing for the reader a setting for the oracle which would help him better to grasp its meaning. In so doing, the writer has enunciated an important and sublime truth, as he makes Isaiah's utterance a particular instance of that constant subjection of the national life to the divine judgment which men all too easily forget. It is not without significance that the Hebrew text in vs. 13 reads "peoples" instead of "his people." Someone felt that it is nothing less than the world with which God is thus concerned, and he has therefore given the passage this wider reference. So a nameless scribe has helped to give to Isaiah's fearless challenge of the leaders of his day its meaning for the whole of human life.

VIII. The Development of the Implications of Prophetic Prediction

In the case of the great prophets of the pre-exilic period, the recognition of the distinction between their oracles and the additions that have been made serves to bring out more clearly the arresting fact that Amos, Hosea, Micah, Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel are all alike in this—they announce the final doom that is to overtake the nation. "The God of Israel is about to destroy his people for their sins" might well be taken as the summary of the message of every one of them. To these prophets it was thus given to discern in the actual course of events the supreme truth of the absolute righteousness of God. They did not set this forth in abstract propositions, as theory which might later win general acceptance, for it was truth pressing in upon life, declaring itself with appalling power in the immediate situation. This realism of their message in the exactness of its relationship to the circumstances of their own day invested what they said with a dread intelligibility for those who heard them speak. But for the reader of a later and a different time there was need of comment and explanation of the kind to which reference has been made. There was also need of a further unfolding of the implications of the truth to which the prophets had borne their startling witness. Questions would be asked. Could the will of the righteous God be bent only on destruction? Were not the prophets sustained in their harsh and forbidding ministry by the hope that the nation might repent and so the final catastrophe be averted? And indeed in the books of the prophets there are to be found moving exhortations to the people to turn from their evil ways. There is, however, grave difficulty in taking the exhortations as coming from the prophets themselves. The unhesitating certainty with which they declare that the fate of the nation is sealed would make somewhat unreal any suggestion that the disaster could be averted by repentance. The prophets speak because they know that doom is inevitable. When, however, due account is taken of the distinctive character of these oracles of doom with their note of ecstatic utterance and their trenchant brevity, and it is further noted that introductory formulas often mark the exhortations as separate deliverances, it seems at least very probable that these have been added to the original oracles of doom by those who sought to relate the prophet's revelation of God more definitely to human needs; teachers for whom, too, the distinctions within the nation, which have their roots in Isaiah's reference to the remnant, had become a basic postulate. An interesting illustration is found in Amos 5. In the midst of invective and predictions of woe there is a powerful appeal to the moral consciousness. Part of it runs as follows:

^o Greek, "his people"; Hebrew, "peoples."

Seek good, and not evil, that ye may live;
And so the LORD, the God of hosts, shall be with you,
as ye have spoken.
Hate the evil, and love the good, and establish judgment in the gate:
It may be that the LORD God of hosts will be gracious unto the remnant of Joseph (Amos 5:14-15).

The reference to the remnant of Joseph points at once to a later date than that of Amos. The "may be" is quite out of keeping with the categorical note which characterizes the prophet's utterances generally. Some commentators therefore regard this call to repentance as coming from a later hand. But let it be said at once that to hold this view does not mean that the passage in question is robbed of its significance. It is simply to distinguish between the task committed to the prophet of setting forth unflinching the inexorable nature of the divine righteousness and that of another who, taking home to his heart the truth enunciated by

Amos, draws out more richly its bearing upon human living.

In ways like these many writers of varied outlook played their part in the growth of the books of the prophets. To them we owe the transmission to our own day of the original oracles of the great outstanding figures in the history of religion who in an especial way are rightly known as the prophets—Amos, Hosea, Isaiah, Micah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the rest. But more than that, they discerned the timeless value of these oracles; they attempted by explanation and interpretation to relate them to the needs and questions of later times; in a word, they developed the truth embodied in the earlier writings and thus helped to invest them with that wealth of meaning which has been theirs through all the centuries down to our own time.

IX. Prophecies of the New Order

There is, however, another important element to be reckoned with in the development of the prophetic literature. In each book there are found substantial additions of quite different character from the passages thus far considered. Instead of dire prediction of the destruction of the nation, with its teaching about the divine transcendence and the righteousness of God and the inviolable holiness of his love, or the development of these truths by way of exhortation to repentance, there is found in these further additions the unflinching conviction of the greatness of Israel's future, of its primacy among the peoples, of the world-wide significance of its history.

To be sure, a link between what may be called the negative note of the oracles and the positive tone of these hopeful predictions was provided by making these latter speak of the restoration which will follow upon the time of disaster and the repentance which this brings about. In fact, many of them were first uttered at a time subsequent to the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. and the end of Israel's career as a nation, notably those found in Isa. 40-66. But some of them date from earlier times, and it is not unlikely that nearly all of them once had their own independent currency. They too spring from the background of primitive ecstatic prophetism, though along a line of development quite different from that represented by the great solitary figures with whose names we are familiar. A piece of historical narrative in I Kings 22 throws light on this twofold development. At the suggestion of Jehoshaphat, Ahab consulted the prophets of Yahweh, four hundred in number, about an expedition he was planning for the recapture of Ramoth-gilead from the Syrians. With one voice the four hundred predicted the success of his siege of that city. But at the prompting of Jehoshaphat, Ahab made further inquiry of one Micaiah ben Imlah, also a prophet, though one who held himself aloof from the group and was known for his contempt for the king. While Micaiah was being summoned, the four hundred prophets in their state of ecstasy continued to forecast Ahab's success. Their strange inspiration characteristically came to a focus in the behavior of one Zedekiah ben Chenaanah. He fashioned horns of iron and dramatically represented the irresistible bull-like rush with which the king was to overwhelm his foes. Over against the group stood the solitary figure of Micaiah, like them the subject of ecstatic vision, but in total opposition as he announced the disaster that was to overtake the royal expedition. Like Elijah of his own day, he was the forerunner of the great prophets of the eighth century and their successors. In him can be noted the same surrender of the heightened consciousness of the individual to the will of the righteous God that led them to announce exultantly the overthrow of self-seeking human power, though it involved tragic results for their own people.

On the other hand, the kind of identification with a people's natural hope of victory, represented by the group ecstasy of the four hundred, and finding expression in the symbolic activity of Zedekiah, was to undergo radical transformation as the implications of Yahweh's relation to the course of history were more clearly understood. The God of Israel was indeed the transcendent God of righteousness who would make no compromise with evil. That righteousness must flame forth hotly against all iniquity, even to the destruction of his people. But nonetheless this was the God who had brought Israel into strangely intimate relationship to himself. In the Exodus his power had been declared in their deliverance from the Egyptian oppressors. He had entered into their history and invested it with positive worth and significance. In Canaan, Israel had gradually learned that the life of nature as it ministered to human need was the beneficent manifestation of the power of this same God. It was he who gave them "corn, and wine, and oil" (Hos. 2:8). If this primary truth of man's dependence upon the goodness of God could be unflinchingly maintained, and right human effort could be seen as a faithful and humble acceptance of God's gifts and response to his activity, the hopes and aspirations of a people could take on new meaning. To these hopes and aspirations thus transfigured, group prophecy, speaking on the lips of individuals, was to give inspired expression. Instead of the simple, "Go up . . . and prosper," representing naïve belief in the successful employment of human resources of wealth and wisdom, no matter what might be the character and motives of those who made use of them, there was to be the assertion of the ultimate triumph of the God of righteousness in a victory in which his people were to have their humble but significant part. Always there was the danger that this victory would be thought of as primarily re-doubling to the material advantage of the nation and to its exaltation. False prophets would subordinate God to man's selfish aims and desires. An Amos must therefore denounce those who lightheartedly hailed the day of Yahweh's final manifestation of power as the day of the fulfillment of their own fond hopes (Amos 5:18). But this perversion upon the part of many of what was involved in God's participation in the human adventure did but throw into sharper relief the prophecies of those to whom God's righteous goodness was the supreme and determining factor in the movement of history. These men of deep spiritual understanding were the authors of many of the great passages in the books of the prophets that again and again have sustained the faith and hope of those who in the face of human failure have held fast to a belief in God's ultimate victory.

THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE

An excellent example of this transformed product of group prophecy is found in the book of Isaiah. The passage runs as follows: "And it shall come to pass in the last days, that the mountain of the LORD's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the LORD, to the house of the God of Jacob; and he will teach us of his ways, and we will walk in his paths: for out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem. And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people: and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks: nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isa. 2:2-4).

The same prophecy is found almost word for word in the book of the prophet Micah (4:1-3). Biblical scholarship in the past has long debated whether Isaiah or Micah was the original author; but it is now generally agreed that the passage is of quite independent authorship. In fact, in tone and idiom, as well as in content, it differs very markedly from the authentic oracles of both these prophets. Both of them foretell unequivocally the destruction that is to befall Jerusalem. Isaiah sees the nation as priding itself upon the abundance of its material resources, and its leaders by their brutal disregard of the elementary principles of justice as flaunting their arrogance in the face of the majesty of God. Upon such a people irrevocable doom must fall, doom which will inevitably involve the fall and destruction of the capital. Micah denounces Zion as a city built with blood, where the greed of princes, priests, and prophets complacently claims the divine protection; and the prophet sees this Jerusalem in ruins, its site a desolate jungle.

But Jerusalem is nonetheless the place of the special manifestation of Yahweh's power, though that power must destroy. It remains possessed of an awful distinction. It was fitting, then, that a prophecy which superbly sets forth the true destiny of the city should be placed alongside oracles that foretold its destruction. In the face of his people's failure to respond rightly to its divine vocation, someone has introduced this utterance of an unknown author, as if to say that God's purpose cannot in the end be defeated. So there has been preserved a prophecy in which crude nationalism has been transmuted into a vision of the true meaning of Israel's unique calling, to mediate to the world the knowledge of the one God, with the result that in the light of that knowledge all peoples are to dwell at peace one with another.

It is not always that the authors of passages such as this so completely transcend the natural self-centered longing of a people for its own security and prosperity. At times the delight in the material benefits which may be expected to accrue as the accompaniment of a right relationship to God seems to be given undue prominence as in such a verse as Isa. 60:5,

The abundance of the sea shall be converted unto thee,

The forces of the Gentiles shall come unto thee.

But again and again it is in world vision far transcending national self-interest that the hope of the future comes to its climax. So in the description of the ideal ruler in Isa. 11:1-9, a beginning is made with the memory of the glorious reign of David, but an end is found in the assurance that the earth shall be "full of the knowledge of the LORD, as the waters cover the sea." Whether the thought is of what is done for Israel or of what is done for the world through Israel, invariably it is the sense of the divine activity that dominates the outlook, and life is seen in the light of God's purpose of righteousness and love rather than in the light of what man's unaided effort can make of it.

It is this sense of God ceaselessly at work in his world that affords the vital connection between these prophecies of well-being and the oracles of doom. Indeed, it was the unfailing fidelity of the great prophets to their discernment of God, declaring his righteous power in the ending of Israel's career as a nation through the rise of the empires of Assyria and Babylonia, that provided the firm ground for the hope of the future. So an unknown author in the splendid prophecies of restoration in the second part of the book of Isaiah makes startling appeal to the truth that his predecessors had made so abundantly clear. In a brief poem embedded in Isa. 42:24-25 he asks,

Who gave Jacob for a spoil,
And Israel to the robbers . . . ,
Poured upon him the fury of his anger,
And the strength of battle?

This apparently harsh reminder that it was their own God who had smitten them is an integral part of the message of consolation. It was no unknown deity who had overwhelmed them, no inexplicable fate against which they must blindly and helplessly struggle. A stricken, broken fragment of a people, they were still in the hands of the one God who in the dire misfortune that had befallen them had manifested that awful righteousness of which their own prophets had spoken.

X. In Many and Various Ways

Both types of prophecy, then, have their distinctive contribution to make to the understanding of God's ways with man. The one enters into the heart of human life, and discerning even in the egoism and the selfishness of human striving simply the perversion of God-given instincts, keeps its thought steadfastly fixed upon what God can do through man, and thus sees human aspiration purified and ennobled and human effort invested with new and lasting value. But the power of this prophecy of the good that will come to keep its vision of God undimmed rests in no small degree upon the faithfulness of the few and lonely souls to whom the absolute holiness of God was all in all, so that for its sake they could face and proclaim the dissolution of all the ties of home and family and country that for most men are what make life worth living. They lived noble lives with the pervading sense of that presence and might which claimed their whole being. They had been drawn out of themselves into union with overwhelming power; they had made complete surrender to the righteousness and truth that they had found at the heart of that power. They had looked into the face of tragedy, seen life at its darkest, and yet could rest in their intense awareness of God and of the world as subject to his sovereign sway.

To speak then of the prophetic literature is to call to mind first of all the great prophets after whom the several books that compose that literature are named. In these books are preserved their authentic oracles, and in each case these oracles constitute the nucleus about which additions by way of explanation, interpretation, and supplement have gathered. It was their ministry that enabled Israel's life as a people to survive the catastrophic end of its career as a nation and thus to be the vehicle of God's continued revelation of himself. But that continued revelation was in no small degree given through the work of the nameless authors who were responsible for the further growth and development of the books. Some of these were prophets and poets in their own right, and their glowing pictures of what the future may hold in store still direct and enrich the faith and hope of the Christian church. Others made their contribution by way of inspired interpretation of the great utterances of those who had gone before. Still others played the humbler role of bringing all this varied material together. The title "editor" that is sometimes given them hardly does justice to the loving insight and care that informed their labors and bear their own testimony to the working of the "one and the selfsame Spirit, dividing to every man severally as he will" (I Cor. 12:11).

If, then, on the one hand biblical scholarship has helped to make more clear the unparalleled greatness of the prophets whose names have come down to us, it has on the other hand made it plain that many unknown writers had their place in shaping the prophetic literature. To no one man, not even to the greatest of the prophets, is it given to know the whole of God's revelation of himself. There is a splendid one-sidedness about the prophet that is bound up with his unhesitating loyalty to the truth of his own immediate vision. That one-sidedness is in no small measure made part of a larger understanding of God's way with man by those through whose labors the prophets' utterances have been transmitted. Theirs was not the piercing original insight of high spiritual genius; they were no doubt often simply representative of the better thought and temper of their own day; but their hearts nonetheless sought God, and his Spirit used them for the enrichment of his revelation of himself through the discipline of his people. "The Bible itself is a monument of the principle that the validity of individual intuitions must be checked by the conscience and insight of the religious community." ⁷ That principle finds pre-eminent expression in the growth and development of the books of the prophets through whom God spoke of old, "in many and various ways" (Heb. 11:1).

THE PROPHETIC LITERATURE

⁷ B. H. Streeter, The God Who Speaks (New York: The Macmillan Co., 1936), p. 169.

XI. Selected Bibliography

- GUILLAUME, ALFRED. Prophecy and Divination Among the Hebrews and Other Semites. New York: Harper & Bros., 1938.
- Lods, ADOLPHE. The Prophets and the Rise of Judaism, tr. S. H. Hooke. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 1937.
- MOWINCKEL, SIGMUND. Prophecy and Tradition. Oslo: J. Dybwad, 1946.
- ROBINSON, THEODORE H. Prophecy and the Prophets in Ancient Israel. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1923.
- SCOTT, R. B. Y. The Relevance of the Prophets. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1944.
- SKINNER, JOHN. Prophecy and Religion. Cambridge: The University Press, 1922.
- SMITH, J. M. P. The Prophets and Their Times. 2nd ed. rev. William A. Irwin. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1941.

THE WISDOM LITERATURE

by WILLIAM A. IRWIN

- I. Wisdom in the Ancient Near East
- II. Wisdom in Early Israel
- III. The Wisdom of Solomon
- IV. The Earliest Core of Proverbs
- V. Pre-Exilic Wisdom

- VI. Postexilic Wisdom
 - A. Proverbs
 - B. Job
 - C. Ecclesiastes
- VII. Conclusion
- VIII. Selected Bibliography

Wisdom is very old in the Orient. At this day we have the collected sayings of Ptahhotep, an Egyptian sage of about the twenty-third century B.C., and we know of the famous Imhotep who preceded him by several hundred years. From such early expression, wisdom continued through the course of Egypt's ancient history. It had a comparable development and popularity in Babylonia. A considerable wisdom literature from both lands has been preserved to the present.

I. Wisdom in the Ancient Near East

Oriental wisdom suffers under deep and widespread misunderstanding. It is supposed to consist of maxims of the sort that constitute a considerable bulk of the biblical book of Proverbs. While this type of sayings was a normal expression of the wise men, it constituted only a part of their activity. The introduction to the book of Proverbs, giving as it does a sort of curriculum of the wisdom schools, provides some concept of the diversity of expression of the ancient sages. The mention of riddles is particularly worth notice. For us they are merely a form of bucolic humor, or serve for the amusement of schoolboys. But in the ancient world the riddle was a serious mode of scholarly investigation and teaching. We grasp its significance by recalling the phrase "The riddle of the universe."

There was also in Babylonia a considerable use of plant and animal fables that expressed the ancient thinkers' engrossment in the problem of man's obvious similarity to and dissimilarity from the lower creatures. Moreover, it is not generally recognized that the maxims, which unfortunately focus the attention of every casual observer of ancient wisdom, are in actuality an expression of the problem of ethics, a very early and simple expression, but nonetheless concerned with the study of human conduct. The ancient sage ignored the prolegomena which we consider essential. He had scarcely realized as yet that there could be a problem of ends and sanctions; consequently, he merely assumed the nature of the good life and the reasons for pursuing it. But given these objectives, which to him seemed obvious, the wise man studied types of conduct and their significance as conducive to or destructive of life's good.

Furthermore, wisdom undertook in relatively ancient times an examination of the ultimate worth of human life, with dawning apprehensions of the metaphysical problems entailed. On a little study it becomes apparent that wisdom was the organized thinking of the East. One might describe it as the scholarship of the time, for the wise man was necessarily conversant with the outreach of contemporary knowledge. But also he did serious thinking about it, asking meanings and relations. He was the ancient philosopher, though we must understand that wisdom had its practical side and application, so that it covered more in this direction than philosophy has come to comprise for us. On the other hand, it was less than modern philosophy, for thought has expanded with the advance of the ages to include problems and areas of truth that had never dawned on the imagination of the ancient scholar. The close and direct relationship between Oriental wisdom and subsequent thought is declared in the word that has become technical with us, for philosophy is philosophia—by which the Greeks confessed their debt to the older speculative thought that had its most notable expression in the wisdom of the Orient.

Wisdom, then, was not limited to the great cultures in the older world. Man instinctively asks the meaning of all that comes within the scope of his experience; not least he asks about himself. It is not relevant, thus, to inquire what lands of the ancient world had wise men—in addition to Babylonia and Egypt we hear a little about them in Assyria and in Edom—but only to know what expression their wisdom found, and how far they pushed their investigations. Indeed, it is now realized that even savage man had his philosophy.

II. Wisdom in Early Israel

Little is known of the wisdom of the Canaanites. The fragments of their literature found at Ras Shamra, in north Syria, contain none. But the high attainments of their civilization, along with certain allusions and records in the Old Testament, make it quite clear that a vigorous, self-conscious wisdom movement had long functioned in Palestine before the Hebrews entered. And this fact is basic to an understanding of Israel's wisdom.

In the Song of Deborah the archaic poet gloats over the death of Sisera; in imagination he pictures the king's mother in the royal palace at Harosheth-haggoyim, peering out the window and anxiously inquiring,

Why is his chariot so long coming,
why tarry the wheels of his chariots?

To this her wise women made answer, assuring her that the delay was but evidence of complete victory (Judg. 5:28-30). What the normal function of these "wise women" may have been we can only guess. Their presence at this time and place, however, provides a brilliant flash of illumination upon an established institution. It is to be noted that they were wise women; hitherto our study has encountered only men in this profession. But that this is no casual accident in Palestinian practice is shown by two other stories.

When Joab would win David's consent to the return of Absalom from exile, he sent to Tekoa for "a wise woman." And she, when she came, behaved with the astuteness and skill of a professional, quoting ancient lore that bears every mark of the traditional maxims of the wisdom movement (II Sam. 14:14). When the revolt that grew out of the Absalom incident was near collapse, again a wise woman took decisive action. Evidently on her own initiative and by virtue of her professional renown, she negotiated with Joab and agreed to the execution of the leader of the insurrection. Then she "went to all the people in her wisdom" and had them perform what she had promised. "In her wisdom" clearly means in her recognized position and acquired fame as one of the "wise." Nor is this all; in her conversation with Joab she told how in early times it used to be said, "They always ask counsel at Abel" (II Sam. 20:16-22). This insignificant little town, up on the borders of Israelite holdings and evidently little changed from its Canaanite days, had in the tenth century B.C. a tradition of ancient repute for its wisdom.

These passages, though all too brief to satisfy us, yet make clear that a Canaanite wisdom movement carried over into Israel. And this circumstance in turn explains the prestige of "wise" persons there when as yet the nation had scarcely emerged beyond a rural culture. Further light in this direction is obtained by consideration of Samson's riddle (Judg. 14:12-19). In and of itself it is commonplace: merely a bit of rustic play of wits. But as a riddle it implies the entire long course of Oriental wisdom. Indeed more; its debasement here to countrymen's buffoonery carries an implication of many years of use through which this could come about. One may not, however, draw the tempting conclusion that here we have evidence of a wisdom movement already very old in Israel; it is more probable that the development took place in pre-Hebrew times. It is relevant to mention also Jotham's fable (Judg. 9:8-15), which tells of the acceptance of kingship by the worthless bramble, after the vine, the olive, and the fig tree had refused it. Respectable people are too busy for politics, and so the way is left open for reprobates! Here is an excellent example of the Oriental plant fable—in fact, the one pure fable of this sort in the Old Testament—providing further evidence of the complete acclimatization of the wisdom movement in Palestine when Israel was yet a newcomer in the land.

Too little is told for us to understand the full nature of this earliest Israelite movement. Social circumstances and the implication of our few passages both alike point toward its having stressed practical discretion rather than metaphysical and ethical speculation. And certainly this is borne out by the function of men such as Ahithophel and Hushai. Of the former it is recorded that "the counsel which he counseled in those days, was as if one inquired of the word of God" (II Sam. 16:23). The conviction cannot be avoided that his relation to David was in a class with the sporadic advice given by the woman of Tekoa; he was a "wise man."

III. The Wisdom of Solomon

On this entire background we are enabled to understand the far-famed wisdom of Solomon. The story of the disputed baby (I Kings 3:16-27), which the historian narrates as an example, implies for us little more than native astuteness and a practical knowledge of psychology. Yet it will be recognized that these qualities fall within the scope of ancient wisdom. More to our purpose is it to consider Solomon's historic place in Israel's evolving culture. His people were but a generation away from rural life. David had won for them a famous old city, and had made it a center for the nation; yet notwithstanding such graces and vices of city life as he may have fostered, he remained to the end essentially a country man. But Solomon was city-bred, with connections through his mother, apparently, far back in the old pre-Hebrew culture of the city. What influences may have molded his youth we do not know, but his tastes soon led his kingdom to such magnificence, such unheard-of graces and external splendor, as to dazzle even the staid historian of his reign (I Kings 4:20-28). His "wisdom," too, becomes lucid in the light of its long history in the Orient: simply, he was a scholar. It is immensely to his credit that in an age and environment such as his he realized the delights and supremacy of the things of the mind. It was of epochal significance for his kingdom; here was the dawning of Israel's cultural life in the narrower sense, with results and implications that go far beyond our present task.

True to the supranational character of scholarship, Solomon was reputed in all lands, his enthusiastic biographer relates, and his wisdom surpassed that of the sons of the East and of Egypt (I Kings 4:30-31). How proficient he may have been, engrossed as he was in affairs of state, it is impossible to say. Men came from distant lands, we are told, to hear his wisdom: doubtless foreign scholars induced by Solomon's generosity to live and work in Jerusalem. Probably we shall not be far from the facts if we regard him as patron of the arts and sciences, who made Jerusalem a center of learning, however modest, and doubtless in his spare time indulged his interests with excursions into scholarly matters. He can be thought of along with Akhenaton, Harun ar-Rashid, Charlemagne, and many other monarchs whose tastes lay in the things of the mind, and who made their courts brilliant with intellectual life, centers of the best things of their times.

The biblical historian summarizes all in the claim that Solomon was author of 3,000 proverbs and 1,005 songs, and that he spoke of plants and animals—evidently plant and animal fables, such as already mentioned; but unfortunately none are preserved, for the few reminiscences of such wisdom in the book of Proverbs (30:18-19, 24-31) are not ascribed to him. Similarly, his songs are not in the present Song of Songs. Both we must consider lost through the accidents of the centuries; but the proverbs are another matter.

IV. The Earliest Core of Proverbs

Prov. 10-21 contain a collection of maxims that bears his name, and ch. 25 claims to begin another that was copied by Hezekiah's men; that is, a full hundred years before the destruction of the Judean kingdom these were already ascribed to Solomon. The collections are such as to be impossible of dating by internal evidence; besides, being devoid of continuous thought, they lent themselves readily to free editorial treatment. And so no one can say of any one proverb that it did or did not belong to the original collection; and of the total we have only such tenuous evidence as here surveyed for its Solomonic origin. Nonetheless, the situation is comparable with that in the Psalter, where we have reacted strongly against the marked skepticism of a former age. There is no adequate reason for denying that chs. 10-21 contain an undetermined nucleus that is Solomonic, an adjective which again we must interpret generously as meaning "produced under Solomon's inspiration."

The form of the maxims is normally a single line, of two parallel members, that makes a pungent observation on some aspect of human conduct, petty or important. It has been claimed that they are not poetic in form, but since parallelism is the usual formal mark of Hebrew poetry, it is difficult to see the grounds of the objection. Certainly when they attain the bulk of two or more lines, one must admit their form is poetic. Probably they should be thought of as comparable with the popular proverbs of the Western world, which commonly strain after a pseudopoetic form but seldom attain anything higher than popular jingle.

The proverbs are not easy reading. Their atomistic structure, lacking context and sequence, baffles the mind with a multitude of unrelated details. However, they were intended not for continuous reading but for prolonged study. They are a concentrate of ancient learning, a crystallization of the sages' long study of courses of conduct and their outcome, and for proper understanding they demand to be redissolved in copious quantities of personal episode. When each is enlarged, through a process of chastened imagination, to the bulk of a whole chapter, then they take on life and impact. Indeed, it is possible that some such method characterized their actual use in antiquity; for they give the impression of being notes of the wise men's teaching. In their corporate character the sages had watched through the centuries the course of history, the rise and fall of kingdoms, and the outcome of individual courses of life. Society was for them a sort of test tube in which they observed experiments in ethics. And in their maxims they set forth the distilled essence of their results. This extra-temporal character of the wisdom movement constituted one of its great contributions: its sense of the continuity and unity of scholarship across the millenniums, indifferent to national bounds, and of the ongoing process of human life that was working itself out to inherently determined results. Symbolic of this is a late Egyptian document that cites the work of famous wise men a thousand years and more in the past.

V. Pre-Exilic Wisdom

The temper of the pre-exilic Hebrew wisdom, in so far as we may cautiously identify it in the book of Proverbs and whatever other source that can be adduced, was not comparable to the religious compulsion which animated the prophets. It lacked their flaming passion; in a word, their inspiration. The wise men took life as it was, and regarded it in a somewhat detached way. At times they were half amused, at times just a little cynical. Life, they were convinced, works itself out according to its own laws, and the man who cannot govern his way to take proper account of them is a fool. Religious realities are to be respected, still only as part of the total of circumstance which the wise man will appraise in planning his conduct.

The course of the wisdom movement subsequent to Solomon is vaguely discernible from a few allusions. Yet in seeking to trace its character and achievements, it is highly important to avoid a fragmentation of Hebrew intellectual life. While one may study separately the three famous forms of leadership of thought in the Old Testament, those of the priest, the prophet, and the wise man, it must be recognized that Israel's life was diverse only within a comprehensive unity. We shall understand it by comparison with the present, where all differing points of view and emphasis blend into a composite that is the spirit of our times. And so while the prophet bitterly criticized priest and politician, the wise man followed his own course, and the priest felt himself superior to both, yet all alike were members of the Hebrew community, sharing its outlook and contributing, each in his own way, for better or worse, to its intellectual and spiritual being and end. In particular, the wise man, as custodian of the nation's intellectual heritage, and concerned with the total of truth in its significance for ongoing life and faith, was intimately a part of all, contributing to all in a comprehensiveness which too often today we are prone to overlook. However, just as a history of philosophy is legitimate, although the philosopher's conclusions have frequently had profound effect on religious belief, on political faith and practice, and on the deep unvoiced convictions of the people as a whole, so likewise we may concern ourselves with assembling the too meager evidences of the continuing work of the ancient sages.

Mention of King Hezekiah's men, already referred to, is highly illuminating. Scholarship then continued under royal patronage. There is an odd little wisdom passage in Isa. 28.23-29, which few scholars would attribute to the prophet. The book of Job, though certainly of a later period, contains allusions to an ancient wisdom that may very well be relevant to the time now under discussion (Job 8.8-12; 15:10; 22:15). It is commonly recognized also that certain of the psalms belong more with the wisdom movement than with the cultus; but the period of their composition is highly uncertain. Thus Ps. 15 is intimately of a piece with the ethical maxims of the Orient, a feature which Ps. 24 shares in part. Ps. 1 is a didactic treatment of the "two ways"—the theme of the much later Didache. Pss. 16; 49; 73 are of the speculative character that is the essence of wisdom. Ps. 19 apparently contains a remnant of the best riddle—in the technical sense of the term—to be found in the Old Testament. Vs. 2 reads, "Day unto day utters speech, and night unto night proclaims knowledge"; but vs. 3 contradicts this flatly, "There is no speech and no language; their voice is not heard." It has been suggested that originally the psalm posed a question to the effect, "What is it that speaks, day by day and night after night, yet has no speech or voice or language?" Answer: "The heavens, which declare the glory of God, and the firmament which shows his workmanship."

VI. Postexilic Wisdom

A. Proverbs.—The Exile was of profound relevance for Hebrew life and thought. All aspects of the people's experience were deepened, a transformation in which the wisdom movement shared to the full. Later wisdom, in so far as we can identify it, is markedly religious—with the exception of Ecclesiastes. The reiterated comment, which is found first in Prov. 1, is a symbol of postexilic wisdom: "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom." Wisdom was a quest of value in life; and so here the sages set forth their reasoned conclusion that supreme and enduring satisfaction can be found only along religious lines. Yet the religious outlook is in general noncultic. A unique passage enjoins payment of religious dues (Prov. 3:9-10); and Ecclesiastes somewhat cynically advised meticulous payment of vows, though qualifying this with the comment that it is better not to vow at all (Eccl. 5:4-5). It is related also that Job sacrificed regularly on behalf of his sons (Job. 1:5). But these are the exception. In general, the emphasis of these later wise men might be supposed to have originated with the prophets who state baldly that the Lord never desired sacrifices; it accords fully with the famous summary of religious duty in Mic. 6:6-8.

Whatever uncertainty attaches to the rest of the book, Prov. 1-9 are generally regarded as postexilic. Apart from placing them somewhere midway in this period, scholars generally refuse to date them more precisely. They begin with a notable catalogue of the proficiency of the trained wise man. They have much to say about the menace of the "strange woman." They contain some maxims of the traditional sort, and frequently follow the usage of twenty previous centuries in bearing the address "My son." They fall into somewhat clearly recognizable sections that may, again with some play of imagination, be described as separate lectures of the ancient teacher. But altogether, their most notable feature is in the exquisite lyric in 3:13-20 and the more lengthy treatment of the same subject in chs. 8-9. Wisdom is described as superior to wealth and precious treasures, which had been precisely the desiderata of the earlier sages. Careful reflection makes it apparent that the term here means the finer, intangible riches of life, the things of the heart and mind. The refined Hebrew wisdom of this late time has penetrated to the insight that life's nonmaterial values transcend all: only in things of the spirit does life attain meaning. Ch. 8 gives this a cosmic setting. God "possessed" wisdom before creation—it was an attribute of his; life's goodness and beauty and all its unseen realities are of the character and being of God. He created the world as an expression of this "wisdom"; and now it stands in the busiest places, wherever men are, calling to them, inviting them to turn aside from lesser things and to seek the serene worth that is found in the ways of God. Here, it may be remarked in passing, is the sages' doctrine of divine revelation, and it is one that has not yet been surpassed or superseded.

B. Job.—By common consent the book of Job is the greatest of Israel's wisdom books, and a supreme treasure of our literary heritage. The greatness of the theme at once attracts attention, for the writer here sets out to pursue

Things unattempted yet in prose or rhyme—nothing less, in fact, than to assert eternal Providence,

And justify the ways of God to men.¹

¹ Milton, Paradise Lost, Bk. I.

The tragic figure of Job stirs universal sympathy—that lordly and blameless sheik who lived in ease and happiness, yet was stricken in a moment with loss of all. His sons and daughters were taken from him, his property destroyed, and then he himself was afflicted with a loathsome disease. So he sits, in the city refuse ground, tormented with pain, and tried to the breaking point by his three friends who lecture him on the wickedness that must have brought him to such sorry plight, while he, in a horror of loneliness and despair, gropes for some ground of faith in the God whose goodness had been the light of former days.

One may summarize the theme of the book in the question, "Why do the righteous suffer?" More pertinent is it to realize that it is a theodicy; it probes into the mystery of God's government of the world and its meaning as a revelation of his own nature. Yet the greatness of the book is that with a subject so exalted it yet moves among simple things: a very sick man, and his obsessions and querulous musings, and his friends who in their smug orthodoxy believe that they have the answers to all life's deepest issues and to the ultimate meaning of the universe. To follow through their lengthy speeches and the still longer ones of Job, adorned as they are with Oriental flights of fancy, and to study the subtle contribution of each to the advance of the discussion toward a conclusion which, we may presume, the author envisaged from the beginning—to do this is a new experience in Old Testament study, where apart from narratives the matter falls generally into relatively brief and somewhat independent passages.

It is well known that the bulk of the book is in poetry. Its art is a delight. The author embellishes his pages with vignettes of ancient life; he draws upon his deep knowledge of psychology; he carries one along with allusion and citation from his wide reading in the great literature of the Orient; and still more, his lines are superb in their finished form, their resonant assonances, their majestic structures, and their confident use of all the devices and figures that enhance great poetry. Certain of his lines have passed into general use as gems of literary art. Think of these:

When the morning stars sang together and all the sons of God rejoiced (38:7).

What pure poetry in the phrase, "the eyelids of the dawn" (3:9)! What majesty in the description of the war horse, pawing the valley in his impatience, while he hears the trumpet and the clash of swords, and "smells the battle far off" (39:19-25)!

THE WISDOM LITERATURE

The book is in semidramatic form. Indeed, its stated dramatis personae and their conversation have led some readers to regard it as modeled on Greek drama. It is impossible to say what the writer intended to achieve, but certainly the action normally expected in drama is lacking. It is sufficient for us that the movement of thought is dramatic. And what a flight of fancy when at length the Lord himself is introduced, appearing in the whirlwind to challenge Job, "Gird up now your loins like a man!" And then there follows a magnificent account of the great works of God since the time when he shut up the sea with doors when it broke forth as if it had issued from the womb (38:8).

The origin of the book has given rise to considerable speculation. Its locale out on the fringe of the desert, its indifference to Old Testament law and ritual, and its strange linguistic features have suggested the hypothesis of a foreign origin. One claim is that it is a translation of an Arabic poem, another that it is a product of Edomite wisdom. But to attribute this supreme achievement of the literary and intellectual life of the ancient world to such sources is just out of the question. Unless better evidence is forthcoming, we may safely hold that the one people in the ancient world qualified to produce such a work was Israel. Job is Hebrew through and through. Its linguistic peculiarities may safely be set down to dialectal divergence from the familiar Hebrew of Jerusalem. Presumably, then, some concession is to be made to the theories just now mentioned; the author was a Jew not of Jerusalem, but of some other part of the world.

The traditional and still commonly accepted interpretation of the book is the obvious one: that it reaches the answer to its problem in the speeches of the Lord. And that answer, so it is held, is that man may trust a God whom he cannot understand. But this line of exposition runs foul of two acute difficulties. Excellent as such a sentiment may be, it can be extracted from these chapters only by violence—or by pietistic eisegesis, which is the same thing. Their patent import and emphasis is that God is mighty, and man has no right to ask questions about his conduct. God is the "completely other," so far above man and so distinct from him that his righteousness also is of a different kind; it is folly to suppose, much less demand, that he be righteous by human standards. For man there is only submission and acceptance, a view which, it may be remarked, is precisely that of the friends in the dialogue, hence the view which Job (and so, presumably, the poet) passionately repudiates. The other objection to this interpretation is that it has uniformly led scholars to overlook an aspect of the dialogue that becomes obvious as soon as it is approached in its own right, freed from presuppositions as to its place in the book. In the dialogue Job's experience is a pilgrimage of faith and hope. But to our astonishment the standard commentators uniformly treat the Job of the dialogue as a static figure. Some, it is true, speak of his progress of thought, but their demonstration leaves it microscopic; for they single out passages from his speeches indiscriminately at any point in the book, and piece them together as Job's "position." In reality Job has no position, but a progress. From an initial theology not unlike that of the friends, he moves on under the spur of their taunts, first into deep pessimism and rebellion, then gradually to a dawning hope which through notable apprehensions of faith comes to clarity in his great affirmation,

He knows the way I take;
when he has tried me, I shall come forth as gold (23:10).

The book takes on vital meaning when we regard it in some such light as this. An old folk tale about the righteous sufferer circulated in Israel; following a method familiar to us from the work of great creative writers of far-subsequent ages, a poet-thinker took this as stimulus and point of departure for the discussion that now constitutes the dialogue. Originally this was of greater extent than at present, and carried the thought onward to Job's restoration. Through some unrecorded misadventure the conclusion of the poem was lost and other parts preserved only in fragments: later editors put together these tattered remnants in what are now called chs. 25–27. But the discussion was of such importance and power as to inspire a series of lesser men to add their views on the subject. Relatively early a series of mutually independent poems were appended; they now go under the name of Elihu. This was before the injury to the manuscript of the dialogue, for the first speech of Elihu (chs. 32–33) traces lightly the course of the discussion right through to the original conclusion. It was some time later that the speeches of the Lord were added by a poet of imagination and skill who saw dramatic possibilities in letting Job have his wish to meet the Lord in open debate. His description of the encounter is a high example of the art of the Hebrew poets. The epilogue was added by lesser men, and apparently someone prefixed the prologue in order to round out the entire episode.

C. Ecclesiastes.—Contrary to a former view, the book of Ecclesiastes is to be regarded as in the main the unified work of a single author. Eccl. 12:12-14 has been added, a sort of pious colophon; the proverbial sayings occurring throughout the book also give an impression of having been expanded, if indeed they are not in some cases intruded in entirety. But for the rest, the book consists of reasoned and orderly views of life's ultimate meaning set forth by some thoughtful and eminently honest man of an indeterminate late period of Old Testament times. His views in part resemble the hedonistic conclusions of Egyptian pessimists of more than seventeen centuries before. It is claimed, too, that he was influenced by Greek thinking; if so, this is clearest in his cyclical theory of history (3:1-17). In any case, he was a thoughtful, educated man who was familiar with the literature and thought of the ancient world.

The author's problem is to find some redeeming value in human life. He gives his conclusion at the outset, though not in a priori thinking, but merely as his way of presenting his views: "Vanity of vanities; all is vanity." The word here translated "vanity" means both worthlessness and transience. It has the latter force in 11:10, but elsewhere the other is closer to the author's thought. His conviction, then, is that life has no worth. This he expounds with several considerations. He points out the cyclical character of nature and life (1:1-11); he tells of his experiment with himself, how he tried various experiences in hope of finding life's secret (1:12-2:23); he speaks of the uncertainty of family and personal fortune (4:4-7; 6:3-8), since a wise man may be succeeded by a fool. In a passage that reveals his generous instincts he tells of rampant injustice (4:1-3, 8) but—unlike the prophets whom it aroused to fiery action—he was merely thrown into deeper dejection. For he is convinced, doubtless on account of his cyclical view of life, that the total of human misery is a constant quality, so that it is hopeless to seek to do anything about it. He concedes that wisdom surpasses folly as light surpasses darkness (2:13), yet for him what is the use? Here we find a clue to his pessimism; he lacks the cosmic view of wisdom so remarkably set forth in Prov. 8; for him wisdom is about equivalent to individual education. As a consequence, it has no permanence. Life is atomistic and futile, never achieving anything of lasting worth. Always it deceives with glimpses of reality and understanding that are never attained, but it ever starts afresh with each new individual from the same unchanging beginning. What then remains? Only to enjoy the passing moment, and avoid serious thought.

The author is from some points of view a figure to stir something akin to pity. An eminently attractive personality, genial, kindly, supremely honest, with deep social feelings and keen intellectual tastes, he could yet find no worth in life. It was all vanity and vexation of spirit, a mere chasing after wind. How one wishes he might have realized, as did the wise man in Prov. 8, that across the ages human life is building up values that endure, and that these compel a metaphysical answer to all our questioning. But then there have always been men of his outlook; they are still with us, and some of them are called philosophers. They insist that they are the ones who take account of all available truth; it is the religious man who is deceiving himself with wishful thinking and a biased selection of facts. But whatever is to be our judgment of his thinking, there can be no doubt that Ecclesiastes was a writer possessed of genuine skill and poetic feeling. His lucidity remains a challenge and a warning to those who too easily reconcile their faith with the perplexities and boredom of human existence.

VII. Conclusion

The vitality of the Jewish sages at a later age is revealed by two books which were not included in the Hebrew canon: Ecclesiasticus and the Wisdom of Solomon (see article "The Literature and Religion of the Apocrypha," pp. 408-11, 406-8). Along with comments of the maxim type, both books took over the concept of cosmic wisdom that had been so strikingly set forth in Prov. 8-9. Ecclesiasticus identified this primordial wisdom with the Torah, a view which is not to be regarded as a mark of the triumph of legalism so much as a logical conclusion drawn from Jewish theological concepts. The author of the Wisdom of Solomon was equally dependent on the ancient sages; his thought was similar to that of Proverbs, but he dressed it up in Stoic phraseology.

The nature of the wisdom concept was such that it was easily carried over into the New Testament. When the early Christians began to wrestle with the problem of understanding the nature and place of their divine Lord, they found an interpretation ready at hand in the age-old speculations of the wise men. Contrary to widely held opinion, the prologue to the Fourth Gospel is more Hebraic than Hellenic. Apart from its featuring the word logos, it is almost completely derived from Prov. 8; it is a reshaping, in terms still bearing the stamp of their origin, of the concept of the pre-existent divine wisdom that had made the world and took delight in the sons of men. Some years earlier Paul had taken the same course of interpreting his Savior as "Christ the power of God and the wisdom of God" (I Cor. 1:24). The christological speculation of the church is rooted in the Old Testament in a far more profound way than mere grasping after "messianic prophecy" has permitted Christian thought to apprehend.

THE WISDOM LITERATURE

VIII. Selected Bibliography

- BAUMGARTNER, WALTER. Israelitische und altorientalische Weisheit. Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1933.
- DRIVER, S. R., and GRAY, G. B. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Job ("International Critical Commentary"). New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1921.
- GRESSMANN, HUGO. Israels Spruchweisheit im Zusammenhang der Weltliteratur. Berlin: Karl Curtius, 1926.
- GUNN, B. G. The Instruction of Ptah-hotep and the Instruction of Ke'gemni. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 1909.
- HUMBERT, PAUL. Recherches sur les sources égyptiennes de la littérature sapientiale d'Israël. Neuchâtel: Secrétariat de l'Université, 1929.
- MACDONALD, D. B. The Hebrew Philosophical Genius. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1936.
- OESTERLEY, W. O. E. The Wisdom of Egypt and the Old Testament. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1927.
- RANKIN, O. S. Israel's Wisdom Literature. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1936.
- RANSTON, HARRY. The Old Testament Wisdom Books and Their Teaching. London: Epworth Press, 1930.
- RYLAARSDAM, J. COERT. Revelation in Jewish Wisdom Literature. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1946.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

by NORMAN H. SNAITH

- I. The Semitic Languages
- II. The Consonantal Script and the Vowels
- III. Main Characteristics of Hebrew Morphology
- IV. Hybrid Character of the Hebrew Language
- V. Hebrew Versus Aramaic
- VI. Semantic Changes of Religious Terms
- VII. The Main Motif of Words

- VIII. Hebrew Poetry and Theological Expression
 - A. Rhythm
 - B. Parallelism
- IX. Modern Recovery of Hebrew Words
- X. The Old Testament of the Early Church
- XI. Selected Bibliography

Most of the Old Testament was originally written in Hebrew. The small residue was written in a dialect of Aramaic known as biblical Aramaic, and comprises three main pieces (Dan. 2:4b-7:28; Ezra 4:8-6:18; 7:12-26), an odd verse in the middle of Jeremiah (10:11, presumably an early gloss), and two words in Genesis (31:47; "Heap of Witness," the name given by Laban to the Mizpah stone which Jacob's clansmen set up in Gilead). The fact that the central portion of the book of Daniel is written in this dialect led ancient scholars to call it Chaldee, under the impression that this was the tongue spoken by the Jewish exiles in Chaldea (Babylonia).

I. The Semitic Languages

Both Hebrew and Aramaic belong to the Semitic family of languages. These are called "Semitic" because, according to the ancient Hebrew ethnological tables of Gen. 10-11, most of the peoples who have spoken them were descended from Shem, son of Noah. The Semitic languages may be roughly grouped according to four geographical areas: (a) Eastern—Akkadian (the modern name for Assyrian and Babylonian); (b) Western—Hebrew and the languages of ancient Palestine and Trans-Jordan; (c) Northern—the various Aramaic dialects, including the later Syriac; (d) Southern—Arabic and Ethiopic.

As a written language, Akkadian is the earliest member of the Semitic family. Then comes the recently discovered Ugaritic, so called from the site of Ugarit discovered in 1929 at Ras Shamra on the Syrian seacoast. These two languages both used cuneiform (wedge-shaped) scripts, and were written from left to right. Akkadian cuneiform is syllabic and ideographic, while Ugaritic cuneiform is consonantal-alphabetical.

Next in chronological order as a written language comes Hebrew, with Aramaic not far behind, though as a spoken language Aramaic is certainly earlier than the Hebrew of the Old Testament. During and after the Exile, Aramaic was used by the Jews both in Babylonia and in Palestine, while the closely allied Syriac became the language of the Christians of the East.

Arabic came into prominence with the rise of Islam from the seventh century A.D., and in the Middle Ages was the medium through which the learning of the Greeks became known in the West. Today Arabic is the major spoken Semitic language, having in addition a marked influence on Urdu (Hindustani), and to a lesser degree on some of the languages of West Africa. Modern Abyssinian is a development from Ethiopic. Small ethnoreligious groups still speak Aramaic and Syriac, while the rise of modern Hebrew is a recent phenomenon.

II. The Consonantal Script and the Vowels

Apart from Akkadian, Semitic languages have used consonantal scripts only, and other means have had to be devised to express the vowel sounds. Even Akkadian did not need vowel signs, for its script, being syllabic, included vocalic sounds in the notation of consonants.

Other Semitic languages, especially Hebrew, pressed certain consonants into service to represent unchangeably long vowels (see article, "Text and Ancient Versions of the Old Testament," pp. 46-62). When this device was found to be inadequate, special signs were created and placed above, within, or below the consonants in order to represent all vocalic sounds. Hebrew was written for centuries without vowels, and this custom is still followed in the scrolls which are used in the synagogues.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

The lack of vowel signs has in general occasioned no great difficulty, though there are instances where it has given rise to misunderstandings. For example, in Gen. 47:31, the Hebrew says that the aged Israel bowed down on the top of the bed (mittāh), but the Septuagint reads that he bowed down on the top of his staff (matteh), and this rendering was quoted in Heb. 11:21. Likewise, in I Kings 19:2-3 the Hebrew tells how Jezebel threatened Elijah with reprisals for his slaughter of her prophets; the Consonantal Text has וירא which the Masoretes read as wayyar ("And he saw") and the Septuagint as wayyirā ("And he was afraid").

III. Main Characteristics of Hebrew Morphology

Like all Semitic languages, Hebrew is built up on a three-consonant (or trilateral) verbal root system. There are indications that there was also a two-consonant system, but any attempt to recover it is largely conjectural. The three consonants carry the meaning, while the vowels, together with consonants either prefixed or suffixed, are used to conjugate the verb in various forms, voices, moods, tenses, and to derive nouns and adjectives (though Hebrew is notoriously weak in the latter).

The verb has seven main forms with a number of others in occasional use. The main forms are the ordinary active with its passive, an intensive or causative form with its passive, a causative, declarative, or progressive-stative form with its passive, and an intensive-reflexive, reciprocal, or "pretensive" form.

The way in which these forms may be obtained by variations in vowels and by additions of consonants will be seen in the following words.

The trilateral root גנב (gānabh) means "he stole"; yignōbh means "he will [may] steal"; gōnēbh (active participle) is "one who steals," while the noun gannābh is a professional or persistent "thief" and genēbhāh is a "thing stolen"; ginnēbh means transitively "he stole away" (e.g., "the hearts"), but hihggannēbh signifies, intransitively, "he stole away" (i.e., "he went away by stealth"); finally, Joseph told Pharaoh gunnōbh gunnabhī, "I was truly stolen away" (Moffatt, "really kidnapped"; Gen. 40:15).

Likewise the three-consonant verb שמר

(shāmar) means "he kept," "tended" (e.g., "flock"), "watched," "observed"; nishmar signifies "he was on his guard," or "he was kept"; while hishtammēr means "he kept himself [from]." Apart from these verbal forms, several nouns may be derived, like mishmār, "jail," "prison," and later, "guard post"; shomrāh and mishmēreth are "guard," "watch," while 'ash-mōreth means "watch" (division of time).

For the most part the same three consonants carry always the same meaning, though, as in every language, there are changes with the passing centuries. Sometimes the same three consonants have meanings which seem to be mutually incompatible. One cause of this phenomenon is that each of the two Hebrew letters נ and מ represents what were originally two distinct gutturals, though the distinction came to be lost in Hebrew. These are still expressed by different signs in Arabic and in Ethiopic. For instance, the Hebrew consonants h-r-b mean either "be waste," "desolate" or "attack," "smite down." The explanation is to be seen in the Arabic equivalents, where harba (with the heavy hēth) means "be waste," while haraba (with the light hēth) means "plunder." Thus the Hebrew noun hōrebh (heavy hēth) means "desolation," while hērebh (light hēth) means "sword."

A second reason is that Hebrew is not a pure language: to some extent it occupied a central place in the Semitic world, where East and West overlapped. For instance, the root q-ḥ-r can mean both "be short" and "reap" or "harvest." The former is the meaning in Arabic, while the latter is the meaning in Akkadian.

A third reason is the way in which consonants interchange from language to language. In the Indo-Teutonic group of languages we have the regular interchanges of consonants according to the correspondences known as Grimm's law; e.g., the English thrash and the German dreschen, or again, father and Vater. Among the similar Semitic rules there are those affecting the Hebrew consonant ש, which is represented in Arabic by no less than three consonants, ṣād (an emphatic s), dād (an emphatic d), and zā (an emphatic z). There are thus three Hebrew roots ḥ-r-r. In Arabic the first is ḥarra ("bind"), so that the Hebrew ḥerōr means "bundle," "parcel," and ḥar means "straits," "distress." The second is ḥarra ("harm," "damage") so that the Hebrew ḥar means "foe," "adversary," and ḥārāh means "vexer," i.e., "rival wife." The third is ḥarra ("be sharp"), whence the Arabic ḥurar is "a sharp-edged stone." In Hebrew, as a relic of the Stone Age, ḥerōr means "pebble," and ḥōr is "knife," presumably dating back to a time when the first Hebrew cutting instruments were flint knives.

IV. Hybrid Character of the Hebrew Language

The fact that Hebrew is a mixed language and has features common to other Semitic languages is to be seen also in the duplicate forms of the first person singular pronoun "I." There are two forms in common use, with no distinction between them as regards meaning, but only as regards style or preference. Each form belongs to its own group, but the two groups overlap in Hebrew. The first form is 'ānōkhi, found in Akkadian and also in Phoenician and Ugaritic. Probably it belonged originally to the east, but came west with that Babylonian influence which was especially strong in Palestine during the middle part of the second millennium, and was formative in the development of the speech of Syria (Amurru, according to the Assyrian geographers) out of which the Palestinian tongues sprang. The second is 'ani, and is found in Aramaic, also in Arabic and Ethiopic. It apparently belonged to the north and the south, and was probably brought into Canaan by the Hebrews or by some other group of invaders with Aramaean associations. When the Hebrews entered Palestine, they seem to have spoken some Aramaean-Arabic language, which in time was fused with the Canaanite already there. Perhaps the book of Job with its strong Aramaic-Arabic flavor is a development of the original speech of the Hebrews of the desert. In Isa. 19:18 Hebrew is rightly called "the language of Canaan," for the Ras Shamra (Ugarit) tablets, the glosses on the Tell el-Amarna tablets, and the ninth-century Moabite stela of King Mesha, all show that the Canaanite element is dominant in biblical Hebrew. The conqueror conquered the inhabitants, but the land itself to a large extent conquered him. Both ethnologically and linguistically it is plain that the land of Canaan conquered, with its already mixed blood, language and traditions. It is plain also from the Old Testament that Canaan would have conquered religiously also had it not been for the prophets whom God "rose early to send." The physical characteristics which we tend to associate with the Jew are actually Hittite, as the Hittite bas-reliefs show. The true Semitic type is to be seen sometimes in the leaner, hawk-eyed Spanish Jew, possibly because an admixture of Moorish blood has brought him back closer to the purer Semitic strain. Ezekiel was in the main right when he said, "Thy birth and thy nativity is of the land of the Canaanite; the Amorite [i.e., the original Syrian stock, cf. Assyrian "Amurru"] was thy father, and thy mother was an Hittite" (Ezek. 16:3 ERV).

The hybrid origin of the Hebrew language is nowhere more clear than in the verbal system.

It used to be said that Hebrew had only two tenses, in this respect being similar to classical Arabic: a "perfect" tense, used of an action thought of as having been completed, and an "imperfect" tense, used of an action thought of as being incomplete. It was also held that the inadequacy of this tense system is compensated for to a considerable extent by the construction known as "imperfect with strong waw" (or "waw conversive" or "waw consecutive"), whereby the imperfect occurring with the copula at the beginning of a clause is translated as if it were the perfect; and similarly, though contrariwise, with the "perfect with strong waw." We know now¹ that this strong waw construction is Akkadian so far as some of its unique features are concerned. It was always hard to explain why the tone should sometimes move forward in the imperfect with strong waw. A modern explanation is that the tense is not really the imperfect yiqṭōl at all, with the accent on the last syllable, but a preterite yiqṭōl, with the accent on the first syllable, preserved in the Akkadian preterite iqṭul. Similarly what was thought to be the perfect with strong waw is not the perfect of Aramaic, Arabic, and Ethiopic, but is the Akkadian "permansive," definitely a present-future tense.

Perhaps we have here an explanation of the so-called "prophetic perfect" of Hebrew. This is an apparent perfect tense used of an action which is in the future, either immediate or not so immediate, but certainly to be fulfilled in the mind of the prophet. It is used chiefly of the word of God as spoken by the prophet concerning future weal or woe. The prophet Isarah says in 5:13, "Therefore my people are gone into exile" (Amer. Trans.), by which he means that it is absolutely certain that they will go. Or again, a strict translation of Num. 24:17 is "There hath risen a star out of Jacob, and a scepter shall arise out of Israel." Here we have a perfect with a strong waw following an apparent perfect, but the English versions have rightly realized that it is not a true perfect, and they have rendered, "shall arise." Actually the tense is a permansive, referring to the future whether immediate or remote.

In the hands of the prophets this so-called "prophetic perfect" developed into a most powerful mode of expression, and it seems to have gathered to itself something of the significance of all the time categories, present, past, and future. For instance, the prophet known as Deutero-Isaiah regularly uses the "prophetic perfect" to say that God "hath redeemed" Jacob-Israel (Isa. 43:1; 44:22, 23; 48:20; 52:9). But this redemption has not yet taken place. The prophet regards it as belonging to the immediate future, and at the same time as being absolutely and finally determined. It is out of this combined idea of an action fully determined by God in the past, but due for realization in the immediate future, that the peculiar features of the prophetic eschatology developed. The prophets spoke of the last things (eschatology), of the consummation of the will of God, with a sense of immediacy. These last things were to come to pass almost "now." The prophets could say that God "hath redeemed Israel," because it was always being realized as true. The whole history of Israel in times past echoed no other refrain than, "God hath redeemed Israel." Any man who had eyes to see could look and see that it was true now; and the prophet could see equally that it was true tomorrow. God is always redeemer. In this sense the development from prophecy to apocalypse is a widening of the prospect from the historical to the eternal. God is immanent to redeem and save not only in the long process of history, but always now, immediately now. The prophetic doctrine of the last things with its salvation in the indefinite future becomes the apocalyptic doctrine of salvation in the immediate future, i.e., the present-future of the permansive tense, so to speak, the eternal tense of the ever present-imminent "now."

¹ G. R. Driver, Problems of the Hebrew Verbal System (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1936), pp. 85-97.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

We thus see that the hybrid nature of the language and of the people is witness both to their very ordinary beginnings and to their extraordinary development. The study of the language emphasizes the statement made in various forms that Israel in herself was no different from any others of the peoples which surrounded her. Everything, therefore, that Israel ever came to be was due not to herself but to the grace of God. Israel was certainly chosen by God to be "a peculiar people to himself" (Deut. 7:6; "a people of segullāh," i.e., acquired property, and so made especially his own while not being his own originally), but, as the passage continues to say, it was not because of any merit in them, e.g., it was not because they were greater in number than any people, for they were few.

It used to be claimed that just as the Greeks had a genius for beauty and so taught the world what true beauty is, so the Romans had a genius for law and gave to the world the idea of law. And similarly, the Hebrews had a genius for religion and so taught the world the true religion. This is contrary to the attitude of the Old Testament. The Hebrews, according to the Old Testament, had no natural genius for religion. On the contrary, they were essentially wayward, and it was only the continued mercy of God to a special degree that enabled even a remnant of them to be faithful to the true God. The language shows that they were a mixed race, and by no means a people especially marked by a preserved purity of blood or ethos. Whatever they came to be was of God, and all was of grace. It was God himself who raised up the prophets. These men, like Amos, were not prophets because their fathers had been prophets, nor because of their occupations or of anything that was peculiarly theirs. They were prophets because God had called them, invaded their lives, and raised them up to be the men they became, to call the people back to him in repentance.

V. Hebrew Versus Aramaic

In some respects the whole story of Hebrew during biblical times is a fight against Aramaic. We know that more and more during the time of the Persian domination (538-331 B.C.), Aramaic supplanted Hebrew, chiefly because it was the language in which official Persia spoke to her western satrapies. But the fight between Hebrew and Aramaic did not begin then. It originated when the Israelites first entered Palestine. They spoke then a dialect which had much closer affinities with Aramaic than with Hebrew.² This accounts for the so-called Aramaisms which appear in the Old Testament, mostly in north Israelite literature, even as early as Judg. 5:11 (yētannū for the true Hebrew yēshannū, "they shall repeat," "rehearse"). Aramaisms are to be found also in Hosea and in the Song of Songs, parts of which are probably northern in origin. Similarly, there is the famous shubboleth test of Judg. 12:6, where the Ephraimites apparently used the Arabic "s" as against the "sh" of the Hebrew.

There was thus always a strong tendency in the north toward Aramaic, strengthened by the Gileadite emphasis on the old desert ways. With the Assyrian settlements of deportees from 721 B.C. onward, the Aramaic influence increased enormously, and doubtless from these days the language penetrated more and more into the south, where the original inhabitants seem to have been less disturbed by the invasion under Joshua. When the Babylonian exiles returned, they came back with their Hebrew into a largely Aramaic-speaking country. Nehemiah complained of the mixed speech, and of children who "spake half in the speech of Ashdod, and could not speak in the Jews' language" (Neh. 13:24). After the Exile, Hebrew survived among the intelligentsia, both as a religious language and as a literary language; this has been the case not only in the early postexilic times, but also right down to the present day. Nevertheless, Aramaic was the common language of ordinary folk, and it grew more and more necessary for the Scriptures themselves to be rendered into Aramaic in order that the hearer should understand what he heard.

² D. W. Thomas, "The Language of the Old Testament," in Record and Revelation, ed. H. Wheeler Robinson (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1938), p. 377.

VI. Semantic Changes of Religious Terms

The Old Testament is the product of many generations, and scarcely a page of it is to be found in the state in which it left the hand of the first writer. The fact is that no book in the world has been more deliberately kept up to date throughout many centuries. This was helped by the fact that all Hebrew writings of olden time are anonymous, the various titles which we now read having been supplied by editors. Men of God kept on re-editing the ancient texts in order to make sure that the Word of God should speak as clearly as possible to every generation in spite of all the changing circumstances of the years. Especially, the editors knew that Yahweh was a God of salvation, so that again and again when they did not find his saving power sufficiently emphasized in the writings that came down to them, they inserted passages to that effect. These additions are often found at the end of books, such as the last verses of Amos.

It is important on other grounds to recognize that the Hebrew of the Old Testament has come from widely separated centuries. Words change their meanings as the generations pass away. For instance, in pre-exilic writings the word qetôreth means "sacrifice" (e.g., Isa. 1:13), whereas in postexilic writings it means "incense" (e.g., Exod. 25:6; I Chr. 28:18). This particular instance is important for two reasons. It makes it quite clear that Isaiah of Jerusalem denounced sacrifice in no uncertain terms: he said that it was an abomination to God. And again, it agrees with what we know otherwise, namely, that there was no incense in Solomon's temple, but that this was an innovation of post-exilic times, due presumably to Babylonian influence on the returning exiles.

Or again, and once more in connection with sacrifice, there is a word minhâh, used both early and late. In Arabic the verb manaha means "lend," "give a gift," and the noun minhat is used of a loan or gift, especially of a she-camel, a sheep, or a goat for milking. The verb itself is not found in Hebrew, but the noun minhâh means "gift," "present," and it is used especially of tribute paid to an overlord or king (Judg. 3:15; Ps. 72:10). This noun is used in Gen. 4:3 of both the animal offering brought by Abel and of the cereal or fruit offering brought by Cain. Here the word undoubtedly means "tribute offering," a gift to God wholly given to him, and not largely consumed by the offerer at a sacred meal, as some other "sacrifices" were. This is the pre-exilic use of the word, but in postexilic writings the word denotes the cereal offering (ERV "meal-offering") which accompanied every flesh sacrifice on the altar of the second temple. In the King James Version the translation is "meat offering," misleading to us today, but in the sixteenth century this phrase actually meant "food offering," involving a wider use of the word "meat" than in modern times. This older use still appears often in common English speech and also, e.g., in John 6:27.

Or yet again, in connection with sacrificial terms, there is a word 'âshâm, which is used in postexilic times, especially in the Priestly Code, to denote a particular type of offering brought in connection with the expiation of certain offenses (Lev. 5; etc.). The King James Version translates, "trespass offering," and the English Revised Version, "guilt offering." The 'âshâm had its place in connection with such offenses against God or man as could be estimated in damages and so covered by compensation. It is this idea of "compensation," "substituted payment," which is at the heart of the word. This particular type of offering was unknown before the second temple, so that when we find the word, for instance, in Isa. 53:10, we must remember that there is no reference here to the guilt offering of later postexilic times. The meaning is, "When you realize that he [or "his life"] is a substitute for yours," i.e., when you realize that he suffers instead of you.

VII. The Main Motif of Words

Proper understanding of the Old Testament may be enhanced by a careful study of Hebrew words. While it must be recognized that words can change their meaning in strange and unexpected ways through the centuries, yet in all languages there is a fundamental motif in a word which tends to endure, whatever other changes the years may bring. This fundamental "theme" of a word is often curiously determinative of later meanings.

The Hebrew word hêpheç is a case in point. The original meaning of this word is "attention." In Arabic it came to mean "excited attention" and so "excitement," but in Hebrew the development was "delighted attention" and so "delight." As the years passed by, the word came to be used to mean "good pleasure," "purpose," e.g., "the purpose of the Lord will prosper in his hands" (Isa. 53:10), with the suggestion of wholehearted and complete attention. The idea of full attention is to be understood in Prov. 31:13, "And she worketh at the business of her hands." In course of time the word came to mean "affair," "matter," e.g., "There is a time for every affair" (Ecl. 3:1; etc.), and in the Mishnah it referred merely to a "thing," having lost all definitive meaning. The word thus ultimately decayed, but it did not lose its motif of "complete attention" until its deterioration from the third century B.C. onward. The name Hephzi-bah, for instance, does not mean merely "my delight is in her," but "my whole delight is in her."

Another example is the first word of Ps. 1. This can be used to illustrate the way in which the ancient Hebrews thought. In the English versions this word is rendered "blessed." The Hebrew is 'ashrê, literally, "happinenses of." The noun 'āshûr means "footstep," and this meaning is confirmed in Arabic and Ethiopic. Further, 'asher is the Hebrew relative particle. The explanation of these wide divergences is that the three-consonant root from which all these words are derived ('-sh-r) means "go straight ahead," "advance." It is thus easy to see how the noun comes to mean "footstep." Many scholars are of the opinion that the Hebrew relative particle was once used as a relative of place only, like its Akkadian counterpart ashru, but that the Hebrew relative particle developed so as to become a general relative for all purposes. All this shows how apt is the use of the first word. The psalm tells of the true way as distinct from the false. The happy man is the man who goes straight ahead, because, as the last verse says, "the LORD knoweth the way of the righteous," while "the way of the wicked shall perish." The meaning of the last word (אבד, "perish") is to be seen in Job 6:18, where it is used of a desert caravan turning aside in a last desperate effort to find water, and wandering till it is lost and dies in the desert; or again in the firstfruits declaration of Deut. 26:5, "An Aramaean ready to perish was my father," where the word 'ōbhēdh (participle) is practically untranslatable. It means "wandering," and also doomed as a desert wanderer who one day will be lost to perish in the desert. And still further, to complete the picture of the last verse of the psalm, there is plenty of evidence to show that the Hebrew yādha' ("know") tends to be used of personal intimacy rather than of intellectual knowledge. God is personally acquainted with this road of the righteous, knows every step of it, and has a real concern for every wayfarer.

This personal aspect of Old Testament religion comes to the forefront again in a word which is often wrongly rendered in the English versions. The word is pésha'. This is very frequently translated "transgression," but its true meaning is "rebellion." When, therefore, the prophets use this term, a favorite word with them, they are thinking not so much of transgressing a code, however excellent, as of deliberate rebellion against a person, and that person the savior God himself. This emphasis makes a very great deal of difference in the Old Testament conception of sin. It makes the main emphasis religious rather than ethical. In this respect Old Testament ethics differ from the traditional Greek ethics which have been the norm for our Western world. In all sound ethical systems the emphasis comes to be placed on the attitude of mind of the wrongdoer rather than on the action itself. This is true of the Greek system equally with the Hebrew. In general humanitarian or secular ethics there is also the emphasis that the wrongdoer has transgressed a particular code or some element in the system. In the Old Testament this second point of emphasis, certainly so far as the prophets are concerned, lies in the fact that the wrongdoer has turned his back on the savior God, and is going his own way instead. "We have turned every one to his own way" (Isa. 53:6). Sin, therefore, is regarded as all the more serious because the wrongdoer, as Elihu said, though wrongly, of Job "addeth rebellion [pésha'] to his sin [hattâ'th, "error," "mistake"]" (Job 34:37).

Corresponding to "rebellion," "turning every one to his own way," the regular word in common use by the prophets for "repent" is shûbh ("return," "turn back"). When Isaiah calls his son She'âr-yāshûbh, his meaning is not, as is often popularly thought, "a remnant shall return from exile," but "a remnant shall turn back to God," i.e., a remnant shall repent.

Another word used in this connection, though less frequently, is niham, generally translated "repent" (in the passive form) and "comfort" (in the intensive form). Actually the word means "to take a breath of relief," the implication being "to breathe hard [as of a horse]," as is shown in Arabic.³ The word therefore has to do with "change of attitude," "change of mind," any other association being accidental. If therefore the word must be translated "comfort," then it refers to "comfort out of sorrow," and so cessation from lamentation and weeping because the troubles are over (Isa. 40:1). When the word is translated "repent," as frequently of God, it means "change of mind or intention," and has no necessary connection with sorrow or regret. We see thus what an apt rendering the Greek μετανοεῖν is, with its corresponding noun μετάνοια. This verb is used occasionally in the Septuagint as the equivalent of the Hebrew verb niham, eight times in the sense of "change one's mind," and about thirteen times where the idea of "repent," "be sorry," is also involved. Both verb and noun occur frequently in the New Testament, and both of them definitely involve a change of mind and intention, as the etymology suggests. The idea of sorrow for past sin, though necessary enough from the religious point of view, is not conveyed in the word itself. The emphasis is that, with whatever accompaniment, the man should change his attitude, turn right around, and go back along the road into which he ought never to have gone away from God.

³D. W. Thomas, "A Note on the Hebrew Root Nācham," Expository Times, XLIV (1933), 191. Also N. H. Snaith, "The Meaning of 'The Paraclete,'" ibid., LVII (1945), 47-50.

There is another matter which arises in connection with Hebrew ideas of sin, and here again a study of the key words shows that Hebrew thought differs from our Western ways of thinking. We make a clear distinction between sin as the wrong act itself, the guilt which thereafter rests upon the sinner, and the consequences of the sin which fall sometimes on the sinner and usually on the innocent. The Hebrews tended to include all three aspects under the same word. The outstanding example is to be found in Gen. 4:13, where Cain says, "My 'āwōn is greater than I can bear." This word 'āwōn is most often translated "iniquity," but in Gen. 4:13 the English translators have rightly seen that the reference is to the consequences of Cain's wrongdoing, and they have translated it by "punishment." It is very often quite difficult to decide the precise meaning of the word in any particular case as between the three elements. In this particular passage the Vulgate has iniquitas, while the Septuagint has αἰτία ("blame," "guilt"). The difficulties of classification are plain from the variations of the references given under the three heads by such authorities as Buhl, Siegfried-Stade, and Brown-Driver-Briggs.

Further complications are introduced with the word ḥattā'th ("error," "sin," "mistake"). This word is used mainly for the wrong action itself and occasionally for the guilt of it (Zech. 14:19). It is also used for the postexilic "sin offering," of which, in the ritual of the second temple, there was more than one grade. This further meaning of the Hebrew ḥattā'th needs to be remembered when we come to interpret such a passage as II Cor. 5:21, "For our sake he made him to be sin who knew no sin." Inasmuch as Paul is thinking of the Greek ἀμαρτία in terms of the Hebrew ḥattā'th, he does not confine himself to thinking of the guilt and of the consequences. He may be thinking of Christ as a sin offering in the sense that what Christ did on the Cross takes away the sin which stands between us and God, and thus re-establishes the proper relationship between God and us. The translation might be, "Made him to be a sin offering, who knew no sin"; that is, although he himself was wholly guiltless, yet he did more than bear the consequences of our sin; his suffering was a ḥattā'th, a sin offering, putting us in a right relationship with God.

A proper appreciation of the root meaning of words is useful generally in the understanding of the Old Testament, as much in secular passages as in directly religious contexts. For instance, in Song of S. 4:1 and again in 6:5, the hair of the maid is likened to "a flock of goats that come in sight from mount Gilead." The Hebrew word for "flock" is 'ēdher, which is derived from the root 'd-r ("to lag behind"). We have, then, the splendid picture of a flock of goats streaming out as it comes into sight on the mountainside, as happy a simile as could be found anywhere for describing the maid's flowing hair.

VIII. Hebrew Poetry and Theological Expression

A substantial portion of the Old Testament is written in poetry. According to official Jewish tradition there are three poetical books, Job, Proverbs, and Psalms. In addition, there is a small number of pieces which traditionally are spaced out as poetry, the chief of which are the two ancient sabbath canticles (Exod. 15:1-18; Deut. 32:1-43), together with the song of Deborah (Judg. 5). Much of the writings of the prophets is in verse also; indeed some scholars maintain that the prophets never wrote or spoke except in verse, and that this criterion should be applied as a test for genuineness. For instance, Gustav Hölzner boldly calls his commentary on Ezekiel Hezekiel, der Dichter und das Buch (Giessen: Alfred Töpelmann, 1924), and a similar attitude is taken by W. A. Irwin, The Problem of Ezekiel (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1943).

Hebrew poetry has no rhymes. Its two characteristics are rhythm and parallelism and thus it follows the same pattern as Babylonian psalmody,⁴ or Ugaritic prosody.⁵

A. Rhythm.—The rhythm is provided by stressed syllables, the unstressed syllables being neglected for this purpose. The lines are divided into two sections, and sometimes into three. The commonest rhythms contain two or three stressed syllables in the section. The three-three rhythm is very common, especially with occasional two-stress sections interspersed as though for the sake of variation. One of the best examples of three-three rhythm is Ps. 105. Perhaps the most striking Hebrew rhythm is the three-two rhythm, where the line is divided into two sections of unequal length, producing a peculiar halting rhythm much used in laments. For this reason Budde called it the qināh ("lament") rhythm. Ps. 17:8-11 is composed in this rhythm, and this particular portion of the psalm can thus be seen to be wholly distinct from the verses which precede it. The whole of the book of Lamentations is in this rhythm, each chapter comprising a qināh poem, the first four being acrostics of various types.⁶

⁴ G. R. Driver, "The Psalms in the Light of Babylonian Research," in The Psalmists, ed. D. C. Simpson (London: Oxford University Press, 1926), pp. 109-75.

⁵ See, e.g., the translations given by Cyrus H. Gordon, Ugaritic Literature (Rome: Pontificum Institutum Biblicum, 1949).

THE LANGUAGE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

The change of rhythm is often indicative of a new paragraph entirely unconnected with what has gone before. For instance, the rhythm changes at Isa. 42:18. Previously the rhythm has been three-two with an occasional three-three, but after vs. 10 there is no two-stress section until vs. 24, which may contain one. There is a new section beginning at vs. 18. The "blind" of vs. 18 are not the "blind" of vs. 16. In vs. 16 they are all the exiles, but in vs. 18 they are those who do not understand the true significance of the Exile.

Another case where there is a change of rhythm is Isa. 46:3. The first two verses of this chapter are quite separate from what follows. They refer to an attempt to carry the idol gods of Babylon away to safety before the fall of the city. The next verses tell the story of God's continued care for Israel, how he carried Israel as a woman carries her unborn child, and how in time to come he will bring her to new birth. The exile, elsewhere spoken of under the figure of death and resurrection (Isa. 53:9-10; Ezek. 37:1-10) or as being swallowed up and disgorged by a sea-monster (Jer. 51:34; Jonah 1:17; 2:10), is here represented under the figure of a new birth.

B. Parallelism.—There are three types of parallelism in Hebrew poetry. The first is "synonymous," where the statement of the first line is repeated in the second, but with other words:

Thou shalt break them with a rod of iron;
Thou shalt dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel
(Ps. 2:9).

The second is "antithetic," where two opposite thoughts are expressed in the two lines, often with exact contrariness:

Weeping may tarry for the night,
But joy cometh in the morning (Ps. 30:5).

⁶ For a detailed study of the structure of Hebrew poetry see G. B. Gray, The Forms of Hebrew Poetry (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1915). A less detailed study is the more recent T. H. Robinson, The Poetry of the Old Testament (London: Duckworth, 1947), pp. 20-46.

The third is "climbing," where part of the first line is repeated in the second, and something further is added:

The floods have lifted up, O LORD!
The floods have lifted up their voice (Ps. 93:3).

An example of this climbing parallelism which extends over three lines is:

The voice of the LORD is upon the waters:
The God of glory thundereth:
Even the LORD upon many waters (Ps. 29:2 ERV).

Some scholars identify as a fourth type an extension of climbing parallelism which dispenses with the repetition (e.g., Ps. 121:2); others do not recognize in it any parallelism.

There are instances where it is theologically important to analyze the use of parallelism in Hebrew poetry. In Isa. 40:31, we have two three-three lines, in each of which there is an almost exact parallelism. The first line is, "But they that wait upon the LORD shall exchange strength . . .," and the second line is, "They shall run, and not be weary; they shall go [travel] and not faint." In the first half of the first line the word translated "renew" in the English versions actually means "exchange." It is the same root as that which is used in the word "Caliph," he who is the successor to Mohammed, the new leader who takes the place of the old. Further, the word "their" is an unwarranted interpolation. The translators, in their zeal to make the passage more intelligible, have changed its meaning. The whole point of the passage is that human strength, even of the lustiest and the most vigorous, is of no avail, but God will give them new strength, different strength, his own strength. They will then grow pinions like the eagles, those high-soaring, distance-devouring watchers of the desert. It is often admitted, though with some regrets as for a good poet who has nodded, that there is an anticlimax in this verse, from flying to running and finally to walking. This, as we have seen, is a mistaken exegesis since it ignores the parallelism of the verse. Further, the root h-l-k does not mean only "walk"; it also means "go on a journey," "travel," and it is better to understand it here in this wider sense.

IX. Modern Recovery of Hebrew Words

Reference has been made above, in illustration of the hybrid nature of Hebrew, to the fact that the same three consonants sometimes represent more than one root, and so carry widely different and wholly unrelated meanings. Sometimes the more infrequent root has been forgotten because of the frequent occurrence of the other. Considerable progress has been made of recent years in the recovery of roots thus forgotten.

There are instances where the Septuagint translators evidently knew of the existence in Hebrew of these other roots. For instance, the Septuagint reads γέρας in Prov. 30:17, supported by the Syriac, the Targum, and Rashi. Evidently they recognized here in the word נקח (usually translated "obedience"), a root קח meaning "old age." This root is found in this sense in Ethiopic, while the corresponding Arabic root is used of hair being white.⁷ Or again, in Isa. 48:10, the word ṣraphīkkā is translated "I have refined thee," but the Septuagint has πέρρακα, which may be explained from another similar Semitic root, presumably preserved by the Egyptian Jews after it had been lost by other Hebrew-speaking groups. This other root is represented by the Akkadian sarāpu, with which one may compare the Arabic ṣarafa, meaning "buy." There is therefore no need to seek to emend the verse either in this section or the next. Another instance⁸ is to be found in Dan. 7:22, where the Aramaic meṯāth is rendered ἐδόθη ("was given"). The context suggests that some such translation is desirable, and Nöldeke referred⁹ to the fourth form of the Arabic root 'atay. This suggestion has its difficulties, but there is an Ethiopic root matawa, meaning "gave," and it seems likely that the Egyptian Jews still knew this word.¹⁰ Yet again, in Isa. 44:28, there is no reason to doubt the correctness of the Hebrew text in the word רֹדֵי ("my shepherd"), but the Septuagint has φρονεῖν, evidently recognizing a Syriac root, from which we get the noun ra'yōn ("thought").¹¹ This instance, however, may not actually involve a newly discovered root since it is probably connected with an Aramaic root which was used by late Hebrew writers, e.g., Ps. 139:2, 17, in the sense of "purpose," "aim," or again, ten times in Ecclesiastes with the meaning "longing," "striving." In this case the history of the word would be similar to that of the noun hēpheç mentioned above.

⁷ D. W. Thomas, "A Note on Liqq'hath in Proverbs xxx.17," Journal of Theological Studies, XLII (1941), 154-55. The root was at first suggested by G. R. Driver in connection with I Sam. 19:20.

⁸ G. R. Driver, reviewing Joseph Ziegler's Untersuchungen zur Septuaginta des Buches Isaias, Journal of Theological Studies, XXXVI (1935), 83. This and other instances of the recovery of long-lost Hebrew roots are given by D. W. Thomas, "The Language of the Old Testament," in Record and Revelation, ed. H. Wheeler Robinson, pp. 391-99.

⁹ See Francis Brown, S. R. Driver, and C. A. Briggs, A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament (Boston: Houghton & Mifflin, 1906), ad loc.

¹⁰ G. R. Driver, "Supposed Arabisms in the Old Testament," Journal of Biblical Literature, LV (1936), 102-3.

¹¹ G. R. Driver, Journal of Theological Studies, XXXVI (1935), 82.

A similar case is Ps. 25:14. Here the Septuagint has κρατάωμα for the Hebrew סוּר. The English versions have "secret," i.e., "secret counsel," but the Greek translators evidently knew the meaning, "chieftaincy," comparable to the Arabic sudu. This is probably not an indication of another root, but rather evidence of a wider range of meaning, for all words have both width and depth. They represent wedges rather than pin points, and can develop along one line into what appear to be strange fields. As Driver has pointed out,¹² the original meaning of the root סוּר is "blackness," as is evidenced both in the Hebrew of Ecclus. 40:29 and in the Arabic sawida ("was black"). From this idea of "blackness" the root branched out in two directions; on the one hand, the idea of secrecy, either in a good sense (Amos 3:7; etc.) or in a bad sense (Ecclus. 41:23). But the Arabic sayyid means "lord," "chief," and sudu is "authority." Driver thinks that this meaning has developed through the idea of the leader who is in the secret counsels of the group, but Fritz Hommel more likely suggests¹³ that the Arabic sayyid means "speaker," as one who gives the decision of the converse which those in secret have held. The Syriac sowud means "friendly, confidential speech," and stawad* is the regular Syriac equivalent of the Greek ὁμιλία ("conversation"), whence the English "homily." But whatever the steps of the development may have been, it seems clear that the Egyptian Jews knew of a development of the word in Hebrew comparable to that in Arabic.

In Hos. 7:16 Arabic again helps in the elucidation of an almost unintelligible passage.¹⁴ The Hebrew root נַעַץ means "be angry," but the Arabic za'um ("stammerer") suggests that it had also a wider meaning. If this is so, then the proper translation is, "Their princes fall by the sword because of the stuttering of their tongues," the unusual meaning having been explained in a gloss, as Budde pointed out, "that is, their stammering in the land of Egypt."

Or again, an interesting question is raised by G. R. Driver¹⁵ concerning the Hebrew word higgāyōn. The word is usually connected directly with the root נַחַח ("moan," "growl," "mutter," "muse," "speak"), and is understood to describe a particular type of song, a "medita-

¹² "Notes on the Psalms. I. 1-72," Journal of Theological Studies, XLIII (1942), 150; see also his "Supposed Arabisms in the Old Testament," Journal of Biblical Literature, LV (1936), 102, 113-14.

¹³ "Das Samech in den minäo-sabäischen Inschriften," Zeitschrift der deutschen Morgenländischen Gesellschaft, XLVI (1892), 529.

¹⁴ See G. R. Driver, "Linguistic and Textual Problems: Minor Prophets I," Journal of Theological Studies, XXXIX (1938), p. 157.

¹⁵ "Notes on the Psalms. I. 1-72," Journal of Theological Studies, XLIII (1942), 151.

THE LANGUAGE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

tion." What is its exact significance in Ps. 9:16 (Hebrew 9:17) where it occurs as a musical note in connection with the hitherto unexplained selāh? Driver points out that the Arabic higā'ū means "alphabet," and that this meaning has support in the Syriac hegyana. Does the Hebrew word, then, also have a special technical meaning, "an acrostic poem," as indeed Pss. 9 and 10 at one time evidently were?

One of the most helpful examples of this type of suggestion is that by D. W. Thomas²⁶ of a second root נָדַח . This root is very common indeed with the meaning "know," but there is another similar root wadu'a in Arabic, which means, "be still," "quiet," "humiliated." In Hos. 9:7, therefore, the Septuagint is right in translating $\kappa\alpha\kappa\omega\theta\eta\sigma\epsilon\tau\alpha\iota$. The meaning of the Hebrew actually is, "Israel shall be humiliated." A similar translation is possible in Isa. 9:7 but the most interesting of Thomas' suggestions is in connection with the obscure phrase in Isa. 53:11, a suggestion all the more welcome because of the general interest in the passage. The phrase "by his knowledge" is difficult. One can retain it, though barely, by assuming God to be the subject, but if "by his humiliation" is read, then we have an admirable rendering, and this is exactly the sense which is required.

X. The Old Testament of the Early Church

The original Christian Old Testament was not in Hebrew, but in Greek—the Septuagint (see article, "Text and Ancient Versions of the Old Testament, pp. 46-62).

Here we have a matter of an importance which can scarcely be exaggerated: Has the Greek Bible had any effect on Christian theology because it was written in Greek? When Protestantism went back to the Hebrew Bible, did this have any effect on Protestant theology? Does it make any difference to the Old Testament and our understanding of it if we read it as a Hebrew book with a Hebrew setting? And has this any effect on the interpretation of the New Testament?

The answer is that it makes a very great deal of difference in our interpretation of both Testaments if we neglect the fact that the Old Testament was written originally in Hebrew.

It is often said that the New Testament was written in koine Greek, that is, in the ordinary "common" Greek of the period, the lingua franca which was common to large parts of the Roman Empire (see "The Language of the New Testament," Vol. VII, pp. 43-59). This is substantially true so far as the syntax is concerned, although every national will tend to write in the idiom of his mother tongue. This happens today. If, for instance, one's knowledge of German is limited, it is much easier to understand German as spoken, say by a Czech, simply because he tends to follow the order of his own language, and does not heap up his verbs at the end of the sentence after the German fashion. It is true also so far as ordinary "secular" words are concerned. In respect of these words the recovery of papyri from ancient settlements of Egypt during the present century has been invaluable. But when we come to "religious" words, then we need to remember that many of the first Christians were thoroughly acquainted with the Septuagint, and may well have used certain Greek words in special ways, different from the ways in which they were commonly used in ordinary Greek. Especially do we need to remember that Paul, the most prolific of the New Testament writers, knew both his Greek Bible and his Hebrew Bible. He was a thorough Jew, sedulously trained in the rabbinical schools, and at the same time a man deeply influenced by the ideas of the Hellenistic (Greek-speaking) Jews of the Dispersion. For instance, in I Cor. 2:16 he quotes the Septuagint of Isa. 40:13 with its "mind" ($\nu\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$) instead of the "spirit" ($\rho\acute{\upsilon}\alpha\eta$) of the Hebrew. In the earlier part of the chapter the apostle speaks continually of "spirit," but it is necessary for the sake of his argument that he should change over his terminology from "spirit" to "mind." His knowledge of both the Hebrew Bible and the Greek Bible aided him here in this point, because Isa. 40:13 is precisely the one case in the Old Testament where the Hebrew $\rho\acute{\upsilon}\alpha\eta$ is rendered in the Septuagint by the Greek $\nu\omicron\upsilon\varsigma$.

It is probable, therefore, that there are many New Testament words which may well have to be interpreted as Hebrew—Septuagint words—rather than according to the meaning which is usual in the ordinary nonbiblical Greek of the period. Further, if there are such words, then they are likely to be the most important words so far as interpretation and doctrine are concerned. In these cases the proper approach will be first to ascertain the meaning of the original Hebrew word, then to study its equivalent in the Septuagint, and finally to determine its sense in the New Testament. The problem of New Testament exegesis is coming to be more and more the extent to which this method is sound and necessary, and there is at present considerable difference of opinion in this matter.

In respect of some words the position is quite clear, and there can be no doubt that the Old ²⁶ "The Root Yādha' in Hebrew," Journal of Theological Studies, XXXV (1934), 302, and in several subsequent issues, especially, "More Notes on the Root Yādha' in Hebrew," XXXVIII (1937), 404-5; and "A Note on the Meaning of Yādha' in Hosea ix.7 and Isaiah ix.8," XLI (1940), 43-44.

Testament, first in the Hebrew and then in the Greek, is essential to the understanding of the New Testament. What, for instance, is the meaning in the New Testament of the verb ἰλάσκεσθαι and its compounds and derivatives? Does it carry the meaning of classical Greek, or that of Septuagint Greek? In classical Greek the verb means primarily to placate a person, and secondarily to expiate a sin, the object being personal in the first case and impersonal in the second. In the Septuagint the meaning¹⁷ is not at all that of placating an angry God. The temple ritual is not looked upon in the Septuagint as being a means to this end, but rather as a means of delivering man from sin. Here the Septuagint is true to the Hebrew kôpher, which does not mean "propitiation." It involves an act whereby guilt or defilement is removed. The idea of placating an angry God is foreign to the word and is definitely wrong. We should have been saved from a great deal of unchristian theology if this had been realized from the beginning. Here, as perhaps elsewhere, New Testament words have been translated as if they were pagan Greek words, and the doctrine of the Atonement has been given a pagan setting.

Another clear case is the Greek ψυχή. This word etymologically has to do with breathing, as the verb ψυχεῖν shows. It stands, therefore, primarily in the first place for the "breath-soul," that which is the clearest outward evidence of life, and leaves the body at death with the blood.¹⁸ The word thus comes to be used for "life," e.g., "to fight for one's life" is μάχεσθαι περὶ ψυχῆς.¹⁹ But even in Homer the word is used for that part of a man which is said to survive death, and so for the departed soul. Thus the word comes readily to stand for "the immortal soul" of man. It is used also, though not commonly, of sensual desire, appetite, and sometimes, though rarely, of animals (Isocrates Orations II. 12). Finally it is used, especially by Plato, of the organ of thought and judgment (i.e., as the organ of νοῦς).

In the Septuagint the word ψυχή is used regularly for the Hebrew nêphesh. This word originally also had to do with breathing (cf. Akkadian naphâshu, "to get breath," and the fifth form of the Arabic nafusa, "breathe," "sigh"). It is therefore used of "that which breathes and lives" in man. It is also used regularly of the appetites, and sometimes of animals. In Gen. 1:20 the phrase nêphesh hayyâh means "a living being." The word nêphesh is used in "risking one's life" (Judg. 5:18) and more than once in "taking one's life in one's hand" (Judg. 12:3; etc.). While the word is used regularly of the seat of the emotions and passions, there is no definite evidence that it is used in connection with mental activities. There are six cases which some allege to be examples of this (e.g., Esth. 4:13), but these are all doubtful and can be more readily explained otherwise.

The great difference between Greek ideas and Hebrew ideas is that the Greeks came to think of the ψυχή as being something in itself, and as continuing after death, whereas the Hebrews did not think of nêphesh in this way. At death the nêphesh ceased to exist, and while the Hebrews did speak of Sheol as the abode of the dead, yet there was no real life there, no nêphesh, not anything, and the whole idea was negative. It follows, therefore, that since the word "soul" in the English translations stands for the Hebrew nêphesh, there is not one single instance in the Old Testament where the word "soul" should be thought of as that which survives death. When the Bible writer says, according to the English versions, that God "breathed into his [i.e., the man's] nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul" (Gen. 2:7), he does not mean that God thereby gave to man an immortal soul. He means that God, having formed man from the dust of the earth, shaping him as the potter shapes the clay, breathed into him his own life-giving breath, so that this shape of dust became alive.

The New Testament follows the Septuagint and uses the word ψυχή as referring to something which is connected with this life only, and not with any life after death. The "natural man" of I Cor. 2:14 is ψυχικός in the Greek, i.e., the man of ψυχή, and he is contrasted with the "spiritual" (πνευματικός) man. In the New Testament ψυχή does not survive death, but πνεῦμα ("spirit") does. For instance, Heb. 4:12 speaks of the word of God as the sharp two-edged sword, "piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit," i.e., of ψυχή and πνεῦμα, separating that which ceases at death (ψυχή) from that which survives death (πνεῦμα). It is true that in the Old Testament man is sometimes spoken of as having a "spirit" (Hebrew rûah; Greek πνεῦμα), though this is a late usage. In any case, this "spirit" is withdrawn at death by God, and no longer belongs to man. If, therefore, the belief in the immortality of the human soul is held to be a Christian doctrine, then it should be realized that it is not a biblical doctrine. The biblical doctrine is of a resurrection life for those who "have the Spirit" and are "in Christ," with variations as to the fate of the wicked and unrepentant between "the outer darkness" and a resurrection to judgment and the fires of destruction.

¹⁷ C. H. Dodd, The Bible and the Greeks (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1935), pp. 82-95; especially the short summary on p. 93.

¹⁸ Homer Iliad XIV. 518.

¹⁹ Homer Odyssey XXII. 245.

Another important New Testament word is the verb δικαιοῦν and its derivatives. The phrase δικαιοῦν τὸν ἀσεβῆ in classical Greek means "to condemn the impious,"²⁰ but in the Septuagint of Isa. 5:23 it means "to put the impious in the right," being used of unjust judges who give the verdict to those who are oppressing the poor. Paul uses the phrase in Rom. 4:5 in the Septuagint sense and not in the classical Greek sense. One can go further and maintain that the noun δικαιοσύνη, usually translated "righteousness," should be regarded in many places in the New Testament as belonging to the vocabulary of salvation rather than to that of ethics.²¹ The argument is that the Septuagint word δικαιοσύνη has a wider use than merely ethical, since it represents the Hebrew ḥdḥāqāh, a word which "always tends away from the more abstract and intellectual Greek conception of justice, in the direction of something warmer and more humane,"²² and indeed in many cases is equivalent to "salvation"²³ (e.g., Isa. 45:8, 23; 46:13; 51:5, 6; etc.). In fact, in the Tosephta Sanhedrin 1:3 ḥdḥāqāh is actually contrasted with dīn ("strict justice").

In Rom. 6:16 we read "either of sin, which leads to death, or of obedience, which leads to δικαιοσύνη." Here we have the regular Old Testament prophetic contrast between sin and obedience, and also a contrast between death and δικαιοσύνη. In view of the Septuagint usage of the word we are encouraged here to see a contrast between death and life, in the sense of that salvation-life of which Paul continually speaks. Paul indeed uses the word in three senses. When he speaks of "the righteousness which is by the law," he means that ethical rightness which comes from obeying the code; when he speaks of "the righteousness which is by faith," he means that "righteousness [ḥdḥāqāh] of God" which is shown chiefly in God's mighty works of salvation; and when he speaks of the righteousness of the man who is in Christ, he means all those good works which are the fruits of the spirit.

To say that these words should be interpreted by their Septuagint usage, as carrying something of the original Hebrew meaning, effects in more than one case a complete transformation in interpretation. Especially is this true in respect of the δικαιοῦν group, and also in respect of πνεῦμα and its companion words, since ²⁰ Dodd, op. cit., p. 52.

²¹ N. H. Snaith, The Distinctive Ideas of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1946), pp. 207-22.

²² Dodd, op. cit., p. 45.

²³ Snaith, op. cit., p. 115.

in this latter case we must think primarily in terms of the transforming, rather than of the sublimating, power of the Spirit of God.

Yet another New Testament word of great importance is the verb πιστεύειν and its derivatives. In classical Greek the general meaning is "to believe in," "trust in" a person or a thing, and "to believe" a statement. Similarly for the noun, but mostly in a subjective sense of "faithfulness," "trustworthiness," or as signifying "that which gives confidence." In the New Testament the noun is used some four times in a passive sense of "fidelity" or "a pledge of fidelity," and similarly for the verb. Then there is the case of Jas. 2:18-20, where the noun is used of "belief in God" in much the same sense as it is used in Euripides Medea 414, where the chorus bemoans the deceitful counsels of men, deceitful because "faith in the gods is no longer firm" (οὐκέτι πίστις ἄραρε). The meaning here is thus a more or less intellectual acceptance of the proposition that the gods exist, together with the assumption that such a belief ought to issue in honorable dealing between man and man.

But the main New Testament use of both verb and noun is, however, determined by the Septuagint. Here the noun stands almost without exception for the Hebrew noun 'emūnāh, but always for one of the four nouns from the root 'm-n. The fundamental meaning of this root is "reliability," "steadfastness," and the causative form of the verb means "to have full reliance upon." This is determinative for the Pauline use of both verb and noun. Paul means an utter and complete reliance upon God. There is, of course, a transformation, as always, between the Old Testament and the New Testament because of the revelation of God manifested in Jesus Christ, but it is a transformation on the Old Testament basis of "reliance," "firm trust."

There is another Hebrew noun derived from the root 'm-n, namely, the noun 'emeth. This noun is represented in the Septuagint generally by ἀλήθεια ("truth"), but occasionally by πίστις ("trust"). This latter rendering is found only in Proverbs, with its speculative atmosphere, more prominent in the Greek Proverbs than in the Hebrew Proverbs, and in the latter part of Jeremiah, that is, that part of Jeremiah for which the second translator was responsible.²⁴ What is important here is that to the Hebrews "truth" is not anything abstract and theoretical, but something concrete that can be relied on, that can be trusted. Thus "truth" is the objective side of "faith"; that is, 'emeth-ἀλήθεια is the ground and basis of 'emūnāh-πίστις. In ²⁴ H. St. John Thackeray, The Septuagint and Jewish Worship (London: British Academy, 1921), pp. 116-17.

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

the Fourth Gospel, therefore, "truth" is not a true idea so much as a person to be relied on. When Jesus says that he is the way, the truth, and the life, he means that he is the way in which we must walk, he is the one on whom we must rely, and he is the means by which we live—all of it wholly practical and this-worldly; not "this-worldly" in the sense of being divorced and separate from what is "otherworldly," but "this-worldly" because God has broken into this world, in order that the kingdoms of this world might become the kingdom of our God and of his Christ. After all, that is indeed what the Bible is about.

XI. Selected Bibliography

- DODD, C. H. The Bible and the Greeks. London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1935.
- DRIVER, G. R. Problems of the Hebrew Verbal System. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1936.
- "The Modern Study of the Hebrew Language," in The People and the Book, ed. A. S. Peake. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1925. Pp. 73-120.
- ROWLEY, H. H. The Aramaic of the Old Testament. London: Oxford University Press, 1929.
- SNAITH, N. H. The Distinctive Ideas of the Old Testament. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1946.
- THOMAS, D. W. "The Language of the Old Testament," in Record and Revelation, ed. H. Wheeler Robinson. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1938. Pp. 374-402.

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

by WILLIAM F. ALBRIGHT

- I. The Sources of Our Knowledge
 - A. Archaeology
 - B. Philology
- II. The Geographical and Economic Background
 - A. The Ancient Near East
 - B. Palestine and Syria
 - C. Mesopotamia
 - D. Egypt
 - E. Anatolia, Armenia, and Iran
 - F. Arabia
- III. The Ethnic Background
 - A. Prehistoric Men
 - B. The Semites
 - C. The Hamites
 - D. Sumerians, Hurrians, Elamites and Hittites
 - E. The Indo-Europeans
- IV. The Beginnings of Sedentary Culture
 - A. The Neolithic Age
 - B. The Chalcolithic Age
 - 1. Mesopotamia
 - 2. Palestine
 - 3. Egypt
- V. The Empires of the Third Millennium
 - A. Mesopotamia
 - 1. The Classical Sumerian Period (ca. 2800-2360)
 - 2. The Sumero-Akkadian Period (ca. 2360-1960)
 - B. Egypt
 - 1. The Protodynastic and Early Dynastic Periods (ca. 2850-2600)
 - 2. The Pyramid Age (ca. 2600-2150)
 - 3. The First Intermediate Period (ca. 2150-1992)
 - C. Palestine
 - 1. The Early Bronze Age (ca. 3100-2100)
 - 2. The Precursors of the Canaanites
- VI. The Middle Bronze Age (ca. 2100-1550)
 - A. Mesopotamia
 - 1. The Rise of Ashur and Mari (ca. 1960-1700)
 - 2. The Amorite Infiltration (ca. 2000-1700)
 - 3. The Age of Hammurabi (1748-1675)
 - 4. Babylonian Science
 - B. Egypt
 - 1. The Twelfth Dynasty (1992-1779)
 - 2. The Age of the Hyksos (ca. 1720-1550)
 - C. Palestine and Syria
 - 1. The Egyptian Eclipse (1778-1720)
 - 2. The Asiatic Invasions (ca. 1720-1550)
- VII. The Late Bronze Age (ca. 1550-1200)
 - A. Asia Minor
 - 1. The First Hittite Empire (ca. 1600-1500)
 - 2. Hurrian Cultural Influence
 - B. Mesopotamia
 - 1. Mitanni (1500-1370)
 - 2. Hurrian Documents
 - C. Egypt
 - 1. The Theban Renaissance and the New Empire (ca. 1570-1370)
 - 2. The Religious Reform (ca. 1370)
 - 3. The Amarna Tablets
 - D. Palestine and Syria
 - 1. The Ras Shamra Texts
 - 2. The New Hittite Empire (ca. 1375-1200)
- VIII. The Early Iron Age (ca. 1200-900)
 - A. The Eclipse of the Empires
 - 1. The Inscription of Merneptah (ca. 1224-1216)
 - 2. The Peoples of the Sea (ca. 1175)
 - B. The Rise of New Powers
 - 1. The Phoenicians
 - 2. The Israelites
 - 3. The Aramaeans
- IX. The Middle Iron Age (ca. 900-600)
 - A. Egypt
 - B. Mesopotamia
 - 1. The Assyrian Renaissance (883-826)
 - 2. The Assyrian Expansion (825-745)
 - 3. The Assyrian Apogee (744-630)
 - 4. The Assyrian Decadence (630-612)
 - C. Palestine and Syria
- X. The Late Iron Age (ca. 600-331)
 - A. The Neo-Babylonian Empire (612-539)
 - B. The Persian Empire (539-331)
- XI. Selected Bibliography

If we examine Bible handbooks and histories written over a century ago, we shall find that their chief source of information with regard to the historical and cultural background of the Old Testament was the latter itself. A few scattered details about the kings of Egypt, Assyria, Babylonia, and Tyre, some miscellaneous information about the religions and customs of these countries, some parallels from Greek life and culture, a number of allusions to old-fashioned practices in modern Arab lands—and that was practically all. Yet a new day was beginning to dawn. When Gardner Wilkinson published his popular three-volume work, The Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians (1836), utilizing the publications of Jean Champollion and Ippolito Rosellini (which had just begun to appear in stately folios), a sensation was created, and scholars were occupied for the next generation trying to employ the new material in biblical research. Only seven years later the discoveries of Paul Botta and Austen Layard in the mounds of Assyria began to dim the luster of the Egyptian monuments, but they proved harder than the earlier Egyptian finds for scholars to digest. It was not until the 1870's that we find reasonably accurate information from both Egyptian and Mesopotamian antiquity appearing in the better informed biblical handbooks.

This is not the place to give a detailed survey of the progress achieved by archaeological research in Bible lands during the past three quarters of a century. It is enough to contrast the paucity of reliable publications of monuments and objects then available with the wealth of material now at the disposal of the biblical scholar who possesses the necessary command of modern languages. Egyptian and Akkadian (Semitic Babylonian) documents can now be read almost as accurately as Greek and Latin texts (where the uncertainty of the transmitted text compensates for occasional doubt as to the meaning of a word or passage in either of the former). The new languages which have been deciphered during the past generation, such as Hittite, can be read fairly well if there is enough inscriptional material available for scholars to study. Even the Ugaritic dialect of Canaanite, written in a previously unknown script, yielded its secrets rapidly after its initial discovery in 1929, and the still more obscure syllabic script of earlier Byblos seems to be on the verge of decipherment. The art of excavation has made such strides that it has become a true science of stratigraphy, yielding historical insights quite as valuable in their way as the material provided by ancient documents.

I. The Sources of Our Knowledge

A. Archaeology.—Scientific archaeology does not go back very far. No early excavator recognized the existence of true mounds, in which successive occupation and destruction had left superimposed layers of debris, which specialists call "strata," until Heinrich Schliemann began the excavation of Troy in 1870. Few even then took the gifted German amateur seriously, and it was not until 1890 that Flinders Petrie made the first soundings in the Palestinian mound of Tell el-Hesi, where he recognized clear stratification and determined the significance of pottery, whole or broken, for dating. Since that time archaeological stratigraphy has developed to a high level of excellence, closely paced by pottery chronology and historical architecture. Museum techniques have also progressed enormously, aided by the resources of modern science. We can accordingly speak of archaeology as a science in the same way that we can use the term "science" of structural geology or geomorphology. Used in this way the word "archaeology" does not ordinarily include the study of the written documents unearthed by the excavator. For the investigation of written remains we must turn to the philological disciplines.

B. Philology.—To decipher inscriptions requires knowledge and ingenuity, but to interpret their meaning in detail and to classify the results of interpretation in historically usable form require all the resources of modern linguistics and philology. Decipherment often demands guessing at meaning, but the time soon arrives when guessing becomes unscientific and when the investigator must employ the same rigorous procedure that any scientist must follow if his results are to be logically consistent. The grammar of any new language must be worked out by scrupulous analysis and classification of the observed phenomena of the language. In other words, the scholar must start with passages which make sense and must study spelling, forms, and inflections of words, and syntactical constructions. His results must then be tested in other clear passages by application of the experimental technique. After sufficient inductive collection of data, formulation of rules which satisfy the data, and experimental verification of these rules, the scholar may begin to apply his rules to the interpretation of more difficult passages. Eventually a complete system of grammar emerges, in which virtually all linguistic facts fit neatly into their places. Naturally documents from different periods and places may diverge linguistically from one another, so that the trained investigator must learn to distinguish between historical periods and dialects within a language. Since comparatively few archaeologists or biblical scholars possess the necessary linguistic and philological training, many of them hold impossible philological views. It must be remembered that in order to determine the meaning of a difficult or obscure word, all passages where this word occurs must be carefully examined, all possible ways of explaining it through comparison with similar words in other languages must be explored; nor may one assume strange phonetic or other changes unless one can show that such changes are normal in the period and language or dialect in question. Linguistic law is not adjusted to mathematical requirements like the laws of physics, nor is it promulgated by decree, like civil legislation; but it is quite as rigorous, unless its operation is suspended or canceled by the operation of another principle which cuts across it. The chief requirements of the interpreter of ancient inscriptions may be summed up as (a) accuracy in copying and transcribing; (b) methodical rigor in making or in using grammars and dictionaries, as well as in studying the pertinent work of all competent scholars; (c) willingness to go to any amount of trouble to obtain information bearing on any given problem. The results must make sense to specialists in the life of the ancient world before they can safely be adopted by scholars in other fields.

II. The Geographical and Economic Background

A. The Ancient Near East.—All the countries which play an important role in the Old Testament lie in several heterogeneous geographical areas clustered around the points where Asia, Africa, and Europe meet. The region in question is roughly comprised between 20° and 40° north latitude and between 25° and 50° east longitude; it includes all of Palestine, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Egypt, all but the extreme north of Asia Minor, most of Armenia, western Media, Elam, all Arabia except the extreme south and southeast, northern Nubia, eastern Libya, Cyprus, Crete, and the eastern islands of the Aegean. Around is a peripheral area including many lands, such as southern Ethiopia, South Arabia, and the land of the Scythians (southern Russia), which play some part in the Old Testament, but which are seldom in the center of the stage. In order to make the extent of this central region clear, we may compare it with one of exactly the same extent in eastern North America, between 20° and 40° north latitude, and between 75° and 100° west longitude; this region includes all the southeastern states south of the Mason and Dixon line, the southern halves of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, nearly all Missouri, nearly all Kansas, Oklahoma, eastern Texas, northeastern Mexico (with Mexico City), the Gulf of Mexico, Yucatan, Cuba, and most of the Bahamas. It is, in other words, far from being a restricted territory, even though Palestine itself, lying in the center, is no larger than Vermont.

B. Palestine and Syria.—Palestine and Syria form a continuous narrow strip over five hundred miles long between the Mediterranean and the desert. The dominant feature of their terrain is the great north-south cleft, dating from the Pliocene Age, which divides both countries into eastern and western halves. In southern Syria this cleft forms the deep and wide Baq'ah, which separates Mount Lebanon from the Anti-Lebanon range. In Palestine the same cleft is continued as the valley of the Jordan and the Dead Sea, the Hebrew Arabah and the Arab Ghor. Palestine and Syria provide typical examples of Mediterranean climate, lying as they do east of a wide stretch of sea between latitudes 30° and 35°. As in southern and central California, each year is divided into a dry season and a rainy season. In the winter the tilt of the earth draws Palestine into the zone characterized by rain-bearing westerly winds; in the summer the southward swing of the earth carries it out of this zone into one of dry west winds. In northern Phoenicia there are relatively heavy winter rains in normal years, but the amount of rainfall decreases steadily as one moves south, until it becomes insufficient in the area of Beer-sheba to permit more than one good crop of winter grain every three years. On the western slopes of the mountains there is ample rain, but on the eastern side, in the rain shadow, rainfall rapidly diminishes until it becomes negligible. The same cycle is resumed east of the great Pliocene cleft, and the clouds decrease their yield of rain progressively as we go eastward into the Syrian Desert. The failure of winter rain, especially in March or April, brings with it great distress, and low rainfall prolonged over several seasons entails inevitable famine. The people of Palestine and Syria are in fact so dependent on the seemingly capricious rainfall for existence that it is scarcely surprising that the great storm-god Baal (Hadad) was the head of the Canaanite pantheon.

Palestine and Syria are countries rich by nature, but this wealth was of such character that it was unevenly exploited and it often vanished entirely. Oil, wine, and honey were by far the stablest crops, since olive trees and vines grew almost everywhere and could strike root deep into the porous limestone soil of the hill country, while the luxuriant growth of wild flowers provided food for innumerable swarms of bees. Next in order of importance came herds of cattle, especially of sheep and goats, which remained close to perennial streams and springs during the summer months, but might be driven out to graze deep in the Southland (Negeb) and far out into the Syrian Desert in winter and spring. The third chief source of livelihood was winter grain, sown in the autumn and harvested in late spring or early summer. In ancient days barley was more important than wheat, while durah (emmer), now an important summer crop, was little grown. Today wheat is grown much more widely than barley. The fourth chief class of food products was composed of various fruits and vegetables, both of which were much more restricted in variety than today. Citrus fruits and bananas were unknown; peaches and apricots seem also to have been unknown. Figs, grapes, and almonds were staples, and the lack of many succulent modern fruits was partly compensated by extensive growing of very inferior apples and of sycamore figs (djummeiz), which had to be punctured while green (giving Amos a secondary occupation) in order to become really edible. Vegetables were also much less common than today; such staples as tomatoes and potatoes were wholly unknown. Onions and garlic, lentils and horse beans (ful), chick-peas, watermelons, vegetable marrows, and cucumbers were leading crops.

Only two important types of raw material were exported from Palestine and Syria in high antiquity: cedar, fir, and other coniferous wood from Lebanon, Casius, and Amanus; copper and some iron from Trans-Jordan and Syria. On the other hand, commerce flourished in most periods. To judge from our evidence regarding the diffusion of culture in the ancient Near East, Syria and Palestine began to have a fairly extensive carrying trade toward the end of the fourth millennium, when Egyptian art and craftsmanship show profound influence from the Euphrates Valley. The cedar trade between Lebanon and Egypt may be traced back by discoveries at Byblos to the beginning of the third millennium. Trade continued to grow apace through the third millennium, as demonstrated by finds scattered through all the lands of the Near East. In the early second millennium there was a great expansion of trade northward into the heart of Asia Minor, while the caravan trade through Palestine and Syria gained steadily in importance. In the early first millennium the Phoenicians developed a previously undreamed-of expansion of commerce throughout the Mediterranean and even beyond it. The entire Israelite and Aramaean hinterland was enriched by the by-products of this commercial activity. Eastward the Aramaeans became the heirs of the old caravan trade, which they developed to new levels of business enterprise.

C. Mesopotamia.—Mesopotamia is much greater in area than Palestine and Syria, but only a very small fraction of that area receives sufficient water from rainfall and irrigation to support human life. In northern Assyria there is enough rain to take care of winter crops in good seasons; elsewhere in Mesopotamia irrigation is absolutely necessary. The two great rivers, Euphrates and Tigris, together with their eastern tributaries, the Balikh and Khabur (Habur), the Upper and Lower 'Zab, 'Adheim and Diyala, were the only important sources of life in most of Mesopotamia. Hence distances between settlements were great, and narrow strips of irrigated terrain were separated by wide stretches of desert. Only in Babylonia, where the rivers ran nearly parallel (and for most of the distance much nearer together than today), from Eshnunna to Eridu, a distance of over two hundred miles in a straight line, was there an area of more than ten thousand square miles which could be irrigated almost throughout in successive years (not all, of course, simultaneously). Hence Babylonia probably supported more than half the entire population of Mesopotamia in the second millennium B.C. Some idea of the distance between points in greater Mesopotamia may be gained from the following figures: from Babylon to Nineveh was about 280 miles in a straight line and at least 350 by road; from Ur at the lower end of the Euphrates to Carchemish at the upper end there was a distance of some 625 miles in a straight line, but by road up the Euphrates the distance was nearer a thousand miles—which is, incidentally, practically the same distance as from Carchemish to Memphis, capital of Lower Egypt.

In Mesopotamia irrigation made it possible to grow enormous crops of grain and vegetables, while adjacent plains and hills supported great flocks of sheep and goats, as well as extensive herds of cattle. Wood, stone, and metals for construction and manufacture were almost wholly wanting, so the natives of the two river valleys were compelled to trade with their neighbors or to raid them periodically in order to obtain these necessary products. Since the nature of irrigation culture, especially in Babylonia, made the growth of organized states inevitable, empires arose. Wealth brought concentration of craftsmanship; the latter created suitable articles for foreign trade, which in its turn brought continuous pressure from the merchants for military control of trade routes and foreign customers. The cuneiform epic entitled "The King of Battle," composed not long after the fall of the Dynasty of Akkad (ca. twenty-third century B.C.), gives a vivid impression of the interaction between merchants and warriors in pressing for imperial expansion.

D. Egypt.—Egypt is a unique geographical phenomenon. The Nile flows north from the mountains of Abyssinia, where the equatorial rainfall and the melting of the winter snow might be expected to produce disastrous spring floods like those which are characteristic of Mesopotamia. However, the Nile flows through hundreds of miles of swamps in the southern Sudan, and the latter act as run-offs and catchment basins in a natural "Nile Valley Authority," which regularizes the Nile flood to an extent nowhere else paralleled. The damage caused by exceptionally high flood levels was so small compared to the increased irrigation which high Niles made possible that they were considered a great blessing. Low Niles were followed by widespread suffering and a succession of them meant a terrible famine, such as has occurred several times in Egypt's long history. The Nile not only brought fructifying water and fertilizing silt; it also provided an unequalled natural highway, since there were no rapids north of the first cataract near Elephantine. The even current of the Nile bears boats and rafts northward, while the regular etesian winds from the north make it possible to sail south with a minimum of rowing, even if at a slow rate of speed. On both sides of the narrow valley are broad stretches of desert, extending to the Red Sea on the east and as far as the Atlantic on the west. During the last three millennia B.C. these deserts were just as inhospitable to man as they are today. With the highway of the Nile connecting all parts of Egypt from Elephantine to Tanis, some five hundred miles by air and a good eight hundred by boat, it is not surprising that Egypt became an exceedingly homogeneous land. From one end of Egypt to the other there was little perceptible difference in race, language, or customs. The delta was of course more accessible to foreign influences, both because of the rich commerce to which its wealth gave rise, and because of land and sea roads which gave easy access to Palestine, Libya, and the islands of the Mediterranean.

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

Egypt's natural wealth was proverbial in the ancient world; the Mitannian King Tusratta wrote to the king of Egypt about 1380 B.C., remarking in connection with his repeated pleas for more gold, "In my brother's land gold is as abundant as dirt." When we realize that its irrigable extent has changed in the past century and a half from less than six thousand square miles to about fourteen thousand in 1950, it becomes easier to understand how productive the soil is. However, this productivity depended largely on the upkeep of dams and canals, the draining of marshes and the irrigation of the Fayyum; it must have varied surprisingly in different periods. In the last century and a half the population of Egypt has grown from not over two million to about eighteen million. H. E. Winlock in 1947 estimated the total population about 2000 B.C. as not over a million, and I should be inclined to estimate its size in the reign of Ramses III (early twelfth century B.C.) as about three million. These figures may seem small, but they average ten times the probable population of Palestine in the same periods. This ratio corresponds to the actual average relation between the populations of Egypt and Palestine in the past century and a half.

E. Anatolia, Armenia, and Iran.—Northwest, north, and east of the "Fertile Crescent," to use Breasted's famous expression describing Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine, lies a wide zone of mountain ranges separated from one another by valleys and plateaus. In this zone lies the peninsula of Anatolia, commonly called Asia Minor, northwest and north of Syria. East of it is Armenia, north of Mesopotamia. Southeast of Armenia and east of Mesopotamia lies Iran, or Persia. All three countries are mountainous and suffer more or less from inadequate rainfall, which makes irrigation necessary if they are to sustain strong organized states. In antiquity these lands were thinly peopled in most periods, but the hardy mountaineers who inhabited them were excellent fighters. Asia Minor was the seat of the Hittites, and it was always important because of its situation as a land bridge between Europe and southwestern Asia. The rich silver, lead, and tin mines of Anatolia attracted merchants and conquerors from Mesopotamia as early as the Dynasty of Akkad (ca. twenty-third century) if not before.

Armenia took little part in international affairs during the third and second millennia, owing doubtless to the inhospitable forests with which most of it was then covered, as well as to the wildness of its few inhabitants. How primitive its customs were in the middle of the second millennium we learn from Hittite sources, which mention polyandry and even cannibalism among them. In the early first millennium B.C. Armenia gained a dominant position, thanks to the energy of the people of Urartu (Ararat), whose kings nearly brought Assyria to its knees in the eighth century.

Iran was a large and rich country, with a sedentary culture quite as old as that of Asia Minor, though no great state is known to have arisen there before the emergence of the Median Empire in the seventh century B.C. At Iran's southwestern corner lay Elam, with its ancient capital at Susa (Shushan), but Elam was geographically so much more closely associated with Babylonia that it is somewhat misleading to speak of it as Iranian. At the same time, close ethnic and geographical ties bound the Elamites to their neighbors on the north, east, and south, so Elam was able to exercise a disproportionate cultural influence on the Iranians, even down into the Achaemenian Age (sixth to fourth centuries). Though little is known about early Iranian commerce, there can be no doubt that it went back to very ancient times, as attested by the wide diffusion of pottery and other artifacts. In the second half of the third millennium a rich irrigation culture sprang up to the east of Iran in the Indus Valley; it is shown by archaeological finds to have been roughly contemporaneous with the empire of Akkad (twenty-fourth to twenty-second centuries). Early in the second millennium this civilization was destroyed by an irruption of the Indo-Aryans (see below, p. 240), part of whom swept westward through Iran into Mesopotamia. From this time on Iran became partly Aryanized, and after the Iranian irruption at the end of the second millennium (see pp. 268-69), Iran became almost wholly Aryanized in language and culture.

F. Arabia.—South of the Fertile Crescent lies the peninsula of Arabia, which has from time immemorial been associated with the purest Semitic stock known to exist anywhere. From Palmyra in the northern part of the Syrian Desert to the coast of Hadhramaut (Hazar-maveth) is an air flight of over fifteen hundred miles, and it must have meant a good two thousand miles for a camel caravan. Most of Arabia is more or less complete desert, with broad stretches of sandy waste (Nefud); but the mountain valleys of Yemen (Sheba) and the Western Aden Protectorate are fertile, with relatively heavy rainfall. The valley of Hadhramaut is richly supplied with underground water, and there are numerous oases scattered through the Hedjaz in west-central Arabia and the Nedjd in east-central Arabia. In the north there are some large oases, such as Palmyra (Tadmor), Djof (Dumah), and Teima (Tema). Gold and copper were the most important mineral products of ancient Arabia, and in the first millennium B.C. the spices of South Arabia became a source of exceedingly lucrative caravan trade with the Fertile Crescent and the lands of the Mediterranean.

The critical point in the history of Arabia fell in the latter part of the second millennium B.C., when the camel, previously common in its wild state, became effectively domesticated for use in caravans. On account of this development it became possible for caravans to plunge out into the desert, relying on a new water supply every third or fourth day. The ass caravans which were the only means of desert transport in the early second millennium were dependent on obtaining water daily, or at most every other day. Camels, moreover, flourish on desert thorns and tamarisk twigs, while asses require grass or fodder. From about 1100 B.C. the use of camels increased steadily and rapidly, and by the eighth century spice caravans from South Arabia had become a characteristic feature of desert life.

III. The Ethnic Background

A. Prehistoric Men.—Great progress is now being made in the domain of prehistory, and the complex picture of prehistoric man is beginning to take definite form. The rapid succession of unexpected discoveries of fossil man in Palestine, in China, in Java, and in South Africa since 1925 led some of the more reckless spirits to construct a separate species for each new fossil type, until current handbooks swarmed with the names of distinct human species. However, more cautious counsels are now beginning to prevail, thanks to the entry into the debate of such first-class geneticists as Theodosius Dobzhansky and genetically competent paleontologists as G. G. Simpson, who insist on the absurdity of multiplying species of hominids. Since the early 1940's this crusade for moderation has been gaining ground rapidly among physical anthropologists. It is now quite generally recognized that many archaic (paleoanthropic) features of anatomy from extinct types of man survive in modern (neoanthropic) types. Skeletons of fossil man from the Middle Paleolithic discovered by Dorothy Garrod and Theodore McCown in Palestine show all sorts of anatomical variation from almost pure Neanderthaloid to a type with well-developed characteristics of Homo sapiens. Yet all these skeletons belong to a single restricted population. It thus appears more and more likely that all surviving types of man are races of Homo sapiens which developed their present peculiarities partly through intermixture with previously existing races or subspecies (Homo neanderthalensis, Homo soloensis, Sinanthropus, etc.) and partly through further local evolution. Such features as skin color, shape of the nose, etc., are largely the result of selective evolution, while such characteristics as height are simply the result of more favorable climatic and especially of better nutritional conditions.

All races of man known from the Old Testament belong to Homo sapiens; it is in the highest degree improbable that any other subspecies of man was still extant anywhere in the world—or had been for at least thirty thousand years. All known ancient races in the region which concerns us here belonged to the so-called "white" or "Caucasian" race, with the exception of the Cushites ("Ethiopians") who were strongly Negroid in type, as we know from many Egyptian paintings. The Near and Middle East has always been such a convenient cluster of bridges between the three continents of the Old World that pure races long since ceased to exist there. It is true that the Egyptians are proved by their skeletons to have developed a relatively standard type, which attained its present height during the fourth millennium B.C. and has ever since kept its anatomy, skin color, and average height with surprisingly little change. However, the Mesopotamians were of mixed long-headed (dolichocephalic) and broad-headed (brachycephalic) type as far back as the early third millennium. In Palestine we find prevailing dolichocephalism down to the second quarter of the second millennium; after that, brachycephalism gained the upper hand through the influx of peoples from the mountains skirting the Fertile Crescent. Language is not a criterion of race unless used with great caution and sustained by anatomical evidence from skeletons. Needless to say, the latter is seldom possible.

B. The Semites.—Scholars used to speculate about the possible origin of the peoples which historically spoke Semitic tongues (that is, languages closely related to Hebrew, Arabic, and Akkadian) in North Africa or somewhere in the regions north of the Fertile Crescent. More cautious students regarded Arabia as the cradle of the Semites, and some protagonists of this theory adopted the hypothesis that owing to periodic drying up, Arabia disgorged its hordes into the Fertile Crescent at regular intervals. However, archaeological evidence opposes this hypothesis of periodic desiccation in historical periods, so we may safely discard it. The facts are simple. In the third millennium B.C. we find the precursors of the later Semitic peoples living in North Arabia and the surrounding lands of the Fertile Crescent. At that time their languages were so closely related that we cannot speak of more than dialectical differences. The languages then spoken by Hamitic peoples (see below) were more closely related to one another than any of them were to Semitic. The difference between the earliest traceable Semitic and Hamitic is little greater than that existing between the oldest traceable Indo-European and Anatolian. The Hamitic peoples have occupied northern and northeastern Africa since not later than the fifth millennium B.C. Egyptian, while essentially Hamitic rather than Semitic, stands linguistically between the other Hamitic languages and Semitic, exactly where it should be if the peoples in question continued to occupy approximately their older homes. Moreover, the anatomical differences between the purest Egyptian and Cushitic (Bedja) types, on the one hand, and the purest Bedouin, on the other, are slight; both types show pronounced dolichocephaly, with delicate bony structure, as was first shown in detail by Felix von Luschan. It follows that the Semites had lived in North Arabia and the adjacent territories for thousands of years before the dawn of written history.

C. The Hamites.—The Hamites (named from Ham, son of Noah) include the Egyptians, the Libyans (Berbers), and the Cushitic tribes south of Egypt; in the third millennium B.C. they seem to have occupied all North Africa, extending farther south than they do today. Negro infiltration had not yet penetrated to any extent, it would appear, into Cush (Nubia). The Berbers were already as mixed a people as they are today; the Egyptians represented them consistently as blonds, presumably because of the high proportion of blonds among them. We have no way of knowing the source of this blond strain, but it can scarcely have been Indo-European at such a remote date. The Egyptians had probably occupied the Nile Valley for many thousands of years before they began to settle down and live in villages, as we may infer from the fact (see above) that they are linguistically intermediate between the Berbers and the Semites, and especially from the fact that men had the same reddish-brown color on the monuments of the Pyramid Age as they possess today, some 4,500 years later. Since this color is admirably adapted to the climate of the Nile Valley, it seems evident that they had acquired it through a long process of preadaptive selection. The one difference of consequence between the earliest Badarian village dwellers of Egypt and their descendants was in height; the former were almost pygmies, like the oldest known Semitic villagers of Byblos and Gezer, also from the fourth millennium B.C. Evidently the rapid development of agriculture in the Chalcolithic Age (see below, p. 241) was mainly responsible for the growth in height which then took place; nutritional factors have recently been found to be responsible for almost as striking changes in average stature in the United States.

D. Sumerians, Hurrians, Elamites, and Hittites.—In Old Testament times there were still many remnants, large and small, of old linguistic stocks which have since become extinct. The Semites, and especially the Indo-Europeans, were only beginning the vast expansion which has since overwhelmed so many other linguistic groups. First and most interesting among these extinct groups are the Sumerians, who created the civilization of Mesopotamia on which the Semitic Akkadians built an impressive superstructure. The Sumerian language does not resemble any known tongue, ancient or modern; its principal features were a tendency to agglutinate or to incorporate words and particles into a highly complex sentence structure and a tendency to phonetic breakdown which rivals that of Chinese. Thanks to the intensive research of Assyriologists, basing their work on the lexical and grammatical treatises of the Semitic Babylonians and the interlinear translations of Sumerian texts which they made, Sumerian is very well known today, though archaic Sumerian texts still offer much difficulty to the interpreter. The Sumerians were probably the bearers of the painted-pottery culture of the Mesopotamian Chalcolithic; it was certainly they who invented the cuneiform script and gave Sumero-Akkadian culture its characteristic features. Sumerian remained a sacred and learned language for many centuries after it ceased to be spoken, and it was still studied in Babylonian schools at the time of Christ.

Second in importance to Sumerian among these now-extinct groups were the Hurrians. The latter people, called "Horites" in the Bible, remained unknown to modern scholars until about 1919, though a specimen of their language had been published in 1889. Since 1925 new material in this language has turned up in many different places, and it is now certain that the Hurrians were the chief cultural intermediaries between the Babylonians on the one hand and the peoples of Asia Minor on the other. The Hurrian language was quite as complex structurally as the Sumerian, but paucity of documents in it makes its complete interpretation much more difficult. We owe to E. A. Speiser our best treatment of the language (1941). Its bearers certainly emerged from the mountains of Armenia and Kurdistan, and their dominant physical type was undoubtedly Armenoid (brachycephalic, with a tendency toward very large noses). Between the middle of the third millennium and the early first we find Hurrians in these regions, from which they pushed out at different times as far as the frontiers of Babylonia and Egypt. The Hurrian language was distantly related to Urartian and may be still more remotely akin to Georgian, though the evidence is tenuous.

The Elamites and Cossaeans (Kassites) flourished from very early times in the mountains and alluvial plains east of Babylonia. Elamite was simpler in structure than Sumerian or Hurrian; it has been plausibly connected with modern Brahui in Baluchistan, but the evidence is still inadequate. Our knowledge of Cossaeans is much slighter.

The progress of archaeological discovery is bringing other new and strange extinct languages into the light of history. Among them may be mentioned the original Hittite language, called "Hittite" by the Hittites themselves, though they spoke and wrote a different language, which we call also by the same name. This "Proto-Hattic" was in any case a prefixing tongue not in the least like any other known language of this part of the world.

E. The Indo-Europeans.—With the Indo-Europeans we enter the full light of history. This group includes linguistically all Teutons, Celts, Latins, Greeks, Slavs, Iranians, and Hindus who speak offshoots of Sanskrit. Since English, French, Spanish, German, Russian, and most tongues of India belong to the Indo-European family of languages, the latter is now dominant in four continents, as well as in two thirds of Asia and in the southern part of Africa. The close kinship existing between Indo-Iranian and the European languages was not discovered by modern scholars until the end of the eighteenth century and was not established until even later; it was, however, known to the author of Gen. 10, who makes the Indo-Iranian Medes and Scythians children of Japheth, along with the Greeks, Cimmerians, and others. The true Indo-Europeans first appeared in southwestern Asia in the seventeenth century B.C., about the same time as their first invasion of India; they formed a curious partnership with the Hurrians in Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine. The Iranians migrated south into Iran toward the end of the second millennium B.C.; to this movement belonged the ancestors of the Medes and Persians.

In 1915 Friedrich Hrozny proved that cuneiform Hittite was closely related to Indo-European; since then this has also been shown to be true of other recently deciphered Anatolian languages such as Luyyan or Luvian, Palaic, and the Hittite of the hieroglyphic inscriptions. It is increasingly probable that Lycian and Lydian, both known from inscriptions of the Persian period, were younger members of the same group, and the same has recently been shown to be probable of Armenian (which is still a living language). Scholars are divided about the degree of relationship between Indo-European proper and Anatolian; but the most plausible view is that of Emil Forrer and Edgar H. Sturtevant, who hold that the Anatolian tongues in question stem from a sister of Indo-European. The relationship between Hittite and Greek would then be something like that existing between Hebrew and Egyptian, but somewhat closer in detail. At all events, the ancestors of the Anatolian peoples were certainly settled in Asia Minor before the middle of the third millennium B.C., at a time when the ancestors of the later Indo-Europeans can scarcely have expanded beyond Eastern Europe.

IV. The Beginnings of Sedentary Culture

A. The Neolithic Age.—Nowhere in southwestern Asia or neighboring regions can we trace the beginnings of settled village life beyond the Neolithic Age into the preceding Mesolithic. It is true that the beginnings of agriculture may now be carried back into the Mesolithic (Natufian) of Palestine and Iran, but the Palestinians of that day lived in caves and probably in small clusters of huts, which were moved each year, if not oftener. The Neolithic of the Near East has not yet been clearly and indisputably demarcated: it was a period of culture in which artifacts with ground edges and massive stone construction of the type known as "megalithic" had come into use; it was characterized by prepottery and pottery phases, and to it belong the oldest village sites yet discovered. The clearest neolithic stratification comes from the sites of Jericho in Palestine and Mersin in Cilicia, both excavated by John Garstang between 1935 and 1947. At Jericho a characteristic neolithic pottery-bearing level (Stratum IX) covered three earlier strata (X-XII) with the same types of artifacts but without any pottery. At Mersin twelve successive chalcolithic strata covered at least two and probably many more neolithic levels. Similar neolithic deposits, usually much thinner and less defined, have been found at the bottom of a number of other mounds in northern Mesopotamia and Syria. Further west there are neolithic cultures at several points in northwestern Egypt, but lack of stratification makes it still difficult to establish a clear chronology of this phase of culture.

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

Thanks to very recent finds we are now sure about the neolithic date of the constructions and tombs of megalithic masonry which are sprinkled over southwestern Asia and which are particularly abundant in Trans-Jordan. The dolmens of Trans-Jordan belong in the main to the fifth millennium B.C. Supporting this date are two sets of facts: (a) the dolmens practically never contain any pottery, and where vases or shards appear in previously opened dolmens, they may belong to any age; (b) the burial places of Middle and Late Chalcolithic and Early Bronze are well known to us, and only the most primitive of them show any resemblance in mode of construction to the dolmens. In northern and western Europe megalithic construction was introduced later and did not die out until well along in the second millennium B.C., but its cultural horizon was still characteristically neolithic.

B. The Chalcolithic Age.—The following Chalcolithic Age represents one of the greatest forward steps in the history of civilization. Our dates are now fixed by radiocarbon (carbon isotope 14) counts of organic matter found by archaeologists. In the course of the fifth and fourth millenniums B.C. the men of western Asia and Egypt ceased to be mere food gatherers and became food producers. In the river valleys and lowland plains they began systematic irrigation of crops, while villages sprang up everywhere. Many of these villages were well constructed and surrounded with fortifications, as a result of which the characteristic tell profile (a low truncated cone) became common. In the Chalcolithic Age we find four principal cultural areas: (a) the Mesopotamian and Iranian painted-pottery horizon, which extended westward into northern Syria and Cilicia; (b) the Anatolian and Aegean horizon, which superficially resembled the Neolithic of Cilicia and Syria-Palestine; (c) the horizon of Palestine and southern Syria, best known through the excavation of Tuleilat Ghassul near Jericho; (d) the Egyptian horizon, which differs sharply from all the Asiatic cultures in detail.

As a result of sedentary life there was a rapid acceleration of the learning process; the experience of previous generations became cumulative as special crafts and guilds began to be formed. Knowledge of food plants spread rapidly through trade and acculturation. Irrigation made it possible to cultivate fruit and vegetables systematically, in addition to the grain crops which had been introduced in the Mesolithic and Neolithic Ages. Through intensive cultivation of many food plants it became possible to improve individual diet and to increase the population greatly; average height and weight grew rapidly. In higher cultural life there was an extraordinary amount of myth-making, as we know from the dominantly agricultural nature of the myths of the immediately following periods. The increasing complexity of life in the river valleys, where struggle for water rights and co-operation in building and maintaining irrigation works gave rise to organized states, was quickly followed by the development of highly differentiated societies and especially by the invention of writing. Higher culture developed along with this art.

1. Mesopotamia.—The Chalcolithic Age in Mesopotamia shows a greater flowering of civilization than anywhere else in that period. Because of intensive study of chalcolithic remains in this region since about 1930, the sequence of main cultural periods has been established stratigraphically. Following scanty remains of neolithic occupation with unpainted pottery, we find successively Hassunan, Samarran, Halafian, Obeidian, and Warkan cultures; the last of them brings us to the end of the fourth millennium. Occupation became relatively dense in the northern river valleys of Mesopotamia in the Halafian, about 4000 B.C. This phase of painted-pottery culture is characterized by extremely beautiful ware, often polychrome. There are so far no clear signs of village settlement in the Babylonian plain until the early fourth millennium. The building of towns in Babylonia may have begun somewhat earlier, but it took centuries to drain the swampy alluvium and create centers of urban life. Once men had mastered the Babylonian earth, its richness proved inviting to more and more tribes from the north and east. Population increased rapidly, and great urban centers were established at Ur, Erech, Eridu, and Nippur, around which were crystallized the most sacred traditions of Sumer. Between 3500 and 3000 B.C. we find great temples of mud brick being erected on raised platforms in order to keep them beyond the reach of the devastating inundations which periodically flooded the new settlements. In and around these temples have been found our oldest clay tablets, inscribed in Sumerian with pictographic characters whose forms suggest that the invention of writing was still recent. Art made rapid advances under the propitious conditions brought into being by the concentration of wealth. Babylonian culture was so superior to that of surrounding lands that it spread rapidly, characteristic elements of it being adopted by the Egyptians of the latest predynastic and protodynastic periods.

2. Palestine.—As indicated above, the Chalcolithic of Mesopotamia extended westward into northern Syria and Cilicia as far as the Mediterranean, separating the contemporary culture of Anatolia from that of southern Syria and Palestine. In Palestine our record is still incomplete, but we already recognize a series of chalcolithic cultures, notably Jericho VIII, Ghassul IV (the earlier Ghassul levels are still too inadequately known to warrant any dogmatism), and a series of later cultures down to the beginning of the Early Bronze about the thirty-first century B.C. Of these the Ghassulian is by far the best known and the most interesting; its remains have been found in numerous places scattered through the country. The Ghassulians flourished before the middle of the fourth millennium, and they represent a well-developed stage of Chalcolithic, far from its neolithic origins. Arrowheads were no longer made of stone, and axheads were even being made of true bronze, that is, of copper with tin alloy (or perhaps of copper ore with an admixture of tin). The Ghassulians were buried in cists made of small stone slabs, arranged like miniatures of the older megalithic dolmens. Remarkable fresco paintings were found on some house walls; they show astonishing capacity for artistic expression, both along naturalistic and geometrical lines.

3. Egypt.—The Chalcolithic of Egypt is chiefly known from a chain of predynastic cemeteries, with occasional village sites, lining the Nile all the way from Ma'adeh near Cairo to Upper Egypt. In 1902 Flinders Petrie arranged all the predynastic graves then known in a typological series to which he gave the name "sequence dating"; though bitterly attacked at the time, it has proved a reliable guide to relative chronology. Since 1924 older chalcolithic cultures have been discovered, but there are still more serious gaps in our documentation than there are in Mesopotamia. The oldest of the cultures hitherto found in the Nile Valley proper, south of the delta, is Tasian. Next comes Badarian, in some respects the best known of all these early cultures; it was already a thoroughly characteristic early chalcolithic assemblage. After we reach Petrie's sequence date "30" (ca. 3500 B.C.), we have a large number of cemeteries containing graves from two successive periods, Amratian and Gerzean. As we approach the First Dynasty we find a more and more complex culture, with rapid development of art hinting at a correspondingly rapid concentration of power, which reached its climax shortly before the First Dynasty (minimal date in the twenty-ninth century B.C.). Somewhere about the thirty-fourth century B.C. commerce sprang up with Asia, as is proved by the discovery of Palestinian pottery of Late Chalcolithic type, as well as by the growing popularity of motifs and objects of Mesopotamian origin. A vivid idea of simple town life at this time may be obtained from recent excavations of the Egyptian government at Ma'adeh, southeast of Cairo. From later traditions and myths it may be possible to reconstruct something of the political history of this age, but details will probably never be known.

V. The Empires of the Third Millennium

A. Mesopotamia. 1. The Classical Sumerian Period (ca. 2800-2360).—By the early part of the third millennium Babylonian civilization was already beginning to assume the characteristic Sumerian dress which it wore until the triumph of Sargon I of Akkad over his Sumerian enemies in the south. It is true that we can hardly as yet read the earliest tablets from the Jemdet Nasr Age, which followed the chalcolithic Warka period. Nor can we make much out of the earliest tablets from Ur, dating from Early Dynastic I, perhaps about 2800 B.C. But the Farah tablets, from about 2600, are intelligible in the main, and by the time of Ur-Nanshe of Lagash, about 2500 B.C., the inscriptions offer little difficulty. It was not until the twenty-fifth century that Sumerian script was developed to the point where verbal and nominal forms were as a rule spelled out phonetically. Practically all texts which we possess from this pre-Akkadian period are either royal inscriptions of stereotyped nature or administrative and economic documents. However, it is certain that most of the Sumerian literary and religious texts from the temple library at Nippur and other libraries of the early second millennium are copies of texts which were composed in the first three quarters of the third millennium and transmitted orally for some centuries before being put into writing.

The Sumerian literary texts bear witness to a remarkable flowering of higher culture around temples and scribal schools. We find a number of literary types well represented. Most interesting are the epic tales, based on legendary exploits of the early Sumerian heroes, included by later Sumerian historiographers among the kings of the first two postdiluvian dynasties at Kish and Ur. Among these heroes were a number who found places later in the Sumerian pantheon, such as Enmerkar, Lugalbanda, and Gilgamesh. There are many myths of the gods which, like the heroic epics, have been recovered in large part by the untiring efforts of S. N. Kramer. There are also hymns and lamentations, proverbs, and other didactic compositions. Only the future can provide more detailed information about the relative date of this rich new literature from a study of language and content, with the aid of occasional finds of literary fragments from earlier times. For the present we must be content to know that the already excavated Sumerian literature represents by far the largest early corpus of its kind in the world. Little that we possess in Egypt antedates the end of the third millennium, aside from the Pyramid Texts, which are almost entirely magical in content and provide no surrogate for the missing belles-lettres of the Egyptians, invaluable though they may be for the history of religion.

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

Some of the Sumerian mythological tablets from the third millennium, preserved in copies of the early second, parallel the early stories of Genesis. Thus we have accounts of creation preserved in bilingual Sumerian and Akkadian texts which probably go back to early times. However, none has yet turned up in the Sumerian tablets from the early second millennium. The so-called Dilmun Poem may refer to a kind of Sumerian Eden, but the text as a whole is very different from anything in Genesis. We possess a list of antediluvian kings dating in its present form about 2100 B.C., but going back earlier in its oldest parts; it runs:

When royalty descended from heaven, royalty was in Eridu. In Eridu Alulim (Alorus) was king, reigning 28,800 years. Alagar reigned 36,000 years. Two kings reigned 64,800 years.

Eridu I leave; its royalty was brought to Badtibira. In Badtibira Enmenluanna reigned 43,200 years; Emengalanna reigned 28,800 years; the god Dumuzi (Tammuz), a shepherd, reigned 36,000 years. Three kings reigned 108,000 years.

Badtibira I leave; its royalty was brought to Larak. In Larak Ensipazianna reigned 28,800 years. One king reigned 28,800 years.

Larak I leave; its royalty was brought to Sippar. In Sippar Enmenduranna became king and reigned 21,000 years. One king reigned 21,000 years.

Sippar I leave; its royalty was brought to Shuruppak. In Shuruppak Ubartutu became king and reigned 18,600 years. One king reigned for 18,600 years. These five cities, eight kings reigned there for 241,000 years. The flood then swept over.¹

¹ Ancient texts are quoted in the author's own translation. Editors.

Another early Sumerian list differs considerably in detail and gives us ten antediluvian kings with a total of 456,000 years of reign. Still later, in the third century B.C. Berosus quotes the list of kings in a slightly different form, but still with ten kings, who rule 432,000 years. The only resemblance between the Hebrew list and the Sumerian lists lies in the number of items (reigns in one case, generations in the other) and their extension from the Creation to the Flood; there are no similarities in detail. However, the resemblance in framework is so close that an ultimate relationship cannot be doubted.

A Sumerian account of the Flood, following a narrative of antediluvian times, is preserved in a Nippur tablet published by Arno Poebel. In the first part we find a reference to the creation of animals, the descent of royalty from heaven, and the same list of five antediluvian cities, in the same order as in the Nippur list of antediluvian kings. Unhappily the text is preserved in a mutilated form, so we have only a few details about the Flood preserved:

The flood. . . . The goddess Nintu [wept] like a . . . , the pure goddess Inanna mourned for its (sic) people; Enki consulted with himself, Anu, Enlil, Enki, and Ninhursag . . . the gods of heaven and earth. . . . Then Ziusudra (Xisuthrus, the flood hero), the king . . . built huge. . . . "Stand at my left side . . . I will say a word to thee . . . hearken to my instruction . . . a flood . . . to destroy the seed of mankind . . . is the decision, the command of the assembly of the gods, the word decreed by Anu and Enlil."

After a long break the tablet continues:

All the mighty winds attacked together. At the same time the flood swept. . . . After seven days and seven nights while the flood swept through the land and the huge ship was tossed by the winds on the great waters, Utu (the sun-god) . . . the huge ship. Ziusudra, the king, bowed down before Utu, while the king butchered an ox, sacrificed a sheep. . . . Life like that of a god they gave him, eternal life like a god they . . . him. Then Ziusudra, the king, . . . of the seed of mankind, in the land of . . . the land of Dilmun, at the place where the sun rises, they caused to dwell.

A number of the Sumerian compositions were later adapted to Akkadian listeners; the differences between them are very instructive. Among the best known of such poems or poetic cycles are a number of compositions celebrating the deeds of Gilgamesh; they appear to form an epic of considerable length, but we lack conclusive evidence with regard to their relation and sequence.

Sumerian religion was organized into a pantheon much earlier than was true of Egypt, presumably because the Babylonian plain was much more compact than the Nile Valley, making possible much more rapid intercommunication and discouraging local isolation. Nippur in central Babylonia, where the storm-god Enlil held his terrestrial court, became recognized at an early date as the cultic center of the whole country, to which votive offerings were brought from all parts of Babylonia. As high cosmic deities of the presedentary Sumerians became settled in local temples, they often received new appellations and thus tended to split up into different figures. But the opposite tendency then began to operate: originally distinct deities which shared functions and attributes were identified, and thus the total number of widely recognized divinities seems to have remained about the same through historical times. Other leading Sumerian deities were An (Akkadian Anu), "Heaven," the titular father of the gods, whose chief city was Erech (Warka); Enki (Ea), lord of the fertilizing flood waters, and hence god of the subterranean fresh-water ocean, whose chief seat was at Eridu; the mother-goddess Inanna or Innin; Nanna, the moon-god, whose terrestrial residence was at Ur; Utu, the sun-god, whose favored abodes were Larsa in the south and Sippar in the north. Many of the deities which rose to prominent positions in the Akkadian pantheon had been relatively insignificant in Sumerian times, though they bear Sumerian names: to this group belonged Sin, the moon-god; Nergal, lord of the underworld; Ninurta, god of war; and many more. In part the rise and fall of deities resulted from the vicissitudes of the cities where they received special honor; thus Nanna, the moon-god of Ur, became replaced by Sin, the Sumerian god of Harran in the north; Ningirsu of Lagash faded out with the disappearance of his city and was replaced by Ninurta; Enlil's figure gradually dissolved into that of Marduk, lord of the new capital at Babylon.

2. The Sumero-Akkadian Period (ca. 2360-1960).—While the Sumerians were certainly the authors of the earliest sedentary Mesopotamian civilization that we can trace, the Semitic Akkadians, who received their later name from the city of Akkad (Gen. 10:10), were present both as seminomads and as settled folk at an exceedingly early date. At Kish we find tradition recognizing kings with Semitic names immediately after the Flood; at Mari excavations have disclosed a Semitic dynasty which antedated the Sumerian dynasty of Ur-Nanshe at Lagash. Semitic loan words, like damgar, "merchant," were adopted by the Sumerians in very early times. Akkadian was reduced to writing, using Sumerian script, before the time of the oldest fully intelligible Sumerian texts which we possess. So we cannot be surprised to find the Akkadians displacing the Sumerians to such an extent, especially in northern Babylonia, that under the great Sargon of Akkad, in the twenty-fourth century B.C., Semitic dislodged Sumerian as the official language of royal inscriptions and business documents. The Dynasty of Akkad (ca. 2360-2180 B.C.) was probably larger than any of the ephemeral Sumerian empires which are vaguely reported by tradition; at its height it dominated the entire region of the Two Rivers, beyond which it extended northwest to control Syria and southeastern Asia Minor, east to control the Zagros region and Elam, and southeast to control the basin of the Persian Gulf. Trade was very active, extending, according to tradition, as far as central Asia Minor, and according to later copies of contemporary texts, as far as South Arabia. Recent finds of a fortified palace at Tell Ibraq and of archives of business documents at various points in northern Mesopotamia show that the administration of the Akkadian Empire must have been astonishingly well organized. Nineveh was a focal point of the empire in the north.

Less is now known about the art and literature of the Dynasty of Akkad than about its political and economic life. A few superbly executed monuments and small objects, including especially cylinder seals, prove that the art of the period was from our point of view immeasurably superior to that of the Sumerian centuries which immediately preceded it. We are just beginning to have some idea of the early Akkadian literature, thanks to stray finds. It would appear that there was an extensive religious literature in Old Akkadian, which was probably transmitted in the main through oral channels. Omen texts in Old Akkadian have been found at Mari, written in the script of the Third Dynasty of Ur. Characteristic grammatical peculiarities of Old Akkadian appear in archaizing prose and poetry of the First Dynasty of Babylon (see below), making it highly probable that the so-called Hymnal-Epic dialect goes back ultimately to the period of Akkad. For centuries thereafter the mighty power of Akkadian arms and civilization dominated the culture of the regions around Babylonia. The earliest heroes of Hurrian heroic saga, as transmitted to us by way of the Hittite libraries of Hattusa (Boğazköy), were kings of Akkad, not native warriors.

The naïve exuberance of this oldest preserved Semitic poetry may be illustrated by the following two quotations. The first represents the opening canto of the Hymn to the Lady of the

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

Gods (Beletilli), copied on tablets from the early second millennium B.C.:

The song of the Lady of the Gods I will sing—	O warriors, hearken!
O comrades, attend,
I sing of Mama, whose song
Is sweeter by far	Than honey and wine,
Sweeter than honey and wine,
Sweeter it is	Than grapes and figs,
Sweeter it is than the purest cream,
Sweeter it is	Than grapes and figs!

Secondly may be quoted two cantos of the epic poem of Agushaya, celebrating the prowess of Ishtar as goddess of battles. In its extant form it goes back only to the reign of Hammurabi, about 1700 B.C., but there can be no doubt that the content and form are centuries older:

Let me praise the Mighty one,	Most valiant of the gods,
The first-born of Nikkal,	Her might let me exalt!
Ishtar, the Mighty One,	Most valiant of the gods,
The first-born of Nikkal,	Her might let me recount!
.
Her feast is the clash	Of those who dance into battle—
Ere the kindled fire flares up,	They are turned to ashes!
Ishtar's feast is the clash	Of those who dance into battle—
Ere the kindled fire flares up,	They are reduced to ashes!

After four generations the Akkadian Empire fell into anarchy, and was soon overwhelmed by an irruption of the Qutu (Gutium) barbarians from the Zagros region, who are said in the dynastic lists to have dominated Babylonia for more than a century. Under their loose control the central administration broke up and was replaced by numerous local states, especially in the south, where a Sumerian renaissance began. The end of this period, about 2100 B.C., is brightly illuminated by the monuments and inscriptions of Gudea, viceroy (ensi) of Lagash, whose building operations and trading expeditions prove him to have been virtually autonomous. Shortly afterward the Qutu were defeated and driven out of Babylon by Utu-hegal, king of Erech, who claimed the distinction of "dragon-slayer" as token of his prowess. Then came Ur-Nammu, about 2070 B.C., who established a new organized empire with its capital at Ur. For over a century the Third Dynasty of Ur controlled most of the Mesopotamian Plain, apparently extending its control at different times well into the Zagros on the northeast and Syria on the northwest. Trade and commerce flourished exceedingly during this century, but almost all of our scores of thousands of tablets are in Sumerian; it was only in the north that the Semitic tradition of Akkad continued to show vitality. However, the return of Sumer to power was brief; Sumerian names became rapidly fewer and finally disappeared entirely, Semitic Akkadian becoming the common language of all Babylonians early in the second millennium.

B. Egypt. 1. The Protodynastic and Early Dynastic Periods (ca. 2850-2600).—Somewhere in the twenty-ninth century (following the minimal chronology) the kings of Upper Egypt invaded the north and founded the first lasting union of the two parts of Egypt. It is highly probable that they were not the first rulers of united Egypt, since the Cairo fragment of the Palermo Stone seems to contain some obscure names of earlier kings wearing the double crown of the north and south. In any case, there was a remarkable flowering of art and architecture under the kings of the First Dynasty, especially under the two first and most powerful, Menes and Athothis (probably Narmer, as pointed out by G. A. Reisner). The arms and trade of Egypt pushed out into Nubia and Asia. Representations of Asiatics appear for the first time on Egyptian monuments, and Syro-Palestinian pottery of typical Early Bronze II type is found in the royal tombs of Adydos. The cedar emporium at Byblos was founded (or greatly developed), and it is probable that much of the coastal plain of Palestine and Syria was under Egyptian control. Mining operations at Sinai were commemorated by the seventh king of the dynasty.

Practically nothing is known about the literature of this period. Though hieroglyphs were written in ink even before Menes, there are no inscriptions which contain more than names and titles and brief formulas. Words were still written ideographically, as a rule. In art there was also a strange archaism, which seemed un-Egyptian to Egyptologists when its monuments were first discovered half a century ago. It was not until near the end of the Thinite period, in the twenty-seventh century (minimal chronology), that we see in statues and reliefs a definite stereotyping of forms and proportions along the lines which afterward became standard through twenty-four centuries of Egyptian life.

The religion of protodynastic Egypt may be approximately reconstructed from the Pyramid Texts (see below) and a few other early religious texts, such as the so-called Monument of Memphite Theology, since much of their content goes back into this period and some of it must go back to predynastic times. From personal names and inscriptions, especially from the Palermo Stone, it is possible to recognize the substantial identity of the gods and practices of the Thinite period with those of the Pyramid Age. Recent discoveries have gone far to prove that a considerable proportion of the beliefs and practices of later times goes back with little change into the earliest dynastic age, if not earlier. Just as among the Sumerians, when the Egyptians settled down in the Chalcolithic Age, the chief gods of their older pantheon were distributed among the districts into which the Nile Valley was divided. But Egyptian religion was far more conservative than Sumerian, on account of the isolation of the country and the regularity of its natural phenomena, which discouraged change. We find that most of the local deities were represented in animal or in half-animal form, and that a number were identified with trees and plants, while a few seem to have been embodied in inanimate objects of fetish nature. However, it would be a gross exaggeration to regard these zoomorphic gods as nothing but deified animals, since there is not a single name of such a god which can certainly, or even probably, be explained as a word for the animal in question. This wholesale combination of gods with animals illustrates rather the prelogical association of animals with the invisible dynamic entities of primitive man's imagination. These dynamic beings were active and possessed definite characteristics, but they remained, in general, invisible. What was therefore more natural than that they should be selectively associated with the mysterious visible beings which moved about and brought so much benefit and loss to mankind? It is probable that the zoomorphism of Egyptian religion was an inheritance from the food-gathering times of the Paleolithic and Mesolithic, though it appears never to have been crystallized into any form of totemism, as happened among other primitive food gatherers in different parts of the world. Whenever we are able to learn something about a specific early Egyptian pantheon, as is particularly true of Heliopolis, the religious center of Lower Egypt, the fundamentally cosmic nature of its deities becomes clear. The head of the Heliopolitan pantheon was the sun-god Re, who was identified with an old cosmic god Atum. The latter is never represented in any but human form. Atum created the air-god Shu and the latter's twin sister Tefnut by masturbation, since he had no consort to impregnate. Shu and Tefnut were the parents of the next pair, Geb and Nut, "Earth" and "Heaven," whose names illustrate the mixture of primitive belief and secondary speculation which created the framework of ancient mythology. To these five cosmic deities were added four more, all regarded as children of Geb and Nut: the famous deities Osiris and his sister-wife Isis, Seth and his sister-wife Nephthys. The falcon-god Horus of Behdet (Damanhur), ancient sacred center of Lower Egypt, and the enigmatic Seth of Ombos in Upper Egypt became sworn foes, probably on both mythological and political grounds. But Horus was by no means restricted to Lower Egypt, since his cult was also popular in the south, while Seth became later closely associated with the history of a north Egyptian shrine at Tanis in the northeastern delta.

2. The Pyramid Age (ca. 2600-2150).—The protodynastic Thinite period was followed by a long period of Memphite ascendancy, during which Memphis, just south of Cairo, was the chief seat of royalty. This period, which included the Third, Fourth, Fifth, and Sixth Dynasties (minimal chronology: about 2600-2150), is known as the Pyramid Age. It was ushered in by the reign of Djoser, whose remarkable stone constructions at Sakkarah, probably designed by his chief minister, the famous Im-hotep, reflect a very early stage of building in hewn stone. The following Fourth Dynasty lasted little over a century, but its chief members, Snefru, Cheops, Chephren, and Mycerinus, must be counted among the greatest kings of Egypt. Under them Egypt became a centralized absolutism, where everything was in theory owned and directed by the king. During the civil wars of the Thinite period the old local nobility had been practically annihilated, and their properties had been distributed among the friends and relatives of the king. Hence the high officials of the Fourth Dynasty appear as parvenus, owing little to their ancestors but everything to the king. Even though this situation may have been in part administrative fiction, the fact remains that the entire country was in the hands of a bureaucratically organized body of royal pensioners. The power and wealth of the state were concentrated on the construction of the royal pyramid, which was so planned that it could be finished quickly at the death of the king. The four mighty pyramids, which represent the tombs of the four greatest kings of this dynasty, give us a stupendous proof that belief in the incarnation of the sun-god in the person of the king was a living force in the Egypt of the day. Though the state was exhausted by the effort and the Fourth Dynasty was replaced by a line of humble origin, the concentration of forces on a task without utilitarian function may yet have contributed to the future unity and cultural momentum of the country.

The Fifth Dynasty shifted the focus of its interest somewhat to the south, and the reaction against the abuse of royal power led on the one hand to the substitution of temples of the sun-god for the great pyramids, and on the other to the breakup of the centralized bureaucracy, whose chief members became local nomarchs, each relatively autonomous within the limits of his district. In the Sixth Dynasty the feudal system grew in strength until the king became a mere figurehead.

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

To the late Fifth and the Sixth Dynasty belong the inscriptions carved on the walls of the pyramid chambers and corridors—the Pyramid Texts. Though their contents were copied from earlier sources which may have been handed down orally in some cases for nearly a thousand years, they bear witness to religious beliefs which were still current in the twenty-fourth and twenty-third centuries. Consisting largely of magical spells and incantations, with hymns and occasional myths interspersed, they were intended to insure the union of the king after death with the sun-god whom he embodied on earth. By a fusion with another chain of belief, it was thought that the king became Osiris as well as Re. However, these beliefs were in part already anachronistic; in the next phase of Egyptian history nobles were to partake in the hope of union with the god after death, and in the New Empire any commoner who could afford the price of a proper burial might expect the same reward.

The following selections from the Pyramid Texts well illustrate their primitiveness and their naïve belief in the union of Pharaoh with the sun-god Re or the Nile-god Osiris after death; the prelogical flavor of these dynamistic spells is evident:

An ascent to heaven is built for him (the reigning Pharaoh), in order that he may climb up it to heaven. He climbs up on the smoke of the great incense. He flies as a bird and alights as a beetle on an empty seat in the bark of Re. . . . He rows in heaven in thy bark, O Re; he punts in thy bark, O Re! When thou dost rise from the horizon, O Re, it is he who is the pilot of thy bark, with his staff in his hand!

He who flies, flies! He flies away from you, O men; he is no longer on earth, he is in heaven. Thou who art his personal god, his genius is with thee (?). He has soared to heaven as a heron, he has kissed heaven as a falcon, he has leaped to heaven like a locust.

3. The First Intermediate Period (ca. 2150-1992).—About 2150 PhioPs II died after a reign of more than ninety years. Egypt then broke up into several small states, and at least three lines of rulers claimed the double crown. The Memphite claim was carried on by the Heracleopolites, who were after a long civil war crushed by the princes of Thebes. Toward the end of the twenty-first century Egypt became reunited under Mentuhotep II. This obscure age (ca. 2150-1992) is called the first Intermediate period.

C. Palestine. I. The Early Bronze Age (ca. 3100-2100).—From the thirty-first to the twenty-first century the archaeological history of Palestine has been conveniently divided by G. Ernest Wright into four phases: Early Bronze I (ca. 3100-2900), Early Bronze II (ca. 2900-2600), Early Bronze III (ca. 2600-2300), and Early Bronze IV (ca. 2300-2100). These dates are all based on our minimal chronology for Egypt, since archaeological synchronisms between the two countries are numerous and are increasing steadily in number. Thus Early Bronze I must be synchronized with the latest Predynastic Age; Early Bronze II was contemporary with the First Egyptian Dynasty; Early Bronze III was coeval with the Pyramid Age, especially the Third to Fifth Dynasties; Early Bronze IV was parallel with the Sixth Dynasty and the First Intermediate. The excavations at Megiddo and Bethshean, Jericho, Khirbet Kerak (Beth Yerah on the Sea of Galilee), and Tell el-Far'ah, northeast of Nablus, have established the stratigraphic succession of periods.

Palestine was far from being a primitive land in the Early Bronze Age; on the contrary, it was dotted with flourishing towns, especially in the river valleys and coastal plains but also in the hill country. The population must have been very small, scarcely over a hundred thousand at any time in the third millennium. It must be remembered that the number of towns which coexisted in any one period was small. A number of Early Bronze temples have now been excavated in whole or in part; the most remarkable group is formed by the sanctuaries of Ai and Megiddo, from Early Bronze I and II. A most extraordinary rectangular structure with circular pits has lately been discovered at Khirbet Kerak, dating from Early Bronze III; Benjamin Maisler plausibly conjectures that it represents an early public granary of a class known to have been in use among the Canaanites. Egyptian influence appears in constructions from Early Bronze III at Taanach and in a quantity of imported Egyptian alabaster bowls found in a shrine of about the twenty-sixth century at Ai.

2. The Precursors of the Canaanites.—There can be no doubt that the Palestinians of the third millennium were Semites, presumably the linguistic precursors of the later Canaanites. This is proved by Canaanite loan words in Egyptian from the Second Dynasty on, by Egyptian mention of Canaanite place names, by the fact that all extant names of places known to have been occupied during this period are certainly or probably Semitic, and by the fact that the prevailing physical type of this age is shown by skeletal evidence to have been dolichocephalic. We may accordingly feel sure that their religion was of much the same type as the Canaanite religion of the following millennium (see below).

VI. The Middle Bronze Age (ca. 2100-1550)

A. Mesopotamia. 1. The Rise of Ashur and Mari (ca. 1960-1700).—At the beginning of the second millennium in Mesopotamia we find Babylonia divided between a number of petty states, one of which laid claim with some success to the kingship over Sumer and Akkad. The Third Dynasty of Ur had come to an end about 1960 B.C., when the Elamites destroyed the capital and took its last king, Ibbi-Sin, into captivity. Isin and Larsa, which had previously revolted, disputed the succession; other independent city-states were set up at Eshnunna in the extreme northeast of Babylonia and elsewhere. The nomadic Westerners (Amorites) swarmed into the country and were soon in control of the entire land (see below).

The political chaos into which Babylonia fell is reflected in the extraordinary decrease in the number of economic texts when compared to the century ending about 1960. On the other hand, there appears to have been much quiet scholarly activity on the part of the scribes of Nippur and elsewhere, who kept on copying Sumerian tablets and developing new sciences and pseudosciences. We may recall that literature flourished under the rump state at Herculopolis, and may assume that much the same activity went on at Nippur under the protection of the kings of the rump state of Isin.

The weakness of Babylonia made it possible for former dependencies of Ur to break away and form new states in the north. Notable among these new states were Ashur on the Tigris and Mari on the Euphrates. For some unknown reason the princes of Ashur in this period did not claim the title "king," but called themselves simply "viceroy" (ishakkum) or "priest" (shangum). However, the same is attested of the Middle Assyrian kings who certainly held the title, and the Khorsabad List calls all of these rulers "king." It also designates the initial group of seventeen rulers, some of whom bore Northwest-Semitic names, as "tent dwellers": they were Semitic nomads. This group is followed by a line of ten kings, most of whom had characteristically Northwest-Semitic names. Then about 2000 B.C. came six with Akkadian or Hurrian names, last of whom was Ilushuma (about 1900 B.C.), who invaded Babylonia. During the next six reigns (ca. 1874-1748 B.C.) there was a tremendous expansion of Assyrian trade westward into Asia Minor, as we know from thousands of "Cappadocian Tablets," that is, Old Assyrian economic texts and letters excavated in various towns of Cappadocia. Most of these documents, which have been studied particularly by Julius Lewy, date from the end of the nineteenth and the beginning of the eighteenth century, about 1800 B.C. in round numbers. These tablets have already thrown a flood of light on the life of the early Patriarchal Age; and as work on them continues, they are likely to become of increasing importance, since they are about a century older than the Mari tablets (see below) and in general antedate the Amorite infiltration into northeastern Mesopotamia. The Assyrians entered Asia Minor and established trading posts outside the principal capitals by treaty with the native Anatolian princes, several of whom also appear in their own inscriptions copied by later Hittite scribes at Hattusa (Boğazköy). We have in these documents the oldest examples known so far of the commercial empires of later times, which formed a kind of symbiosis with surrounding states; none of the latter sacrificed any political power by encouraging reciprocally profitable trade through foreign channels.

2. The Amorite Infiltration (ca. 2000-1700).—For centuries after the Akkadians had settled down in Mesopotamia, their seminomadic successors continued to maintain a nomadic existence on the edges of the cultivated regions of the Fertile Crescent. In those days, before camels had been effectively domesticated, nomads had to keep much closer to a permanent water supply than their Bedouin successors. In a Sumerian hymn to the storm-god of the west, originally composed somewhere in the third quarter of the third millennium, we are told that the nomads were wild marauders who spent their time in fighting, ate raw food, did not live in houses, did not bury their dead, and so forth. Disregarding the exaggeration of their savagery by the civilized Sumerian, we may see in this a reflection of a state of society roughly intermediate between the modern Bedja and similar Hamitic groups in the eastern desert of the Sudan, on the one hand, and the modern sheep-raising seminomads of the Upper Euphrates Valley, on the other. The Akkadians, following Sumerian usage, called them "Westerners" (Amurru, whence "Amorite"). Periodically the Amorites gathered in larger hordes and raided the sown land; their pressure became so serious in the reign of Shu-Sin of Ur, early in the twentieth century, that the latter built a line of fortifications to which he gave the name "Western Wall Which Keeps the Didnu [read Di-id-ni-im] Far Away." These nomadic Didnu or Didanu (the word is identified with Amurru by contemporary Babylonian lexicographers) had presumably migrated nearly six hundred miles from the region of the great oasis of el-'Ula in southern Midian, which was still called Dedan by the Israelites and South Arabians over a millennium later.

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

After the downfall of the Third Dynasty of Ur there was no longer any serious obstacle to Amorite immigration, and the infiltration of preceding generations became a flood. It is significant that an end also came to the relatively dense sedentary culture of southern and central Trans-Jordan in the course of the same twentieth century. Semitic nomads moved on beyond the barrier of the Tigris into the semiarid regions east and northeast of Babylonia, which became Amorite country, just as the same regions were later to fall to the seminomadic Aramaean tribes of the Assyrian Empire. By the middle of the eighteenth century Amorite dynasties were enthroned in large and small states all over Mesopotamia and Syria; among the most important of them were Larsa and Babylon (1930—), Mari on the Middle Euphrates (ca. 1950—), Yamkhad (Aleppo), Qatna (el-Mishrifeh), Ashur (1748—). Among the minor Amorite states were Abram's home at Harran (Haran) and Apum (the region of Damascus, later Opa).

Our knowledge of the Northwest-Semitic nomads, called "Amorites" by the Babylonians, was exceedingly tenuous until the discovery in 1935-36 of some twenty thousand tablets from the second half of the eighteenth century B.C. These documents were excavated at Tell el-Hariri (ancient Mari) on the Middle Euphrates by André Parrot; many hundreds of them have been published or described since then by Georges Dossin and others. Several thousand of them are letters which formed the official correspondence of successive princes of Mari, mostly of Zimri-Lim, older contemporary of Hammurabi. Since Mari lay in the geographical center of Amorite land and kept up close relations with the surrounding Amorite states, the tablets give us a comprehensive picture of conditions at the time. When all these priceless records have been published and digested it will be possible to have a clear idea of Amorite institutions and customs, which include many items of extraordinary interest such as the custom of sacrificing an ass to solemnize a pact, or the practice of rapid communication by means of fire signals. The natives of Mari, though their scribes wrote Akkadian, were themselves by this time almost solidly Northwestern Semites, as shown by innumerable names of "Amorite" type and by Northwest-Semitic words, expressions, and grammatical peculiarities which swarm in the letters. The ethnic and cultural background is very definitely that of the Hebrew patriarchs, a number of whose names recur in the new texts. The religion of the Amorites now appears to have been a mixture of Mesopotamian and Northwest-Semitic elements; among the deities of Mari were Dagan (Dagon), Rasap (Resheph), the water-god Id (the 'ēdh of Gen. 2:6).

The following letters from Mari illustrate the close relationship existing between the life and culture reflected in them and the early traditions of Israel, especially from the Patriarchal Age. In the first we learn that the southern tribes of the Mari region were called "Benjamin" (Banu Yamin, literally, "Children of the Right Hand=South"; their opposite numbers were the Banu Sim'al, "Children of the Left Hand=North"). We also learn that the use of telegraphic fire signals was highly developed in that day. Of course there are many other letters which further illustrate these points.

To my lord say: Thus Bannum, thy servant. I departed yesterday from Mari and spent the night at Zuruban. All the Benjaminites raised fire signals. From Samanum to Ilum-Muluk (a name meaning literally, "Moloch Is God"), from Ilum-Muluk to Mishlan, all the towns of the Benjaminites in the district of Terqa raised fire signals in reply, but so far I have not determined the meaning of those signals. Now I shall ascertain their meaning, and I shall write to my lord [telling him] whether it is thus or not. Let the garrison of the city of Mari be strengthened and let my lord not go outside the gate.

Another letter throws light on the ecstatic seers of that time and their oracles, delivered presumably while they were in a trancelike state.

To my lord say: Thus Kibri-Dagan thy servant. The gods Dagan (biblical Dagon) and Ikrub-El are well; the city Terqa and the district are well. Further, on the very day in which I send this tablet of mine to my lord, the ecstatic seer (mukhhum) of the god Dagan has come to me and has spoken to me as follows, "The god has commanded me, 'Write at once to the king in order that they may present funerary meals to the shade of Yakhdun-Lim (the deceased king of Mari, father of the reigning king, Zimri-Lim).'" This is what that ecstatic seer has said, and I write it to my lord in order that my lord may do what seems good to him!

In another letter we read:

And when the Benjaminites were at war with my lord, my lord wrote you asking you to furnish troops, but ye did not furnish troops to my lord. At the command of the gods Dagan and Itur-Mer my lord slew the chief (dawidum=Hebrew dāwidh, "David") of his foes and turned their towns into mounds and ruin heaps.

Other letters often mention the 'Apiru, who were perhaps the Hebrew relatives of the patri-archs, then living in the region of Harran. One of the Hebrew towns mentioned in Genesis (24:10), "the city of Nahor," appears frequently as Nakhur in the Mari tablets; it seems to have been located in the Balikh Valley, south of Harran.

3. The Age of Hammurabi (1748-1675).—The Age of Hammurabi may be conveniently defined as the period which began with the accession of Shamshi-Adad I, the Amorite conqueror of Assyria, about 1748 B.C., and which ended with the partial break-up of the Babylonian Empire in the reign of Samsu-iluna, about 1675 B.C. The great wealth of Babylonia and the vigor of its inhabitants, who had received a fresh transfusion of blood from the Amorite settlers, made it the leading center of civilization in the world of that day. Thanks to many thousands of published letters and economic texts, we possess a very clear picture of the life of the time. Of the greatest possible interest is the famous Code of Hammurabi, discovered at Susa, the capital of Elam, in 1901. This priceless document, now in the Louvre, dates from the closing years of Hammurabi's reign (1728-1686 B.C.). It was not the first code of laws promulgated in Babylonia; in 1947 Francis R. Steele announced his discovery of a Sumerian law code from the Nippur Library, dated in the reign of Lipit-Ishtar of Isin, about 1885 B.C., nearly two centuries before the Code of Hammurabi; in 1948 Albrecht Goetze discovered a law code in Akkadian from the city of Eshnunna, also dating about two centuries before Hammurabi. Moreover, it reflects the established tradition of Akkadian law, not the customary law of the Amorites, as has sometimes been inferred from the fact that the country was then ruled by an Amorite dynasty. All three Babylonian codes already exhibit the same formulation and some of the same provisions as we find in the Hittite, Assyrian, and Israelite laws—especially the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 21–23)—all of which were compiled in their extant form centuries later.

The contents of these earliest Mesopotamian codes are of very great comparative value. Thus the Eshnunna Code contains exactly the same law which we find in Exod. 21:35: "If an ox gores an ox and causes its death, both the owners of the oxen shall divide the price of the live ox and also the equivalent of the dead ox." Among other interesting provisions is the following: "If a dog is mad and the authorities have informed its owner, but he does not cage it; if it then bites a man and causes his death, the owner of the dog shall pay two thirds of a mina [forty shekels] of silver." Still another law runs: "If a wall is about to fall and the authorities have informed its owner, but he does not consolidate his wall; if it then collapses and causes the death of a free man, it is a capital offense and comes under the jurisdiction of the king."

The Code of Hammurabi is directly descended from the stream of legal decision and practice which produced the Code of Lipit-Ishtar, but it is very much fuller and more systematic; it was copied down into Neo-Babylonian times and seems, in fact, to have played something of the role in later Babylonian history that the Code of Justinian did in Byzantine jurisprudence. Antedating the Book of the Covenant (Exod. 21–23) by several centuries, it may be taken as the best extant representative of the class of customary and codified law from which the Israelite code arose. The following provisions illustrate both the cultural level and the stern justice of the time:

If a physician performs an operation on a freeman with a bronze knife and saves the freeman's life, or if he removes a cataract from a freeman and saves the freeman's eye, he shall receive ten shekels of silver.

If it is a plebeian, he shall receive five shekels.

If it is a freeman's slave, the owner of the slave shall pay two shekels of silver to the physician.

If a physician performs an operation on a freeman with a bronze knife and causes the freeman's death, or if he removes a cataract from a freeman and destroys the freeman's eye, they shall cut off his hand.

If a physician performs an operation on the slave of a freeman (!) with a bronze knife and causes his death, he shall replace slave for slave.

If he removes a cataract with a bronze knife and destroys his eye, he shall pay one half his value in silver.

If a physician sets a freeman's broken bone or cures an injured ligament, the patient shall pay the physician five shekels of silver.

If it is a plebeian, he shall pay three shekels of silver.

If it is a freeman's slave, the owner of the slave shall pay the physician two shekels of silver.

If a veterinarian performs an operation on an ox or an ass and saves its life, the owner of the ox or ass shall pay the surgeon one sixth of a shekel of silver as his fee.

If he performs an operation on an ox or an ass and causes its death, he shall give to the owner of the ox or ass one fourth its value.

A more complex law of a type impossible in Mosaic law, where sorcery was not recognized legally, appears in the following:

If a freeman brings a charge of sorcery against a freeman but does not prove it, the one against whom the charge of sorcery is brought shall go to the river-god (for the ordeal); he shall throw himself into the river, and if the river overcomes him, his accuser shall take over his property. If the river shows that freeman to be innocent and he has accordingly emerged unharmed, the one who brought the charge of sorcery against him shall be put to death, while the one who threw himself into the river shall take the property of his accuser.

4. Babylonian Science.—To this general age belong the principal achievements of the Babylonian mind which have come down to us, including especially intellectual triumphs in the fields of mathematics, astronomy, and philology. In arithmetic and algebra the Babylonians developed a place value notation based on the sexagesimal numeration of the Sumerians. This notation, which recognized the existence of zero, was just as superior to the cumbersome Egyptian hieratic system of numbering as the Hindu-Arabic system was superior to the Greek and Roman methods of numbering. Thanks to their control of such a powerful tool, the early Babylonians were able to develop algebra to a level never quite reached by the Greeks. Tablets from the First Dynasty of Babylon, discovered by Otto Neugebauer, preserve elaborate tables of multiplication, division, reciprocal numbers, squares and square roots, cube roots, and even a kind of simple logarithms. With their place value notation, fractions offered no insuperable difficulties, and the solution of complex quadratic equations by the method of false position became relatively easy. Of course all these complex calculations were carried out without benefit of formal logic, and mathematicians had to follow the time-honored empirical way: trial and error, analogy, and systematic tabulation of all the details which had been learned.

The love of the Babylonian scholars of the early centuries of the second millennium for systematizing their learning led to an enormous amount of tabulated and classified knowledge. To be sure, much of the knowledge which was then put into great canonical tablet series was scarcely useful from our point of view, since it dealt largely with magic and divination, especially with omens of all kinds. However, this incredible industry in collecting knowledge led to very remarkable achievements in the field of philology. Owing to their familiarity with ideograms which no longer had any similarity whatever in form to the objects or ideas portrayed, and which possessed many equivalents in two languages, the Babylonian scholars of this age acquired a familiarity with abstract thinking which stood them in good stead throughout their intellectual activity and which contrasts strikingly with the comparative absence of abstract thinking in ancient Egypt. Thanks to their command of two languages of entirely different structure, they early acquired a surprising grasp of grammatical problems, impressively illustrated in the numerous grammatical texts of the period, designed for students of both Sumerian and Akkadian. Nothing quite like it is known in the extant remains of the Alexandrian grammarians, and it was not until the medieval Arabic and Hebrew grammarians that the achievements of these Babylonian forerunners were surpassed. Moreover, they prepared exhaustive lists of cuneiform signs and their values, and elaborate dictionaries of words and their meanings, again unsurpassed in some respects before Byzantine times. For another millennium and a half these collections of philological material remained authoritative in Mesopotamia; they were copied by the Assyrian scholars of Nineveh and by the Aramaean cuneiformists of Erech in the Seleucid Age. Because of them modern Assyriologists have acquired a far deeper and more exact knowledge of Akkadian and Sumerian than Egyptologists have of Egyptian. From mathematics and philology Babylonian scholars turned to astronomy and religion, both of which were elaborately catalogued and recorded for the benefit of subsequent generations.

In literature also the First Dynasty of Babylon reached heights unsurpassed in most respects during the following fifteen hundred years of cuneiform writing. Best known are the great epics: the Epic of Creation and the Gilgamesh Epic. The former dates from the seventeenth century B.C. in approximately its extant form (found in Late Assyrian and Neo-Babylonian copies), but the framework which it employs and much of the content are Sumerian. There is no direct connection with the creation narratives of Genesis, but the story in Gen. 1 may preserve a reminiscence of the seven tablets of the Babylonian epic in its arrangement in seven days of creation. Both the stories in Gen. 1-2 preserve the characteristic Sumerian framework, "when . . . then." Enuma elish ("When Above," the Babylonian title of the poem, from its first two words) begins as follows:

When on high heaven had not been called by name,
The earth below a name had not received—
The primordial Nether Waters being their begetter,
The sovereign Sea she who bore them all,
While their waters were mingled together,
Not [yet] matted into reed lands, not appearing as reed marshes,
When no gods at all had come into existence,
Not [yet] called by name, not [yet] with their destinies fixed—
Then it was that the gods were created within them,
Lahmu and Lahamu came into being, they were called by name.
While they grew up and became big,
Anshar and Kishar were created, surpassing the others.
They prolonged the days, added the years;
Anu was the heir, rivaling his parents.
To Anshar did Anu make his first-born equal;
Anu begot in his image Nudimmud (Ea).

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

From this highly polytheistic version of the Creation we turn to the account near the end of the Creation Epic of the creation of man:

When Marduk heard the word of the gods,
His heart guided him to devise a cunning scheme.
Opening his mouth he addressed Ea,
Imparting the plan he had fashioned in his heart,
"Blood I will clot and make bones.
I will bring into existence humankind; 'man' shall be its name;
Verily humankind I will create.
It shall be charged with the service of the gods, that they may rest!
The ways of the gods I will cunningly change;
All shall be worshiped, but into two [classes] shall they be divided."

Ea answered him, speaking to him,
Telling him a plan for the relief of the gods,
"Let just one of their brethren be handed over;
He alone shall perish that mankind may be made!"

Ea goes on to suggest that the rebel Kingu, who was responsible for the revolt of the dragon
Tiamat, be bound and executed:

From his blood they formed mankind.

The Gilgamesh Epic, which contains some four thousand lines in twelve tablets, describes the adventures of the legendary king of Erech, whose historical prototype may have flourished about 3000 B.C., when the early city of Erech in southern Babylonia was at the height of its power. It is partly mythological, partly heroic saga, reaching its climax in the journey of the hero in search of his ancestor, the flood hero Utnapishtim, in the hope that the latter may teach him his own secret of living forever and thus escaping the dreaded fate of death. Utna-pishtim tells the story of the great flood, which resembles the biblical account in many respects, but is shot through and through with the crassest polytheism. Nearly two hundred lines are devoted to this story, from which is quoted the passage describing the release of birds from the ark after the deluge had subsided and the following sacrifice to the gods (cf. Gen. 8:6-22):

When the seventh day arrived,
I sent forth and set free a dove;
The dove went and returned,
For there was no resting place, so it returned.
I sent forth and set free a swallow;
The swallow went and returned,
For there was no resting place, so it returned.
I sent forth and set free a raven;
The raven went forth and saw that the waters had fallen,
So it ate, waded (?), cawed, but did not return.
Then I released [the animals] to the four winds
And offered a sacrifice.
I poured out a libation on the peak of the mountain;

I set up incense stands, seven by seven,
And heaped sweet flag, cedar, and myrtle on their bowls.

The gods smelled the savor,
The gods smelled the sweet savor,
The gods swarmed like flies around the sacrificer.

The contrast between the polytheistic crudity of the Babylonian story and the simple monotheistic dignity of the biblical narrative is only too evident.

B. Egypt. 1. The Twelfth Dynasty (1992-1779).—The brief rule of the Theban kings of the Eleventh Dynasty over a united Egypt came to an end in 1992 B.C., when the chief minister Amenemmes I (Amenemhet) made himself king, founding the Twelfth Dynasty. This was in many respects the greatest family of kings in the history of Egypt; its members enjoyed long reigns, and by associating their successors with them on the throne, as a rule, they ensured continuity of succession. The old feudal chieftains were partly eliminated and partly reduced in power. There was much building activity, but instead of being limited to imposing royal monuments, it included drainage works in the Faiyum and fortifications for the protection of the delta against the Semitic hordes. Nor did the Pharaohs of this dynasty restrict themselves to internal action; they also reduced Nubia, Libya, Palestine, and Phoenicia to subjection. More than that, they kept some control through special Egyptian envoys over such remote lands as Ugarit on the coast of northern Syria and Qatna to the southeast, on the border of the Syrian Desert. The Execration Texts (see below, p. 254) enable us to fix the northern boundary of the territory claimed by Egypt in the nineteenth century B.C. north of Damascus and Byblos.

The Twelfth Dynasty was a period of intense literary and scholarly activity in Egypt, corresponding in this respect to the immediately following age in Babylonia. Between 2100 and 1800 were composed a large proportion of the most significant literary works, including such autobiographical narratives as the Story of Sinuhe (see below, p. 254), such fiction as the Story of the Shipwrecked Sailor, and King Cheops and the Wizard, such didactic literature as the Eloquent Peasant, the Teaching of Merikare, of Amenemhet, and of Sehetep-ib-re, such poems as the Debate Between a Man and His Soul, prophetic texts as the Prophecy of Neferrohu, and many others. While the extant copies of our oldest mathematical and medical texts come from the Hyksos Age (1720-1550), there is no reason to doubt that the originals go back to this same golden age of Egyptian culture. The Egyptians developed geometry and especially medicine beyond anything known in Babylonia, though in arithmetic and algebra, astronomy and the philological disciplines they remained far behind the Babylonians.

The most popular literary work of the Middle Empire was the Story of Sinuhe, purporting to describe the adventures in Asia of an Egyptian prince who had been forced to flee from Egypt about 1970 B.C. It was long believed to be fiction, but modern discoveries have confirmed details to such an extent that a solid historical nucleus is now probable. It may be a literary expansion of an autobiography inscribed in Sinuhe's tomb; our oldest hieratic manuscripts go back to within two centuries of Sinuhe's flight. It contains many interesting parallels to episodes in the early Hebrew tradition, for example, Moses' flight from Egypt and his kind reception by the nomads. After the introductory narrative we find Sinuhe about to escape across the Egyptian frontier:

I let my feet carry me northward and I reached the Wall of the Prince, built to keep away the Asiatics and to suppress the Sand dwellers. I crouched in the bush, fearing that a watchman whose turn it was to be on the wall might see me. When night fell I departed, and by daybreak I had reached Peten. I stopped at the Island of Kem-wer. I was overcome by thirst; I was parched and my throat became dry. I said, "This is the taste of death!" But I revived and gathered myself together after I heard the lowing of cattle and caught sight of Asiatics. A chief among them, who had been in Egypt, recognized me; he gave me water and boiled milk for me. I went with him to his encampment and they treated me well.

One foreign land led me to another. I left Byblos and went in the direction of Qedem (the East), where I spent a year and a half. Then Ammunenshi, chief of Upper Retenu, took me and said to me, "Thou wilt do well with me and wilt hear the speech of Egypt." This he said because he knew my ability and had heard of my cleverness, for Egyptians who were there with him had told him about me. . . .

He put me in charge of his children and married me to his eldest daughter. He made me chief of a tribe in the best part of his land. . . . After I had spent many years [there] my children became strong men, each one keeping his tribe in order. A courier who went north or south to the [Egyptian] capital stopped with me; I showed hospitality to all men; I gave water to the thirsty; I guided those who were lost to their road; I saved the man who had been robbed.

In the following narrative we hear of Sinuhe's duel with a native champion whom he slew. Then Pharaoh invited him to return to Egypt, and the latter half of the composition is devoted to details of the negotiations and to the hero's happy return to his native country and the honors which he received in Egypt. This part of the story is extremely rhetorical, diverging widely from the narrative simplicity of the first part.

Out of the wealth of Egyptian didactic literature of the Middle Empire we may select a few passages from the Teaching of Ptahhotep:

Be not vain because of thy knowledge and rely not on the fact that thou art a wise man. Consult the ignorant as well as the learned, for there are no boundaries for skill and no skilled man is skillful in all respects. Good speech is better hidden than turquoise, yet it may be found among maidservants at their hand mills. . . .

If thou art sitting at the table of one who is greater than thyself, take what he gives when it is placed before thee. Look not on what is before him but look at what is before thee. Do not keep looking at him. . . . Look down until he greets thee and speak only after he greets thee. Laugh when he laughs, so that he will be happy and what thou doest will please him. No one knows what is in the heart.

If thou desirest to prolong friendship in a house to which thou hast access, either as lord, as brother, or as friend, in any place into which thou mayest enter, beware of approaching the women. A place where they are is not good.

2. The Age of the Hyksos (ca. 1720-1550).—

After the flourishing Twelfth Dynasty, Egypt rapidly fell into a state of anarchy. The Thirteenth Dynasty continued to carry on the Theban tradition of learning, but art and literature languished. Within a space of less than fifty years (ca. 1778-1740) the Turin Papyrus lists twenty kings, and contemporary inscriptions add still others. Then came a brief renaissance of the Theban Empire under Neferhotep, whose suzerainty was still recognized at Byblos in Phoenicia. About 1720 B.C. Lower Egypt was flooded with Asiatic invaders ("Hyksos") about whom practically nothing is known except the good Northwest-Semitic names of some of their chieftains, such as Ya'qub-har (Jacob), 'Anat-har, Samuqena, Babilmma. Probably after 1690 a better organized Semitic group overran the country, penetrating into Nubia and making the weak Thebans their vassals. This group founded the Fifteenth Dynasty, which lasted 108 years (ca. 1690-1580), according to the Turin Papyrus. Brief inscriptions and scarabs of two of its kings have been found in Egypt and Palestine. These two, Apophis I and Khayana (whose monuments have been found even in Crete and Babylonia) reigned approximately sixty years (ca. 1650-1590); their combined reigns represent the Hyksos golden age, during which the Hyksos Empire extended from Nubia to Syria—possibly for short periods even beyond. There can be no doubt that this brilliant epoch left its mark on Egyptian culture and especially on its administrative organization; it was probably an age of close international relations between the Northwestern Semites of Egypt and their kindred in other parts of the Near East. At all events, it left a deep impress on Hebrew historical tradition.

C. Palestine and Syria. 1. The Egyptian Eclipse (1778-1720).—In the Middle Bronze Age (ca. 2100-1550 B.C.) Palestine and Syria developed a flourishing civilization. At the end of the third millennium we find the culture of the Early Bronze in decadent condition on both sides of the Jordan. In the anarchic period of the First Intermediate Age Egyptian control over the Asiatic dependencies vanished, and Egypt itself was invaded by Semitic nomads. The density of settlement decreased rapidly, and by the end of the twentieth century virtually all of Trans-Jordan had been abandoned, not to be reoccupied by sedentary populations until the thirteenth century. Even in western Palestine there are singularly few sites which continued to be occupied during the first phase of the Middle Bronze (the period of "caliciform" pottery, Tell Beit Mirsim H). This period is illustrated by the hieratic Story of Sinuhe and the Execration Texts from the late nineteenth century B.C., published by Kurt Sethe in 1926, which list Northwest-Semitic tribes and chieftains, but very few towns (among them Jerusalem and Ascalon). The following period saw the introduction of a new type of pottery, with carinated forms imitated from metallic originals (Tell Beit Mirsim G-F, Megiddo XIV-XIII, ca. 1850-1750 B.C.), which was used all over Phoenicia, southern Syria, and Palestine. There is not the slightest evidence that there was any ethnic change. With the Amorite blood transfusion and with Egyptian political and cultural domination, Canaan was more prosperous than it had been for a long time. This prosperity continued to increase, as we see from the rapidly increasing number of occupied sites and from the rich contents of tombs (Tell Beit Mirsim E¹, Megiddo XII). During the eighteenth century B.C. Byblos was ruled by a succession of wealthy princes, no longer more than nominally subject to Pharaoh; the best known of them is one Yantin'ammu or Enten (ca. 1740-1720), who was contemporary with Neferhotep in Egypt and with Zimri-Lim in Mari.

2. The Asiatic Invasions (ca. 1720-1550).—The beginning of the Hyksos Age in Palestine is not illumined by inscriptions. We know, however, that it was a time of steadily increasing wealth and material culture, during which there seem to have been tremendous historical developments. The horse-drawn chariot was just coming into use in the eighteenth century, but early in the following century there was a sudden change in dominant methods of fortification in order to accommodate chariots inside permanent fortifications. Great rectangular camps, surrounded by earthworks lined with beaten earth, suddenly make their appearance, together with extensive use of earthworks in protecting towns and fortresses. This new type of construction appears almost simultaneously in Syria, Palestine, and Egypt; it is mentioned in contemporary Babylonian inscriptions. The introduction of chariotry was accompanied by the widespread use of the composite bow, previously unknown in Egypt and little used in Canaan. With the coming of the horse-drawn chariot there came new ethnic elements, apparently carried into Mesopotamia and Syria on the crest of a mighty inundation which took the Hurrians and other northern peoples much farther south in both countries than they had ever been before. Palestine's earlier dolichocephaly was replaced by growing brachycephaly, a legacy from the mountain peoples who poured into the country in the seventeenth century.

VII. The Late Bronze Age (ca. 1550-1200)

A. Asia Minor. 1. The First Hittite Empire (ca. 1600-1500).—Through the light shed by the Cappadocian Tablets (see above, p. 248), we saw the emergence of previously unknown Anatolian states about 1800 B.C. Not long after this period, in the late seventeenth century, the town of Hattusa, on the strong natural site now called Boğazköy, became the capital of a rapidly growing state, called "Hittite" after its capital. Three powerful kings were responsible for signal triumphs; Labarnas unified central and eastern Asia Minor under Hittite domination, about 1600 B.C.; Hattusilis I extended the arms of Hattusa beyond the peninsula; Mursilis I conquered the kingdom of Aleppo and even raided distant Babylonia, destroying the city of Babylon (ca. 1550). Soon afterward internal strife brought the ephemeral Old Hittite Empire to an abrupt close, and for a good century and a half thereafter the Hittite kings do not seem to have ventured beyond the Taurus Mountains. The Hittites had originally been speakers of a strange prefixing language without demonstrable connection with any other known tongue, but practically all their native inscriptions were written in an Anatolian tongue of Indo-European type (see above, p. 240). Their religion, like their material culture, was a mixture of elements from different sources, but it was already characterized by the orgiastic cult of the Great Mother (Kubaba, Khepat), and the god Telibinus was fundamentally identical with the later Phrygian Attis. Eunuch priests (galli) formed an important element in the Hittite priesthood.

2. Hurrian Cultural Influence.—The Hurrians were drawn by their conquerors into the Hittite state, and it was probably at this time that the custom arose of associating a queen bearing a Hurrian name with a king bearing a Proto-Hittite name. Hurrian literature was copied and translated by the Hittite scholars, so we find nearly all the yet discovered fragments of Hurrian mythology preserved for us in Hittite translation. In 1946 H. G. Güterbock collected all the now available fragments of the "Song of Ullikummiss," the myth of Kumarbis, father of the gods (like Anu, El, and the Greek Cronus), the myth of the dragon Khedammu, the myth of the rape of Ishtar by Mount Pisaisa, and so forth. Since the Hurrians also translated and adapted many Akkadian compositions like the Gilgamesh Epic, the resulting mixture of elements almost defies analysis.

B. Mesopotamia. 1. Mitanni (1500-1370).—After the downfall of the Old Hittite Empire a new power rose rapidly into a dominant position; this power was formed by a kind of symbiosis between the incoming Indo-Aryans and the older Hurrian population of the region. The Indo-Aryans, with good Sanskrit names of Vedic type, brought with them fast horse-drawn chariots which gave them tremendous prestige, probably quite out of proportion to their numbers. At all events, in Late Bronze Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine we find that princes and leading nobles very often have Indo-Aryan names, while their subjects bear Hurrian names. This was true, for example, in different parts of Syria, as at Ratna and Damascus, as well as at Taanach and elsewhere in Palestine.

2. Hurrian Documents.—The new power to which allusion was made above was Mitanni, which grew rapidly from its beginnings in the sixteenth century until the time of Saushshatar, about the middle of the fifteenth century, when it controlled most of Mesopotamia and northern Syria, as well as probably most of Armenia. A small but wealthy Hurrian town of this period has been located south of Kirkuk. This town, then called Nuzu or Nuzi, has yielded thousands of cuneiform tablets from the fifteenth century B.C., which have given us a remarkably clear picture of life and customs in northern Mesopotamia during the late Patriarchal Age. The resemblances between the practices mentioned in Genesis and the customs of the Nuzians are frequently so close that all scholars who have studied them are convinced that there is some connection.

One of the most remarkable documents from the fifteenth century which has yet come to light is the autobiography of Idrimi, king of Alalakh in northern Syria. Published by Sidney Smith in 1949, it contains some very striking parallels to the biblical story of Joseph and throws direct light on the background of Baalam. Idrimi may be dated about 1480-1450 B.C.; he was son of Ililimma, king of the lands of Mukishkhe, Ni'a, and 'Amau. The land of 'Amau is mentioned in a slightly later Egyptian inscription as being in northern Syria; it must obviously be identified with the land called by the same name in the Hebrew original of Num. 22:5. In the introductory lines of his inscription Idrimi describes a rebellion in the city of Khalab (Aleppo) in which his father appears to have been killed, and says that he and his brothers fled to the town of Emar, where they found asylum with his mother's sisters. He goes on:

My brothers, who were older than I, abode with me, but none of them thought the things which I thought. So I said, "Whoever hath his father's estate, let him live on it, but whoever hath not, from the children of Emar let him depart!"

I took my horses, my chariot, and my groom and fled. The wilderness I traversed and entered [a camp of] the Sutu (Semitic nomads). With them I spent the night in my chariot. The next day I departed and went to the land of Canaan (which appears here for the first time in ancient records, though it later became common). In the land of Canaan is situated the town of Ammiya; in Ammiya dwelt children of Aleppo, children of Mukishkhe, and children of 'Amau. They saw me and behold, I was the son of their lord, so they joined me. . . . And I dwelt in the midst of the 'Apiru people (perhaps the Hebrews) for seven years. I interpreted [the flight of] birds, I inspected [the intestines of] lambs, while seven years of the storm-god turned over (?) my head.

And I built ships. My troops did not tarry; I put them on the ships and traversed the sea to the land of Mukishkhe (valley of the lower Orontes); and I reached dry land in front of Mount Khazi (Casius). I went ashore and my land heard about me and brought oxen and sheep into my presence. And in a single day, as one man, the land of Ni'a, the land of 'Amau, the land of Mukishkhe, and the city of Alalakh, my capital, turned back to me. My brothers heard and came into my presence. When my brothers had been reconciled to me, I confirmed them [in the rank of] my brothers.

But Barattarna, the great king, king of the Horites (Gen. 36:20-21), had been hostile to me for seven years. In the seventh year I sent to Barattarna, king of the Umman Manda (literally: "Barbarian Hordes"), and I stated the conditions of peace of my fathers when my fathers had made peace with them and our words found favor with the Horite kings. . . . So I became king of the city Alalakh. Kings on my right hand (=south) and on my left hand (=north) came up against me, and when they heaped on the earth ruins beyond (?) the ruins of the fathers, I also caused ruins to be heaped (?) on the earth, and I made them stop fighting.

Idrimi then raided the land of the Hittites, dividing the rich spoil between the troops, the king's brothers, and his friends, while he himself took his share.

In subsequent sections of the long inscription the king tells of building a palace with the proceeds of the Hittite spoils and of furnishing it in the royal fashion of the day. He then organized the settlement and defense of his country and reorganized religious festivals and temple liturgies. Finally he handed over the reins of power to his son Adadnirari after he had reigned thirty years.

C. Egypt. 1. The Theban Renaissance and the New Empire (ca. 1570-1370).—Under Hyksos suzerainty two dynasties of Theban princes continued the traditions of the Middle Empire in Egypt. The earlier of these has been identified and dated by H. E. Winlock, who calls it the Sixteenth Dynasty; the other represents the Seventeenth Dynasty of Manetho and followed its predecessor in the early sixteenth century. One of its princes revolted against the Hyksos, beginning a war of liberation which was completed by the founder of the Eighteenth Dynasty, Ahmose I (1570-1546 B.C.), shortly before the end of his reign. Ahmose even invaded Asia before his death, and the devastation wrought by Egyptian arms is witnessed by the destruction which befell a good many fortified towns of southern Canaan about the middle of the sixteenth century, immediately before the period of bichrome pottery. Though we know next to nothing about the wars of his son, Amenophis I, he must have been a great conqueror, since the Egyptian frontier in Nubia was pushed south as far as the region of the Fourth Cataract, while his successor, Thutmose I, claimed the Euphrates as his northern border at the beginning of his reign. These victories were followed by a rapid decline under Queen Hatshepsut, who seems to have lost most of the Egyptian empire in Asia. However, her young nephew Thutmose III, whom she had married and kept powerless, invaded Asia immediately after the death of his aunt and in a daring campaign regained the whole of Palestine (1468 B.C.), taking Megiddo after a siege of seven months. The king's further progress northward was considerably hampered by the fact that he had to fight against a powerful Mitanni, whereas his predecessors had begun their Syrian campaigns after the collapse of the Old Hittite Empire and before the expansion of Mitanni. The war with Mitanni continued under the reign of Amenophis II (1435-1414?), but the rise of the New Hittite Empire (see below, p. 261) induced his son Thutmose IV (1414?-1406) to make a treaty with Mitanni, which was renewed in the two following reigns, until Mitanni in its turn was finally conquered by the Hittites.

2. The Religious Reform (ca. 1370).—The following age was outwardly one of the most brilliant in the history of Egypt, but inwardly it was sown with the seeds of decay. During the thirty-six years of Amenophis III's reign (1406-1370) Egypt's foreign policy remained static, and the bureaucratic corruption which spread rapidly during all weak reigns began to undermine the administration at home and alienate the subject peoples abroad. Amenophis married a commoner named Teye, who exercised a dominant role in the affairs of state, as we see not only from native inscriptions but also from the Mitannian correspondence. Egypt had become prodigiously wealthy and the resulting luxury was eating like a cancer at its vitals. Under the New Empire the process of democratizing life after death which had begun in the Feudal Age, when nobles adopted the funerary rites which had belonged previously to the king alone (see above, pp. 246-47), was extended to any commoner who could afford the price. The new sacred book, which brought together spells and religious texts that were deemed efficacious in protecting the soul of the deceased from the dangers of the journey to the hereafter, is called by Egyptologists the "Book of the Dead"; its oldest copies go back to the fifteenth century B.C., before this work had become stereotyped. It is hard to think of any process which could so thoroughly demoralize the social conscience as the faith of that day in Egypt; in this faith all the sanctions of religion were marshaled to support the belief that a wicked rich man who spent money on magic and mummery could thereby assure for himself a splendid eternity. At the same time the temples and priesthood flourished as they apparently never had before, and the wealth of the nation was drawn almost irresistibly to them. Higher culture ceased to be productive; the language of literature was the extinct speech of the Middle Kingdom, and there is no evidence that a single literary masterpiece (from our point of view) was composed between 1600 and 1375 B.C.

The time was obviously overripe for revolution; it came in the shape of a new "teaching" (sbaye), which substituted solar monotheism for the complex polytheism of traditional religion, replaced the fossilized art of the past by a new art intended to reproduce nature, and made the speech of the court the new literary language of the country. It is impossible to believe that the weak Amenophis IV (1370-1353) was responsible for such a tremendous change in basic ways of thinking. Some unidentified genius, probably working through the young king's gifted mother Teye, is a far more likely candidate. The roots of the new religion go back to the Heliopolitan solar theology of the Pyramid Age (see above, pp. 245-47), and it is foreshadowed in texts from the reign of Amenophis III. It may have been in Heliopolis itself that this revolt against the powerful priests of Amun at Thebes was hatched. However this may be, the king and his courtiers took the revolution very seriously, and for some twelve years they tried to suppress the cult of Amun and of all other gods except the solar disk, in honor of which the king changed his name to Akhenaton (or Ikhnaton). Singularly beautiful hymns to the solar disk attest the high idealism of the revolution, but it had no foothold among the masses, and indeed seems to have made no effort to improve their wretched condition. Between the hatred of the old nobility and the apathy or aversion of the common people, the reform movement collapsed within a year or two after the death of the heretic king, and his new city of Akhetaton ("Horizon of the Solar Disk") was abandoned some twelve years after its foundation.

The monotheistic hymns to the Aton (solar disk) as the only god are of very great historical importance. Dating from the century immediately preceding Moses and the Israelite conquest of Palestine, they undoubtedly exerted some influence on the monotheism of early Israel, though the extent and character of the influence are naturally subject to debate. The following prayer from Amarna illustrates the "theology" of the Aton cult very well:

Fair is thy rising, O Harakhti ("Horus of the Two Horizons"), he who rejoices on the horizon in his name Shu, which is the sun, thou living sun-god besides whom there is none other; who strengthens the eye with its rays, who has created all that exists. Thou dost rise on the horizon of heaven in order to give life to whatever thou hast created, all men [all beasts], everything that flies and flutters, and all creeping things in the earth. They live when they see thee; they sleep when thou dost set.

In this prayer the Aton appears as the sole deity, without competitors, and the creator of everything, like Yahweh in early Israel.

In the famous hymn to the Aton, which in some ways strikingly resembles Ps. 104, we have emphasized the universality of Aton's sway:

Fair is thine appearance on the horizon of heaven,
Thou living Aton, who first lived!
When thou dost rise on the eastern horizon
Thou dost fill every land with thy beauty.

• • • • •
All beasts are content with their herbage;
Trees and plants are green.
The birds fly from their nests,
Their wings praise thy spirit (literally, "thy ka");
All wild beasts leap on their feet.
Whatever flies and flutters,
It lives when thou dost rise for them.

Ships sail north and sail again south,
And every road is open because thou dost rise.
The fish in the river leap before thee;
Thy rays are in the interior of the sea.

• • • • •
How much it is, what thou hast created,
O thou sole god, like whom there is no other!
Thou hast created the earth according to thy wish,
When thou wert alone:
All men, cattle, wild beasts,
Whatever is on earth, walking on its feet,
And whatever soars above, flying with its wings.
The lands of Syria and Nubia, the land of Egypt—
Every man dost thou put in his place,
Providing what they need.
Each one has his food and his allotted time of life;
Their tongues are separate in speech,
And so are their forms;
Their skin is different,
For thou makest the foreign peoples different.

• • • • •
All remote foreign peoples, thou makest what sustains their life.
Thou hast placed the Nile in heaven,
That it may come down for them [in rain]
And break over the mountains like the sea,
To water the fields in their towns.

3. The Amarna Tablets.—Toward the end of 1887 an Egyptian peasant woman accidentally discovered the archives of cuneiform tablets from Akhetaton which we call "the Amarna Tablets." Since their initial publication in 1889 and 1892 many additional tablets and fragments have turned up in private hands or have been found in organized excavation at the site of Tell el-Amarna, until we now have nearly four hundred pieces. Most of them are letters written by the kings of Babylonia, Assyria, Mitanni, Hatti (the Hittites), Alashiya (Cyprus), Arzawa (Cilicia), as well as by many local princes in Syria and Palestine, to Pharaoh Amenophis III and his son, Akhenaton. The tablets which interest us most were written by local scribes on behalf of their Canaanite masters. Among them are letters from Byblos (Gebal), Ugarit, Sidon, Tyre, Berytus (Beirut), Damascus, Accho (Acre), Megiddo, Hazor, Shechem, Jerusalem, Hebron (probably the capital of Shuwardata), Gezer, Lachish, Ascalon (Ashkelon). Since the scribes had learned Akkadian in school from other Canaanite scribes, who had learned it in their turn from still others, the Akkadian which they wrote was a curious jargon, quite different in detail from contemporary Babylonian. This official language had developed from a more archaic stage of Akkadian about the seventeenth century B.C. and had acquired a strange grammar of its own, strongly influenced by the fact that the native tongue of most of these scribes was Canaanite. A few of the letters, notably one written from Shechem by Lab'ayu, are so full of Canaanitisms that whole lines may be read as straight Canaanite.

These documents exhibit an extraordinary mixture of groveling before Pharaoh and of plotting and counterplotting against him. Different princes accuse each other and their Egyptian commissioners (assigned to watch them) of disloyalty. In the face of such intrigue it is obviously quite impossible for us to determine who, if any, was more honest than his fellows. The letters paint a depressing picture of corrupt administration and insecurity of life and property. Under the exactions of ruthless Egyptian tribute collectors, an increasing proportion of the people are said to be joining the "bandits," also called the 'Apiru, a name which may be the source of our "Hebrew." The references to them in the Amarna letters and other sources come from Syria as well as from Palestine; they appear as a separate group along with other ethnic groups, but the name is also used as a mere synonym for "brigand," or the like.

We now have about 350 Amarna letters, as well as about a score found in Palestine, Phoenicia proper, and southern Syria. Some 300 letters came from Semitic-speaking territory. In this article we can quote only two or three of them. Typical of the state of the country about 1370 B.C. is the following letter (one of six) from 'Abduheba, prince of Jerusalem (perhaps about, 150 years before Joshua):

To the king, my lord, say: Thus 'Abduheba, thy servant. At the two feet of my lord the king seven times and seven times I fall. Behold Milkilu (prince of Gezer) does not break his pact with the sons of Lab'ayu and with the sons of Arzayu in order to acquire the land of the king for themselves. When a governor does such a deed as this, why does not my king call him to account? Behold Milkilu and Tagu (probably prince of Gath in Sharon)! The deed which they have done is this, that they have taken it, [namely] Rubutu. And now Jerusalem [itself]—if this land [really] does belong to the king—why is it as loyal to the king as Gaza (seat of the Egyptian resident)? Behold the land of Gath-carmel, it belongs to Tagu, and the men of Gath have a garrison in Bethshean (excavated by Alan Rowe). Or shall we do like Lab'ayu, who gave the land of Shechem to the 'Apiru (perhaps the Hebrews)? Milkilu has written to Tagu and the sons of [Lab'ayu] as follows: "Ye are allied with my house. Yield all the demands made by the men of Keilah, and let us break our pact with Jerusalem!" The garrison which thou didst send through (the Egyptian officer) Haya son of Miyare, Addaya (Canaanite in Egyptian service) has taken and has placed in his residence in Gaza, and he has sent twenty men to Egypt. Let my lord know that there is no royal garrison with me. So now, as my king lives, truly the master of the stable, Puwure, has taken leave of me and is in Gaza; so let my lord look out for him! And let the king send fifty men as a garrison for the land! The entire land of the king has rebelled. Send me Yanhamu and let him take care of the land of the king!

To the scribe of the king, my lord: Thus 'Abduheba, thy servant. Present eloquent words to the king. I am much inferior to thee; I am thy servant.

Of the names of towns mentioned in this letter six are biblical; the seventh—Rubutu—does not appear in the Bible but is found several times in other sources. Lab'ayu's capital was Shechem, later the second most important city of the northern kingdom. An Amarna letter from Lab'ayu is written in a Babylonian which is so full of Canaanite words and phrases that it might just as well have been written entirely in the native language of Bronze Age Palestine:

To the king, my lord, say: Thus Lab'ayu, thy servant. At the feet of my lord I fall. With respect to what thou hast written to me, "Are the men strong who have seized the town? How can the men be stopped?" [I reply] By hostile action was the town seized, despite the fact that I had taken an oath of conciliation and that, when I took the oath, an [Egyptian] officer took the oath with me. The town has been seized together with my god. I have been slandered/betrayed before the king, my lord.

Further, if even ants are smitten, they do not accept it [passively] but they bite the hand of the man who smites them. How can I hesitate this day when two of my towns have been seized?

Further, even if thou shouldst say, "Fall beneath them and let them smite thee!" I should still repel my foe, the men who seized the town and my god, the despoilers of my father, yea, I would repel them!

Note the curious tone of truculence which pervades this letter; Lab'ayu of Shechem was protected by the wooded mountains of central Palestine against the swift retaliation which might be expected by his servile brethren on the coastal plain. The otherwise unknown Canaanite proverb about the ant may be compared with two very ancient proverbs about the same insect found in Prov. 6:6 and 30:25.

A letter from the same general age, found at Shechem in 1926, throws a very interesting side light on education of boys in Canaanite Palestine:

Unto Birashshena say: Thus Baniti-[Ashirat(?)]. From three years ago until now thou hast caused me to be paid. Is there no grain nor oil nor [wine(?)] which thou canst send? What is my offense that thou dost not pay me? The boys who are with me continue to learn; their father and their mother every [day] alike am I. . . . Now [behold], whatever [there is] at the disposal [of my lord let him send] to me and let him inform me!

An interesting letter to the prince of Taanach in northern Palestine from his brother in the Jordan Valley south of Bethshean has been recovered. The writer complains of having been ambushed and robbed, and asks for various parts of a chariot and weapons; at the end of the letter he says that he wants to be married:

To Rewashsha say: Thus Akhiyami. May the lord of the gods protect thy life. My brother art thou and there is no friend here (?). And thou wilt remember that I was ambushed in Gurra, so give me today two chariot wheels and an axle, also two . . . And when the making of the axle has been finished, send it to me by Purdaya. Further, charge thy towns that they do their work (corvée). Anyone who attacks the towns is responsible to me. Now behold me, that I do well by thee! Further, if there are copper arrows let them be given to me. Further, let Elrapi'i come to me at Rakhabu (south of Bethshean) or I will send my man to thee, for truly I wish to be betrothed.

D. Palestine and Syria. 1. The Ras Shamra Texts.—In 1929 C. F. A. Schaeffer began excavations at Ras Shamra on the coast of northern Syria, opposite Cyprus. In eleven campaigns he excavated a considerable area in the upper stratum and a much smaller part of the second level. The name of the city was found to be Ugarit, said in the Amarna Tablets to be proverbial for its wealth. His most important finds consisted of two large groups of tablets from the early fourteenth century B.C., one consisting mainly of religious texts in a new cuneiform alphabet, the other including several hundred tablets in the same script or in Akkadian, all of official and administrative character. Many individual tablets in both cuneiform scripts add materially to the cumulative effect of the principal finds. The religious texts have been found to consist mainly of large and small fragments of mythological epics, including parts of the texts of Baal and Anath, Keret, and Aqhat or Danel (Daniel). The new script was deciphered by Paul (Edouard) Dhorme and Hans Bauer almost immediately after Charles Virolleaud first published a sample of the texts. Ugaritic is a Northwest-Semitic dialect closely related to contemporary Phoenician and a little less closely to biblical Hebrew. The language of the epics is more like biblical Hebrew than is the language of ordinary letters and administrative documents; the content of the epics proves that they had originally been composed in Phoenicia proper, south of Ugarit. When we compare the new sources for early Canaanite literature with the Bible, we find extraordinarily close resemblances in diction and style with the oldest Israelite poetry (the Song of Moses, the Oracles of Balaam, the Song of Deborah, the Blessing of Moses, etc., as well as with the oldest psalms, such as Pss. 18; 29; 68). In archaizing Hebrew poetry we find similar resemblances, for example, in the psalm of Habakkuk and in a few later psalms. The rich new data from Ugarit are rapidly revolutionizing our entire approach to the history of Hebrew literature, and everything written on this subject before the late 1930's is already in need of revision. However, it is difficult to exaggerate the difference between the ethical monotheism of the Old Testament and the brutal coarseness of many polytheistic narratives in the newly discovered Canaanite literature. Between the religion of early Israel and that of the Canaanites there is a wide and deep gulf.

The surviving fragments of the great Epic of Baal and Anath reflect a series of loosely connected myths in poetic dress, all of which probably go back centuries before the date of our extant copies (which precede the great earthquake of about 1360 B.C.). The following are some of the better preserved and more intelligible passages which deal with the mythical adventures of the great Canaanite storm-god Baal and his sister Anath. These selections follow the theoretical, but plausible, order proposed by H. L. Ginsberg.

Apparently the earliest episode extant is the conflict between Baal and the mighty water dragon called Prince Sea and Judge River. Sea and river figured in Hebrew allegory as primordial foes of Yahweh (e.g., Ps. 89:25; Hab. 3:8). Some deity is describing forthcoming events:

"Let words proceed from her (Anath's?) mouth,
From her lips her speech!
And as she raises her voice,
The foundations of the throne of Prince Sea will shake."
And Koshar-and-Khasis will reply,
"I have told thee, O Prince Baal,
I have repeated, O Cloud Rider—
Behold thine enemy, O Baal,
Behold thine enemy shalt thou smite,
Behold thou shalt destroy thy foe!¹
Thou shalt take thine eternal kingdom,
Thine everlasting dominion."
Koshar will bring two maces
And will give them their names:
"Thy name is Yagrush—
Yagrush, drive Sea,
Drive Sea from his throne,
River from the seat of his dominion!
Thou shalt swoop in the hand of Baal,
Like an eagle from his fingers;
Strike the back of Prince Sea,
The breast of Judge River!"
It will strike the back of Prince Sea,
The breast of Judge River—
The mighty one, Sea, shall droop,
His pinnacles shall tremble,
His visage shall sink.
Koshar will bring two maces,
And will give them their names:

¹ Cf. Ps. 92:9.

THE INTERPRETER'S BIBLE

"Thy name is Ayamur (?) — Ayamur (?), . . . Sea
 . . . Sea from his throne,
 River from the seat of his dominion!
 Thou shalt swoop in the hand of Baal,
 Like an eagle from his fingers;
 Strike the skull of Prince Sea,
 The forehead of Judge River."
 Sea will collapse
 And will fall to the ground!

In another important section of the Baal Epic there is a long series of intrigues and actions on behalf of Baal, who wishes a temple like the other gods. His sister Anath supports him in this project, while El's consort, the biblical Asherah, seems to alternate between hostility and favor. Again we find ourselves in a typical prospective narrative, with a deity foretelling what is going to happen, or what ought to happen:

Then let her (Asherah) direct herself
 Toward El at the Source of the Two Rivers,
 In the midst of the Fountains of the Two Deep.
 She shall pass through the Field of El
 And shall enter the pavilion of the King, Father of Years,
 At El's feet she will bow and fall down,
 Will prostrate herself and pay him obeisance.
 As soon as El spies her,
 He will put away grief and will smile,
 His feet on the footstool he will place,
 And he will entwine his fingers.
 He will lift up his voice and will cry,
 "Why has the Lady, Asherah of the Sea, come,
 Why has the Creatress of the Gods arrived?
 Art thou indeed hungry . . .

Or art thou indeed thirsty . . . ?
 Eat then and drink!
 Eat bread from the tables,
 Drink wine from the vessels,
 From gold cups blood of trees.
 Behold the love of El holds thee,
 The affection of the Bull sustains thee."
 And the Lady, Asherah of the Sea, shall reply,
 "Thy command, O El, is wise,
 Thy wisdom lasts forever,
 A life of good fortune is thy command!
 Our king is Triumphant Baal,
 Our judge, above whom there is no one!
 Each of us will bring his gift,
 Each of us will bring his purse;
 Let the Bull, his father El, call ships,
 El, the king who brought him into being,
 Let Asherah and her sons call,
 Elath and the band of her companions!"

In the next column we have further details about the extent of the projected preparations for building Baal's temple:

Call a caravan into thy temple,
 A trading company (?) into thy mansion;
 The mountains shall bring thee much silver,
 The hills a treasure of gold,

They shall bring thee glorious gems (?).
 So build a house of silver and gold,
 A house of pure lapis lazuli.

The following episode from the Baal Epic describes the sanguinary fury of the goddess Anath and her slaughter of men. Unfortunately, we do not know what occasioned such an outburst of vindictive cruelty:

The Seven Maidens (Pleiades) were hidden,
 The Propitious Ones and the Bees (?) were at rest,
 The gates of Anath's house were bolted,
 When she met the youths on the slopes of the mountain.
 And then Anath did battle,
 Mightily she hewed down the folk of the two cities;
 Smiting the people of the Seacoast,
 Crushing the men of the Rising Sun.
 Beneath her are heads like pellets,
 Above her are hands like locusts,
 Like . . . the hands of warriors.
 She fastened the heads to her back,
 The hands she bound to her girdle;
 Knee-deep she plunged into the blood of champions,
 Up to the throat (?) in the gore of warriors.

 Her liver swelled with laughter,
 Her heart filled up with joy,
 Anath's liver with success,
 When she plunged knee-deep into the blood of champions.

 She washed her hands, did Maid Anath,
 Her fingers, did the . . . of the Peoples;
 She washed her hands in the blood of champions,
 Her fingers in the gore of warriors.

Baal's death and subsequent resurrection form the theme of what was probably the largest portion of the epic. After Death (Mot) had conquered Baal in battle and had carried him down to the nether world, the bad news was brought to the gods:

"We two came upon Baal lying on the ground—
 Dead is triumphant Baal,
 The Prince, lord of the earth, has perished!"
 Then the Kindly One, God of Mercy (?),
 Came down from the throne, sat on the footstool,
 And from the footstool he sat on the earth;
 He poured dust of mourning on his head,
 Earth of sorrow (?) on his skull.

After a certain lapse of time Anath overtook Death (Mot) and fought a mighty battle with him over her lost brother:

Like the heart of a wild cow for her calf,
 Like the heart of a wild ewe for her lamb,
 So was the heart of Anath for Baal.
 She caught Death by the fold of his garment,
 Seized him by the hem of his robe

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

She seized Death, son of the gods,
 She cleaved him with a sword;
 She winnowed him with a fan,
 She burned him in the fire;
 She ground him in a hand mill,
 She sowed him in the field;
 That the birds might eat his remnants.

When we next reach an extant portion of the epic, Anath's exertions for Baal have been rewarded, and the great storm-god lives again:

"In a dream, O Kindly One, God of Mercy (?),
 In a vision, Creator of Creatures,
 The heavens rained oil,
 The dry valleys flowed with honey;
 So I know
 That Triumphant Baal lives,
 That the Prince, Lord of Earth, is alive!"

The Kindly One, God of Mercy (?), rejoiced,
 His feet he placed on the footstool,
 He put away grief and he smiled.
 He lifted up his voice and cried,
 "Now will I sit and rest,
 And my spirit shall be at rest in my breast."

2. The New Hittite Empire (ca. 1375-1200).—

The collapse of the Aton heresy was roughly synchronous with the rapid emergence of the New Hittite Empire, which under Suppiluliumas (ca. 1370-1335 B.C.) overran Mitanni as far as Lebanon, the Upper Tigris, and the frontiers of Babylonia. Egypt lost several of its Syrian provinces, which it apparently made no serious effort to recover during the forty years which followed the death of the heretic king. During this interval the Hittites were kept too busy resisting the expansion of the new Middle Assyrian Empire under its vigorous monarch, Ashurballit (1356-1321 B.C.), to undertake the conquest of Egypt itself, which could otherwise scarcely have resisted a Hittite invasion. In 1309 a high military officer of Haremhab (who had himself been general of the army under the feeble successors of Akhenaton), named Ramses, made himself king with the help of his energetic son Seti I (1308-1290 B.C.). Ramses I died almost immediately after founding the Nineteenth Dynasty, but his son set about reorganizing the weakened Egyptian empire in Palestine and southern Syria. Since the Ramesside family came from the district later called Tanis, the new residence of the king was established there, and Seti's son Ramses II (1290-1224 B.C.) called it by his own name, "House of Ramses," or Raamses (Exod. 1:11) for short. The identification of the Ramesside capital with later Tanis (biblical Zoan) has been convincingly demonstrated by Edouard Montet as a result of his years of excavation there; occasional objectors forget the simple fact that if Ramses is moved to an insignificant site in the neighborhood, the great city of Tanis, with all its Ramesside monuments, is left without any contemporary name! From their residence in the northeastern delta the kings of the Nineteenth Dynasty continued the war against the Hittites, which reached its climax in the Battle of Kadesh on the Orontes (1286 B.C.), but was finally brought to an end by a treaty (1270 B.C.), the text of which has been found in an Egyptian translation at Thebes and in an Akkadian rendering at Boğazköy. The reason for the cessation of hostilities between the Hittites and Egypt is not far to seek; Assyria was then continuing its steady encroachment on the Mitannian province of the Hittites, under two vigorous rulers, Adad-nirari I (1298-1266 B.C.) and his son, Shalmaneser I (1265-1236 B.C.), the second of whom liquidated the last Hittite holdings east of the Euphrates. Under Shalmaneser's son, Tukulti-Ninurta I (1235-1199), the Middle Assyrian Empire reached its climax with the conquest of Babylonia.

VIII. The Early Iron Age (ca. 1200-900)

A. The Eclipse of the Empires.—With the end of the Bronze Age and the rapid spread of the use of iron came also the end of the creative age of the ancient Near East. Original intellectual and artistic productivity came almost to an end in Egypt with the Ramesside Age; in Mesopotamia the influx of fresh Aramaean blood revived the country and brought fresh life in the sphere of higher culture as well as in material affairs, but the religion of the country and its canonical literature remained virtually unchanged until the last days of Babylonia. On the other hand, new life was pulsing in the arteries of hitherto unknown peoples, such as the Israelites and the Hellenes.

1. The Inscription of Merneptah (ca. 1224-1216).—The first contemporary indications of the emergence of Israel are found in the blackened ruins of Canaanite towns of the thirteenth century B.C. and in the surprising couplet with which Merneptah (1224-1216 B.C.) ends an enumeration of conquered foes in the poem celebrating his triumph over the Libyans:

The people of Israel is desolate, it has no offspring;
 Palestine has become a widow for Egypt!

2. The Peoples of the Sea (ca. 1175).—The Hellenes appear dramatically, though briefly, in the history of Egypt and Palestine as one of the barbarian elements taking part in the invasion of the Peoples of the Sea. In the inscriptions of Merneptah and of Ramses III (ca. 1180-1149) a number of peoples from the northern shores of the Mediterranean are mentioned among the invaders who swarmed across to raid or to settle the coasts of Africa, Egypt, and Palestine; among them are the Aqiwasha (probably the Achaeans), the Tursha (certainly the Tyrsenians or Etruscans), the Shardina (certainly the Sardinians), the Pelast (certainly the Philistines), the Tjikal (probably the Sicilians, called "Sikel" in the Odyssey), and the Danuna (probably the Danaans, an archaic name for the Hellenes). Though the invading hosts were repelled, they occupied the coastland of Palestine. At the same time as these peoples attacked by sea, other barbarous peoples (including some of those just mentioned) flooded Asia Minor and Syria, destroying the Hittite Empire and razing many cities, Ugarit among them. There are a number of allusions, early and late, in the Old Testament to the great impression made on the Israelites and their neighbors by this inundation from the north (e.g., Num. 24:24).

B. The Rise of New Powers.—After the reign of Ramses III, who had briefly tried to restore the glories of his precursors, Egypt fell into a state of chronic disorder, and Phoenicia and Palestine gained complete autonomy after the middle of the twelfth century B.C. Since the Hittite Empire had collapsed under the blows of the northern barbarians, there was no power strong enough to dominate Syria and Palestine. After the great victories of Tukulti-Ninurta I, Assyria relapsed into a state of weakness and was unable to maintain its old boundaries. Under Tiglath-pileser I (1116-1078 B.C.) a brilliant series of victories restored much of Assyria's lost prestige: the Phrygians and other barbarians who had put an end to the Hittite Empire were forced back from their foothold in southern Armenia; Babylonia was reduced to a vassal state; the nomadic Aramaeans were checked, and northern Syria and Phoenicia were added for a short time to the Assyrian Empire. But Tiglath-pileser's successors did not possess his energy; the empire gradually lost ground, yielding its outposts on the Euphrates to the Aramaeans in the reign of Ashur-rabi II (1012-972), and being finally pushed back to the borders of Assyria proper under the latter's grandson, Tiglath-pileser II (966-935 B.C.). There was thus no longer any power which offered a serious threat to the growing might of Israel under David and Solomon.

1. The Phoenicians.—Within a single century (1250-1150 B.C.) the Canaanites of Palestine, southern Syria, and Phoenicia suffered a series of terrific blows which sent them reeling back into Mount Lebanon and the narrow coastal strip which it protected. These blows came in the form of successive invasions of Canaan by the Israelites, the Sea Peoples, and the Aramaeans.

The few remaining Canaanite towns in Palestine and in Syria east of Lebanon were too weak to stand by themselves (cf. the account of the fall of Laish, Judg. 18:27-28) and gradually yielded. Phoenicia itself was devastated by the Sea Peoples; Ugarit was then destroyed and was never reoccupied; Tyre must have been peculiarly exposed, and Sidon, according to Timaeus, a very reliable Hellenistic historian who followed Phoenician tradition, seems to have fallen about 1194 B.C. Timaeus states that the Sidonians crossed over to Tyre and built it. Since Tyre was a famous Canaanite city in the Bronze Age, it had probably just been destroyed and was founded anew by the Sidonians, who still claimed Tyre as a colony on their coins of the early Hellenistic Age. According to the Tyrian tradition reported by Josephus on the authority of Menander of Ephesus, Tyre was founded about 1198 B.C.; both traditions agree with the fact that the attack by the Sea Peoples must be dated in the years just before their defeat by Ramses III (ca. 1173).

Thanks to the new art of digging and lining cisterns with waterproof lime plaster, the Phoenicians were able to build towns and villages where none had existed before, and Tyre was no longer dependent on fresh water from the mainland, as had been true in the Late Bronze Age. Moreover, the still more recent spread of iron, which followed the destruction of the Hittite monopoly by the Sea Peoples, soon made the felling of the great conifers of Lebanon and the construction of fleets of ships much easier than it had been. The use of iron nails made it possible to build much larger seagoing vessels. The Report of Wen-Amun, a narrative of the adventures of an Egyptian envoy to Byblos about 1060 B.C., gives us a vivid picture of the resulting state of affairs. The Byblians and the Sidonians were the two principal Phoenician maritime groups, but the former were still in the ascendancy under a King Zakarbaal. Owing presumably to the insecurity of the seas in the days of widespread piracy which followed the collapse of the Mycenaean thalassocracy (command of the seas) in the late thirteenth century B.C., the Phoenicians were organized into a system of khubur, or trading syndicates, which were closely allied with contemporary ruling personalities. The system is twice referred to in the Old Testament, with the use of the same term (Job 41:6; II Chr. 20:35-37). Not long afterward the Sidonians gained the ascendancy over the Byblians, who became a minor state. It seems to have been Hiram I of Tyre (969-936 B.C.) whose energy led to the first great step in the Phoenician exploitation of the Mediterranean: the partial colonization of Cyprus and the sending of Phoenician trading expeditions into the western Mediterranean. Quite aside from Greek and biblical evidence for the early date of Phoenician expansion is the fact that a recently published Phoenician inscription from Cyprus must be dated in the century following Hiram's death, and that there are several Phoenician inscriptions from Sardinia whose script places them also in the ninth century. One of them, a fragment of an edict from Nora in southern Sardinia, mentions Tarshish in connection with Shardin (Sardinia); Tarshish was almost certainly the name of the Phoenician mining colony on the island, where there had already been a great copper mining industry in the preceding centuries.

2. The Israelites.—In recent years excavations have thrown much light on the progress of the Israelite occupation of Palestine, as well as on the character of its material culture. Excavations at sites where an intensive Canaanite occupation in the Late Bronze Age was followed by Israelite reoccupation after the Conquest show that very little time elapsed before the resettlement. This is notably true of two sites at which I have excavated: Tell Beit Mirsim (probably Kiriath-sepher) and Bethel. At other sites where there was no Late Bronze occupation, as at Tell en-Nasbeh (Ataroth?) and Beth-zur, we find Israelite settlement beginning in the twelfth century, at the latest. This situation proves that the Israelites were not merely desert nomads, but were ready to settle down immediately after the Conquest. On the other hand, we find a striking decline in the quality of material culture at these sites, where the contrast between the excellence of Canaanite masonry and the crudeness of the Israelite masonry which replaced it is most extraordinary. We also find that Palestine was in a state of relative anarchy in the early part of the Iron Age. At Bethel, for example, there were no fewer than four successive phases of occupation in the twelfth and eleventh centuries, each followed by a destruction by fire. About the middle of the eleventh century a number of towns were destroyed, among them Shiloh, Tell Beit Mirsim, and Beth-zur; since Shiloh was certainly attacked by the Philistines after the capture of the ark (I Sam. 4:12-22) and was not reoccupied as a town for several centuries (Jer. 7:12, 14; etc.), we may safely credit the destruction of the other towns also to the Philistines.

Under the monarchy progress was rapid. Saul's citadel at Gibeah (Tell el-Ful), which I excavated, was still extremely simple in construction, though planned according to the patterns of its time and solidly built of hammered stones. The few constructions of David's time which can be identified with some plausibility were still simple, showing as yet no trace of Phoenician influence. Under Solomon all is changed, just as might be inferred from the chapters in Kings and Chronicles which describe his wealth and his building operations, emphasizing the part played in them by Phoenician craftsmen and enterprise. Excavations at Megiddo, Gezer, and Ezion-geber on the Red Sea have demonstrated the introduction of new techniques in building and decorative art. They have also demonstrated an extraordinary development of wealth and power. The stables at Megiddo and traces of contemporary stables at several other towns of tenth-century Palestine confirm the biblical statements about Solomon's interest in horses and chariots (I Kings 4:26-28; II Chr. 1:14; 8:6; 9:25). Nelson Glueck's work at Tell el-Kheleifeh illustrates what is said about metallurgy in I Kings 7:46. Above all, discoveries at Megiddo, Ta'ynat, and elsewhere have brought to light some of the northern models after which the temple of Solomon was planned and decorated.

3. The Aramaeans.—In the Late Bronze Age we have many references to the Semitic nomads of the Syrian Desert, then called the Ahlamu, who were scattered from the Persian Gulf to the Upper Euphrates basin. Tiglath-pileser I calls the Aramaeans, who are first mentioned in his inscriptions, the Aramaean Ahlamu, that is, the Aramaean Bedouin. From other sources it is clear that they occupied much of Syria after the collapse of the Hittite and Egyptian power there in the early twelfth century. We can, however, no more speak of a migration of Aramaic-speaking nomads from Central Arabia at this time than we can describe the Amorite inundation as coming from Central Arabia. Linguistic and other evidence make it clear that Aramaic developed as the local speech of some district of the Middle or Upper Euphrates basin, from which it spread among the seminomadic population in the oases and around the fringes of the Syrian Desert. As Aramaic spread, nomadic tribes which might better be described as Arab, joined Aramaean tribal groups. In later centuries this process was accelerated until Aramaic became the principal language of all Mesopotamia, Syria, and Palestine, and the secondary language of the entire Persian Empire. Having no urban culture of their own, the Aramaeans who settled eastern Syria and northwestern Mesopotamia adopted the Syro-Hittite culture which they found in the country. We recall that the Hittites had conquered Syria in the early fourteenth century B.C.; in the following two centuries they established a firm political organization, whose basic forms persisted into the following Iron Age. The monuments of Carchemish from Iron I illustrate the survival of Hittite art and religion. The partial decipherment of the Hittite hieroglyphic inscriptions from Syria shows even more strikingly how the old royal dynasties survived, continuing Hittite traditions down into the Aramaic period. Both the Assyrian inscriptions and the Old Testament allusions to Syria in this period call it "Land of the Hittites." In northern Mesopotamia the Hurrian tradition prevailed over the Hittite, but the difference between the Aramaean monuments of Gozan (Tell Halaf), from the tenth century, and those of Sam'al and Carchemish in Syria, from the same general period, is slight. As the Assyrians swept over the young Aramaean settlements in the ninth century, the Aramaeans lost no time in making necessary adjustments; from then on Aramaic culture became rapidly Assyrianized.

IX. The Middle Iron Age (ca. 900-600)

A. Egypt.—While Assyria was painfully awakening from its long lethargy, Egypt had re-entered the Asiatic stage under a vigorous new dynasty of Libyan origin. After the reign of Ramses III the Ramessides of the Twentieth Dynasty relapsed into helpless impotence, while the high priests of Amon at Thebes gained power steadily at the expense of the crown. Finally, about 1065 B.C., the high priest Hrihor took the title of king, and was followed by a line of Theban high priests, which was soon merged with the Tanite house founded by Smendes about the same time. This new dynasty, partly Theban and partly Tanite, is called the Twenty-first Dynasty (ca. 1065-935 B.C.). The richly adorned mummies of several of its later kings have been discovered at Tanis by Edouard Montet; the insignificance of their tombs illustrates the impotence to which they had been reduced by their powerful Libyan generals. The last of these generals, Shishak, founded the Twenty-second Dynasty, which had its seat at Bubastis, half way between Tanis and Heliopolis. On the walls of the temple of Amon at Karnak Shishak recorded the names of the Palestinian towns which his troops had taken in the fifth year of Rehoboam (I Kings 14:25); the list includes numerous north Israelite as well as Judahite names; most interesting, however, is a list of names of Edomite towns, several of which can still be identified. In the excavation of Megiddo a large fragment of a stele of Shishak came to light, confirming the inclusion of Megiddo in the Shishak list. The northward extension of Bubastite influence is further attested by the remains of two statues found at Byblos; one represents Shishak and bears an inscription of Abibaal, king of Byblos, and the other represents Shishak's son Osorkon I, with an inscription of Elibaal, king of Byblos. The increasing power of the Sidonians had endangered Byblos, which had evidently accepted nominal overlordship in return for aid against the common foe. However, the Bubastites in their turn relapsed into impotence, and there is no trace of any serious attempt on their part to intervene in the affairs of Asia after the reign of Osorkon II (middle of the ninth century).

B. Mesopotamia. 1. The Assyrian Renaissance (883-826).—Tiglath-pileser II's son, Ashur-dan II (934-912 B.C.), began the arduous process of recovering Assyria's lost empire. His son, Adad-nirari II (911-891), was more successful, driving back the advancing Aramaean tribes and extending Assyrian power to the Habur River. The next king, Tukulti-Ninurta II, successfully continued the conquest of Mesopotamia, so when Ashurnasirpal II (883-859) became king, he found Assyria well organized and ready for new wars of conquest. His voluminous inscriptions heap up nauseating details about the suppression of the surrounding peoples. While the brutality of the Assyrians was proverbial (Nah. 2-3), no other king has left such descriptions of the harrowing details, in which Ashurnasirpal seems to have found sadistic pleasure. Captives were flayed alive, impaled, burned alive, buried alive; their skins were used to decorate walls and their heads were employed to construct triumphal pyramids. In spite of the bitter hostility which such savagery aroused, the organized might of Assyria was so great that resistance crumbled in all directions. Before the end of his reign he invaded Syria, reaching the coast and receiving the tribute of Phoenicia. We do not know whether he measured swords at that time with Benhadad of Damascus, who was easily the most powerful king in Syria. However, his successor, Shalmaneser III (858-824 B.C.), invaded Syria in 853; at Qarqar on the Orontes he met the coalition of Western princes, which included a strong contingent from Ahab of Israel and even a detachment from Egypt. Apparently the Assyrians won the decision but lost so heavily that they were unable to follow up their victory. However this may be, Shalmaneser returned again and again to Syria, and by 841 had obtained the submission of Israel, though without being able to force the new Syrian king, Hazael, to his feet. In 826 the Assyrian king's son rebelled against his father, and by the time the rebellion was suppressed by Shamshi-Adad V, at least six years later, Assyrian power had to be consolidated anew.

2. The Assyrian Expansion (825-745).—Shamshi-Adad had married an Aramaean princess, one Sammuramat, who seems to have been an exceptional woman. For the first four years of her son's reign, Adad-nirari III (810-783), she was queen regent. We know nothing of the details of her administration, but it made a tremendous impression among her Aramaean kinsmen, who remembered her in their tales of the past, calling her by her native name Shamiram, which the Greeks popularized as Semiramis. As soon as her son was free (806 B.C.), he invaded the West, which he claims to have overrun as far as Philistia. Damascus surrendered to Assyrian arms, paying heavy tribute. From early in Adad-nirari's reign until the death (745 B.C.) of the last of the three sons who followed him successively on the throne, there is no royal inscription to give us information about the state of the empire. The Eponymous Chronicle and some miscellaneous official documents indicate that the highly organized Assyrian administrative system continued its somewhat ponderous grinding, while the empire lost ground slowly on all sides. In the north the kings of Urartu (Ararat) steadily built up their own empire, which came to blows repeatedly with Assyria and gradually pressed southward. The Medes and Babylonians gained their independence, and so did most of Syria. Provincial Assyrian governors assumed autonomous powers and some of their inscriptions do not even mention their masters' names.

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

3. The Assyrian Apogee (744-630).—At this critical point in the history of Assyria there was a change of dynasty, and a man of unknown background adopted the famous name of Tiglath-pileser, becoming the third of that name (744-727 B.C.). He found the Assyrian Empire in a most precarious state, following some forty years of rule by the weak sons of Adad-nirari III. The Aramaean states of Syria were in rebellion; the kingdom of Urartu was slowly closing its pincers on the Assyrian homeland. The new king acted promptly: in 743 he smashed the might of Urartu and its Syrian allies; in 740 he captured Arpad, capital of the leading Aramaean state of that time in northern Syria. From then on the Assyrian advance was rapid; Philistia was invaded in 734, and the following two years were devoted to the conquest of Damascus, which became an Assyrian province. Palestine seems to have remained passive under the onerous Assyrian yoke for a number of years, but not long after the accession of Shalmaneser V (726-722), son of Tiglath-pileser III, Samaria revolted. Unfortunately there is a break in our information for several years, so we know little about details.

The next Assyrian king, Sargon II (721-705 B.C.), was again a usurper who assumed a famous name. He proved himself, like Tiglath-pileser III, to be much more energetic and successful than kings who were born to the throne. In the year of his accession Samaria fell. Sargon tells us succinctly about the fall of Samaria in his inscriptions, probably not enlarging on the event because it was really his predecessor's achievement. The following is the longest account, which can be restored almost completely from duplicates; phrases restored from parallel texts are not indicated as such in the translation:

At the beginning of my reign, in my accession year (about January, 721 B.C.), Samaria I captured. . . . I carried away 27,290 of its inhabitants and levied fifty chariots from among them for my standing army. . . . The city I rebuilt, making it better than before, and I settled in it people from other countries which I had conquered. One of my officials I set over them as governor and I imposed tribute on them according to Assyrian practice.

Sargon continued the deportation policy which seems to have been inaugurated on a systematic basis by Tiglath-pileser III, and thenceforth rebellions were generally followed by removal of most of the rebellious population to some other region and importation of other conquered peoples into the depopulated areas. Before the end of the Assyrian Empire this practice had resulted in such complete shuffling of subject peoples that little local particularism was left. On the other hand, the amorphous mass of apathetic humanity over which the Assyrians now ruled proved to be the worst possible foundation on which to erect a dynamic state. When Assyria collapsed, the structure fell like a house of cards. During Sargon's reign numerous new provinces were set up; if he had been followed by a wise administrator, the Assyrian Empire might have become much stronger in the next generation. As it was, Sennacherib (704-681) proved to be a vindictive braggart, hated by his subjects and his own family. In 701 he invaded Palestine and defeated the Ethiopian and Egyptian army sent by Shabaka to oppose him. Hezekiah escaped loss of his throne only by paying heavy tribute and sacrificing territory.

In his famous inscription (Taylor Prism) Sennacherib tells at some length of his invasion of Judah in 701:

In the course of my campaign I besieged Beth-dagon, Joppa, Bene-berak, Yazor (Azuru), towns belonging to Sidqia, who did not submit to me at once; I conquered and plundered them. The rulers, the notables, and the people of Ekron, who had thrown Padi, their king, into iron fetters since he remained loyal to his oath of allegiance to Assyria, and had turned him over to Hezekiah the Judahite—who imprisoned him unlawfully as an enemy—were afraid. They called for aid on the kings of Egypt and on the archers, the chariotry, and the cavalry of the king of Cush (Ethiopia)—a host without number—and they came to their help. In the environs of Eltekeh they were drawn up in battle array before me and they sought recourse to arms. Relying on Ashur, my lord, I fought with them and defeated them; in the clash I captured the commander of chariotry and the royal sons of an Egyptian king together with the commander of chariotry of the Ethiopian king, all alive. The towns of Eltekeh and Timnah I besieged, captured, and plundered. . . .

As for Hezekiah, the Judahite, who did not submit to my yoke, forty-six of his strong fortified towns and the small towns in their environs without number I besieged and captured with ramps of trampled earth (aggers), with the onslaught of battering-rams, with the storming of shock troops, with tunnels and breeches in the wall and demolition. I brought out 200,150 people, young and old, male and female, together with horses, mules, asses, camels, cattle large and small without number, and counted them as spoil. Him I shut up in Jerusalem, his royal city, like a caged bird; I made a chain of forts around him and forced back those who escaped through the city gate to their doom (?). His towns, which I had plundered, I gave to Mitinti, king of Ashdod, Padi, king of Ekron, and Sillibel, king of Gaza; and I reduced his territory. I increased the tribute and the special gifts due my lordship, and imposed them upon them (the kings just listed).

As for Hezekiah himself, the terror and the splendor of my lordship overwhelmed him and he sent after me to my capital, Nineveh, the mercenaries and his elite troops, which he had brought in and had used as auxiliaries in order to strengthen the city of Jerusalem, his capital, together with thirty talents of gold, eight hundred talents of silver, precious stones, antimony, stibium, lapis lazuli in large chunks, ivory beds, ivory chairs (i.e. pieces inlaid with ivory), elephant skins, ivory, ebony, boxwood, and all kinds of valuable treasure, his daughters, palace women, male and female musicians. He also sent his courier to deliver the tribute and to make [formal] submission

In 689 Sennacherib, irritated by his constant wars with the Chaldeans who had infiltrated into Babylonia during the preceding three centuries, destroyed Babylon, apparently trying to erase it completely from the map. His son, Esarhaddon, was to be known for his great effort to rebuild the ancient capital. During his reign (680-669) he conquered Egypt and beat back the first attacks of the Cimmerian and Scythian hordes which were inundating Asia Minor and Armenia. Known to the biblical writers as Gomer and Ashkenaz, these barbarians destroyed the Phrygian monarchy of Midas and nearly conquered Lydia before they were checked.

The last great king of Assyria was Ashurbanipal, the Sardanapalus of the Greeks (668-631?), long remembered for the splendor of his reign and the catastrophe which followed his death. He was faced with difficult problems, which he solved in the Assyrian way by hammering at them with the whole might of the empire. Egypt rebelled and was subdued; the sack of Thebes in 663 made a great impression on the world of the day (Nah. 3:8). Esarhaddon had placed Ashurbanipal's uterine brother, Shamashshumukin, on the throne of Babylon; civil war broke out, dividing the empire. Finally Babylon was stormed in 648 and the rebels were savagely punished. Among the allies of Babylon had been Elam and the Arabs; both were crushed in a series of bitter campaigns which came to an end about 640 B.C. The stupid devastation of Elam removed a potentially valuable buffer state between Assyria and the growing power of the Iranians. The Arab tribesmen had taken advantage of the distraction of the Assyrian army during the civil war and had inundated eastern Syria and Palestine all the way from the Palmyrene to Mount Seir; the little states of Moab and Edom never recovered from this blow, but fell completely into Arab hands before a century had passed.

Ashurbanipal's reign represents the culmination of Assyrian civilization. The reliefs of his royal palaces are the best, from our modern Western point of view, of all the Assyrian monuments which have survived. His library at Nineveh, thousands of tablets from which are now in the British Museum, has saved for us many ancient literary and religious works which would otherwise have been lost, such as the Akkadian Poem of the Flood. The agents of the Assyrian king scoured Babylonia to collect or copy old tablets for the royal library. However, the royal inscriptions themselves were written in an ungrammatical Assyrian which cannot be compared with the language of the texts of Sargon and Sennacherib. The royal scribes already spoke Aramaic, and Akkadian was fast becoming a foreign tongue to them. As so often in history, the conquered Aramaeans had subdued their conquerors, and cuneiform Assyrian was almost completely displaced by alphabetical Aramaic as the language of commercial and administrative documents before the death of the great king himself.

4. The Assyrian Decadence (630-612).—The Assyrian Empire was tottering, and the surrounding nations were gathering for the kill. The first country to rebel and turn against its former master was Egypt. In the late eighth century the Libyan Bubastites had been conquered by the Nubian kings of Ethiopia, Kashta, and Piankhi. The Ethiopians founded the Twenty-fifth Dynasty, which lasted only a generation, from about 705 to 663; the last king Taharko, biblical Tirhakah (689-663), was driven out of Egypt by Esarhaddon in 671, and the efforts of the Ethiopians to regain control of the country proved unsuccessful. The son of a member of an old Bubastite family, who had taken the Assyrian side in the contest between would-be foreign masters, finally threw out the Assyrian officials while Ashurbanipal was busy with the war against his brother. About 650, Psammetichus, son of Necho of Sais, became king of independent Egypt, founding the Twenty-sixth, or Saite, Dynasty (which was officially dated from Necho's death in 663). When the power of Assyria began to collapse toward the end of the Pharaoh's reign, he was clever enough to take the Assyrian side against the still greater menace of the Medes, but he doubtless exacted stiff conditions from his erstwhile masters.

The second country to rebel against Assyria was Babylonia, which had now become solidly Chaldean; Nabopolassar declared his independence about 625 B.C., the date of his official accession. The Medes, under their king Cyaxares, made common cause with the Babylonians, and beneath the force of the blows from both south and east, the end could not be long delayed. In 612 Nineveh fell and the Assyrian king was killed. For a few years thereafter an Assyrian who assumed the famous old name of Ashurballit maintained the fiction of empire at Harran, the old home of Abram, but with the fall of Harran, the Assyrians ceased to be a nation. Meanwhile their Egyptian allies annexed Palestine and Syria, having defeated Josiah of Judah in 609. But four years later the Egyptians were decisively beaten by the Chaldeans at Carchemish, and soon afterward they were ousted from Asia.

The events attending the downfall of Assyria are succinctly and accurately described, with precise dating, in a tablet belonging to the Babylonian Chronicle, which was published by C. J. Gadd in 1923. Previously it had been impossible to give anything but a very general picture of what may have happened, without exact dates or details. The value of this tablet for the interpretation of Kings and such prophetic books as Nahum is very considerable. Unfortunately, the tablet is badly broken in places. It begins in the tenth year of the Babylonian King Nabopolassar (616-615 B.C.) and closes in his seventeenth year (609-608). In 612 Nineveh was besieged and taken by storm; our chronicle describes the event as follows:

[In the fourteenth year] the king of Akkad (Babylonia) levied his army, and Cyaxares, king of the Manda Hordes, marched to meet the king of Akkad. . . . They met one another. The king of Akkad . . . and Cyaxares . . . he ferried across and they marched along the Tigris . . . against Nineveh. . . . From the month of Sivan until the month of Ab three battles (?) . . . a mighty assault against the city they made. In the month of Ab . . . there was a great massacre (?). At that time Sinsharishkun, king of Assyria. . . . Many captives from the city, beyond counting, they carried away. The city they turned into mounds and heaps of ruins.

C. Palestine and Syria.—Archaeology has thrown a great deal of light on the material culture of Palestine, Phoenicia, and Syria during Iron II (ninth-sixth centuries B.C.). The material culture of Phoenicia and Palestine long retained the pattern which had been developed in the tenth century. Recent excavations at Megiddo and Samaria show the survival of the Phoenician culture of the Solomonic Age well down into the eighth century B.C. This is illustrated by the buildings of the ninth and early eighth centuries, and especially by the ivory inlay from Samaria, which so closely resembles Phoenician and Syrian ivories from the same period previously discovered at Calah and Khadattu in Assyria as well as in various parts of the Mediterranean basin. In Syria excavations at Carchemish, Sham'al (Zinjirli), and elsewhere show that Syro-Hittite art was replaced during the late ninth and early eighth century by the Assyrian style. Palestine became Assyrianized somewhat later, in the course of the late eighth and early seventh centuries.

Our knowledge of the life of the common people comes principally from the excavation of Tell Beit Mirsim, where many well-preserved houses of the eighth and seventh centuries were cleared. From this site, supplemented by finds elsewhere, it has become clear that in Judah at the time of Isaiah and Jeremiah the ordinary citizen lived much better than had been supposed by previous archaeologists, working with inadequate material and sometimes (as at Gezer and Jericho) in an entirely different period. There was more room in a house than had been supposed, and hygienic conditions in particular were much better than had been assumed before the excavation of Tell Beit Mirsim. Most unexpected was the discovery of a surprising uniformity in the way of life in this representative town, with no indication of great wealth or poverty. Everything about the town of this period suggests freedom and relative equality, together with public security, all in sharp contrast to the situation in early periods. Evidently the prophets had not labored in vain—though much that was objectionable doubtless remained to vex the god-fearing man of Judah.

X. The Late Iron Age (ca. 600-331)

A. The Neo-Babylonian Empire (612-539).—We have a wealth of written material from the Neo-Babylonian Empire, but nearly all of it consists of business documents and private letters. During the years before 1914 the German excavators of Babylon discovered many administrative records, but very few of them have yet been published. The royal inscriptions are lengthy, but seldom go beyond accounts of building operations, following a tradition of many centuries which prevented the Babylonian kings (as distinguished from the Assyrian) from mentioning their wars.

Nabopolassar's son, the Chaldean King Nebuchadrezzar II, took the name of a famous predecessor and ruled forty-three years (604-562 B.C.). Under him the boundaries of the Neo-Babylonian Empire were fixed along the lines which it maintained until its downfall in 539 B.C. His empire included Babylonia and Susiana (Elam), Mesopotamia west of the Tigris, Syria and Palestine, together with considerable areas in North Arabia. His invasion of Egypt came late in his reign and did not succeed in establishing Chaldean domination in the Nile Valley.

Under Nebuchadrezzar the language of the empire became Aramaic. There was a revival of Babylonian culture, but cuneiform was used only for formal documents, and the Aramaic tongue displaced it for all practical affairs, just as we are told by the later author of Daniel. Commerce developed and craftsmen were brought in from all parts of the empire, as well as beyond it, for use in the colossal building operations of the king. Babylon and its temples and palaces were completely rebuilt (Dan. 4:30). Chief among these constructions was the great temple tower of Marduk, god of Babylon, called "House of the Foundation Platform of Heaven and Earth" (Etemenanki), which evoked the memory of the legendary Tower of Babel. Its length, breadth (both at the bottom) and height were each about three hundred feet.

We know little about the wars of Nebuchadrezzar except what we find in the Bible, for the reasons already indicated. However, excavations and surface surveys have established the accuracy of the biblical tradition of thoroughgoing devastation. Jerusalem and all other towns of any significance were demonstrably or probably destroyed and not rebuilt until after the Restoration. The savagery of the Chaldean invasion is amply illustrated by the results of the excavation of such towns as Tell Beit Mirsim (probably Debir) and Lachish (Tell ed-Duweir). These two towns were twice destroyed within a decade or two, thus illustrating the record of two destructions in 598 and 587 B.C. in Kings. Both pottery and inscriptional data agree on the chronology of the destruction, so there is no excuse for the skepticism sometimes heard about the validity of the evidence.

Evidence from inscriptions has been slowly accumulating. In 1948 an Aramaic papyrus found in a sixth-century deposit at Saqqarah near Cairo was published by André Dupont-Sommer; it contains part of an Aramaic letter, probably from the local prince of Ashkelon, telling his Egyptian suzerain about the advance of the Chaldean armies, perhaps in 603 B.C. At Lachish J. L. Starkey discovered numerous ostraca (potsherds inscribed in ink), which vividly portray the state of mind among local officials in the Lachish area just before the invasion of 589 B.C. Written in beautiful classical Hebrew of the type familiar from the prose sections of Jeremiah, these ostraca are of equal significance to the historian and the biblical philologist. Some administrative tablets from Babylon, published by E. A. Weidner, list rations distributed in or about the year 592 B.C. among royal pensioners of all kinds, among whom is Jehoiachin, king of Judah, together with five royal princes and several other Jews living in the capital city. It is interesting to note that his name is written Yaukin, with exactly the same abbreviated form of the name which we find on contemporary seal inscriptions from Judah itself.

After Nebuchadrezzar's death the Chaldean state lasted only twenty-three years longer. Its only important ruler was also its last, Nabonidus, who associated his son, the Belshazzar of Daniel, with him on the throne. Nabonidus came from an old family of Harran in northwestern Mesopotamia, and he showed a striking preference for Aramaean gods and ways, preferring the cult of Sin to that of Marduk of Babylon, and carrying on antiquarian researches for the purpose of recovering half-forgotten cults and temples. His excavations in order to find ancient foundation records endear him to the modern archaeologist, but since he rebuilt the sanctuaries which he had first probed for records of the past, his antiquarian activities cost the state dear. Hints in the records of Nabonidus show that he also fought a number of wars, especially, it would seem, for the control of the caravan routes from the spice lands of South Arabia. These caravan routes had been steadily increasing in importance for several centuries, and the spice trade reached a high point of prosperity at this time, as we know from archaeological discoveries in Arabia and Palestine. For some reason Nabonidus decided to make his home in the oasis of Tema (Teima) in North Arabia, and here he spent years, turning the administration of the empire over to his son Belshazzar. Through his religious and fiscal policy he bitterly antagonized the priests of Marduk in Babylon, who plotted against him and welcomed the Persian invasion when it finally came in 539 B.C. We possess a poetic composition denouncing Nabonidus and praising Cyrus, who was welcomed no less, it would seem, by the priests of Marduk than by the Jewish exiles.

B. The Persian Empire (539-331).—A new Indo-European power now created an empire more powerful than any previously known.

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

Many centuries after the irruption of the Indo-Aryans into Iran (Persia) and the countries to the east and west came a similar migration of the seminomadic Iranians from the plains of Turkestan into Iran. The date of this migration is still uncertain, but the indications are that it began about the twelfth century and was practically completed by the tenth century B.C. Probably about the ninth century B.C. arose the great Iranian prophet, Zoroaster, who undertook to replace the old polytheism by a new dualism between good and evil, truth and falsehood, light and darkness. The old high gods, which the Iranians had shared with their Aryan kinsmen in India, were replaced by angels, very much as in contemporary Israel. To judge from the Avesta, which transmits the hymns and ritual of Zoroaster, the dualism of Iran was, however, much more primitive in character than the religion of the prophets of Israel. His teachings gained ground slowly, sects arose, and there was so much fusion of Zoroastrian teachings with the old polytheism (forming a mixed faith known as Magianism) that it cannot be said that Zoroastrianism was adopted by the Persian people as their national faith until the Parthian period, before and after the Christian Era. The description of Persian religion which we find in the pages of Herodotus, who wrote in the middle of the Achaemenian period, has very little in common with what we find in the Avesta.

In the seventh century B.C. the Iranian settlers created two powerful kingdoms in western Iran, one in Media, south of the Caspian Sea, and another in Persis, east of Babylonia and Susiana. Inscriptional evidence indicates that the Persian state rose first to prominence, since inscriptions of Ashurbanipal mention Cyrus I, king of Persia about 640 B.C., whereas no kings of Media appear by name in the inscriptions of this Assyrian king. But soon afterward, the Median King Phraortes was succeeded by Cyaxares, under whom the Medes gained ground with extraordinary rapidity. Their conquest of Assyria proper after storming Nineveh in 612 B.C. made them the most powerful people of southwestern Asia. Cyaxares next attacked and conquered Armenia, after which he proceeded against the Lydian Empire in central and western Asia Minor. A long war between two well-matched adversaries was brought to an end by a treaty, after the solar eclipse of 585 B.C. (predicted by the Ionian philosopher Thales) had frightened both parties into a stalemate. The last independent king of Media, Astyages, was defeated by Cyrus II, king of Persia, in 550 B.C., after a revolt of the former's Iranian troops. Thereafter Media and Persia became a dual monarchy under the permanent rule of a prince of the Achaemenian line.

Cyrus climaxed his career of conquest by overrunning Lydia (546) and the Babylonian Empire (539), dying in 530. His moderation in victory gained him a great reputation for magnanimity, well known from the Bible and Xenophon's Cyropaedia. To judge from cuneiform inscriptions written on his orders or to honor him, he understood how to endear himself to the conquered peoples. In Babylon he befriended the aggrieved priests of Marduk, but he also helped other cities and restored their cults.

The Cyrus cylinder describes the Babylonian reaction to the Neo-Babylonian regime of Nabonidus and the triumph of the Achaemenian king very vividly:

The worship of Marduk he (Nabonidus) suppressed (?); he did evil to his city daily. . . . [Oppressing its people] with a yoke beyond relief, he destroyed them all. Because of their lamentation the Lord of the Gods became terribly angry . . . their boundaries. The gods dwelling in them left their abodes, angry because [Nabonidus] had brought them into Babylon. Marduk . . . turned again to all the settlements which had been laid waste and restored the people of Sumer and Akkad, who had become like corpses; . . . he had mercy on them. All of the lands he surveyed and inspected, searching for a just prince, one according to his heart, whose hand he might take. Cyrus, king of Anshan, he called by name, he announced his name for rule over the universe. . . .

When I entered into Babylon in peace and established the seat of rule in the princely palace amid rejoicing and jubilation, Marduk, the great lord, caused the generous heart of the Babylonians to . . . me, while I strove daily to worship him. My widespread troops walked in Babylon in peace, and I did not permit anyone to terrorize any part of the land of Sumer and Akkad.

All the kings enthroned on the royal dais in all parts of the world, from the Upper Sea to the Lower Sea, the dwellers in . . . , the kings of the land of the West, all of whom dwell in tents, brought their valuable tribute and in Babylon they kissed my feet. . . . As for the cities east of the Tigris, which had been founded in antiquity, I returned the gods who dwelt in them to their shrines, and caused them to inhabit dwellings forever. All of their people I gathered and restored to their settlements.

The decree of Cyrus restoring the old city of Jerusalem to the Jews and facilitating the building of the temple, though often called a forgery by biblical scholars, is thoroughly in keeping with what we know of his policy elsewhere, and the language suits both period and circumstances so well that most historians have recognized its substantial authenticity.

His son, Cambyses II (529-522), continued

his father's policy of expansion by the conquest of Egypt and Cyrene (525), but later tradition agrees that he was not equal to his father in ability. After a brief interruption during the Magian revolt, another branch of the Achaemenian house came to power with the victory of Darius I (521-486). Darius Hystaspis was perhaps one of the greatest organizers of history. Under him the Persian Empire attained its greatest extent, from the Indus Valley to Macedonia, and from central Asia to south Arabia. There is good reason to believe that he espoused Zoroastrianism, though in what precise form remains uncertain. Under Darius the system of provinces ruled by members of the leading families arose; these governors were called satraps, and their rule became hereditary. Darius understood how to curb their power, by establishing roads and couriers who carried the royal mails with a speed previously unknown in the ancient world. The statements of Greek authors about this postal system have been illuminated by the discovery of official letters written by a great satrap named Arsames, toward the end of the fifth century, to his officials in Egypt.

The administrative system of Darius is now being elucidated through the interpretation of the Elamite documents found at Persepolis and published by G. G. Cameron. Under Darius, Aramaic documents appear in Egypt, and Aramaic was increasingly used as the common speech of the empire. Darius also introduced a system of coinage in imitation of Greek precedents, since there had never been any coinage before his time east of the Greek cities of Asia Minor.

Unfortunately for the stability of Persia, both Darius Hystaspis and Xerxes I spent the energies and resources of the empire in an increasingly unsuccessful war against the Greeks. The subsequent history of the empire is largely a story of intrigue and open war between the powerful satraps, some of whom were equal to the king himself in wealth and prestige. This was certainly true of the satrap Arsames, already mentioned, since he ruled the entire southwestern part of the empire, including Babylonia, Syria, Palestine, Egypt, and adjacent territories.

Our knowledge of Achaemenian history must be pieced together from many sources, among which the data supplied by Greek historians continue to rank high. For reliable information regarding conditions of life in the Persian Empire we turn increasingly to the discoveries of archaeologists. Mention has been made of the administrative documents in Elamite cuneiform which have been discovered at Persepolis. In Babylonia proper many thousands of economic texts and private letters have been excavated, and many of them have been published. From Egypt we have papyri and leather documents in demotic Egyptian and Aramaic. The latter come mostly from the Jewish colony at Elephantine, near the southern frontier of Egypt at the First Cataract. Two large collections of papyri from Elephantine were published by Sayce-Cowley and Eduard Sachau, and many more papyri and ostraca from different parts of Egypt were subsequently added to the already large collection. Recent discoveries have added notably to this material. Dupont-Sommer is about to publish some three hundred ostraca which were excavated nearly fifty years ago. A large collection of papyrus rolls in the Brooklyn Museum is now being published by E. G. Kraeling. Another group of some eight rolls from Hermopolis in Middle Egypt is soon to be published by Murad Kamil. And finally there is the group of leather rolls belonging to the Arsames correspondence, which will be published by G. R. Driver. All these documents belong to the fifth century B.C., and the light which they have already shed and will continue to shed on the period of Nehemiah and Ezra promises soon to make this period one of the clearest in biblical history instead of one of the most obscure.

The Aramaic documents preserved in Ezra are written in the same language that we find in these documents, though they have been slightly modernized in spelling. The administrative and political picture which we have in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah is being illustrated in numerous details by the contemporary Aramaic documents which have been discovered. There can no longer be any doubt whatever in the mind of any scholar who takes the trouble to acquaint himself with these discoveries, with regard to the authenticity of the material contained in these two books. It has been said, for example, that the word pathgam is a Greek loan word, borrowed in the Hellenistic period, and therefore a proof that the Aramaic sections of Ezra are late forgeries. Now we find the same word, in the same meanings, in the correspondence of Arsames and elsewhere in the Aramaic documents of the fifth century B.C., contemporary with the period to which they refer. Another illustration is found in the word darkemonim, "drachmas," mentioned in Ezra and Nehemiah as a standard of coinage employed in the Persian period. Critical scholars have scoffed at the suggestion that the drachma might have become known to the Jews before the conquest of Alexander about 330 B.C. However, archaeological research has long since established the fact that the Athenian (Attic) drachma standard spread before the middle of the fifth century over Syria and especially Palestine. Moreover, a considerable number of Jewish coins imitating Attic originals have come to light, they are in part inscribed with the name "Judah," leaving no doubt as to their origin. These are only a few out of many striking examples which could be given. We are accordingly entirely justified in insisting on the historicity of the matter which we find in Ezra and Nehemiah, which yields a picture entirely consistent with our new knowledge of the period.

THE OLD TESTAMENT WORLD

Thanks to these discoveries, as well as to the finds in Egypt and Babylonia, we can reconstruct a picture of an active and rapidly expanding Jewish Diaspora (Dispersion), centering in the temple of Yahweh at Jerusalem, and cultivating its sacred literature and traditions assiduously. During the last seventy years, more or less, of the independent existence of the Persian Empire, the high priests of Jerusalem enjoyed a considerable amount of autonomy, probably according to the model set by the contemporary high priests of Hierapolis (Bambyce) in northern Syria. These high priests were permitted to strike their own silver coins and levy their own taxes for the maintenance of the sanctuary. This was probably one of the most productive periods of Jewish scholarship, during which most of the canon of the Old Testament reached the standard form which we know. The Dead Sea scrolls of the last two centuries B.C. have confirmed the evidence from the Greek translation for early canonization of most of the literature of the Hebrew Bible. Hellenistic dating is no longer admissible for any of the Prophets or the Psalter, and has become very doubtful for the didactic writings—with the exception of Ecclesiastes and Daniel. The peaceful conditions which in general prevailed in Judah during the last decades of the Achaemenian Empire favored the burst of Jewish scholarly activity to which we owe the canonical form of many books of the Old Testament.

The Jews also took a very active part in the commerce and public life of their day. They played a leading role in the development of the Aramaic civilization of their day without which the later adaptation of Jewry to Hellenism would have been difficult. In the last two centuries of the Persian Empire normative Judaism was established throughout Jewry, and the first great step toward a future world Christianity was taken.

XI. Selected Bibliography

- ALBRIGHT, W. F. Archaeology and the Religion of Israel. 2nd ed. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1946. Complements the author's From the Stone Age to Christianity.
- . Archaeology of Palestine. Harmondsworth: Penguin Press, 1949. Cheap and up to date.
- . From the Stone Age to Christianity. 2nd ed. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1946. A still further revised German edition appeared in 1949. Comprehensive but somewhat difficult to read.
- BREASTED, J. H. A History of Egypt from the Earliest Times to the Persian Conquest. 2nd ed. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1912. Still standard, but needs revision in detail.
- BURY, J. B., COOK, S. A., and ADCOCK, F. E., eds. The Cambridge Ancient History. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1923-27. This important work is detailed but now out of date.
- FINKELSTEIN, LOUIS, ed. The Jews: Their History, Culture, and Religion. New York: Harper & Bros., 1949. Contains chapters by W. F. Albright, E. J. Bickerman, Ralph Marcus, et al. on biblical history and literature in the light of the surrounding world. Up to date.
- FRANKFORT, HENRI and H. A. WILSON, JOHN A., JACOBSEN, THORILD, and IRWIN, W. A. The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1946. Also reprinted in large part in a Pelican edition. The contributions of Frankfort, Wilson, and Jacobsen are particularly good.
- MCCOWN, C. C. The Ladder of Progress in Palestine. New York: Harper & Bros., 1943. Very good.
- OLMSTEAD, A. T. History of Palestine and Syria to the Macedonian Conquest. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1931. Comprehensive but already out of date.
- PRITCHARD, JAMES B., ed. Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament. Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1950. A magnificently planned and executed volume containing an enormous mass of material from all lands of the ancient East, translated by the foremost authorities in the various fields. Recommended without reservation.
- STEINDORF, GEORG and SEELE, KEITH C. When Egypt Ruled the East. Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1947. Very good.
- WRIGHT, G. ERNEST and FILSON, FLOYD VIVIAN, eds. The Westminster Historical Atlas to the Bible. Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1945. Excellent.
- The Biblical Archaeologist*. A quarterly review of current archaeology relating to the Bible. Ed. G. Ernest Wright. Published by the American Schools of Oriental Research, New Haven, Connecticut. Cheap and excellent. Recommended without reservation.

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

by THEODORE H. ROBINSON

- I. The Origins (ca. 1800-1500 B.C.)
- II. Moses and the Exodus (After 1500 B.C. [?])
- III. Entry into Palestine (ca. 1350 B.C. [?])
- IV. The Judges (ca. 1300-1030 B.C. [?])
- V. The United Monarchy (ca. 1030-936 B.C.)
- VI. The Divided Kingdom (936-721 B.C.)
- VII. Fall of Northern Israel (721 B.C.)

- VIII. Fall of Judah (586 B.C.)
- IX. The Exile (586 B.C.) and the Return (After 538 B.C.)
- X. The Maccabean Age and After (167 B.C.—A.D. 70)
- XI. Selected Bibliography

"Thy father was an Amorite, and thy mother a Hittite" (Ezek. 16:3). This was the judgment passed by a prophet early in the sixth century B.C. Such a statement may have been in a sense metaphorical, but there seems to be little doubt that it contains a large element of historical truth. Israel was a mixed people.

I. The Origins (ca. 1800-1500 B.C.)

There were three successive waves of "Semites" moving northward out of Arabia, in migrations which were separated by a millennium or more (see article "The Old Testament World," pp. 233-71). The earliest of the three, speaking an Akkadian language, occupied southern Mesopotamia, and spread up the great river valleys, subduing or dispossessing their Sumerian predecessors. The second wave, to which may be given the general title of "Amorite," seems to have broken out in two directions, moving into Mesopotamia in the east and into Syria-Palestine in the west. The third wave, which followed the second more closely than the second did the first, again took a double line, though it was stronger in the west than in the east. Its speech came under the general heading of Aramaic.

Probably all three waves started in their new areas as nomads, living at first on the borders of the cultivated land, and gradually, either by conquest or by peaceful penetration, settling down to agricultural life. The process was less complete in the case of the Aramaic-speaking group than in the other two, and till a comparatively late period Aramaean states were few,

The dates proposed in this article are the same as those adopted in W. O. E. Oesterley and T. H. Robinson, A History of Israel (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1932). Cf. another chronology in article, "The Old Testament World," pp. 233-71; cf. also article, "Chronology, Metrology, Etc.," pp. 142-52. Editors.

though they played an important part in the carrying trade of the Fertile Crescent, and a form of Aramaic became the international language of the Near East, superseding Akkadian till it in turn gave way to Arabic.

These Semitic elements, however, were far from being the only sources of Israelite blood. Constant irruptions from without added their share to the physical ancestry of peoples dwelling in the Fertile Crescent, the most important being of Hurrian origin. It was this rather than any true Semitic group which gave to the Israelites—and, indeed, to the peoples of northern Mesopotamia—their characteristic physical appearance. The name "Hittite" applies to this element of the common ancestry.

Physical ancestry, however, plays only a secondary part in determining the sense of nationality. What counts is tradition, and it is a striking fact that the traditions of Israel nearly always refer to an Aramaean group which, invading Palestine early in the Iron Age, succeeded in imposing much of its religion and social theory on the country, though in some parts its contribution to the actual blood of the population was by no means the largest. It is to this group of Aramaean tribes that the term "Israel" properly applies.

This view of Israel's origins is confirmed by the evidence of philology. Classical Hebrew is a mixed language (see article, "The Language of the Old Testament," pp. 220-32), and the mixture is of a type found elsewhere in the case of a minority conquest. The history of the English language is a good parallel. For a fairly long period Anglo-Saxon and Norman-French remained apart, but in the end the tongue of the subject people retained its position, and that of the conquerors merely added to the vocabulary. In England the process took about three centuries, but it may have been shorter in Palestine, since the Amorite and Aramaean languages are much nearer to one another than Anglo-Saxon is to Norman-French. The parallel still holds good, however, for classical Hebrew is basically the speech of pre-Israelite Canaan, with the addition of certain words from the Aramaean stock.

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

The actual traditions of Israel, as preserved in the book of Genesis, nearly all go back to the nomadic stage of the Aramaean tribes. Some of them made their way into Egypt during the Hyksos period (ca. 1800-1600 B.C.), where they were eventually reduced to slavery and put to forced labor. Thence they were rescued through Moses, and after a period of wandering in the wilderness to the south and east of Palestine, made their way into that country.

So much may be regarded as certain, but a number of questions as to details are still unsolved. Most of the narratives which have come down from pre-Mosaic days deal with individuals, the eponymous ancestors of the tribes which were eventually amalgamated into the nation of Israel. There is a strong feeling among scholars that these narratives should be interpreted as tribal rather than personal history, especially where they are concerned with marriages and other connections between individuals or groups. In the story of Jacob, for example, we are told that he had two wives, Leah and Rachel, and that he also had children by their maids, Zilpah and Bilhah. From Leah were descended six tribes, of whom the most prominent was Judah, and from Rachel the Joseph tribes, to which was attached that of Benjamin. The subordinate tribes grouped themselves around these. According to the interpretation just suggested, these narratives represent coalitions of tribes which united to constitute more or less close entities of a type similar to the Greek "amphictyony."

The important fact is that the Aramaeans not only contributed to the physical ancestry of Israel but also brought into the country, and to some extent retained, the social mentality of the nomad. This is marked by an intensely strong emphasis on the value of persons as compared with things, and by a passion for freedom. The nomad has little that can be called private property; his wealth consists in his cattle (camels, sheep, or more commonly, goats), and belongs to the tribe as a whole rather than to any individual. It follows that he is free from many problems which arise in a more complicated order of society. At the same time, he lays stress on matters which affect the life of his group as a whole, with the result that he usually holds to a high standard of sexual morality and insists on those laws and customs which are designed to protect tribal life; the most obvious of these is the principle of blood revenge. His religion is simple, at least in externals, and his deities are those which are bound up with community living. The gods worshiped by the ancestor of Israel may have been originally eponymous ancestors or semi-animistic spirits of the wilderness. But they are of little importance for the actual history of Israel, since all earlier cults were absorbed in or superseded by that of Yahweh, at least in the official religion of the united people.

The pre-Aramaean inhabitants of Palestine were of Amorite stock (to judge from their language), though with a very strong admixture of other blood, particularly Hurrian. Their political organization was that of the small "city-state," and in the period at which the history of Israel began, all Palestinian states were nominally subject to Egypt. But Egyptian control was incomplete and spasmodic, short periods of activity being interspersed with longer intervals of comparative neglect. The arts were well developed, especially that of architecture, and a number of sites which have been excavated reveal a fairly high degree of skill. The main occupations were agriculture and trade, the latter being stimulated by the geographical situation of Palestine, which forms the only land bridge between Africa and the Eurasian continent. A system of civil law was well established, and though it might vary in detail, it was generally of a type found elsewhere in western Asia. Religion was a somewhat complicated matter, centering around ancient sanctuaries and everywhere involving the worship of the fertility-powers. There was a regular calendar of agricultural festivals, and animal sacrifice was an essential part of the cultus. Human sacrifice seems to have been frequently practiced, and the ethical standard demanded by the religion was normally low—as is not uncommon in early agricultural communities. The whole order of society offered as strong a contrast as possible to that of the nomad, and the history of Israel as an independent people settled in Palestine is conditioned by the way in which these two types of organization and political theory reacted on one another.

II. Moses and the Exodus (After 1500 B.C. [?])

The history of Israel properly begins with Moses. Both in politics and in religion the nation owes to him its very existence as well as that character which made it unique among the peoples of the ancient world. He himself was endowed with an extraordinary personality, and legendary developments which may now color the traditions concerning him are an evidence of his magnitude. Curiously enough, there is practically no mention of his name outside the Pentateuch till the time of the Exile or later, but the earliest strata in the Law are full of him, and both prophets and poets frequently refer to the work that he accomplished.

Moses appeared among those Hebrew nomads who were subjected to forced labor in Egypt. The tribe to which he belonged is not known with certainty, although it is traditionally Levi (a name which in itself raises problems), but there are indications which suggest that the oldest tradition made him an Ephraimite. According to the Exodus narratives he was born during a period of oppression, when the very existence of his people was threatened. Adopted by an Egyptian princess, he was brought up at the royal court, though he seems to have been aware of his Hebrew descent. The time came when he was forced to leave Egypt, and he so-journed with a nomadic tribe, probably that of the Kenites (wandering smiths, the ancient equivalent of "tinkers") who were at the time making their home among some Midianites, probably in the Sinaitic Peninsula. There he married, and after forty years' absence from Egypt, received the divine commission to return and lead his people into freedom, that they might offer sacrifice to Yahweh, the God who had appeared to him. In Egypt he found the reigning Pharaoh unwilling to accede to the demands of Yahweh, in spite of a series of calamities which reinforced the deity's claims. Finally, as the Hebrews could not go to Yahweh's home to observe the Spring festival (Pass-over?), Yahweh came to Egypt, with disastrous consequences for the Egyptians. The Hebrews escaped in the confusion, and were pursued to the edge of the Sea of Reeds. Divine interference enabled them to cross this barrier in safety, while their pursuers were swallowed up by the returning waters. Then the people made their way to Sinai (Horeb?) where they entered into a "covenant" with Yahweh. In that act the nation was born.

Such is a rough outline of the story handed down to us in the Pentateuch. Many questions arise, some of them no longer soluble, and it is impossible here even to indicate them all (see Intro. to the book of Exodus, pp. 833-48). The account of Moses himself has been so shaped as to conform in many ways with the familiar pattern of the deliverer-hero, of whom we have several examples in the Ancient Near East and elsewhere. The figure of Moses combines Hebrew and Egyptian elements; his name is probably a hypocoristic modification of something like Ahmose, a form common in the royal houses of the Eighteenth and Nineteenth Dynasties.

The date and place of the Exodus are much disputed. The former has to be considered in connection with the conquest of Palestine, and the latter is closely linked with the situation of the sacred mountain. The terminus a quo is that of the expulsion of the Hyksos and the establishment of the Eighteenth Dynasty; on the other hand, a date so far down as the twelfth century has been suggested (see article, "The Old Testament World," p. 256). The two favorite dates are the middle of the Eighteenth Dynasty and the middle of the Nineteenth, i.e., roughly 1450-1400 B.C., and about a century later. In the former case the Pharaoh of the oppression was Tutmose III; in the latter, Ramses II. Strong arguments may be adduced for each, though in my opinion the balance of evidence is in favor of the earlier date.

The location of Sinai is also much disputed. The conventional identification of the site with the Jebel Musa in the Sinaitic Peninsula is due to a comparatively late tradition. The mention of Midianites has led some scholars to place the sacred mountain to the east of the Gulf of Aqaba, since that was the region assigned to the Midianites in the first century A.D. Others would find a clue in the name 'Ain Kadis, a spot lying midway between the Egyptian border and the most southerly of Palestinian sites, Beersheba. Still others suggest a place well to the north of Egypt, near the Mediterranean coast. If the first-named proposal were adopted, the "Red Sea" would be the northern end of the Gulf of Aqaba; the second would imply an ancient extension of the Gulf of Suez. According to some scholars, the accounts given in Exodus suggest that the mountain of the Law was an active volcano. This would have been a most useful clue if there had been any trace of volcanic activity in recent geological time anywhere near the Egyptian-Palestinian frontier, but none has been offered.

Of the two accounts describing the crossing of the Red Sea which have been interwoven in Exod. 14 (see Exeg.), the earlier seems to be that which depicts a withdrawal of the water, leaving a stretch of bare sand, which was first turned into a quicksand and then covered by the return of the sea. This may have been due to an earthquake, or it may have been the natural action of the tide, especially if the site lay between the present Bitter Lakes and the Gulf of Suez. To a people knowing only the tideless Mediterranean this would inevitably appear miraculous. We must admit that we know for certain neither where the sea was crossed nor where the sacred mountain stood.

But the exact location of Sinai matters little. What is important is the event. Somewhere the Hebrews made their escape in a fashion which proved to them that Yahweh was working for them, and somewhere they met him. It was then that the real work of Moses was accomplished; the rest was but a preliminary. What was done there was the making of a covenant between Yahweh and Israel.

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

The conception of a covenant is fundamental to the whole history of the people, and a clear understanding of its significance is needed. To the modern ear the word implies something like a bargain. Not so to ancient Israel. A covenant meant the union—indeed, the unification—of two parties who had previously been independent but were now to be regarded as a single entity. It might apply within a limited range of activity; there might be conditions imposed on both sides, or conditions imposed only on one side, or no conditions at all. In a sense, the Sinai covenant was one-sided. Israel undertook certain obligations; Yahweh undertook none, except to be the God of Israel. It has been plausibly conjectured that he was already accepted by Hebrew (or Kenite?) groups which had never been in Egypt, and which regarded the sacred mountain as his home and therefore their own religious center. What gods the others worshiped we do not know for certain, but there are enough references to "strange gods" to make it clear that they had a number of cult-objects among them. In the future they were to have only the one, and so found a unity not only with other groups but with a single God. The people Israel had come into existence, and what made them a people was their unification in Yahweh.

Two forms of covenant ritual are mentioned in Exod. 24 (see Exeg.). The first is simply a common meal, shared by the deity and by representatives of the people (vss. 1a, 9-11). The other (vss. 1b-8) is more elaborate. An "altar" represents the deity. Victims are killed and their blood drained into bowls. Half this blood is thrown over the altar. The terms to be observed by the people are read and accepted, and the remainder of the blood is thrown over them. Both forms point in the same direction. The two parties, originally separate, have now been united to one another through their union with a third party—the slaughtered victim—whose vital essence has entered into or includes all who have shared in the ritual. Henceforward they are one.

We can no longer state exactly what were the original terms imposed by the covenant on Israel. But we are certain that they included moral obligations, and that the standard of conduct indicated was much that was expressed in the familiar Ten Commandments, though it does not follow that these were then written down in the form in which we have them now.

Whatever the conditions, one important fact remains beyond dispute: Israel was a single people, a nation, and she had achieved her unity, indeed her existence, through union with Yahweh. This historical achievement was the work of Moses.

III. Entry into Palestine (ca. 1350 B.C. [?])

The narrative which describes the entry of Israel into Palestine is on the surface simple and straightforward. During the lifetime of Moses, after an unsuccessful attempt to enter the land from the south (Num. 14:40-45), the country to the east of Jordan and north of the Arnon was conquered and occupied (Num. 21: 21 ff.). Immediately after Moses' death the people were led by Joshua across the Jordan (Josh. 3). Jericho fell at once (Josh. 6), and the next conquest was that of Ai, in the central hills, not far from Bethel (Josh. 8). The people of Gibeon, in the same general region, submitted voluntarily, and became serfs to the Israelites (Josh. 9). A coalition of kings ruling in central Palestine was defeated, and most of their territory passed into Israelite hands (Josh. 10). This gave control of the center of the land, and from that point the Conquest proceeded north and south. When the whole was occupied, the tribes met and solemnly divided the land between them, having exterminated their predecessors, with some few exceptions such as the Gibeonites.

Further examination, however, shows that this story is an idealized presentation of history; in fact the Conquest was neither sudden nor complete. Many of the places listed in Judg. 1 were not subdued. In the fertile parts of the country, especially in the Esdraelon district, the old inhabitants remained, and relations between them and the Israelites were often strained, one side or the other subjecting their opponents to forced labor. Jerusalem remained a foreign city down to the time of David, and Gezer till the reign of Solomon.

The evidence of archaeology is also significant. One instance will suffice. The book of Joshua ascribes the fall of Jericho and that of Ai to the same period; indeed, we get the impression that the interval was not more than a few weeks. But certain archaeological data indicate that the two events were several centuries apart. Ai was destroyed early in the second millennium B.C., and not reoccupied till after 1200. Jericho appears to have fallen in the first half of the fifteenth century B.C., though some archaeologists would put the date as late as the thirteenth century. It seems clear that Israel was well established in the land before the arrival of the Philistines soon after 1200 B.C.

We have to face the probability that the actual conquest was spread over a period of several centuries, and that it was carried out spasmodically by different groups acting independently—some of them may even have settled before the descent into Egypt. Traditions have been handed down from a number of sources, giving details of conquest here and there. Such are the accounts of Kiriath-sepher and Bethel given in Judg. 1; in neither case is there any suggestion of united Israelite action, nor is Joshua mentioned. It seems clear that a collection of these traditions has been crystallized into the continuous narrative which we have before us in the book of Joshua, though even there we find signs of a variant tradition, and indications that the whole has been colored by a religious theory which is usually ascribed to a comparatively late period in the monarchy.

But allowing for all this, we can trace three main stages in the Israelite conquest of Palestine. The book of Numbers records an unsuccessful attempt made from the south, shortly after the making of the great covenant (Num. 14). There are, however, signs of its renewal (cf. Num. 21:1-3), and though elsewhere the narrative places the conquest of the southern area after that of central Palestine, and ascribes it to a southward movement, there is reason to suspect that the actual advance was made in the opposite direction. Here it will be enough to note two points. In the first place, Jerusalem and Gezer—possibly other strong places as well—long held out against the newcomers. One can best explain this by assuming a gap between the main Israelite settlements in the center and the south, which would have been unlikely if the movement had been in one direction only. The other is the fact that Judah (the chief element in the south) always stood a good deal apart from the central and northern tribes. There is a tradition, for example, which looks on Judah as permanently settled even in the patriarchal age (Gen. 38), and it is usual today to consider this tribe as one of those which never were subject to Egyptian slavery, or possibly as a Canaanite group absorbed into the Israelite whole only long after the general settlement. In the earliest times the southern members of the covenant people seem to have been rather nomads like Kenites and Jerahmeelites, perhaps even Amalekites. But whether the event came early or late, southern Palestine was occupied by a section of the Israelite people, and was included in the area covered by the Yahweh cult.

There is less uncertainty about the conquest of the country to the east of the Jordan. Biblical texts assign it to the lifetime of Moses, and there may be good ground for the tradition.

Archaeological evidence has not yet pronounced a verdict on the age of these conquests. Num. 21 mentions the overthrow of two kings to the east, Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og king of Bashan. The territory of the latter lay to the north, and stretched out to the desert, though it does not seem to have included any part of what later became the Damascus district, since the latter was still dominated by seminomad Aramaeans in David's day. Here, till the rise of Damascus in the reign of Solomon, there seems to have been no serious frontier question. But to the south the matter was different. The land between the Arnon and the Jabbok was always in dispute between Israel and Moab. The Moabites were held to be of Aramaean stock, though their language was Amorite (as that of Israel afterwards became). They may, then, have had an early history not unlike that of the Israelites, overcoming and subduing an older Amorite population. It is difficult to form a clear opinion of them; their only well-known literary monument—the Mesha (Moabite) stone—dates from the ninth century B.C. There is in Judg. 11 the argument that the disputed territory had been given to Sihon's people in the first instance, while in Num. 21:27 ff. there seems to be the remains of a song which commemorates the conquest of this area by Sihon. Israel claimed that, as Sihon's successors, she had a God-given right to all that he had possessed, no matter how he had acquired it. But whatever the actual rights of the position were, there was always the possibility of strife along the frontier, and the Moabite inscription was set up to record an advance of Moab into the country north of the Arnon. At the same time, it is clear that a considerable part of this east Jordan land remained genuinely Israelite, and the fact proved to be of the highest importance in the development of the Israelite religion and social theory.

The occupation of the central hills was carried out in the main by the Joseph group, and there is no reason to doubt the tradition which makes Joshua their leader. The Jordan was crossed easily, perhaps, on account of a heavy landslide near the mouth of the Jabbok, which dammed the stream for a time (Josh. 3), and Jericho fell almost at once (Josh. 6). Recent excavations have made it almost certain that the city walls collapsed as the result of an earthquake—perhaps one of a series which was also responsible for the stoppage in the river. The city was then burned. From this point an entry into the hills was comparatively easy, and with the fall of Bethel (which may have taken place only after the death of Joshua—cf. Judg. 1:22-26), the invaders were able to make their headquarters in the center of the land. They spread down toward the western coast, where they held their own till the advent of the Philistine migrants. The "hill country of Ephraim" was more thoroughly Israelite than any other part of the country. The earliest great national shrine was established at Shiloh, and archaeological research has shown that the Hebrews made far more use of the land than did any of their predecessors. In a large number of sites the first signs of occupation belong to the early Iron Age, in strong contrast to some other places whose relics can be traced back even beyond the Bronze Age. It follows that they were not occupied till the period of Israelite invasions.

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

It seems that the strong cities and fertile lands of the plain of Esdraelon long resisted any Israelite attacks. There may have been some penetration, but it is clear that in this area Israel was never in a commanding position till the time of David. Cities like Megiddo, Taanach, Jezreel, and Bethshean still continued to be directly under Egyptian rule. The last-named certainly had an Egyptian garrison till late in the period of the Judges, and there the Egyptian occupation was immediately followed by that of the Philistines. Standing as it did where it could cover one of the main fords of the Jordan, Bethshean was one of the key positions in Palestine, for it was traversed by one of the great routes of the ancient world. David was the first Israelite leader to hold it.

The fourth area of conquest was in the far north. Here Joshua is said to have overthrown a certain Jabin king of Hazor, in a battle fought by the "waters of Merom" (Josh. 11). This site was once identified as Lake Huleh, but modern opinion is inclined to locate it somewhere else in northern Galilee. It also seems clear, especially in view of the situation in the plain of Esdraelon, that the attack was delivered from the east and not from the south, and this military operation, like the southern invasion, was probably quite independent of Joshua. The Hebrews penetrated far up into the valleys which lie between the Lebanon and the Anti-Lebanon ranges. Their ideal frontier was "the entering-in of Hamath," and whether they always effectively occupied the whole or not, they certainly claimed as their own the land as far north as the watershed between the Litany and the Orontes.

So after a long and slow process the land was occupied. In many places the occupation remained incomplete, and the older inhabitants still held their position. There may have been much mingling of blood, and certainly, as the Israelites settled down, they tended to adopt the civilization, religion, and language of the more highly cultured peoples whom they displaced. There was no unified political organization; each group was largely free to act as it saw fit and to remain independent even of its Israelite fellows. Some Hebrew clans, especially to the east of the Jordan, remained nomadic; others became sedentary farmers and city dwellers. But they were still conscious of their unity. The covenant mediated by Moses had given them the sense of a common life, and formed a far stronger bond of union than their traditions of a common ancestry. In their national cult of Yahweh they were one, and at his call became, at least for the time being, a single people who were compelled to work together for a common cause. The full effects of this awareness were not apparent in the earliest stages of the conquest, but in later times again and again the influence of Moses' work was manifest, to the salvation of Israel and to the development of her faith.

IV. The Judges (ca. 1300-1030 B.C. [?])

The establishment of Israel in Palestine did not mean that there was in any modern sense a Hebrew state. On the contrary, modern historians envisage a number of more or less isolated groups, each carrying on its own affairs normally without reference to its kinsmen, and uniting only when some great peril threatened them. For the most part they were in the middle of the larger masses of their predecessors, and gradually learned the operations of agriculture and city life. In doing so they naturally tended to take over Canaanite points of view and methods, both in secular and in religious matters—if it is possible to separate the two. Exceptions to this gradual absorption into the existing community are to be found only to the east of the Jordan and to the far south, where the land was not suited to agriculture or to the building of large cities, on account of the scanty water supply. To the east in particular there seems to have come a comparatively dry spell about the beginning of the Iron Age, since there are plenty of traces showing an earlier occupation of the land. But the evidence of the Old Testament points to a traditional maintenance of the shepherd life on a large scale in this area (cf. Num. 32). It seems probable also that Israelite blood and customs remained purer in the central hills, at least between the Jerusalem region and the plain of Esdraelon, though even there a certain amount of cultural syncretism took place, as the story of Gideon shows (cf. Judg. 8:31).

Throughout the period—roughly about two centuries—between the entry into Palestine and the unification of the people into a single political whole, Palestine was subject to attacks from the outside. In addition, there were conflicts from time to time with the earlier inhabitants, though such occurrences seem to have become exceptional as time went on.

Leaders against enemies from outside were found in the so-called "judges." The word shôphêt, as the use of its Phoenician cognate in Carthage shows (see the Latin sufes), meant to the Semitic mind far more than the administration of justice in the ordinary sense. "Judges" were men who felt themselves called to the leadership of their people in times of distress, and were able to send out a call in the name of the national God. At the same time, their activities do not seem as a rule to have covered a very wide range. They gathered about them the men of their own and neighboring districts, won their victories, and secured for themselves a real authority during their lifetime. In only one instance do we hear of an attempt to establish an actual kingdom with a hereditary dynasty, and that proved to be a failure.

The book of Judges presents a series of these rulers, and arranges them in a regular framework, involving also a chronological scheme. The latter has the appearance of being an artificial structure, with its repeated periods of twenty or forty years. The framework itself seems also to be based on a special theory of history, and runs somewhat as follows: The Israelites forgot Yahweh their God, and he sold them into the hands of a foreigner who oppressed them for some years; they repented and cried to Yahweh, who raised up for them a deliverer who "judged" Israel for a number of years; and Israel served Yahweh all the days of this hero, but after his death they forgot Yahweh and served the Baals. And then the whole cycle begins again. Now this pattern may have been due to a religious theory, but it embodies a sound philosophy of history. The independent communities of Palestine were seldom strong enough to repel invaders by themselves; it was only in combination that they could muster the necessary strength, and even then, as the narrative of Joshua testifies, they were liable to be overthrown by the battle fury of the hardy wilderness tribes. In the absence of help from Egypt (and the Tell el-Amarna documents show how difficult it might be to arouse the Egyptian court to activity), they had neither the will nor the power to oppose a united front to the raiders. Their religion, strongly corrupted by the cult of the Baals, or local fertility spirits, may have encouraged a village patriotism, but otherwise it was a disintegrating, not a uniting force. Whenever Israelites adopted Canaanite forms of worship, they too were disunited. But in Yahweh they had a unifying power which covered all the tribes, including those far away from the scene of trouble; all were morally bound to answer a call sent out in the name of the covenantal deity. This religious factor made them formidable to enemies, and under the leadership of inspired judges they were often able to save their districts from plunder and slaughter. Surviving Canaanites profited by Israelite unity, and this fact, more than any other, enabled the Hebrews to impose on the whole land in large measure a Yahwistic pattern of living. It may be said that the Hebrews conquered Palestine not by destroying their predecessors, but by defending them.

The full list of the judges includes twelve names, counting Deborah and Barak together. Of these, six are generally regarded as minor, since little is said about their exploits; of the other six, tradition has fairly long accounts to give. Only in one instance is the enemy a Canaanite power. That is the case of Sisera, a local prince of the Esdraelon region, who clearly made life difficult for the Israelites in or near this part of the country. His defeat and death were celebrated in one of the finest pieces of ancient Hebrew poetry which have been preserved, the so-called "Song of Deborah" (Judg. 5). It is contemporary with the events which it records, and constitutes the best available witness to the conditions and ideas of the period. The little clans gathered in answer to the appeal sent out by an inspired prophetess. Some refused to help and ignored the summons; they were cursed. The rest were little more than a wild horde, collected on the slopes to the north of the Kishon Valley. They were not adequately armed as compared with their foes, who were well equipped with chariots. But as they looked out over the enemy crossing the plain, a thundercloud gradually rose in the south, and Israel saw in it the coming of Yahweh from his southern home. Panic fell on Canaanite horse and man, who turned at the breaking of the storm. Before they reached the farther banks of the swollen torrent of Kishon, beyond which lay their safety, they were drowned in large numbers. Sisera himself fled alone, and was murdered by a Kenite woman in whose tent he had sought refuge. This is regarded as the climax of the whole story; it is the death of the personal enemy which brings the real triumph.

The other enemies were all invaders from outside Palestine. One of the first to be mentioned is Moab, which apparently was not content with expanding into the disputed territory north of the Arnon, but crossed the Jordan River into central Palestine. The hero in this case was a Benjamite named Ehud, and he achieved the deliverance of Israel by assassinating the Moabite king, Eglon (Judg. 3:12-30).

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

One event, which belongs wholly to Trans-Jordan, introduces the story of Jephthah the Gileadite (Judg. 11), who is best known for the sacrifice of his daughter in performance of a vow. It is not quite clear who his enemies were; they are called Ammonites, but in arguing with them Jephthah seems to have been speaking to Moabites. Perhaps traditions from two different sources have been intertwined.

The most southern oppressor was a certain Cushan-rishathaim, who was king of Mesopotamia (Judg. 3:7-11). Here again the historical details are uncertain, for such an adversary would have naturally attacked from the north, but the deliverer was Othniel, the hero of southern Palestine, who was held to have been the son-in-law of Caleb (Judg. 1:13).

A good deal of space is given to Gideon, otherwise known as Jerubbaal (Judg. 6-8). Once more records of two distinct invasions appear to have been telescoped into a single narrative. The raiders came from the east, and were of that class of wilderness nomads to which Israel originally belonged. In one case the chiefs of the enemy are named Oreb and Zeeb—"Raven" and "Wolf"—and in the other Zeba and Zalmunna. The story of the latter involved trouble with the town of Succoth, to the east of the Jordan, and with the tribe of Ephraim, which was jealous of Manassite leadership. One significant feature of the story is the abortive attempt at the establishment of a monarchy, made by Gideon's son, Abimelech, who was partly of Canaanite descent (Judg. 9).

A far more serious enemy threatened the independence of Israel, and indeed of all Palestine. Extensive racial movements were taking place in the last quarter of the second millennium B.C., and one of the early cultures was coming to an end. Some of the ancestors of the Greeks were breaking into the region of the eastern Mediterranean, destroying or driving out those peoples generally known as the Aegeans. It was the era of the Trojan wars, and foreign pressure was driving the dispossessed Aegeans southward from Crete and the coasts of Asia Minor. They migrated by land and sea, heading toward Egypt. Naturally their route led them down the coast of Palestine, but early in the twelfth century they were checked on the borders of Egypt by Ramses III. They made their home in the coastal plain, and we have indications of the effect produced by their arrival on Israel. The first sufferers were the Danites, who had penetrated to the sea. Their resistance is best seen in the familiar stories of Samson, in whose day the Danite settlements seem to have been reduced to two small villages (Judg. 13-16). A narrative attached to the end of the book of Judges (chs. 17-18) tells of the way in which the remainder, including only six hundred fighting men, made their way to the north, and settled as far from the Philistines as they could, in a valley lying between the Lebanon and the Anti-Lebanon ranges. Here was the city to be known later as Dan, the most northern of the Israelite settlements.

Philistine pressure, however, was not yet spent. The complete political disunion of the Palestinian cities is exemplified in the story of the Benjamite war, which forms the second appendix to the book of Judges (chs. 19-21). Attempts to unite the people failed, and the Philistines made their way up into the hills, establishing military posts even on the eastern side of the central range, though they did not cross the Jordan. Farther north they put an end to the last remains of Egyptian occupation by the capture of Bethshean, and from that point southward they reduced the inhabitants to submission. One or two places, however, remained independent, apparently in some kind of alliance with the Philistines. Chief of these was Jerusalem, one of the strongest fortresses of the ancient Near East. The completeness of the Philistine conquest over a large part of Palestine is attested by the story of the battle fought at Ebenezer, where the Philistine booty actually included the ark (I Sam. 4). It seems highly probable that the one great shrine in Israel, that of Shiloh (cf. Jer. 7:12), was destroyed as a result of this crushing defeat.

So the period of the judges closed with the Philistines' supremacy in western Palestine. Comparatively small local combinations had sufficed to defeat and destroy other invaders, but the Philistines were cast in a different mold. They were a people of great skill and high culture, the survivors of long and heroic wars, and it is clear that some closer and stronger form of amalgamation was necessary if they were to be driven out of the central lands. The story of the period of the judges is the record of the way in which the isolated elements in western Palestine were gradually welded into a single whole by the hammer strokes of foreign invasion; the presence of the Philistines made a final unification imperative.

V. The United Monarchy (ca. 1030-936 B.C.)

The Philistine threat called for a far higher degree of centralization than was possible under the loose system (if it can be called a system at all) which prevailed through the period of the judges. With the need arose the man: Saul, son of Kish, a Benjamite. Like the judges, he was summoned to his task by direct inspiration; his office was in the first instance charismatic. He was indeed the typical "nabi," or ecstatic prophet, subject to strange psychological conditions which came upon him from time to time. The story of his anointing by Samuel is familiar (I Sam. 9:1-10:16). Samuel is presented alternately as a seer, a priest, and a judge, and once the term "prophet" is applied to him. It is as a seer that he played his part in the anointing of Saul, and the earlier strata of the numerous stories which have gathered about him do not give him any active military role in the course of events. There is, however, no reason to doubt his connection with Saul, or the very important place he took in the early days of the monarchy.

Saul's first great act was the relief of Jabesh-gilead, threatened by Ammonites (I Sam. 11:1-13). On this occasion he acted exactly as the older judges had done, and might have gone no farther than they did but for the pressure of the Philistines. This first exploit, however, gave Saul immense prestige and secured for him a base to the east of the Jordan, on which he could fall back if necessary. That connection remained throughout his life and that of his son.

The Philistines seem to have tolerated Saul, perhaps treating him as a local ruler under their authority. They had posts in various places among the central hills, and, at selected spots, government officials. War with the Philistines was started when Jonathan, Saul's son, killed an official (I Sam. 13:3), and Saul summoned the clans to gather to his standard. The most eastern garrison seems to have been at Michmash, looking down on the Jordan Valley. Saul lay a few miles away, but his force dwindled till Jonathan took advantage of a raid which the Philistine garrison was making to attack and destroy the few men left to hold the fort. The result was a general rising (I Sam. 14:1-46), which swept the Philistines from the hill country and confined them to the plains to the west and north. Saul's authority was practically complete over the central range and to the east of the Jordan, but he never occupied the Jerusalem area or the Plain of Esdraelon. All his life he was engaged in the struggle to keep the Philistines out of the central hills. As long as their main assaults were made from the west he was successful, probably because chariots were comparatively useless in the high and narrow valleys, but at last they moved from the north, since they were now in complete occupation of the plain of Esdraelon. Saul and most of his sons fell in battle on Mount Gilboa, which looks down on the plain, and the hill country once more fell under Philistine control (I Sam. 31).

Saul left a successor greater than himself. David the Bethlehemite had been a successful warrior in Saul's army, till the king's jealousy was aroused, and the young man took service with Achish, king of Gath (I Sam. 21:11-16). He thus had links with the Philistines, and may also have been connected with Moab through Ruth, an ancestress of his. He used his position with Achish to win for himself the enthusiasm of the extreme south of the country, and at the same time gathered about him a band of refugees from all Israel (I Sam. 27). After Saul's death he felt strong enough to act by himself, and selected Jerusalem as the first point of attack. The Philistines appear to have had some interest in the city, though nominally it was still in the hands of the Jebusites, for David had to fight a series of battles and sustained several setbacks before he succeeded in taking the place through an exploit of Joab, his captain (II Sam. 5:6-9).

Even before the capture of Jerusalem, the house of Saul had come to an end with the murder of Ishbosheth (II Sam. 4:1-8; called Esh-baal in I Chr. 8:33), and all Israel recognized David as king (II Sam. 5). He showed his genius as a statesman by making his new conquest the capital of the land. Apparently this decision was not reached at once, for he broke down the defenses to the north of the old city, the most vulnerable point, and had to restore them later. But his occupation of the place solved one of his problems: the "city of David" had belonged neither to Judah nor to northern Israel, and so was as independent of the various elements composing his dominions as Washington and Canberra are of their countries.

David's military efforts did not stop with the capture of Jerusalem. It is a curious fact that we have little record of his further activities against the Philistines; the battles recorded took place in the Jerusalem campaign for the most part. But he certainly drove the Philistines from the plain of Esdraelon, and established his authority far north into the valleys between the Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon ranges—the "entering-in of Hamath" was his traditional frontier.

The whole of western Palestine (except for the Philistine cities to the southwest) was thus for the first time in its history formed into a single political unit under a native ruler. But the land was still as exposed as ever to assault from the outside, and David's next care was to erect barriers around it. Edom (cf. II Sam. 8:14; I Kings 11:15-16), Moab (II Sam. 8:2), Ammon (II Sam. 10; 13:26-31), and the Aramaean tribes (II Sam. 10:6-19) to the northeast were defeated in battle and subdued. A close alliance of friendship was formed with the Phoenician powers (II Sam. 5:11; 8:9-10), and it is clear that this was to the advantage of both parties. To the southwest the Philistines were no longer formidable. Palestine was thus protected on every side, and the Israelite portion of the land was able to develop in security. It is no wonder that the reign of David was regarded in later times as the golden age in Israel's history.

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

These outer conquests were even more important from the economic point of view than from that of politics. Squeezed between the Great Sea and the Arabian Desert, Palestine formed a regular ganglion of trade routes. The caravans which came to the Phoenician ports or to Egypt had to pass through David's territories. Egypt could be reached by the rest of the world only through Palestine or the drier route to the east of the Jordan; both were now in David's hands. The occupation of Edom meant control of the ports at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba, and opened the door to sea traffic with the farther east; there is little doubt that in this period there was trade between Israel and India. It is possible, too, that there was some commerce with eastern Africa.

It is obvious that no trade passed through David's territories without leaving something to his advantage. He is reputed to have built up vast financial reserves, and Palestine in ancient times had little if any exportable products. International trade was still in the hands of the crown; the wealthy class mentioned by the literary prophets in the eighth and seventh centuries had not yet come into being. The commercial advantage was reaped by the king, and it was rendered possible by the possession of the great lines of international communication.

David did not neglect the affairs of his own country. As time went on it is clear that he developed a highly organized system of internal administration, although no allusion to such an organization is found in the record till the reign of Solomon (cf. I Kings 4:7 ff.). The various elements in the population were still far from being united, and at least twice in David's reign the mutual jealousies of north and south endangered his position. Some kind of secure control was indispensable.

In the two rebellions mentioned David owed his success largely to his military organization. For wars abroad he could rely on the national levies, a kind of militia in which every Israelite was bound to serve. At its head was the doughty old warrior Joab, who had followed David faithfully since the early days. As this force might well have proved insufficient in case of domestic trouble, the king maintained also a permanent military establishment composed of professional soldiers, many, if not most of them, recruited from outside Israel, and particularly from among the Philistines. Their leader, Benaiah, to judge from his name, was an Israelite, and David seems to have instituted various orders of merit and distinction within the royal bodyguard. There can be little doubt as to David's organizing ability, and if his successors had been his equals, Israel might have risen to a commanding position among the nations.

At the same time, sociological changes were taking place which were destined to have a profound effect on the future of the people. It must never be forgotten that the population not only was mixed in blood, but also contained elements whose social practices were very different from one another. On the one hand there were the older peoples, long accustomed to agriculture and resigned to a more or less despotic rule. They had the normal Oriental outlook and regarded the king as a supreme person to whom all his subjects stood in the relation of slaves to their master, with no rights of person or of property against him. On the other side stood the free Israelite, clinging to the traditions handed down from Mosaic days, impatient of authority, and insisting on the rights of every free member of the community. It was to the latter element that David had owed his elevation, and those of his early comrades who survived into the period of his prosperity still clung to the old ideals. A striking instance of their influence is given in the story of Uriah and Bathsheba (II Sam. 11-12). Nowhere else in the ancient world would the king's conduct have been regarded as iniquitous or even abnormal; in all probability an Eastern monarch would not have troubled to put the husband to death. But the spirit of Israel arose against the adultery and the murder, and found expression in Nathan. It is a striking tribute to the strength of the tradition that not only was the protest made, but that David accepted it, and acknowledged the justice of the rebuke. We cannot imagine any other king in the ancient East behaving as David did.

At the same time, it appears that the other tendency was at work, and in his later days David was drifting into the position of an ordinary Oriental autocrat. The existence of his bodyguard is significant, and the revolts which the king had to meet may have hardened his outlook. Matters came to a climax in his old age, when a palace revolution put the young prince Solomon on the throne and overthrew the popular candidate, Adonijah (I Kings 1). The names of each side are revealing—Joab and Abiathar, companions of David's youth, are with Adonijah, and clearly the "democratic" principle might have found some support from him. But Solomon had been born in the purple, some time after the last of David's foreign wars, and knew little or nothing of the way in which the genuine Israelite spirit had raised his father to the throne. His accession was a victory for the principle of autocracy.

Even so, a wise man might have preserved and strengthened the new Israelite state, but Solomon was quite unfit for the task. Vain, ostentatious, shortsighted, selfish, and cowardly, he was unscrupulous in the attainment of his ends, and largely indifferent to the personal values which meant so much to the genuine Israelite. Nevertheless, he had certain mental abilities. If tradition is to be trusted, he was a clever judge (cf. I Kings 3:16 ff.) and had a pretty turn for epigram (cf. I Kings 4:32). It is to this fact that he probably owes his reputation for wisdom. His great passion was for building, and he has gone down in history as the founder of the temple. But this was not his only work. Jerusalem itself was enriched with magnificent structures on which no expense was spared. He established a force of chariotry, and modern excavation has revealed some of his stables; that at Megiddo, for example, had accommodation for two hundred chariots. It was also in his reign that the last of Canaanite strongholds, Gezer (I Kings 9:16-17), fell into Israelite hands.

It is to be noted that Solomon himself did not conquer Gezer. It was captured and sacked by his Egyptian father-in-law, probably one of the last Pharaohs of the Twenty-First Dynasty. In spite of his equipment, he did not undertake any war; he made no attempt to recover the outlying dependencies with which David had so carefully surrounded his proper kingdom. Edom fell away (I Kings 11:14-22), and the Aramaeans to the northeast revolted, setting up an independent state at Damascus (I Kings 11:23-25). These political events had an important bearing on Israel's domestic history.

For Solomon's aims involved considerable expense, and his temperament was far from frugal. He had to import all his best material, especially timber for his buildings and precious metals for their adornment. Horses, too, were not bred in Palestine, and had to be purchased in Egypt. It was not long before the treasure accumulated by David was exhausted, and the king had to find other sources of income. One method of reducing expense was to impose the corvée (I Kings 5:13-14; 9:15), that forced and unpaid labor which every true Israelite regarded as the final violation of human rights. Matters were not improved by the fact that a large part of the service had to be rendered as unskilled labor in the cedar forests of the Lebanon. Every Israelite peasant had to give one third of his year to the king's service, and for the purposes of this conscription the land was divided into twelve districts (I Kings 4:7-18). Judah, it seems, had preferential treatment, for it is not included in the list. The loss of Edom and of the Damascus area meant that a large proportion of the royal income from trade disappeared, and in the end Solomon was forced to cede to the Phoenician king a portion of his territory in order to liquidate his debts (I Kings 9:11-13). There is also the darker suspicion that he was in the habit of selling his own subjects, particularly to Egypt; man power was the only exportable product of Palestine in the tenth century B.C. The reign which had begun in such brilliance closed in gloom, and it was already clear that David's ideals would never be realized in the political world.

VI. The Divided Kingdom (936-721 B.C.)

On the death of Solomon, his son Rehoboam was accepted by Jerusalem and Judah, which had suffered less than the north from royal oppression. But when the new king came to Shechem to take the covenant imposed on Israelite sovereigns (Solomon's coup d'état had apparently escaped this national custom), he was at once faced with a demand for the relaxation of the corvée. Rejecting the crafty advice of those councilors who recommended him to make promises which he did not need to keep, Rehoboam brusquely rejected the demand, and at once the northern tribes broke away. They accepted the leadership of Jeroboam, a former royal officer who had been under suspicion and had taken refuge at the court of Sheshonk, the founder of the Twenty-Second Egyptian Dynasty (I Kings 12:1-20). Naturally war followed, and Sheshonk interfered. It seems that Rehoboam had made some progress, for the list of cities Sheshonk claimed to have conquered included several from northern Israel. But the trained and organized forces of the south were unable to cope with an Egyptian army, and Rehoboam was forced to withdraw his troops and to pay a large indemnity, which exhausted even the last of his father's treasures (I Kings 14:25-26).

From this time onward there was no political unity in Israel, though the two parts continued to regard themselves as a single whole for many purposes. They had a common tradition and a common faith, and these often proved stronger than political divisions. Two centuries later, prophets like Amos and Isaiah were interested in the north as well as in the south, and the ideal Israel always included the full tale of twelve tribes. This did not prevent a century of rivalry, usually leading to war along an artificial frontier. Jeroboam did his best to keep the two parts separate; his most famous measure was the establishment of sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan to rival that of Jerusalem. Here Yahweh was worshiped under the form of a bull, possibly according to a type of cult adopted from earlier Canaan (I Kings 12:26 ff.). Little protest was heard against it until the time of Hosea, at the very end of the northern monarchy (cf. Hos. 8:5-6).

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

All the little western states became engaged in a desultory warfare, in which the most striking feature was the rise of Damascus to supremacy, a result no doubt due to her favorable position as a commercial center. While Assyria and Egypt remained in a state of weakness, these small principalities were free to quarrel among themselves without interference from the outside. In the south the house of David retained the throne, but there were frequent changes of dynasty in the north; only two royal houses lasted into a third generation. Slave raids, the plundering and destruction of farms near the frontiers, mutual jealousy and suspicion—these were the characteristic features of a period in which the strength of David's old realm was steadily drained away. Even in northern Israel there appears to have been disunion, and we hear of hostility between Ephraim and Manasseh. The whole area was in more or less permanent political confusion.

The rise of Omri (I Kings 16:23-26) in the early part of the ninth century brought a considerable change. More than any other Israelite king, he had something of the political genius of David. His first step was to erect a new capital at Samaria. He entered into an alliance with Phoenicia, and recovered the old authority over Moab. He so impressed his contemporaries that the Assyrians themselves for many years after him called Israel "the land of Omri."

Omri's son, Ahab, did not succeed in maintaining his father's dominions unimpaired, for Moab recovered its independence. But he was wise enough and strong enough to take a leading part in a coalition of the little western states which was formed to resist the growing power of Assyria. This country, under Shalmaneser III, was waking up after a long period of internal weakness, and in 853 B.C. made a determined effort to extend its dominions to the Mediterranean. About a dozen of the small peoples combined; the two leading powers were Damascus and Israel, the former stronger in infantry, the latter in chariotry. A great battle was fought at Karkar in the Orontes Valley, and though Shalmaneser claimed a great victory, he went no farther. Unfortunately, with the relaxation of external pressure, the coalition temporarily broke up, and Ahab himself fell in battle against the forces of Damascus. Nevertheless, when need arose, the same resistance was offered to Assyria as long as the house of Omri remained on the throne.

But at this point the course of foreign politics was gravely affected by events in Israel itself. The Phoenician alliance, in itself a fine stroke of policy, brought with it disaster. Ahab had married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Sidon (I Kings 16:31), and the foreign princess was imbued with the normal ideas of Oriental monarchs—a complete absolutism (I Kings 21) such as had not been seen in Israel since the days of Solomon. Four outstanding figures deserve to be noted. First there was Naboth, the Israelite free peasant-farmer, independent and obstinate, and sure of rights on which he would insist, even against the king. Second, Ahab, who, with the old tradition behind him, saw no alternative to accepting Naboth's refusal. Third, the foreign queen, a much stronger character than her husband, who could not understand how it was possible for any subject to refuse a fair and perhaps even generous demand made by the king. It will be observed that Ahab himself apparently had no knowledge of what was happening till Naboth was actually dead. The fourth figure was that of Elijah, the most significant of all.

Among the groups which were at work all through Israelite history, striving to maintain the old standards and principles which the Aramaean invaders had brought into Palestine, the most conspicuous and successful were the prophets. As enthusiasts for the covenant God, Yahweh, they were concerned to see that the rights of free personality were respected, and that no authority, even that of the king, could override them. It will be remembered that the stern rebuke to David for his sin with Bathsheba came from this section of the community (II Sam. 12). The great disruption under Jeroboam had a prophet behind it (I Kings 11:29 ff.), and the spirit was not dead. While it survived in western Palestine, it was strongest in the cattle districts to the east and to the south, and it is not an accident that Elijah's home lay in the former region. To him and those who stood with him for the old Israelite theory of life, the death of Naboth was sheer murder, and the taint of blood attached to all that had been his. Though Ahab himself might have been guiltless of the actual crime, by taking the vineyard he assumed the load of sin, which must work itself out on him and his successors.

The crisis came within a dozen years of Ahab's death. Once again the prophets moved, and their nominee, Jehu, extinguished the whole house of Ahab, including Jezebel, in a frightful massacre (II Kings 9-10), which called for the condemnation of Hosea a century later (cf. Hos. 1:4). In all Israelite history only once again did a king attempt to ape Solomon, and that was Jehoiakim, who had been placed on the throne of Judah by a foreign power.

The prophetic revolution, however, had an important effect on foreign policy. To secure his position Jehu submitted to Assyria and paid tribute. This broke up the old coalition, and ensured the temporary success of Assyria. Damascus was the chief sufferer, and her weakness meant a relaxation of the pressure which she had exerted on Israel for nearly a century.

It was, then, under Jeroboam II, the grandson of Jehu, that Israel reached the highest prosperity she had known since the division of the monarchy. Even with the accession of the house of Omri the hostility between north and south had died away. Probably Judah occupied a subordinate position; the marriage of Athaliah to a Judean king points in that direction, and the list of the allies who fought at Karkar does not include the name of Judah. The narrative of I Kings 22 makes it clear that Jehoshaphat was not wholly a free agent. There was thus unity in foreign affairs between the two kingdoms. The further expansion in the age of Jeroboam II gave back to Israel much of the territory she had lost to the east of the Jordan, and in the far south the recovery of Elath by Judah (II Kings 14:22) opened once more the sea route to the south and east. It is significant that the writer of the pre-exilic record (preserved in II Kings 14:25-27) looked on Jeroboam as a divinely appointed savior of his people. Judged by purely material standards, the statement is sound.

VII. Fall of Northern Israel (721 B.C.)

Although the reign of Jeroboam II was a time of prosperity, greater than any since the days of Solomon, all was not well beneath the surface. It is true that little or nothing is said of royal exactions or tyranny, but a yet more serious peril threatened the nation. In earlier days it seems that commerce abroad, with the wealth which it brought into the country, was the king's prerogative. In the century which followed the death of Ahab, however, there grew up a class of wealthy subjects, who used their traditional liberty to amass fortunes for themselves. The genuinely "democratic" spirit of Israel, which had found expression in the prophetic movement, had won its victory over autocracy; it had now to face a deadlier enemy in plutocracy.

Between 850 and 760 B.C. a complete change had come over the social and economic structure of Israelite society. The old peasant of the Naboth type had almost entirely disappeared, and the land was now parceled out into large estates, worked by tenant farmers or serf labor. The prophetic reaction to the new order may be exemplified by such a passage as Isa. 5:8 ff. The absentee owner spent his time in one of the cities, giving himself up to a life of idle luxury such as is depicted in Amos 6:1 ff.; Isa. 5:11 ff. There was a great gulf between him and the actual workers, whose abject misery excited the pity of men like Amos and Isaiah, and called for their strong denunciations. Micah's language was even stronger, but seems to have been justified by the facts. His account of an eviction is classical (Mic. 2:9-10).

It is not hard to guess at the means whereby this result had been brought about. The laws of debt in the East always press heavily on the poor peasant. A bad harvest, a raid from across the border, a domestic calamity—and the poor fellow had to apply to the moneylender, a familiar figure in Israelite society (cf. II Kings 4:1 ff.), to enable him to live at all. His land was the only security he could offer, and when fresh trouble came the mortgage would be called in. The original owner might be retained as a tenant paying an enormous rent (cf. Amos 5:11), but he would be sure to need a fresh loan at some time, and then had only the persons of himself and his children to pledge. Next time they would become actual slaves, and it seems that the law which limited the period of slavery (cf. Exod. 21:2 ff.) was either unknown or disregarded. Probably the victims had only the choice between permanent slavery (cf. Exod. 21:5-6) and actual starvation, for the law which ordained the restoration of property does not appear to have been effective till the discovery of Deuteronomy in 621 B.C.

The process was possibly accelerated by judicial corruption. A rich man had only to bring a charge of debt against his neighbor, and a small bribe to the judge would secure a verdict. It was literally true that the poor could be bought for a pair of shoes (Amos 2:6; 8:6). Added to this was the general dishonesty in retail trade (cf. Amos 8:5), and it will be seen that the wealthy classes were building up for themselves a strong position at the expense of the workers.

The prophets understood that such a state of society could end only in ruin. History has abundantly justified their insight. The oppressed classes may still retain something of the human spirit, and an internal explosion follows. Or if they do not, then the land falls as easy prey to the first serious invader. So it was with Israel. The sturdy nation which had led successful resistance to Shalmaneser III in 853 B.C. had vanished, and when Assyria once more recovered her strength, the armies of Tiglath-pileser (who came to the throne in 745 B.C.) easily overran the western states, and incorporated a number of them in his empire.

In Israel the collapse was hastened by internal disunion. Zechariah, son of Jeroboam II, was murdered by a usurper named Shallum (II Kings 15:10), and Shallum by Menahem (II Kings 15:14), who paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser in 738 B.C. (II Kings 15:19). He was the last northern king to be succeeded by a son. Pekahiah fell to Pekah (II Kings 15:25), who, in concert with Rezin of Damascus, attempted to revive the old western alliance which had so firmly held its ground a century earlier. But Ahaz of Judah refused to join him (II Kings 16:5; Isa. 7:1-17) and called in the Assyrian king (II Kings 16:8-9). Within three years Tiglath-pileser had conquered a large part of the country (cf. II Kings 15:29). He organized the territory of Damascus and the northern part of Israel as provinces of his empire, appointing officials directly from the court. Samaria was left with a little brief independence, at least in name, though her new king, Hoshea, was compelled to pay a regular tribute to the Assyrians (II Kings 17:3).

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

Egypt in the meantime took alarm. She was no longer the power she had been, and was unable effectively to meet the Mesopotamian forces in the field. But she was an adept at intrigue, and stirred up all possible trouble. Hoshea revolted, and seems to have disappeared about 724. Tiglath-pileser had been succeeded by Shalmaneser V, who soon laid siege to Samaria. The city held out for three years, but in the end was captured and destroyed (II Kings 17:5-6). Hoshea's dominions, which seem to have been limited to the northern part of the central range, were organized as the province of Samaria by Sargon, who had succeeded Shalmaneser before the fall of the city. Of all the western states, Judah and some of the Philistine cities alone retained a nominal independence. Numbers of people from Israel were deported eastward, and their places taken by groups introduced from other conquered districts (II Kings 17:24). Assyria was never again troubled by disturbances in the newly occupied lands.

But the remaining free states were still liable to give trouble. Ashdod made a bid for complete independence in 711 B.C., and was ruthlessly suppressed. Hezekiah of Judah may have been implicated in the matter, but escaped severe punishment, remaining faithful to Assyria as long as Sargon lived. On Sargon's death in 705 B.C., however, his successor, Sennacherib, was faced with widespread revolt. The moving spirit was Marduk-apal-iddina, the subject king of Babylon, who fomented a general revolt. Sennacherib was at first occupied in securing his position against his nearest adversaries, but in 701 B.C. was able to turn westward. Only one prince had been faithful to him, Padi, king of Ekron, and he had been deposed by his people and handed over to Hezekiah. An attempt at a diversion was made by Egypt, and it seems that Sennacherib's army suffered from bubonic plague (cf. II Kings 19:35). Jerusalem was a very strong fortress, and Sennacherib was content to accept Hezekiah's surrender and leave him on the throne. The Judean king, however, was compelled to pay an enormous indemnity (cf. II Kings 18:13-16), and many of his people, including royal princesses, were taken prisoner. Padi, on the other hand, was rewarded for his fidelity by considerable grants of land from Judah's territories. But Jerusalem did not fall, and the house of David still sat on the throne. As a matter of fact, Judah was the only western state to outlive the kingdom of Assyria, and for the next three quarters of a century there is no hint of any further attempt to break loose from Assyrian dominance.

VIII. Fall of Judah (586 B.C.)

For the greater part of the seventh century the land of Judah was under Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah, a king more strongly condemned by the prophetic party than any of his predecessors (cf. II Kings 21:2 ff.). He was charged with apostasy of many kinds, and particularly with the practice of human sacrifice (II Kings 21:6). It seems clear also that foreign cults were freely introduced, some, no doubt, imposed by the Assyrian overlord. But to all appearance the country remained externally at peace.

The truth is that the two great world powers were not for the time in acute conflict. Egypt was passing through one of her recurrent periods of weakness and had actually been invaded by Esarhaddon, the successor of Sennacherib, who had organized the Delta as an Assyrian province. She began to recover under Psamtik (ca. 660 B.C.), but did not become again a serious military power till well on in the seventh century. Ashurbanipal succeeded Esarhaddon in 668 B.C., and became the last great king of Assyria. The empire had grown unwieldly, and was unable to resist the influx of wild tribes from the north (ca. 630 B.C.). Peoples known to Greek historians as Scythians and Cimmerians broke down the defenses and made their way into the Fertile Crescent. Though Ashurbanipal remained on the throne till 626 B.C., we have no official records of his reign later than 639. Egypt had regained her independence before 640 B.C., and when the Scythians moved down through Palestine (there may be references to these events in Jer. 4-6), she was able to check them on her borders. They failed to take Jerusalem or seriously to occupy Palestine, and in a few years they had vanished from western Asia.

The northern invaders had weakened Assyria beyond recovery. Under Nebopolassar, the first king of the new Chaldean dynasty, Babylon recovered her independence in 626 B.C., and in a few years formed an alliance with the eastern power of the Medes. The final struggle was long, and its fortunes varied. But in 614 B.C. the combined armies of the Neo-Babylonians and of the Medes took and sacked Asshur, and two years later Nineveh itself fell. The Assyrians continued the struggle from Harran, but that city also was taken in 610 B.C. It seems that the final stand was made at Carchemish (cf. Jer. 46:1-2) where the last great Chaldean victory was won in 605 B.C. This last event was recorded in western documents. Necho, son and eventually successor of Psamtik in Egypt, hoped to revive the ancient glories of Egypt, and seeing that the real danger came no longer from Assyria but from Babylon, he came to the rescue of the dying empire of Nineveh. Year after year, from 616 B.C., onward, he led armies into Mesopotamia and, more often than not, achieved a certain amount of success. At Carchemish he was clearly the most important enemy the Chaldeans had to face, and that battle marks not only the end of Assyria, but the last attempt of Egypt to secure world domination.

It was inevitable that all these events should have profound effects on Judah. In 641 B.C. Manasseh was succeeded by his son Amon (II Kings 21:19 ff.), who was assassinated two years later; his successor was Josiah, then a child of eight (II Kings 22:1). The Scythian inroads of 626 B.C. laid the whole country waste, and five years later Josiah took a definite step toward independence. Its most striking aspect was a religious reform, which appears to have resulted from the discovery of a book of law (II Kings 22:8), commonly identified with Deuteronomy or a part of it. All foreign cults were eradicated, not only from Jerusalem, but also from the whole country, and it is interesting to note that records mention the shrine of Bethel (II Kings 22-23). The Assyrian province of Samaria was breaking up, and it seems that Josiah was able to claim at least a part of its territory for himself. But ultimately he came into contact with Necho, and was killed at Megiddo in 608 B.C. The book of Chronicles gives a circumstantial account of a battle (II Chr. 35:20-24), but the language used in the book of Kings implies that the Judean king was simply executed (II Kings 23:29), probably on some charge of conspiracy with the Assyrians.

Josiah has a better reputation than any other king of Judah since David. Naturally his purification of the cultus gave him a high position in the eyes of those biblical writers whose primary concern was with theology. But the evidence shows that he was also the true ideal of the democratic king, free from pomp and vanity, fair in the administration of justice, and friendly to all his people (cf. Jer. 22:15). It is no wonder that he was generally mourned by Judah.

Presumably Necho was on his way to make his annual expedition into Mesopotamia in 608 B.C. when Josiah met his death. The people chose as his successor his second son, Jehoahaz (II Kings 23:30), but three months later, probably on his return from the expedition, Necho deposed him and put Jehoiakim, the elder brother, on the throne (II Kings 23:33-34). The new king was quite different from his father; if the one was a second David, the other was a second Solomon. He erected magnificent buildings, and was ostentatious in his parade of monarchy, but he put his people to forced labor and reintroduced the cults which Josiah had removed (cf. Jer. 22:13-19). As an Egyptian nominee, he probably was not compelled to take the normal covenant.

The battle of Carchemish meant that all the west passed under the authority of Babylon rather than that of Egypt. Jehoiakim accepted the new regime (II Kings 24:1) and for some years remained faithful to the court of Babylon. But even if the Egyptians could not fight, they could intrigue, and there was probably a strong party in Jerusalem which favored them. In 597 B.C. Jehoiakim came out openly on their side (II Kings 24:2-3). Nebuchadrezzar, the king of Babylon, was not the man to let this come to pass, but before his armies could capture Jerusalem, possibly even before they reached the city, Jehoiakim died, and was succeeded by his young son Jehoiachin, one of the most pathetic figures in Old Testament history. Three months after his accession Jehoiachin surrendered (II Kings 24:12 ff.) and was carried to Babylon, together with many of the best people in the land. Still Nebuchadrezzar did not take the extreme step of destroying the Judean state, and placed a third son of Josiah on the throne, Zedekiah (II Kings 24:18), who offers a strong contrast both to his father and to his elder brother. His intentions were good, but his character was weak. The new nobility, with one or two striking exceptions, were far inferior to the old in every way (cf. Jer. 24), and the country was in a constant state of unrest. The final revolt broke out in 588 B.C. Jerusalem was besieged, and after eighteen months of suffering, relieved only by a short interval during which an Egyptian army made a fruitless demonstration (Jer. 37:5), the city was taken by storm. It was laid in ruins, the temple was burned, and all but the poorest peasants were carried off to Mesopotamia as prisoners. Zedekiah himself made a futile effort to escape, but was captured. His eyes were put out after he had witnessed the execution of his sons, and he too was deported. Judah, as an independent political entity, had come to an end (II Kings 25:1-21).

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

IX. The Exile (586 B.C.) and the Return (After 538 B.C.)

The desolation of Judah was practically complete. The process of destruction, of which we have an illuminating flash in the Lachish letters, left only a semipastoral community, with few if any well-established sites. Archaeologically, the sixth century is almost a blank in southern Palestine. But small farmers still remained, and for their government the Chaldeans set up Gedaliah, a member of a Judean princely house, at Mizpah (II Kings 25:22 ff.). It seems that the land began to recover under this wise and chivalrous nobleman, and for a time there was hope. But Gedaliah was murdered by a certain Ishmael, a scion of the old royal house. Fearing Chaldean vengeance, most of the remaining people fled to Egypt, taking with them Jeremiah among others (II Kings 25:25-27; Jer. 41:1-43:7).

In Babylonia the exiles settled down and took their part in the life of their new home, but they were never wholly absorbed in the general population. On account of their distinctive religion they retained their identity in a remarkable fashion. They had been united by Moses at Sinai through their common bond with Yahweh, and this same power still held them together. This was a unique phenomenon in the ancient world. They began to develop the worship of the synagogue, a new form of cultus which has ever since made religious exercise possible for a scattered people. They also engaged in considerable literary activity, including the compilation of law, history, and prophetic utterances.

In the early years of the Exile the Jews did not seem to find the rule of their masters oppressive, but after the middle of the sixth century Nabunaid, who was not of the family of Nebuchadrezzar, appears to have had religious designs not unlike those of Ikhnaton in Egypt, seven centuries earlier, and to have attempted the establishment of a single cultus. Other gods were removed from their shrines, and it is possible that Jews and others were subjected to persecution. Certainly there is a strong contrast between the tone of Jeremiah and Ezekiel on the one hand and that of prophets who lived toward the end of the Exile on the other.

The Chaldean Empire, however, was short-lived. A new power arose in Persia, under the leadership of Cyrus, king of Anshan (cf. Isa. 44:28-45:6; etc.). He first conquered Asia Minor, and then turned on Babylon. Nabunaid himself was in retirement at the Oasis of Tema, but his son, Belshazzar, was defeated and killed in a battle at Opis, and Babylon opened its gates gladly to the conqueror. One of the first acts of Cyrus was to restore the cults which Nabunaid had suppressed—indeed, he claimed that it was for this purpose that the gods had summoned him to overthrow the Chaldean power. Among others, the shrine of Yahweh at Jerusalem was marked out for restoration (Ezra 1:1 ff.; cf. Isa. 40:1 ff.), and this necessarily involved the return of a certain number of his worshippers.

It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the restoration was in the first instance a religious movement. The great prophet of the period, Second Isaiah, predicted first of all the return of Yahweh to Jerusalem (Isa. 40:1 ff.); that of the people was a necessary corollary (cf. Ezra 1:3 ff.). Indeed, the initial phases of the event are unknown. A certain Sheshbazzar was the leader of the first group (Ezra 1:8), but for sixteen years nothing definite was done. According to the records, a fresh expedition was led by Zerubbabel (Ezra 2:2), a son or a grandson of the unfortunate Jehoiachin. With the support of two prophets, Haggai and Zechariah, he rebuilt the temple, and it is suspected that he attempted to achieve some kind of political independence. His end is wrapped in mystery, but it seems that Jerusalem itself remained an unwallled city till the middle of the fifth century, when it was rebuilt by another Jewish governor, Nehemiah (Neh. 3; etc.), who had probably two periods of office, one beginning in 444 B.C. (Neh. 2:1) and the other in 432. To him, more than to any other one man, is due the recovery of Israel as a national though not an independent entity. He was insistent on the purity of the Jewish blood, and came into conflict with his immediate northern neighbors of Samaria (cf. Neh. 2:10 ff.) where the population was believed to be more affected by an infusion of foreign blood. His enemies tried to represent his erection of the walls around Jerusalem as an act of rebellion against the Persian court, but he was able to maintain his position, and charges against him were not sustained.

Ezra the scribe completed the work of Nehemiah. He came to Jerusalem in the sixth year of Artaxerxes—probably Artaxerxes II, not Artaxerxes I, as was formerly supposed because of his reputed connection with Nehemiah. It was, then, in 398 (on the older view 458) B.C. that Ezra promulgated the law (Neh. 8), and in so doing made the Jewish community what it continued to be through its whole history, the "People of the Book." While his purpose was primarily religious, his action gave to the new Israel a unity which it has never lost.

The position remained practically unchanged till the advent of Alexander the Great. The land of Judah was far from being wealthy or prosperous, and the first two centuries after the return from Babylon must have been a period of depression and struggle. The people had the nominal protection of their Persian overlords, but Susa was far away, and, as the story of Nehemiah shows, local administrators and neighbors took advantage of the little community. The Persian conquest of Egypt left the Jews untouched, except in so far as some of them were called on as soldiers to take part in the conflict, or to garrison Persian military posts in Egypt (remains of such a post have been found at Elephantine near Assouan). But steady progress was being made, and by the time the Persian empire came to an end, the Palestinian Jews were a fairly contented people, gaining gradually in strength and stability. We hear vaguely of a revolt under Artaxerxes Ochus, which resulted in the deportation of large numbers, but details are lacking.

The conquests of Alexander seem to have made little difference to the general situation of the Jewish communities in Palestine or elsewhere. The king himself favored Jewish merchants, and made use of them in the founding of his new cities, especially of Alexandria, where they formed a very important element in the population until the seventh century A.D. The measure of independence and self-government which had been allowed to them by the Persians was continued.

Even the death of Alexander brought no serious change in the position. His empire was broken up, and Palestine became again what it had been centuries before, the debatable ground between north and south, between Syria and Egypt. For a century and more the land remained within the dominions of the Ptolemies, and the Greek government of Egypt followed the old policy.

X. The Maccabean Age and After (167 B.C.—A.D. 70)

The conquest of Palestine by Antiochus II, king of Syria, had a serious effect on the history of the Jews. Even under the Ptolemies they had been exposed to Greek influences, which had tended to weaken in some quarters the sense of national and religious uniqueness. But the Seleucids were far more enthusiastic missionaries of Hellenism than the Ptolemies had been, and with the advent of Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), matters came to a head. By this time there were two distinct parties within Jewry, the "broadminded," who were ready to accept Greek culture with all that it involved, and those on the other hand who clung more tenaciously to the old national faith and way of life.

The spark which fired the train was the appointment by Antiochus of a certain Jason as high priest, after the deposition of Onias. Jason in turn was superseded by a man named Menelaus, who did not even belong to the high priestly family. Orthodox Jews refused to accept him, and so challenged the right to nominate the high priest, which was claimed by the king. Antiochus in 169 B.C. made an attempt to conquer Egypt, but was compelled by the Romans to withdraw from that country. During his absence Jason made a bid to recover his position, and when Antiochus returned, he wreaked his vengeance on the troublesome Jews by spoiling the temple. Supported by the Hellenizing party among the Jews, he seems to have felt that the root of his trouble with this people was to be found in their religion, and he determined to stamp it out. Heathen altars were set up all over the country, and worst of all a shrine of Zeus was erected in the temple itself. The attempt to secure religious uniformity led to a revolt; at a place named Modein one of the local elders killed the officer who was sent to impose acceptance of a heathen cult. This man, Mattathias, and his sons, became the focus of the national and religious movement. The father did not long survive his heroic deed, and the leadership devolved on his son Judas, known to history as Maccabaeus—"The Hammerer." It must be remembered that there was already a strong Hellenizing element among the Jews themselves, and that Judas had to face a party among his own people as well as the military power of Syria. But the stricter Jews had behind them the driving force of a great spiritual impulse, and the early successes of Judas strengthened his position, turning a sectional revolt into a national uprising. Antiochus had to control a large and heterogeneous empire, and could spare only small forces for Palestine. The rebels, too, had the advantage of knowing their ground thoroughly, and in Judas they had a guerrilla leader to whom history offers few equals.

The first armed clash was with a detachment under a certain Apollonius, who was defeated and killed. A second and rather larger force under Seron was surprised near Beth-horon, and met with no better fortune. The spot was already famous in Israel's history for one of Joshua's great victories. A third engagement also resulted in the defeat of a Syrian army. The king himself was busy fighting the Parthians on his eastern frontier, and the local governors, whose seat was at Antioch, were unable to prevent Judas from occupying Jerusalem.

In December, 164 B.C., the victorious Jewish leader carried out a solemn purification of the temple. The altar had been defiled by heathen sacrifice, and much else in the sacred building had been contaminated by Greek worship. All that could be moved was taken away, even the great altar, whose stones were left in a place by themselves "till a prophet should arise" who would give more exact instructions. A new altar was built in accordance with the prescriptions laid down in the law, and on it sacrifices were offered. The occasion is still celebrated in the Jewish winter festival of Hanukkah. There remained, however, a Syrian garrison in the citadel of Jerusalem, the so-called "Akra," and as long as these men held their ground, the Jewish nation could not regard herself as politically free.

THE HISTORY OF ISRAEL

The religious aim of the revolt, however, was now secured, provided that Judas and his followers could maintain what they had won. From this time onward within the national party a rift appears which in the course of years led to serious division. Many felt that they had now gained all that they were fighting for. Others, including Judas himself and his brothers, seem to have felt that their position was insecure till they had attained complete liberty, and gradually the conception of a growing territorial state took the place of the purely spiritual ideal with which the movement had begun. So the struggle was continued, and the Jews were aided by internal troubles within the Syrian kingdom. Antiochus IV died soon after the purification of the temple, and at once a struggle began among different claimants for his throne. From time to time a ruler who held the western portion of the empire was able to use force in Palestine, but the whole power of Syria was never again united against the Jews. Judas and his brothers were thus able to add Gilead and Galilee to the districts of Judah which they already controlled.

A determined effort was made by Lysias, the governor in Antioch, who very nearly recovered the ground which had been lost. But just as he seemed at the point of complete success, other dangers compelled him to make terms with Judas, granting complete religious liberty, though still asserting political sovereignty. The war was renewed, however, with the advent of a certain Demetrius, one of the pretenders to the Syrian crown, and though Judas won a great victory over a Syrian general named Nicanor, he himself was defeated and killed at Elasa in 159 B.C.

The leadership was then assumed by Judas' brother Jonathan. Mattathias had belonged to the priestly family of Hasmon (whence Judas and his successors are commonly called the Hasmonaeans), and Jonathan was therefore eligible for the Jewish high priesthood, an office which he assumed in 152 B.C. He was at first confronted with a difficult situation, for the Hellenistic Jews were now in the ascendant, and the national party dispirited and scattered by the death of Judas. Gradually Jonathan recovered his brother's position, skillfully taking advantage of the conflicts which separated rivals for the Syrian throne, and at last secured himself against interference from them. In 147 B.C. an attack was made by an army under a certain Apollonius, but Jonathan won a complete victory which still further strengthened his position. There were still two signs of Syrian domination: the Jews had to pay tribute to Syria and the garrison of the Akra was retained. Jonathan not only extended Jewish territory but also made a determined effort to get rid of the two emblems of subjection. He succeeded in getting the tribute abolished, but was unable to drive out the Syrians from the Jerusalem citadel. Jonathan himself was at length entrapped by the Syrian general Tryphon, and treacherously murdered (141 B.C.).

The last surviving son of Mattathias was Simon, who then succeeded to the high priesthood. He won a reputation among his contemporaries even higher than that of his brothers. Like Jonathan he made good use of the civil wars constantly carried on in the Syrian kingdom, and one of his first acts was to recover the citadel of Jerusalem. He continued to expand the borders of his territory in spite of an attempt made by the Syrians to overthrow him. His sons, however, won a complete victory in 137 B.C., and Simon's power was unimpaired when he was murdered by his own son-in-law, a man named Ptolemy, in 134 B.C.

Simon was succeeded in the high priesthood by his son John, commonly known as John Hyrcanus. For a time he was in serious difficulties, and even Jerusalem was occupied by the Syrian king, Antiochus VII (Sidetes). Unlike so many of his predecessors, however, Sidetes showed himself magnanimous and sympathetic. He was content with a nominal sovereignty, and it seems that Hyrcanus was even allowed to assume the title of king as well as that of high priest. He, like the other Hasmonaeans, was able to make good use of the dissensions in the Syrian kingdom, and broadened the territory of Judah. His most notable achievement was the conquest of Idumaea, the ancient Edom. He compelled all the inhabitants to accept the Jewish faith, and so to become members of the Jewish community. In later years many Jews found reason to regret that achievement of Hyrcanus.

It was during this reign that the two main sections of the Jewish people crystallized into the parties known as Pharisees and Sadducees. The latter were the consistent supporters of the Hasmonaeans in their political as well as in their religious efforts. The Pharisees, on the other hand, felt that Judas had secured all that was necessary when he rededicated the temple and restored pure Jewish worship. They concentrated on the religious aspect of Judaism, and developed that strictness, even in small details, for which they are so well known. They went so far as to challenge the right of Hyrcanus to be high priest, on the ground that there was a possible doubt concerning the circumstances of his birth. They won a very large measure of popular sympathy, though they were seldom able to wield any political power.

John Hyrcanus was the last of the really great Hasmonaeans, and with his death in 103 B.C. began a period of conflict and decline. It was characteristic of Eastern dynasties that a few able men were liable to be succeeded by weaklings, and the death of a strong ruler might easily lead to civil war between rival claimants for his throne. In Judah there was also a marked lowering of the moral standard, and the later Hasmonaeans present a strong contrast to the first two generations. Lust of power and personal jealousies had their inevitable effect, and the last forty years of Jewish freedom tell a sad story.

John Hyrcanus left five sons. The eldest, Aristobulus (it is significant that the Hasmonaeans names were now Greek rather than Hebrew), assumed the high priesthood, imprisoned three of his brothers and put the fourth to death. But his reign lasted barely a year, and on his death his widow secured both the high priesthood and the kingship for one of her brothers-in-law, Alexander Jannaeus. He continued the policy of his predecessors, taking advantage of the political confusion in Syria to extend his own dominions. His ambitions and his character awoke resentment and even hatred among his own people, especially among those elements which were influenced by the Pharisees. Civil war broke out in Judah itself, and Alexander nearly lost his throne. The danger seems to have made him realize that he must try to meet popular feeling, and it appears that in his later years he was inclined to show some favor to the party of the Pharisees.

Alexander died in 76 B.C., leaving behind his widow, Alexandra, and two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus. Alexandra herself became queen, making Hyrcanus high priest. During the nine years of her reign the Pharisees became quite influential, and their conduct did little to reunite the nation. The Sadducees attached themselves to Aristobulus, and on Alexandra's death in 67 B.C. bitter fighting broke out between the brothers. Of the two, Aristobulus was the abler, but Hyrcanus had the support of a very clever and vigorous Idumaeans named Antipater, who enabled him to maintain the struggle at least on equal terms.

The general confusion led at last to the interference of Rome. Nearly a century earlier communication with the senate had been established by Judas Maccabaeus, and the alliance had become traditional. In the course of a general settlement in the east Pompey established a Roman province of Syria, and then interfered in Jewish affairs. He entered Jerusalem in 63 B.C., and maintained Hyrcanus in the high priesthood, giving him a certain amount of authority in his own country, though Judea was nominally incorporated in the province of Syria. The brief spell of Jewish independence had come to an end.

From this time onward the history of the Jewish people is dominated by their relations with Rome. The natural feeling of hostility to any foreign government was enhanced by the action of Crassus, who in 54 B.C. robbed the temple at Jerusalem of its treasures. Julius Caesar, on the other hand, adopted a policy of conciliation, and at his death was nowhere more sincerely mourned than in Judea.

Hyrcanus had taken the side of Pompey in the Roman civil war, but had transferred his allegiance to Caesar after the battle of Pharsalus in 48 B.C. As a reward for Jewish help, Caesar bestowed on Hyrcanus the title, not indeed of king, but of ethnarch, which at least seemed to be a symbol of comparative independence. More practical were the remission of tribute to Rome, the assurance of religious liberty, and the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem which had been destroyed by Pompey.

All classes of Jews, however, were united in their abhorrence of Antipater, the true ruler of the land. In spite of his wise, vigorous, and beneficial government, he was hated as an Idumaeans, and racial prejudice overrode all other considerations. He was assassinated in 43 B.C., and his place was taken by his son Herod, a man who was at least his father's equal in ability and in strength. But Roman affairs were still far from being settled, and in 40 B.C. Antigonus, son of Aristobulus, allied himself with Parthian invaders and deposed his uncle Hyrcanus. His rule, however, was short, for Herod won the support of the stronger party in Rome, and in 37 B.C. defeated and killed Antigonus, becoming himself the political ruler of Judea.

For centuries the name of Herod the Great has been held up to general execration. There are good grounds for this judgment. He was ruthless in taking the lives of those who stood in his way, or who seemed to be dangerous. It is remarkable, however, that the worst acts ascribed to him are domestic atrocities such as the judicial murder of his wife Mariamne and of her mother. But there is no doubt that the royal palace was a hotbed of intrigue, and Herod, who knew so well how to handle men, was no match for feminine arts. The air was full of plots and counterplots, charges and countercharges, and during the first twelve years of his reign, Herod could have had little peace in his own household. He was in a most difficult position, and his cruelty may be taken as evidence of a helpless bewilderment in face of a situation he could neither control nor understand. In such circumstances power as absolute as Herod's becomes a moral danger.

In other respects it seems clear that Herod earned the title of "The Great." While he had warmly espoused the cause of Antony against Octavius, he succeeded, after the destruction of the former, in making his peace with the new ruler of the world, and even of winning his favor. While his government was strict, it was not unjust, and he had a passion for adorning the cities of his kingdom with beautiful buildings, of which the best-known example is the temple at Jerusalem. During the middle period of his reign there seems to have been little in his conduct to which objection could be fairly taken, but his later years were clouded once more by domestic trouble, and when he died in 4 B.C. there were few if any to mourn him.

Rome did not recognize a hereditary kingship, and Herod's dominions were divided. Galilee fell to a son named Antipas, a district to the northeast to another son, Philip, while a third son, Archelaus, was placed over Judea proper. But the experiment was not a success. Antipas alone seems to have inherited his father's abilities and character, though in the end he failed to maintain his position and was driven into exile. The reign of Archelaus was short; he was quite unequal to the government of a people like the Jews. Procurators, subordinate officials under the proconsuls of Syria, were placed in charge of Judea. Their official residence was at Caesarea; it was rightly felt that their permanent presence in Jerusalem might be an unnecessary irritant. From time to time, however, they appeared in the city, where they had a regular palace. Of these governors the best known is Pontius Pilate, whose name will be forever remembered as that of the Roman governor who sent Jesus to the Cross. As a rule, these men were not the best type of Roman official, and the tension between them and the people steadily grew.

Caligula and Claudius tried another experiment by placing a grandson of Herod, named Agrippa, on the throne. He had been brought up in Rome, and was reputed to have spent a wild youth. But responsibility steadied him, and on his appointment as king of the districts formerly held by Philip and another tetrarch, he began to show himself a wise and skillful ruler. He, like others of his race, knew how to deal with the Roman authorities, and before he died in A.D. 44, he had become king of all the country ruled by Herod the Great. He also manifested real sympathy for and understanding of his Jewish subjects, and he lost no opportunity of displaying his Jewish behavior. Had he been succeeded by men of similar character, the Palestinian community might have survived much longer than it did. But Judea was never again under the rule of a native king; even Agrippa's son, Agrippa II, had to be content with a comparatively distant principality.

The method of government by procurator was resumed, and the hostility between Jews and Romans became more bitter. A new and violent nationalistic sect appeared, known as Zealots, who were constantly on the verge of rebellion, and shrank from no means of annoying the Roman authorities. Matters came to a head in A.D. 66, when the Zealots succeeded in arousing the whole people. The Romans were forced to take the matter seriously, and Vespasian, the general appointed by Nero, spent the whole year 67 in reducing Galilee. In 68 he turned his attention to Judea, but events in Rome, where Nero was overthrown, kept him comparatively inactive, and in the following year Vespasian himself became emperor, leaving his son Titus to finish the Judean campaign.

In Jerusalem itself the Jewish factions were constantly fighting among themselves, even while the Roman armies were besieging the city. In the circumstances only one end was possible; the legions broke down resistance, entered the city, and after taking a certain amount of booty, destroyed both temple and city with fire.

XI. Selected Bibliography

- ALBRIGHT, W. F. From the Stone Age to Christianity. 2nd ed. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1946.
- LODS, ADOLPHE. Israel from Its Beginnings to the Middle of the Eighth Century. Tr. S. H. Hooke. New York: Alfred A. Knopf, 1932.
- . The Prophets and the Rise of Judaism. Tr. S. H. Hooke. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., 1937.
- OLMSTEAD, A. T. History of Palestine and Syria to the Macedonian Conquest. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1931.
- ROBINSON, H. WHEELER. The History of Israel, Its Facts and Factors. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1938.
- ROBINSON, THEODORE H., and OESTERLEY, W. O. E. A History of Israel. Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1932.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

by JAMES MUILENBURG

- I. Introduction
 - A. Faith and History
 - B. Faith and Interpretation
 - C. Bible and Church
 - D. The Biblical Perspective
- II. The Age of the Patriarchs (ca. 2000-1500 B.C.)
 - A. Historical and Cultural Background
 - B. Sources
 - C. The Religion of the Patriarchal Age
- III. The Age of Moses (ca. 1350-1250 B.C.)
 - A. Sources
 - B. Historical Background
 - C. Moses and His Work
 - D. The Exodus
 - E. The Covenant
 - F. Yahweh and His Nature
 - G. Law and Cult
 - H. Conclusion
- IV. The Period of the Conquest (ca. 1250-1020 B.C.)
 - A. Sources
 - B. Historical Background
 - C. The Religion of the Conquest
 - 1. Canaanites and Israelites
 - 2. Yahweh in Canaan
 - 3. Sanctuaries
 - 4. Cultic Personnel and Religious Groups
 - 5. Moral Standards
- V. The Early Monarchy (ca. 1020-922 B.C.)
 - A. Sources
 - B. Historical Background
 - C. The Religion of the Early Monarchy
 - 1. Samuel
 - 2. Saul of Benjamin (ca. 1020-1004 B.C.)
 - 3. David of Judah (ca. 1004-961 B.C.)
 - 4. Solomon (961-922 B.C.)
 - D. The Epic of the Yahwist
- VI. The Divided Kingdoms (922-586 B.C.)
 - A. Historical Background
 - B. The Prophets of the Ninth Century
 - 1. Elijah the Tishbite
 - 2. Micaiah ben Imlah
 - 3. Elisha ben Shaphat
 - C. The Prophets of the Eighth Century
 - 1. Amos of Tekoa
 - 2. Hosea ben Beerl
 - 3. Isaiah of Jerusalem
 - 4. Micah of Moresheth-gath
 - D. The Reformation of 621 B.C.
 - 1. Historical Background
 - 2. Source
 - 3. The Code of Deuteronomy
 - E. The Prophets of the End of Judah
 - 1. Zephaniah
 - 2. Habakkuk
 - 3. Jeremiah of Anathoth
 - 4. Ezekiel
- VII. The Babylonian Exile (586-538 B.C.)
 - A. The Significance of the Fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.)
 - B. Second Isaiah
- VIII. Postexilic Judaism (538-ca. 150 B.C.)
 - A. The Priestly Edition of the Pentateuch
 - B. The Religion of the Psalms
 - C. The Religion of the Wisdom Literature
 - D. The Religion of Apocalyptic
- IX. The Function of the Cult in Israel's Religion
 - A. Holy Places
 - B. Holy Objects
 - C. Holy Times and Seasons
 - D. Holy Acts
 - E. Holy Persons
 - F. The Synagogue
- X. Conclusion
- XI. Selected Bibliography

From the secular point of view the books of the Old Testament represent the classical religious literature of an ancient, Oriental people known as the Hebrews or as Israel; from the religious point of view, however, they comprise the sacred scripture of two of the world's great religions, Judaism and Christianity. Each religion views the Old Testament as more than merely a significant deposit of ancient writing.

The way in which the history of Israel's religion is written will depend upon our manner of viewing it. In the following discussion the Old Testament is interpreted from within a religious community which holds it to be sacred scripture.

I. Introduction

A. Faith and History.—In Judaism and Christianity history and faith are inextricably related.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

The way in which faith is related to events provides a major disclosure into the meaning of the religion. In the Old Testament the nature of history is grasped in terms of the nature of the God of Israel. It is interpreted from the perspective of the initiative, revelation, sovereignty, and purpose of a covenantal God. History is therefore the area of maximum interest and concern. When we try to discern the character of Israel's religion in the light of the form in which it has been transmitted to us, we are confronted first of all not with doctrines or principles or even ideas, but with the activity of God in events. It is in the relation of the covenant God with a covenant history that the Old Testament is to be understood.

This historical orientation of the Old Testament is apparent in the earliest records; in them we witness the presence of a dynamic historical faith (Exod. 15:21; Judg. 5). When the early traditions are compiled and ordered into the extensive patterns of epic, as in the Yahwist and Elohist sources, or when the events of the early monarchy are related to a major historical continuity, as in the stories of Saul and David, the meaning of events is greatly deepened. Without the biblical point of view, Israel's history has only a minor importance. Viewed secularly, the uniqueness of this people does not emerge, for Israel's history cannot be understood in secular categories. It is only when faith and event meet that the situation is changed. Event without faith yields little illumination; it is faith that transforms the event and makes of it the reality which the Bible describes. And conversely, faith without event is not relevant faith; it is the event that gives to Israel's religion its form and character.

This is clearly seen in connection with the biblical personalities who appear in the course of Israel's history. Abraham and Jacob-Israel, Moses and Samuel and Elijah, Amos and Isaiah and Jeremiah are not significant apart from the faith which motivates and inspires them. It is in the immediacy of his own personal situation in history that the person hears "the word" spoken to him. To apprehend the significance of biblical persons, then, we must apprehend the nature of the religious faith which lies within and behind them. They cannot be understood without this faith. The one subject of the Bible is God, and it is only in relation to him that the Bible can be understood. This provides us with the first answer to the question, "How shall we read the Bible?"

B. Faith and Interpretation.—As it is faith that inspires the history of Israel and gives it content and meaning, so it is only through faith that the record can be understood. There is an interior approach to the history of Israel's religion, over and beyond the critical and analytical approach, which is assumed in any effort to recover what the faith was. This interior approach of participation or empathy opens up vistas and sounds depths that are undisclosed in any other fashion. For this approach it is necessary to identify oneself with the ancient writer, to stand where he stands. This does not mean that we read uncritically. It means that we must read with the eye of appreciation—in an interior way. It means that we must read with imagination, for it is the religious imagination that is at work throughout the Bible. It means that we must read with sympathy as though we ourselves are somehow involved in what is being written. We belong to it, and it belongs to us. We stand in community with it. It is Israel's story, Israel's life and thought and aspiration, and we do not read well or profoundly if we stand outside as spectators. It is only the poet in us which responds to great poetry. It is only the artist in us which helps us to see, really see, the work of the artist. For the kind of literature that the Bible presents to us, it is essential that we adopt an attitude and point of view of this sort. For an ancient Semitic literature which is at once imaginative and poetic and historical and personal and eventful, such an approach is indispensable.

C. Bible and Church.—The point of view and attitude which have just been described have particular force for those who stand in living continuity with the great tradition. We do not think of ourselves as detached and separated from it, but rather as belonging to it. Within the community of Israel, whether old or new, the Bible wears a different aspect from that which it has outside the community. Church and Bible belong together.¹ They are reciprocal realities. They depend upon each other. Within the church the Bible is confessed as scripture, and the church finds in its pages the record of the story of its deepest origins. The church cannot understand itself without the Bible. Similarly, the Old Testament is unintelligible outside of Israel, the living, historical community which passes through varying vicissitudes and through deep chasms of crisis and destruction. It is true that such language as this has peculiar force within the sacred community, that is, the faith of a Jew or Christian helps him to appropriate this language as something congenial and intelligible. But a good historical defense can also be made for this position, for from early times sanctuary and tradition exist together. The sanctuary is the place where the tradition is preserved, transmitted, interpreted, and implemented into the life of the cult.

¹ See article "The Bible: Its Significance and Authority," pp. 3-31.

The history of the religion of Israel is not the chief among biblical disciplines. That distinction belongs to biblical theology. But the latter requires the reinforcement and concreteness of the former. The theology of the Old Testament cannot be rightly understood without the history of Israel's religion. Standing isolated by itself, Old Testament theology always involves a distortion of the faith of Israel.² It runs the danger of violating the historical character of the revelation as it is transmitted to us in the biblical records. The creation of a theology out of the kind of materials that the Old Testament presents us is always to do the religion of Israel some degree of violence. The revelation that comes to us is historical and existential, and so it is the historical approach that most accurately reflects and does greatest justice to the biblical records. It is here that historical criticism finds its highest justification. For Hebraic religion, above all others, it is essential that the records be subjected to careful criticism and evaluation. It is impossible to recover the nature of that historical revelation without placing the documents in their proper historical setting. What is spoken or written is spoken or written in a definite context, and the "word" is not rightly apprehended, that is, as it was meant to be apprehended, if we leave it hanging in the air. Word and event belong together, and this means concrete word and concrete event. Perhaps no contribution in modern times has been greater than the contribution of the scholars of the past century who have helped us to discern what this means. The prophets have come to life for us, and in our new appreciation of them as men of God to their own times they have spoken to us and our own times with a directness and force unprecedented in the history of Hebrew-Christian faith.

D. The Biblical Perspective.—When the whole of the Old Testament is read in this historical context and we get a picture of its movement from its earliest beginnings to its final end, we are in a position to understand the achievement of Israel, or rather, the nature of the divine activity in the Chosen People. We must evaluate and interpret the individual event and individual word, but we must move beyond this if we are to assess the true significance of Israel's religion. The context of biblical thinking is linear. It moves from beginning to end. The thought and mentality of Israel are keenly sensitive to beginning and end; they constantly play reflectively upon these two focuses. It is natural that beginning and end should be variously understood and interpreted, but before the Old Testament comes to a close, these great focuses are comprehended at their final points of the primordial and the eschatological, of creation and redemption, of old covenant and new, of the word to Abraham (Gen. 12:1) and the realization of that word.

² See article "The Faith of Israel," pp. 351-52.

But what can be said of the history of Israel's religion itself? What is the nature of its movement as it presses beyond the limits of the Old Testament canon? Naturally, Judaism and Christianity will give divergent answers. The one will discern the most authentic culmination in the literature of rabbinical Judaism, while the other will see the Old Testament fulfilled in the New. The view we take as to the culmination of Israel's faith will inevitably influence our reading of the Old Testament. We cannot help being influenced by our understanding of its most authentic outcome. To be sure, both Jew and Christian will seek to read their scriptures in the light of the meaning of the original writers. But there will certainly be a difference in emphasis and evaluation, and there will be a difference in discerning where the deepest continuity really lies. Such writings as Deuteronomy, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Priestly Code will be treated somewhat differently when their importance is assessed. But for both religions the Old Testament is indispensable to an understanding of their true character. For the Christian community the belief that the New Testament fulfills the Old is a major fact concerning the religion of Israel. It is the faith of Christians that the new Israel is the true continuation of the old. The confession of the people of the new covenant concerning Jesus of Nazareth can never be ignored completely. Such a confession has its grave perils when it comes to interpreting the Bible, for it is always our first task to learn what the text really means, and later developments must not be allowed to obscure the original meaning. At the same time, we do not read a passage in isolation only, but inquire into the subsequent development of its thought and into its use in other parts of the Bible or in rabbinical and other literature.

II. The Age of the Patriarchs (ca. 2000-1500 B.C.)

A. Historical and Cultural Background.—The period covered by the Hebrew patriarchs was one of almost universal turbulence among the peoples of the ancient Near East.³ There is a curious interruption in the flow of contemporary records toward the beginning of the Middle Bronze Age and extending to 1500 B.C. and beyond. Fortunately the discovery of the Mari archives in the region of the Upper Euphrates

³ See article "The Old Testament World," pp. 233-71.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

by André Parrot has made it possible for us to gain a fairly clear picture of the situation in the Euphrates region in the eighteenth century B.C. Following the brilliant Twelfth Egyptian Dynasty (2000-1750 B.C.) and the great age of Hammurabi in Babylon (1792-1747 B.C.) Hurrians from the Caucasian highlands pressed into the Fertile Crescent and spread throughout the entire region, both east and west, and even into Egypt. About 1750 B.C. the Hyksos, who were in all probability predominantly North Semites, invaded Egypt, where they remained for almost two centuries until they were driven out by Ahmose I (ca. 1550) to mark the beginning of the Eighteenth Dynasty and the New Empire. Not much later than the Hyksos conquest, the Hittites from Anatolia burst into the Euphrates region and brought the dynasty of Hammurabi to a decisive end. This invasion, in turn, prepared the way for the Kassites, who swept from their mountain home in the Zagros into Babylonia and retained control of the region for over four centuries.⁴ Other groups were involved in the turbulence of this age, but enough has been shown to indicate that the period was one of great unrest. The documents from Mari and those which emerge after the period of silence all reflect the same situation. The Fertile Crescent, which was far from being racially homogeneous before these invasions, became much more complex in its racial composition. "It was amid this welter of diverse races rapidly commingling that the Hebrew people were born."⁵ In many ways the most interesting and significant of all these movements was the Hurrian invasion, for our recent knowledge of these people provides almost certain proof that the origins of the Hebrew patriarchs are to be traced among these people who settled in the region of the Upper Euphrates later controlled by the Mitanni. The linguistic and cultural affinities that have been adduced from this region and the equally startling parallels between Genesis and the Nuzi materials go far to settle the issue as to the origin of the patriarchs. The biblical account of the sojourn from Haran has much to support it, and the general emphasis upon Aram and the Aramaeans in the accounts corroborates what is probable on other independent lines.⁶ One ⁴ W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (2nd ed.; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1946), pp. 150 ff.

⁵ Theophile J. Meek, Hebrew Origins (rev. ed.; New York: Harper & Bros., 1950), p. 6.

⁶ Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, p. 179. Here Albright is inclined to believe that the localization of Abraham's home at Ur was secondary (a) because it is without archaeological illustration, and (b) because the Greek translators nowhere mention Ur. In his article, "The Biblical Period," in The Jews: Their History, Cul-

other name appears among the peoples of this era, the Habiru. The name appears almost everywhere in the ancient Near East, so it is certain that the Habiru were widely disseminated. The name bears no ethnic association, but the equation of Hebrew with Habiru is widely accepted.

It was in this period of international anarchy and ethnic diversity that the patriarchs lived—the period represented by the book of Genesis. The movement and pressure of various races and racial types were reflected in the Hebrews, and the complex picture of the culture and religion of the book of Genesis is consistent with what our recent knowledge has taught us concerning conditions of the whole of the ancient Near East during the period of the Middle Bronze Age. It is obvious that many forces and influences went into the making of the Hebrews. In any attempt to reconstruct the religion of this age these are the facts that must be borne in mind.

B. Sources.—The Bible contains no contemporary sources for the history of Israel's religion before the time of Moses. Our earliest literary documents come from a period centuries after the events they record. This situation combined with the highly legendary character of many of the materials, the indisputable presence of eponymous elements, a number of anachronisms, and obvious traces of the point of view of a much later age, has prompted many historians in the past to view the representations of the Pentateuch with great suspicion. There certainly was a long period of oral tradition in which the memories of Israel were transmitted from generation to generation, but many scholars have been skeptical whether these memories have been accurately preserved. Critical analysis has demonstrated the presence of two great epic works: the Yahwist epic, emanating from the time of the early monarchy (ca. the tenth century B.C.), the Elohist epic from the northern kingdom (some time in the eighth century B.C.).⁷ There is no question that the theology which dominates these works in their present form represents the point of view of their authors and compilers. Until recent times, therefore, the ture, and Religion, ed. Louis Finkelstein (New York: Harper & Bros., 1949), I, 4, he appears to accept the historicity of the Ur tradition: "We shall probably never be able to fix the date of Terah's migration from Ur to Haran, but there can be no doubt that a date about the third quarter of the twentieth century B.C.E. would suit historical indications remarkably well."

⁷ Two other sources of considerable scope and of major importance are present in the Pentateuch: the Deuteronomic, emanating from the seventh century B.C., though its sources in turn are often much earlier, and the priestly history and law, codified ca. 538-450 B.C., but containing a great amount of early and trustworthy material.

majority of scholars have felt impelled to treat the accounts in the Pentateuch as unreliable to a considerable degree for the historical period which they describe.

Our vastly enlarged knowledge of the ancient Near East has changed the situation appreciably, however. Today many scholars recognize a substantial amount of genuine historical material for such a period as the age of the patriarchs. Archaeology has revealed an extraordinary correspondence between the general social and cultural conditions portrayed in Genesis and those exposed by excavations. Discoveries from such sites as Nuzi, Mari, and elsewhere, provide the geographical, cultural, linguistic, and religious background against which the stories of the patriarchs are laid.⁸ Many passages which were heretofore obscure have become clear. A large number of details which the spade has unearthed fit in with the details of Genesis. Moreover, today we attach greater credence to oral tradition than in earlier times. If the sanctuaries were repositories of many of the traditions, as seems likely, then we can understand more readily why the traditions remained as reliable as they now appear to be.⁹ Again, the striking differences between the religion of Genesis and the religion of Exodus argue for the preservation of an authentic tradition.

Yet it is important not to exaggerate the situation as we meet it in the Pentateuch. It is obvious that the literary materials are of great complexity, that various sources have gone to their making, and that the point of view of the compilers has left its stamp upon their compilations. If we do not distinguish between the work and thought of the compilers and their sources we are in danger of throwing the history into confusion. In actuality we are confronted with a number of strata from different times, and these times are much later than the patriarchal age. The true historian will seek to avoid the Scylla of undue skepticism and the Charybdis of undue credulity. For such an undertaking we are in a better position today than ever before. It is not too much to say, however, that all the sources, late as well as early, preserve an appreciable amount of ancient and trustworthy tradition.

C. The Religion of the Patriarchal Age.—Pre-Mosaic religion has its home in Palestine. Only against the background of Canaanite religion are we able to make any estimate of the religion of the patriarchs. The biblical traditions of the book of Genesis do not suggest any sharp difference between the worship of the patriarchs and the worship of the Canaanites. The most telling witness of the inscriptions from widely separated places (Mari, Ras Shamra [Ugarit], Nuzi, Boğasköy, Tell el-Amarna, and elsewhere in Egypt) is in fundamental harmony with the Canaanite milieu and Canaanite character of pre-Mosaic religion. All this is amply reinforced by the later biblical record (such as Deut. 26; Ezek. 16; the Priestly Code, etc.). Complex and late as our literary sources may be in their present form, the background against which Mosaic religion came into existence is without question Palestinian and Canaanite.

⁸ For detailed illustrations see Millar Burrows, What Mean These Stones? (New Haven: American Schools of Oriental Research, 1941), passim.

⁹ Despite exaggeration in some quarters, it is the great merit of the contemporary Scandinavian school of tradition-historical criticism that it has called attention to the living process of the growth of traditions.

The head of the Canaanite pantheon worshiped by the patriarchs was El. His presence is seen in such titles as El Elyon (Gen. 14:18-20, 22; Num. 24:16; Deut. 32:8), El Shaddai (Gen. 17:1; 28:3; 35:11; 48:3; 49:25; Exod. 6:3), El Olam (Gen. 21:33), El Roi (Gen. 16:13), El Berith (Judg. 9:46). In Gen. 14:19 Melchizedek, the king of Salem and priest of El Elyon, blesses Abram:

Blessed be Abram by El Elyon, Maker of Heaven and Earth;
And blessed by El Elyon,
Who has delivered your enemies into your hand.

Such compounds are kin to Ugaritic compounds tḫn 'el dp'ed, 'el mlk, šr' el, etc.¹⁰ In the Ugaritic poems El is described as dwelling in a distant cosmic locale, the "Source of the Two Deeps" (cf. Hebrew tehom). He was worshiped at Shechem, Jerusalem, Ugarit, and elsewhere. A developed cult of El Elyon which existed at Jerusalem has left its impress upon more than one Old Testament passage.¹¹ His cosmic character is affirmed in Melchizedek's blessing and is closely paralleled by the Ugaritic expression qnyn 'El, El our Creator. At Shechem, El Berith (El of the covenant) was worshiped, and while biblical evidence first appears in Judg. 13:33; 9:4, it is confirmed to a degree by the phrase "the terebinth of the lawgiver" in connection with the theophany to Abram upon his entrance into Palestine (Gen. 12:6 [JJ]). In the light of these considerations Joshua's covenant at Shechem, with its accompanying statute and ordinance, is most illuminating. That the cult at Shechem was somehow related to the cult at Jerusalem is suggested by the name Abimelech

¹⁰ Herbert G. May, "The Patriarchal Idea of God," Journal of Biblical Literature, LX (1941), 113-28.

¹¹ Aubrey R. Johnson, "The Role of the King in the Jerusalem Cultus," in The Labyrinth, ed. S. H. Hooke (London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1935), pp. 71-111.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

(Judg. 9), king of Shechem, and the name Melchizedek at Jerusalem. The component parts of these two names have good Ugaritic parallels. Another deity whose name is familiar to us from the second millennium B.C. is Bethel.¹² It will be recalled that the Old Testament records at least three references to theophanies to Jacob at Bethel (Gen. 28:10-22 [JE]; 31:13 [E]; 32:9-11 [J]), "I am El-Bethel". Philo of Byblos mentions Bethel as a deity along with El, Dagon, and Atlas,¹³ and in the Elephantine papyri of the fifth century B.C. the name seems to appear again as that of a deity. The appellation El Shaddai is commonly employed by the priestly writer before the time of Moses (cf. Exod. 6:3). The inscriptions, together with an early biblical source (Num. 24:16) and the archaizing references in the book of Job, lead to the conclusion that El Shaddai was in actuality head of the Canaanite pantheon, and this is confirmed by his identification in Num. 24:16 with El Elyon. El Shaddai is evidently a mountain deity, "the Mountain" or "the One of the Mountain."¹⁴ Among the Canaanites, as among other peoples of the Near East, the plural form Elohim was already applied to one god.

The chief interest in the cult represented by these various names was in nature. The mystery of life as it manifested itself in the fertility of soil was articulated in the worship of the bāmōth or high places. Here the most characteristic appurtenances were the maqṣēbhāh or sacred stone and the ʾashērāh, perhaps the image of the god by that name (cf. "Ashirat of the Sea" in the Ugaritic inscriptions). Offerings and gifts were made on the high places and other sanctuaries, as at Bethel, Beersheba, Hebron, Shechem, and Jerusalem. Festivals were probably celebrated at certain seasons of the year, all of them nature celebrations, not very different from those celebrated at the vineyard dances at Shiloh (Judg. 21), or "the marriage festival of the fields" at Shechem, of the wailing for Jephthah's daughter "upon the mountains" (Judg. 11:38). The religion of the fathers was not the same as the worship of the thundering Yahweh of Sinai. The God pictured in Genesis is not like the God who reveals himself to Moses in the book of Exodus.

¹² J. P. Hyatt, "The Deity Bethel and the Old Testament," Journal of the American Oriental Society, LIX (1939), 81-98. Hyatt traces the origin of the god Bethel to the second millennium, possibly to Ugarit, but certainly "to the religion of the territory of Syria or Syria-Palestine which is best represented to us by the Rās Shamra documents" (p. 90).

¹³ Phoenicum Historia II. 14.

¹⁴ Cf. Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, p. 186: "The mountain-deity in question is clearly . . . called Baal (lord) by the Canaanites, and often addressed as 'great mountain,' or the like, in Accadian invocations to Amurru, the 'Western One,' i.e., the storm-god of the West."

On the other hand, the biblical traditions present us with a religion which was much more than, and quite different from, Canaanite worship. A comparison of the stories of Genesis with the Ugaritic texts will reveal at once that we are moving in another world of thought. The Canaanites were agriculturists, and their interest was in nature and the fertility of the soil; the Hebrews were nomad shepherds and the interest in nature is quite secondary to the interest in history. This contrast is not to be explained as solely the work of the late compilers. The deities of Genesis are gods of the fathers. Albrecht Alt has subjected the sources to close scrutiny in the light of Palmyrene and Nabataean texts, and has drawn a picture of religious development which is not only consistent with the biblical traditions, but also in conformity with the situation as we encounter it in the revelation to Moses on Mount Sinai.¹⁵ With each of the patriarchs there is associated a special theophany in which the deity reveals himself in a highly personal way. The names of the deities are directly connected with the patriarchs: the Shield of Abraham (Gen. 15:1), the Kinsman (pāhad) of Isaac (Gen. 31:42, 53), and the Mighty One of Jacob (Gen. 49:24). These were family or clan gods with family names and associations in which the intimate relationships of the family (father, brother, etc.) were applied to the deities, as is reflected in many of the biblical names.¹⁶ They were personal gods and they bore the names of those to whom they first appeared: the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob (Exod. 3:6). These were ancient tribal deities which later coalesced into one in the revelation to Moses. The view of Alt is not without its difficulties, but it has the merit of focusing upon the biblical traditions themselves and of being in harmony with the mentality of these traditions. Family kinship is of course prominent in all West Semitic religions, and the Hebrews employ exactly the same terms to describe it as their neighbors do. But in Genesis there is an historical germ which was not only original but also susceptible of further development.

III. The Age of Moses (ca. 1350-1250 B.C.)

A. Sources.—The biblical records which center in the life and work of Moses are the Yahwist (J) and Elohist (E) epics and the priestly (P) history and legal codes. It is significant that much of the most important material concerning Moses and the theophany on Sinai, ¹⁵ Der Gott der Väter (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1929).

¹⁶ Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, p. 185.

with its covenant events, come to us from E, although occasionally it is J which provides us with valuable information (e.g., Exod. 19:3b-8). The book of Deuteronomy witnesses to a recrudescence of Mosaic religion. The priestly sections of the Pentateuch, although they are late, often preserve important and early reminiscences, and even much of the legislation in its ultimate origin goes back to very early times. Of great value, too, are the not infrequent allusions to the Exodus and the wilderness sojourn in the Prophets and Psalms (Amos 2:10; 9:7; Hos. 11:1; 13:4; Mic. 6:4; Jer. 2:2-3, 5-7; Pss. 66:6; 78:18-53; 136:10-11). While we have no firsthand extrabiblical material corroborating the story of the Exodus, such materials as we may glean from the ancient Near East concerning the periodic invasion of Semitic tribes into Egypt, the reference to Israel in the Merneptah stele (ca. 1229 B.C.), the earlier witness of the Tell el-Amarna letters (fourteenth century B.C.), and the important results of excavations in Palestine (e.g., Bethel, Lachish, etc.) as well as extra-Palestinian sites, help us to see the events in a convincing context and setting. As to the historical existence of Moses there can no longer be any serious doubt. He is as well authenticated as the founder of any of the great world religions. The imaginative and folkloristic elements in the accounts do not deprive them of their general historicity.

B. Historical Background.—The beginnings of religions are characteristically obscure, and this is also true of the beginnings of Israel's religion. On such important questions as the time and circumstances of the entrance into Egypt, the number and identity of the tribes, the length of the Egyptian sojourn, the date of the Exodus, and the location of Sinai, we are not in a position to give any decisive answer. Yet archaeology has aided us enormously in recent years so that the obscurity is not nearly so great as it was even a generation ago.

There is good reason to suppose that the Hebrew clans entered Egypt during the period of Hyksos occupation (1750-1560 B.C.). It is not likely that all twelve tribes were present in Egypt, but neither is it likely that only one tribe (e.g., Levi) was there. The Exodus itself is to be dated in all probability in the early part of the thirteenth century B.C.

C. Moses and His Work.—While there has been much gratuitous speculation for centuries upon Egyptian influences in the records which deal with Moses, we are now in a better position to assess the true situation. The name of Moses is certainly Egyptian (cf. the Egyptian mesu as it appears in Ah-mesu [Ahmose], Ra-mesu [Rameses], Thut-mesu [Thutmose]). Other Egyptian names continue for several generations after Moses. Some scholars have seen the influence of the solar monotheism of Amenhotep IV's reform movement upon Moses. It is certainly not impossible that Moses and his contemporaries came under this Egyptian influence, but nothing at all certain can be deduced from our present records, and there is very little to suggest any direct bearing of Akhenaton's lofty monotheism upon the mind of Moses.

The idyllic story of the birth of the child which has many parallels among other peoples, the daring stroke for justice, the flight to Midian, the romantic scene at the well, the theophany of the burning bush, Moses' mighty wrestling, and the great contest between Moses and Pharaoh all constitute a stirring prologue to the fateful events which follow. Oriental imagination is at work in all these accounts, but the figure of the personality which emerges from them is not inconsistent with sections which lay claim to greater credence. The theophany to Moses reveals a great psychological struggle which is not only consistent with later biblical "calls" but also in harmony with the kind of personality which the records describe Moses to have been.

D. The Exodus.—The central event upon which all the early stories converge is the Exodus from Egypt. In this event the Hebrews believed that their God had made himself known to them. He came to them in the hour of their deepest need and wrought a mighty liberation for them. At the Sea of Reeds (or Papyrus Marsh) he prepared a road that they might pass over dry-shod. In the moment of supreme crisis when the Egyptians pursued them, he came to their rescue from the pillar of cloud and fire (Exod. 14:24-25). From the midst of the gathered clans Miriam came forth with a tambourine, and in ecstatic joy sang a hymn of deliverance and redemption. No lines in the whole account lay greater claim to fact than these. In a profound sense they mark the beginning of the religion of Israel:

Sing to Yahweh, for he has triumphed mightily,
The horse and its rider he has hurled into the sea (Exod. 15:21).

In a succession of events all the way from Egypt to the mount of convenanting, Yahweh came to the help of Israel. They needed a leader in the desert, and he came in pillar of cloud and fire to lead them. They suffered from thirst, and he healed the bitter waters of Marah with a branch of leafy foliage (Exod. 15:25 [JJ]). They hungered for the onions and garlic of Egypt, and he came with "bread from heaven" in the gift of manna and quail (Num. 11:4-10 [E]). In the supreme hour of their arrival at the mount, Israel encountered Amalek in internecine warfare, but in miraculous fashion Yahweh gave victory to his people (Exod. 17:8-16 [E]). Such was the God who had revealed himself to Moses: Deliverer, Leader, Physician, Provider, and Victor in war. Now he was to reveal himself to them as more than all these.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

Israel saw in the series of events centering in the Exodus the living matrix of her faith. The thought and reflection of later periods focused again and again on this creative period, and our present Pentateuch is a major witness to it, just as the remaining portions of the Old Testament, and often of the New Testament, return again and again to them as the lodestar of the great tradition. It is common in modern accounts of this period to speak of "the work of Moses," and surely nothing should obscure the momentous proportions of his achievement. But it is by no means certain that this is the point of focus of the Bible; rather, it is Yahweh who is at work through Moses, his mediator, in every crisis and vicissitude. With grateful hearts the generations rehearsed the "righteous deeds" (צדקות) of Yahweh.

E. The Covenant.—In the biblical accounts of the covenant the central features of the faith emerge with clarity. What is the significance of this event? The Scriptures are rightly called "the Old and the New Covenants," for it is the covenant that constitutes the cardinal fact underlying them. The historicity of the covenant at this early time has been challenged, but without success. Not only the contention of the narratives themselves, but the subsequent development of Israel's life from Sinai onward needs this basis to give it the meaning which it professes to have. It is a covenant God who speaks covenant words to a covenant people and consummates a covenant relationship in a fateful covenant act. The memories of Israel are memories which find their source and vitality in some such event as this. The absence of references to the covenant is often perplexing.¹⁷ But many sections before Deuteronomy and Jeremiah (e.g., I Kings 19:10, 14; Amos 3:2; Hos. 1-3) demand the covenant to explain them. And as Israel treasured these covenantal memories in her communal life, so she looked forward to the covenantal promises which all versions of the covenant contain. Past, present, and future, all of history in fact, was read in terms of the reality of the covenantal event and revelation. In saying this it is important not to exceed our evidence by relying on sources which are inextricably intertwined with our present narratives (e.g., P), but which are nevertheless late. At the same time, it is just as important to evaluate our earliest sources, late as they are, and to discern what is historically reliable and religiously significant in them. When the true place of the covenant in Israel's religion is once recognized and appreciated, we shall have to find an adequate source for such a momentous development as the Old and New Testaments present to us.¹⁸

¹⁷ Gerhard von Rad, Das formgeschichtliche Problem des Hexateuchs (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1938).

The significance of the covenant for Israel in the age of Moses may be stated as follows:

(a) In the complex of events of which the covenant is the center it is Yahweh who takes the initiative and brings about the beginning of Israel's historical existence. There are horizontal elements in the account, such as Israel's slavery in Egypt, conditions under the New Empire, the influence of Akhenaton's reform, the reign of Ramses II, the Midianite or Kenite cult with Jethro as its priest on the mount of God, and many other similar factors. These forces are obviously of importance for an understanding of the account. But there is also a transcendent element here; at least Israel understands it so, and obviously understood it so from the beginning. Faith and history are interwoven in this account of Israel's beginnings, and faith does justice to the transcendent elements as historical and literary criticism seeks to do justice to the immanent elements. Both are present, and we must recognize both if we are to understand Israel's religion. The narrative is theocentric, and the theocentricity is marked by God's breaking into history in behalf of his people Israel.

(b) The initiative of God in delivering Israel and thus bringing her to self-consciousness was marked by his revelation, "God spake all these words, saying" (Exod. 20:1). When God takes the initiative by a great event he accompanies the event by his word. Yahweh speaks to Israel, who knows herself to be addressed. But the distinctive feature of this account is that Yahweh reveals what Israel needs above all things else to know. The first words are in the characteristic form of all theophanies, biblical and nonbiblical. But to Israel the word is "I am Yahweh" (Exod. 20:2). A relationship has been established. The name has been spoken, and Israel can know her God and call upon him and praise him.

(c) This God who speaks from the mountain does not speak to Israel as a God of nature. It is possible that he was a nature god originally, the god of the Kenite clans of which Jethro was priest. The natural elements in the theophany are striking, but they are transcended and even defied. Israel understood her origins to be not animistic, but historical.

¹⁸ For recognition of the Mosaic date of the covenant see Walther Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1933-39), where the covenant dominates the whole of biblical faith from beginning to end and in every area and phase of its life; cf. also the works of Ernst Sellin, Ludwig Köhler, Adolphe Lods, W. F. Albright, Theophile J. Meek.

(d) The revelation of Yahweh meant that a relationship had been established. Later sources described it in the familiar words, "I will be your God, and ye shall be my people," but this idea is present from the beginning. It is not too much to say that the fundamental word of the Old Testament scripture is this expression of relationship: Yahweh the God of Israel, and Israel the people of Yahweh.¹⁹ This is in reality the basis of Old Testament ethics as it is the basis of the cult; in it both priest and prophet find their task.

(e) The relationship between Yahweh and Israel is one that is understood and described in terms of history. "I am Yahweh who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slaves" (Exod. 20:2). This is the prior and essential revelation of Yahweh; other revelations are subordinate to it and must be read in the light of it.

(f) The revelation of Yahweh in the covenant situation was one that confronted Israel with obligation and responsibility. The covenant is contingent: "If you will indeed heed my injunctions and keep my covenant" (Exod. 19:5). The account may reflect the views of a later period of composition, but the sources are unanimous in this fundamental and fateful representation of Israel's responsibility as expressed in a law. From the beginning Israel knows herself to be accountable. This must be recognized as an authentic contribution of Moses. At the heart of his own "call" throbs this imperious demand upon him, which he seeks to evade but cannot resist. If the Old Testament is a development from the covenant relationship, then this confrontation with an absolute demand belongs with it. There is no theophany without obligation, no meeting of God without meeting the urgency of a demand.

(g) Yahweh's revelation is to a people; it is not Moses who is "called," but Israel; Moses' call is a call to confront Israel with Yahweh's word of revelation and his deed of deliverance. Yahweh's purpose is to choose for himself a people. Every people has its god, and the gods have their peoples, but the historical character of Yahweh's choice of Israel and the series of events in which he has made himself known makes Israel a people in a unique sense.

(h) When Israel covenanted with Yahweh, they covenanted together. It was a voluntary act of solidarity. Who were those who gathered at Sinai? We do not know, but they probably represented disparate tribal elements. Together they covenanted with Yahweh, and they were bound by one central loyalty, an exclusive loyalty to Yahweh alone. They were bound so surely because they were so surely bound to Yahweh, the Lord and initiator of the covenant. The covenant is the basis of Israel's consciousness of community.

(j) In the later religious development Israel reflected upon the motive of Yahweh in his election of her and in his entering into covenant with her. The later prophetic leaders could see nothing in Israel that merited such a choice and such a deed (Deut. 7:7-8). The final answer was that it was an act of Yahweh's unmerited love and in accordance with his oath to the patriarchs. This is not articulate in the earliest sources, but it is implicit in them. One might say that Yahweh's choosing of Israel was no different from Chemosh's relationship to Moab, or Rimmon's to Aram, or Marduk's to Babylon. But no careful reading of the relevant accounts substantiates such a view. There is elsewhere no living, personal, voluntary relationship in which the two parties are dynamically involved. In Israel choice and decision, loyalty and fidelity, obligation and accountability, and mutuality of response are writ large over the whole account. And Yahweh, who brought about the whole situation, is one who acts because it is his character to act and speak and make his claim. At least we may say that the later consciousness of an election love ('ahabhâh) and a covenant love (hêsedh) demanding mutuality and fidelity are adumbrated here. It was present enough for Israel to proceed upon its basis.

(k) The covenant relationship as the primary locus of Israel's loyalty and self-consciousness provides her with a perspective from which to view all the relativities of her history. What the covenant meant in relationship to the life of the nation could be apprehended only in the course of on-going history, but the oldest accounts clearly describe the commands which govern Israel's community life from the point of view of the covenant. The tendency in recent decades to find in the Elohist Decalogue of Exod. 20:1-17 the original Mosaic deposit is not guided by this covenant consciousness necessarily, but it is the covenant relationship which gives this Decalogue another claim to authenticity alongside of other claims. To assume the general representation of J and E concerning the covenant to be substantially correct is to give a meaning to the whole Mosaic age which is in accord with the later representations of the Old Testament.

¹⁹ For an admirable statement of this see Johannes Hempel, Gott und Mensch im Alten Testaments (2nd ed.; Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1936).

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

F. Yahweh and His Nature.—Almost the first question to come from the lips of Moses on the occasion of the theophany was, "What is his name?" (Exod. 3:13). This is an important question in all ancient religion, and the answer for ancient man is of supreme import. When the deity revealed himself to Israel, the first words were the communication of the name. The reply Moses received to his question seems to be cryptic or enigmatic, and it is the view of many scholars that it was meant to be so. That is not impossible. But most scholars have sought to find the meaning of the famous four letters, YHWH, for it is a natural assumption that the name was expected to mean something significant. Since the verb is most obviously from the Hebrew verb "to be" (better, "to become," "to befall," "to happen," "to come to pass"), it is natural that many explanations have started with what appears superficially to be the primary meaning. This has had at least one unfortunate effect, for it has encouraged metaphysical interpretations of being, which are certainly wide of the original meaning. Similarly, the rendering "Eternal," popularized by its employment in the Moffatt translation, must be rejected. The view taken here is also that adopted by T. J. Meek, "I that cause to be what comes to pass"²⁰ or "I who cause to happen what happens."²¹ This translation is linguistically permissible and is in accord with the context of the revelation to Moses. The chief question is whether the name was thus understood by those who worshiped Yahweh before Moses. This is not likely. As in other biblical etymologies, the word is given a meaning to suit the Hebraic interests.

The view of the origin of the Yahweh cult set forth by Karl Budde²² still commends itself as the most probable, although many details would have to be restated. According to that view, Yahweh was the God of the Midianite (Kenite) clans inhabiting Sinai-Horeb, "the mountain of God." Jethro was priest of this tribe, and was expert in the cult associated with it. When Moses married into the family of Jethro he was adopted covenantally as a member of the tribe whose God was Yahweh. The revelation to Moses was a revelation of Yahweh, perhaps at the sanctuary or sacred spot (before the cave?) where the god dwelt. Both the character and the wide range of evidence in the Old Testament, most important of which is found in the earlier and later associations of Israel with the Kenites, make it inherently probable.

²⁰ Hebrew Origins, p. 100.

²¹ Even a hasty examination of the usage of the verb hāyāh in Francis Brown, S. R. Driver, C. A. Briggs, eds., A Hebrew and English Lexicon of the Old Testament (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1906) will reveal the active connotations of the word.

²² Religion of Israel to the Exile (New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1899).

But more important than the origins of Yahweh and the cult associated with his name is the character of the deity. What is most striking in his nature is his holiness. He is a zealous, jealous, mighty God who thunders with his voice and sends forth lightning and fire. There is something fearful, terrifying, even demonic in him. The whole mountain quakes at his descent, and the people tremble before the awfulness of the theophany. This utterly holy character of Yahweh makes him and everything associated with him taboo. Therefore Moses and Israel must engage in elaborate cultic acts in order that Yahweh may not burst upon them. Such a God is a "consuming fire." There is no suggestion of mysticism anywhere in these accounts; it would be unthinkable that any devotee, even Moses, should feel himself mystically united with him. This holy character of Yahweh appears at the beginning in primitive fashion, but it put its stamp upon the whole faith to our own day. Yahweh the God of Israel is a holy God.

It is this jealous, terrible aspect of Yahweh that lends such urgency to the first of the commands of the Elohistic Decalogue, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me" (Exod. 20:3). Yahweh tolerates no other God to be worshiped beside him. Yahweh stands alone. In contrast to the nature gods of the Semitic East, Yahweh has no consort, although in the Elephantine papyri of the fifth century B.C. there is more than a suggestion that in Egypt the Jews did recognize such a consort. But as the narratives are before us now, and indeed as the whole Old Testament now stands, Yahweh is without any connections of family. To be sure, Israel is his son (Exod. 4:23), but the relationship is one of adoption, not of nature. The later expression, "sons of El," is a poetic reminiscence of Canaanite provenance which refers to angelic beings and should not be taken literally. Yahweh permits no cleavage in Israel's piety; there is no separation between belief in God and belief in demons. He comprehends within his being both the divine and the demonic (Exod. 4:24-26; 19:21-22), the positive and the negative, light and darkness. Yahweh has no mother goddess at his side; he includes within his nature both husband and wife, both father and mother. The feminine attributes as well as the masculine are absorbed into his holy being. He forbids the perpetuation of beliefs and practices of the ancient folk religion such as the cult of the dead. Yahweh is in control over every area; there is no need for a special cult of the family, for he is Lord within the family and over the family. The family traditions associated with the patriarchs are absorbed and taken over by the Yahweh cult (Exod. 3:15).

Yahweh admits no easy toleration of other divine beings. He demands an exclusive worship. Everywhere else in antiquity the belief is common that the more gods the better; the more diverse and manifold the pantheon, the greater the resources for every kind of need and every aspect of human life. The gods are as many as the needs of men. Not so in Mosaic religion. The demand that Yahweh makes of his people is monolatrous, however, not monotheistic. The existence of other gods is not denied; the command to worship him alone, "Thou shalt have no other gods before me," actually implies their existence. What is required is that Israel shall neither worship nor recognize these gods. The later formulation, Yahweh, and Yahweh only shall you serve (Deut. 6:10-15), is Mosaic through and through. But further, the urgency with which the demand of monolatry is made of Israel, and the power and holiness and jealousy of Yahweh which are associated with the demand, are such as to give it not only a peculiarly binding force but also an impulsion and impetus in the direction of something more than monolatry. In a continuing historical revelation, where the intense reality of Yahweh's holiness asserted itself in the movement of succeeding vicissitudes and events, and where his sovereignty was viewed in new contexts of ever more extensive range, monotheism was certain to emerge in the course of time. It is not too much to say, therefore, that monotheism is already implicit in the original command to Israel (Exod. 20:3). Not until we do justice to this feature of Mosaic religion are we prepared to measure the magnitude of Moses' work as the founder of Hebrew religion; not until we appreciate the implications of the command are we prepared to understand either the immediately subsequent religious development of Israel or the relative absence of fear among the Israelites in comparison with other peoples of the ancient Near East. Precisely because Yahweh is to be worshiped alone, because he demands everything and excludes nothing, life was destined to be grasped as a unity, the ethical demand was destined to have singular force, and the interpretation of history was destined to be grasped under a controlling unity as in Second Isaiah and the book of Daniel.

Consonant with the holiness of Yahweh and his status as the only God to be worshiped by his devotees is the command against the making of images: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness" (Exod. 20:4a). Yahweh must not be represented by visual imagery of any kind, or at least by any imagery which bears the trace of human handiwork. The Yahweh whom Moses proclaims to Israel, and with whom Israel enters into living covenantal relationship, is invisible to human eyes. The intensity of the conviction that no man shall see God and live extended itself congenially into the whole area of God's nature. He was not such a God as could be adequately represented by the work of men's hands. The contrast of the cult of Yahweh with the cults of the ancient Near East was tremendous at this point, for visual imagery belonged to the very heart of the cult practices and the religious mentality associated with them. It is questionable whether Yahweh was ever represented in the form of animals, but in this period at least there is no suggestion that Yahwism permitted any kind of theriomorphism. Again, if we consider the wide currency of theriomorphism among the ancient Oriental cults, the Yahweh cult stands out conspicuously.

Yet the language of the Old Testament is strongly anthropomorphic, and it never ceased to be so. In nothing is the stirring quality of our sources more apparent than in their use of anthropomorphic and anthropopathic language, "I have seen the plight of my people, . . . and I have heard their cry, and I have come down to deliver them" (Exod. 3:7-8 [JJ]). "At the morning watch YHWH looked down toward the Egyptian army in the column of fire and cloud, and threw the Egyptian army into a panic. And he clogged their chariot wheels" (Exod. 14:24-25 [JJ]). It is the use of this vivid, living speech that opens a window into one of the most important features of Hebraic mentality, for parts of the body are bearers of psychical functions, and the physical becomes a remarkably powerful and significant agent of expressing psychical meanings.²³

G. Law and Cult.—Through the mediation of Moses, Israel became the people of Yahweh. The covenant relationship between Yahweh and Israel demanded a mutuality of obligation. Yahweh agreed to be the God of Israel, and Israel agreed to accept the provisions upon which alone the covenant could be based. We have already observed that the relationship was contingent upon Israel's keeping the covenant, yet it is only God who can abrogate it. The sojourn at Kadesh (En Mishpat)²⁴ and the instructions of Jethro to Moses on the occasion of his attempts to adjudicate disputes and give decisions to the people (Exod. 18:13) certainly suggest the development of a body of social practice and law.

²³ On this very important subject see the following: H. Wheeler Robinson, "Hebrew Psychology," in The People and the Book, ed. A. S. Peake (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1925), pp. 353-82; and especially Johannes Pederesen, Israel, Its Life and Culture I-II, III-IV (London: Oxford University Press, 1926, 1940).

²⁴ Adolphe Lods, Israel from Its Beginnings to the Middle of the Eighth Century, tr. S. H. Hooke (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trubner & Co., 1932), pp. 176-81.

It is somewhat more difficult to decide how extensive this body of law was and to identify its original scope. At the present time the Pentateuch contains a vast body of elaborate law, but this is almost all the work of the priests in the exilic and postexilic periods of Israel's history. That this may contain much that is early is fairly certain, but it is impossible to distinguish early and late with any great degree of plausibility. For years the J Decalogue (Exod. 34), first isolated by Goethe in 1773, was considered the earliest, although it has always been recognized that this could scarcely be Mosaic in view of its agricultural interest. More recently, however, there has been a tendency to turn to the Elohist Decalogue of Exod. 20:1-17, which follows the important interview of Jethro and Moses in Exod. 18 and the theophany to Israel in Exod. 19, and precedes the covenant act of Exod. 24 (reported by J in vss. 1-2, 9-11; E in vss. 3-8; and P in vss. 15-18a). To be sure, the Decalogue appears in an expanded form, and there is no universal agreement as to its exact contents. Without vouching for the historicity of every line, one may construct the passage somewhat as follows:

God spoke all these words: I am Yahweh, your God, who brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slaves.

1. You shall have no other gods before me.
2. You shall not make for me any graven image or any likeness.
3. You shall not invoke the name of Yahweh your God in vain.
4. Remember the sabbath day to keep it holy.
5. Honor your father and your mother.
6. You shall not commit murder.
7. You shall not commit adultery.
8. You shall not steal.
9. You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor.
10. You shall not covet your neighbor's house.

Paul Volz finds in the E Decalogue our only authoritative source for the real work of Moses, except for reminiscences outside the Pentateuch. Perhaps this is going too far, for there is much other material in the Pentateuch emanating from J, and especially from E, which has a claim to consideration. On the other hand, even the Elohist Decalogue has its difficulties. The tenth command has often been suspected, and the command of sabbath observance in a nomadic milieu is troublesome. The fifth through the ninth commandments should occasion no difficulty, for there is no good reason why they should be placed as late as the florescat of the prophetic movement. After all, other peoples in antiquity had long before recognized these basic demands of any stable social order.

The Covenant Code which follows the Elohist Decalogue (Exod. 20:23-23:19) is in its present form not later than the ninth century, but the researches of Anton Jirku,²⁵ Albrecht Alt,²⁶ and W. F. Albright²⁷ have greatly added to our knowledge of this material. Alt distinguishes between the casuistic laws of Canaanite provenance found in the Covenant Code and the apodictic laws. The Decalogue and the curses of Deut. 27 illustrate the form and spirit of the Hebrew apodictic formulations. Albright says of these: "The most striking thing about the apodictic laws is their categorical character . . . ; the Israelites are commanded not to sin, because Yahweh so wills."²⁸ Law and religion in ancient Israel belong together; ethics and religion are one and inseparable.

Of the institutions in the desert only two will demand our attention here. Circumcision is perhaps pre-Mosaic, so it need not deter us. First of all, the ark.²⁹ Controversy has raged for long concerning this sacred emblem. Whether its historical associations lie with the wilderness sojourn or with the later conquest of Palestine (I Sam. 4-7) has long been a major center of dispute, but the argument has gone with those who have defended the biblical representation of a desert palladium. The parallels among the nomad Arabs and the researches of Morgenstern and Klamroth are almost decisive. But what was the function of the ark, and what did it signify to those for whom it was a very sacred and holy object? Certainly it was closely connected with Yahweh himself. Rejecting older interpretations of W. Robertson Smith and those who follow him, we may say with assurance that in some way it mediated the presence ²⁵ Das weltliche Recht im Alten Testament (Gütersloh: C. Bertelsmann, 1927).

²⁶ Die Ursprünge des israelitischen Rechts (Leipzig: S. Hirzel, 1934).

²⁷ Journal of Biblical Literature, LV (1932), 164-69. The Canaanite casuistic laws of the Covenant Code belong in the same genre as the Sumerian Lipit Ishtar Code 150 years before Hammurabi, the Akkadian Eshnunna laws, which Albrecht Goetze thinks may be even older, the Code of Hammurabi of the eighteenth century B.C., the Hittite laws of the fourteenth century, and the Assyrian laws of the twelfth century. For a most important and illuminating discussion see Goetze, "Mesopotamian Law and the Historian," Journal of the American Oriental Society, LXIX (1949), 115-20.

²⁸ From Stone Age to Christianity, p. 204.

²⁹ For a brief though excellent discussion see Elmer A. Leslie, Old Testament Religion (New York: Abingdon Press, 1936), pp. 121-26.

and even the will of Yahweh. Some scholars have thought of the ark as the throne of the invisible Yahweh. Others have held that the ark contained some object or objects of a holy character. Its military associations are clear both in Numbers and I Samuel, and are classically formulated in the early songs of the ark:

Arise, O Yahweh, and let thine enemies be scattered;

Let those that hate thee flee before thee.

Return, O Yahweh, to the ten thousand thousands of Israel (Num. 10:35-36).

But there is no reason to believe that this was its only or even its chief function. It may well have been used for the consultation of the oracle, although our earliest sources connect the "inquiry of God" with the tent of meeting. On the basis of the Deuteronomic writings, such modern scholars as Ernst Sellin, Paul Volz, and Hans Schmidt have maintained that the ark contained the Sinaitic laws. Sellin argues:

If it was recognized at the very beginning that the source of the holy will of God—his words—was contained in a box, as the pledge of the conclusion of the covenant between him and the community, then it is most easily explained how there was erected for him the cult of prayer, of blessing, and of consultation of the deity.³⁰

The direction of the cult was left to Yahweh, for at all times the word of God was considered to be the source of all directions, so that even in the land of Canaan, so remote from Sinai, where Israel came under the dominance of Canaanite religion, the presence of Yahweh was nevertheless in their midst and his will was known in the concreteness of his commandments. This is surely an attractive view and has more to commend it than the alternative view that it was some meteorite stone taken from the sacred mount. It is a daring conjecture that Sellin makes, for it runs the serious danger of reading back the situation of later times into the time of Moses, but it is coherent with the movement and progress of Israel's historical life. We may at least recognize that the ark was intimately associated with Yahweh himself, that it was in some fashion or other connected with the expression of his will, whether as an instrument of divination or as containing the sacred words enshrined in the Elohist Decalogue. Finally, it is likely, as William R. Arnold maintained, that there were many arks in ancient Israel, perhaps one at each of the great sanctuaries, but that the Deuteronomists recognized only one ark and one place of worship.³¹

³⁰ Israelitisch-Jüdische Religionsgeschichte (Leipzig: Quelle & Meyer, 1933), p. 31.

³¹ Ephod and Ark (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1917).

Although the report concerning the tent of meeting has been subjected to fanciful elaboration, the central representation of the early sources may be accepted as reliable. Quite certainly it was used already in the Mosaic period for the consultation of the oracle, the "inquiry of God" (Exod. 33:7-11 [E]). As so frequently in the Pentateuch, it is the Elohist who gives us information that appears to be authentic. In fact, the Yahwist does not mention the tent at all.

"Now Moses used to take the tent and pitch it outside the camp, at a distance from the camp. It was called the tent of meeting. If there was anyone who wanted to consult Yahweh he would go outside the camp." (Exod. 33:7.) It is doubtful whether the ark and the tent belong together; more likely they were separate from each other until the time that David brought the various sacred tribal emblems into the city of Jerusalem. As to the central importance of ark and tent of meeting, little need be said. As instruments for mediating the presence and the will of God they belong to the center of the cult.

Did the Israelites sacrifice to Yahweh in the desert? If one were to confine his attention to the representations of the prophets alone, the answer would in all probability be in the negative. Amos seems to deny categorically that Israel sacrificed to Yahweh in the desert, and Jeremiah confirms Amos' apparent denial. On the other hand, it is the uniform witness of all the major Pentateuchal sources that sacrifice was offered to Yahweh and on notable occasions (Exod. 18:12-13 [E]; 24:5-8 [E]). Moreover, the Covenant Code contains the fundamental command that no one shall come before Yahweh empty-handed (Exod. 23:15), prescribes the construction of altars for sacrifice (Exod. 20:24), and even enters into details which are probably very early (Exod. 23:18-19). It is significant that the Elohist Decalogue has no word about sacrifice, since throughout the ancient Near East sacrifice is the natural expression of religion. The conclusion, then, will be that Israel did indeed offer sacrifices to Yahweh in the desert, but that they never assumed the central role in her religion which the Priestly Code, for example, suggests. In sacrifices Israel was brought into communion with Yahweh. They brought him into dynamistic relationship with his people, who became united with him by sharing with him in the sacrificial flesh. The priesthood nowhere assumes any place of importance in our earliest sources, although Moses himself functions as a priest in the great moment of the covenant relation (Exod. 24).

H. Conclusion.—The first great period of Israel's religion centers in the name of Moses, and if the picture here presented of the religion which he founded has not been overdrawn then the period may be designated as the age of Moses. The patriarchal age lies behind that epoch, to be sure, but it comes to us rather as prologue to Moses and the emergence of Israel. The period of great beginnings, the seminal age, was the time of Moses. The great act of redemption from slavery rehearsed in Miriam's song, the succession of mighty deeds culminating in the covenant on Sinai, the covenant itself with its tremendous demands of monolatry, imageless worship, and the elemental commands for the cohesion and purity of the social solidarity, all these stand as the pillars which uphold the faith. Behind all and within all is the historical consciousness of Yahweh's mighty deed in history; the personality of Moses, the servant of Yahweh; the chosen people with a great commission; the prospect toward a future in which the meaning of the covenant will articulate itself and Israel will trust and hope in its promises.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

IV. The Period of the Conquest (ca. 1250-1020 B.C.)

A. Sources.—The period of the Conquest is exceptionally well documented, both for the ancient Near East as a whole and for the international corridor of Palestine. If we may include the Late Bronze Age (1500-1200 B.C.) as an indispensable background for the understanding of this period, then we are confronted with almost an embarrassment of riches. First of all, there are the Egyptian records emanating from the New Empire, the Eighteenth (ca. 1550-1319 B.C.) and Nineteenth (1319-1200 B.C.) Dynasties. Of greatest importance are the famous Tell el-Amarna letters from the reigns of Amenhotep III (1413-1377 B.C.) and Amenhotep IV (Akhenaton; 1377-1360 B.C.). These letters are of inestimable value for the light they cast upon the international character of the age which J. H. Breasted has felicitously styled "The First Internationalism," and for the vivid picture they give of conditions in Palestine and the Near East as a whole. Of like value are the materials from ancient Ugarit. These inscriptions do for us culturally and religiously what the Tell el-Amarna tablets do politically. The language and culture reflected in the Ugaritic inscriptions show the same international outreach and cultural fusion of diverse elements from the ancient Near East as are suggested by the Tell el-Amarna letters. Of great interest and importance also are the Hittite archives from Hattusa (modern Boğazköy) in Asia Minor, the Nuzi texts from the Upper Euphrates, belonging to the fifteenth century B.C., which give us an amazingly vivid insight into the social conditions of an ancient city from this period, and finally, the Assyrian Code of Laws.

The biblical sources for the period of the Conquest are the anticipations of the Conquest in the Pentateuch and the books of Joshua, Judges, and I Samuel. The biblical books must, of course, be subjected to criticism before they can be used by the historian. In its present form, for example, the book of Joshua has peculiar difficulties, and it is natural that there should be great diversity of opinion concerning its historical character and value. Albrecht Alt has subjected Josh. 1-12 to careful examination and has recovered the original etiological stories.³² Used in conjunction with other sources, they are of great value. The highly compressed précis of "the lost J account of the Conquest" (Judg. 1:1-2:5) and the Song of Deborah (Judg. 5) are sources of the first importance, though the text is not always secure and the continuity of the former narrative is confused.³³ The stories of Judges both in the body of the book (3:7-16:31) and in the "appendix" (chs. 17-21) give us much good historical information for the period. The two early poems of the blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49) and the blessing of Moses (Deut. 33) preserve authentic memories. Even the late, conventionalized, editorial materials of Joshua and Judges confirm in their own stylized and exaggerated way what we learn in a different fashion from JE. We have come to have new respect for the priestly sections of Joshua too, for in recent years the lists have been subjected to critical examination by the Alt-Noth-Jirku-Albright school on the basis of the Gunkel method of Gattungsforschung.³⁴ It should be added that the results do not always present us with sources for the period of the Conquest but for later periods of Israel's history.³⁵

B. Historical Background.—The historical problems for this period are even more acute than those of the Mosaic age, although here we are aided by the vast resources of archaeology. It would seem that not infrequently the name of Joshua has been adapted to the Pentateuch ³² "Josua," in Werden und Wesen des Alten Testaments, ed. Paul Volz (Berlin: A. Töpelmann, 1936), pp. 13-29.

³³ R. H. Pfeiffer, Introduction to the Old Testament (New York: Harper & Bros., 1941), pp. 296-301. Pfeiffer concludes that J's account of the Conquest, "which survives in a meager and revised summary, without being strictly accurate in all details is our main source for a period of Israel's early history as obscure as it is important for the nation's later achievements."

³⁴ Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, pp. 210 ff.
³⁵ Alt, "Judas Gaue unter Josia," Palästinajahrbuch, 1925, pp. 100-16; "Das System der Stammesgrenzen im Buche Josua," Sellin-Festschrift (Leipzig: A. Deichert, 1927), pp. 13-14; Martin Noth, Das Buch Josua (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1938; "Handbuch zum Alten Testament").

at crucial moments; and that similarly the allusions to Moses in Joshua, besides being highly stylized, have been accommodated to the narrative. Even more troublesome is the presence of what seem to be conflation of the Moses and Joshua traditions. Such accounts as the crossing of the Jordan, the story of the spies, the circumcision at Gilgal, the passover at Gilgal, the extraordinary theophany to Joshua which culminates in exactly the same words as those addressed to Moses (Josh. 5:15), the law on Mount Ebal, and the covenant at Shechem cannot be cavalierly dismissed, for they raise the question of what is historical in the biblical tradition of this period and what is not.

Certain general conclusions may be derived from the sources which bear upon the religion of this period: (a) The period of Israel's emergence into history was one of great international activity. It was an age of many peoples, and Palestine was a land of many peoples—Hurrians,⁸⁶ Hittites,⁸⁷ Canaanites,⁸⁸ etc. (b) Almost throughout the period of the New Empire Palestine continued to be an Egyptian province.⁸⁹ (c) The conquest of Palestine extended over many decades. Indeed, the land was not securely in Hebrew hands until the time of David. National unity was hammered out under the successive blows of foes without and within. (d) Many competing peoples entered into the struggle for the corridor (Moabites, Ammonites, Philistines, and Canaanites), although the conflicts with the Canaanites were neither as fierce nor as extended as is wont to be believed. (e) The Conquest was the achievement of many leaders in different times and in different places and against different invading or resident foes. The narratives in Joshua, Judges, and Samuel which stand the test of historical inspection by no means tell the whole story. The uprising of the tribes under Deborah and Barak, the routing of the Midianites under Gideon of Manasseh, the repulsion of the Ammonites under Jephthah the Gileadite, the fabulous exploits of the Danite hero Samson, ⁸⁶ Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, pp 108-12; E. A. Speiser, "Ethnic Movements in the Near East in the Second Millennium B.C.," Annual of the American Schools of Oriental Research, XIII (1932), 13-54, Mesopotamian Origins (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1930); "Hurrians and Subareans," Journal of the American Oriental Society, LXVIII (1948), 1-13; Albrecht Goetze, Hethiter, Churriter und Assyrer (Oslo: H. Aschehoug & Co., 1936).

⁸⁷ Emil Forrer, ed., Geschichtliche Texte aus Boghazköi (Leipzig: J. C. Hinrichs, 1926); "Die Boghazköi-Texte im Umschrift"; "The Hittites in Palestine," Palestine Exploration Quarterly for 1937, pp. 100-15.

⁸⁸ The literature is vast. For an excellent discussion, see Albright, "The Role of the Canaanites in the History of Civilization," Studies in the History of Culture (New York: Modern Language Association, 1942), pp. 11-50.

⁸⁹ Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, p. 155.

the remarkable defeat inflicted by Joshua of Ephraim upon the Amorites, these are all part of the great period of the Conquest, but altogether they are far from being the whole of it. (f) It follows from this that the Conquest was not the work of united Israel standing embattled against the resident Canaanites to strike one fell blow against them, but rather the work of various tribes or groups of tribes. (g) Chief of all the foes to threaten Israel after her success in gaining at least a precarious foothold were the Philistines (ca. 1170), and it is against these that Israel launched her greatest strength under the leadership of Saul and David. (h) The leader responsible for securing the corridor for the Hebrews, for bringing the Conquest to an end, was David of the tribe of Judah. (i) Israel's prowess in war constitutes a dominant feature of the whole period. (k) In the larger perspective of history, however, it was not Israel's military power nor even her nomadic heritage that contributed most, but the religious vitality with which she was endowed. The meeting of Hebrew and Canaanite indeed represents a profound cultural phenomenon which was destined to stamp a large part of the Old Testament, to influence the character of the faith itself, and to give it powers of survival and stability which the less rigorous cults of the Baal could not ultimately withstand.

The period of the Conquest was one of profound transition: from the seminomadic life of the desert to the farming life of the Palestinian oasis, from the life of the desert to the great international corridor, the highway of the nations and what has been called "the political and geographical center of the world"; from relatively tribal organization to an organization of a more inclusive type, the amphictyony of tribes, and later to the monarchy itself under Saul and David; and finally, from an inferior culture to a superior one. On this latter point, however, it must be remembered that the invasion made a profound impress upon the land as the excavations eloquently show. The Hebrews were in the ascendant, the Canaanites in the descendant. The meeting of Hebrews and Canaanites represents the dominating feature of the second great age. The meeting involved a clash that transformed Hebrew religion for the age of transition itself and beyond it. The Yahweh who met Gideon as he was beating out wheat in the wine press, exacted the fulfillment of Jephthah's dreadful vow, and appeared to Samson's mother with assurance of a Nazirite son, was not in all respects the same as the Yahweh who had thundered forth amidst the fire of Sinai, yet had much in common with the El of Genesis. What is left after the stories are told and retold is that Yahweh of the Exodus and the mount of covenanting remains (cf. Judg. 6:8 ff.). The God of history stands forth triumphant in battle. They who were "called" and commissioned by Yahweh were endowed with the urgency and unction of the charism of the Spirit.

C. The Religion of the Conquest. 1. Canaanites and Israelites.—Canaan, the "land of milk and honey," was in Baal's possession, and it was to Baal's land that Israel came.⁴⁰ Baal ensured fertility of the soil and thus guaranteed self-preservation. Baal was native to the land, and the Canaanites were Baal worshipers. Between gods and soil there was a deep, warm, psychic, even passionate relationship. To secure fertility one must therefore satisfy the pleasure of the Baal. He naturally withheld his gifts to those who refused to recognize his ownership of the land and denied him his due. Canaanite Baalism at this time was in a stage of decadence and degeneracy. The depth of the corruption is evidenced in the cult of ritualistic prostitution and sacrifice of infants.

How would Israel relate herself to the new land with its fertility cult? What would be most natural and simple and approved is that she would grant the fertility gods their due; this would be assumed throughout the ancient East. In Canaan one respected and honored the indigenous divinities of the land. Israel was leaving the desert and entering an oasis where farming was possible, where vineyards were cultivated, and the fig and the olive were nurtured. This was not the province of Israel's seminomadic Yahweh. It is likely that many Israelites took the easiest and most natural course: they recognized the Baal's prerogatives. Some, indeed, may have forgotten their covenant God of Sinai completely; many more simply recognized Baal for what Baal had to give, and Yahweh for what Yahweh offered in time of war and national crisis. Tolerance was a characteristic of ancient religions, and only the small minority, men like Samuel and Elijah and the band of their successors, understood the nature of Yahweh, the jealous, zealous god of Israel. Thus the worship of Yahweh and the Baal went on together with no intended mutual affront. On the other hand, there must have been a considerable body of Israelites, how many it is impossible to conjecture, who carried on the Mosaic tradition and refused to "bow the knee to Baal."⁴¹ The orgiastic cult of fertility, the highly sensuous symbols of the nude mother goddess, and the elaborate mythologies of springtime and harvest repelled the austere and simple nomadism of Yahweh's followers. If the picture here given of Mosaic religion is at all accurate, then there certainly must have been many who would not be so easily lured by Baalism.

⁴⁰ According to W. F. Albright the Canaanite Baals were all high gods in their own right: "The Baal par excellence, undoubtedly intended whenever the singular noun 'Baal' is mentioned, was the storm-god, who ruled over the world from his home in the northern heavens" (Archaeology and the Religion of Israel [Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1942], p. 116.

Our crucial problem here is to discern the nature of the meeting of Hebrew with Canaanite. The problem is greatly complicated by the fact that different social strata reacted differently to the nature cult; groups like the Nazirites and Rechabites represented one extreme while many farmers represented another. What wrong could there be in acknowledging the agricultural divinities in agricultural territory? Neither of the extremes won the day. At times the nation would move toward Canaanite deities, but at other times under the urgency of some crisis they would turn to their own national God. The neat Deuteronomic framework of Judges is a theological stereotype, but it contains much historic truth. Israel did follow the Baals and Astartes, and only national crisis forced the tribes to recognize Yahweh as the God of their national life and destiny. Such reflections as the vintage festival at Shiloh (Judg. 21:19-23), Gideon's name of Jerubbaal and the idolatrous ephod, the annual festival of Jephthah's daughter, Jotham's fable with its interesting reminiscences of the Canaanite cult of nature, Shechem's Baal-berith, and many other similar instances give us too eloquent a witness to be ignored. In the time of Hosea there were those who looked to Baal as the giver of "the grain and the wine and the oil" (Hos. 2:8), and as late as the fifth century B.C. the Jewish community at Elephantine was championing, evidently without any embarrassment, a religion into which Canaanite religious rites and conceptions of deity had made deep incursions.

2. Yahweh in Canaan.—The book of Judges contains several theophanies, each of which presents a revealing picture of Israel's view of Yahweh at this time. The angel of Yahweh (or Yahweh himself) appears to Gideon under the terebinth at Ophrah. When Gideon offers his sacrifice on the open rock, the angel touches the food, fire bursts forth from the rock, and the angel vanishes from sight. The theophany is memorialized by an altar called Yahweh-Shalom. Similarly in the theophany to the parents of Samson, when the flame of the cereal offering rises from the rock, the divine being ascends in the flame on the altar. As in the Genesis story of Abraham and Sarah or of Rebekah's sterility, so here the woman is promised a son, who is to be a Nazirite to Yahweh. Over against these stories, which tell their own tale, we have the remarkable theophany of Deborah's militant song. When Yahweh came forth from Seir or marched from the fields of Edom,

⁴¹ Cf. Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, pp. 217-18, for evidence that the Israelites' invasion of Palestine actually represented "a most abrupt break between the culture of the Canaanite Late Bronze Age and that of the Israelite Early Iron Age in the hill-country of Palestine."

The earth quaked, the heavens also shook,
The clouds too dripped water,
The mountains rocked at the presence of Yahweh,
At the presence of Yahweh, the God of Israel (Judg. 5:4-5).

The literary construction of the lines suggests Canaanite influence, but the theophany described is Hebraic or Mosaic. The reminiscence of Sinai is inevitable, though the reference to the mountains in vs. 5 is an obvious gloss.

The great command of the Decalogue for the exclusive loyalty to Yahweh resounds again and again throughout the period of the Conquest. The dynamic urgency of monolatry is shown nowhere more powerfully than in the call of the tribes to unity. In the name of Yahweh they are summoned to battle, and in the name of Yahweh they are extolled or cursed according to their participation or unwillingness "to come to the help of Yahweh" (Judg. 5:23). In the period of the Conquest Yahweh appears as the mighty man of war (cf. Exod. 14:14; 15:3). Israel's wars are Yahweh's wars. One of the earliest collections of poetry surviving in fragments here and there in the Old Testament was the book of the Wars of the Lord. The Conquest of Canaan was Yahweh's work, and he endued deliverers with the gift of the Spirit so that they might be supernaturally equipped to carry on the work of battle. Deborah, Barak, Gideon, Jephthah, Samson, and others are indeed charismatic leaders, men of war commissioned by Israel's God of war. The spoils of war must be devoted to him as a great holocaust (the hérem). Yahweh participates actively in Israel's historical life in order that his will for them may be done. But Yahweh is not bound to Israel in any coercive way. Israel's defeats are not Yahweh's defeats. Yahweh is not defeated. Israel is defeated because she has defied the will of her God.

The conviction arose during that period that Yahweh was Lord of the land of Canaan. The contention that the soil of Palestine belonged to Yahweh signified a change. The name "baal" appears for some time in theophorous names (Eshbaal, the son of Saul; Merib-baal, David's son, etc.). Yet it is not Baal who is absorbing Yahweh, but Yahweh who absorbs Baal. In the process the character of Yahweh was changed. "Yahweh was the sole object of worship, but all the titles and attributes of the baals were transferred to him."⁴² For one thing, it meant a vast increase in the range of Yahweh's activity in nature. The story of the "dew" in the Gideon narrative had perhaps itself little significance, for it might easily be told in any desert oasis so far as the nomadic Yahweh was concerned, but in the context it is perhaps significant and belongs with that movement which declared Yahweh to be the giver of the rain as over against Baal (I Kings 18-19), the giver of grain and wine (Hos. 2), and finally Lord of all nature.

Yet Yahweh, the God of Israel's life, is not primarily a God of nature. He is first of all the covenant God, and however the two traditions of the Sinaitic and the Shechem covenants are ultimately explained, in Palestine as in Sinai, he is Lord of the covenant (El-berith). The Canaanite expression "Baal-berith" points clearly to the Canaanite background of Shechem and its life, and it is possible that the Canaanite casuistic laws of the Covenant Code have their ultimate origin here in the great covenant at Shechem (Josh. 24). Yahweh is also understood by the true Israelite to be sovereign over his people Israel. When his fellow tribesmen urge him to rule over them after his successful defeat of Midian, Gideon replies laconically, "I will not rule over you, nor shall my son rule over you, since Yahweh rules over you" (Judg. 8:23). Such a reply is authentically Hebraic, above all in its immediate context, and provides the major impulse to the motif of the divine sovereignty which runs through the history of Israel's religion from beginning to end. Yahweh is king, and he alone will rule over Israel.

The nature of Yahweh in this period is best revealed in the activity of his Spirit. The Spirit is never a pervasive, silent influence, but is rather invasive and dynamic. The spirit of Yahweh comes upon Jephthah (Judg. 11:29) so that he is able to launch an attack against the Ammonites; it rushes upon Samson (Judg. 14:19) so that he performs remarkable feats of physical strength.

3. Sanctuaries.—The religious life of Israel during the period of the Conquest is reflected in the sanctuaries. Most of these were simply taken over from the native inhabitants, and in the transfer much else was taken over. Indeed, these sacred places became major centers for the transfer of Canaanite traditions, rites, and ideology. A later age naturally adorned these places with etiological narratives, but in no case perhaps is the story pure fancy. The ancient associations with Hebron and Bethel and Beer-sheba made the transfer of such sanctuaries to the Israelites relatively simple, and wherever pre-Israelite Hebrews existed in the land we have reason to believe that the coalescence of the two groups progressed without much difficulty, especially in the light of the conditions prevailing in Palestine at that time and the decadence of Canaanite religion. It was little wonder that the worship of Yahweh suffered severe strains and stresses. But our sources point particularly to such sanctuaries as Dan in the far north near the sources of the Jordan, where Jonathan, the grandson of Moses, and his sons served as priests "until the day of captivity of the land"; to Gilgal, where twelve memorial stones were erected (Josh. 4:19 ff.), a sanctuary was established, the rite of circumcision observed etiologically, the Passover celebrated, a great theophany vouchsafed, and where the first king was crowned; to Ophrah in the fertile plain of Esdraelon, where the tensions between Canaanite and invading Israelite were more acute than elsewhere and the fertility cult was particularly strong; but above all, to Shechem and Shiloh, the two greatest of all the sanctuaries of the Conquest.

⁴² Lods, op. cit., p. 405.

Shechem had long been Canaanite and doubtless the Israelites and Canaanites lived in close relationship to each other. On the one hand, Genesis tells how the first great Hebrew patriarch pitched his tent at Shechem upon his arrival in Canaan, where was "the terebinth of the lawgiver" (Gen. 12:6), and how Jacob-Israel after a succession of notable events (Gen. 32:22-32) arrived at Shechem, where he purchased a piece of ground from Hamor the father of Shechem, built an altar, and called it El-Elohe-Israel (Gen. 33:18-20). On the other hand, Joshua gives an account of another series of notable events at Shechem: the establishment of a covenant, the promulgation of laws, and the formation of an amphictyony of tribes. Here at Shechem the Canaanites worshiped their god, Baal-berith ("Lord of the Covenant"), in a temple. Both Genesis and Joshua show the intimate Canaanite associations with Shechem. Sellin suggests that the covenant described in Josh. 24 was a coming together of the pre-Israelite tribes in Canaan who had long before bound themselves into an amphictyony with the invading Hebrews, and that they were bound by their worship of El, the God of Israel. The laws which were promulgated there are sometimes thought to be preserved in Deut. 27, and this has much to be said for it; but in recent years, since the notable researches of Alt and Albright, the alternative view that the Covenant Code contains the original Shechemite laws has gained in force. To be sure, the Covenant Code exists in two recensions, and some have proposed that the J Decalogue of Exod. 34, with its agricultural emphasis, is the original, but the majority of scholars who follow this line are inclined to hold that the casuistic Canaanite statutes present a much better case. If we can accept this view, then we are in a good position to describe the nature of the bond which united this early Israelite confederacy. Most interesting perhaps is the reference to the three agricultural festivals: the feast of Unleavened Bread, the feast of First Fruits or Weeks, and the feast of Ingathering (Exod. 23:14-19). Later these agrarian feasts were transformed by Hebrew thought and faith into festivals commemorating historical events, but here they clearly refer to nature. The present form of our Covenant Code is doubtless late.

Nowhere is the life at an ancient sanctuary during the period of the Conquest described with greater clarity than in the case of Shiloh. It was here that the tribe of Ephraim had erected a sanctuary in the middle of the thirteenth century. It was obviously well built and stationary, equipped with all the necessary paraphernalia for an elaborate cultus, provided with various chambers for the celebration of the cult and its continuance: the central shrine containing the sacred ark, rooms for the slaughter of the animals, for the preparation of the sacrifice, for the altars, and for the eating of the meal in the lishkâh or festal chamber. Besides, there were doubtless rooms for Eli and his sons and their families. One tiny glimpse gives us a vivid picture of the practice of the cult: "Whenever any man was about to sacrifice, an attendant of the priest would come, while the meat was still boiling, and with a three-pronged fork in his hand, he would thrust into the pot, or kettle, or cauldron, or vessel; all that the fork brought up the priest would take for himself. So they used to do to all the Israelites who came there to sacrifice in Shiloh" (I Sam. 2:13-14).

4. Cultic Personnel and Religious Groups.—

Eli was the head of the sanctuary at Shiloh, and thus of the religious focus for all the Israelite tribes of central Palestine. The prestige and dignity of his office is clearly reflected in the narrative itself and in the tradition which carries him back to Aaron and extends into the future for more than two centuries. Similarly, the sanctuary at Dan claims continuity with the Mosaic tradition. In this period the Levites emerge as a priestly class; Levites and priests tend to become partially synonymous terms. The importance of the priestly office is reflected in the story of the migration of Dan.

Shiloh contained the sacred ark, which in the stories of I Sam. 4-7 serves as a kind of palladium of war intimately associated with Yahweh's presence, so that when the Philistines hear of its presence in battle, they cry out in great fear, "Their God is come into the camp!" (I Sam. 4:7). When the wife of Phinehas hears the dreadful news that the ark is captured, she cries in her death agony, "The glory is departed from Israel, for the ark of God is taken" (I Sam. 4:21). It was in the presence of the ark that the child Samuel heard himself addressed, and finally heard the words of doom against the house of Eli. Sleeping in the presence of the ark was eminently suitable to divine revelation.

Both Samson and Samuel were Nazirites, according to the accounts, from their birth. They were not to drink strong drink and no razor was to come upon their head. The Nazirites long continued as a nomadic group within Israel, protesting against all syncretism with the indigenous Canaanite cults and calling Israel back to the seminomadic ways of the desert and Sinai. Other groups were closely associated with them at a somewhat later period: the Rechabites, who likewise fostered desert folkways and ideals in Palestine, and the "nebiim" or prophets, who recalled Israel to the days of "purity" in the desert, when Yahweh had made no such demands as their contemporaries assumed in their current cultic practices.

Finally, there were the "shophetim" or "judges," who may at times have adjudicated disputes, although their function was much wider than this. They included "heads of clans like Othniel, military leaders of humbler origin like Ehud, Barak, and Gideon, men of wealth like Jair, Ibzan, and Abdon, bastard adventurers like Jephthah, priests like Eli, prophets like Samuel, and even Canaanite chieftains like Shamgar of Beth-anath."⁴³ Max Weber, Albrecht Alt, and W. F. Albright all apply the term "charismatic" to these various leaders, and Albright has styled this period as "the charismatic age in Israel." Alt has gone so far as to suggest that it was through the judges that the Canaanite casuistic law was transferred to Israel. Perhaps it was the prowess, courage, and energy exhibited by these men which prompted their contemporaries to think of them as peculiarly endowed with charismatic powers.

5. Moral Standards.—The biblical books which report the Conquest present a vivid picture of the moral conditions prevailing in Israel. We may discount the Deuteronomic accounts of the subjection of the Canaanites to destruction, but there are obvious historical instances where Canaanite towns were subjected to the terrible hérem. This is viewed and accepted as the requirement of Yahweh, infringement of which produces such dreadful consequences as were visited upon Achan and all his blood relatives. The role of Yahweh as God of war assumes its most sinister aspects in accounts such as these. In the Song of Deborah the act of Jael is obviously recounted with great pride. More appalling is the incident at Gibeah reported in the narrative of Judg. 19-21. The crime itself sends a shock throughout the tribes, but their treatment of Benjamin and Jabesh-gilead is a dark reflection on this whole period. The sacrifice of Jephthah's daughter becomes tolerable only on one basis, that it is in fact an etiological cult story on the order of Agamemnon's sacrifice of Iphigenia, to account for the annual festival of Jephthah's daughter. Samson's amours and adventurous exploits, culminating in his prayer to Yahweh for revenge upon his foes, were evidently listened to with relish by the ancient Hebrews, and Gideon's polygamy is taken quite for granted. The account of the behavior of Samuel's sons at Shiloh is certainly not condoned, but it does afford us a glimpse of conditions in Israel. "At that time there was no king in Israel. Everyone used to do as he pleased" (Judg. 17:6 et passim).

How can this appalling picture of conditions in Israel be explained? Perhaps the following comments are in order: (a) The transition from the desert and seminomadic life to the situation existing among the Canaanites in this period would naturally produce a radical deterioration. One has only to remind himself of the conditions among soldiers and sailors when they are freed from the restraints of civilian life, and of course the contrast in the case of Israel and Canaan was much sharper. (b) The formative character of the period with its inevitably tentative organization and accompanying insecurity would produce the kind of lawlessness that is described. (c) In some instances the temptations of the new land were such as were associated with the very nature of agricultural, fertility worship and belief, and nomadic mores must have seemed to many to be peculiarly inapplicable to the changed situation.

V. The Early Monarchy (ca. 1020-922 B.C.)

A. Sources.—A new social and political self-consciousness naturally reflected itself in the production of historical documentation. Our sources grow both in variety and in authenticity. The books of Samuel are extraordinarily rich in the diversity of types of tradition. The dirges of David over Saul and Jonathan (II Sam. 1:19-27) and Abner (II Sam. 3:33-34) are universally recognized as the work of David. Similarly, the great narrative sequence on the history of ⁴³ Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, p. 216.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

David's reign in II Sam. 9-20 and I Kings 1-2 is unsurpassed not only in the Old Testament but in the historical archives of the ancient Near East, and it is possible that the traditions preserved in II Sam. 2-6; 8 are almost as reliable. Of great value, too, is the early source in I and II Samuel. Not a few of the stories are legendary in character as, for example, the call of Samuel (I Sam. 3) and the stories of the appendix (e.g., II Sam. 21:1-14; 24). On the other hand, the lists in the appendix have great historical value. The late source, associated chiefly with the name of Samuel but extending beyond him, is less trustworthy than the primary materials which have been mentioned, but it is valuable if carefully interpreted and evaluated. The ark stories seem to belong to a special source and may originally have been the continuation of Judg. 3:7-16:31. Hannah's Song (I Sam. 2:1-10) in its present form is postexilic.

B. Historical Background.—The Early Iron Age has not infrequently been known as "the age of small peoples." It is certainly true that during the period of the united monarchy none of the great "powers" like Egypt or Babylonia or Assyria was in a position to press its claims upon the corridor. The incursions of sea rovers upon the "New Empire" of Egypt and the Levantine region "were incidental effects of a Central European barbarian Völkerwanderung," and the Philistine invasion (ca. 1170) was the major threat to Israel for many decades, a superb illustration of Arnold J. Toynbee's "stimulus under blows."⁴⁴ During this period three cultural events of the first consequence emerge into our region: the coming of iron, the domestication of the camel as over against the ass, and the use of the horse. The destruction of Shiloh by the Philistines brought to an end the amphictyony of tribes in central Palestine, of which Shiloh was the chief sanctuary.

C. The Religion of the Early Monarchy. I. Samuel.—The dominant interest of this period is political and social rather than religious. It is doubtful whether at any time during this period, despite advance in culture and social life, Israel achieved the religious vitality and "purity" of the age of Moses. To be sure, Samuel is a kind of Moses redivivus, but he seldom emerges with any historical distinctness. The story of the origin of his name (I Sam. 1:20) applies better to Saul (the name shā'ul means "asked"), and his call is described in the form of a folk tale. In his relations to Saul he appears as the embodiment of the tragic nemesis which pursues the afflicted king to his terrible doom. Nevertheless he stands as a giant monolith in the age of Conquest, and appears in the varying guise of seer, prophet, judge, itinerant justice, priest, and maker of kings. He is a veritable "man of God," so mighty indeed that the divine words which fall from his lips make and unmake kings and his prayers bring about a heavy hailstorm so that the Philistines no longer appear in the land. The two great movements which tower over everything else in his lifetime are the beginnings of the monarchy and the coeval beginnings of prophecy. The late B source in I Sam. 15:22-23 sounds the note of authentic prophecy and illustrates the kind of tradition which came to be attached to his name:

⁴⁴ A Study of History (London: Oxford University Press, 1934), V, 290; cf. also I, 100-1 et passim. See also Albrecht Alt, Die Staatenbildung der Israeliten in Palästina (Leipzig: Alexander Edelmann, 1930); Leslie, Old Testament Religion, pp. 111 ff.; Burrows, What Mean These Stones? pp. 19-20, 97-98, 165-66.

Has Yahweh as great delight in burnt-offerings and sacrifices as in obedience to the voice of Yahweh?
Behold, obedience is better than sacrifice, and hearkening than the fat of rams;
For rebellion is the sin of divination,
and stubbornness the iniquity of teraphim.
Since you have rejected the word of Yahweh
he has rejected you from being king.

2. Saul of Benjamin (ca. 1020-1004 B.C.).—If Samuel has been enshrouded in devotion and loyalty in the memories of Israel, then the historical Saul has been all but eclipsed by the Judean edition which preserved the story of his life. Historical criticism and modern psychology provide the two major instruments whereby we are able to recover Saul and to understand his true character. He was himself his own worst victim, and as the narratives succeed each other we see him caught in the coils of a destiny beyond his control and beyond his comprehension. Saul has his great historical importance as the first king of Israel, as the first to cope with the Philistine domination, and as the one to reveal the strange and baffling contradiction of prophet and king, the Lord's anointed, within the breast of a single man. Attractive, shy, sensitive, passionate in his rage and in his love, he was unable to deal with the cunning and capacity of one who was his superior. In religion he was the child of the times. He could invoke a terrible curse and was willing to allow its consequences to fall upon the head of his eldest son (I Sam. 14:24-30, 43-46). Yahweh was the God of battles, and Saul was a fit servant to him. In his name he practiced the hérem, and yet compassion could deflect him from this course. Samuel might slay Agag in pieces before Yahweh; not so the vacillating, mercurial, softhearted Saul (I Sam. 15:7, 32-33). He sought to be loyal and faithful to Yahweh, erring and blind though he may have been in his understanding. He used the divining instrument of Benjamin, the ephod, to inquire of Yahweh, and employed the Urim and Thummim to determine who had violated his taboo on food. He built altars to Yahweh, and in an awful dilemma performed the sacrifice himself in the absence of Samuel. He exiled those with familiar spirits from the land, yet in his darkest hour was driven to consult the necromancer at Endor. The narratives which preserve his memory are cast in a remarkable framework showing how an evil spirit from Yahweh sends him to his inevitable ruin, whereas the spirit of Yahweh is upon David to exalt him to be king over Israel.

Our earliest source views the establishment of the kingdom with favor. It is the gift of Yahweh to his people. Yahweh sends Saul to Samuel to deliver Israel from the Philistines (I Sam. 9:16). The late theocratic source takes the opposite view. When this document was written the prophets had entered upon the scene, and the institution of the monarchy was viewed as an act of apostasy. He who would appraise the contradictions of historical existence does well to read both accounts and to understand their place within the tradition.

The prophet (נביא) is one who is "called"—called of God—to perform a special task in behalf of the people, to warn them of what God is about to do. The remarkable story in I Sam. 9:1–10:16 presents us with a vivid scene of a band of prophets coming from a high place, "the hill of God where is the garrison of the Philistines," playing various musical instruments, and prophesying ecstatically. The spirit of Yahweh comes mightily upon Saul (I Sam. 10:6), so that he prophesies with them and "is turned into another man." It is significant that the origins of the kingdom are so closely bound with the emergence of these prophetic bands. Always in times of great crisis the prophets came to declare the word and will and purpose of Yahweh, and this simple tale, so profoundly revealing in many respects, combines prophecy and politics in a way that was destined to be of great omen for Israel's future life in the world.

3. David of Judah (ca. 1004-961 B.C.).—The true greatness of the historical David lies more in the area of Israel's political history than in religion. But since it is impossible in the Old Testament to divorce history and faith, especially in relationship to the king, it is natural that his achievements bear directly on the history of Israel's religion. Not the least of David's achievements was the bringing of the ark to the city which he secured for the Hebrews, Jerusalem, the "city of David." It was he who gave Jerusalem the place it was to occupy in all subsequent history as the center of Israel's political life and the center of worship, first for the united kingdom and later for the kingdom of Judah. Whatever judgment one may finally pronounce on David's religion, there can be no question that he sought sincerely to be a faithful worshiper of Yahweh. His nature, with all its contrasts, is nevertheless basically consistent. For him, as for Saul and the judges, Yahweh was a God of war, and none served Yahweh as a God of battles more valiantly and successfully than he. At the height of his career he committed adultery with Bathsheba, the wife of a Hittite mercenary, and when he failed to escape the consequences of his act, he ordered the murder of her husband. Nathan, the prophet, confronted him with the word of Yahweh in the form of the parable of the little ewe lamb (II Sam. 12:1-6). The effect was not lost upon the king, and he repented bitterly for his crime. In this circumstance, as in all the circumstances of his life, David's relation with Yahweh seems to have been peculiarly close and intimate, though it was not without a deep-seated fear and reverence.

The tradition which associates him with the establishment of the temple cult has an authentic source in his life, as does indeed the tradition which connects him with the musical life and heritage of ancient Israel (cf. Amos 6:5). Yet his cruelty scarcely knew any bounds. His curses were violent and intemperate, and he believed in their terrible efficacy. He was willing to invoke blood revenge against the house of Saul in his slaughter of the sons of Rizpah and Michal. It is possible, indeed, to describe David as one who was motivated solely by ambition and self-interest. But this would not do justice to other forces in his nature, such as his devotion to and fear of God and his capacity for repentance.

The same logic of events which pursues Saul to his death now follows David the king after his adultery and murder. Event follows event in heartbreaking succession as the judgment of Yahweh follows him to a broken and ineffectual old age. His biographer can sketch the matchless narrative of the disintegration of his family, above all of Absalom's revolt, with such sympathy and restraint that the Orient has no close parallel to offer to it, and one is reminded only of the lament of Priam for his son Hector after he is dragged about the walls of Troy. David had other weaknesses also. Yet the final verdict is a merciful one, and tradition was not completely faithless to the facts of his life. The Deuteronomist could view him as the norm for the perfect king; the Chronicler could see in him the servant of the Lord, the priestly writers as the founder of the cult, and the editors of the Psalter as the author of many hymns, prayers, and liturgies, while those who looked for a deliverer found in him the prototype of the messiah or, as David redivivus, the messiah himself.

David became a king in the fashion of the western Semites. To what degree he was considered in any sense divine it is hard to say. Not a few passages suggest that he was believed to possess divine qualities. That his kingship was dynamically related to the life of the people with whom he stood in psychic rapport there can be little doubt. He was the protector of his people, and his battles were Yahweh's battles. His anointing equipped him with God's spirit (rūah Yahweh), and the following narratives vividly portray the effect of the spirit upon him. He dances ecstatically before the ark. In his old age the men about him swear to him, "You shall no more go out with us to battle, lest you quench the lamp of Israel" (II Sam. 21:17; cf. the perpetual light [nēr tāmīdh] of the temple). That he was subject to Canaanite influence is apparent not only from the language and style of his lament over Jonathan and Saul but from a number of other passages. He was the charismatic king par excellence in Israel, and such passages as II Sam. 7 in which Nathan's oracle speaks of his intimate relationship to Yahweh as that of a son to his father (late though it is in its present form) show the influence of this charismatic quality of David upon the thought of later times.⁴⁵

4. Solomon (961-922 B.C.).—The importance of Solomon's reign belongs to the history of civilization and the development of culture rather than to the development of Israel's religion. Thanks to the amazing revelations from archaeology throughout the Fertile Crescent—Mesopotamia, Syria, Phoenicia, and Egypt—and more specifically to the excavations at Megiddo, Ezion-geber (Tell el-Kheleifeh), Lachish, and elsewhere, we are now in a position to evaluate its true character. But for religion it represented no advance. The account in I Kings 3-12 is devoted almost entirely to the construction of the Temple of Solomon. In composition and point of view the narrative is Deuteronomic, and the importance attached to it represents the attitude of another age than Solomon's. In actuality the construction of the temple was only a part of Solomon's elaborate building program, and was motivated by political considerations fully as much as by religious interest. The temple was essentially a royal chapel. Without doubt it kindled the animosities and resentment of all who cherished the Mosaic tradition. In architecture, furnishings, cultic symbolism, and ritual, it was more Phoenician (Canaanite) and Syrian than Hebrew. As such it was alien to Israel, and it was only subsequent events like the destruction of the northern kingdom in 722 B.C., the miraculous preservation of Jerusalem during Sennacherib's campaign, and above all, the reformation of 621 B.C., which gave it the central place it later assumed in the history of Judah and Judaism. For an understanding of the religion of Israel in the tenth century it is not of the first importance.

⁴⁵ For an extended treatment of this subject see Aubrey R. Johnson, "The Role of the King in the Jerusalem Cultus," in The Labyrinth, ed. Hooke, pp. 73-111. (The literature on this subject is extensive. In English it is represented by the school of Hooke in such books as the foregoing and in Myth and Ritual [London: Oxford University Press, 1933].) Cf. also Ivan Engnell, Studies in Divine Kingship in the Ancient Near East (Uppsala: Almqvist & Wiksells, 1943). For an examination of the theory of divine kingship see Martin Noth, "Gott, König, Volk im Alten Testament," Zeitschrift für Theologie und Kirche, LVIII, 1950, Heft 2.

And yet the temple bore witness to the incursion of foreign influence within the royal court.⁴⁶ The brazen sea, supported by twelve bulls, the universally recognized symbols of fecundity, three of them on each of the four sides; bears a cosmic significance, probably symbolic of the subterranean fresh-water stream, the source of all life and fertility comparable to the Babylonian Apsu. The two isolated pillars, Jachin and Boaz, standing before the entrance, the lions, the lavers, the shovels, and the basins and the four hundred pomegranates, the ten bases with their bronze frames, the great altar of burnt offering with its reflection of Mesopotamian cosmic ideas, together with all the other appurtenances of the temple and its cult were the work of Phoenicians and reflected the religious symbolism and ideology of the Semitic world. When after many decades and even centuries it became the central shrine for all Israel, the temple was accepted as the true center of worship for Yahweh of hosts, who dwells on Mount Zion where his "tabernacling presence" abode in the midst of the people.⁴⁷

⁴⁶ Herbert Gordon May, "Some Aspects of Solar Worship at Jerusalem," Zeitschrift für die Alttestamentliche Wissenschaft, LV (1937), 269-81.

⁴⁷ Cf. the extremely early words of dedication in I Kings 8:12, which the LXX attributes to the book of Jashar:

"Yahweh has set the sun in the heavens [LXX, not in M.T.]

But has said that he would dwell in thick darkness.

I have indeed built thee a shrine of Zebul for you,

A fixed place for your seat forever."

May comments as follows: "It is not improbable that Solomon declared that he was building a house of Baal-Zebul for Yahweh, thus applying to Yahweh a title of deity which we know was current not only in the fourteenth century at Ugarit, but also in the ninth century in Palestine" ("Some Aspects of Solar Worship at Jerusalem," p. 270). Cf. I Kings 1:2 ff. where we should read "Baal-Zebul" instead of "Baal-Zebub."

The ascription of wisdom literature to the age of Solomon and even to Solomon himself doubtless has a historical basis. There is no good reason for doubting the tradition itself, but all the literature attributed to Solomon is clearly the work of a much later age. As law was attributed to Moses, psalmody to David, so sapiential writing was "Solomonic." But in the deeper sense of true wisdom, the wisdom of justice and mercy and of the word of the Lord, Solomon was far from wise. He might well have died with the words of another monarch on his lips, Après moi le déluge. The glory of Solomon remembered down the centuries was not a reflection of the glory on the face of Moses, or the glory of the mount of theophany, or the glory of the Presence in the simple "ark of the covenant" which he housed in the dark recesses of the temple dehhtr. Yet despite the new direction in which Solomon and in only a lesser degree David turned the course of Israel's history, what lay deepest within Israel was the allegiance of the covenant people to Yahweh, her covenant Lord.

D. The Epic of the Yahwist.—The national self-consciousness and unity which David and Solomon had sought to achieve over against the inveterate tribalism of the disparate elements of the population reflected itself in a great literary awakening. The long reigns of David and Solomon quickened the pulse of the time as Elizabeth's reign stimulated the thoughts of Tudor England. It is significant that both David and Solomon are credited with literary activity, the former as a poet and the latter as a sage. Above all else, even the remarkable history of David's reign (II Sam. 9–I Kings 2), towers the dramatic epic of the Yahwist. Out of materials of great variety—stories of cultic "heroes," etiological stories recounting theophanies at sacred places, poems coming full-fledged out of the raw primitivity of oral tradition, historical pieces enshrining past memories, laws defining and regulating communal relations, genealogies preserving the continuity of the tradition in the guise of a family relationship (Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and his twelve sons)—out of all the complexity of tradition the Yahwist fashioned an epic of vast scope and remarkable unity. The individual narratives emerge in all their sharp identity like pieces of finely carved ivory or chiseled marble.⁴⁸ In them Oriental imaginative mentality and insight combine to produce a literature that has in turn fired the imagination and haunted the memory of men throughout the ages. The inner conflicts and sharp tensions persist from beginning to end: man's creation and fall; his rebellion and defecation which deserved death and extinction (Gen. 6:5-6); the promise to Abraham of a child who is born in the face of apparently insurmountable obstacles; the sojourn to Egypt and the long period of slavery; the hazards and harshness of the desert wanderings; the discontent, despair, and revolt of the people; the difficulties of the journey to Palestine; the long years of conquest and the indecisiveness of the invasion (Judg. 1:1–2:5); the choice and rejection of the first king, and David's tortuous rise to power. Yet despite the diversity of literary traditions, the possible presence of alien influences (Kenite and Canaanite), the conflict in cultural patterns, the numerous shifts of scene and circumstance, the Yahwist keeps before him the single goal of his dramatic narrative. This is succinctly stated in the promise to Abram, Israel's progenitor (Gen. 12:1-3), the man of obedience in whom Israel's true life is already dynamically and psychically existent. To it the J narratives of Gen. 1–11 are but prologue, a prologue which places the patriarch's emergence in a setting of universal scope and of a supremely revelatory theological context. Overarching all else is the "philosophy of history" in which the purpose and will and action of God are the factors which press time and event to their culmination.

In reading such an epic as this the reader recognizes the artistic composition of the individual literary units, but beyond this he sees how they are fashioned into a mighty work of literary art and theological insight. From the creation and fall of man to Babel's tower, from the call of Abraham to the birth of Jacob-Israel and his twelve sons, from Jacob-Israel to the Exodus, from the Exodus to the mount of the covenant, from Sinai to Palestine, from the travailing years of conquest to the possession of the land under David, the Yahwist moves on in sure-footed progress to the fulfillment of the divine promise to Abraham. It is a covenantal history in which the faith of Israel is recorded in the concreteness of many events. Creation and nature, sin and judgment and suffering, sin and ever-recurring supervening grace, the union of man and wife, the conflict of brother against brother, the coming of sinister powers of darkness in the fall of the angels, the fateful resort to culture and technology, the confusion of tongues, the Exodus from Egypt, the birth of the people of God, the giving of the law, the covenant relation, the gift of the good land as Yahweh's heritage to his people, the resort to a ⁴⁸ It is the great merit of the monumental commentary of Hermann Gunkel on Genesis that he has portrayed the quality and character of these separate units. Only in our time are we beginning to see the heterogeneity and number of the traditions in their total perspective and unity. See Gerhard von Rad, Das erste Buch Mose (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1949).

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

king and yet the deep-dyed apostasy of reliance upon him, the birth of the nation, and the creation of David's far-flung empire—these are the realities which lie within the matrix of the monumental epic of Israel's early life. The interpretation of history is grasped here for the first time by a mind of almost unsurpassed insight. Second Isaiah ascends a yet greater height and views the history of the covenant people at the end of the Semitic age when Cyrus the Great emerges into world history in the framework of beginning and end, but he builds on foundations laid by the Yahwist.⁴⁹ When in the decline of the Roman Empire Augustine wrote his City of God, he was the conscious heir of a tradition classically enshrined in this epic.⁵⁰ If the Yahwist narrative is read and understood from beginning to end in terms of the height and depth and breadth of its own categories, and if it is read with empathy and a sense of identification, that is, existentially, it becomes clear that here Hebraism has reached an understanding of itself that has seldom if ever been surpassed.⁵¹

VI. The Divided Kingdoms (922-586 B.C.)

A. Historical Background.—From a purely political point of view the disruption of the united monarchy following the death of Solomon was disastrous for the life of Israel. But more than this, it reflected the general divisiveness of peoples in the Fertile Crescent. It meant that when "the Assyrian came down like the wolf on the fold," they were unprepared to withstand this fresh and incalculable vitality and finally fell before it. Periods of effective resistance there were indeed, as when Aram succeeded in enlisting the co-operation of the "Syriac states" at Qarqar in 853 B.C., but in the great perspective of the centuries it was the divisiveness of the nations of western Asia which finally brought about their disintegration and collapse.⁵² And yet the division of the monarchy into Israel in the north and Judah in the south had its important consequences for the future. It meant for one thing that two nations, separate and distinct, both worshiped the same God. Again, because of the division the north now lay more exposed to the world of nations. Israel could orient herself to Phoenicia or Aram, and in so doing would assimilate herself to the religious ideologies of these people.⁵³ Economic and political alliances inevitably involved religious recognition and rapprochement. The Phoenician Baal would be worshiped in Palestine, especially at a time when the countries were intimately bound by royal marriage. The presence of Phoenician merchants in Samaria and elsewhere would inevitably have its effect. Finally, it meant that Judah, while far from being isolated in the world, would orient itself more to its classical Yahweh tradition.⁵⁴ The nomadic tribes to the south and the nomadic groups of Nazirites and Rechabites within her borders would be free to exercise their influence without the constant hindrance of extraneous Baalistic influences to which the north was always more susceptible. However catastrophic the disruption of the monarchy may have been from a purely political point of view, for the religion of Yahweh its total effect was not calamitous. The conservative forces of the great tradition associated with Moses and that part of the cult which retained the memory of the Mosaic heritage could assert themselves and thus prevent the corrosive and debilitating effects of syncretism with Canaanite Baal and the later astral deities.

⁴⁹ The eschatological poems of Second Isaiah incorporate within them all the main features of the Yahwist epic: e.g., the promise after the Flood (P elements are present here also); Abraham in whom all the nations will bless themselves; the redeemed, called, chosen, and covenanted people; the Yahwist "philosophy of history"; the significance of David; in fact, all the "beginnings" of the sacred history.

⁵⁰ Augustine deepened his view of Israel's sacred history by his profound conception of the place and significance of memory as the agency of the Holy Spirit.

⁵¹ For valuable treatments of the nature of these Hebraic categories the following works may be consulted: Johannes Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture (London: Oxford University Press, 1926-40); Artur Weiser, Glaube und Geschichte im Alten Testament (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1931); H. Wheeler Robinson, "Hebrew Psychology," in The People and the Book, ed. Peake; Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1946).

B. The Prophets of the Ninth Century.—The revolution of Omri brought to an end the fifty years' war between north and south and saved both kingdoms from complete exhaustion and collapse. The greatness of Omri belongs to Israel's history, but it is against the background of his achievements that we must read the religion of Israel during this period. Omri's policies and successes cannot be understood in isolation from the history of the ancient Near East, but in connection with it. It is possible, as Rudolf Kittel suggests, that it was determined by the rise of Assyria under the dynamic aggression of Ashurnasirpal II (883-859 B.C.).⁵⁵ More certainly it was determined by the conflicts be-

⁵² Toynebee, Study of History, IV, 67-68.

⁵³ Ibid., V, 535-36. The Baals mentioned by Toynebee are not the animistic baals but refer to the national Baal of the Ugaritic inscriptions.

⁵⁴ Martin Noth, Geschichte Israels (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1950), pp. 157-58.

⁵⁵ Geschichte des Volkes Israel (Gotha: Leopold Klotz, 1925), II, 234. The dates of the Assyrian monarchs here and elsewhere are based on Arno Poebel, "The Assyrian King List from Khorsabad," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, II (1943), 56-90.

tween an emerging Aram with its exceedingly crucial position in the Fertile Crescent and its pivotal situation in relation to the great commercial highways in the ancient East. The researches of Julian Morgenstern⁵⁶ and Nelson Glueck⁵⁷ have created for us a convincing background against which the prophetic movement of the whole ninth century may be understood. It is only against such a detailed and vivid picture that we are able to appreciate the significance of the relation of Israel's faith to history and of the profound problem which emerges from her trust in a covenantal God as determiner of her historical destiny. Concretely stated, how shall we interpret the position of the great proponents of classical Yahwism in relation to the practical exigencies of historical circumstance and the successes of Omri and his policy in preserving Israel from destruction?

Three prophets emerge from this period of Israel's history: Elijah the Tishbite, Micaiah ben Imlah, and Elisha ben Shaphat of Abel-meholah. It is striking that the tradition which preserves their memory comes to us in the form of story.⁵⁸ Narrative was more suited than any other literary mold to express Israel's consciousness of the initiative and activity and will and word of God. These stories were remembered in Israel and to a degree were transformed in the telling, though not nearly to the extent that is sometimes supposed. In the history of the Jewish-Christian tradition they have naturally occupied a place out of proportion to modern estimates, precisely because they preserve so faithfully the quality of the prophetic faith.

I. Elijah the Tishbite.—Legend has preserved a vivid picture of this mighty man. His very name proclaims his central message: "Yahweh is my God," "Yah is my El." His clothing, his home, his food and drink, his intimate relations with nature, his extremely dramatic and sudden appearances make him a fit subject for popular imagination. He is a veritable incarnation of nomadic Yahwism, fierce, unyielding, austere, and unafraid.

But if Elijah is so shrouded in the imaginative memory of those who revered and loved him, what can be said of him as a historical figure? It goes without saying that much of the material cannot pass the muster of careful historical examination. But what is more important to recognize is that he was the kind of person who inevitably elicited the tribute of stories, miracles and remarkable predictions. Memory preserved above all the great witness that the word of the Lord was in his mouth. It is this conviction that dominates the famous story of the drought and its dramatic end on the heights of Carmel's promontory. He was a prophet of Yahweh, a man of God, and he spoke the words of the Lord. He was the mediator of the divine revelation. Moreover, in the mighty conflict with the Phoenician Baal it was through Elijah that the issue was decisively drawn: Yahweh is God in Israel. All the machinations of an energetic mercantile civilization could not withstand the greater drive and dynamism of Yahweh, the covenant God of Israel, who thundered on Sinai and engaged as war God in behalf of his people. Here on Carmel the national Baal of Phoenicia was conquered by a mightier competitor.

At least two elements emerge out of the story of Elijah on Horeb. The great climax of the narrative falls not on the earthquake or the wind or the fire, but on the sound of a gentle whisper. Here is an advance we would not have anticipated. The narrator characteristically makes no comment. Another element in the Horeb account is the reference to the remnant which had not yet bowed the knee to Baal, the seven thousand worshipers of Yahweh. This is not the earliest mention of the remnant, but it is one of the most important and the fit prototype for all further speculation on the continuing community of the devoted, loyal pious who are not overcome by the strength and clamor of loud majorities. One might even suspect still another feature in the story, the command to Elijah to return to Palestine to foment a revolution. This demand is native to the Yahweh cult. It could never end in the quiet contemplation of the gentle whisper, valuable and important though that may be. The mighty prophet is confronted with three great commands upon him, and they have at least one level of historicity which cannot be doubted. They were all fulfilled, and fulfilled under the influence of Elijah: "Go, return on your way to the desert of Damascus, and when you arrive, anoint Hazael to be king over Syria; and Jehu the son of Nimshi you shall anoint to be king over Israel; and Elisha the son of Shaphat of Abel-meholah you shall anoint to be prophet in your place" (I Kings 19:15-16).

Finally, Elijah comes before us as the champion of the rights of the common man. In the story of Naboth's vineyard we see him standing stoutly against the king and the subtle intrigues of the shrewd and calculating Baal emissary who was his wife. When Ahab comes to take over his vineyard, Elijah confronts him with his terrible word of doom from Yahweh. The prophet staunchly supports the common peasant who has no friend in court against a king. There is little that can surpass a story like this for its sheer purity of heart, its unqualified urgency, its passionate, selfless, and fearless support of the little man. But the sources of such blazing passion lay deep in the religion of Yahweh. They went back as far as Moses, even to Yahweh who had revealed himself in such fashion on Sinai that this thing of Naboth's cruel and unwarranted death could never go by unnoticed.

⁵⁶ Amos Studies (Cincinnati: Hebrew Union College Press, 1941), I, 258 ff.

⁵⁷ The River Jordan (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1946), pp. 169 ff.

⁵⁸ Many scholars assign the Yahwist epic to the ninth century. If this is correct, then the stories in this epic witness to the same kind of literary movement. However, the Yahwist should probably receive an earlier date.

Elijah's influence trailed on into the next century and beyond. The eighth-century prophets are under debt to him and to the tradition which he embodied with such purity. Israel looked forward to the return of the prophet (Mal. 4:5) and the New Testament preserves his memory in passages of crucial importance.⁵⁹ But when all is said, no "contributions" of Elijah can describe his work. "In lonely splendor this prophet towered above his time, a majestic figure of heroic stature, as no other in the Bible; legend could preserve a firm impression of him as history could not."⁶⁰ Not the least of these legends was that he was carried off to heaven in a whirlwind.

2. Micaiah ben Imlah.—Of the prophetic career of Elijah's contemporary, Micaiah ben Imlah, only a single narrative survives (I Kings 22). The kings of Israel and Judah are sitting in solemn conclave. To their inquiry whether they should attack Ramoth-gilead, the ecstatic Baal prophets of the court give an uncompromisingly optimistic answer. Jehoshaphat, the king of Judah, inquires significantly for a prophet of Yahweh. But Ahab hates Micaiah "for he never prophesies good concerning me, but evil" (I Kings 22:8). When Micaiah is brought in, he at first mimics the court prophets, but under pressure reveals the word of Yahweh which had come to him in a remarkable vision of a celestial council in which the historical crisis is under judgment. The decision is reported by Micaiah, "God has spoken evil concerning Ahab" (I Kings 22:23). Micaiah suffered for his outspoken fidelity to Yahweh's word, but history proved him right. The word of Yahweh had come to him, and the word was fulfilled in event. Micaiah, like Elijah, belonged to a long succession of which Amos and Jeremiah were notable members. They scorned the easy optimism of loud majorities, looked the bare realities of history in the face, and proclaimed the oracles of judgment that they had heard in the divine councils.

3. Elisha ben Shaphat.—Elisha ben Shaphat was another contemporary of Elijah and was in some ways a strong foil to him (cf. Amos and Hosea, Jeremiah and Ezekiel). Popular memory recalled many wonderful deeds wrought by the prophet. Numerous magical elements appear in the stories which are preserved concerning him (II Kings 2-9; 13:14-21), some of them strangely similar to those of Elijah, his prophetic master. One theme runs through all the prophet's activity, his kindness and sympathy for those in trouble. He is remembered not only as a prophet who spoke to the conditions of the times in the hours of Aramean crisis, but also as an understanding pastor who would spare no pains to help the needy and distressed.

C. The Prophets of the Eighth Century. 1. Amos of Tekoa.—The book of Amos is a source of incomparable value since it is not only contemporary with the man and message it describes, but is in the main the work of the prophet himself. The so-called "motto" of Amos 1:2 (cf. Joel 3:16) is possibly late. The oracles against Edom and Judah are certainly secondary in their present form. The doxologies come from a time later than Amos and reflect the theology of Second Isaiah (Amos 4:13; 5:8-9; 9:5-6). The optimistic liturgical appendix of 9:8b-15 is similarly the work of another time. The superscription (1:1) is the work of the editor. There are numerous minor additions.

The prophetic revolution responsible for the isolationist dynasty of Jehu (842-745 B.C.) did not improve material conditions. Jehu was himself forced to pay heavy tribute,⁶¹ and Jehoahaz was compelled to subsidize the campaigns of Adad-nirari IV against Aram (806-803 B.C.). The bitter blow of Damascus' destruction in 805 B.C. was well-nigh fatal. Aram declined, but Assyria was not in a position to press her claims in the Fertile Crescent. Israel soon revived as a consequence. Jeroboam II (786-746 B.C.) extended his territories from Hamath to the sea of the Arabah (II Kings 14:23-29), and won back the Trans-Jordanic cities of Lodebar and Karnaim. Israel entered upon her last great period of prosperity. Her commerce was at flood tide, and her economy had become incontestably urban in keeping with the traditional orientation of her life toward Phoenicia and the demands of the Phoenician merchants.⁶²

⁶¹ On the Black Obelisk of Shalmaneser III (860-824 B.C.) Jehu is pictured kneeling before the Assyrian monarch. Behind him stand the tribute-bearers. The inscription reads as follows: "Tribute of Jehu, son of Omri. Silver, gold, a golden bowl, a golden beaker, golden goblets, pitchers of gold, lead, staves for the hand of the king, javelins, I received from him." See Jack Finegan, Light from the Ancient Past (Princeton: Princeton University Press, 1946), pp. 172-73 and Fig. 73; A. T. Olmstead, History of Assyria (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1923), Fig. 77.

⁵⁹ Mark 6:15; 8:28 (cf. Matt. 16:14); Matt. 11:14; Mark 9:4 ff. (Matt. 17:3 ff.; Luke 9:30 ff.); Mark 15:35-36 (Matt. 27:47-49); Luke 1:17; 4:25-26; 9:8, 19.

⁶⁰ Julius Wellhausen, Israelitische und jüdische Geschichte (3rd ed.; Berlin: G. Reimer, 1897), p. 74.

Such would be the usual account of the history of this age in western Asia. But Amos tells another story. He sees the prosperity of the rich and also the grinding poverty of the poor. Houses of hewn stone and ivory, wine from bowls, silken cushions on luxurious couches, choice lambs from the stalls, generosity in tithes and sacrifices, hilarity and excitement at the great festivals witness to the prosperity of the land. But beneath the external show Amos exposes the gross dishonesty of the merchants, the exploitation of the poor, the corruption of justice both in ordinary relations of buying and selling and in the execution of justice in the courts; the gross insensateness of the leaders to "the affliction of Joseph"; the callousness and intemperance of the women—"cows of Bashan" Amos styles them in characteristic bluntness—and the complete unawareness of the deep insecurity that lurks in the shadows of Israel's political and social life. With almost brutal candor Amos exposes the rottenness of Israel's social and economic and religious life, exhibits it to the eyes of all, and goes to the very centers of corruption and entrenched power, the king's sanctuary and the royal palace (7:13), where his message will cut the deepest.

Amos' call to prophesy was a call to speak the divine oracles. The first "words" are addressed to the nations, to Syria and Philistia and Tyre (?), and Ammon and Moab, but above all, to Israel herself. From beginning to end they are words of judgment. They announce what Yahweh is about to do. "Thus saith Yahweh," they begin; and they end with the formula, "the oracle of Yahweh." Amos proclaims his oracles as divine revelations.

Yahweh speaks the language of history. He names names: nations, cities, kings, events, and the instruments men use to destroy each other. Nations can perform terrible deeds of power (Amos enumerates them), but Yahweh's fire is more terrible than all that nations can do. All the nations among whom Israel has lived are involved in the words of judgment. They fall under the same sovereignty as Israel does. Yahweh brought the Israelites from Egypt but also the hated Aramaeans from Kir and the Philistines of bitter memory from Caphtor (9:7). Israel is in the same category as the distant Ethiopians of Africa. It is true Yahweh had entered into particular relationship with Israel (3:2; 2:13-16), but this meant only greater responsibility and obligation. The chosen people are chosen for a purpose, and if that purpose is disobeyed, then the chosen people are to be rejected. Here we have a great advance in the history of religion, for this is the first appeal to an international morality. History is understood from the perspective of the sovereignty of a divine will and purpose. It is understood as a unity of transcendent significance and quality, for the God whose purpose and activity history reveals is a God of overwhelming demonic power, and at the same time a God of righteousness and justice. But if there is to all intents and purposes but one God who determines the course of history, then all peoples exist under a single sovereignty, and if that God is of the character of Yahweh, then this sovereignty is above all moral. Here we meet the major contribution of eighth-century prophecy.

This view of history naturally focused upon the issue or outcome of things. Amos is the first to refer to the "day of Yahweh." On this "day" Yahweh will reveal himself decisively. He will engage in battle and will come forth in triumph as victor over his foes. Contrary to popular expectations, Amos declares that Yahweh's appearing will be a time of darkness and deep gloom, a day of judgment against the covenant people Israel, a day when he will act in order to effect his will and purpose, and above all, a day that is near at hand (5:18-20). Judgment dominates the thought of the prophet. The early visions (7:1-6) still hold out hope, but the later ones (7:7-8; 8:1-3; 9:1-4) make it clear that "the end" has come (8:2) and Israel must be destroyed. Yet it is by no means absolutely certain that Amos could see no other possibility than doom. At least there is the one clear reference: "It may be that Yahweh, the God of hosts, will be gracious to the remnant of Joseph" (5:15). If this text is secure—and there is no good reason for rejecting its authenticity—then certain other passages gain greater force.

We have seen how trenchantly Amos exposed the social evils of his day, and how fiercely he denounced the inhumanities of his contemporaries. Every social wrong—profiteering at the expense of the poor, commercial dishonesty, intemperance, bribery, social callousness, distortion of justice, luxury, and extravagance—is an offense to Yahweh. Not all the exercises of the cult could avail anything in the light of such a situation. However elaborate the ritual, however pleasant and moving the music inherited from David (6:5), however generous the tithes and hilarious the festivals and costly the various kinds of sacrifices (5:21-27), however eagerly and loyally Israel streamed to the great sanctuaries—Bethel and Beer-sheba and Gilgal and Dan and all the others—Yahweh could take no notice. These are not the things ⁶² Morgenstern, Amos Studies, I, 383-428.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

he desired first of all, they could never be a substitute for righteousness (ʿedhāqāh) and justice (mishpāt; 5:24). Amos' message is deeply rooted in the past. He is unintelligible outside the matrix of the historical revelation beginning with Moses. But he is the first to set the religious faith of Israel completely free of nationalism, and his message rises to a height not before attained. There is a fierce integrity in this prophet, a moral earnestness born of intense religious devotion, a consuming passion for the realization of Yahweh's will and purpose, and withal a perspicuity of vision and faith that place him in a position by himself. Yet he is not so much a spiritual monolith towering isolatedly into the sky as he is one of the loftiest among the many peaks that tower above the ranges of Israel's historic faith.

2. Hosea ben Beeri.—The book of Hosea is an excellent source for the social and political history of Israel in the middle years of the eighth century B.C. The book has certainly been edited, but the condition of the text often makes it hard to determine how far-reaching this process went. The superscription (1:1) has been expanded. The second verse serves as a summary of the prophet's message and is responsible for many of the difficulties of the first chapters. The final verse (14:9) is obviously very late. The majority of scholars hold that 1:7; 1:10–2:1, the greater part of 2:14–23 (e.g., vs. 16, 18, 21–23), and 3:5 are additions. It is possible that 14:1–8 is a late liturgical appendix, but we cannot be sure. In all probability, the prophet had a message of hope and restoration. The book does not make sense without this hope, and so 14:1–8 may be original, though this is doubtful.

Hosea was a younger contemporary of Amos. His writing reflects the disintegration and confusion which followed upon the death of Jeroboam II (786–746 B.C.) and the accession of Tiglath-pileser III (744–727 B.C.) to the throne of Assyria. Indeed, the entire book is as sensitive as a seismograph to the conditions in Palestine and the Near East. Assyria and Egypt are never absent from the prophet's mind, and his sense of imminent doom was probably evoked both by what he saw happening all about him and by the distant rumblings of new Assyrian advances. It is likely that Hosea belonged to the tribe of Benjamin, and if the references to Judah are original—which is by no means certain—he was in a good position to see the threat that lurked beneath both the northern and the southern kingdoms.

The prophecy of Hosea begins with a story of the infidelity of his wife Gomer. In this story we receive the deepest insight into the meaning of the book; actually the book is unintelligible without it. Only by an appreciation of the form and the substance of the story is it possible to understand the deeper "story" with which the book is occupied, the "story" of Yahweh's relationship to Israel and Israel's relationship to Yahweh. For the meaning of Gomer's faithlessness and whoredom is simply this: Israel, the chosen people, has broken the covenant. As the covenant dominates the life of Israel and provides it with its meaning, so the broken covenant constitutes the tragic matrix for the yet deeper revelation of God's reconciling and redeeming love. This it is which stirs the prophet and prompts his thought to range from the beginnings of Israel's history to the present, and from the present to that future when the starkness of the tragedy will somehow be caught up in pain and suffering into the heart of God himself.

To express the meaning of the covenant relationship in the catastrophic days of Israel's historical existence (745–722 B.C.), Hosea turns to the two most intimate areas of human life with an intensity that makes his little book quite sui generis in Scripture. The covenant on Sinai was Yahweh's marriage to Israel. Conjugal relationships were universal among the deities of the ancient Near East. But that Yahweh betrothed himself to a people, his people Israel, was a new insight, however deep the roots of the idea and the language might lie in the contemporary fertility cults. It is in the most profound and revealing of all man's intimate relationships that Hosea finds an expression of Yahweh's relation to his people. Yahweh is not only a husband; he is also a father, and Israel is his son. Yahweh's redemption from Egypt was a "calling" of his son (Hos. 11:1; cf. Exod. 4:22–23). What Gomer was to Hosea, Israel is to Yahweh.

When Hosea speaks of the relations between husband and wife and between parent and child, he does so because he finds in them an appropriate and revealing language to describe the relationship which exists between Yahweh and Israel. It was a love which only love can understand. This is why Hosea becomes so authentic an interpreter of Yahweh's love. He knew how love could suffer, and under its strains and in its violation he came to see its greater depth. He pointed again and again to the concrete evidences of this covenant love in the events of history. "I am Yahweh from the land of Egypt" (12:9); "by a prophet Yahweh brought Israel up out of Egypt" (12:13); "I found Israel like grapes in the wilderness" (9:10). Hosea has his own favorite word for this relationship, hēsedh. This word may be rendered "devotion" or "covenant faithfulness." It is partly on account of Hosea himself that we find it so difficult to get precisely the right term. But he would be the first to say that we can understand it best by reading Israel's history through the eyes that hesedh gives us to see. As Adam C. Welch says,

What engrossed all his thoughts was the historic religion which had made his nation what it was, which had given it a different genius from all the other nations among which it lived, and the loss of which would mean the loss of a great thing from the world. He did not speak of a God who was Lord of heaven and earth, but of One who had come into contact with this people, who revealed Himself through the deeds which had made the people's history and through the institutions which moulded its life.⁶⁸

But Israel had broken the covenant. She had gone after the Baals as the givers of fertility, or even worse, had identified Yahweh with Baal. Yahweh could not tolerate such easy syncretism. "She did not know that I gave her the grain, and the new wine, and the oil" (2:8). The Yahweh cult must be de-Canaanized. What this means is clear from Hosea's description of the new covenant in which Yahweh will betroth Israel to him in righteousness and in justice, and in fidelity, and in mercies, in faithfulness and in knowledge of Yahweh (2:19). Israel had violated the covenant in a second respect. She had organized herself into a monarchy with a king. But creation of the kingdom was an act of apostasy! The trouble all began at Gibeah whence Saul came, at Gilgal, where he was crowned king (10:9; 9:15; 10:3; 8:4; cf. also 7:3-7). Similarly, Israel's reliance on diplomacy, her periodic flirtation with the great nations of Egypt and Assyria, was infidelity, want of knowledge, apostasy. "Ephraim mixes among the peoples, and strangers devour his strength" (7:8-9); "She is a silly dove cooing to Egypt and then to Assyria" (7:11); "She is swallowed up among the nations, wandering off like a wild ass alone" (8:8-9). Again, Israel's resort to arms and defense measures will not avail her; her fortified cities and palaces are no security to her (8:14). Israel's infidelity to Yahweh is seen in her apostasy to the Baal cult of fertility, in her trust in the monarchy with its kings, in her trust in foreign relations, in her dependence upon material power and arms. All this shows that she does not know Yahweh. This is her cardinal sin. Just as the covenant meant that Yahweh knew Israel, and that Israel's acceptance showed she knew Yahweh, so all this infidelity shows that she does not know Yahweh. There is no knowledge of God in the land (4:1, 6, 11; 5:4; 6:6). Knowledge of God is not one quality among others. All of Israel's relationship to Yahweh is gathered up in knowledge of God, and all her apostasy is seen in her failure to know Yahweh. Her infidelity shows her lovelessness to Yahweh; her lovelessness has blinded her to the covenant relation, and this blindness has brought about judgment.

⁶⁸ The Religion of Israel Under the Kingdom (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1912), p. 111.

The consequence of Israel's breaking of the covenant is her destruction. Yahweh has abandoned his people (5:6, cf. 4:6). He will love them no more (9:15); he is Israel's destruction (13:9 ff.); he will not be their God any more, "Ye are not my people, and I will not be your God" (1:9). The covenant made at Sinai is ended. Yahweh is like a lion to Israel (5:14), a leopard (13:7), a bear (13:8), a moth and rottenness (5:12). Israel has sowed the wind, but she will reap the whirlwind (8:7). Ephraim shall return to Egypt, and eat unclean food in Assyria (9:3).

Quite as vigorously as Amos, Hosea excoriates the existing cult. Even more plainly he shows how far it has gone in its syncretism with Baal worship. The flourishing cult of ritualistic prostitution at the high places and its association with the fertility of the soil (4:13-14), the worship of the bulls (13:1-3), the festivals of the Baals' days (2:13), the sacrificial meals (8:13), and the thoroughgoing depravity of the entire cult, all are denounced by Hosea in scathing rebuke. Hosea's scorn and contempt and ridicule and the definiteness of his characterizations are even more piercing than Amos' invective. He comes out flatly against the whole business of visual images in worship, so flatly, indeed, that many scholars believe him to be the first to launch this protest. On the matter of sacrifice, central as it was doubtless deemed by many to be, and not without some justification, Hosea is as outspoken as Amos, but his touchstone is not justice (mishpāt), though Hosea also knows what justice is, but mercy and covenant faithfulness (hesedh) and knowledge of God (da'ath 'elōhīm):

For hesedh I desire and not sacrifice;
and the knowledge of God more than burnt offerings (Hos. 6:6).

And yet this is not the end, not the final end. For Yahweh could no more reject Israel utterly than Hosea could cast off Gomer. That is the message of Hosea, the triumphant love of God, triumphant over wrath and judgment. What binds Israel and Yahweh is stronger than what separates them. Like Gomer, Israel will pass through a long period of discipline and purgation, "without king, and without prince, and without sacrifice, and without pillar, and without ephod or teraphim" (3:4), but there will be a new covenant, a new marriage in which they will live together on the basis of a covenant God and a covenant people in justice and righteousness and mercy and love, and in faithfulness. Then Israel will know Yahweh as Yahweh knows her. Hosea sees the reality of the divine judgment and he sees how deep and terrible Israel's infidelity is, but he sees even more clearly the covenant faithfulness that outlasts judgment and a mercy that reconciles and restores and redeems a wayward and faithless people.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

How shall I give thee up, O Ephraim!
how shall I cast thee off, O Israel!
How shall I make thee as Admah!
how shall I set thee as Zeboim!
My heart is turned against me,
my compassions are kindled together.
I will not execute the fierceness of my anger,
I will not again destroy Ephraim;
For I am God and not man;
the Holy One in the midst of thee;
and I will not come in wrath (Hos. 11:8-9).

3. Isaiah of Jerusalem.—The original materials belonging to Isaiah of Jerusalem are found chiefly in chs. 1-12; 28-33, although there are authentic Isaiah materials outside these chapters. The prophet lived during the period of the most dynamic phase of Assyrian imperialistic aggression. The oracles of Isaiah gather about the chief crises of his day, although the entire period was one of international ferment. The reign of the usurper Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 B.C.) lies behind Isaiah's early ministry. This monarch's fateful policy of shifting conquered populations from one part of the empire to another, the death of Uzziah king of Judah, the Syro-Ephraimitic war, the decline and fall of the northern kingdom, and the campaigns of Sennacherib are but a few of the events which marked the career of Isaiah. Elijah, Elisha, Micaiah, Amos, and Hosea had directed their messages almost exclusively to the northern kingdom. Now on the eve of Israel's destruction Judah appears upon the scene in the person of one of the greatest of all the prophets, Isaiah of Jerusalem.

Isaiah seems to have come from the privileged class. He is pre-eminently a citizen of Jerusalem. He has the manner and speech of a city man. He possesses a kind of savoir-faire, a personal dignity and ease, and a sophistication which distinguishes him sharply from his prophetic predecessors in the north. He is supported by the stability of a social structure in which he has an instinctive trust and confidence. Institutions mean more to him than they do to any other prophet with the exception of Ezekiel. He is never quite able to break completely with the conservatism of Judah, and he has an innate and even profound regard for the house of David. Behind his call and through all the years of his preaching of judgment, and above all in the final crisis of Sennacherib's invasion, his patriotism and loyalty to Jerusalem and the monarchy are never lost. Deeply influenced by Amos, he nevertheless has so absorbed the herdsmen-prophet's passion and message that he has made them to some degree his own. Amos can be brutal, unrestrained, ruthless, and impetuous; Isaiah's breeding and heritage and home life in Jerusalem transform the message of Amos into something more measured and grand and classical.

In the account of his inaugural vision all the major emphases of the prophet's teaching are present. "In the year that king Uzziah died," he begins simply, "I saw the Lord." The reality of this vision runs through all the oracles. He sees the Lord "high and lifted up," a phrase that keeps appearing in one form or other in his later messages. It is the holiness of God that is borne in upon him above all else. Holy, holy, holy! Hereafter this became his word for Yahweh, "the Holy One of Israel." It described Yahweh in his unapproachableness, his overwhelming majesty, his piercing glory. Overpowering and shattering in his awfulness, yet fascinating and compelling in his nearness, Yahweh was sublime and sinless and of purer eyes than to behold iniquity, before whom the seraphim hide their faces in reverence, cover their limbs in their awareness of the "holy," and poise their wings in flight to do his bidding. Isaiah in the utter authenticity of this final moment has but one word to speak, "Woe!" the woe of one who knows his own "uncleanness" and the uncleanness of the solidarity which he cherished so deeply. The threshold trembles, and the house is filled with smoke. Only Second Isaiah and, to a lesser degree, the psalmists inherit this great and central word of Isaiah's, "the Holy One of Israel." It is Isaiah more than any other who transforms the customary meaning of the word. He transforms it by seeing in God's justice and righteousness that which makes holiness the supreme reality that it is (Isa. 5:16). Intense as this realization is in the singing of the seraphim still, "the whole earth is full of his glory," or literally, "the fullness of the earth is his glory." But good Hebrew that he is, Isaiah presses on with utter economy of phrase: "For the King, Yahweh of hosts mine eyes have seen!" All the baffling relativities of history which have so much perplexed him now fade away as he sees who and what it is that is utterly sovereign. Yahweh is king. Amos would not have said it that way, and Hosea would have repudiated the expression for his own reasons. But not Isaiah. Then a seraph touches his lips with a glowing stone from off the altar, and the prophet knows in this "act" that the word he needs above all to hear has been spoken.

Lo! this has touched your lips;
Your guilt is removed; your sin is forgiven (Isa. 6:7).

Now Isaiah, standing within the council of God, can hear himself addressed, and it is the characteristic word of prophetic faith throughout the Old Testament, "Go!" Then follows the unbearable commission to which the prophet can only cry with dreadful poignancy, "How long?" The reply is even more terrible, but the last verse, corrupt as it is, may have some suggestion of hope in it, though the final sentence does not appear in the Greek text.

Isaiah's message, like that of Amos, is pre-eminently one of judgment. In a series of magnificent strophes, disordered and mutilated as they now are in our text, he describes the imminent day of Yahweh. Yahweh has a day, final and decisive beyond all the other days of men. The pride of men has erected lofty structures of security and self-sufficiency but the haughtiness of man will be humbled,

And the pride of man will be brought low;
And Yahweh alone will be exalted in that day (2:17; cf. vs. 11).

"Yahweh has abandoned his people." This is the terrible word which Isaiah has to speak. Again and again he makes justice and righteousness the measuring rod to apply to Judah's life, and the verdict is always "destruction." The coming judgment of Assyrian conquest cannot be prevented; all the many resorts which men use to strengthen themselves are futile, as futile as the petty godlings, nonentities, which they worship:

For all this his anger is not turned away,
But his hand is stretched out still to strike (9:12, 17, 21; 10:4; cf. 5:25).

In the crisis of the Syro-Ephraimitic threat Isaiah appealed to one permanent and sufficient resource at the king's disposal—it is faith in Yahweh, the God of history.

If you will not have faith [thā'aminū]
You shall surely not be established [thē'amēnū]
(Isa. 7:9).

Isaiah had had his glorious vision, and such trust, such unreserved and single-minded confidence was for him the only possibility. But Ahaz could examine the water mains more closely! Then Isaiah presses the issue, but Ahaz piously evades it. Nevertheless, Isaiah says, Yahweh will give a sign, the sign of a child about to be born who will bear the name Immanuel, "God with us." Before the child is grown, the king of Assyria will come to accomplish the will of Yahweh. The final and all-sufficient potency of faith was not the inspiration of a single moment. Yahweh had placed in Zion a stone, a well-tested stone, a precious stone, as the cornerstone of a sure foundation, and this is the great security, "He who believes will not be in haste" (28:16). Israel's strength lies in quietness and confidence (30:15). The waters of Shiloah that flow softly will outlast the waters of the great Euphrates. For the first time in history faith was appealed to in a moment of great destiny as man's supreme resource. For Christianity the child Immanuel is the symbol of that faith (Matt. 2:23).

Like Amos, Isaiah sees the activity of God's purpose in the history of his own times. The series of moving strophes in 9:7-10:5; 5:26-29 describe the sovereignty of the divine purpose. Stroke after stroke the judgment falls until men have lost every support and stay (cf. 3:1-12; 1:4-9; 31:1 ff.; etc.). Again like Amos, Isaiah denounces the false security of the cult. Yahweh despises sacrifices; their odor is an abomination to him. Amos could go no further. This fervid attendance at the sanctuary, why do you trample my courts? New moons and sabbaths and solemn gatherings, Yahweh cannot endure them. Even when you pray, he will not listen.

Your hands are full of bloodshed—wash yourselves clean;
Put away the evil of your doings from before my eyes;
Cease to do evil,
learn to do good;
Seek justice,
restrain the oppressor;
Uphold the orphan's rights, defend the widow's cause (1:16-17).

But despite the urgency and apparently unqualified character of Isaiah's oracles of judgment, he did not look forward to the future without hope. A remnant will survive the judgment, and the inconspicuous minority will become the community which is to be the bearer of the word of God.⁶⁴ Some of the passages which relate to the remnant are questionable.

⁶⁴ Sigmund Mowinckel, in his Jesaja (Oslo: Gyldendal, 1949) and other writings, sees in Isaiah the fons et origo of an extensive Isaiah tradition and school. To it he attributes the non-Isaiah, pre-exilic portions of the book of Isaiah, parts of Micah, Zephaniah, Nahum, Habakkuk, "The Song of Moses," and parts of the Deuteronomic laws; cf. G. W. Anderson, "Some Aspects of the Uppsala School of Old Testament Study," Harvard Theological Review, XLIII (1950), 242 ff.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

The reference to Isaiah's older son, Shear-jashub, "the remnant shall return," more probably bears the meaning of judgment, not hope. More certain is the triumph of his faith to which he appealed at all times. For example, the prophet's stand on the occasion of Sennacherib's siege of Jerusalem has a consistency which is lost if one does not regard the totality of his message and views only the great number of oracles of doom. But standing above all are the lines from Isaiah himself on the occasion of his rejection during the Syro-Ephraimitic crisis: "I will bind up my testimony and seal my law [teaching] in the heart of my disciples. Then I will wait for Yahweh, who is hiding his face from the house of Israel; I will set my hope on him, while I and the children whom Yahweh has given me remain as signs and symbols in Israel from Yahweh of hosts who dwells on Mount Zion" (8:16-18). In the biblical perspectives the faithful community survived beyond all the din of empires and the machinations of kings. Signs and symbols from Yahweh of hosts!

Did Isaiah look forward to a messianic age governed by a messiah? If the great passages associated with his name (2:2-4; 9:1-6; 11:1-9; 32:1-8) are his, then of course no one in the whole range of biblical faith looked more steadily and confidently to the coming of such an age and such a deliverer than he. There are great difficulties in the way of accepting them, however. And yet it cannot be said to be impossible. Some of the passages have a greater claim than others to authenticity (e.g., 9:1-6); and our more recent studies of ancient Oriental literature put the problem in a new light. It is at least precarious to reject them. In certain respects they have an interior consistency with Isaiah's religious thought, his great concern for the monarchy, and above all, the house of David:

For to us a child is born,
to us a son is given,
And the government will be on his shoulder, and his name will be called Wonderful counsellor, Mighty God,
Everlasting father, Prince of peace.
Of the increase of his government, and of peace,
there will be no end,
Upon the throne of David, and over his kingdom, to establish it and to uphold it,
with justice and with righteousness,
from henceforth and forever.
The zeal of the Yahweh of hosts will do this (9:6-7).

4. Micah of Moresheth-gath.—The prophetic oracles which most surely come from Micah are contained in the first three chapters of the book which bears his name, and of these 2:12-13 is probably a later addition. Mic. 4-7 may preserve isolated utterances of the prophet, but one cannot be certain. The famous controversy before the mountains in 6:1-8 comes a full half century after Micah lived and belongs to the reign of Manasseh. Of Micah himself the book tells us little, and yet he stands forth as clearly as any of his contemporaries. A peasant-farmer from the Shephelah, he knows the harsh and grudging life of the poor. He speaks out in bitter outrage at the injustices done to those who have neither power nor capacity to resist, but with deep compassion for those who suffer from the devices and machinations of shrewd and prosperous men.

The utterances that are preserved for us are nearly all invectives and threats. Yahweh is coming in great theophany to bring judgment upon the cities, for it is cities like Samaria and Jerusalem which embody the evil of the time (1:5). Across the book might be written Jerusalem delenda est. But Micah does not gloat over the divine judgment (1:8). His condemnation of the social injustices of his contemporaries falls particularly upon the landholders who devise ways in which to fleece the peasants of their holdings.

You are my people's foe,
You rise against those who are at peace,
For the sake of a mere trifle you take a heavy mortgage! (2:8.)

Next comes the rulers. "Is it not your place to know justice?" (3:1.) The priests demand fees for their oracles, and the prophets prophesy for cash. Micah cuts straight through the sham and pretense of the professional classes, not least of all his own. The thought of the insincere prophet evokes his apologia:

But I am full of power,
The spirit of Yahweh, justice, and strength,
To declare to Jacob his transgressions,
And to Israel its sins (3:8).

In one final and smashing threat he speaks his last and most remembered word against the city's leaders:

Therefore, because of you,
Zion shall be plowed like a field,
And Jerusalem shall become a ruin,
And the temple hill a high place in a forest (3:12).

The temple which Isaiah of Jerusalem had declared to be inviolate, Micah consigns to destruction. Jerusalem is no place for Yahweh's tabernacled presence!

Much of the remainder of his book comes from later times. In the heart of it stands the great controversy of Yahweh with his people (6:1-8). It is a mistake merely to repeat the great finale in vs. 8; the passage is a unit, and one must enter into the whole drama of the trial at law, and with the case each party has to make, before it can be really appreciated. Yahweh's case in vs. 3-4 is prophetic to the core. What is it that Yahweh has done for Israel? Israel must answer, for this is peculiarly her province. She must remember because it belongs to her nature to remember. She must remember Moses and Aaron and Miriam and the events that culminated at Gilgal, "that you may understand the righteous acts of Yahweh." Israel's defense is poignant. It is not sacrifices, not even those of her children, that Yahweh requires. This is a good summary of the prophetic message of Amos, Hosea, and Isaiah on the subject of sacrifice. And then the great commandment is flung before them. You have been told what is good!

What does Yahweh require of you?
To do justice, and to love hēsedh,
And to walk humbly with your God (6:8).

Not much is preserved for us from Manasseh's long and evil reign, but here the heritage of the great prophetic tradition of the ninth and eighth centuries has found a stirring and clamant voice. The little minorities who served as signs and symbols for Yahweh of hosts held firm and steady, and prepared the way for Josiah's great reform in 621 B.C.

D. The Reformation of 621 B.C. 1. Historical Background.—When Ashurbanipal, the last of the succession of great Assyrian kings, died in the year 633 B.C., the empire was in a state of rapid decline. The king had succeeded in meeting the revolt of Babylonia in 650-648 B.C., but it proved to be the handwriting on the wall. Soon after his death, Nabopolassar, a Chaldean prince, made himself king over Babylonia and became the founder of the neo-Babylonian kingdom. In a short time other powers became involved: ⁶⁵ Egypt under Psamtik I, Media under Cyaxares, hordes of Scythians from beyond the Caucasus, and other lesser peoples. It is in this international setting that the history of Judah recounted in II Kings 22-23 should be interpreted. The tensions between nation and covenant, to both of which the reform movement of Josiah sought to do justice, constitute the major realities that make this reformation of such profound consequence in the history and religion of Israel.

Nowhere in the Old Testament is Israel's sensitiveness to history better illustrated than in her response to the momentous events between the death of Ashurbanipal and the destruction of Jerusalem in 586(7) B.C. Toynbee's theory of "challenge and response" is confirmed in the history of Israel in general, but there is one phase of this response that has special significance for us, the relation of history to the production of scripture. The great events of the seventh and sixth centuries left their literary precipitate in the form of such works as Zephaniah, Jeremiah, the Code of Deuteronomy, the original edition of I and II Kings, Nahum, Habakkuk, Ezekiel, and a number of psalms. No period of comparable extent is so rich in biblical writings of the first importance.

⁶⁵ In the case of Egypt and the Scythians, at least, the intervention into the international situation preceded their activity at this time; nevertheless it was Nabopolassar's revolt that gave the impetus to the final overthrow of the empire.

2. Source.—Among the more important of these sources is the Book of the Covenant contained in Deuteronomy. This document must be read and understood in the light of the narrative given in II Kings 22-23. It is prefaced by two extensive introductions (Deut. 1:1-4:43; 4:44-11:32), both of which are probably later than the code itself, although the second has a greater claim to originality than the first. The remaining chapters (27; 29-34) come from different times. Deuteronomy is a rhetorical book with a moving hortatory style, which has no adequate extrabiblical parallels. The materials within the Bible which have a similar style are the work of Deuteronomists. The code contains many ancient elements. The Covenant Code of Exod. 20:23-23:19, or its prototype (as is more probable), was in the hands of the authors.⁶⁶ Times as disturbed as those of the decline and fall of Assyria naturally inspired a great return to tradition. The writers of Deuteronomy doubtless intend to give a transcription of Mosaic faith, as they understood it, for their own times.

3. The Code of Deuteronomy.—Dominating all else in the code is the demand for an exclusive loyalty to Yahweh. This is stated with an urgency unmatched in the Scriptures. Its classical formulation appears in the Shema (Deut. 6:4-9). Translated literally, the opening words read as follows: "Hear, O Israel, Yahweh our God is one Yahweh. And you shall love Yahweh your God with all your heart [mind], and with all your life [nēphesh], and with all your strength. These words which I am commanding you today shall be upon your heart. . . ." The code itself repeats the assertion of Yahweh's unity again and again and in different ways: historically, by applying the hērem to the whole period of the Conquest; practically, by the demand for complete extermination of all Canaanite and other alien elements from the existing worship; cultically, by the reorganization of worship and the centralization of the sanctuary; ethically, by the insistence upon complete commitment to the will of God. "It is Yahweh your God that you must follow; of him you must stand in awe; his commands you must keep; his injunctions you must heed; him you must serve; and to him you must hold fast" (13:4).

⁶⁶ See the excellent analysis of the materials in S. R. Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (9th ed.; Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1913), pp. 73-75.

Jerusalem is the place where men must worship. Heretofore the sanctuaries were near and accessible to all. Every slaughter was a sacrifice, every festival a festival to Yahweh. This new concentration of worship at Jerusalem actually produced an unprecedented separation between the secular and religious life. Secular slaughter was now permitted. Only the three great festivals of Passover, Weeks, and Tabernacles (16:1-15) must be celebrated. The centralization of the sanctuary now required going to Jerusalem, the national capital, with all its venerable associations with David, Solomon, Isaiah, and the Davidic dynasty. The cult with its various practices and its priesthood was rigorously controlled. Sacrifices were not only permitted but enjoined. Directions were given for their proper performance. Specific and elaborate instructions were issued for the care of the Levites. Distinctions between clean and unclean food were carefully set forth (14:3-20).

The book is addressed to the average man of Israel; it is a layman's book, and it has the style and content to which the layman would be the first to respond. One cannot help but sense throughout the urgent situation out of which such demands for control came. The inroads of the Canaanite fertility cult and Babylonian astral worship were so serious that rigor had to be applied if the religion of Israel, continuous with Moses, was to survive. Moreover, the emphasis upon rejoicing in all the celebrations of the cult is a particularly salutary and authentic element in the code.

The main characteristic of Deuteronomy is its strong emphasis upon love: Yahweh's love for Israel and Israel's loving response to Yahweh. Yahweh, the holy God, has chosen Israel to be a holy people (cf. Exod. 19:6). It was Yahweh's love, unmotivated and spontaneous, that prompted him to take the initiative (Deut. 7:6-8). But this love of Yahweh is interpreted in the light of the concrete historical evidence of Israel's own history. "You must remember all the experiences through which Yahweh your God has led you for the past forty years in the desert" (8:2). The future, too, lies within the providence and love of God. The prophets were the instruments of his continuing revelation so that Israel might always be guided by his word. "They have spoken well; from time to time I will raise up for them someone like you [Moses] from among their fellow countrymen to be a prophet; and I will put my words in his mouth, and he shall tell them all that I command him" (18:17-18). Past, present, and future, all are evidences of Yahweh's love for his people. Yahweh sent the law as his gift to Israel; his law was in fact revelation, revelation of what above all they needed to know. And so Yahweh's unmotivated love for Israel has as its corollary the demand for Israel's reciprocal love to God. After the great opening line of the Shema about the unity of Yahweh, there follows this cardinal demand of love from Israel, a love that will dominate all her life, a love of such intensity that it enlists the whole mind, the whole self (néphesh), the whole of one's energy. While the second command of the gospel appears in Lev. 19:18 and not here, yet it really appears everywhere in Deuteronomy also. For the writers would certainly agree that this was the motivation of all the ethical requirements laid upon Israel. To be sure, love does not have the universality that it has in the gospel, for it is circumscribed in various ways; but this circumscription needs to be understood in terms of the milieu which makes it central. Not only must Israelites love each other; they must love the resident alien (gér) also, "for you were once aliens yourselves in the land of Egypt" (Deut. 10:19).

Israel is a holy, a chosen, and a covenant people. The holiness of Israel describes the character and meaning of its life. "For you are a holy people to Yahweh your God, and Yahweh has chosen you to be a people for his own possession out of all the peoples that are on the face of the earth" (14:2). The uniqueness of Israel is a constant stress of the Deuteronomist. This uniqueness is derived from the uniqueness of her God. She is granted this uniqueness by being made holy, chosen, and "covenanted." It is Israel's responsibility both in the practices of the cult and in acts of humanitarianism to live as a holy people. Her relations to other peoples are to be determined by her holy character. She must separate herself from the ways of other nations and maintain her religious purity. The holiness of Israel is closely related to two other dominant emphases in Deuteronomy: election and covenant. The belief in election gives a historical character to the idea of holiness. This event never ceases to excite the wonder of the Deuteronomic writers (7:6-8; 9:4-6; 10:14-15; 14:2; 26:18-19). Yahweh's choice of Israel is not explained by Israel's genius for religion, by her native endowment, by the purity of her ethical life, or by any merit in Israel at all, but rather by the divine mercy. Above all, in the covenant relationship Yahweh manifested his love and mercy to Israel. The nations of the Near East met the confusion and disintegration of their world in their own ways; Israel's major response was in terms of the return to the Mosaic covenant. But Deuteronomy gives new content and force to it by viewing its significance in the light of the conditions in western Asia in the late seventh century B.C. If the covenant receives remarkable emphasis, it is because the situation called it forth. The Deuteronomistic writers contributed more than any others after Moses to center Israel's life in the covenant: a covenantal people, a covenantal book, a covenantal God.

The laws of love as they were understood by the prophets and priests who were responsible for the code are set forth in great detail. Love demands justice. Justice gathers into one all the requirements of Israel's social life. The influence of the eighth-century prophets is apparent in their formulation and content. As Yahweh is God of gods and Lord of lords, the great, the mighty, and the terrible God, who is never partial and never takes a bribe, executing justice for the fatherless and the widow, and loving the resident alien, and giving him food and raiment, so Israel must live and act in relation to her neighbors (10:17 ff.). What is required of Israel is determined by the character of God in his dealings with men. There must be no poor in the land. Poverty is forbidden (15:4-11). The Israelite, like Yahweh, must make no distinctions between important and unimportant people. Servants and slaves have their rights; even a runaway slave must not be turned over to his master. "He shall dwell with you in your midst" (23:15-16). No interest is to be exacted of the fellow countryman. Cities of refuge are to be set up throughout the land so that there may be no miscarriage of justice. Various aspects of family life are treated with sensitiveness for the persons involved (21:15 ff.; 22:5, 13 ff., 22 ff.). Not least important is the concern for animal life. The ox that treads the grain must not be muzzled (25:4). If one comes upon a nest with eggs in it or with the young, the mother bird must not be seized (22:6). In time of war or siege the fruit trees may not be cut down. "Are trees in the field to be besieged by you?" (20:19-20.)

The moral sense of the reformers reflects itself in another way in the moral logic of Deuteronomy. The same mind which insists upon the claims of the law of God views the consequences of good and evil in a perfectly simple way. The motivation for doing good was reward: "That it may be well with you in the land." This note is sounded again and again throughout the book. Justice demanded that good should produce good consequences and evil, evil consequences. This simple view of the divine sovereignty dominates not only Deuteronomy, but the whole succession of books upon which the Deuteronomistic school laid its hand.

This interpretation of history was one of the chief defects of Deuteronomy.⁶⁷ In many ways it was an evil legacy. The ultimately profound truth it embodied was in actuality obscured because of the immediate perspectives in which it asserted the divine justice. To our own day we are cursed with superficial constructions of the historical process in neat moral categories which history itself contradicts, precisely as the history of Israel contradicted the Deuteronomists and finally evoked the deeper interpretations of Second Isaiah, some of the psalmists, and all the apocalyptists. A theodicy which saw life in terms of rewards and punishments only could not cope with the realities of national tragedy; indeed, it was the simple moral logic of the Deuteronomists and their like that made the blow of 586 and the succeeding years all the more intolerable.

A second defect in Deuteronomy was the intensity of its nationalism. The attempt to take the prophets seriously and to apply the great ideals of justice and mercy and mutuality to the life of the nation was glorious enough, but not infrequently nationalism gained the upper hand. At the same time, it is important to read this nationalism in terms of the political climate which produced it. Again, the emphasis upon the written code was destined to produce important consequences. A book became the medium of a divine revelation. It was not the living voice of an Amos or an Isaiah proclaiming the will of God, but the letters and words of a book, and Deuteronomy set itself up as the criterion for orthodoxy. With Deuteronomy began the movement which was to make of Judaism the people of the Book. But if the written word had its consequences, so too did the emphasis upon the single sanctuary in Jerusalem. The absolutizing of the cult and its temple could not go unchallenged. This was not in the spirit of any of the great prophets, of Hosea or Amos or Micah, or even Isaiah. Such an emphasis led to superstitious veneration of the temple, and it needed the terrible castigations of a Jeremiah and later of Jesus of Nazareth to expose the dangers of exalting even the temple too highly.

E. The Prophets of the End of Judah. I. Zephaniah.—This little book was inspired by ⁶⁷ A. C. Welch, in The Code of Deuteronomy (London: James Clarke & Co., 1924), attributes the nationalism and ecclesiasticism of the book to the work of the southern king and priests, not to the original form of the book, which he believes, perhaps correctly, to have its home in the north. For further discussion of the effects of this nationalism see his Jeremiah: His Time and His Work (London: Oxford University Press, 1928).

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

the threat of the invasion of Scythian hordes from beyond the Caucasus. The following passages are probably secondary: 2:7; parts of 2:8-11; 3:14-20. The book is valuable for its picture of conditions existing in Jerusalem in the years preceding the reform of 621 B.C.

A day of doom is to descend upon the world: "I will cut off mankind from off the face of the ground" (1:2-3). Judah and Jerusalem will be destroyed because of their worship of astral deities, the Canaanite Baal, and Milcom (1:4-6). Zephaniah seizes upon the day of Yahweh for his classical formulation of the terrible dies irae (1:7-13, 14-18). Because of the gross corruption of their worship of Yahweh in the temple, priests, princes, the rich, and the illustrious are singled out for bitter attack: "Yahweh will bring trouble upon mankind so that they will walk like blind men, because they have sinned against Yahweh" (1:17). From Judah and Jerusalem, Zephaniah turns to the nations. To the passionate demands of his predecessors for righteousness and justice and mercy Zephaniah adds his own great word of humility in a passage that echoes Amos 5:14-15:

Seek Yahweh, all you meek of the earth,
Who do his will,
Seek righteousness, seek humility;
Perhaps you may be hidden on the day of the anger of Yahweh (Zeph. 2:3).

One other feature for which this little book is memorable is its emphasis upon the remnant. Jerusalem will be purged of its proud and haughty leaders; Israel will be the holy nation it was destined to be from the beginning, a holy remnant:

And you shall no more be haughty in my holy mountain;
For I will leave in the midst of you a people humble and poor.
And in the name of Yahweh shall they seek refuge
—the remnant of Israel (3:11b-13b).

2. Habakkuk.—The book of Habakkuk is one of the most appealing and important books in the Bible, as it is one of the most difficult. The critical problems are peculiarly troublesome. We cannot be certain even of its date. It is probable, however, that it was written in the year of the Battle of Carchemish (604 B.C.). Only chs. 1-2 belong to Habakkuk himself, as may be confirmed by the commentary on the book discovered among the Dead Sea scrolls. The problem which occupies the prophet is the righteousness of the divine sovereignty in history.

How long, O Yahweh, shall I cry for help, and thou wilt not hear,

Call out to thee, "Violence!"
and thou wilt not save?
Why dost thou make me see wrongs and look upon trouble?

For the wicked surround the righteous, so justice goes forth perverted (1:2-3b, 4cd).

Habakkuk is not satisfied with easy or conventional answers. The Babylonians are surely no worthy instruments of judgment upon Judah, evil as the latter may be. Finally Habakkuk determines to station himself upon a watch-tower "to see what he will say to me." There he receives a word from Yahweh:

Write the vision,
Make it plain upon tablets,
So he may run who reads it.
For still the vision waits its time,
It hastens to the end—it will not fail;
If it tarry, wait for it;
It will surely come, it will not delay.
Behold, he whose soul is not upright in him shall fail,
But the righteous lives by his faithfulness (2:2-4).

Such a revelation in a time of darkness was destined to receive fresh formulations in other periods of history. Both the apostle Paul (Rom. 1:17; Gal. 3:11) and Martin Luther seized upon these words to express a meaning deeper than the prophet himself divined. Habakkuk belongs to the company in Israel who learned to wait (Isa. 8:16-18; 40:28-31; 64:4; Ps. 130:6). The righteous gets not a pat answer to his desperate query, but an answer which demands all the resources of his soul. He must walk and live by his trust and faithfulness to God.

Ch. 3 is an independent psalm, but it was placed here intentionally. The poem is one of the most vivid in the Old Testament.⁸⁸ Its description of the theophany has mythological echoes and contains reminiscences of the language of ancient Ugarit. But it is the closing lines that bind it securely to the rest of the book in its wonderful expression of unconquerable trust. If Habakkuk did not write them, he would certainly have wished to claim them for his own.

Though the fig-tree do not blossom nor fruit be on the vine,
The produce of the olive fail and the fields yield no food,
The flock be cut off from the fold and there be no herd in the stalls,
Yet will I exult in Yahweh,
I will rejoice in the God of my salvation (3:17-18).

⁸⁸ See the reconstruction of the text by W. F. Albright, "The Psalm of Habakkuk," Studies in Old Testament Prophecy, ed. H. H. Rowley (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1950), pp. 1-18.

3. Jeremiah of Anathoth.—The prophetic activity of Jeremiah, the son of a priestly family at Anathoth, a village to the north of Jerusalem, is understood in the light of his own extraordinary personality and the international background against which he delivered his oracles. Called to be a prophet in 626 B.C., or possibly some years later, he felt himself to be predestined, set apart (lit., "made holy"), and appointed to match the events of his world with the word of God. His call, his confessions, and his oracular utterances reveal him as a person peculiarly endowed with the capacity for personal identification with the storm and stress of his age. His poetic temperament, his solitariness and sense of isolation, his profoundly interior sense of communion with God, and his constant preoccupation with the problem of the meaning of Israel's life and destiny fitted him uniquely to interpret the religious significance of the world-shaking events that were going on in the crucial period from 626 to 586 B.C.

In a series of early oracles (2:2-4:4) Jeremiah contrasts Israel's religion, as it had come down from Moses enshrined in the covenant relationship, with the current syncretistic versions which had undermined what the prophet believed to be the most distinctive elements in the inherited faith. Yahweh remembers Israel's past relationship with him in the desert, an elected, called, redeemed, and holy covenant people whose life was oriented to a historical revelation. But she and her leaders had corrupted the traditional faith into a grievous apostasy (2:4-8). They were skilled in doing evil, building cisterns that held no water (2:13), but they had no will or ability to do good. They exchanged their God for gods of their own making and their glory for vanity. The appetite grew on what it fed, and the lure of the fertility cults had tempted Israel to an insatiate lust so that her moral degradation grew apace into a fatal spot incarnadine (2:20-22, 23-29; 3:21-25). So Jeremiah calls for a profound inward transformation, a circumcision of the heart (4:1-4), in which men will really know Yahweh as they had once known him in covenantal devotion.

The subsequent poems deal with "the foe from the north." In their present form, at least, they refer to the Babylonians. In lyrical utterances of striking quality, in which the prophet's identification with the travail of his age is almost unmatched, Jeremiah says that the foe has been sent by the Lord as a judgment upon Judah. The deepening darkness and tragedy of the times are set forth in the powerful descriptions of the approaching foe, Jeremiah's own inward suffering (4:19-21), and the remarkable description of the returning chaos (4:23-26). The cry to repent, to return, sounds throughout these poems, "O Jerusalem, wash your heart of wickedness that you may be saved" (4:14). History is understood as the arena of a divine sovereignty, of a God whose will and purpose are revealed in the disaster and confusion of the times.

It is doubtful whether the book of Jeremiah contains any authentic utterances relating to the Deuteronomic reform of 621 B.C. It is possible that a nucleus of authentic material may be recovered, but the difficulties involved in such a recovery are so serious that it is better to leave the problem unsettled.^{88a} In another group of passages we have a record of what is indubitably Jeremiah's personal confessions, perhaps the first of their kind in history (11:18-23; 12:1-6; 15:10-21; 17:9-10, 14-18; 18:18-23; 20:7-12, 14-18). There are no more "interior" words in the history of religion than these. The intimacy of the dialogue, the passionate outbursts of pain and deep travail, the urgency of prayer, and the way in which God conquers Jeremiah's own inveterate temptation to self-centeredness expose the depths of his agonizing struggle. The prophet is influenced by the devotional traditions of Israel preserved in the psalms, but there is a sovereign independence from them also, for his confessions express what is deepest within him. It was in part out of experiences such as these that the confessions record that Jeremiah's individualism is forged.

In the prophetic utterances connected with the Babylonian aggression Jeremiah's message to the nations and to his own people is dominated by the conviction of God's reign in history. In season and out, the prophet urges his people to surrender to the Babylonians. It is a mistake to call him a pacifist. He sees in the crisis of western Asia the working out of the divine purpose. The issues involve a choice between life and death (21:8-9). It is the business of the "house of David" to execute justice and relieve oppression (21:12). He rejects the easy optimism of his contemporaries, which sees the exile as short-lived. There is more than a suggestion that his hope for the future rested in those who had been carried away. Yet his purchase of a field from his cousin was a sign of a better time to come (32:1-15). That he looked forward to a messiah from David's house is problematical at best.

^{88a} J. P. Hyatt, "Jeremiah and Deuteronomy," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, I (1942), 156-73; H. H. Rowley, "The Prophet Jeremiah and the Book of Deuteronomy," in Studies in Old Testament Prophecy. Rowley makes a strong case for the view that Jeremiah first supported the Deuteronomic reforms but later recognized the dangers implicit in them. On somewhat different lines Wilhelm Erbt (Jeremia und seine Zeit [Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1902]) takes a similar view. This, after all, is the more common position taken by scholars and may be right.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

The consistency of Jeremiah's prophetic message is admirably reflected in his attitude toward the great historical institutions of Israel. The temple was not inviolable as some had interpreted Isaiah as saying, but it was to be destroyed like Shiloh. The "law" had been turned into a lie by the scribes (8:8), and the circumcision which the Lord really required of his people was a radical change of heart (4:4). Even the intercession of a Moses or a Samuel would not avail to avert the impending judgment. The city of Jerusalem, with all its hallowed associations with the cult, with David and Isaiah and the Deuteronomic reforms, must be destroyed, and the nation was to go into exile as the verdict of God upon its apostasy. Above all, Yahweh will make a new covenant, not like the old one on tables of stone, but graven on the heart of man (31:31-34). The knowledge of God, which runs like a major strain in Jeremiah as in Hosea, is to be a new kind of inward relationship in which all men will know the Lord. For God "will forgive their iniquity and will no more remember their sin" (31:34; cf. Isa. 40:2). This is an eschatological utterance. It forms the culmination of the interior conflict within the prophet from his earliest days, crystallizes the meaning of Israel's life and destiny in the covenant relation, and prepares the way for its appropriation by his prophetic successors and the writers of the New Testament (Luke 22:20; I Cor. 11:25; II Cor. 3:6; Heb. 8:8-12).

4. Ezekiel.—The study of the book of Ezekiel presents problems as difficult as any in the whole Old Testament. The dominant critical view today is that it is highly composite. There can be little question that more than one hand has gone to its making. But radical disintegration of the book is peculiarly precarious in the case of Ezekiel because of the personal portrait which the book gives us of the prophet. For if Ezekiel was the kind of person there described, then it is likely that this reflected itself in his writings. Moreover, the literary argument is not disposed of simply. We are not in a position today to assert with any degree of certainty how much of the book comes from a time later than the prophecy. The position of R. H. Pfeiffer⁶⁹ seems on the whole the safest one to adopt. This assigns a substantial portion of the book to the prophet himself.

Ezekiel, son of a Jerusalem priest, was carried into captivity in the deportation of 597 B.C., together with King Jehoiachin. There, on the banks of the river Chebar, the great canal of the city of Nippur, in the year 592 B.C., he had an extraordinary vision of a throne-chariot above the firmament, and upon the "likeness of the throne . . . was the likeness as the appearance of a man above upon it" (1:26). This was the appearance of the glory (kābhōdh) of Yahweh. The character of the vision suggests a priestly interest, although the imagery has been doubtless influenced by its Babylonian provenance.⁷⁰ The holiness of God, his transcendence, and his glory which the vision portrays, constitute the major features of the prophet's thought of God. Doubtless his own experience in the life of the cult, his close association with "the tabernacling presence" in the dim recesses of the sanctuary, his appreciation of symbolism, his profound sense of incommensurable dimensions in the reality of God, and his deep sense of Israel's guilt lie behind his description.

The message of the prophet before the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C. is prevailingly one of judgment. The guilt of Judah is so deep and dark that its doom cannot be averted. Ezekiel surpasses both Hosea and Jeremiah in his tragic portrait of the sin of his people. It is significant that he does not describe it in any metaphysical category, but rather in terms of Israel's origins and history. From birth Judah was corrupt, the offspring of an Amorite father and a Hittite mother. Historical reflection is present here, but it is not the historical datum which concerns him so much as the religious. The biography of Israel was one continuous story of infidelity and apostasy. Not even the presence of Noah, Daniel, and Job in the city could ward off its inevitable destruction. Cultic and ethical transgressions are put on the same level. The prophet characterizes the former as idolatry, the latter as murder, harlotry, rebellion, and apostasy. Jerusalem is worse than Samaria, the foreign peoples, and even Sodom. Worst of all, the temple has become the seat of pagan practice. Therefore it must be destroyed. The prophet resorts to every kind of symbolism and imagery to express the reality of judgment. Judah is responsible, and she will be held accountable for her breach of the covenanted bond.

The sin of Israel is terrible to Ezekiel because he profoundly apprehends the holiness of God. God manifests his holiness by his rule and sovereignty over Israel's history. The ever-recurring phrase, "in order that you may know that I am Yahweh," expresses the transcendent lordship of God, his sovereignty over all that is human. Before him man is as nothing, and the words with which the prophet is addressed, "son of man" or mortal man, express the vast distance which separates God and man. The nations are to be destroyed "for his name's sake." The divine honor and majesty must not be profaned. Throughout his prophecy Ezekiel seeks to vindicate the righteousness and holiness of God.

⁷⁰ Lorenz Dürr, Ezekiels Vision von der Erscheinung Gottes (Münster: W. Aschendorff, 1917).

⁶⁹ Intro. to O.T., pp. 518-65.

After the fall of Jerusalem the obduracy and pride of the people turned to despair. On the one hand, they were burdened with the consciousness of their guilt: "Our transgressions and our sins are upon us and we pine away in them; how then can we live?" (33:10.) To this plaint the prophet replies with a divine oracle: "As I live, saith the Lord Yahweh, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked; but that the wicked turn from his way and live: turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways; for why will ye die?" (33:11.) On the other hand, when the people complain of God's injustice (33:17), he vindicates God by asserting that the people have deserved what has befallen them and mirabile dictu he appeals to the principle of individual responsibility: everyone is judged according to his own way. To the ancient belief in the solidarity of guilt (Exod. 34:6-7 [J]; Exod. 20:5 [E]; II Kings 21:1-15; 22:15-20; etc.) Ezekiel replies with a strong assertion of the responsibility of the individual. In ch. 18 and 33:10-20 he appears as a pastor rather than a theologian. He is attempting in the first instance not to formulate a generalization, but to meet a critical need. He does so in a mechanical and rigid fashion, in contrast to the more profound message of Jeremiah (31:29-30); but his pronouncement ministered more effectually perhaps to the situation which he confronted.

With the destruction of Jerusalem and its temple, Ezekiel becomes a prophet of hope. God will not allow his honor to be profaned among the nations. His holy people will be vindicated before the eyes of all the world. In an ecstatic vision the prophet sees a valley filled with dry bones. He is commanded to prophesy, "O ye dry bones, hear the word of the LORD" (37:4). As the word is spoken the bones assume sinews and flesh, and they become living beings again. So it will be with Israel, which now lies dead and buried in Exile. God will bring her out of her grave and restore her to the Holy Land. All Israel will be reunited into one, both the northern and the southern kingdoms. God will put his Spirit into his people, and they shall live and know that he has spoken and performed his purpose. It is the Spirit of God that gives life to the nation.

This radical transformation appears in another form in the condemnation of the false shepherds, the rulers who feed themselves and not the sheep. God himself becomes the good shepherd, as in Ps. 23, and on a day of clouds and thick darkness he goes out to deliver the sheep and restore them to their fold. "I myself will be the shepherd of my sheep" (34:15). "I will feed them in justice" (34:16). Land and people will both be transformed. God will make a new covenant, a covenant of peace, and an eternal covenant with his people; he will bless them and multiply them, and set his sanctuary in the midst of them, and the new covenant will be ratified by the ancient covenant formula, "I will be their God, and they shall be my people."

Finally, the prophet envisages an ecclesiastical restoration. Only the first section of chs. 40-48 is genuine. Here (Ezek. 43:1-4) the prophet returns with consistency to the opening vision of the glory of the Lord. A new temple will be built, and Israel will become a temple community. The nation will be transformed into a church. The glory of the Lord will return to its ancient abode and will fill it with its radiance. Israel will at last be a holy people, not by her own work but by the gracious act of her holy God (cf. Exod. 19:6 and Deuteronomy, passim).

Ezekiel and Jeremiah were almost contemporaries. The influence of Jeremiah is apparent in Ezekiel's book. Both prophets reflect within their minds the deep hurt of their times. Ezekiel is more versatile than Jeremiah; he is poet, pastor, priest, prophet, apocalypticist, and theologian. The tragedy of his time cuts deeper into his soul. He is more terribly wounded even than Jeremiah by the word of the Lord. Yet he has a deeper sense of the structure of Israel's community life in history. He understands the necessity for institutions as Jeremiah does not. He is more disheveled than Jeremiah, and yet he finds a shelter and a fortress within the temple as Jeremiah evidently could not. Jeremiah and Ezekiel belong together as Amos and Hosea do. They both plumb the deepest depths of Israel's faith and heritage, and together form a mighty witness to the meaning of the decline and fall of the nation in an international world.

VII. The Babylonian Exile (586-538 B.C.)

A. The Significance of the Fall of Jerusalem (586 B.C.).—The fall of the southern kingdom in 586 B.C., which involved the destruction of the temple where dwelt in mystery and splendor the tabernacling glory of Yahweh; the cessation of the cult, above all, of sacrificial offerings; the termination of the royal line of David after more than four hundred years of continuous rule; and the deportation of substantial elements of the population into exile had the most profound consequences for the religion of ancient Israel. The nation as the bearer of the people's history was gone. To be sure, the covenant had always stood from the time of Moses as the community in which Israel's truest life was expressed, but the covenant gained its relevance precisely because it existed in relation to the life of the nation and its king. Whether the king bore any divine associations or not, he was "the anointed of the Lord," and as such was the protector and supporter and guarantor of the nation's prosperity and welfare. But now the kingdom was destroyed, and Zedekiah and his family suffered the most ignominious humiliation and torture (cf. Lam. 4:20; cf. also Pss. 20:6; 28:8; 89:51; 132:10, 17). When on the ninth of Ab the Babylonians entered the holy city, a new period was inaugurated in the history of biblical religion. The traditional faith had then to be read in the light of an event, catastrophic for Israel's political life and consequently supremely fateful for the quality of faith enshrined in the sacred history. Faith in a historical revelation was seriously threatened, and not a few came to conclusions of hopelessness that the facts of history seemed only too eloquently to warrant.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

The literature following 586 B.C. bears witness to the character of the transformation that took place. To be sure, there was real continuity with the past, but profoundly altered conditions called into being new emphases and more penetrating reflections. In the books of Deuteronomy, Ezekiel, and Jeremiah we detect powerfully seminal forces which were destined to bear fruit. In a radical fashion the writers of these books respond to the stress and malaise of the age. The most significant of these forces we may record as follows:

Pessimism and Beyond. The immediate effect of the nation's fall is vividly described in the much-neglected book of Lamentations. Jerusalem sits in the ashes of mourning. She finds no resting place among the nations. Her glory has passed away. She knows that doom has befallen her for her rebellions. She recalls the past, and sees in it the meaning of the present. This meaning is twofold: judgment and grace. Despite all that has happened, "the LORD is good to those who wait for him. . . . It is good that one should wait quietly for the salvation of the LORD." (Lam. 3:19 ff.)

Revision of History. The problem of history raised by the fall of Judah impelled historians to view the past in the light of the primary presuppositions regarding moral coherence within history. The theologians who represented the Deuteronomistic school undertook to revise and edit the whole of Israel's past history from Moses to the present (Deuteronomy to II Kings) in order to reconcile the actual, tragic history of the past in the light of a moral sovereignty within history. This simple moral logic had vast repercussions for the future of religion.

Deepening Sense of Sin. The strong sense of responsibility which marked Israel's religious life and the consciousness of purpose and destiny involved in her redemption from Egypt, her call, her election, and her covenant relationship combined to kindle within the hearts of the faithful a strong sense of guilt. The proclamation of the prophets and the cultic ministrations of the priests served to emphasize in season and out that Israel had broken the covenant, that the land had been taken from her, and that sin required a deeper expiation than even the pre-exilic prophets had seen. In this Jeremiah and Ezekiel prepared the way for their successors (Lamentations, Psalms, Zechariah, etc.).

Individualism. The constant preoccupation of Jeremiah and Ezekiel with the character of the covenant people, especially in relation to the national solidarity by which they understood themselves, prompted them to discover within the individual person the source of hope and meaning. That is, what could not be easily explained in terms of the solidarity of the community might be more readily understood in the life of the individual. Out of such experiences as are recorded in his confessions Jeremiah came to grasp the reality of fellowship with God, and thus personal religion received a new and profound emphasis. Ezekiel, on the other hand, focused upon the responsibility of the individual. Again, both prophets prepared for their successors in the Psalter and the wisdom literature.

The Revival of Tradition. The confusion and chaos of the period following 626 B.C., and more particularly 586 B.C., prompted certain of Israel's prophets and priests to view the present in the more spacious and more revealing context of the great tradition stemming from the Exodus, and before that, to Abraham, the Flood, and even the creation of the world. Among these was the priestly historian who gave not only a new continuity to history, but also a structure which was destined to influence later thinkers not a little.

Reflection on Cosmogony. To the historian of religion it is astonishing to see how relatively little preoccupation there is with creation in the Old Testament compared, for example, to the great neighboring peoples. After 586 B.C. this cosmogonic interest asserts itself in many ways, for example, in Second Isaiah, the priestly history, the Psalms, and the wisdom literature. A profound eschatology inevitably evoked speculation about the beginning, and in a period when historical categories were under grave threat or suspicion, it was deemed necessary to find a perspective from which the emergence of history might be understood. In this speculation Babylonian and Ugaritic influences are apparent.

The Ecclesiastical Community. Ezekiel had prepared the way for the Jewish church. Particularly in the Persian period, when the Achaemenides ruled their world in the stable organization of the satraps, the Jewish community became a church and came to govern its life increasingly in the terms of a church organization. The books of Chronicles offer a vivid picture of the interests and character of the temple community.

The Life of Worship and Devotion. The disappearance of the external features of religion made possible a greater emphasis on its inward aspects, above all the life of prayer. It is possible that Jeremiah was a major influence here. When the foundations of national and cultic life were shaken, men could seek God in the intimate communion of prayer.

The Problems of Theodicy. The decline and fall of Judah and the rise of new empires stirred the prophets and others to new thought concerning the ways of God with men. Habakkuk (ca. 604 B.C.) had already raised the problems of the righteousness of the divine sovereignty in history in acute form, and had come to the conclusion that "the righteous man lives by his faithfulness" (Hab. 2:4); the Deuteronomists gave the orthodox reply to contemporary queries, and both Jeremiah and Ezekiel gave their own characteristic answers to the same problem. Above all, the Second Isaiah discerned in the earth-shaking events of his day a depth of meaning in suffering and pain which no one before him had divined. This preoccupation with the moral government of history and nature runs like an unbroken cord through all the centuries between 626 B.C. and the Christian Era. Historians, apocalyptists, wisdom writers like the author of the book of Job, psalmists, and prophets reveal the same great concern for this problem. The thought of Israel plumbs its deepest depths in relation to the most baffling and disturbing problem of philosophy and religion.

The Transformation of Prophecy. With the loss of the political matrix of the nation and the conventional features of political life, the message of the prophets was changed. In Second Isaiah we see the prophetic spirit overcoming its limitations. The prophet has a perspective of Israel's tradition, of her past and future, unmatched by any other writer of the old covenant and perhaps of the new, with the exception of the apostle Paul. Here is prophecy on a new level. But there was another change in the prophetic message, such as we see in Haggai and Zechariah. The prophets were always associated with the cult in one way or another, but here there is an interest in the cult which is far removed from anything that we find in such pre-exilic prophets as Amos, Hosea, Micah, or Jeremiah. Again, we find prophecy transformed by a greater emphasis on transcendence, a readier appeal to cosmic categories, a more persistent pessimism concerning any resolution of the divine will within history, and a more passionate and intense faith in the coming of the divine kingdom. In other words, prophecy develops into apocalyptic, which sees more deeply into the tragic perplexities of history.

The Quest for Authority. The sense of insecurity induced by the fall of the nation and the destruction of the temple with its priestly ministrations aroused a widespread hunger for authority and certainty. In a previous age, as we have seen, the decline of Assyria and the widespread dislocation and confusion that followed in its wake were major forces behind the great reformation of 621. This reform had been conceived as a renaissance of Mosaic religion, and in the book which gave classical formulation to the fundamental realities of the faith in Yahweh, "Moses" addressed Israel with an emotional appeal and urgency seldom equaled elsewhere in the Bible. Deuteronomy, which contains the "Book of the Covenant," became sacred par excellence. It was the first book to become authoritative, and the movement toward canonicity finds in it its fons et origo.

Later the two epics of the south and the north, already amalgamated into one (JE), were combined with it, and later still the priestly history and law provided the general framework for the whole mass of tradition. The result was the first major division of the canon of the Torah. The Former Prophets (Joshua, Judges, Samuel, Kings) and the Latter Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve) received canonical status and authority in due time, probably under the stress of the crisis of the Maccabean period, and finally, in A.D. 90, at the famous Council of Jamnia, the third section of the Writings or Ketubim completed the Old Testament canon.

Life Under the Law. The law gave form and structure to life. To the constant query, "What must we do?" the reply came in terms of the revealed Torah. The large mass of legislation which goes under the name of the Priestly Code is in reality a codification of material that is in many instances very ancient. It was the ideal of the legalist that the whole of life should conform to the divine statutes. There is not much evidence in the Old Testament that it was a grievous burden. Quite the contrary! The book of Psalms is an eloquent witness to what the law meant to the pious Israelite (Pss. 1; 19; 119). The Torah was more than a mass of legal precepts. It was teaching and it was susceptible of vastly extended elaboration and interpretation.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

A Holy People. The central command for Israel was often expressed in terms of the Holiness Code (Lev. 17-26): "Be holy even as I am holy." Deuteronomy and Ezekiel had stressed the peculiar relation of holiness that existed between the holy God and the holy people, and in the Holiness Code we have a superb expression of what this holiness involved, both for the body and for the soul. Israel's uniqueness was expressed in her holiness as a people.

Particularism and Universalism. One of the strange phenomena of the Old Testament is that particularism and universalism often exist together, as in Deuteronomy and Second Isaiah. The recognition that there was but one God, even one covenant God, for all peoples, did not necessarily imply the forfeiture of the uniqueness of Israel. On the other hand, we do find such narrowly nationalistic books as Esther, and such catholic and warmhearted and compassionate books as Jonah and Ruth. It was of supreme importance for the religious life of the world that Israel did not easily capitulate her uniqueness and evanesce into an indiscriminating universalism. Indeed, universalism gains its force and relevance only by appealing to the so-called particularistic categories by which Israel construed her covenant life.

Life After Death. There are not a few adumbrations of life after death. To be sure, there was the abode in Sheol, but it was not a significant existence, not one to look forward to. Only Isa. 26:19 and Dan. 12:2 present us with clear statements, and in both of these we have resurrection of the body. The Old Testament knows nothing, of course, of immortality of the soul. But to state the case so is to state it too simply, for again and again we stand at the borderline of a personal survival in which man enters into fuller fellowship with God.

Expectation and Hope. The primary orientation of the Old Testament as a whole is toward the future, not toward the past. To be sure, the experience of the past is invoked again and again, but the very nature of biblical thinking, whether in the form of story and history or in the nature of the bonds of election and covenant, was such that men looked forward to an outcome or issue of the dilemma and uncertainties of the present. In times of stress this expectation grew very strong (cf. Isa. 8:17; Hab. 2:1-4). Isa. 40:28-31 puts an emphasis on waiting in a context which is all embracing. The psalmists (e.g., Pss. 25:3, 5, 21; 27:14; 37:34; 39:7; 42:6; 69:6; 130:5-7) sense in the inner life of devotion the profound reality of the life of faith which anticipates the coming of the dawn of a great redemption. The supreme expectation for Christians is of course the messianic. It is essential to distinguish, however, the messianic age and the messiah. That is, more often than not the future period of felicity is without the messiah. Moreover, it must be borne in mind that the messiah, in many passages, is not the kind of deliverer which appears in the New Testament. Yet when every reservation has been made, we have such messianic passages as Isa. 9:1-6; 11:1-9; 32:1 ff.; Mic. 5:2-5a, and perhaps some of the psalms. The messianic hope is part of Israel's great expectations which made of her increasingly, at least among remnants, the waiting people.

B. Second Isaiah.—The sequence of poems which appear in Isa. 40-55 represents the supreme contribution of the Hebrew mind to the religious history of the world. The poet, like his prophetic predecessors, has appropriated within him the nature of the times in which he lives. He stands at the turning point of world history, between two ages, at the point which Toynbee describes as "the end of the Syriac Time of Troubles." The period of internationalism which began with the death of Ashurbanipal comes to its focus in his time, and Second Isaiah stands in lineal succession to the writers of Deuteronomy, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel. Yet there is also a sovereign independence from them.

The thought of the prophet is eschatological. The end of Israel's historical "warfare" has come. "The glory of the Lord shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together" (40:5). A new exodus, greater than the first, will usher in the kingdom of God (40:10; 52:7-10). Zion, the herald of the gospel, is to proclaim to all the world,

Behold your God,
Behold the Lord Yahweh comes in power
And his arm shall rule for him,
Behold his reward is with him (40:10).

Reflection upon the "end" prompts the prophet to turn to the various dynamic beginnings in which Israel's life was enshrined: the Exodus, the sojourn in the desert, the promise to Abraham, the waters of Noah, the creation of the world. What is happening in Cyrus' meteoric career is to be understood in the light of these seminal moments of the past.

The conception of the word of the Lord assumes new dimensions and forms in Second Isaiah. On the one hand, it must be understood in the light of the whole conception of the word in biblical thought,⁷¹ with all its dynamic associations; but on the other, it must be understood as the eschatological word. "The word of our God shall stand for ever" (40:8).

⁷¹ Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, I-II, pp. 167-68 et passim.

It has a power and reality like the creation (45:18-19). The servant knows his unique character because Yahweh's words have been whispered in his ear. The oracular formula, "Thus saith the Lord," nearly always appears in relation to such categories as creation, redemption, election, sovereignty. It has a universal range. Event and word belong together, but for our prophet the event and the word are eschatological. God accomplishes his purpose in the word (55:10-11).

The thought of imminent redemption is matched by God's creation of the world. But creation never stands by itself. It stands in relation to other ideas and gains its significance by this association. God's creation is described as a source of comfort for Israel (40:27-31). Behind and within the world of history stands the Creator (40:15, 17, 23-24, 29-31). Moreover, creation is related to eternity: "Yahweh is an everlasting God, Creator of the ends of the earth" (40:28). He is incomparable. The idols are as nothing before him, like chaff which the wind drives away. The prophet's vision of God is so intense that he spares no words to denounce the making of all representations (40:18-20; 41:6-7; 44:9-20). Between creation and redemption lies the whole span of history which gains its meaning from the life of Israel (cf. 41:1-42:4). The nations cannot reply to historical questions like the coming of Cyrus, but Israel has a unique history beginning with the call of Abraham and her election and all the sacred events from that time in which Yahweh was guiding the destinies of his people (41:8-10; 51:1-2). Yahweh is Israel's King, and he is about to appear as King before all the nations of the world (52:7-10). He is Israel's Holy One. He has fashioned her from the womb to be his servant. He has redeemed, called, chosen her, revealed himself to her, and entered into covenant relation with her. He is the only God, a thought which the prophet never wearies of repeating. But his monotheism always stands in relation to other ideas like creation, history, redemption, eternity, and so forth, and never appears as an independent generalization. Second Isaiah is profoundly convinced that the meaning of history—of past, present, and future—is seen in the purpose of God, a purpose which he interprets and elaborates in the concrete terms of Israel's sacred history and the imminent eschaton.

The thought of the prophet is both universal and particular. Yahweh is God of all the earth, Lord of history and of nature, but he is also the covenant God of Israel. His redemption is not confined to his own people. All nations are to be included within the covenant relation (ch. 55). The redemption does not come as a result of Israel's merits, for her persistent blindness and infidelity deserve only judgment. Israel's great suffering (40:2) is not sufficient to bring about the redemption. Rather, God works for his own sake (43:25; 48:9, 11). The time of his coming to usher in his kingdom is a time of forgiveness (43:25; 44:22; 54:8-10); it is the inauguration of the new covenant.

Throughout the poems there appears the figure of the servant of the Lord. While many scholars follow Duhm in separating the passages 42:1-4; 49:1-6; 50:4-9; 52:13-53:12 from the rest of the poems, the literary relationships of these passages are so intimate with the rest that it is precarious to do so. But who is this servant? A decisive answer is impossible, but the balance of the evidence probably favors Israel rather than an individual. Wheeler Robinson's discussion of the idea of corporate personality in the Old Testament helps to make this view plausible.⁷² But more important than the identity of the servant is his task and mission. Over all the poems stands the divine asseveration, "Thou art my servant." These words must be read in the light of the whole of the sacred tradition, as is true of the prophet's whole eschatology. Israel was fashioned in the womb to be Yahweh's, she was called and chosen to be servant. She has been endowed with the charism of the Spirit to perform her unique task of bringing judgment to the nations. She is appointed to be God's witness, that men may know and believe and understand that he is the one God (43:10-12; 44:8). She is the light of the nations so that God's salvation may reach to the ends of the earth (44:6). Through her all the nations of the world will be forgiven and redeemed. Through her the covenant will be mediated to all men. But above all, the servant is a vicarious sufferer for the transgressions of the nations. The orthodox view was that men suffered for their own sins: "we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God" (53:4). But it was God's purpose that he should be so afflicted. By the servant's suffering the nations were healed. He bore the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors. He goes to his death like a criminal (so the text seems to read). Yet dominating the whole of this supreme passage is the vindication and exaltation of the servant.

The history of Israel does not suffice to account for this description.⁷³ Israel is present surely, but there is more than Israel here. The portrait is eschatological and must so be understood. It is flung into the future. A shroud of the unknown hangs over the passage, in the manner of many other eschatological passages. Many elements have gone to its making, both historical and mythological. It must not be read by itself, but in the light of the whole of the sacred tradition. It was destined to stir the minds of the prophet's successors, in the Old Testament and in the intertestamental literature. In the gospels the servant passages appear in contexts of central and decisive importance, and in the early church at least, if not in the thought of Jesus himself, our Lord is identified with him.

⁷² H. Wheeler Robinson, "The Hebrew Conception of Corporate Personality," Werden und Wesen des Alten Testaments, ed. Paul Volz, pp. 49-62.

⁷³ H. H. Rowley, The Re-Discovery of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1946), pp. 198 ff.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

VIII. Postexilic Judaism (538—ca. 150 B.C.)

A. The Priestly Edition of the Pentateuch.—

The exilic and postexilic periods of Israel's religious history reproduced the ancient traditions associated with the patriarchs and Moses in a fashion corresponding to the interests and point of view of the emerging of Judaism. The Yahwist epic was the precipitate of the nationalism of the united monarchy; the Elohist epic assumed written form during the great reign of Jeroboam II; and the Deuteronomic discourses and regulations were the expression in part of the national revival under Josiah. Each had its distinct point of view, but in all of them the prophetic impetus was primary, although in Deuteronomy it was qualified by concern for a legitimate and proper cult. The priestly historians and lawgivers (P) sought to give form and structure to the tradition. For this purpose they gathered together many ancient sources which had not yet found a place in J or E or D, some of them doubtless in already codified form. In this they reflected the point of view of the Judaism of the Persian period (538-333 B.C.). They were the custodians, teachers, and learned experts of Israel's religious heritage. It was they, more than any other group, who were responsible for preserving and perpetuating the tradition. But the nature of the times required a formulation of the tradition which would set forth the faith of Israel more succinctly and clearly, and which would also describe what the content of the revelation was and what ought to be believed. A theological work was required in which the central institutions of Israel would be given adequate grounding, the law produced in ordered fashion, the period of the beginnings articulated into periods, and the significance of the fathers properly understood. The result was priestly writing. Instead of the vivid stories which embodied the interior meaning of prophetic faith, we have priestly teaching; instead of the intimate psychological portraiture of the Yahwist, we have individuals whose meaning for religion is their connection with institutions like the prohibition of blood (Gen. 9:1-7) and circumcision (Gen. 17:9-14); instead of a dramatic account of conflict and resolution, we have a fixed scheme into which are fitted in predestined fashion both history and human personality. History is subordinated to priestly faith and belief.

The creation of the world culminates in the institution of the sabbath. The prohibition of blood follows the Deluge. Circumcision began with Abraham, the Hebrew progenitor. The period of primeval beginnings and of the patriarchs is prologue to the appearance of Moses and the institution of the theocracy. In this theocracy the whole life of Israel is regulated. The cultic regulations are enumerated in ordered fashion. Service at the sanctuary is the only valid worship. The meaning of holiness is interpreted in the conduct of life, above all, of course, in the cult. Clean and unclean are sharply separated. Always the priests attempt to order and regulate life in fixed patterns. This is clearly seen not only in the way the priestly narratives are written (indeed, there is little narrative) but also in the self-consciousness of the chronological data, in the extensive genealogies, in the division of the pre-Mosaic traditions into fixed molds, in the succession of covenants, and in the rigid care to center everything in the theocracy.

The priestly source was added to JED and constituted the framework for the whole. The result was exceedingly impressive. The grandiose perspectives of the priestly writers; the great sense of structure and form, doubtless influenced by the struggle for maintaining the "purity" of Judaism in the presence of Persian power; the subordination of the flux and fluidity of history; and the elimination of the vivid personal qualities of the patriarchs in order that God might thereby be exalted—these features made the priestly source a pre-eminently suitable means for gathering the vast diversity, complexity, and heterogeneity of the literary materials into a work of colossal amplitude and theological significance. The redactors who were responsible for the fusion of the sources into an ordered whole were men of genius, men guided and directed of God. They saw profoundly into the needs of their times. Judaism demanded such an imposing edifice of revelation, and succeeding centuries have amply vindicated their work by the place that the Torah has assumed in the subsequent development of the religion. The opening account of the Creation (Gen. 1:1-2:4a), a liturgy of surpassing dignity and elevation, even of sublimity, was a fit introduction to the complete work. For the modern student the sources must be recognized, studied, and pondered. But his task is not complete until the Pentateuch is seen and read as a whole, until it is understood in the spirit of those who fashioned it into one. For these great compilers and editors and theologians deserve a place in the development of Judaism which may surpass even that of their great predecessors. Indeed, when the Pentateuch is seen in its diversity and its unity, we have before us one of the loftiest achievements of the human race, and for faith, a holy Scripture; it is a history of Israel's religion; it is the Torah of Israel, the revelation of God.

B. The Religion of the Psalms.—In the book of Psalms we meet Israel at worship. Without it we should have a one-sided view of Israel's religious life. To be sure, the prophetic and historical literature gives us more than a glimpse of the temple and the practices of the cult, but in the Psalter we are taken within the sacred precincts of the sanctuary itself to listen to Israel's hymns, laments, and thanksgivings.

Ancient Israel was endowed with the gift of music, both vocal and instrumental. The Psalter witnesses to the place that music served in her worship. The last psalm, for example, is a tumultuous finale of exultant praise, but it is more than that. It is a superb expression of the musical activities of the worshipping community. When the Babylonian captors demanded of the exiles, "Sing us one of the songs of Zion" (137:3), they were calling upon them to express themselves in their wonted fashion. For singing was more typical of the average Israelite than the prophetic gift and, together with narration, constituted a most natural response to God's goodness and grace.

The Psalter is a book of great variety. It comes from many different authors and many different occasions. Various literary types appear throughout the collection: hymns, prayers, songs of thanksgiving, laments, blessings and curses, royal psalms, and others. The streams of prophecy, law, wisdom, history, reflection on nature, and mythology meet in the Psalter. More important is the fact that most of the psalms are liturgical and find their life situation in the part that they play in the active cult. It is difficult to assign a precise date to most, if not all, of the psalms, but it has become possible to describe something of their place in the rituals of the Jewish church.

The uniqueness of the Psalter as devotional literature must not obscure its affinities with other literatures, however. Many of the poems remind one of the Babylonian penitential and other hymns.⁷⁴ Others recall the Egyptian songs

⁷⁴ G. R. Driver, "The Psalms in the Light of Babylonian Research," in The Psalmists, ed. D. C. Simpson (London: Oxford University Press, 1926), pp. 109-75. Driver comes to a negative conclusion as to the influence of thanksgiving.⁷⁵ More important, however, is the kinship of many of the psalms with the Ugaritic materials.⁷⁶ Among the most important of these are Pss. 18; 29; 45; 68; 78; 89; and the "enthronement hymns" (47; 93; 95-100).

The Psalter throbs with the worshiper's passionate devotion to the temple, a devotion even more intense than that to the law. There he came to "seek Yahweh's face," to dwell in the tabernacles of the Most High. He called upon the gates to lift up their heads that the King of glory might come in (24:7, 9) to join the procession to the altar. His soul longed, even fainted, for the courts of Yahweh. With jubilation he joined the throng of those who went to the house of God. His one consuming desire was that he might "dwell in the house of Yahweh all the days of [his] life, to behold the beauty of Yahweh, and to inquire in his temple" (27:4). In the offering of sacrifices and in participation in the liturgical responses he found comfort and joy. Through the ministrations of the priests, and alone also, he could unburden himself of his weight of sorrow, trouble, and guilt.

The presence of God was an intense reality in the temple, and the experience was infinitely deepened by the character of Israel's God. For Yahweh was personal. He entered into relationship with those who called upon him. He was one whose will and purpose were decisive for human life. His compassion, kindness, devotion, covenant-faithfulness, justice, goodness, and truth were available to all who called upon him in sincerity. The nearness and reality of God's presence and personality are set forth in numerous anthropomorphic and anthropopathic expressions. God remembers and forgets, chides and rewards, searches the heart, ascends his royal throne, sees with his eyes, hears with his ears, calls with his voice, and loves his children. He is judge, king, keeper, shepherd, and redeemer. In all these ways and in many others God is near to those who seek him with their whole heart. Yet it is characteristically within the covenant bond that the psalmist calls upon his God, and within this bond the covenant God answers (25:10, 14; 50:16; 74:20; 78:10, 37; 89:3, 28, 34; 103:18; 105:8; 106:45; 111:5, 9). The Psalter is pre-eminently a covenant book.

We should not expect much stress on monotheism in a devotional literature of this kind, of the Babylonian poems on the Psalter. See also Geo. Widengren, The Accadian and Hebrew Psalms of Lamentation as Religious Documents (Uppsala: Almqvist & Wicksells, 1937).

⁷⁵ Hermann Gunkel, Reden und Aufsätze (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1913), "Aegyptische Danklieder," pp. 141-49.

⁷⁶ John Hastings Patton, Canaanite Parallels in the Book of Psalms (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1944).

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

and yet it does emerge more than once, though the existence of other gods is not infrequently recognized (86:8; 89:6; 95:3; 135:5). One of the most distinctive emphases is upon God as creator. Like Job and Second Isaiah, the psalmist uses the ancient myth of the chaos-dragon (74:13-16; 89:9-12; 104:6-9). The heavens recount the glory of God, and the firmament shows his handiwork. This is the mysterious secret that is passed on from day to day and night to night (19:1-4). In the face of the wonder of the heavens the psalmist feels his smallness and yet, strangely, his uniqueness also (8:1-9). By his word God creates the heavens (33:6), an idea that was susceptible of future development (Ben Sirach, Philo, John). Every event in nature, whether rain or hail or snow or storm or flood or earthquake, is the express deed of his will.

The psalmist never wearies of speaking of God's eternity. It is a favorite device of his to bring the psalm to a climax on this note. His thought is not the result of philosophical speculation. Eternity is a very great extension of time, perhaps even an infinite extension, though one must be cautious in affirming this (90:1-2; 102:11-12). "The eternity of Jahveh did not consist in His ability to transcend the category of time." "Eternity is ascribed to human actions also. The pious Israelite will praise God forever and ever, and he longs to dwell in the Lord's house "to length of days."

An even more constant note is the goodness and love of God. What goodness and love are is made known in concrete events.

The psalmist trusts in the goodness of God. "Thou art good, and doest good" (119:68). The ordinances of God are good (119:39) as are his justice and knowledge (119:66). The remarkable poem dealing with the problem of theodicy, Ps. 73, begins by affirming, "Surely God is good to Israel." "The Lord is good; his covenant faithfulness [hēsedh] is everlasting" (100:5). Ps. 136 is completely devoted to the hēsedh of God. It recounts God's wonders in creation and in history in a great succession of lines, but each is followed with the emphatic affirmation, "for his hēsedh is everlasting." Here too it would seem that covenant faithfulness is the appropriate word.

In four psalms God's revelation in nature is described (8; 19:1-6; 29; 104). They are among the most magnificent of the poems, and yet it is significant that precisely these psalms have the greatest affinities with the literature of the ancient Near East. The modern conception of nature is alien to the Psalter, as to the whole Old Testament. God reveals his majesty in the processes of nature: in the rising of the sun, the waxing and waning of the moon, and the myriad stars; in the stormy sea, the thundercloud, and in the thunderstorm. Every "natural" event occurs by his will and purpose. Most striking is the way in which nature and history are combined (78; 136).

⁷⁷ T. H. Robinson, "The God of the Psalmists," in The Psalmists, ed. D. C. Simpson, p. 37.

The history of Israel is intimately drawn into the center of the cult. In the experiences of worship and devotion the psalmists recall the wonderful works of the Lord in the past, and they are fond of recounting these events in great detail. One of the central words of the Psalter is the verb "to remember." The piety of Israel is kindled by the things that are remembered. Out of these memories Israel forges her expectations. She grounds her trust in the future in the concreteness of past covenant events.

Not only history but also prophecy influences the devotional life of Israel. The prophetic polemic against sacrifice which we have seen in Amos, Hosea, Micah, Isaiah, and Jeremiah has left its stamp on more than one psalm.

Sacrifice and offering thou dost not desire,
But thou hast given me an open ear to hear.
Burnt offering and sin offering thou hast not required;
So I said, "Lo, I come,"
For in the roll of the book it is written of me:
I delight to do thy will, O my God;
Thy law is within my heart (40:6-8).

Ps. 50:8-13 is a devotional paraphrase of Isa. 1:10-17, and Ps. 51:16-17 is brought into the inner citadel of the worshiping heart. The conditions for fellowship with God are ethical, as is illustrated by the little decalogue of Ps. 15 and the similar requirements for entrance into the sanctuary of Ps. 24:

Who may ascend into the hill of the Lord?
And who may stand in his holy place?
He who has clean hands and a pure heart,
And does not lift up his soul to what is false (24:3-4).

The law also makes its appearance in the Psalter, though not frequently. This is remarkable in view of the fact that so many of the psalms are believed to have been composed in the time when legalism was regnant in Israel. Moreover, we should expect the Torah to be more fully represented in the sanctuary. But there are not many psalms in praise of the law (1; 19:7-14; 119).

Nature, history, prophecy, and law, all form part of the texture of Israel's worship. Still another force was the thinking of the Deuteronomist. That God punished sin and rewarded righteousness was the foundation of Israel's religious ethic. So when affliction and sorrow and pain came, when the unjust persecutor got the better of his victim, when the dark spells of uncanny forces laid the sufferer low on his death bed, the mind endured tortures deeper than any physical pain. Many a cry breaks forth out of the night of despair. The large number of such psalms illustrates how real this problem was, as real as it was to Habakkuk and Jeremiah and Job. In Ps. 73, the greatest of all the psalms on this subject, a lonely man reveals the depth and the stress of the problem which tortures him, yet he finally comes to think and live by his faith and his awareness of the presence and fellowship of God:

Whom have I in heaven but thee?
Having thee, I desire naught else on earth;
Though my flesh and my heart waste away,
God is the rock of my heart and my portion forever (73:25-26).

Such an affirmation gains added force by the fact that the psalmist could not envisage the possibility of a significant personal survival beyond death. A number of the psalms seem to stand on the very frontier of this possibility, but nowhere is it stated with any absolute clarity.

The consciousness of sin is present throughout the Psalter. God is the judge of all men and all nations, and to him they are accountable. Yet the awareness of sin is seldom so deep as in Ezekiel. The most moving of the psalms which center in man's sin are the so-called penitentials (6; 32; 38; 51; 102; 130; 143). Here the awareness of sin is very deep indeed, and the psalmist sees no hope for escape from his sore dilemma except in the forgiving mercy and love of God. He sees the terrible effect that sin has in alienating man from God's presence. That is the most grievous of all his ills. And so he prays for an event from God as great within the interior recesses of the heart as the redemption from Egyptian bondage in history.

It was out of experiences such as these that the psalmist came to know the great resources of comfort and joy. When all is said and done, what remains after the psalms have been read again and again is the sense of joy and triumph and interior peace. Often such gifts of grace came after the storm and stress of pain and travail, after a night of utter darkness with no answer but the echo of a lonely cry.

Weeping may tarry for the night,
But joy comes with the morning (30:5; cf. 130:5-7).

But there is another kind of joy in the Psalter, one that appears much more consistently throughout, the joy that breaks from a heart kindled by praise. The psalms have been called "the praises of Israel." "Hallelujah, praise the Lord" rings like an exultant shout of triumph again and again. The spontaneity, exuberance, and full-throated abandon of the worshiper shows that here his deepest self is being revealed. No history of the religion of Israel is either complete or reliable which does not assign a central role to Israel's praise of her God. For to him belongs praise, and praise benefits his sanctuary. The Psalter moves in its closing poems into a magnificent crescendo, a universal and ecstatic paean of praise, "Let everything that has breath praise the Lord."

C. The Religion of the Wisdom Literature.—

The wisdom literature calls attention to the great diversity of the religious thought of ancient Israel. One and the same people produced history, prophecy, law, psalmody, didactic romance, apocalypse, and wisdom. Each of these developed in many different literary types and forms, and each continued throughout a substantial period of time. They cannot be read or understood in isolation. They represent different facets and emphases of the same fundamental mentality. More than any other mode of literary expression, the wisdom literature of Israel was intimately connected with the wisdom literatures of other peoples, above all of Egypt.⁷⁸ Yet like the nature psalms of the Psalter, which have striking affinities with extrabiblical literature, the wisdom of Israel transforms what it borrows and sets the stamp of what is peculiarly Israelite upon it.

The chief features of Israel's wisdom thought may be summarized briefly as follows:

(a) In all wisdom there is a strong emphasis upon human experience. Here the individual emerges with a clarity scarcely equaled anywhere else in the Old Testament. The many experiences and vicissitudes of ordinary everyday life are observed with close and realistic scrutiny. The sage was a keen observer of the ways of man and beast. Man bears a moral responsibility, and this is atomized in concrete and realistic detail. Family relationships such as those of a husband to his wife and a wife to her husband, of parent to child and child to parent, are reflected upon with common sense and shrewdness. The books of Proverbs and of Ben Sirach (Ecclesiasticus) are guidebooks for practical living. Observe the father's counsels to his son, for example, in Prov. 4; the warnings against the wiles of the adulteress in 6:20-7:27; the praise of the "good wife" in 31:10-31; or ⁷⁸ Paul Humbert, Recherches sur les sources égyptiennes de la littérature sapientiale d'Israël (Neuchâtel: Secrétariat de l'Université, 1929); Johannes Fichtner, Die altorientalische Weisheit in ihrer israelitisch-jüdischen Ausprägung (Giessen: A. Töpelmann, 1933); W. O. E. Oesterley, The Book of Proverbs (London: Methuen & Co., 1929; "Westminster Commentaries").

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

such illuminating passages as the following from Ecclesiasticus: 7:24; 13:3-24; 19:4-12; 25:13-26; 26:1-4, 13-18; 29:1-10, 11-13; 31:12 ff.; 38:1-15.

(b) With sagacity and morality belongs piety. "The fear of Yahweh is the instruction of wisdom" (Prov. 15:33); it is "the beginning of knowledge" (1:7) as "of wisdom" (9:10).

Every way of a man is right in his own eyes,
But the weigher of hearts is Yahweh (Prov. 21:2).

All conduct is thus brought under the surveillance of God; all human motives and intentions and desires are determined by his will. In this connection it is important to observe the close relationship of wisdom and law. Obedience to the law is Israel's first duty (Eccles. 9:15; 10:19; 32:15-24). Law and wisdom are identified (15:1; 19:20; 21:11; 34:8). The root meaning of "righteousness" (ḥēdeq) was congenial to wisdom, for righteousness meant to conform to a certain standard and norm. "To gain wisdom, keep the commandments" (Eccles. 1:26; cf. 24:23).

(c) To the persistent questions raised by the presence of suffering in human life the wisdom writers gave no single or consistent answer. Greek influence was destined to make its impress upon Israel, especially in the Hellenistic Judaism of Alexandria, just as Iranian influence was destined to alter the prophetic point of view and perspective of history. As is to be expected, the conventional view of Hebrew orthodoxy that suffering was a result of sin asserted itself in the greater part of wisdom thought: Proverbs, Ben Sirach, Koheleth (Ecclesiastes), the speeches of the friends of Job, and elsewhere. With this view the writer of the book of Job could not rest content. The dialogue as a whole culminates in the remarkable speeches of Yahweh out of the whirlwind, and Job responds to the vast mystery of natural existence which those speeches reveal:

I had heard of thee by the hearing of the ear,
But now mine eye has seen thee (Job 42:5).

The problems of theodicy represent an inscrutable mystery, and Job makes his confession before God, retracts his precipitate words, and repents in dust and ashes. But there is another answer in the prologue. Here Job demonstrates that there is such a thing as disinterested religion. He vindicates God before the thrusts and taunts of Satan. Job trusts where he does not see. By his suffering he becomes a witness for God, a martyr to God's purpose and righteous rule which are hidden from him. Like the writer of Ps. 73, the poet of Job places this great affirmation of trust at the head of his writing. The scene in the heavenly council gives the context for the whole book, and it is not without significance that it ends with Job's intercession for his friends.

Koheleth cuts the Gordian knot of the problem by denying outright the moral government of the world. The final development of the problem is seen in the late book, the Wisdom of Solomon (ca. 50 B.C.), which shows much Greek influence. The writer believes that righteousness is immortal (1:15), that the souls of the righteous are in the hands of God (3:1), that the righteous shall live forever and in the Lord is their reward (5:15). There are many other elements in the book, and different points of view are not always easily harmonized. Nowhere, significantly, does the wisdom literature deal with suffering as sacrificial. The martyr witness of Job is not remote from the suffering servant of Isa. 53, but the latter is on a different level and in a much more spacious context.

(d) The nature of wisdom itself ranges all the way from simple sagacity to the wisdom of vision, which borders on apocalyptic wisdom. This latter wisdom has not infrequent affinities to the wisdom of the sages. What is most interesting, however, is the movement of wisdom from personification to hypostasis. Prov. 8:22 ff. pictures wisdom as the first of God's created works, the beginning of his deeds; wisdom is "present at the creation and serves God as his "master workman" or artificer (8:28 ff.). In Ben Sirach the personification is less universal than in Prov. 8:22 ff., and is closely related to Israel, with whom wisdom first finds rest (Eccles. 24:6-8), to the holy tabernacle on Zion (24:10), and to the law of Moses (24:23). Yet she comes forth from the mouth of the Most High, and covers the earth as a mist, fixing its throne in the cloud and compassing the circuit of heaven (24:3-5). Finally, the Wisdom of Solomon brings the development to its culmination. The central passage is Wisd. Sol. 7:22-8:1. Wisdom "pervades and penetrates all things by reason of her pureness"; she is "a clear effluence of the glory of the Almighty" (7:25), a "reflection of the everlasting light," and "the image of the goodness of God" (7:24-26).

Though being [but] one she can do all things,

And from generation to generation passing into holy souls,

She maketh men friends of God and prophets.

For nothing doth God love save him that dwelleth with wisdom. (Wisd. Sol. 7:27-28.)

D. The Religion of Apocalyptic.—The development from prophetic to apocalyptic thought was influenced to a degree by forces from without, but it does not represent an aberrant movement in Israel. On the contrary, the theology of the apocalypses may be accounted for by elements deeply embedded in prophecy itself. An examination of the prophetic books reveals a number of "apocalyptic" passages, and these cannot be always simply ascribed to later writers (cf., e.g., Mic. 1:3-4). Apocalyptic actually represented a deepening of Israel's prophetic consciousness in the light of the destruction of the nation and the somber years of suffering and tragedy which followed.

The book of Daniel is the most familiar of the apocalyptic sections of the Old Testament, but such books as Joel, Zechariah, Ezekiel, Isaiah (chs. 24-27; 34-35; etc.), contain much of the same kind of thought. The Apocrypha, and especially the pseudepigraphical writings, contain not a few apocalypses, and these should be included in any study of apocalyptic, especially for an apprehension of the meaning of some passages in the New Testament. To understand this strange literary genre it is essential to observe (a) that apocalypses stand in relation to their own historical times and reflect the conditions of crisis behind them; (b) that the imagery is not infrequently drawn from mythology and that the thought is itself often of a mythological character; (c) that Iranian influences of dualism, angelology and demonology, and so forth, as well as Hellenistic influences have left their impress upon this work; and (d) that the apocalypses are by their nature made up of a great variety of materials and must not be reduced too quickly to a collection of sources and fragments.

The major elements in apocalyptic thought may be stated briefly:

(a) God is all-wise and all-powerful. He is God of gods, Lord of lords, and King of heaven. He works great signs and wonders in the earth. He breaks through the orderliness of the natural world to bring about his will and purpose among men. In the book of Daniel the "assurance of supernatural deliverance . . . rests on the doctrine that Jehovah is the only God and that his power is irresistible."⁷⁹

(b) The time of God's coming to effect his final purpose in the world is near at hand. In this as in so many of his ideas the writer of Daniel is indebted to his prophetic predecessors. Different apocalypses construe this coming in various ways, but they are one in their conviction that it is a time in which the justice and sovereignty of God will be vindicated in history.

(c) To the supernatural world view and the belief in God's imminent parousia is to be added the theological dualism of the apocalypticists. This was stated later in a pronounced form by IV Ezra (II Esdras), "The Most High has made not one world, but two" (7:50). There are two ages, and it is the general view of these writers that one age is coming to an end and a new one is about to dawn.

(d) The book of Daniel represents the imminent coming of the kingdom of God as the shattering of the great image, which represents four pagan empires (Babylonia, Media, Persia, Greece) and by "one like the son of man," who pronounces sentence against the four beasts and inaugurates an eternal and universal rule. Both symbols represent Israel, "the people of the saints of the Most High" (Dan. 7:27). Thus we have no personal messiah in Daniel, though it is important to add that Israel is here conceived as the messianic people, performing the function of the messiah. Dan. 7:13, the central passage in question, was susceptible of future elaboration in which the idea of a personal messiah was set forth (Enoch 46:1-6; 48:2-10; II Esdras 13:3, cf. vs. 6; Mark 13:26=Matt. 24:30; Acts 7:56; Mark 14:61-62=Matt. 26:63-64).

(e) When God comes to judge the earth the righteous will receive their reward and the wicked their punishment. The nature of the judgment and the reward varies greatly. Most important here is the belief in the resurrection of the dead. Dan. 12:2-3, together with Isa. 26:19, is the locus classicus for this doctrine: "And many of those who sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. And those who are wise shall shine like the brightness of the firmament; and those who turn many to righteousness, like the stars forever and ever."

(f) History is ordered according to the divine plan. God both knows and determines the course of history. He reveals his "secrets" in visions of the end of things to his servants, the apocalyptic seers. Such representations as Dan. 2 and 7 (cf. also chs. 10-12) portray the writer's dramatic conception of history. With the deterioration of history reaching its climax in the time of Greece a new reality enters in—the kingdom of God "which shall never be destroyed" (Dan. 2:44-45).

And the kingdom, the dominion, and the greatness of the kingdoms under the whole heavens Shall be given to the people of the saints of the Most High; Their kingdom shall be an everlasting kingdom, And all kingdoms shall serve and obey them (Dan 7:27).

IX. The Function of the Cult in Israel's Religion

There is a danger within Protestantism of giving such undue emphasis to the prophetic ⁷⁹ Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., p. 774.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

religion that the worship of the sanctuary and the work of the priests are greatly obscured. Even a hurried analysis of the biblical materials will reveal that an exclusive emphasis upon prophecy distorts the meaning of the Old Testament. It is true that prophecy has a special meaning for Christians, but today we see, as we did not see for many decades, that even the prophets cannot be studied in isolation from the cult.

Foreign influences asserted themselves in the worship of the temple and the sanctuaries. The fertility interests of the Canaanite nature cult found expression in rites and rituals and even in the persons active within the cult. Like the qedhēshīm and qedhēshōth (lit., "holy ones"). In the heyday of Mesopotamian power astral elements found their way into Israel's worship. While the syncretistic forces within the cult must be recognized, it is also necessary to recognize the degree to which the cult perpetuated realities that belonged to the heart of Israel's religion. The best indication of this is the function of the cult as the repository of Israelite memory, whether the memories of the cult legends of the patriarchal period or, more strikingly, the ministrations and ministry of the prophets.

Divine revelation evokes human response. The firm basis of Old Testament faith is that God has taken the initiative in behalf of his chosen people. In the practices and rituals of the cult we observe Israel's response to Yahweh, who has already made himself known in event and word. The covenantal people seek to draw near to their covenantal God through rites and ceremonies. The cult is instituted, created, and performed by Israel, although it is under the constant direction and supervision of God. Because the cult is man's work, it is subject to the radical criticism of the word of God through the prophets.

The forms and characteristics of the cult undergo constant change in the light of new situations and new cultural environments. It cannot be understood therefore as a static reality, as a fixed phenomenon which endures throughout all time unaltered. The experience of worship is not for Israel the contemplation of the timeless, infinite Reality. The worshiper does not lose himself in mystical absorption; he does not unite himself with God so that the separation between the divine and the human is overcome. On the contrary, the man of Israel knows that he worships as a member of a particular covenantal community, whose character is stamped deep upon his soul. He understands this community in the light of the particular history which describes its life. Therefore cult and history are closely related, and the best interpretation of the former is in terms of the latter. An adequate study of the cult demands a historical description. The Mosaic cult, the cult of the time of the judges and more especially of the Israelite amphictyony whose center was the sanctuary at Shiloh, the cult of Solomon's temple, and the cult which the prophets of the eighth century observed were not identical, but each reflected in some ways its own time. Similarly, the representations of the Covenant Code (Exod. 20:23-23:19), the Deuteronomic Code (Deut. 5-26), the Holiness Code (ca. 550 B.C.), and the Priestly Code, while they have much in common, constitute different strata and formulations, though, it is important to add, not necessarily of the temporal periods to which they are customarily assigned. There is a third reason why Israel's cult cannot be understood statically. All personal and historical life is precarious, and in Israel's practice of the cult the precariousness of personal and historical living is drawn into the very center of its observance.

There was a certain distinctiveness, then, in the development of the cult in ancient Israel, but this must not be affirmed at the expense of the wide scope of community which Israel's modes of worship shared with those of neighboring peoples. In no area of Israel's religion are the affinities with the religions of other peoples more clear than in the cult. In the construction of the sanctuaries—above all, of Solomon's temple—in the observance of sacrifice and the celebration of the festivals, in the liturgies and hymns, and even in fundamental attitudes like man's view of nature, Israel had much in common with contemporary peoples.

The basic and underlying reality of the cult common to all Semitic and other peoples was the holiness of God. In the cult the holy and profane enter into relationships with one another. In his sense of "the holy" the worshiper is made aware of the presence of the "otherness" of the divine. This otherness is a present reality, but it is also incomprehensible, imponderable, and "beyond." The deity cannot be approached cavalierly or without fear. He is unapproachable, full of zeal and uncanny power. The presence of the divine means the presence of holiness. It is with holiness that the worshiper has to do, but he must know what is holy and what is not. Woe betide him who does not regard the distinction!

It is because God is holy that the cult is necessary. To enter into the presence of God one must "cleanse" himself lest the deity be offended. Therefore all sorts of ablutions, abstinences, and other apotropaic actions are necessary. In the pursuit of war, for example, the soldier must make himself ritually "clean," for war is a holy undertaking, and Yahweh, who leads the battalions, is present in the midst of the camp as "man of war." Again, certain objects have numinous qualities and associations, and they must be approached with great caution. There are holy places, holy times, holy objects, holy persons, and holy actions or observances. For Israel, Yahweh's name and his glory are all-holy. To call upon the name of the Lord is to invoke the holy God, and to worship in the temple where his glory dwells is to enter into the reality of his holiness.

A. Holy Places.—God is present where he has revealed himself. To such places the Israelite may repair either in pilgrimage or indeed in any time of need. Many theophanies are described in the Old Testament: at Hebron, where Yahweh appeared to Abraham (Gen. 18 [J]); at Bethel, where he appeared to Jacob-Israel in a dream (Gen. 28:10-22 [JE]), at Shechem, where he appeared to both patriarchs (Gen. 12:6-7 [J]; 33:18-20 [J]), at Gilgal, where he appeared to Joshua (Josh. 5:13-15); and at other places. The holiness of the sacred place is strongly emphasized in the theophany granted to Moses: "Do not come near, take your shoes from your feet, for the place on which you are standing is holy ground" (Exod. 3:5). Centuries later Elijah makes a pilgrimage to Horeb to receive another theophany. Finally, Jerusalem becomes a sanctuary by the theophany at the floor of Araunah the Jebusite (II Sam. 24:16b-17a), and David makes it not only his political capital but also the central sacred place of his kingdom.

It is clear from the Genesis accounts that the patriarchs appropriated the Canaanite shrines. Likewise Canaanite legends and traditions were adopted and transformed according to the nature of "the god of the fathers." Before the time of the Deuteronomic reformation in 621 B.C., no protest is raised against worship at the high places (bāmōth). On the contrary, in a very early source God says to Moses: "At every place [sanctuary] where I record my name I will come to you and bless you" (Exod. 20:24). There is no doubt that these country sanctuaries were the seats of extensive syncretism with the Canaanite fertility cults. Here Baal, the high god of the Canaanites, was worshiped along with Yahweh, or indeed identified with him. The sanctuary at Bethel obviously carried this syncretism to an advanced stage.

With the reformation of 621 B.C. the tide was stemmed for a time. In the Deuteronomic Code Yahweh is to be worshiped at a single sanctuary, the one at Jerusalem, and the high places, with their ancient Canaanite associations and their current Canaanite practices and rituals, are to be destroyed. Such debased practices as sacred prostitution are to be wiped out, and the cult is to be under the supervision of the custodians and officials of the Jerusalem temple, itself the creation of a radical syncretizing process.

The typical shrine had an altar, a maḥṣēbhāh or sacred stone, and an Asherah, in all likelihood the image of the goddess by that name, as we know from the Ugaritic inscriptions.⁸⁰ The altar is older than the "house of God," which can be authenticated only after the Conquest (Exod. 23:19; 34:26). Jacob's anointing of the maḥṣēbhāh at Bethel with oil (Gen. 28:17 ff. [E]) and perhaps also at Shechem (Gen. 33:20 [E]) suggests that it served the function of an altar. In the story of Gideon and in the account of Samson's mother (Judg. 6:19-22; 13:19-20) we have an extremely primitive offering of a sacrifice upon a rock. This mode of offering has been confirmed archaeologically. The altar, as the Hebrew word makes clear, was used for the slaughter of animal sacrifices. Notable among all the altars mentioned in the Old Testament, including those in Jerusalem, was the great rock which served as the altar in Solomon's temple. The altar was the place par excellence where Yahweh had caused his name to be remembered. Theophanies are characteristically memorialized by the erection of the altar, even when Genesis makes no mention of any sacrifice being offered on them.

B. Holy Objects.—David sought to center the religious loyalties of the tribes by transporting the various cultic symbols to the city of Jerusalem. Abiathar, of the tribe of Benjamin, came to the city with the divining ephod; Levi's serpent was sent for, and the tent of meeting was lodged within the City of David. Chief among all the symbols, however, was the ancient ark of Yahweh Sabaoth. Originally it was a nomadic shrine which represented the presence of Yahweh in the midst of Israel. It was associated with the desert wandering (Num. 10:35-36), and in the period of the Conquest it was lodged for a considerable period in the central sanctuary of the Israelite amphictyony at Shiloh. According to Josh. 6 it had wrought great wonders in connection with the conquest of Jericho. But what was the nature of this shrine? Was it a palladium of war? If so, how was it conceived? A positive answer is impossible. We cannot be certain, for example, what its contents were, but according to Deut. 10:1-5, two tables of stone inscribed with the Decalogue were placed within it. The suggestion of Martin Dibelius⁸¹ that it was a portable shrine without any image of the deity is the one that commends itself as most likely. Yet Yahweh's presence and power were associated with it in a peculiarly intense fashion, as many accounts bear witness. When the Israelites carry the ark into battle, the Philistines cry that their God has come against them. When the ark is captured, the Philistine cities are stricken with a deadly pestilence, and when the report of its capture reaches the wife of Phineas, she cries out in her death throes, "The glory [kābhōdh] is departed from Israel." Later when David seeks to convey it to Jerusalem, Uzzah is struck dead by touching it. At the building of the temple, Solomon places the portable ark in the holy of holies. It is possible, as Arnold has attempted to show, that there were a number of arks in ancient Israel for various sanctuaries.⁸²

⁸⁰ William L. Reed, The Asherah in the Old Testament (Fort Worth: Texas Christian University Press, 1949).

⁸¹ Die Lade Jahwes (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1906).

C. Holy Times and Seasons.—God reveals himself at particular times as well as at special places. From the Canaanites Israel took over three great agricultural festivals: the feast of Unleavened Bread (maççōth), the feast of Harvest (qāçîr), and the feast of Ingathering (āsîph or teqûphâh; Exod. 23:14-17 [E]; 34:18, 22-23 [J]). The first of these was celebrated at the beginning of the barley harvest. Unleavened cakes were used so that the produce of the new year might be eaten with fresh leaven. First fruits were brought forward, and the priest waved a sheaf of these toward and away from the altar, a symbol of the gift to Yahweh, the giver of the grain, and the acceptance from him again of "that sustenance of earth which He had caused to grow."⁸³ The feast of Harvest or of Weeks was celebrated seven weeks later when the barley harvest was over and the wheat harvest began. During the feast of Ingathering the Israelites lived in booths for seven days (Lev. 23:39-43). This festival was the great day of thanksgiving, when the fruits of the year had been gathered and especially the harvest of the vineyards. It was also the time of the celebration of the New Year festival. That this latter festival profoundly influenced Israel's life is quite certain. Under the inspiration of Sigmond Mowinckel, many scholars find the origin of eschatology in a celebration of the enthronement of Yahweh. Appeal is made to the parallel celebration of the Babylonian New Year or akitu festival. A number of scholars have discovered the basic patterns of the latter within ⁸² Ephod and Ark. W. C. Graham and H. G. May (Culture and Conscience [Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1936], pp. 261-67; cf. also H. G. May, "The Ark—A Miniature Temple," American Journal of Semitic Languages and Literature, LII [1936], 215-34) hold that the ark probably existed in the form of a miniature temple, such as the one discovered at Megiddo, and that such miniature temples were present in other sanctuaries.

⁸³ Norman H. Snith, "Worship," in Record and Revelation, ed. H. Wheeler Robinson (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1938), p. 259.

the Old Testament, above all in the so-called enthronement psalms (47; 93; 95-99). It is very doubtful whether the akitu festival had the degree of influence that Mowinckel claims for it, and we cannot even be certain that there ever was such an enthronement festival in Israel, but such psalms as Ps. 47 certainly seem to suggest something of the sort. The most that can be said, however, is that the imagery and language of these psalms has been influenced by the patterns of thought associated with the celebration of the New Year. The references to creation, the chaos-dragon myth, the primeval combat of Yahweh, and the enthronement of the king are all described with great vividness. The use of Ps. 47 in the modern celebration of the feast of Tabernacles and of the New Year supports the view.

Our sources for the Passover are relatively late, the earliest authentic witness appearing in the late seventh century. But while the most extended descriptions occur in the priestly source (Exod. 12:1-20, 43-49), there is no reason to question the essential accuracy of its representations. What the nature of the original festival was we do not know; many theories have been proposed.⁸⁴ A common view and one that seems most plausible is that it was the day on which the first born of the flock was sacrificed. Later it became associated with the Exodus and the last night of Israel's sojourn in Egypt when the first born of the Egyptians were slain but the destroying angel passed over the homes of the Israelites on the lintels of whose doorposts had been placed the prophylactic blood. The outstanding features of the festival are threefold: (a) the sacrifice of a sheep or goat, a sacrificial meal celebrated in the homes of the participants; (b) a night celebration between sunset and sunrise; and (c) the application of the blood of the animal on the doorposts. The original meaning of the details of the celebration is obscure. In Deuteronomy the Passover is most clearly associated with the Exodus from Egypt, and this is the association which it has in most of the subsequent history. As such it relates to the greatest of all the events of Israel's history. It was a memorial of the night of Israel's redemption from bondage. Christian faith has made its own use of the Passover and refers it to the death of Christ "our Passover." One feature of these festivals needs special attention: all of them were originally connected with the phenomena of nature and fertility, but eventually they were transformed into memorials of historical events.

The observance of the sabbath goes back to an early time. Its connection with the new moon (Amos 8:5) and its weekly observance suggest that it was a lunar day. According to early accounts (II Kings 4:23; Amos 8:5; Hos. 2:11), it is a holy day. Deuteronomy appeals to humanitarian grounds for its observance, calling to mind the days of Israel's slavery in Egypt and the need for rest for every person in Israel, whether native or resident alien, and for domestic animals also. The E Decalogue has been expanded in the light of Gen. 1. Here the reason is given in terms of God's own sabbath rest. In the exilic and postexilic period, and in later Judaism, the sabbath became one of the chief institutions of Israel. With circumcision it became a distinctive mark of Judaism.

⁸⁴ Lods, Israel from Its Beginnings to Middle of Eighth Century, p. 291, n. 4.

The day of Atonement is described in detail in Lev. 16. For Judaism it became the most important of all holy seasons. It expressed a profound awareness of sin and a longing for restoration to holiness and cleanness. Through the mediation of the high priest, their representative, the Jews seek to approach their holy God. On this day the high priest, after changing his usual garb and going through appropriate ablutions, enters into the holy of holies. He there makes atonement for all Israel (Lev. 16:17). The word rendered "atone" (kipper) properly means here "to wipe away" in the sense of expiation.⁸⁵ The central concern of the cult with the holiness of God and man's relation to this holiness here reaches its culmination. The tragedy of 586 and the following decades greatly deepened Israel's sense of guilt (Ezekiel, Lamentations, Psalms, Zechariah) so that restoration to holiness became the supreme quest of her cultic life. In the day of Atonement unholy Israel is made holy.

D. Holy Acts.—To the fundamental question of the cultic community, "How shall I come before God?" (Mic. 6:6) Israel, like other ancient peoples, had a ready reply: "Through sacrificial gifts." By the offering of sacrifices the cleavage between the holy and unholy was overcome. From the world of the profane, man entered the area of "the holy." Sacrifice is the holy act. As a holy act it possessed the numinous and mysterious and sacramental associations of all holiness. As the conception of holiness undergoes development in the history of Israel's religion, so the conceptions of sacrifice change in different periods. There are many varieties of sacrifice, and to the varieties correspond different situations and occasions and different attitudes and points of view. In times of relative peace and prosperity the mood and mode of sacrifice are quite different from those in times of distress and darkness. Thus during the Exile and in postexilic times certain sacrifices receive a greater prominence and emphasis than theretofore. The wide diversity of sacrifice illustrates both the fluidity and the large scope of Israel's cultic life. Yet it is difficult to write a history of sacrifice. The discovery of the Ugaritic materials, which mention nearly all of the Old Testament sacrifices, warns us against a too simple construction of Israel's cult.⁸⁶ The Old Testament gives its most ample descriptions of sacrifice in the Priestly Code. Much of this material is drawn from ancient ordinances and regulations, but it also reflects the conditions of its own time (ca. 550-450 B.C.). On the other hand, it is possible to exaggerate these difficulties, for the Bible contains numerous illuminating accounts of sacrificial practice outside the priestly documents. In all of them, however, it is with the conception of holiness that we have to do. As has already been said, sacrifice constituted the major response to the major question of the worshiper in connection with his approach to God. Three basic elements entered into this response: (a) communion, (b) gift, and (c) impartation of life and vitality. The opposition between the sacred and the profane was broken by the act of communion. The alienation between worshiper and the divine was overcome through gifts of propitiation and expiation. The need for strength and vitality and blessing was satisfied by the infusion of fresh life in the soul of the devotee.

Israel was influenced by her Canaanite (Hebrew) forebears in her sacrificial offerings and rituals, but here, as elsewhere, she transformed what she borrowed according to the presuppositions and history of her covenantal life with Yahweh. Sacrifice was a covenantal act, and through it the covenantal bond was restored (Ps. 50:5). It is not sufficient merely to record the various kinds of sacrifice, for the concrete meaning of the sacrifice may thereby be obscured. The sacrifice must be apprehended in its situation and context, and these may be of an extremely great diversity. Here again history enters deeply into the cult, as is shown, for example, by the celebration of the festivals or by the offering of sacrifices in times of social crisis. With this in mind we may refer to the more important sacrifices which appear in the pages of the Old Testament.

The Burnt Offering (ôlâh): This sacrifice is ⁸⁶ René Dussaud, Les origines cananéennes du sacrifice israélite (Paris: Ernest Leroux, 1921); Theodor H. Gaster, "The Service of the Sanctuary: a Study of Hebrew Survivals," Mélanges syriens (Paris: P. Geuthner, 1939), II, 577-82. Gaster's estimate of the nature of the influence is, however, well taken: "The Israelites did not borrow their institutions on Canaanite soil from the inhabitants of the country, but . . . both inherited them independently from that common Hebrew stock from which they were alike descended" (p. 578).

⁸⁵ George Buchanan Gray, Sacrifice in the Old Testament (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1925), pp. 67 ff.

described in detail in Lev. 1 (P). It is an animal offering, whether ox, sheep, or goat, and it must be a male. The Yahwist describes Noah's burnt offering after the Flood. Through it the curse of God on the soil was expiated, his anger appeased (Gen. 8:20-22).

The Tribute or Gift Offering (minhāh): In early times the word could apply to an offering of any kind. Cain and Abel both offer a minhāh to Yahweh, one of agricultural produce, the other of an animal. As late as Malachi it is still used in this general sense (Mal. 1:10-11, 13). On the other hand, it is often considered as a cereal offering, invariably so in P. Burnt offering and tribute offering are also used together in distinction from each other (II Kings 16:12 ff.; Amos 5:22; Isa. 1:13). In I Kings 18:29, 36 the word is used in connection with the evening oblation of Elijah on Mount Carmel, more often, however, with the morning offering. It is also used in connection with both the morning and the evening oblation (Exod. 29:41; Num. 28:8 [P]; I Kings 18:29, 36).

Slaughter Sacrifice (zēbhah): This is the most common term for sacrifice in the Old Testament; the word for altar (mizbēah) has the same root. The rite consisted of consuming the flesh of the victim in which the deity was believed to participate by receiving the blood and fat pieces. Zēbhah is the name applied to all the sacrifices eaten at the festivals. It is used, together with burnt offerings, of the covenant sacrifice at Sinai (Exod. 24:5 [E]), of the Passover (Exod. 34:25 [JE]), of the annual sacrifice (I Sam. 20:29), in connection with thank offerings (Lev. 7:13; Ps. 107:22). In the rituals of the Holiness Code and the priestly writer they are defined by the word shelāmim (Lev. 3; 7:28 ff.), that is, complete sacrifice. With this sacrifice are associated three other kinds of offerings: the thank offering (tōdhāh), which was an expression of thankfulness for God's goodness and help (Amos 4:5; Lev. 22:18; Pss. 50:14, 23; 116:17); the freewill or voluntary offering (nedhābhāh), which included gifts to the sanctuary (Exod. 35:27-29 [P]) and the sacrifices for festival meals at the feasts (Deut. 16:10; Ezra 3:5); and the vow (nedher), which was an offering that had been promised in recognition of the fulfillment of a request.

Sin Offering (hattāth) and Guilt Offering ('āshām): Both are animal offerings, though not exclusively so, for in II Kings 12:4-5 they are used of a payment of money to the priests. The sin offering is holy. It was especially important in postexilic times, though it was offered before the Exile also. Like so many of the words for sacrifice, it appears in the Ugaritic inscriptions. Related to the sin offering is the guilt or trespass offering. The chief significance was restitution or compensation. The offering was customarily a ram, together with restitution and a penalty of one fifth its value. The blood and fat pieces were for the altar, the skin and flesh for the priests. Although the term appears relatively late in the Bible (Ezek. 40:39 and later), its origin is doubtless much earlier. It appears in the Ugaritic texts and is there differentiated from the sin offering. In Second Isaiah the servant of the Lord offers himself as an 'āshām in substitution for the sins of the nations (Isa. 53:10).

Many other kinds of sacrifices were offered in ancient Israel. They were usually occasions of rejoicing, sometimes in the mood of festal celebration, at other times in the mood of reconciliation and peace. In other situations they were the expression of a stricken conscience. For an appreciation of their significance one must read not only the detailed provisions of the Priestly Code and the references in Chronicles, but also the earlier historical passages and, above all, the Psalter. Many of the liturgies of the book of Psalms are doubtless to be understood in connection with sacrificial offerings of the temple.

E. Holy Persons.—In modern times the importance and function of the priesthood in Israel have been somewhat obscured, especially by the modern recognition of the great importance of the prophets. But the Old Testament contains almost as much "priestly" literature as prophetic, and we are only now coming to grasp something of the stature of the priest as theologian.⁸⁷ The priest is the holy person through whom the Israelite seeks to approach God in the cult. He is "set apart" to serve as the representative of the people before God. He stands in peculiar relation to the institutional side of Israel's religion. He remembers the traditions of the past, preserves their continuity with the present, and treasures them for the future. The priest appears from the earliest days of Israel's history to its close. The opposition between prophet and priest has been grossly exaggerated in modern times, and we now see that they had a fundamental relation to each other and that both of them performed their services to the cult. Prophetic criticism of the cult must certainly be taken seriously, but it must be understood in its total framework. Many of the cultic prophets were doubtless "false prophets" according to the standards of a Micah or a Jeremiah, but surely not all of them. Moreover, we have abundant evidence to show that the prophets did not divorce themselves from the life of the sanctuary as has been sometimes supposed.⁸⁸

⁸⁷ Gerhard von Rad, Die Priesterschaft im Hexateuch (Berlin: W. Kohlhammer, 1934); Pfeiffer, Intro. to O.T., pp. 190-200.

The most difficult problem in connection with "holy persons" is the place and function of the Levite. In the blessing of Jacob (Gen. 49) Levi is a tribe without any sacerdotal connections, but in the blessing of Moses (Deut. 33:8-11) he is in charge of the divinatory Urim and Thummim. Mowinckel thinks that the tribal association of Levi was a development from his priestly status, that is, a tribal origin was assigned him to explain his existence. But this view runs against serious obstacles. It is not possible to take up this problem here, but reference may be made to Theophile Meek's discussion.⁸⁹

In the early period of Israel's history the priest served the function of a diviner. As we have seen, the blessing of Moses puts him in charge of the Urim and Thummim, and his casting of the sacred lot points in the same direction (Josh. 18:6). In this Joshua passage the verb "to cast" is the root for the word tôrâh. An examination of the employment of the verb yârâh confirms the judgment concerning the priestly divinatory function. It is the task of the priest to ascertain the divine will through techniques and instruments of which he is an expert. His is a learned craft, whereas the "word of the Lord" comes to the prophet. From lowly beginnings developed the whole tôrâh, usually translated "law" but rendered frequently quite as plausibly by "revelation." There were prophetic tôrôih also, but it was the task of the priest, above all, to give tôrâh (Jer. 18:18). The history of the development of the tôrâh, from original single words of "Yes" or "No" in response to the priestly query of the divining instrument to the vast corpus of priestly literature in the Pentateuch with its successive codes, gives one some notion of the importance of the priest in the history of Israel's religion.

Closely associated with the priest's original function as revealer of the will and decision of God is his teaching office. In perhaps the majority of instances the word tôrâh should be rendered "teaching" or "instruction." The sages of Israel, whose work is preserved in the wisdom literature, were teachers also, as in the case of the writers of our book of Proverbs and Ecclesiasticus. But the priest had a special teaching to promulgate, one which stood in intimate relationship to the continuity of tradition. It is likely that the sanctuaries preserved ancient records. Not only the temple archives at Jerusalem, but the archives of such sanctuaries as Hebron, Bethel, Gilgal, Samaria, and others included accounts of their original founding set forth in etiological stories, such as are preserved for us in Genesis; legends of the prophets like those concerning Elijah and Elisha (I Kings 17-II Kings 9); legal records of great variety and extent like the decalogues, the Covenant Code (Exod. 20:23-33:33), and similar formulations; and even liturgical compositions such as are represented by Pss. 15 and 24. The priest was master of all this treasure, it may be supposed, and it was his task to teach it. Two books of the Old Testament in quite different ways point to such a conclusion: Deuteronomy, the teaching book par excellence, and Ezekiel, the work of a priest who gives us an admirable impression of the nature of the teaching materials of the sanctuary (cf. also Hos. 4:6; Lev. 10:11; Mal. 2:6).

Finally, the priest was in charge of the sacrificial cult. He was not always exclusively charged with this function since the king and others could perform the sacred act quite as well. With the development of the cult, however, the responsibility and prerogative were increasingly his. Moreover, the many different kinds of sacrifices for many different kinds of occasions and situations and the great increase of their number in the postexilic period inevitably demanded a high degree of specialization. The priest does not appear before us in the striking manner that the prophets do, and that alone says a great deal. For the priest was devoted to the life of the institution, and he stood daily in the presence of the Glory whose will and work in Israel was preserved in the records of which he was custodian. Yet we do have the traditions about Aaron, and the portraits of men like Eli, Zadok, Ezekiel, and Ezra. If the priest was not the central figure in ancient Israel, he was essential to her life, and it is chiefly to him that we owe the canon in all its great variety and extent. In more than one sense he prepared the way for the new covenant and for the fuller glory to be revealed.

F. The Synagogue.—With the dispersion of Israel throughout the Mediterranean Basin, the destruction of the Holy City, and the Exile, it was inevitable that sooner or later some institution should arise to take the place of the temple and of its worship if Israel's religion was to survive. The loss of the external vehicle for the practices of worship, above all, of sacrifice, was destined to affect profoundly the whole subsequent development of the religion. The pre-exilic prophets by their trenchant criticism of the cult prepared the way for such an institution. Jeremiah and Ezekiel, each in his own way, contributed to the inner forces which made ⁸⁸ Adam C. Welch, Prophet and Priest in Old Israel (London: Student Christian Movement Press, 1936); Aubrey R. Johnson, The Cultic Prophet in Ancient Israel (Cardiff: University of Wales Press Board, 1944).

⁸⁹ Hebrew Origins, pp. 119-47.

THE HISTORY OF THE RELIGION OF ISRAEL

worship beyond the confines of Israel possible and effective. The institution which arose to satisfy Israel's needs and aspirations was the synagogue.

The origins of the synagogue are wrapped in obscurity. Our earliest certain witness to its existence comes from the reign of Ptolemy III (247-222 B.C.). In the Roman period it is a flourishing institution, not only in the Diaspora but in the city of Jerusalem as well.⁹⁰ Some scholars attribute its origin to the period of the Exile. Paul Volz, for example, thinks that Second Isaiah was a synagogue teacher in the sixth century B.C. At any rate, we may be confident that the synagogue was the creation of the Dispersion. It is difficult to exaggerate its importance. It influenced the spiritual commonwealth of Israel, the nature and form of Christian worship, and the later religion of Islam.

It is not necessary to pause to describe the architecture, physical characteristics, and interior of the synagogue.⁹¹ Most important is the connection of the synagogue with the teaching of the Law. Indeed, it is not too much to say that it was the Law which was the primary force behind the creation of the synagogue. Originally it was read at the great festivals, but later it became the regular practice at the weekly assemblies of the sabbath. In the course of time the Torah was divided into 150 sections and was read through completely in three years.⁹² The Prophets came to be included in the synagogical readings. The haphtarah, or prophetic lesson, began as illustration to the torah passages read at the festivals, but later grew both in length and in importance so that in New Testament times the practice is recognized at the weekly assemblies (Acts 13:15; 15:21; cf. also Luke 4:16-19). An exposition or interpretation followed the reading of the scripture. From this developed the paraphrases of the Targums and the sermon. The New Testament vividly illustrates the use of the "preaching of the word."

The Shema, which in its liturgical use was first limited to Deut. 6:4 ("Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God is one LORD") but later developed into its present form (Deut. 6:4-9; 11:13-21; Num. 15:37-41), was foremost among the declarations of faith and came to be regarded as embodying the central "creed" of Judaism. Of great importance was the practice of prayer. Like the reading of the Law, the gathering for prayer goes back to the Old Testament itself.

⁹⁰ W. O. E. Oesterley, The Jewish Background of the Christian Liturgy (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1925), p. 97.
⁹¹ See Herbert Gordon May, "Synagogues in Palestine," The Biblical Archaeologist, VII (1944), 1-20.

⁹² H. St. John Thackeray, The Septuagint and Jewish Worship (London: British Academy, 1923), p. 45.

The earliest of the great synagogue prayers is the Eighteen (Shemoneh Esreh) Benedictions, sometimes referred to as Tephillah ("The Prayer") or Amidah ("Standing").⁹³

The singing of hymns and spiritual songs, some of them from the old temple liturgies and others of original composition, was part of the synagogue service. The Psalter doubtless contributed greatly to the spiritual life of the community. Life under the law and the joyful praise of God in singing were expressions of the same religious devotion.

X. Conclusion

When one surveys the religion of Israel as a whole and contemplates the course of its movement from its earliest beginnings, certain features and characteristics stand out with striking clarity. First of all is the colossal scope of tradition and the extensive range of the historical revelation. From the simple family and tribal religion of the patriarchs to the highly developed cult of Judaism we advance through a period of over a thousand years. It must be remembered that the literary deposit is made up almost throughout of relatively small literary units. When these are viewed in their totality and in the almost infinite diversity of circumstance and occasion, two things emerge: the concreteness and the extent of tradition. Again, one is impressed with the constant interaction of Israel's religion with the religions of other peoples: Canaanite, Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, and Greek. The polemic and struggle of Israelite mentality with the mentalities of other peoples account in no small measure for the vitality and power of the Bible. Again, one stands in wonderment before the number and character of unique personalities: patriarchs, judges, prophets, kings, priests, and psalmists. Even more significant is the conscious solidarity of "the people," the redeemed, called, chosen, holy, covenant people, with the praises of God on their lips and the divine Torah in their hearts. One cannot read through the Old Testament without constantly asking the question which Israel itself seems to be asking constantly: who and what is this people, and what is the meaning of its life in history? When this question is taken seriously, the significance of Israel both for the Old Testament and for the New Testament begins to dawn upon the mind. Further, the historical character of the divine revelation is a major feature of the Bible as a whole and of the Old Testament in particular. The sense of continuity pervades much of the Old Testament in its present form, but the compilers and canonizers did not do funda-

⁹³ Oesterley, op. cit., pp. 53 ff.

mental violence to the religious mentality of the people. The movement from the past to the present and into the future is an expression of Israel's self-understanding. In her history and in the world at large God is making his will and purpose known. The promises made to the patriarchs, to Moses and Israel, to the prophets and the Deuteronomists, implied some issue, some outcome or resolution of Israel's existence. The movements of prophecy and apocalyptic were no capricious phenomena; rather, they lay inherent in the character of the faith already revealed to Moses. Yahweh called his son out of Egypt, a holy God made for himself a holy people, a covenantal God chose an "elect" people, a righteous God called a responsible people, and a faithful God fulfilled his promises to a waiting people. To this people was vouchsafed a revelation, a "holy book." Such a book could be accepted only on its own terms. It required for its proper understanding a faithful appropriation. Through faith the Jew and each Christian in his own way identifies himself with the people of God, shares in its history and the living record of the sacred events, participates in the covenantal reality in the midst of a world where nations exist and struggle for power and pre-eminence, grasps the meaning of his life under the awareness of the sovereign, redemptive God of Israel, and finally, expects and waits for the fulfillment of his purpose from the foundation of the world. Yet for the Christian the reality of the people of God finds its complete fulfillment and living expression in the church, the new Israel. The major categories of Old Testament faith therefore undergo a kind of transformation, for they are apprehended in the light of the Christ. Violence is not done to these categories. On the contrary, the New Testament understands them as receiving their final meaning and ultimate illumination in the teachings, the life, the suffering and death, and the resurrection of its Lord. Fulfillment is not understood without a profound awareness of that which is fulfilled. The Christian Bible is divided into two covenants: old and new. The relations and the tensions between the two constitute a revelation of the meaning of the Bible as a whole. It is Paul the Christian apostle who bears a witness (cf. Rom. 9:1 ff.) the church can dismiss only at the cost of its life and gospel: "They are Israelites, and to them belong the sonship, the glory, the covenants, the . . . law, the worship, and the promises; to them belong the patriarchs, and of their race, according to the flesh, is the Christ. God who is over all be blessed forever. Amen."

XI. Selected Bibliography

ALBRIGHT, W. F. From the Stone Age to Christianity. 2nd ed. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1946.

———. Archaeology and the Religion of Israel. Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1942.

BUDDE, KARL. Religion of Israel to the Exile. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons, 1899.

ELMSLIE, W. A. L. How Came Our Faith. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1948.

HANEL, JOHANNES. Die Religion der Heiligkeit. Gütersloh: C. Bertelsmann, 1931.

HÖLSCHER, GUSTAV. Geschichte der israelitischen und jüdischen Religion. Giessen: Alfred Töpelmann, 1922.

HOOKE, S. H., ed. The Labyrinth. London: Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge, 1935.

———. Myth and Ritual. London: Oxford University Press, 1933.

JAMES, FLEMING. Personalities of the Old Testament. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1946.

LESLIE, ELMER A. Old Testament Religion. New York: Abingdon Press, 1936.

MEEK, THEOPHILE J. Hebrew Origins. Rev. ed. New York: Harper & Bros., 1950.

OESTERLEY, W. O. E., and ROBINSON, T. H. Hebrew Religion, Its Origin and Development. 2nd ed. rev. New York: The Macmillan Co., 1937.

———. The Jewish Background of the Christian Liturgy. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1925.

PEDERSEN, JOHANNES. Israel, Its Life and Culture, I-II, III-IV. London: Oxford University Press, 1926-40.

PHYTHIAN-ADAMS, W. J. The People and the Presence. London: Oxford University Press, 1942.

ROBINSON, H. WHEELER. Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament. Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1946.

———. The Religious Ideas of the Old Testament. London: Duckworth, 1934.

SELLIN, ERNST. Israelitisch-jüdische Religionsgeschichte. Leipzig: Quelle & Meyer, 1933.

WELCH, ADAM C. The Religion of Israel Under the Kingdom. Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1912.

THE FAITH OF ISRAEL

by G. ERNEST WRIGHT

- I. Introduction
 - A. The Christian Approach to the Old Testament
 - B. The Task of Biblical Theology
- II. The God of Israel
 - A. God and People
 - 1. The Election of Israel
 - 2. The History and Problems of Election
 - B. The God of the Covenant
 - 1. The Ceremonies of the Covenant
 - 2. The Vocabulary of the Covenant
 - 3. The Covenant Law
 - 4. The History of the Covenant
 - C. God and the Gods
 - 1. The Contrast Between Pagan and Israelite Faith
 - 2. The Nature of Biblical Monotheism
 - D. The Being of God
 - 1. The God Who Acts
 - 2. The Anthropomorphism of God
 - 3. The Holiness of God
 - 4. The Name and Attributes of God
 - E. God and the World
 - 1. The Relationship Between Creator and Creation
 - 2. The Revelation of God in the World
- F. God and Man
 - 1. Man in the Image of God
 - 2. Man as Sinner Against God
- G. The Hope of Man
 - 1. The Problem of Death
 - 2. God's New Age
 - 3. The Messiah
- III. The Worship and Service of God
 - A. The Spiritual Basis of Worship
 - 1. Pagan Magic, Divination, and Demons
 - 2. Israel's Rejection of Pagan Magic and Demonology
 - 3. Israelite and Pagan Festivals
 - B. The Forms and Places of Worship
 - 1. Tabernacle and Temple
 - 2. The Meaning of Sacrifice
 - C. The Common Life
 - 1. Israelite Wisdom
 - 2. The Covenant Law
 - D. Sin and Forgiveness
 - 1. The Conception of Sin
 - 2. Atonement and Forgiveness
- IV. The Faith of Israel
 - A. Biblical Faith and Biblical Theology
 - B. The Faith of Israel and the Faith of the Church
- V. Selected Bibliography

As we approach the study of Old Testament faith, it is important that we consider first the central contents of the Bible and the place of the Old Testament within it. When this has been done, we shall be in position the better to understand the special nature of the word "theology" when applied to the faith of the Bible and as well the task of the biblical theologian.

I. Introduction

A. The Christian Approach to the Old Testament.—In the earliest Christian preaching as recorded in the book of Acts it is significant that the Old Testament is used as the clue to the meaning of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ. Equally significant is the fact that in Jesus Christ the apostles have been given a fresh and impelling key to the meaning of the Old Testament.

How was the new age in Christ to be explained, except that it was the day of salvation long promised by God through the prophets of Israel? And could the primary meaning of the history of Israel be anything other than the record of God's mighty acts of grace and of the promises contained in them? In Christ this scripture was seen fulfilled, and in him the new community was the heir of the promises. It is true that Jesus as the Christ was rejected and crucified, but this again should occasion no surprise, it is said, since the scriptures are filled with the story of the people's sin and rebellion against God, of which these last events are the crowning example.

The new credo, or confession of faith, is succinctly presented by the apostle Paul in his sermon at Antioch of Pisidia (Acts 13:16 ff.). It contains the following articles of faith: (a) the God of Israel chose the fathers (patriarchs); (b) with uplifted arm he delivered their seed from Egyptian slavery, and suffered them in the wilderness; (c) he gave them their land as an inheritance; (d) in the course of time he raised up David as their king, (e) of whose seed he brought unto Israel a Savior, Jesus, as he had promised.

It will be noted that this is a typical biblical statement of faith, cast not in the form of theological abstractions, but in terms of historical events which are seen as the acts of God. Furthermore, the particular history of Israel which Paul here reviews begins with the patriarchs and ends with David; from that point he passes immediately to Jesus Christ. He thus suggests that the period from Abraham to David is the most significant history of the former times, and that Christ is the continuation, the clarification, and the fulfillment of the redemptive purpose of God within it.

From the study of such passages as this it becomes obvious that the primary element which holds the two testaments together is a confessional proclamation or kerygma of certain great redemptive acts of God which have taken place in one particular history, the climax and fulfillment of which is Jesus Christ.¹ The history of Israel thus is seen directed not to the Law as its end, but to Jesus Christ in whom the forgiveness of sins is effected (Acts 13:38-39) and the purpose and promise of God in the call and election of Israel are fulfilled.

It is from this perspective, then, that the Christian begins the detailed study of the Old Testament. He does not begin with the Law because the priority belongs to the proclamation of the redemptive action of God which furnishes the context in which the Law is to be understood. Taking his clue from the New Testament, he turns to the first part of the Old Testament and there discovers that the core of Israel's proclamation is precisely that which the preaching of Acts affirms. Through the roughhewn conglomerate of material of which the Hexateuch, or first six books, is composed there runs one central theme: God, the creator of the world, chose the fathers of Israel and promised them a goodly heritage in the land of Canaan. When Israel became numerous and was enslaved in Egypt, God delivered them by the most remarkable proofs of his power and grace; and after a long wandering, he provided them with the Promised Land, the gift of an inheritance.

This theme is the Israelite credo, the Hebrew confession of faith. In its oldest and simplest forms it can be found in certain cultic recitations which must go back in their essential elements to a very early period of Israel's history. An old cultic law preserved in Deut. 26:1-9 is an example. When the Israelite had arrived in the land of Canaan, he was to present a basket of firstfruits at the sanctuary, presumably each year. When he did so, he was to recite a confession as follows: "A Syrian ready to perish [wandering or lost—ASV mg.] was my father; and he went down into Egypt, and sojourned there with a few, and became there a nation . . . : And the Egyptians . . . laid upon us hard bondage. . . . And the LORD brought us forth out of Egypt with a mighty hand. . . . And he hath brought us into this place, and hath given us this land" (Deut. 26:5-9).

¹ Cf. the words with which Jesus began his ministry, "The time is fulfilled" (Mark 1:15). This "time" is the special, particular time of God, beginning with Abraham and climaxed in Christ, in which the establishment of God's kingdom and his salvation have been accomplished.

The dominant references here are to God's deliverance in the Exodus and to his gift of the land. A similar confessional statement or credo is to be found in Deut. 6:20-24, where the same great saving acts which brought the Israelite community into being are emphasized. Much more elaborate is the sermon of Joshua in the covenant ceremony at Shechem (Josh. 24:2-13). The present form of this passage is to be dated between the ninth and seventh centuries B.C., but its basic form is not a new literary creation. It bears the stamp of the old cultic credo, here elaborated with some freedom of expression. It is the Hexateuch in miniature, in which the confessional elements emphasized are (a) God's choice of Abraham, (b) his deliverance at the Exodus, and (c) his gift of the land.²

The conglomerate nature of the first six books of the Old Testament in their present form is the result of a long and complicated history, during which Israel's traditions were compiled and edited around this basic theme. We probably owe the first written edition of our present Hexateuch to one who is called the Yahwist (J) writer. He was a collector of old traditions from every available source, and in his arrangement and editing of a variety of materials he constructed a great confessional history, using the old stories to present a profound theological base for the credo. It was probably he who collected and put into writing the earliest traditions about the prehistorical period in Gen. 2-11, using them as the setting for the history of Israel. In so doing he employed his material in such a way as to analyze the problem of universal man. Man lives no longer in the paradise God provided, because he has rebelled against his creator and repeatedly has rejected the conditions of his creation. The answer to man's problem is seen by the Yahwist to lie in the call or election of Abraham, in whose seed the nations of the earth shall find a blessing (Gen. 12:1-3). The old credo is thus given a new and deeper dimension, for the election of Israel is set within the universal redemptive purpose of God.³

² See Gerhard von Rad, Das erste Buch Mose (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1949), pp. 7 ff.; and more fully his Das formgeschichtliche Problem des Hexateuchs (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1938). For an evaluation and qualification of von Rad's view concerning the manner in which the Hexateuch was built up from such old cultic confessions see Artur Weiser, Einleitung in das Alte Testament (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1949), pp. 66-79.

The election promises and the gracious guidance of God were the theme around which the various cycles of patriarchal traditions were collected, while Exodus presents the first stage in the fulfillment of the promises. The traditions concerning the Sinai covenant (Exod. 19-24), which once seem to have circulated separately from those narrating the great saving acts of God, were built into the over-all theme as the immediate goal and purpose of the deliverance from Egypt. Having rescued Israel from slavery, God bound the people to him in a solemn compact and thus formed them into a nation. Together with the good news of the old confession there was now the reminder of the obligation for unconditioned obedience to the will of the Lord. This joining of the Exodus and Sinai traditions gave the needed undergirding to the recital of God's saving acts in the credo; together they presented the basic elements of the biblical proclamation, the gospel and the law of God. Deuteronomy expanded the covenant theology in this framework, giving a summary of the faith in an earnest, homiletical appeal to remember the great things God had done, to fear, obey, and love him with a wholehearted devotion. In it the confessional story and the covenant law are brought together in a series of solemn sermons, in which the redemptive love of God and the whole duty of man in God's service are nobly proclaimed.⁴

The greatest contribution of the priestly editors (P) to the older Yahwist and Elohist material was the detailed description of the tabernacle, with the forms and offices of worship associated with it (Exod. 25-31; 35-40; Leviticus; and parts of Numbers). The tabernacle was the seal of God's real presence in the midst of the people; and the priesthood and sacrificial rites were the means ordained by him through which he might be approached and worshiped, forgiveness of sins secured, and atonement effected.

The Hexateuch as compiled around its central theme is thus a great confessional history based upon the saving acts of God, his sov-eignty over the life of man, and the temporal means by which he was to be worshiped. It contained the promises of God to and through Israel, and as well the proclamation of his lordship with the requirement of human obedience. It thus held the Israelite credo, in the light of which the remainder of the Bible was composed and interpreted. Yet to be added, however, was the office of kingship, David being its typical representative. Israel in Palestine, in possession of the old credo and its early cultic institutions, was promptly faced with the problem of security among hostile neighbors. Kingship was granted and the promise of justice and salvation was conferred with it. But the central theme of the remainder of the history and of the prophets was that of God's controversy with his people for their failure to live by their credo, his destruction of the nation by successive stages, to the end that he might revive and fulfill his promises. Their complete fulfillment, however, was not accomplished within the period of the Old Testament, though it was ardently awaited. Small wonder, therefore, that the early church seized so confidently upon the Old Testament kerygma as the explanation of God's work in Jesus Christ! In him the meaning of the whole was perfectly clear, for it was now possible to penetrate within the roughhewn accumulation of material and behind the law with its multitudinous ramifications, and to do so with clarity, certainty, and boldness unknown since the days of the prophets.

³ See further, von Rad, Das erste Buch Mose, pp. 15-16, 132-34.

⁴ The various aspects of the completed credo are beautifully treated in the poetry of the psalms; cf. especially Pss. 78; 104; 105; 106; 136.

B. The Task of Biblical Theology.—The purpose of this brief review of the central content of the Bible as seen through the perspective of the New Testament is to make clear at the outset what the chief task of biblical theology must be. That task is simply to expound the meaning and implications of the biblical credo in its various forms. This must be done in as coherent, reflective, and relevant a manner as possible, to the end that the gospel may be proclaimed in and by the church with clarity and power. It must further be stated that the Christian in approaching the Old Testament inevitably does so with certain presuppositions which he must confess. These involve the conviction that Jesus Christ is both the destination of and the guide to the Old Testament's basic content. This does not mean that the Christian is entitled to betray the Old Testament by reading into it meanings which are not there, nor that he can neglect the most rigid use of the tools of scholarship. Yet it does mean that he performs his scholarly and exegetical work in the knowledge of God's fulfilled "time," and with the conviction that Israel's faith in its deeper dimensions is an integral part of his own faith through the new Israel of which he is a member by faith in Jesus Christ.

Such a definition of our task and of its presuppositions is, however, far too simple unless it recognizes the many difficulties which lie in the way of a biblical theology or of a theology of either Testament. By its very nature theology involves an attempt to systematize and generalize by means of abstract language. Yet biblical religion is a living faith which can never be confined in simple generalizations nor in an abstract system. It is based upon an anthropomorphic vocabulary which, when translated into abstractions, loses its creative power. Its central content is a historical credo, the ramifications of which are many and various in the complexities of a long history and of various schools of thought within that history. Yet the task of the church demands that we must make the attempt to organize the central articles of the faith, to penetrate behind them in order to discover their foundations, and to portray as well as we can their historical developments and ramifications. This the church has done repeatedly, as it was done in each generation of biblical history itself. Thus while at times our gait may be a bit unsteady, we must proceed in the faith that God himself will verify and validate his truth, even though our own attempts to express and expound it are incomplete and historically conditioned.

II. The God of Israel

A. God and People.—It would be an injustice to the faith of Israel if we were to begin our discussion with an abstract analysis of God's nature and attributes. God was known to Israel because he had revealed himself, his purpose, and his nature through dramatic historical acts. The Old Testament as a religious literature is basically a historical narration because the description of the faith was primarily the story of what God had done, how the people had responded or should respond, and what God was yet to do. Our point of beginning, therefore, must be with the phrase "the God of Israel," or, in other words, with the doctrine of election.

1. The Election of Israel.—How had Israel come to have such faith in the Lord Yahweh that she owed her very existence as a nation to him, that she saw him engaged through her in a unique redemptive work in history, that thus she could say, "What great nation is there that hath a god so nigh unto them as is Yahweh our God whenever we call upon him" (Deut. 4:7)? Such faith cannot be explained solely in terms of an evolutionary process wherein a social organism gradually evolved from polytheism through the interplay of a variety of environmental and sociological factors. A descriptive study of this type can explain many things, but by its intrinsic limitations it cannot explain how Israel became the people of Yahweh. In a presentation of Old Testament theology, therefore, it is necessary to take seriously the doctrine of Israel's special election by God, to see that doctrine as the primary article of the faith, and to understand the significance of the Exodus as the only historical event in which such a conception could have originated, or at least been confirmed as an integral part of the faith of the nation.

At the center of that faith lay the joyful proclamation that the God of the fathers had heard the cry of an oppressed people in Egypt, and by mighty acts of power had delivered them from slavery and made them a nation. They were a weak, dispirited, and helpless people whom the world's justice had passed by. Yet they were freed; and to them this miracle of deliverance could not be explained on simple naturalistic grounds. It was a sign, a wonder; as such it revealed a God who was more powerful than the greatest temporal power of the age (i.e., Pharaoh), a God who could make the forces of nature serve him, a God who for some gracious reason had set his pity on this defenseless people and had chosen them for his own.

Israel's doctrine of God, therefore, was not derived from speculative thought; it was derived from the sole interpretation of historical events possible to them. Their God was the one who had met and chosen them in their weakness and had shown his power over all human and natural powers in delivering them from oppression. Accordingly, in all subsequent events they could but recognize and acknowledge the one deity who had chosen and saved them. Wherever they were, or in whatever condition, he was to be found in their midst. In Canaan it was he, not Baal, who made "the hinds to calve" (Ps. 29:9), who sent the rain and the dew from heaven, the fresh water from the earth, and the blessings of beast and womb (Gen. 49:25; Deut. 33:13-16). Yet even in the earliest poetry he was no mere storm or fertility deity; he was the great Lord whose righteous acts in Israel's behalf men shall rehearse (Judg. 5:11). In the international crises of the subsequent history it was none other than Yahweh, the God of Israel, who was directing the wars of conquest to his own ends. The Assyrian was "the rod of [his] anger" (Isa. 10:5); Nebuchadrezzar was his "servant" (Jer. 25:9); and Cyrus was his "anointed" (Isa. 45:1). Even in the captivity of Israel and Judah he was seen at work for his own name's sake. As the God of Israel who had met this people in a historical event, he thus was recognized as the Lord of all events who was directing the whole course of history to his own ends, for nothing happened in either nature or history in which his power was not acknowledged.

The problem of Israelite monotheism, how it is to be defined and when it was achieved, is left for subsequent discussion (see pp. 359-62). The point emphasized here is that Israel's knowledge of God cannot in the first instance be described in theological abstractions. God was known in Israel because events were interpreted as his handiwork. Israel learned of him because he had chosen them from all the nations of the earth, because he had set his love upon them to deliver, to guide, and to govern them. The theological language used of him was inevitably concrete, historically conditioned, and based upon human analogy; to confess him thus meant to describe what he had done. The deepening of the language in the direction of the abstract was only gradually and partially accomplished when through the succession of historical events he revealed himself more clearly.

Such is the conception implicit in the phrase "the God of Israel." This God was known because he had revealed himself as Savior and Lord of one particular people whom he had chosen out of all the peoples of the earth. But why had God chosen Israel? A typical modern explanation is to assert that the Hebrews were an extraordinarily gifted people with a special genius for religion. Natural endowment is thus used to explain Israel's consciousness of being an elect people. Yet this is not the emphasis of the Old Testament. There God's election is not based on special considerations of human power or righteousness. Israel was seen by the leaders of the faith to have been a hardhearted and rebellious people from the earliest times.⁵ The election was rooted in the mystery of divine grace. It was not and could not be explained; it could only be accepted in faith and in gratitude.

2. The History and Problems of Election.—In presenting the various traditions about the fathers of Israel in Genesis, it was inevitable that even the earliest historians should project the election faith back into that period as the occasion for the patriarchal migration from Mesopotamia into Canaan.⁶ God selected and called each patriarch, repeating to Isaac and Jacob the promises made in the call of Abraham

⁵ This is especially emphasized by the prophets and Deuteronomy (e.g., Jer. 7:21-26; Ezek. 16; Hos. 11; Deut. 7:7-8; 9). The stories of the murmuring and rebellion in the Sinai wanderings, preserved even in the oldest sections of Exodus and Numbers, were the source from which these writings drew their emphasis.

⁶ For a detailed analysis of the two different emphases in the literature as to the origin of election (the Exodus and Abrahamic traditions), see especially Kurt Galling, Die Erwählungstraditionen Israels (Giessen: Alfred Töpelmann, 1928).

(Gen. 12:1-3). The theme of the Yahwist document is precisely the election with its glorious promises and the successive stages in which those promises were fulfilled. Furthermore, election is presented as furnishing the central spiritual problem which the fathers had to face. Abraham had no sooner received the promises than he was caught lying about his wife in Egypt (Gen. 12:10-20). Having been promised a son, Sarah could not believe. Taking matters into her own hands, she immediately involved the family in turmoil over Hagar and Ishmael (Gen. 16). God promised to give Israel an inheritance of land; but lacking the faith and courage to take it, the people were consigned to a generation of fruitless wandering in the wilderness (Num. 13-14). Faith meant the acceptance of God's election promises and the belief that he would do what he had promised. Sin was born in the doubt which was nourished by anxiety.

The knowledge of God's special election was so deeply rooted in the Israelite religious consciousness that we must presume it to have arisen in a very early period of the people's history, long before the earliest documents now preserved were written down. It furnished the context in which Israel's conception of God's nature was evolved, in which the significance of history was understood, and in which the meaning of the people's life and destiny was interpreted. While no answer could be given as to why God chose Israel rather than some other nation, yet this particularism in the exercise of the divine favor seems early to have been understood as in some way set within God's purpose of universal salvation. As pointed out on pp. 350-51, it was the Yahwist writer who first seems to have given the doctrine of election this wider context, thus delivering it from the dangers involved in a conception of divine favoritism. However dimly this conception of the crucial role which Israel was to play in a divine drama of universal salvation may have been understood in the early days of the nation's history, it certainly became most explicit in Isaiah 40-55, in the book of Jonah, and in prophetic eschatology as a whole (e.g., Isa. 2:2-4; Zech. 2:11; 8:22-23; 14:16). God's purpose was to establish his redemptive sovereignty over all the earth, and he had chosen Israel as his special agent through whom this aim was to be accomplished.

Since the days of Celsus in the second century A.D., biblical faith has been subjected to constant criticism for this particularism in the operation of divine grace. Yet the election of Israel was not for selfish or self-centered privilege. God had his own purposes which Israel was continually struggling to understand. He was no objectification of a people's natural desires; he was an external point of reference, one who set his course and required that his people follow, one whose will was in constant conflict with that of the nation. Actually, the story told by this elect people about itself is in its total scope a sordid, terrible tale. Contemporary gods of nature and culture perished in the very tragic events which confirmed to a remnant of Israel both the sovereignty and the election of Yahweh. Such an election can scarcely be conceived as the objectification of the egotism of a small nation. It demanded more than the people would normally give; its violation involved the destruction of the nation's political life; and it had such a purifying effect upon the national consciousness that its historians and prophets told the truth about their people as have the patriots of no other nation. The greatest heroes of Israel were at one and the same time both sinners and heroes of faith.

B. The God of the Covenant.—The particular vocabulary which expressed most clearly the meaning and implication of the doctrine of election for Israelite life was drawn from the realm of jurisprudence—that is, from the conception of covenant. In covenant the sense of law and legal obligation was given concrete form and theological setting; responsibility and obedience were interpreted as the proper human response to the grace of God as shown in his saving acts and election promises. The priority thus belongs to God's grace in election, apart from which there would have been no covenant.⁷ The apostle Paul in the books of Galatians and Romans was correct in his attempt to prove from the early Old Testament material that the proper order is gospel and law, not the reverse as was emphasized in Judaism. The setting of law in the grace of God meant that at least in the deeper reaches of Israelite faith human righteousness in the law could never be completely identified with the righteousness of God nor in any way confine or circumscribe divine grace.

The sense of covenant was rooted in the nomadic, patriarchal society which formed the ideal background of Israelite community life. The basis of society, its harmonious nature, its freedom from bloodguiltiness, its inner and outer wholesomeness or peace, all these were derived from the various levels of sacred compact or covenant in which men lived and moved and had their being. Covenant created the community which gave meaning to the individual; it supplied the norms of right and wrong; it was rooted in legal compact, but went deeper than modern legal forms of covenant in that it basically involved a psychical, wholesome union of souls wherein there was an intermingling, a mutuality of life. It was usually consecrated by sacrificial rites, and the deity or deities of the respective parties were members and guarantors of the union (cf. Gen. 31:44-54; Josh. 9:3-21; I Sam. 18:1-4). The dissolution of covenant meant the disintegration of society; violation of covenant as in murder meant that the individual was deprived of the community's protection and blessing—the worst curse which could befall anyone (cf. Gen. 4:10-14).⁸

⁷ Cf. H. Wheeler Robinson, Inspiration and Revelation in the Old Testament (Oxford: The Clarendon Press, 1946), pp. 150-55; Gallig, Die Erwählungstraditionen Israels, p. 37.

From this background in the people's common life the conception of covenant was borrowed as the means of expressing the special relationship existing between Yahweh and Israel. In this sense it no longer referred to a legal compact between human beings, sanctioned by deity; instead it furnished the language with which the relationship of God and people was described.

1. The Ceremonies of the Covenant.—A number of covenant ceremonies are recorded. For example, Ezra returned to Jerusalem with the law of God, presumably the complete Pentateuch, in his possession and with the royal commission to reform religious affairs on the basis of this law (Ezra 7:14, 25-26). An eight-day ceremony was held, during which the law was read by Ezra and expounded by the priests and Levites so that the people understood what they had heard. This was followed by a solemn public confession of sin and a formal vow to keep the law, written and sealed in the people's behalf by the leaders (Neh. 8-10). A similar ceremony before an official assembly was conducted by Josiah in 621 B.C., on the basis of the Deuteronomic law, at the inauguration of a great religious reform (II Kings 23:1-3).⁹ In Josh. 24 a great covenant ceremony at Shechem was conducted by Joshua. In this case the law was not read. Instead, the confessional history which forms the theme of the Hexateuch was rehearsed, and in response the people formally vowed to serve Yahweh and no other.¹⁰ Deuteronomy preserves the tradition of a covenant ceremony in Moab, in which the law was expounded by Moses and the people vowed to keep it (cf. Deut. 29). Basic to all of these ceremonies, however, was the tradition of an original solemn rite at Sinai. There the "book of the covenant" was read by Moses, the people vowed to keep the law, and the vow was sealed with the sacrificial blood (Exod. 24:4-8; cf. 19:5-8).

⁸ See Johannes Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture I-II (London: Oxford University Press, 1926), 263-310.

⁹ Cf. also II Chr. 23:16-21 for the covenant between priest, people, and king "that they should be Yahweh's people," after the slaying of Jezebel's daughter, Athaliah, in Jerusalem.

¹⁰ The significance of the Shechem covenant is that in this ceremony the Sinai compact was probably accepted as binding upon all the tribes, some of which had not participated in the Exodus under Moses. In this way the tradition of Sinai became normative for all twelve tribes; see Martin Noth, Das Buch Josua (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1938; "Handbuch zum Alten Testament"), pp. 108-9.

2. The Vocabulary of the Covenant.—Covenant thus bound the chosen people to God in a solemn relationship of obligation and obedience. Its ratification was one of the most holy and sacred rites in the nation's life.¹¹ It was based upon a political anthropomorphism, that of kingship applied to God, which furnished the central metaphors by means of which God was apprehended and the basic religious terminology by which the nation's life, its meaning and aim, its institutions and officials, were described.¹² Since national law was the duty of kings to provide and administer in the ancient world, the God of Israel was first apprehended as King and Lord, who rescued a people, formed them into a nation, and bound them to him in a relationship of servants to a ruler. He did not force them into this relationship; he offered it to them as a gracious act. He promised to be their king who would provide justice for them, together with salvation and security from those who would oppress them. When they accepted this offer, they in turn made their promises to obey and serve their ruler.¹³ They were to hearken and to be obedient to his will. He gave them the law as the constitution of the society, which to keep meant life and peace within the nation. He governed them directly, though he chose leaders for specific tasks and gave these leaders the power to perform them (Moses, Joshua, the judges). Later, in response to the people's necessity, he gave them the institution of kingship; the human king, like the priest, was anointed with oil as to a holy office, and he was to rule as God's earthly vicegerent or "son." Yet the divine King did not confine his will to any one institution. He also called his prophets, who were his heralds, his messengers, who knew his heavenly counsel and who proclaimed it directly to the people and to their ordained leaders. Such metaphors as "judge" and "shepherd" as applied to God were also drawn from the office of kingship. They were commonly used of kings in the ancient world and indicated different aspects of the royal office. The marriage metaphor, introduced by Hosea, in which God is the husband of the faithless wife, Israel, was a fresh way of describing the covenantal relationship existing between God and people; it was one which made Israel's faithlessness vividly clear (cf. Ezek. 16). The father-son terminology was largely avoided between the tenth and sixth centuries B.C. because of the merely physical use made of it in paganism.¹⁴

The covenant, based as it was on a terminology derived from a monarchical form of government, thus involved an interpretation of the meaning and significance of Israel's life. In ideal form it provided the structure of the nation's social and political organization, with the result that a tension continually existed between it and the political actualities. It furnished the Deuteronomic historian (Joshua-II Kings) and the Chronicler (I Chronicles-Nehemiah) with the chief clue to the interpretation of the national history between the conquest of Canaan and the reformation of the postexilic community under Nehemiah and Ezra. The special interests of the Deuteronomist centered in the political affairs of the nation, while those of the Chronicler lay in ecclesiastical matters. Yet both saw the succession of events as the story of the divine King's acts of judgment and of grace in ruling a people who had solemnly promised to be his loyal subjects but who had repeatedly rebelled against his sovereignty. Indeed, to Israel the whole course of history was to be viewed in terms of God's purpose to establish his kingship over all peoples of the earth. The term "kingdom of God" in this sense does not occur in the Old Testament, but the conception behind it is a theme which becomes increasingly explicit and is particularly evident in prophetic eschatology and the psalms which celebrated God's enthronement as universal king (e.g., Pss. 47; 93; 96-99).

3. The Covenant Law.—It is also significant that the covenant furnished the setting for both the common and the cultic law. Much of the social law was adapted from ancient Near Eastern common law; in its typical formulation it

¹¹ That there was a yearly festival in the central sanctuary commemorating the conclusion of the covenant, and at the same time renewing it, is considered a probability in the light of the evidence derived from studies in form criticism and in the history of tradition; see Martin Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1948), p. 64.

¹² See G. Ernest Wright, "The Terminology of Old Testament Religion and Its Significance," Journal of Near Eastern Studies, I (1942), 404-14; cf. also Wright, The Challenge of Israel's Faith (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1944), ch. iii.

¹³ The one word which more than any other comprehends these covenant promises and obligations is the Hebrew hesedh, frequently translated "lovingkindness": see Nelson Glueck, Das Wort hesed im alttestamentlichen Sprachgebrauche (Giessen: Alfred Töpelmann, 1927).

¹⁴ It was known, however, and used particularly to emphasize Israel's special election rather than the covenant (cf. Exod. 4:22; Hos. 11:1-4; Mal. 1:6; see further, Wright, Challenge of Israel's Faith; Johannes Hempel, Gott und Mensch im Alten Testament [Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1926], pp. 131 ff.).

was introduced by a conditional clause in which the case is carefully defined but the person addressed left indefinite.¹⁵ The type of legal formulation peculiar to Israel, however, is that in which the case is not defined with care but in which each member of the community was addressed directly by the divine Ruler, "Thou shalt," or "Thou shalt not."¹⁶ This command or apodictic type of law is the characteristic law of the covenant relation. Yet regardless of origin or type, all law was taken into the covenant as the expression of the will of God.

From this fact certain important inferences are to be drawn: (a) Israel conceived of the law not as a penal burden to be borne, but as a special gift of God that a people who had been without law might now have it and in it find justice and security. (b) Israel's law as God's special gift was thus not a natural law. Of the latter there are intimations (e.g., Gen. 2:23-24; Amos 1-2; Isa. 1:3; Jer. 8:7), but they are never collected together into what might be called a doctrine. The law instead was rooted in the grace of God and conceived as a special revelation. (c) For Israel totalitarian rule was lifted from the earthly to the cosmic sphere. The law of the covenant meant that the people had an association with the divine King which was prior to political organization. Thus the human king could not take credit for the law; he could only administer it and be subject to it.¹⁷ (d) The covenant law was given by God to the community as a whole, for the covenant was made with the nation. Yet in the law the individual was singled out of the group and addressed directly with God's "Thou shalt." Man as man was not lost in tribal or mass society, but was given his place and function within it. Individuality and community were thus held in proper balance. In the covenant with the nation each man was bound to God in the realm of will; he was called upon to obey his Lord. As a result, life assumed a meaning and a dignity unknown elsewhere.¹⁸ The great gods of polytheism were aristocrats inaccessible to the common man. Yet the covenant God of Israel was not a respecter of persons; he would hearken to the prayer of the most humble for ¹⁵ Cf. Exod. 21:18: "And if men strive together, and one smite another. . . ."

¹⁶ For an analysis of this distinction in legal formulation see Albrecht Alt, Die Ursprünge des israelitischen Rechts (Leipzig: S. Hirzel, 1934).

¹⁷ Cf. Deut. 17:14-20: Henri Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1948), pp. 337-44.

¹⁸ Cf. Walther Eichrodt, Das Menschenverständnis des Alten Testaments (Basel: Heinrich Majer, 1944), pp. 7-11.

he had dignified each one with his personal address.

4. The History of the Covenant.—Old Testament scholarship has shown a tendency to regard the special covenant between God and Israel as a conception which arose late in Israel's history, perhaps in Hosea at the earliest and more probably in the Deuteronomic reform of the seventh century.¹⁹ Recent study, however, makes it increasingly difficult to give credence to this point of view. In the period of the judges Israel was distinguished from other peoples of the day by her peculiar organization. While other nations had a monarchical form of government, Israel was an amphictyony—that is, an association of tribes, bound together by sacred compact around a central sanctuary.²⁰ The association of the tribes was thus not a natural or secular one; it was a religious "assembly" or "congregation" (Hebrew, mō'ēdh, 'ēdhāh; qāhāl) composed of those who were partners in the compact. The antiquity of this tribal covenant is further certified by the results of form criticism,²¹ by the fundamental nature of the ruler-servant terminology described above, and by the legal terms so basic to the Israelite religious vocabulary and so clearly illustrated in the prophetic proclamation of God's controversy (i.e., legal case) against his chosen nation (e.g., Isa. 1:2; Jer. 2:1-13; 25:31; Hos. 4:1-3; Mic. 6:1-5).

It can thus be affirmed that election and covenant are so closely related in Israelite faith that they cannot be separated. Together they furnish one of the central themes of the Bible, the gracious acts and promises of God together with the binding relationship and obligation to God on the part of the believer who has accepted the promises. It was natural, therefore, that covenant should be projected into the patriarchal period as the only means of explaining the relationship of Abraham to God. This was done by J and E in Gen. 15; and the priestly edition of JE elaborates the conception into a framework for all of history. In the covenant with Noah the rainbow is the "token" of ¹⁹ E.g., Julius Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Israel, tr. J. Sutherland Black and Allan Menzies (Edinburgh: Adam & Charles Black, 1885), pp. 418-19; Adam C. Welch, The Religion of Israel Under the Kingdom (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1912), p. 263; Richard Kraetzschmar, Die Bundesvorstellung im Alten Testament (Marburg: N. G. Elwert, 1896).

²⁰ See Martin Noth, Das System der zwölf Stämme Israels (Stuttgart: W. Kohlhammer, 1930); Albrecht Alt, Die Staatenbildung der Israeliten in Palästina (Leipzig: Alexander Edelmann, 1930).

²¹ See Martin Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichte des Pentateuch, pp. 272-77. For an excellent review of the arguments concerning the importance and age of the covenant see Walther Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments (3rd ed.; Berlin: Evangelische Verlagsanstalt, 1948), I, 6-11.

THE FAITH OF ISRAEL

God's eternal covenant with all mankind (Gen. 9); the election covenant with Abraham was sealed by the rite of circumcision; and the great covenant with all Israel at Sinai had as its "token" or "sign" the sabbath (Exod. 31:12-17). Thus in priestly circles the relationship of God to man was conceived under these forms of covenant as possessing an eternal and universal character.

Covenant, as the dominant language in which the election relationship of God to Israel was expressed, could, however, be misused by too great a narrowing of its rich meaning. Instead of pointing first and foremost to the gracious and marvelous acts of God in saving and binding the nation to himself, it came to be interpreted among many in an external, legalistic way, so that attention was drawn more to the covenant ordinances than to their Giver. This tendency reached expression in Deuteronomic circles, where the very word "covenant" could be used as the name for the Decalogue (Deut. 4:13, 23; I Kings 8:21). But to identify covenant with a law to be kept is so to emphasize the external, statutory nature of the compact as to push the spiritual bond and communion between God and people into the background. Deuteronomy attempted to preserve a balance between the two,²² but among the people as a whole this was not done. Covenant as a purely juridical institution encouraged them to keep the outward forms of legal decency while neglecting the spiritual nature of their relationship with God, which alone could produce a worthy fruit.

It was perhaps for this reason that the prophets did not make more use of the term, but frequently employed other metaphors drawn from human analogy to express the relationship of God to Israel. Thus Hosea used the figures of marriage (chs. 1-3) and of fatherly love (ch. 11), both of which appear again in Jeremiah (chs. 3; 31). Ezekiel speaks of the foundling, reared, loved, and married by God (ch. 16); Second Isaiah, of the mother who has not forgotten her child (49:15) and of the acts of the redeemer (gō'ēl) who because of a close family relationship saves his relative from slavery (43:1, 14; etc.). Through such pictures the prophets present the warm, personal love and fidelity of God, which seek a response from the heart, but which stand in contrast to the faithlessness and disloyalty of the people. "In this battle against all opus operatum the covenant thought could not help them."²³ Yet later

²² For the background of Deuteronomy in the old amphictyonic circles of North Israel see Gerhard von Rad, Deuteronomium-Studien (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1947).

²³ Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, I, 15; cf. also A. B. Davidson, "Covenant," in James Hastings, prophesy employs the thought anew in depicting the relationship with God which the future will bring. In the days to come God will renew his relationship with his people in an "everlasting covenant" (Isa. 55:3; 61:8; Jer. 32:40; Ezek. 37:26), a "covenant of peace" (Isa. 54:10; Ezek. 34:25; 37:26), a "new covenant" written upon the heart (Jer. 31:31-34). The servant of Second Isaiah is even to be the mediator of the covenant for all people and as such the agent of their salvation (Isa. 42:6; 49:8). In these cases there is no longer any question about the nature of the covenant as an external, legal compact. It is based upon the pure grace of God which shall create in man a new heart and new spirit to receive it.

It is in this last sense that the covenant conception is carried over into the church of the New Testament. The Christian as a member of the new covenant in the blood of Christ becomes the true and actual heir of the election promises made to Israel. Yet in a sense the basic conflict between the apostle Paul and Judaism lay in the conception of the meaning of God's relationship and revelation to his people as established in election and covenant. Judaism had identified covenant solely with the Mosaic law, with the result that Paul was no more able to use its terminology in his struggle than were the prophets—except to oppose it. Thus in the Bible as a whole there are two lines of development in the theological use of a legal compact for expressing the relationship between God and people. In one the movement was "from covenant through covenant relationship, covenant statute, statutory order to religion, cult, and covenant people." In the other it was from covenant through the institution of the nation, relationship of grace and revelation "to redemptive order, saving decree, and world consummation." Two opposing conceptions thus stand over against one another. Yet they of necessity must be taken together, though held in tension, for on the one hand they point to the legal ordering of human life under God in our present existence, and on the other to the eschatological fulfillment of that life in the promise of the kingdom which is to come.²⁴

C. God and the Gods.—It has been assumed by many scholars during the first part of the twentieth century that the most significant thing about Israel's faith was its development from very primitive beginnings to the "ethical monotheism" of the prophets. In seeking to explain the nature of the earliest stages of the faith and of the development to "higher" beliefs, the pagan environment was studied intensively for ed., A Dictionary of the Bible (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1898), I, 512.

²⁴ Eichrodt, op. cit., I, 23.

parallel conceptions, and the idea of progress was used as the clue to the significance of Israel's achievement.²⁵ This type of study has been exceedingly fruitful in showing Israel's dependence upon her environment and in demonstrating the fact that the Old Testament cannot be treated as a static literature without regard for its history. It is highly questionable, however, whether such study has succeeded in explaining the nature of the faith or in proving that the clue to Israel's achievement is to be found in development. From our present knowledge of the nature of polytheism it must rather be affirmed that the faith of Israel, even in the earliest days of the nation's history in Palestine, was so radically different from its environment that one has difficulty in seeing how it could have evolved by a gradual process from pagan religion. It can only be interpreted as a new creation, a mutation. It owed much to its environment, and in the successive crises of history it was refined and deepened. Yet its basic affirmations, in the framework of which the development took place, are so unique that a radical discontinuity with the environment rather than a simple continuity must be acknowledged.

1. The Contrast Between Pagan and Israelite Faith.—Contemporary religions were all natural religions—that is, the problem of human life was seen over against nature and the divine forces which personified the powers of nature. The realm of the gods was the realm of nature, and in the latter the life of man and society was embedded. The aim of human endeavor, therefore, was to achieve an integrated harmony with the natural powers of the universe on which man's life is utterly dependent. Even by the time of the Hebrew patriarchs the ancient world had left the stage of "primitive" religion far behind, and had achieved a highly developed and sophisticated polytheism. The belief in many gods was occasioned by the fact that the forces which man met in nature, and to which he had to adjust, were many. Yet the great achievement of polytheism was in its reduction of this plurality into a cosmic order, one in which there was coherence and meaning. The universe was seen to be organized into a cosmic state in which the various powers assumed the respective duties decreed for them in primordial time. Complementary forces were paired as male and female, and derivative powers were

²⁵ For a well-written summary of this viewpoint as it was elaborated in nineteenth- and early twentieth-century scholarship see especially Harry Emerson Fosdick, A Guide to the Understanding of the Bible (New York: Harper & Bros., 1938); cf. also W. O. E. Oesterley and Theodore H. Robinson, Hebrew Religion (2nd ed.; New York: The Macmillan Co., 1937); I. G. Matthews, The Religious Pilgrimage of Israel (New York: Harper & Bros., 1947), interpreted as their offspring. The opposing or contradictory forces of nature were believed to be in yearly combat with one another, yet so balanced that at the end of the annual cycle of events life could begin afresh.²⁶

The life of the gods was thus the life of nature, and within this cosmic rhythm man adjusted or integrated his own existence. In Babylon man was believed to have been created as the slave of the gods because those among the latter whose duty it was to look after the earthly economy were wearied by the onerous tasks of irrigation, seedtime, and harvest. The good life for man thus consisted in the obedience which a slave owed to his master. He showed this obedience by fitting himself willingly into the hierarchy of authority with which he was surrounded, beginning with his elders within the family. The bad man was the active, self-willed person who disrupted the authoritarian harmony, and the evil society was one in which the authorities, who were always right, were not respected or obeyed.²⁷ Polytheism with its emphasis upon harmony and integration was thus pre-eminently a religion of the status quo, in which sin was basically an aberration to be abhorred because it disrupted the natural integration and rhythm of the universe. Consequently, in no country has such a religion ever been the cause of a revolution in the social structure to provide justice for the common man. The ancient polytheisms were so tied to the political and social orders which they buttressed that they inevitably perished in the decline and fall of their nations.

In Israel religious faith was based upon an entirely different theological foundation. The God of Israel was not a natural god. Nature was his handiwork, and no force in it was more characteristic of him than another. As the Lord of nature he transcended it and thus transcended the whole realm of the pagan gods. He was one (cf. Deut. 6:4), not many; he possessed no consort and no offspring. The family principle was unneeded as a means of ordering the cosmic forces, because Yahweh himself was that order and the source of all power and creativity.

As indicated in pp. 349-51, Yahweh was known to Israel because of his great historical acts. The dominant themes of Israel's faith centered in the God who had vanquished Pharaoh by the use of natural signs and wonders, who ²⁶ See further H. and H. A. Frankfort, John A. Wilson, Thorkild Jacobsen, and William A. Irwin, The Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1946), chs i-vii, xii.

²⁷ Cf. Jacobsen, in Frankfort, et al., Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man, pp. 202-3; Henri Frankfort, Ancient Egyptian Religion (New York: Columbia University Press, 1948), ch. iii.

THE FAITH OF ISRAEL

had chosen this people for himself, bound them to him in covenant, led them through the wilderness and into the Land of Promise. Israel's faith was thus grounded in what God had done and was yet to do in the sphere of human history. There was no primary interest in nature as such, except as it revealed God's creative power and as it was used by him to further his purposes in history. To think of him as originally a mountain god or fertility deity is simply to overlook the clear implications of the earliest poetry and confessional statements which indicate that Yahweh's primary sphere was history, nature playing a secondary role. It is true that the theophany on Mount Sinai traditionally was of such a character that Yahweh's appearances were frequently described in the categories of the storm (Exod. 19; Judg. 5; Hab. 3; etc.), together with many expressions which once were used of Baal in Canaan (e.g., Deut. 33:26; Ps. 68:4, 33). It is also true that Yahweh was seen as the power in nature's fertility and as the dispenser of her good things, even as was Baal (e.g., Gen. 49:25; Deut. 33:13-17; Ps. 29.9). Yet such language was used only to exalt his cosmic power; it was not the basic language of the faith.

In polytheism precisely the opposite was the case. There the original and primary metaphors by means of which the divine was apprehended were derived from nature. Metaphors drawn from society, such as king, lord, father, mother, judge, or craftsman, were important in the historical period but were nonetheless secondary and imposed on earlier forms. As a result, there was little stability in the conception of the outward form of the gods, theriomorphic and anthropomorphic forms abounding in mixed confusion. In Israel, by contrast, anthropomorphism was central because the polytheistic integration of the divine, natural, and human worlds was broken. Metaphors drawn from nature were secondary, not indigenous. In other words, the basic language of the Bible and of the Christian religion is an anthropomorphic language, drawn from the categories of personality and community. Confusion with metaphors drawn from other realms should be avoided because there is a basic relatedness and kinship between God and human life which does not exist in the same sense between God and nature.

Israel's knowledge of God was not based, therefore, on a numinous awareness of nature as in polytheism. It was founded in historical event and in special relationship with human existence. As a result, the problem of life was seen to be grounded in the realm of the will of man as it was related to the will of God. The polytheistic notion of the rhythmic harmony existing between nature, man, and deity was done away. Instead, a tension continually existed between the will of God and the will of man. Revolution in history was expected because God was at work mightily to effect his historical purposes. The religious literature of polytheism was accordingly of little use to Israel, because its mythology was essentially the description of the workings of nature, the powers of which were immanent and personified. In Israel religious literature took many forms, but its core was an interpreted history. Thus it was that biblical faith produced that conception of human history as a meaningful process en route to a goal which has exerted such a profound influence upon Western culture. Such a conception could never arise in polytheism with its concentration on the cyclical rhythm of nature and on the function of human existence as integration in this rhythm.

2. The Nature of Biblical Monotheism.—The transcendence of Yahweh over the realms of history and nature and thus over the sphere of the pagan gods meant, however, that the problem of the one in relation to the many forces of the cosmos was raised to a degree of acuteness unknown elsewhere. Polytheism by its very nature was as tolerant as the philosophies and mysticisms which later developed out of it. Travelers and sojourners from Canaan in Egypt, for example, found it comparatively easy to identify the chief gods of their homeland with certain of those in the new land and thus to acclimate themselves in the new religious environment. Beliefs, rites, and customs circulated with ease from one polytheistic sphere to another, particularly in those times when political conquest opened the avenues for cultural interchange. Yet in Israel from as early as the time of the conquest of Canaan one of the most important aspects of Yahweh was his "jealousy." This meant that he was intensely and zealously concerned for his own prerogatives. To him alone belonged all authority and power. No other deity was associated with him in his great acts (e.g., Deut. 32:12); no other deity was to be compared with him or placed on his level; no images whatsoever were to be made of him; nothing in the universe was worthy to be worshiped except him and him alone. He would not put up with a religious tolerance on the part of his people but insisted on their exclusive and undivided loyalty to him. As time passed and the issues were clarified, these assertions became increasingly explicit. The worship of man-made images was derided as foolish and dangerous; the gods of the nations were ridiculed as "no gods," until Second Isaiah forthrightly exclaimed that before Yahweh there was no god; neither shall there be after him. Besides him there is no savior; he will work and none can hinder it (Isa. 43:10-13).

Such claims for the exclusive prerogatives of one deity are unique and astonishing. In the vast sea of a tolerant polytheism this jealousy of Yahweh was such a new and startling conception that it is small wonder the Israelite common people sought to compromise it and numerous kings to qualify it. In the past most scholars have assumed that the greatest danger to Israelite faith lay in the temptation to identify Yahweh with Baal of Canaan. It can be shown, however, that a far greater danger lay in another direction. Of course, as in every religion, numerous pagan intrusions among the common people are to be traced to magical rather than to theological reasons. An illustration is the widespread use of figurines made in the image of the Canaanite fertility or mother goddess.²⁸ Yet this was not a danger to normative Yahwism. The real peril lay in the conception of the divine assembly—that is, in the heavenly host associated with Yahweh in his rule of the world.

References to this heavenly assembly are numerous. One need only recall the vision of the prophet Micaiah in I Kings 22:19-22, and the scene in Job 1-2. In this assembly Yahweh was enthroned as king and judge, presiding over the deliberations. The divine members of the council were called "angels" (properly "messengers"), "ministers," "servants," "holy ones," and "sons of God" (a borrowed Canaanite term meaning simply "divine beings"). That this conception of a divine assembly or council was present in early as well as in late Israel is evident from passages in the earliest strata of the Pentateuch and in early poetry.²⁹ Whether the meetings of the council were held only once a year on New Year's Day, as some scholars believe,³⁰ we have no certain knowledge, but it can be inferred from the evidence that at least one of the purposes of the meetings was to pronounce judgment upon sin and rebellion. The true prophet was one who heard the divine sentence and commission (cf. Isa. 6:8), whereas the false prophet did not (cf. Jer. 23:16-18).

The danger to Israel in this conception of the divine assembly lay in its similarity to divine ²⁸ See further, G. Ernest Wright, "How Did Early Israel Differ from Her Neighbors?" The Biblical Archaeologist, VI (1943), 16.

²⁹ Observe not only the frequent mention of angels but such a passage as Gen. 3:22: "Behold, the man is become as one of us," i.e., he has asserted himself to possess a knowledge like that possessed by a member of the heavenly council; cf. also Exod. 15:11 (LXX); Deut. 32:8-9 (LXX); 33:2-3; Pss. 29; 89:5-8.

³⁰ See especially Julian Morgenstern's articles in Hebrew Union College Annual, VI (1929), 1 ff.; XII-XIII (1937-38), 1 ff.; XIV (1939), 40 ff.

assemblies in Canaan and in Babylon.³¹ In Israel the undefined nature of the council's membership left the door open for a large amount of syncretism. While the exalted position of Yahweh himself was not changed, pagan deities could be introduced as members of his heavenly host. That this happened during the seventh century, for example, is clear from the statement that Manasseh erected altars to the host of heaven, meaning the sun, moon, and stars, in the very courts of the house of Yahweh (II Kings 21:3-5). Jeremiah refers to the people's burning incense on the housetops to all the host of heaven and pouring out drink offerings to other gods (Jer. 19:13). While the Deuteronomists and Jeremiah denounce such paganizing of the faith (e.g., Deut. 4:19), the heavenly bodies continued as members of the assembly in postexilic Judaism (cf. Neh. 9:6; Ps. 148:1-3), though it was not permitted to give them independent worship as had been done in the time of Manasseh.

Ps. 82 goes a step further by assuming that the gods of the nations are actually members of the host. This psalm pictures a heavenly assize in which God calls the gods to account for their misdeeds. He indicts them for their failure to provide justice for the poor and the oppressed (vss. 2-4). In an aside (vs. 5) he exclaims that they so wander about in the darkness of their understanding that the foundations of the universal order are shaken. As a result, he sentences them to die like a mortal (vss. 6-7). The final verse is the poet's prayer that God will arise and assume direct control over all the earth. We infer from this that the psalmist takes for granted the membership of pagan deities in the assembly; to them Yahweh has delegated authority over the nations. This recalls the reference in Deut. 32:8-9 which, according to the correct text preserved by the Septuagint, speaks of God's apportioning the nations and establishing the boundaries of the peoples according to the number of the divine beings, but has retained Israel as his special possession.³² From such a conception it was but a step to the later belief in the patron angels whom God placed in charge of the nations (cf. Dan. 10:20).

The Israelite seems not to have conceived of an inanimate nature any more than did the polytheist. The prophets, for example, in proclaiming the divine indictment against the people called heaven, earth, and the everlasting ³¹ Cf., Jacobsen in Frankfort, et al., Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man, chs. v-vi.

³² Cf. also Deut. 33:3, the first phrase of which probably is to be rendered, "Yea, the ones who care for the peoples," i.e., the guardians of the peoples: see Frank M. Cross, Jr., and David Noel Freedman, "The Blessing of Moses," Journal of Biblical Literature, LXVII (1948), 193, 200.

THE FAITH OF ISRAEL

mountains as witnesses (e.g., Mic. 6:2). It seems improbable that this is simply poetic language with nothing concrete behind it. Much more probable is the assumption that the heavenly court of Yahweh included the whole host of powers in heaven and earth. The ambiguity between such a conception and that of polytheism is one which many in Israel did not escape. Yet the difference is much more phenomenal. In normative Yahwism these powers were left undefined and not clearly distinguished from one another. Not one of them received any special attention. None were to be worshiped or provided with temple, altar, or cultus. Yahweh alone is the source of all power, authority, and creativity. All other heavenly beings owe their existence and functioning solely to him. They possess no independent validity and thus are not the focus of religious attention. It is a dangerous waste of time to give them heed, when all direction of life, of history, and of nature is in the hands of Yahweh, who demands exclusive worship. Israel's solution of the problem of the one in relation to the many was thus an intense, unswerving monolatry, any deviation from which was rebellion and idolatry.

During the last century the German scholar Max Müller invented the term "henotheism," which since that time has been widely used to designate the faith of early Israel. It means the worship of one god who is confined to one geographical area, yet an exclusive worship which does not deny the existence of other gods. The value of this term is that it prevents the interpretation of Israel's faith in terms of a philosophical monism. Yet actually it is an exceedingly poor term because it does not do justice to the cosmic power and rulership of Yahweh and to the complete devaluation of all other superhuman powers. Furthermore, it is impossible to trace a development in the Old Testament from "henotheism" to "monotheism"; indeed, if one were forced to contest the issue he might argue that the movement was in precisely the reverse direction, since the composition of the divine assembly undeniably grew more complex and syncretistic with the passing centuries. Either the whole of the Old Testament is "henotheistic" or else none of it is. Even Second Isaiah was no "monotheist" in the unitarian sense, for he believed in the heavenly host (i.e., the stars) as superhuman beings created and appointed to their work by Yahweh.⁸³

On the other hand, the term "monotheism" places the emphasis upon that unique and astonishing feature of Israelite faith: the unity of all power and authority in Yahweh, who is so exalted that even the heavenly powers are called upon to praise him (cf. Pss. 103:20-21; 148:1-6), and who if he wills can destroy these powers (Ps. 82). Yet at no point in the Bible can "monotheism" be applied in a unitarian or Greek monistic sense. The word must be defined by the actual phenomena in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, for it is intended to designate that which these three religions have in common over against all other religions. That is the transcendence of one God over nature and history; who is the giver and sustainer of all life; who is without sexuality or mythology; whose holiness does not permit images to be made of him; whose jealousy does not allow any worship except that directed to him alone; and whose superiority over all powers in the host of heaven and earth, including demons and false gods, is such as to make him completely unique and sui generis.⁸⁴

⁸³ See Charles Cutler Torrey, The Second Isaiah (New York: Charles Scribner's Sons, 1928), pp. 309, 376-77 (on Isa. 40:26; 48:13).

If we are deprived of the use of "monotheism" for describing the faith of Israel in even its early stages, then we shall experience considerable difficulty in finding the exact point at which it can be used. The divine world grew steadily more complex in conception, including the elaboration of a considerable mythology of angels and demons in later Judaism. In the New Testament it is affirmed that God the Father as the ultimate authority in the universe has exalted Christ to his right hand and put all things, including the angels and host of heaven, in subjection to him (cf. Heb. 1-2). Such heavenly powers are to receive no independent worship, for this would spoil the "simplicity that is in Christ" (cf. Col. 2:18). There is yet another realm of the superhuman, however, composed of Satan together with the principalities and powers of darkness against which we wrestle (cf., e.g., Eph. 6:12), though the victory is assured through Christ. The attitude of the apostle Paul toward the pagan deities indicates that one cannot force a philosophical monism on him any more than on the Israelite of old. In I Cor. 10:19-21 the existence of such deities is not altogether denied; they are simply degraded to the rank of demons. With the development of the host of Satan there was no longer any need to conceive of the gods as members of Yahweh's assembly with whom he was displeased, as in Ps. 82. If their existence was not completely ignored, one might, if pressed, assume them to be members of Satan's host. It is surely obvious that no dictionary ever intended to exclude early Christianity from its definition of monotheism in favor of an abstract monism as conceived in later philosophy. Indeed, the trinitarian Christian has always and will ever resist the attempt so to exclude it.⁸⁵

⁸⁴ The greatest defense of the use of the term "monotheism" in this sense for even the earliest religion of the nation of Israel is that of W. F. Albright, From the Stone Age to Christianity (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1940), chs. iv-v; cf. also his Archaeology and the Religion of Israel (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins Press, 1942), p. 116.

Yet we must beware that such a discussion as the foregoing does not lead us to a betrayal of the real nature of biblical faith. The significance of the latter does not lie in a developing human conception of deity or in an "ethical monotheism." It is a confessional proclamation of the sovereignty of God and of his saving acts in man's behalf, a proclamation which demands of its hearers that they make a decision as to where they stand in relation to this sovereignty. For God is to be known not in the first instance as the power in nature's rhythmic cycle, nor as the absolute of metaphysical speculation, but as the "Lord" who "chose" Israel for himself and as the "Father" of our "Lord" Jesus Christ.

D. The Being of God. 1. The God Who Acts.

—The dominant impression given by the Old Testament about God is the concreteness, definiteness, and energy of his being. His ever-present power is to be seen and felt in all movement of nature and history. His dynamic moving vigor stands in complete contrast to the Greek "unmoved Mover," to the mystic's Source of illumination and beatification, and to every form of deism or philosophical abstraction. He is "the living God" in contrast to the dying-rising deities of the natural cycle in polytheism. The idols of the nations know nothing and can do nothing; Yahweh alone is the source of both creative and destructive activity. Baal may be away on a journey or asleep (I Kings 18:27), but Yahweh never sleeps (cf. e.g., Ps. 121); his directing presence is the comfort of the faithful, the terror of the wicked, and the problem for which Job seeks an answer (Job 7:17-21).

The existence of God was never doubted in Israel; but this powerful, direct, energetic, and pervasive activity of God was and has always been the chief source of men's difficulty with biblical faith. The fool who says there is no God (Pss. 14:1; 53:1) was actually calling God's works, not his existence, into question. He was in the same position as those of whom Jeremiah speaks, "It is not he; neither shall evil come upon us; neither shall we see sword nor famine" (Jer. 5:12). The tension which God's ever-seeing eye places at the heart of existence led men to attempt an escape into deistic idolatry. The practical atheism of the sinner who claims to believe that God does not see him and does not act directly in the affairs of this earth has always been the simplest means of escape from this biblical conception of the active, living God.

In the philosophies and mysticisms of Greece and India, time and history are without significance except as they are the source of evil and misery from which man must escape to find the good life. Deity cannot be involved in the corroding movement of earthly life; if it were, it could be neither absolute nor good. The Bible in the most daring fashion asserts by contrast the meaningfulness of history and the dynamic working of God within it. Man in history has betrayed his destiny by sin; but God's purpose in his earthly creation is not defeated. His directing presence is the ground of man's hope, for his redemptive activity is never ceasing. He adjusts that activity to the contingencies of earthly need, yet never compromising his being, his holiness, his sovereignty, his righteousness.

2. The Anthropomorphism of God.—The Old Testament makes no attempt to define God's being. Throughout he is simply depicted as a person by means of a free and frank use of anthropomorphic language. To be sure, there are various levels of anthropomorphism; a difference exists between the simple story form of Gen. 2-3 and the more abstract and theologically self-conscious presentation of Gen. 1 and Ezekiel. Yet this difference is actually a minor one of degree. In general, God is depicted as possessing practically all the characteristics of a human being, including bodily form and personality, though excluding sex.

In the past there has been a tendency to assume that this aspect of the Old Testament indicates a fairly primitive level of religious conception; growth to a "higher" level of thought, it has been claimed, came with the increasing emphasis on the spirituality of God. This is an exceedingly doubtful assumption. Nowhere in the Bible can there be said to be a doctrine of God's spirituality, unless one were to except John 4:24. The spirit of God is not to be identified with God himself. The latter is conceived in personal, even corporeal terms, and perhaps the most vivid example and the climax of this anthropomorphism is to be found in the doctrine of the Incarnation. In pp. 358-59 something of the significance of this vocabulary drawn from human analogy was suggested. God is not to be depicted by a mixture of metaphors drawn from nature as in polytheism; he is not conceived as an abstract idea or principle; he cannot be apprehended primarily by means of an undefined analogy drawn from wind or breath (hence "spirit"). He is a living, active, forceful personality whom men can meet, know, and worship, before whom they can bow in confession of sin and not be broken as before an inexorable law of fate, but in whom there is both justice and forgiveness.

⁸⁵ For a more detailed review of the point of view outlined in this section see G. Ernest Wright, The Old Testament Against Its Environment (Chicago: Henry Regnery Co., 1950), ch. i.

To be sure, anthropomorphism has its limits which many in Israel transgressed. The second commandment (Exod. 20:4; cf. Deut. 4:15-19) thus forbids all attempts to confine or materialize God's being. He cannot be seen by human eye, and thus in theophany his presence is hidden by a blinding brilliance, called his "glory," or by a cloud or smoke (Exod. 19:9; 24:15-18; Num. 10:11, 34; I Kings 8:10-11; Isa. 6:4; Ezek. 1:26-28). He does not lie or change his mind as does man (Num. 23:19; I Sam. 15:29; Mal. 3:6). The contrast between the weakness of man and the strength of God can be said to be the same as that between flesh and unconfined spirit (Isa. 31:3). Indeed, God is God and not man (Hos. 11:9), but he reveals himself as a personality whom men can know and describe as being known in the language familiar to them.

3. The Holiness of God.—The conception of holiness was that which most distinguished the divine from the human. It is exceedingly difficult to define, and the etymology of the Hebrew word, even if certainly known—which it is not—could not provide much assistance. It is rooted in man's knowledge of mysterium tremendum and of the "numinous," to use the terms of Rudolf Otto.³⁶ As such it defies a completely rational analysis. It is that which makes God deity and without which he would not be deity. Thus it is the essence of the divine which separates him from the human. In primitive religion and in polytheism it is at the center of religious attention and known as the mysterious, positive power which breaks into the world, often in the most unexpected ways. It produces awe, wonder, and fear. It leads men to elaborate devices which are thought to control this awesome dynamism. Certain things are taboo; care must be taken to separate clean and unclean, pure and impure, the holy and the profane.

The basis of holiness is thus quite different from morality; this is true both in paganism and in Israel. In the latter, relics of the primitive, nonmoral dynamism survived in the priestly cultus and in the popular interpretation of certain mysterious events (cf. I Sam. 5-6). Yet holiness as the essence of God's being was qualified by the other attributes of his character, and thus differed from pagan holiness primarily as the total being of Yahweh differed from that of the gods. Yahweh's holiness possessed a consistency unknown elsewhere because his character and purpose were consistent. As in paganism, anything especially separated and related to God derived its holiness from him. In the case of cultic objects, rites, persons, and places of worship this derived holiness seems to have differed only in the sense that the total meaning of the cultus in Israel had a different meaning than in paganism (see pp. 375-87). Yet in the case of the people as a whole, holiness expressed both the relatedness to Yahweh as known in election and the obedience which the Lord required of his servants as made clear in the covenant. To be holy as God is holy was thus the reason for obedience to God's law in the Holiness Code (Lev. 17-26); and from this viewpoint the whole aim of Israel's existence was to be as a kingdom of priests, a holy nation (Exod. 19:6), sharing in a measure God's holiness because they were faithful to his covenant. Hence in Israel the dominant conception of holiness was no longer that of an irrational, impersonal dynamism in nature; instead it was controlled by the knowledge of God's personal and consistent character and imparted by God to those things in creation which he chose to separate to himself. His being was holy and the source of holiness, and thus distinct from anything in creation; yet he was also personal, and holiness was the mystery of his personality wherein he willed to be Lord and Lord alone.

4. The Name and Attributes of God.—The revelation of God's name was a further sign of his personality, and a warning against all mystical and philosophical misunderstanding of his being. That this revelation occurred at the time of the Exodus is the historical assumption of the Elohist and priestly writers (Exod. 3:13-15; 6:3). The pronunciation of the name was probably "Yahweh," but its meaning has been much debated. At the present time, however, by far the best linguistic arguments have been marshaled in favor of the view that the word is the causative of the verb "to be," meaning "he causes to be," that is, he is the creator.³⁷

In possession of the name of God, the Israelite worshiped with confidence in God's knowableness. He used the name in prayers and oaths, in blessing and cursing in war and triumph. It was not to be used lightly or in false swearing (Exod. 20:7). Places of worship bear the name, and the worshiper trusts that God will hear and answer prayer when offered

³⁷ See Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, pp. 197-99; and Albright's review of B. N. Wambacq, L'épithète divine Jahvé S'ba'ot, Journal of Biblical Literature, LXVII (1948), 379-80. The phrase in Exod. 3:14 ("I AM THAT I AM") in its original form in the third person would mean, according to this view, "He causes to be that which is," i.e., "He brings what exists into being."

³⁶ The Idea of the Holy, tr. John W. Harvey (London: Oxford University Press, 1923).

in his name and directed toward the sacred sanctuary (cf. e.g., I Kings 8:28 ff.). The close connection between God's name and being can be understood only in the light of the religious thought of the ancient world, wherein the name of a deity or even of his temple often possessed independent mythological significance and could be used in multitudinous ways, especially in the realm of magic. In Israel magic dropped into the background; and while the name continued to play a vital role in cultic activity, it was primarily conceived as the gracious revelation of the covenant Lord whereby he could be definitely worshiped.³⁸ The large number of epithets and appellations used in addition to the proper name served the same purpose, most of them emphasizing certain particular aspects of God's being or activity.³⁹

The so-called attributes of God, such as his justice, love or grace, jealousy, anger, wrath and vengeance, are also drawn from the category of personality. As the living personal God engaged in a creative, historical work, his active pleasure and displeasure were vividly expressed by the language of human analogy. The one word which more than any other summarizes the totality of God's attributes is "righteousness"; Yahweh pre-eminently is the "righteous God" ('elôhim çaddîq). The term was derived from the realm of jurisprudence; it is the "right" to which one is legally entitled. Yahweh is righteous, therefore, because he helps his people to their "right." Conversely, he is righteous because he actively shows his "wrath" and his judgment upon the wicked who are his enemies and who thwart his purposes. In the deliverance from Egypt God's righteousness was known as his saving power directed to a weak and defenseless people. Consequently, throughout Israel's history God was looked upon as zealously concerned with the poor, the weak, the outcast, who had nothing else to depend upon than his righteousness. Thus salvation and righteousness in many passages are synonyms.⁴⁰ Yet the work of salvation is not conceived apart from God's active warfare against evil, and this also is his righteousness. The word "vengeance" has the same double meaning. When applied to God, it does not refer to an unjust vindictiveness. On the one hand, it is his salvation (cf. Isa. 35:4; 61:2); on the other, his just retribution for the wicked (cf. Isa. 59:17; Jer. 46:10; 51:6).

³⁸ Cf. Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, I, 96-97.

³⁹ A number of them were borrowed from Canaanite religion, e.g., Elohim, the most general and abstract of all names used for God (for its Canaanite background see G. Ernest Wright, "The Significance of the Temple in the Ancient Near East, Part III: The Temple in Palestine-Syria," The Biblical Archaeologist, VII [1944], 69), El (both the general Semitic word for "god" and the name of the head of the Canaanite pantheon), Elyon ("exalted"), Adon ("Lord") and Baal ("Lord"). The last mentioned does not appear in the Pentateuch; it came to be used as the common surrogate for the Canaanite storm-god, Hadad, only after about the sixteenth century B.C. It was used in Israel of Yahweh during the early centuries of the nation's life in Palestine, but after the Elijah-Elisha movement in the ninth century it dropped rapidly from use because of its dangerous connotations (cf., e.g., Hos. 2:17). Shaddai, commonly translated "almighty," was derived from a Mesopotamian word and evidently meant originally "mountaineer." It is unknown in Canaanite religion and was probably brought by the patriarchs to Palestine as an epithet of the "god of the fathers" (so P in Gen. 17:1; Exod. 6:3; see Albright, From Stone Age to Christianity, pp. 184-85; also, "The Names Shaddai and Abram," Journal of Biblical Literature, LIV (1935), 180-93).

Perhaps the best description of the personal character of God as known from his historical acts is to be found in an old liturgical confession embedded in Exod. 34:6-7 and quoted at least in part in many subsequent passages (e.g., II Chr. 30:9; Neh. 9:17, 31; Joel 2:13; Jonah 4:2; Ps. 86:15; etc.); "Yahweh, Yahweh, a compassionate and gracious God, slow to anger, abundant in hêsedh [gracious loyalty to his covenanted promises] and fidelity, keeping hêsedh for thousands, forgiving iniquity and rebellion and sin, though by no means acquitting [the guilty], visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children and upon the children's children unto the third, even the fourth [generation]." We should note here the emphasis upon the gracious, loyal, and forgiving nature of God, an emphasis which stands at the center of the Old as well as of the New Testament. Yet this divine grace is a two-edged sword which appears in the human scene as the power working both for salvation and for judgment, that salvation may be accomplished. Thus the man of faith worships a gracious and righteous God who responds to human need in a personal way. To the penitent he offers forgiveness and a new chance to accept his commission. Yet he will never rest in his warfare against the wicked; his righteous and gracious holiness permits of nothing else. Were it not so, man's hope of earth would indeed be futile.

E. God and the World. 1. The Relationship Between Creator and Creation.—The God who formed Israel into a nation, through it to establish his sovereignty over the lives of all men, stood in a completely free and independent relationship to human history. At the same time he was the creator of the world and stood in the same unconfined and unlimited relationship to the universe. The unity of his will and being was the ground of the world's unity and, therefore, of the inner relationship between nature and history. In Israel, accordingly, the conception of a universal theogony or dualism of opposing forces was excluded as a necessary means of explaining the origin and movement of the world. So also was every form of pantheism in which God and the world are in some measure identified, or in which the divine is believed to be immanent in the evolving process, a principle, whether personalized or impersonal, pulsating through the movement of nature and giving it form and coherence. By New Testament times, it is true, a dualistic element had been introduced through the development of the doctrine of Satan in intertestamental Judaism. But this was a cosmic projection of the inner spiritual and moral struggle of man. Satan was not conceived as a natural power in the sense that the opposition forces of polytheism were; he is allowed his temporary opportunities and victories, but his kingdom is not eternal. Yet in the Old Testament even this amount of dualism is not present; the few references to Satan belong to postexilic literature in which he is still a member in good standing of God's heavenly council, a tester and tempter of man (I Chr. 21:1; Job 1-2; Zech. 3:1-2).

⁴⁰ This is especially true in Second Isaiah; cf. Isa. 41:10; 42:6; 45:8; 51:5-6; but see also Isa. 11:4; 32:17; Mic. 6:5.

Israel's conception of the universe was so closely related to the ancient conceptual world that the creation of matter ex nihilo was not a question which yet was raised. When the subject became an issue under the influence of Greek thought, it was promptly settled (II Macc. 7:28 is the first such reference). For the most part, God's creation is described by the use of very simple, anthropomorphic words (e.g., "to make," "form," "establish"), though the priestly author of Gen. 1 does attempt a more abstract presentation by using the term bārā' and the conception of the divine creative word.

The Israelite view of the world was essentially that of the other peoples of the time. Heaven was not a limitless space. It was erected as a vault over the earth; it was a solid substance, a "firmament," which kept out the primeval waters and thus left a clear space for the sky and the dry earth (Gen. 1:6-10; Isa. 40:22). There was evidently a series of heavens (Deut. 10:14; I Kings 8:27; Ps. 148:4); the number of them is not mentioned, though in Babylon and in Judaism seven were distinguished. In the highest heaven was the palace (temple) and throne of God. Both heaven and earth were believed to be supported on pillars or mountains; those supporting the earth reached down into the waters of the underworld ocean, so that in poetry the earth could be said to have been founded on the seas (Pss. 24:2; 136:6). Below the earth, yet still associated with it, was the underworld, Sheol, the home of the "shades" of the dead.

The whole of this universe was God's creation, and its stability was due to his continuing and sustaining power. Life was possible because God created and preserved a space for it in the midst of the primeval waters, a space which could be done away at any moment were it not for his gracious will to preserve it (cf. Gen 6-9). The utter dependence of all life upon the creative will and sustaining energy of God was thus the Hebrew emphasis.

In Israel, however, God as creator cannot be understood apart from the conception of God as "Lord." As the originator of the universe and all its life, he was its sovereign. The life of the creature was not conceived to exist by its own natural resources; it lived in relationship to the divine Person and the events of its existence had significance only in the context of this dependent relationship. Thus creation bore a close connection to history; it was the starting point of history. There was no pessimism regarding the worth of God's work such as is so frequently encountered in other religions; it was all "good" (Gen. 1). Accordingly, it was a proper setting for the "good" life. The material nature of man was not an evil thing which separated him from God; man's trouble lay in the realm of the mind and the emotions, in his refusal to accept or remain in his dependent relationship. Consequently, God's creative work is felt to imply a teleology in the world order which gives the clue to the meaning of its history. The words "in the beginning" involve a conception of "the end of days,"⁴¹ and thus a meaningful historical process directed by the divine Sovereign. In prophetic theology the original creation was conceived to have been so marred by human sin that God's judgment would take the form of a destruction of the world order (Isa. 2:21; 34:4; 51:6; Jer. 4:23-26; Amos 7:4; Zeph. 1:15), though not a complete return to the original chaos. Beyond this will come God's erection of a new heaven and a new earth (Isa. 11:6-9; 51:6; 60:20; 65:17; 66:22; Ezek. 47; Amos 9:13). God the creator, the judge, and the redeemer are one and the same God, as will become perfectly clear in the new creation. Creation and history, therefore, are involved in one another because God is the Lord of both.

2. The Revelation of God in the World.—If, however, the Israelite conception set a gulf between God and his creation, if God's being was in no way confined in or a part of nature, how did he make himself and his will known upon the earth? One means, of course, was through his steady support of the cycle of nature; but that which received most emphasis were the "signs" and "wonders." Any spectacular happening in history, but particularly in nature, was a "sign," a revelation of God. We today are inclined to define miracle as an event which contravenes natural law, and we have diligently sought to reduce this element in the Bible by means of our new knowledge of nature. Yet in the Bible a miracle is something quite different. It is any spectacular happening or "wonder" which is a "sign" of God's working. Most of these "wonders" are capable of a double explanation (cf. John 12:28-32), but from the biblical viewpoint they cannot be explained away. The "signs" and "wonders" of God in nature are significant revelations and as much the normal language of God as the dependable order of nature. The reason is that nature is not only the arena of history but the instrument of history and thus of God's historical work.⁴²

⁴¹ Cf. Ps. 102:26-27; see Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, II, 53.

The gulf which separated God and creation was bridged, however, in an even more important way by God himself. That was his direct communication and intercourse with human life. The language of revelation was simple and concrete. For the most part God "spoke" or revealed himself (the reflexive of the verb "to see," i.e., he permitted himself to be seen), and men "heard" or "saw." Thus Yahweh spoke to Abram and Abram obeyed "as the LORD had spoken unto him" (Gen. 12:4). So also God spoke directly to the prophet, his messenger, and the latter proclaimed, "Thus saith the Lord." Dreams and visions were regarded as important mediums of revelation and were emphasized by those who were more self-conscious about the problem of immediacy and manner of God's communication (cf. especially the Elohistic writer in Gen. 15:1; Num. 12:6).

Yet in whatever manner God appeared, he did so in order to speak and to have his "word" heard and obeyed. God's "word" was one of the most general terms used by Israel for revelation. This word came to all the great leaders of Israel; in legal circles it was the law, the commands of God; in Deuteronomic circles it was the clue to the meaning of Israel's history, for as proclaimed by the succession of prophets it was the means whereby God directed the course of his people's life (Deut. 18:15-19; cf. Jer. 7:13, 25-26). In the psychology of the ancient world a person's word was an extension of his personal presence, and this was the case with the word of Yahweh in Israel. It was endowed with the personal power and planned activity of God himself (Isa. 45:23; 55:10-11). He sends his word and the afflicted are healed or delivered (Ps. 107:20), the prophet's heart burns as with fire (Jer. 20:9), yet with joy and rejoicing (Jer. 15:16), the people despise it to their own hurt (Isa. 5:24), whereas it should be hidden in the heart (Ps. 119:11), obeyed and praised (Ps. 56:10). Yet there is no clear hypostatization of the word in Israel; it was not so separated from God as to be an independent being, though in the later Jewish Targums it seems to have been so used in order to avoid the frank anthropomorphism of the sacred narratives.

The gulf between God and his creation was further bridged by the conceptions of God's presence, his angel, his spirit, and his wisdom. The idea of God's presence or face (pānim) originated in paganism wherein it was a concrete reality in the deity's statue in his temple. In Israel, while there was no such materialization of the divine being, yet his presence was still to be met in the sanctuary (see pp. 378-79), and his face would shine or be lifted up upon the sincere and contrite worshiper (cf. Num. 6:24-26). To be sure, no one could see God's being; it was always hidden by his glory (see above, p. 363). Yet in the context of the pānim it could be said that one might see God "face to face," though such an expression could not be taken in a materially literal sense, unless the case of Moses was in some measure an exception (Exod. 33:11; Deut. 34:10; but cf. Num. 14:14; Deut. 4:12; 5:4; Ezek. 20:35). In other words, the use of the term "presence" does not explain, it simply affirms the present reality of God with his people.

God's angel, spirit, and wisdom were separate entities which he created, though as such they must largely be considered in function as extensions of his active personality. The angel as his messenger did not possess an independent personality. God "appeared" to Abraham (Gen. 18:1), but the following verse speaks of the three angelic visitors who were evidently considered as the mediums of that "appearance." Throughout Gen. 18-19, verses in which the visitors are said to speak and to carry out the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah alternate with verses in which God speaks and himself destroys the cities. After Jacob's nocturnal wrestling with the heavenly messenger, he believed he had seen God himself "face to face" (Gen. 32:22-30). Thus God's word and action are so completely identical with those of the angel that the independent personality of the latter fades into insignificance. Only during the intertestamental period do the personalities of separate angels, such as Gabriel, Michael, and Raphael appear to have been distinguished. Consequently, the conception of angel must be said to be nothing more than a theological means of relating God to his world and of describing how that relation was achieved.

⁴² See Paul S. Minear, Eyes of Faith (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1946), pp. 183-97; Robinson, Inspiration and Revelation in O.T., pp. 34-48.

The spirit of God was another such means, though appearing much more frequently than angel. Unlike the latter, it was not conceived in anthropomorphic terms. It was primarily the means whereby the empowering activity of God within man was expressed. Consequently, it was conceived after the analogy of wind (the primary meaning of the Hebrew rûah), rather than of the human body. It was God's agent acting within man, and thus by simple extension it could be conceived also as the life-producing energy in man. On the one hand, when the spirit entered the prophet, he prophesied (cf., e.g., Num. 11:24-29; cf. I Sam. 10:10; Joel 2:28); when it entered the man of valor, or any servant of God, he was empowered to do the work God meant him to do (Judg. 6:34; cf. 14:6, 19; Isa. 42:1); indeed its presence in the midst of Israel had led and saved the people in the days of old and would do so yet again (Isa. 63:11; Hag. 2:5). On the other hand, it is God who gives man his breath or spirit (Isa. 42:5; Zech. 12:1; Job 27:3), that is, the mysterious principle of life, which, if God takes away, means death for a man (Job 34:14; Ps. 104:29-30). Consequently, in the new aeon to come God's spirit will be poured out on creation and make all things new, including a new spirit in man (Isa. 32:15; 44:3; Ezek. 11:19; 36:26-27).⁴⁸

The personification of wisdom as that by which God created and ordered the world seems to have been a subject of importance only to a small group in later Israel (Prov. 8:22-31; cf. Job 28; Ps. 104:24). Yet in Jewish and Christian theology it played a significant role; among other things, it was identified with the spirit of God (Dan. 5:11; Wisd. Sol. 9:17) and with the Word or law of God (Ps. 111:10; 119:97-104; Ecclesiasticus: Prologue; Baruch 3:9-4:4). As such, it formed an important bridge between the biblical and Hellenic worlds, especially in the doctrine of the logos. Thus John 1 could adopt the form of the latter but fill it with the meaning derived from the pre-existent wisdom-word and identify it with Christ.

In the Old Testament, therefore, and in the New as well, the problem of transcendence and immanence in the relationship of God to his creation was not keenly felt. Consequently, it was not a major issue to the faith in the sense that it was later to become in Judaism and Christian philosophy. The independent, personal, and creative activity of God was so conceived as to combine his transcendence with his lordship over the world. An unbridgeable gulf existed between his being and his creation, but it was one which formed no barrier to the exercise of his sovereignty. He bridged it as he himself chose and in ways which permitted men to employ a variety of conceptual language in depicting it.

⁴⁸ See further, Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, II, 18-31; Robinson, Inspiration and Revelation in O.T., pp. 50-53, 74-77.

F. God and Man. 1. Man in the Image of God.—The central fact about the place of man in creation according to the Old Testament is the dignity and honor accorded him by God. As Ps. 8 affirms, God has made man almost like a divine being ("a little lower than the angels"), has given him the insignia of royalty ("crowned him with glory and honor"), and has placed the whole of the earthly creation under his rule. This teaching is precisely that of Gen. 1, in which man is said to be formed "in the image of God," a phrase in some measure equivalent to "a little lower than the angels" in Ps. 8:5, and in which he is commanded by God "to have dominion" over all creatures, indeed actively "to subdue" the earth. In Gen. 2 the centrality and lordship of man in creation are likewise affirmed, though in a different manner, by a story in which all the animals are brought to man that he may give them names; yet among them there is none which can be "a help meet for him." Thus man, though a part of creation and made from "the dust of the ground" with the mysterious life principle "breathed" into him by God, is nevertheless separate and distinct from all other creatures of God. He alone, according to Gen. 1, is made "in the image of God."

This phrase, though it occurs elsewhere in the Old Testament only in Gen. 5:1-3 and 9:6, has rightly been considered in Christian theology as an excellent statement of the biblical conception of man. Yet its precise meaning in the biblical setting is by no means easy to define. The Hebrew word "image" means primarily a definite material object which is made to look like or to represent something else; it is the customary word for an idol. How can man be an "image" of God in this sense? Does it mean that man physically resembles the corporeal form of God? Or is the word given an extended meaning and intended to convey only a spiritual resemblance? A moment's reflection on the nature of man, as the Bible conceives it, will make it evident that we are not permitted to phrase the problem in this way.

For the most part, we are accustomed to think of man in the dualistic terms derived from Greek philosophy, in which the spiritual and material natures are sharply distinguished. In the Bible no such dualism exists. Man is a vital unity composed of various interdependent elements. To be sure, we read of the "flesh," "soul," and "spirit" of man, but these are not independent, clearly distinguishable or definable entities. The word "flesh" does denote properly the material nature of man's being. The word nēphesh, translated "soul," is most commonly used to designate a person's vitality, the total self as a self-conscious unit which is activated by the mysterious principle of life; thus it does not have reference to the "soul" at all in the Greek sense of the term. The "spirit" of man refers to the immaterial part of man's being. It is the breath, the source of which is God; it also is used of the psychical aspects of life, including the whole range of man's emotional and mental life. There are many other words, however, particularly the various parts of the body, which are credited with psychical functions. Chief among them may be mentioned the "heart," which is the seat or instrument of mind and will and thus the center of psychical activity, and the bowels or kidneys, among the most sensitive parts of the body in which the emotions were believed to be concealed.

It is obvious from the above that most of these terms which depict human psychology overlap considerably and defy clear definition. Man was conceived as a unified psycho-physical organism, and thus nearer to the point of view of modern psychology than to that of the Greeks. The psychical functions of the ego were conceived as finding expression in the various parts of the body and to be located in them. Thus we may say with H. Wheeler Robinson, "The Hebrew conceived man as an animated body and not as an incarnate soul."⁴⁴

Man "in the image of God" means, therefore, that there is a correspondence between the total being of God and the total being of man. The thought cannot be confined to physical resemblance; indeed, it is improbable that the physical is in the center of attention. Instead, the emphasis must lie on the self-conscious, self-directing vitality which constitutes the sum of personal being. This, of course, does not exclude the corporeal because the Hebrews did not conceive of pure being in spiritual terms apart from material form. Yet it does mean that the "image" in man must primarily be concerned with the deeper aspects of personal being and not merely with the superficial.⁴⁵

This is made quite clear in Gen. 1 and Ps. 8,

⁴⁴ Inspiration and Revelation in O.T., p. 70. For a treatment of Hebrew psychology see especially Aubrey R. Johnson, The Vitality of the Individual in the Thought of Ancient Israel (Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1949); cf. also H. Wheeler Robinson, The Christian Doctrine of Man (Edinburgh: T. & T. Clark, 1911), ch. i; Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, II, 58-77; Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture I-II, 99 ff.

⁴⁵ Contrast, e.g., Hermann Gunkel, Genesis (5th ed.; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1922; Göttinger Handkommentar zum Alten Testament"), pp. 110-12; but cf. von Rad, Das erste Buch Mose, pp. 44-47.

where as a consequence of the divine resemblance in man the latter is enabled to assume the lordship of the earthly creation. As God is Lord of the universe, so man is lord of the created earth, crowned with glory and honor as befits his lordship. This implies a consciousness of the radical difference existing between the animals and man as personal being. Man is endowed with a freedom and capacity for self-direction which enable him to plan and execute his plans. Furthermore, as personal being he can respond to the personal direction of God and assume office as God's steward or vicegerent on earth. Implied in Gen. 1 and made perfectly clear in Gen. 2-3 is the dependent and responsible relationship existing between man and God. Man's lordship is to be exercised in the context of God's lordship and in the understanding of the dependent relationship. Thus God has the right to command, while man must obey. This places a limit upon man's freedom, yet only within this limitation can man find the meaning of his freedom and of life itself.

The freedom given man by God, therefore, is a freedom to rule the earth. The capacity which makes it possible for him to do this is, at least in part, the "image" of God in him. Yet the freedom accorded man was meant by God to be used properly. It is a positive, not a negative attribute. For each order of human freedom in the Bible there exists a corresponding order of responsibility. Each area of freedom exists in order that the corresponding responsibility can be assumed. Thus freedom is limited by the responsibility conferred with it. Each area of freedom has its law, its order, its divine command. Consequently, freedom and election or calling go together. The first witnesses to the mystery of creation in God's "image"; the second, to the mystery of communion and dependence.

2. Man as Sinner Against God.—The dignity, nobility, and freedom of man constitute one of the Bible's primary assumptions. It should be pointed out, however, that these human attributes are not the focus of the Bible's attention. The peculiar worth of man is taken for granted, and occasionally God is praised for it (cf., e.g., Ps. 8); but the problem of man is the Bible's central concern. Why is this noble creature of God confronted with so much misery, trouble, and sorrow? He owes his life to God and his continued existence is wholly dependent upon the continued activity of God's spirit (cf. Job 10:12; 12:10; Ps. 104:29-30; Ezek. 37:14; Zech. 12:1) which, when taken away, leaves him without his vitality so that he dies (cf., e.g., Job 17:1; Eccl. 12:7; cf. Deut. 32:39; I Sam. 2:6). His greatest desire should be to be "bound in the bundle of life with the LORD" (I Sam. 25:

THE FAITH OF ISRAEL

29). If he is so bound, then he will walk with Yahweh in fullness of life, experiencing good health and material prosperity. Yet he lives so much of his existence apart from this fullness of life. The reason is that "walking with God" involves both an inner and outer obedience in which man's total being finds its true unity, happiness, and fulfillment. Apart from this obedience there is no communion; and apart from communion there is only disintegration, misery, and death (the loss of vitality). It is the mystery of the freedom given man that by it he is enabled to find both true life in communion with God and also his own disintegration and destruction. On the one hand, man wants to obey and to live in communion with God, but on the other, he desires to be "like God" (Gen. 3:5, 22). But the self-assertion in the latter is a denial of the former and thus one of the chief roots of sin. Furthermore, man wants to "walk with God," but to do so demands a firm belief in God's promises at times when such faith is difficult. Thus Sarah, having heard the promise of a son, could not believe but attempted to take matters into her own hands (Gen. 16). Sin is thus born in the doubt, nourished by anxiety, which leads to a self-assertion that does not wait on God.

Man's problem is further complicated by the fact that he does not exist in isolation before God. He has been placed by God in a community, apart from which he is not his true self. In Gen. 1:27-28 this is made clear by the use of the term "man" for the species, which is divided into male and female, to whom the command to "be fruitful, and multiply" is given. In Gen. 2:18-24 the life of the individual man is seen to be incomplete apart from woman, and the two in marriage are to be "one flesh"—that is, as one person. In the order of creation, therefore, the individual is seen to exist in the context of the family and in relation to the "thou" of the opposite sex. Such a conception immediately cuts the ground from under a whole realm of later asceticism wherein sex is considered as in its very nature a primary source of evil. Yet the freedom of man is limited by the necessity laid upon him in creation to live in the context of the family relationship and in obedience to the will of God governing it.

Furthermore, the family unit does not exist in isolation but is set within the larger groupings of society and nation. God's law in the covenant thus further delimits the freedom of the individual in the interests of peace and harmony within the group. Yet man must live in society for apart from it his life has no meaning. "Walking with God" involves, therefore, a type of obedience which involves the twofold love of God and the neighbor. Man's problem in this case is to love both as himself, and his sin is the self-assertion in which self-love denies and betrays the other two.

Thus the roots of sin in the Old Testament appear to be numerous. In Gen. 3; 11; Isa. 10:13-16; Ezek. 28:2-10; etc., we see the picture of man striving to be "like God," exhibiting his lordly power without relation to God. In Genesis, Exodus, and Numbers numerous incidents illustrate the lack of faith in God's promises on the part of the elect, with the result that anxiety becomes the root of sin. In the Deuteronomic and prophetic writings sin is the violation of God's covenant law, both as regards worship and the common life. Its cause in this case is, on the one hand, a "spirit of whoredom" or infidelity, and, on the other, a "hard heart" and a "stiff neck" which destroy community peace and well-being.

Yet in all cases the significance of sin is seen to be violation of God's command and rebellion against his authority. The Yahwist writer in Gen. 3 presents this rebellion as the cause of man's trouble on earth. By disobeying God man has violated communion, has been expelled from paradise, and has brought on himself and on the earth God's curse. Thus in this life he can expect nothing else but struggle with temptation (Gen. 3:15), with childbirth (vs. 16), and with nature for his food (vss. 17-19). This "fall" of man from God's gracious communion, a conception which has played such an important role in Christian theology, does not, however, separate him completely from God's grace. The election of Israel is the most signal proof of this grace (Gen. 12:3), as is also the salvation of a remnant in the Flood. Furthermore, to the priestly editor the "fall" does not mean that God's image has been effaced from man (cf. Gen. 9:6). Yet it does mean that man can expect no simple peace or security in this life apart from God's judgment, known both in natural and historical tragedy, and apart from God's gracious salvation.

It is in this perspective that the whole Bible sees the life of man and earthly society. The focus of attention is not on the worth of man. It is rather on man's sin, God's judgment, his gracious promises of salvation and their fulfillment.

G. The Hope of Man.—Man's creaturely existence, involved as it is in the problems of finitude, self-will and sin, is nevertheless not without hope. This hope is emphatically not a natural optimism based upon an illusory faith in the native capacity of man for self-salvation. Instead, it rests entirely upon the knowledge of God, whose revelation of himself has broken through man's finitude and sinful state and has disclosed the divine purpose through the medium of both past and future. The known activity of God thus becomes the guarantee that man may hope; indeed, it creates the hope and establishes the conditions and the bases in which and on which the hope may exist. Time, therefore, becomes significant as the arena of God's redemptive action; it ceases to be static or cyclical as it is in paganism.

The central theological theme of the Old Testament is that of the sovereign and redeeming activity of God, who is engaged for his own name's sake in establishing his kingdom over the whole earth. What happens in history is thus to be interpreted in this context, and when the day of final victory comes, the peace and perfection of the original creation will have been re-established. In all that God does, even in the most tragic and terrible of historical events, his ultimate redemptive purpose is understood. The reason for his action at any one moment may not be entirely clear (cf. the problems of Habakkuk and Job), but the man of faith need not despair. His hope is grounded in the over-all purpose and direction of God's work.

1. The Problem of Death.—The one area which this redemption-faith of Israel had most difficulty in penetrating was that of the suffering and death of the individual man. The views of Israel regarding death were so strongly conditioned by those of her pagan neighbors, excepting Egypt, that the invasion and transformation of this realm by the new and unique theology of Israel was a slow process, completed in the intertestamental period long after the classic age had come to an end. At death man's unity of being is destroyed and he loses vitality. The néphesh or "soul" (see above, pp. 367-68) thus does not continue to exist. It disintegrates, or as in the case of the suffering servant, it is said to be "poured out" as an offering to death (Isa. 53:12). The dead are like "water spilt on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again" (II Sam. 14:14).

This does not mean, however, that existence ceases. Man continues to live, though in a very weak state, in the underworld of Sheol, together with those who have passed into this realm before him. There he subsists in darkness (Job 10:21-22), in a kind of sleep (Nah. 3:18), in weakness (Isa. 14:10), in forgetfulness (Ps. 88:12). Existence in Sheol thus was conceived as the opposite of life. Earth is the land of light; Sheol is filled with the primordial darkness (cf. Gen. 1:2). Life means vitality and energy; death is weakness, inaction, a mere shadow of life. Since God is pre-eminently the giver of life and Lord of the living, it was something of a question to the Israelite as to what relation he had with the dead. Is not death the separation from life and thus from the God of life? Consequently, the psalmist questions whether God will show his wonders to the dead, whether his lovingkindness and his righteousness will be known in the land of forgetfulness (Ps. 88:10-12; cf. Isa. 38:18). He prays the more earnestly, therefore, to be delivered from death's power. Many of the psalmists lived in great danger of their lives or in grave illness; and any form of weakness which robbed them of the free exercise of their powers was to them a form of death, though as yet the gates of Sheol had not closed finally upon them. Their prayers were for God to save them and to bring them back from the "pit" or from the waves of the deep through which they have been forced to go in the journey to the underworld (cf. Jonah 2:2-6). In God's hands are the issues of life and death, for it is he who "killeth, and maketh alive; he bringeth down to Sheol and bringeth up" (I Sam. 2:6; cf. Deut. 32:39).

The dominant emphasis in the prayers of sick and troubled individuals was thus on the redemptive power of God to save them from death. The greatest boon in life is to walk with God and to dwell in his presence, for there is "fulness of joy" and "pleasures for evermore" (Ps. 16:11). The faithful man was certain, therefore, that God would redeem his life (néphesh) from Sheol's power (Ps. 49:15; Hos. 13:14). Does this mean that death will be abolished? Such a passage as Ps. 23:6 ("I will dwell in the house of the LORD for ever") is somewhat ambiguous and unclear. There is no doubt, however, that during the postexilic period some believers began to answer the question in the affirmative. In God's new age there shall be no more death, and tears shall be wiped away from all faces (Isa. 25:8; cf. I Cor. 15:26, 54; Rev. 21:4). The chief difficulty which the man of faith had with death was that it separated him from life with God. Consequently, it was inevitable that sooner or later he would assert that the cause of this separation would be removed (cf. Ps. 139:8), for God in life will guide him with his counsel and afterward receive him with glory (Ps. 73:24). Illustration of the thought in the last passage was at hand in the cases of Enoch and Elijah, neither of whom suffered death but was taken directly to God's heavenly abode (Gen. 5:24; II Kings 2:11). This made it easier for some to believe that God would send Elijah back to earth again as the forerunner of the new age (Mal. 4:5; cf. Mark 9:11-13).

Yet if death is to be abolished by God in the new age so that redeemed man need never be separated from him, what about those who have died before that time? Two late passages affirm their resurrection: Isa. 26:19 and Dan. 12:2. In keeping with the unitary view of man, this doctrine of the resurrection of the dead is the only one which would be congenial to the biblical point of view. Many people under the ultimate influence of Greek thought have felt it simpler to believe in the immortality of the soul, though from the standpoint of reason this separation of soul from body appears as difficult as the belief in the resurrection of the body, i.e., of the complete person. The latter view, however, excludes all thought of a natural immortality and focuses attention upon the gracious miracle of God to raise the departed into fellowship with himself in the new age on earth. It was in this context that the doctrine became widespread in the intertestamental period, though there continued to be those who retained the position of the earlier literature of the Old Testament and who thus did not believe it (cf. Eccl. 3:20-21; and the Sadducees of the New Testament time, Matt. 22:23). Yet for the majority of the Jews the faith in God's redemptive power had finally won its victory over death.⁴⁰

THE FAITH OF ISRAEL

2. God's New Age.—It is characteristic of the resurrection faith which developed in Judaism, however, that for the most part it was closely related to the fulfillment of God's aims in the earthly creation. The resurrection was usually conceived as taking place in order that the dead might participate in God's new age on earth. There is no thought whatsoever of a salvation from the earth to an ethereal existence. God had a purpose in creation and that purpose he would fulfill. The world is in need of redemption, to be sure, but in its original creation it was good and it shall be good once again. God had a purpose in the election of Israel, and while Israel's sin has complicated the process of universal redemption, God will not be defeated. His purpose in election will be fulfilled. The primary concern in the faith of Israel, therefore, was not with the problem of the individual in death, but with the re-creation of earth and of Israel, that the original intention of God might be carried out in this earth. To know God is to know both past and future;

⁴⁰ For a very succinct review of the eschatology of the apocryphal literature see article, "The Literature and Religion of the Apocrypha," pp. 391-419; also R. H. Charles, "Eschatology of the Apocryphal and Apocalyptic Literature," in James Hastings, ed., A Dictionary of the Bible, I, 741-49. See also the interesting treatment of Johnson, Vitality of the Individual in the Thought of Ancient Israel, pp. 88-107, with references there cited, including Christoph Barth, Die Errettung vom Tode in den individuellen Klage- und Dankliedern des Alten Testaments (Zürich: Zollikon, 1947); Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture I-II, 453-96; Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, II, 112-19; III, 148-68.

the past reveals his intention and will, the future will see their fulfillment.

The Israelite's knowledge of God, then, did not allow him to give up his hope of earth. The goods of this earth are not evil in themselves; they were meant by God for man's enjoyment. Consequently, the future will see the re-establishment of the peace, harmony, and material abundance of the original creation. Prophetic eschatology is quite explicit on this point. The new age will be one in which conflict and bloodletting of every sort will be done away. The weapons of war will be converted into agricultural tools (Isa. 2:4; Mic. 4:3). All animals will become domesticated so that the lion, the wolf, the bear, the viper will be at peace with the lamb, the cow, and the child. There shall be no hurting nor destroying "for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD" (Isa. 11:6-9). The seasons will be done away so that earth's productivity will never cease: "The plowman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed; and the mountains shall drop sweet wine, and all the hills shall melt" (Amos 9:13). The divine curse on the ground which the Yahwist writer conceives as the reason for man's material hardship (Gen. 3:17-19) will no longer exist in the new age. All elements of nature will become exceedingly fertile. Indeed, Palestine will be so remade, according to Ezek. 47-48, that the poorest sections of the country will be as fertile as the best. The divine blessing will be so poured out upon the earth that sun and moon will no longer be needed for light because God himself will be the everlasting light (Isa. 60:19-20).

It is of course impossible to construct these various prophetic pictures into an exact blueprint for the age to come. Yet their essential meaning is that the goodness and abundance of the earth will be created anew. There is nothing intrinsically wrong with material abundance. Man was not created for poverty and hardship; he was intended by God to enjoy the marvelous abundance of nature, and this he shall enjoy in the time to come. Why does he not enjoy this abundance now? The whole implication of prophetic teaching, and the explicit statement of the Yahwist (Gen. 3:17-19), is that the sin of man has marred the peaceful harmony of the world so that the whole earth and all its life has experienced the divine judgment. Consequently, the transformation of nature must be accompanied by the transformation of man. God will give him a new heart and a new spirit so that he can enjoy the earthly abundance without self-destruction, without rebellion, and therefore without divine judgment. Since Israel is God's agent whereby the transformation is to be brought about among the nations, the saving grace of God will first be known in Israel. But it was prophetic insight which saw that the salvation would be known through and beyond judgment, not apart from it.

According to the early account of the call of Abram as given by the Yahwist writer, three divine promises were made: (a) that Israel would become a great nation (Gen. 12:2), (b) in possession of the land (Gen. 12:7), and (c) the recipients of a blessing with which all nations shall bless themselves (Gen. 12:3). The first two of these promises were fulfilled in the Conquest and in the reign of David. The third was unfulfilled at the time of the writing, but in all probability was continued as the anchorage of Israel's hope. When oppression and the loss of independent national existence came in the years between 733 and 586 B.C., the first two promises were again remembered and became an integral part of the future hope.

Amos 5:18 is the first reference to a popular expectation of a "day of the Lord." It is unexplained, but we can presume that it involved in some way the third of the divine promises referred to above, namely, that it would be a time when God's sovereignty would be extended over all the world with the resultant glorification of Israel. But Amos warns that the day expected will be the opposite of that hoped for. It will be a day of judgment, taking the form of a captivity "beyond Damascus" (Amos 5:27). In the succeeding prophecies of the next three centuries the day assumed various forms, depending upon historical circumstances. The book which presents the clearest outline of eschatological events is that of Ezekiel. We cannot presume that this outline was dogmatically fixed, and therefore accepted in detail by all Judean circles of the pre- and post-exilic periods. Yet it does present a coherent picture of the main lines of expectation. First, God's terrible judgment will fall on the chosen people, destroying both state and temple (Ezek. 4-24). While the agency of the destruction is the Babylonian army, a vision depicts it as actually an angelic visitation (Ezek. 9). In keeping with the priestly theology which pervades the book, God's glory, the shining, refulgent brilliance which surrounds his being, is then seen to leave both temple and city (Ezek. 10-11). Since the wilderness period, the fullness of Israel has been God's tabernacling presence in the people's midst; but now the nation is deserted, alone, shortly to be destroyed and scattered. The second stage is the divine visitation on Israel's pagan neighbors in Egypt, Palestine, and southern Syria (Ezek. 25-32). Virtually the whole civilized world has thus come under the terrible judgment of God, the chief exception being the agent, Babylon, which is unmentioned perhaps because it is the agent and God's purpose in its regard is as yet unclear.⁴⁷

From this picture of the judgment of God, first against the chosen nation and then against the pagan nations, one must affirm that no support or comfort for any existing order of society can be derived from the Old Testament. In the day of the Lord all shall be overthrown. The chief sin of the chosen people was that of rebellion against the God who had chosen them and bound them to himself. The chief sin of the nations was that of inordinate ambition and self-deifying pride which their power, wealth, and idolatry made possible. Thus they felt themselves able to say, "I am, and there is none else besides me" (Isa. 47:10; cf. Ezek. 28:2).

After the judgment will come the restoration of the remnant (Ezek. 33-37). God's purpose in his terrible visitation was to destroy the self-deifying pride of man and the institutions which man used for a security rooted in them instead of in God himself. A new heart and a new spirit will now be given, not because the remnant of Israel deserves such consideration, but because God works for his own name's sake and is determined to bring into being that which he had promised (Ezek. 36:22-23). Neither the original election nor the salvation is based on merit, but solely on the grace which is the ultimate and glorious mystery of God's being.

Before the era of peace is completely established, however, there will occur the final, terrible war with the barbarous, unrepentant forces of evil from the distant places of the world (Ezek. 38-39; Joel 3; Zech. 14; cf. also Matt. 24; Rev. 19:11-20:15). Only after this battle will the world be completely purified and ready for the new Jerusalem, to which the glory of God shall return (Ezek. 40-48; cf. Rev. 21-22).

Prophetic eschatology was thus based on an interpretation of the meaning of the great historical events of the time and on the certain faith that God would fulfill his promises. National tragedy did not mean that God is defeated or that he has wearied of his earthly task and gone off in search of greener pastures; it is instead the very proof of his determination to make his will known and operative in his earthly creation. The gods of the nations were unstable and without real power to direct the course of events; consequently, they perished in the very disasters which continually proved the lordship of Yahweh (cf. Isa. 41:21-24; 46:1-7). Yet the salvation of God, even for the elect people, is to be found through judgment, not apart from it. Man's hope for security amidst the goods of this earth is not fulfilled except through God's radical and scaring treatment of sin. Such a juxtaposition of judgment and salvation is in direct contrast to the hope of the natural man, but it is precisely that to be found in the New Testament's view of the Cross and the Resurrection. For this reason the Christian understands that the Cross is the only adequate symbol of biblical faith. In the Old Testament it is the social aspect of salvation which receives the emphasis, while in the New the problem of the individual is finally resolved. Yet both are integral aspects of the full Christian hope, which is concerned with nothing less than the redemption of the whole of creation (cf. Rom. 8:19-23).

⁴⁷ Cf. Isaiah's treatment of the agent, in this case Assyria, in Isa. 10:5-19; and that of Jeremiah in Jer. 25:12; 50-51. Under similar circumstances to those of Ezekiel, Second Isaiah makes no mention of the ultimate fate of God's agent of restoration, Cyrus.

The central and unresolved problem of Old Testament eschatology, however, is the precise relationship between the salvation of the one and the many, of the restored Israel and the people of the nations. In the latter days all nations shall stream to Jerusalem and acknowledge the sovereignty of God and of his law (Isa. 2:2-4; Mic. 4:1-3). In the midst of the world darkness the light of God shall illumine Jerusalem, and to it the Gentiles shall come and shall name the walls "Salvation" and the gates "Praise" (Isa. 60). People will lay hold on the garments of the Jew and say, "We will go with you: for we have heard that God is with you" (Zech. 8:23). Thus the problem of universal man as first envisaged by the Yahwist writer in Gen. 2-11 will receive its resolution in accordance with the promise in Gen. 12:3. But under what conditions? Will the new age in which God's blessing and sovereignty are extended to the world mean the political supremacy and enrichment of Israel? In the figure of the suffering servant of the Lord in Isa. 53 the meaning of Israel's suffering is seen in a deeper dimension than anywhere else in the Old Testament. This suffering is more than a punishment for sin; it is a vicarious atonement for the sins of the world, through which the world will be brought to the knowledge of God. What relation exists between the redemptive function of Israel and her political and national aspirations? This is a question which the Christian must pose, and it is one which was not solved, except in the affirmation of the identity of the two seeming opposites. The problem stands out clearly in the conception of the Messiah.

3. The Messiah.—Messianic thought in Israel was rooted in the theology of the office of kingship. In the circles of the Jerusalem royal court, beginning in the time of Saul and David, an elaborate attempt was made to fit the royal office into the older theology of the covenant. The king was anointed with holy oil, hitherto reserved for the office of priest. The anointing oil was especially prepared and none was to be made like it (Exod. 30:22-32). It was holy and to be used only for sacred purposes. When poured on the priests and the paraphernalia of worship, these were "cleansed" and readied for the cultic service (Exod. 40:9-15; Lev. 8:10-13, 30). Anointing and hallowing thus went together. When taken over for use at the coronation of the king, the anointing signified the consecration and the hallowing of the king's person for a divinely appointed office. His person was thus separated from the persons of ordinary people; for this reason David refused to harm a hair of Saul's head (cf. I Sam. 24:6, 10; 26:9-23; II Sam. 1:14-16). With the anointing, as with the baptism of Christ, went the special gift of the spirit; at least this was the case when Saul and David were anointed (I Sam. 10:1, 10; 16:12-13).

The king as God's Anointed (Messiah) was chosen by God; that is, the office was divinely instituted and its personnel was considered especially elect. Accompanying the election of the king, as in the election of Israel, were the divine promise and covenant (II Sam. 7:8-29; 23:5; I Kings 8:22-26; Ps. 89:3-4, 19-37). God would grant enduring power and stability to the throne; in return the ruler was expected to fulfill the purposes for which his office was established, namely, to provide both inner and outer justice and security for the people. He should not misuse his power in order to violate the law of his office and of his relationship to God. He could not presume too much; he could not claim credit for the law or violate it; he could only administer it in justice (cf. Deut. 17:14-20).

In the "royal psalms"⁴⁸ the function of the king and his relationship to God are seen even more clearly. These psalms are messianic, but not in the customary usage of this term. Originally they probably did not refer to a future king in the new age. Instead, it is likely that they were hymns composed for religious ceremonies in which the king played a prominent role (e.g., at a coronation, a royal marriage, and perhaps at a New Year's service in which Yahweh's enthronement as king of the world was celebrated). From Ps. 110, for example, we infer that in ideal the king was God's vicegerent, endowed with his power; he would rule until all enemies in the earth are subdued. He was a "son," "begotten" of God (Ps. 2:7; II Sam. 7:14), an extension of God's power, who was to subdue and rule the world with and for God.

⁴⁸ Especially Pss. 2; 18; 20; 21; 45; 72; 89; 101; 110; 132; see Hermann Gunkel and Joachim Begrich, Einführung in die Psalmen (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1933; "Göttinger Handbuch zum Alten Testament"), pp. 140-71.

It is quite clear that the pretensions of this royal theology were not accepted by all elements of the community (e.g., the Deuteronomic movement). This was especially true when the office of kingship was so badly misused that few of the rulers could be said to be faithful to their consecration. In the new age depicted in Ezek. 40-48 this theology scarcely appears, and an old tribal term of "prince" was applied to the ruler instead of "king."⁴⁹ Yet the theology of kingship was taken over by certain of the prophets in Judah who were familiar with the royal court and with the priestly circles. In so doing, however, these prophets shifted its basic reference from the current king to a ruler whom God himself would provide from the Davidic line in the new age about to dawn. In him will lie complete security and justice, for he will be a mighty warrior, an everlasting father of his people, a prince of peace (Isa. 9:6-7), endowed with the spirit of Yahweh to rule the world according to the justice of God rather than of men (Isa. 11:1-5). His name shall be "Yahweh our Righteousness" (Jer. 23:6); under his rule Judah shall be saved, dwell in safety (Jer. 33:15-16), and be reunited into one kingdom under a new and everlasting covenant of peace (Ezek. 37:21-28). He shall "be great" over the whole world (Mic. 5:4); and "his dominion shall be from sea even to sea, and from the river [Euphrates] even to the ends of the earth" (Zech. 9:10).

It is perfectly clear from an analysis of the above-mentioned material that the suffering servant of Second Isaiah is not drawn from the royal theology, and is therefore not messianic in the proper sense of the term. Everything about the servant is the antithesis of royalty. He is not endowed with the kingly insignia; he has no glory or honor; he is given no power and no political role to play in the sense that the king will play it. To Second Isaiah, Cyrus has been given the power to function as Yahweh's anointed king (cf. Isa. 45:1-4). Though Cyrus has not known Yahweh, yet it is he who shall do Yahweh's work, using the power given him to make the crooked straight, to break the bars of iron, and to open the treasures of secret places. The servant, on the other hand, has a redemptive, vicarious, prophetic, and pacific role to fill. His is a salvation apart from the wielding of power, and it will mean the pouring out of his "soul" unto death, though in so doing God will divide for him a portion with the strong and the great (Isa. 53:12).

⁴⁹ See, e.g., Noth, Das System der zwölf Stämme Israels, pp. 151-62.

Second Isaiah thus comes nearer than any other Old Testament writer to resolving the problem of the relation between the political hope and the spiritual redemption involved in Israel's election. Yet this writing stands apart from the main stream of Judaism's eschatology. For this reason nationalism and racial consciousness were never clearly distinguished or separated from the redemptive mission of Israel in the world. It is small wonder, then, that Judaism's future hope has been something of a theological problem, since it is difficult to understand how God's salvation of the world can be accomplished in the nationalistic framework of the chosen instrument. Consequently, it should be no surprise that Judaism increasingly through the centuries has become a religion without a missionary zeal and has persisted largely on a nationalistic basis.

At this point the Christian understands the impasse of Israel's hope to have been broken in Christ, so that the hope became genuinely universal. The pages of the New Testament were written under the triumphant assurance of the risen Lord, who has ascended into heaven and is seated on the right hand of God (cf. Ps. 110:1; Mark 16:19; Acts 2:33-36). Christ is the king to whom all power has been given in heaven and earth, for he is indeed the Christ, the Anointed One and the Son of God from the seed of David. Thus the royal theology of Israel was seen to be fulfilled in him, for he was and is the hope of Israel, the mediator of the new covenant, of the new kingdom, of the new age.

The rule of Christ, however, is from his heavenly, not an earthly, throne. Thus we must note that the messianic theology of Israel has been transformed, that the kingdom is at this moment a spiritual one which is missionary in its essence and universal in scope. It is most difficult to explain this transformation unless one assumes that Jesus himself made a profound, novel, and daring bit of scriptural interpretation. He accepted the messianic faith of Israel but he interpreted it by means of Isa. 53. Thus God's king of the new age is precisely the suffering Redeemer. He was despised and rejected of men, yet he bore the sins of the world, was exalted by God and crowned with glory and honor. Henceforth the citizens in Christ's kingdom are the children of Abraham by faith and adoption, heirs of the promises, and members of the new covenant, who live in the assured hope of the consummation of all things in the final redemption of the world.

III. The Worship and Service of God

A. The Spiritual Basis of Worship.—When one looks beneath the surface of pagan religion, he finds a dark, mysterious world, comparable in its complexity to the depths of unconscious life laid bare by modern psychoanalysis. That is the world of magic, divination, and demons. To be sure, the higher forms of paganism, such as Greek philosophy and Eastern mysticism, are relatively free from this world of the occult. Yet the philosophical and mystical mediums of salvation are at best available only to the few, whereas the common man is left in his superstitions. Both the Israelite and the pagan were vitally concerned with the discovery of the divine will and with the proper worship and service to be accorded deity, but to the polytheist there was available an elaborate and mysterious methodology from which Israel was largely excluded. Though there is always grave danger in oversimplification, yet the difference may perhaps be stated as follows: In polytheism the basis of worship was for the most part in magic; in the faith of Israel the basis of worship lay in historical memory and in spiritual communion and obedience.

1. Pagan Magic, Divination, and Demons.—Illustrations of ancient magic abound from every country of the Near East, but from Mesopotamia come the most detailed and numerous records. In almost every collection of tablets a large number have to do with omens of various sorts. Astrology was highly developed, and the profession of deducing omens from the movements of the stars and planets reached such importance that a system of periodic reports to the king came into being.⁵⁰ When the omens were unfavorable, a substitute king could be placed on the throne, while the real king went into hiding.⁵¹ Far more common was divination by a variety of humbler means, one of which was the inspection of the liver of animals. The Babylonian diviner was an extremely important person, and it was unsafe to make any major decision without his aid. From the tablets of Mari on the middle Euphrates we learn that each section of troops had its own diviner and no campaign could be undertaken without the proper omens (cf. Ezek. 21:21-22). Balaam is the best known of these ancient experts, and the Israelite writers who tell about him (Num. 22-24) do so with high good humor, for to them it was absurd to assume that magic could in any way thwart the purpose of Yahweh. Instead, Yahweh turned the divination to his own purpose and made a prophet out of the pagan specialist, greatly to the disgust of the Moabite king who quite naturally refused to pay Balaam the promised fee.

Even more disturbing was the vast world of demonology, in which sickness and every form of trouble were believed to be caused by lesser deities who were pictured in the most fantastic combination of animal, bird, and human bodies. To secure release from the power of these demons the help of a priestly magician had to be secured, who could conjure up the proper incantation and by exorcism drive off the offending beings.⁵²

2. Israel's Rejection of Pagan Magic and Demonology.—The attitude of the Old Testament is very explicit on this type of approach to the divine world. In both law and prophecy it is directly forbidden as a part of the abominations of the nations from which Israel must separate herself (cf. Exod. 22:18; Lev. 20:6, 23, 27). Isaiah derides the people who seek out spiritualists and diviners that "chirp and mutter" their incantations, when God's direct revelation should be sought (8:19-22). Diviners, dreamers, spiritualists, necromancers, and soothsayers continually make the people believe lies, but the power of salvation is not in them (Jer. 27:9-10; Ezek. 13:17-23; cf. Isa. 47:12-15). The clearest elaboration of the law together with the reason for it is given in Deut. 18:9-15. There the whole pagan world of magic and divination is forbidden as incompatible with the worship of Yahweh. The God of Israel cannot be tricked, influenced, or coerced into revelation by occult means. He will make his will known when, where, and how he chooses. When he does so, it will not be by magic. His word will be heard directly, clearly, and understandably through his prophet to whom he has revealed his counsel. In Israel God's mediums of revelation undercut the world of pagan superstition.

This does not mean that Israel could or did so separate herself from the cult of magic that no remnants remained. The law would have had no reason to exist had not the forbidden practices been well known and used among the people. Furthermore, Israel shared in the common separation of clean and unclean, in ceremonial purifications, in recognizing the importance of dreams. The rod of Moses was a magical device (Exod. 7-8). There is one very mild example, though only one, of trial by ordeal (Num. 5:11-31). Saul inquired of the witch of Endor, who conjured up the ghost of Samuel for him (an example of necromancy or spiritualism), though this act was felt to be a terrible thing, an act of desperation on the part of a sinful man who should have used other means to reconcile himself to God in order to secure God's forgiveness. David frequently inquired of Yahweh by Urim and Thummim, the sacred dice carried by the chief priest, though there is no reference to the practice after that time. Closely related was the effort to determine God's choice by the casting of lots (e.g., I Sam. 10:17-24; 14:36-45; cf. Acts 1:26). Throughout Israel's history in Palestine the problem of discerning true prophecy from a pagan type of divination was acute (cf. I Kings 22; Jer. 23:9-32; Ezek. 13). For this reason Jeremiah classed the prophets of his day with the diviners, soothsayers, and magicians (Jer. 27:9-10).

⁵⁰ See R. Campbell Thompson, The Reports of the Magicians and Astrologers of Nineveh and Babylon (London: Luzac & Co., 1900).

⁵¹ Cf. Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods, pp. 262-65.

⁵² Cf. R. Campbell Thompson, The Devils and Evil Spirits of Babylonia (London: Luzac & Co., 1903-4), and Semitic Magic (London: Luzac & Co., 1908).

This situation should occasion no surprise, since the relics of magic exist in many forms to this day. The important thing to observe is that the worship of God in Israel actually cut the ground from beneath the magical approach to deity, so that the world of the occult was no longer the center or basis of worship. This is equally clear in the study of demonology. The Old Testament contains few references to demons (cf. Deut. 32:17; Isa. 13:21; 34:14; and the mysterious Azazel in the wilderness, mentioned in the ceremonies of the day of Atonement, Lev. 16:8, 10, 26). Israel had no abstract or reasoned position regarding the existence or nonexistence of demons; they simply were unimportant and played no role whatever at the center of religious attention. The source of the psalmist's trouble is never personified as a demon. Sickness is not caused by a malevolent spirit, but by God himself (cf. Ps. 38). So radical was the wholehearted exaltation of and concentration on Yahweh that the realm of lesser beings dropped from conscious sight. If a person were afflicted or appalled by the terror of night or the destruction of noonday, he needed only to turn in faith to God, who would be with him in trouble, deliver him, and show him his salvation (Ps. 91). Sigmund Mowinckel⁵³ and Alfred Guillaume⁵⁴ believe that the penitential psalms were composed as prayers, comparable to those in Babylonia, the purpose of which was to ward off the evil effects of magical spells. The imprecatory psalms are also thought to have had the prophylactic purpose of slaying the sorcerer at his evil work. As in the case of the "terror by night" in Ps. 91:5-6, this view has some evidence to commend it, but both scholars, especially the first, are generally felt to have carried the argument much too far. In any case, it is most improbable that these psalms were composed as ritual incantations against sorcerers. They are simply prayers to the God who alone can and will deliver a person from all danger, but who will not permit the chirping and muttering of ritual incantations and exorcisms to have any effect whatever on his decisions. Faith, not incantation, is what he demands.

Furthermore, the true prophet as God's spokesman was no soothsayer in possession of numerous ritual incantations. He was possessed by God, and there existed between him and his Lord a fellowship of understanding and conscious communion which is the very antithesis of the attitude of the magician whose ritual has an automatic efficacy when properly performed. In other words, the worship of God in Israel had a far deeper basis than that in paganism. In Israel, spiritual attitude was all important. God's first requirement is a holy fear or reverence. Unless man can bow in humble contrition and reverence before God, there can be no such thing as worship. But the second requirement is one of faith, trust, and love, which means to believe God, to accept his promises with grateful heart, and to act obediently in love without anxiety. The man possessed of such fear and faith has nothing whatever to be afraid of, except sin. That faith was a remarkable and unique thing in the ancient world. It was rooted in a knowledge of the divine nature and purpose which through Christ has become the basis of man's faith and worship.

By New Testament times the doctrine of Satan with his principalities and powers of darkness had altered the situation which existed in Israel. The realm of Satan had opened the door to pagan demonology, with the result that the use of spells and exorcism became common among the Jewish people, as did an elaborate mythology of angels and demons. The New Testament world was thus one of demon possession. Yet the essential faith of Israel was carried over into the church by Christ and the apostles. In the cures effected by them little is said about incantations. To Christ, God has given complete power over the demons. Consequently, Christ could command the demons and they would obey him, and his disciples could accomplish the same cures by the use of his name. But faith was necessary, and without faith there was no cure (cf., e.g., Mark 2:5; 3:15; 5:34, 36; 6:5-6).

3. Israelite and Pagan Festivals.—The significance of Israel's conception of worship is further clarified when we examine the nature of the religious festivals. In polytheism the great cultic festivals centered in three major celebrations: (a) the New Year's festival in which the divine creation battle was refought, rewon, and the security of society in nature re-established ⁵³ Psalmstudien I (Kristiania: Jacob Dybwad, 1921).

⁵⁴ Prophecy and Divination (New York: Harper & Bros., 1938), pp 272-89.

THE FAITH OF ISRAEL

for the ensuing year; (b) the marriage rite in the spring between the rain and vegetation god and the goddess of fertility; and (c) the rites incident to the revival of this god in the fall after his death in the summer's drought. These festivals cannot be conceived merely as celebrations, however, nor were they occasions for the reverent worship of deity in the biblical sense. Basic to them was the conception of sympathetic magic. In them man acted ritually, taking on the form or identity of the gods. By acting out the divine events mimetically, man by a willed exercise achieved what he desired, security and integration within nature. Like produces like; man in a drama taking the part of a god became that god temporarily, and his actions became the actions of the god. He thus created anew the orderly world in the battle against chaos, and he secured the revival of nature in spring and fall.⁵⁵

In Israel, by contrast, the official festivals of normative Yahwism betray no hint whatsoever of sympathetic magic. In the cultic laws the primary attention is focused on three annual festivals (Deut. 16:16): (a) the Passover and associated feast of Unleavened Bread in the spring; (b) the feast of Harvest or Pentecost, fifty days later; and (c) the feast of Ingathering or Tabernacles in the fall.⁵⁶

The original setting of the festivals, like that of our own Christmas and Easter, was within paganism, but the meaning was transformed in the religious environment of Israel. The harvest festival was a time of rejoicing when gifts of the first fruits were presented to the divine owner of the land. Only with the remarkable events recounted in Acts 2 was it completely historicized in the Christian community. From the earliest times in Israel, however, Passover and Unleavened Bread were together the great commemorative festival of liberation from Egyptian bondage (Exod. 13:8-9; Deut. 16:3). The feast of Ingathering lost much of its original significance and became the feast of Tabernacles, commemorating the booths in which Israel had to live in the wilderness after the Exodus (Lev. 23:43).

The new moon, marking a natural calendar division, was a holy day which was difficult to historicize. Similarly, the day of Atonement (Lev. 16) had a special signification since its central concern was with the sin of the nation. Yet the sabbath, which to the priestly writers was the token of the Sinai covenant (Exod.

31:12-17), was observed as a holy day commemorating the rest of God after the six days of creation (Exod. 20:8-11), though Deuteronomy connects it with the Exodus (Deut. 5:15) as also the harvest festival (Deut. 16:12).

Thus while the Hebrew festivals had behind and in them a variety of motives, yet the dominating and most significant tendency was that toward historical commemoration. Thus the later festivals of Purim and Hanukkah were solely commemorative, while in the Roll of Fasting, dating from the first or second century A.D. and evidently intended as a supplement to Lev. 23, practically every festival listed was given a historical background of which it was a memorial.⁵⁷ Nowhere is there the slightest hint that the primary purpose of a festival was the re-enactment of a drama, in which by sympathetic magic and the identification of man with the divine the harmonious integration of nature and society was thought to be achieved. The basis of Israelite worship was on an utterly different foundation.

In modern times a great deal of work has been done in the attempt to reconstruct a New Year's festival in Israel, in which the king took the role of God in acting out the original drama of creation. This reconstruction is based upon a number of psalms which are considered as ritual for the festival.⁵⁸ While the results of this investigation are by no means certain, in any case the festival would have been sponsored solely by the royal court in Jerusalem on a theological basis completely different from that of the Babylonian New Year's festival. The enemies to be annihilated were not the chaos monsters, but historical forces which must be done away before God's universal reign can be established. If such a festival existed, it was actually a celebration of God's rulership over the whole world and of the king's position as God's vicégerent. Sympathetic magic in the Babylonian sense could have played no prominent role whatever.

Perhaps the most significant differentiation between Israelite and Christian worship on the one hand, and that of pagan religion on the other, is to be found at this point. In the worship of the Israelite and the Christian, primary attention is focused upon the great redeeming acts of God. In worship these historical events are rehearsed and the worshiper joins himself by sympathetic imagination with the original participants and understands that these acts ⁵⁵ See Jacobsen in Frankfort, et al., Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man, pp. 198-200.

⁵⁶ For Passover and Unleavened Bread see Exod. 12-13; 24:15; 34:18; Lev. 23:4-8; Num. 28:16-25; Deut. 16:1-8. For the harvest and ingathering festivals see Exod. 23:16; 34:22; Lev. 23:15-21, 34-36; Num. 28:26-31; 29:12-38; Deut. 16:9-15.

⁵⁷ G. B. Gray, Sacrifice in the Old Testament (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1925), pp. 277-84.

⁵⁸ See especially Mowinkel, Psalmstudien II; Aage Bentzen, Messias, Moses redivivus, Menschensohn (Zurich: Zwingli, 1948); Elmer A. Leslie, The Psalms (New York and Nashville: Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1949) pp. 62-130.

were done for him also (cf. Deut. 5:3; 26:3-11). He then gives thanks and praise to God for what God has done, and solemnly renews his covenanted vows. The spiritual process which biblical worship entails thus involves a combination of historical narration with participation by means of memory and imagination, with illumination derived from the continued working of God's spirit, with praise and thanksgiving, and with solemn renewal of covenant as the worshiper again faces his own life. Much more than this is involved, depending upon the occasion and the type of worship, yet illumination from historical memory and participation remain central and primary. As such, the worship avoids the pitfalls of magic and mysticism, but combines the historical past, present, and future in the conception of God's gracious and continuous direction of human life.

B. The Forms and Places of Worship. 1. Tabernacle and Temple.—In ancient paganism, while there was no stability or uniformity in the manner in which the outward form of the gods was represented, the inner structure of all of them was personal, with the result that they could be met and addressed by human beings. The most spectacular witness to this anthropomorphism was the conception of the deity's house or palace. In western Asia no word corresponding to our term "temple" seems to have existed; the god's dwelling was designated by the same terms as those used for the residence of king or other important person. The temple was conceived as a manor house in which a god resided with his family and servants, both divine and human. Food (sacrifices and offerings) and drink (oblations) had to be provided for the daily needs of the god and his attendants; in the larger temples, at least, the human task of providing the needed sustenance was very great. The amount of food consumed by the court of Solomon in one day (I Kings 4:22-23) seems unreasonably luxurious; but it appears to have been only slightly more than that provided in the four daily meals for the god Anu and his family in the Babylonian city of Uruk. The original and basic meaning of the sacrificial cultus, therefore, was simply to provide for the needs of the gods who lived as the human aristocracy in palaces of varying degrees of luxury, depending upon the available wealth. In most cases the great temples owned large amounts of land and were thus the centers of large commercial transactions. From this land the basic requirements of the god were met, though supplementation was continually available from the gifts of suppliants who came to the home of the divine lord for assistance.

The existence of rival temples for the same god seems to have caused no intellectual difficulty. As a king or noble might have more than one palace, so could a god. A real danger existed, however, in the numerous temples for one deity; that was the danger of the splitting up of the divine personality. Consequently, the god might be worshiped under various manifestations. That this happened with regard to the goddess Ishtar of Mesopotamia and to the god Baal of Canaan is quite clear. In the Old Testament we hear of many Baals, though in reality Baal was one, the cosmic god of the storm and the executive king of the divine and human worlds.

The problem of transcendence and immanence in regard to the temple seems also to have been no problem. A cosmic god could be immanent in an earthly temple because that building was erected as a microcosm of the deity's limitless world. Thus all ancient temples were filled with cosmic symbolism. Since in the conceptual world of paganism like makes like, the temple as a representation of the universe could in a sense be the universe; and the gods who inhabited the universe, whose proper home was in the heavens or on the cosmic mountains, could thus live also in an earthly abode.⁶⁰

It is in this pagan setting that the forms and places of worship in Israel, so foreign to our own religious life, may best be comprehended. The meaning and nature of the Israelite cultus differed radically from that of polytheism, though the outward forms were directly borrowed. Before the Deuteronomic reform in 621 B.C. (II Kings 22-23) the particular places where Yahweh revealed himself and was worshiped were numerous. Many of those places were Canaanite holy sites before the time of Israel, but none of them were conceived as dwelling places of Yahweh. Rather, they were simply places where he revealed himself. There never was serious danger of the divine personality's being split into various local manifestations. Wherever his chosen people were, there he also could be found. Yahweh's dwelling was properly in heaven from which he could be said to "come down" to earth (Gen. 11:5; 18:21; 28:12-17; Exod. 19:11, 18, 20).

Yet the tabernacle and the temple were also conceived as his dwelling. The latter was simply entitled "the house" or "the house of Yahweh." The cosmic symbolism in the temple of Solomon indicates that in all probability under Canaanite influence it was conceived to be the abode of God in the sense that it was the earthly representation of his heavenly dwelling. In other words, the problem of transcendence and immanence was resolved by means of a rich, sacramental symbolism.⁶⁰

⁶⁰ See Harold H. Nelson, "The Egyptian Temple," The Biblical Archaeologist, VII (1944), 44-53; Thorkild Jacobsen, "Temples, Mesopotamian," in Vergilius Ferm, ed., An Encyclopedia of Religion (New York: Philosophical Library, 1945), pp. 770-71; Frankfort, et al., Intellectual Adventure of Ancient Man, pp. 186-91.

THE FAITH OF ISRAEL

Yet the important thing to observe is that Israelite theology found it difficult to accommodate itself to this theology of the temple, closely dependent as it was on pagan conceptions. The first clear reaction against it is to be observed in the Deuteronomic writings. For example, in the Deuteronomic edition of the Solomonic prayer of dedication of the temple, the question is asked directly as to whether God really dwells on earth at all. Since not even the heaven of heavens can contain him, how much less this earthly building! Yet while the temple does not actually contain God's being, nevertheless God has seen fit to place his name there and to hear and answer the prayers directed toward it (I Kings 8:27-30; cf. Deut. 12:5). Thus the temple is God's gracious accommodation to human need. When prayer is directed toward the temple, either by an Israelite or a stranger, God will hear it in his dwelling place in heaven and answer. Consequently, the temple is important not because it is his palace—indeed, he has no need of a palace—but because he has consented to place his name there in response to humble prayer (cf. Isa. 56:7).⁶¹

The Israelite priests were likewise aware of the problem of the transcendent God in any sense being localized in an earthly abode. Consequently, they carefully avoided using the ordinary word for "dwell" (yāshabh) when speaking of God's presence on earth. Instead, they employed an archaic term meaning "to tent" or "to tabernacle" (shākhan). Yahweh never "dwells" on earth as does man; he "tabernacles" in the midst of his people. The technical term for the tabernacle was drawn from the same root and properly means "tent" (mishkān), but not "dwelling" in the ordinary sense. The center of priestly theology was the conception of God's covenant-presence in the midst of the people for the purposes of revelation and atonement. The tabernacle was thus conceived primarily as a tent of revelation (Exod. 25:22; 29:42-43; 30:36), where God had graciously allowed his presence, hidden by his "glory," to "tabernacle" and there be met.⁶²

It is thus significant that Israelite thinkers found the conception of the temple a theological problem demanding careful treatment. Both the Deuteronomic and priestly circles carefully avoided the literalism of paganism, and their views prepared the way for the later conception of synagogue and church as places where God may be worshiped, though his physical being is in no way permanently resident there. Yet it must be confessed that Israel's attachment to God in election and covenant demanded a spiritual type of worship and obedience for which the temple was no primary symbol or adequate means of expression. Consequently, both the prophets and Jesus could envisage God's actual destruction of the temple precisely in order that a proper worship might be ordained (cf. especially Jer. 7:1-15;⁶³ Mark 13:1-2; 14:58; John 2:19). In polytheism the temple was the all-important link between heaven and earth, and the welfare of society was utterly dependent upon the integration with the world of nature and deity, established by its cultic rites. But in Israel the temple could play no corresponding role, and when destroyed left no irreparable damage to the faith. Even in the economic life of the nation it could not achieve the importance of the pagan temple. It could own no land, but had to be supported solely by the gifts of the worshipers. Instead of grants of land, the law prescribed a system of tithes (Lev. 27:30-33; Deut. 14:28-29) which meant that its priests could never achieve a measure of control over the economy, as happened in Egypt and Mesopotamia.

2. The Meaning of Sacrifice.—Equally important and unique was the conception of the meaning of sacrifice in Israel. In polytheism the idea that sacrifices were the needed food and drink of the gods was never completely spiritualized. Yet in Israel there is no thought whatever of God's need of physical sustenance; anthropomorphism in the Old Testament had its distinct limits. To be sure, some of the sacrifices continued to be prepared as food, including the addition of salt, but there is never the slightest suggestion of God's eating them. There is reference to God's smelling the "sweet savor" of the burning sacrifice (Gen. 8:21), but the phrase had been spiritualized and meant little more than that God found the offering acceptable. Indeed, in Levitical terminology the words "sweet savor unto the LORD" were a technical expression referring to an offering's acceptability unto God (Lev. 1:9, 13, 17; 2:2, 9, 12; etc.).

In other words, the theological basis of the sacrificial cultus was shifted to a different foun-

⁶³ On this passage and its significance see especially Walther Eichrodt, "The Right Interpretation of the Old Testament: a Study of Jeremiah 7:1-15," Theology Today, VII (1950), pp. 15-25.

⁶⁰ See Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, pp. 142-55; G. Ernest Wright, "Solomon's Temple Resurrected," The Biblical Archaeologist, IV (1941), 17-31.

⁶¹ Cf. von Rad, Deuteronomium-Studien, pp. 25-30; G. Ernest Wright, "The Temple in Palestine—Syria," The Biblical Archaeologist, VII (1944), 74-76.

⁶² This technical vocabulary of P was first discerned by Frank M. Cross, Jr.; see his brief review of the evidence in "The Tabernacle," The Biblical Archaeologist, X (1947), 65-68; cf. also von Rad, loc. cit.

dation from that on which it rested in paganism. The whole cultus was conceived as God's special revelation to Israel, a means which he provided and accepted whereby he could be worshiped. There is no thought whatever of God's personal need of the sacrifices or that somehow they were of benefit to him. The setting is thus prepared for the amusing apocryphal tale in Bel and the Dragon, relating Daniel's exposure of the false claim of the pagan priests about the idol's consumption of the offerings, and as well the statement of the apostle Paul that the Creator does not dwell in man-made temples to be worshiped with men's hands as though he needed anything (Acts 17:24-25).

Furthermore, as the course of Israel's history moved on, we observe particularly in Ezekiel and the priestly writings an increasing atmosphere of somber seriousness. The prophetic indictment of the nation had been validated, and as a result there existed a heavy feeling of sin. The priestly writers, no less than the prophets, emphasized the persistent and perennial sin of Israel and the conditional nature of the covenant. Israel was unclean and the holiness of the "tabernacling" God would not mix with uncleanness. Consequently, both state and temple, which in polytheism were the sole foundation of human existence, were destroyed. The primary meaning of the sacrificial cultus was that God had given it as a means of atonement. By making atonement the breach of the covenant could be repaired and the problem of sin resolved.

Behind the Hebrew expression for atonement (kipper) there seems to have been the metaphor of "covering." While the etymology and derivation of the word are not certainly known, the basic metaphor involved is clear from a careful study of the contexts in which it occurs. In a number of cases it is used in parallelism with words properly meaning "to cover" (kāsāh), or "to hide" (sāthar), or the latter are used in place of it. For example, Nehemiah prays that God would not atone ("cover," kāsāh) the iniquity of his enemies and that their sin might not be blotted out from before him (Neh. 4:5). The psalmist (Ps. 32:1-2) says: "Blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven [borne away], whose sin is covered (kāsāh); blessed is the man unto whom the Lord imputeth not iniquity" (Ps. 32:1-2; cf. 85:2-3). In Ps. 51 the psalmist prays that God will "blot out" his transgressions, wash and cleanse him, and "hide" his face from his sins (vs. 9). In Prov. 10:12 are the words, "Hatred stirreth up strifes; but love atones for (covers, kāsāh) all sins" (cf. Prov. 17:9). A noun from the same root as kipper ("to atone") means "bribe"

(kōpher), and the function of a bribe, it is said, is "to cover" (kāsāh) or "to blind the eyes" of the offended party or the righteous or the judge (cf., e.g., Gen. 20:16; Exod. 23:8; Deut. 16:19). Indeed, the purpose of Jacob's present to Esau is "to cover" (kipper) his face so that Jacob may see him (Gen. 32:20).

In other words, the trouble with sin is that it is an act of disloyalty which breaks off personal communion. The offended one in his injury has the just desire to remove the offender from his sight. The problem of the sinner is thus one of reconciliation; something must be done to appease or propitiate the anger of the one sinned against, whether it is one's neighbor, the human judge, or God himself. The sacrificial cultus was a means which God graciously provided whereby reconciliation and atonement (or "covering") were effected. Man's sacrificial act of worship atoned for sin in the sense that it "covered" him, his sin, or the eyes of the divine Judge so that the latter no longer saw the sin. God's holiness was a consuming fire in the midst of uncleanness. In the presence of that holiness no mortal, sinful man could exist. But God has provided a "covering" of which man can avail himself, and with the aid of which the broken, personal relationship can be reconstituted. To comprehend Israel's conception of atonement, therefore, one must keep in mind the metaphor behind it, and relate it closely with the more abstract conception of forgiveness and reconciliation.⁶⁴

The difficulty with all outward acts of atonement, however, is that they may become mechanical, conceived as automatically effective, ex opere operato. Consequently, the Israelite cultus of temple, priesthood, and sacrifice did not escape the prophetic censure any more than did the institution of kingship. To the prophets sacrifice could make no atonement for a people who, while multiplying their offerings and thronging the religious festivals, engaged in the most elemental violation of God's laws. God would not accept a mechanical sacrifice; he despised it. His purpose is not fulfilled by an elaborate ceremonial, but by a humble, righteous life, filled with the knowledge of himself (Isa. 1:10-17; Jer. 6:20; 7:22-23; Hos. 6:6; Amos 5:21-24; Mic. 6:6-8).

So forthright and wholehearted is the prophetic condemnation that many have assumed that the prophets would like to have seen the sacrificial system abandoned entirely. More cautious scholars, however, believe that the ⁶⁴ The above treatment of the word kipper is dependent upon an unpublished monograph which breaks new ground in the investigation of the subject of atonement: Sidney O. Hills, "The Meaning of Kaphar in the Old Testament," a B.D. thesis submitted to the faculty of McCormick Theological Seminary, Chicago, in 1948.

THE FAITH OF ISRAEL

prophets were merely condemning the misuse of the cultic system. In doing so they naturally used the language of hyperbole, but they had no intention of doing away with sacrifice. Such an argument about what the prophets might have done, had they been in official charge of worship, is actually rather futile. We do not know what they might have done, and it is doubtful whether they themselves knew. They were not religious legislators. They were given God's word to proclaim, and their task was completed when God's message was uttered.

Nevertheless, it was under the influence of the prophetic proclamation that Pss. 50 and 51 do imply a spiritualization of the term "sacrifice." Ps. 50, more than any other passage in the Old Testament, points out the incongruity of offering animals as food to the God who owns the whole of creation. The purified worship envisaged is composed of thanksgiving, the payment of vows, and prayer. In Ps. 51:17 it is said that the only sacrifices God does not despise are a broken spirit and a contrite heart. It is doubtful that we should take these psalms as indicative of a clearly conceived movement in Israel for the revision of the sacrificial system. Yet Ps. 51:17 does show a spiritualization of the term "sacrifice," one which was carried over into the New Testament and into the church. This was possible because God's primary desire in the covenant was a personal relationship and communion, centered in the realm of that which we term "the spiritual life." It was this personal attachment alone which made true and willing obedience possible and the cultic worship acceptable. Consequently, when the people de-based temple and sacrifice into a type of fetish which operates automatically, they actually were conceiving of God in terms of a pagan idol whose power one exploits for himself. God's word to the prophets thus condemned the whole cultic institution because it was used to validate the people's security when the true relationship between man and deity, which alone can give security, had been violated. The ground is thus prepared for the Christian church to move out into the world as the body of Christ, who replaces the temple and whose sacrifice of himself brought an end to the ancient cultus.

C. The Common Life.—Man's treatment of his neighbor has been subject to some measure of social control since the dawn of history. In order to live in society at all man has had to have an ethical law. Consequently, one may assume with Amos 1-2 and Rom. 1 that the will of God in social relations is so deeply rooted in his creation that peoples who do not acknowledge his sovereignty are nevertheless responsible for a proper ethical life. The true distinctiveness of a religious faith or of a people's ethic is thus not to be determined solely by a detailed comparison of ethical injunctions. While such comparison must be made, the real nature of a given social morality is to be discovered within the context of the world view and theological framework in which the moral law is placed.

1. Israelite Wisdom.—This fact is clearly illustrated by Israel's wisdom movement. The wise men were evidently a special class in the community, as distinct from priests and prophets, whose function was to give practical advice on the conduct of affairs in the community (Jer. 18:18; Ezek. 7:26). They came under the same prophetic condemnation as the priests and popular prophets. Nevertheless, they were considered an important source of knowledge by the people and three of their books—Job, Proverbs, and Ecclesiastes—were retained in the canon. The anthology of epigrams in Proverbs seems to have been typical of their work. The primary source of their insight in such proverbs seems to have been observation, experience, and common sense. The teaching is chiefly practical, prudential, and utilitarian, much of it beautifully phrased, easily quoted, and exhibiting a profundity of observation. Like many sermons on character education in the past three generations, however, they represent for the most part the type of thing which any man of good will can say, regardless of his theological affiliation or lack of it. Consequently, the close relation between Israelite wisdom and that particularly of Canaan and of Egypt is by no means surprising. In fact, the wisdom type of interest and of epigram existed in those countries before it did in Israel, and many of Israel's proverbs undoubtedly were borrowed from the international collections. It is well that this is the case, for the proverbs indicate that a prudential, common-sense ethic, based upon broad experience, is by no means excluded from Israelite faith.

Yet it is important to notice that the new theological setting in Israel has altered the inner meaning of the ethic. A basic pattern in proverbial writing was to make clear what the good man should do by giving in contrast the manner of the bad man. In Egyptian wisdom the contrast was between the silent and the passionate man. The former is the self-disciplined, patient, modest person who is master of himself at all times. The latter is the self-assertive, grasping, arbitrary person who disturbs the existing order and destroys the harmonious integration of society.⁶⁵ In Israel proverbs similar to those in Egypt were used, but the basic contrast is between the righteous or upright man and the wicked or foolish man. This presupposes an entirely different kind of judgment between the good and the bad from that which existed in Egypt. The righteous and the wicked are evaluated according to a given standard, which can only be the revealed law of Yahweh. Thus the wisdom ethic in Israel cannot be conceived as unrelated to revelation; on the contrary, it rests squarely upon the peculiarly Israelite understanding of what constitutes good and evil. This is the more clear when we observe that the motto of the wisdom movement in Israel seems to have been "the fear of Yahweh," which is the beginning of knowledge and wisdom (Prov. 1:7; 9:10). It is this holy reverence for Yahweh which is strength to the upright (Prov. 10:29), which produces righteousness (Prov. 14:2), which is a fountain of life (Prov. 14:27; cf. 19:23; 22:4). Thus Yahweh is in truth the source of wisdom (cf. Job 28) and the author of prudential morality. It is he who rewards the righteous and punishes the wicked.⁶⁶

⁶⁵ See Frankfort, Ancient Egyptian Religion, ch. iii.

Yet the extremely individualized perspective of the wisdom movement's doctrine of divine reward and punishment furnished the setting for theological controversy. The book of Job was written to deny that this doctrine is sufficient to explain all human suffering. The prophetic teaching concerning the judgment of God upon human sin is not necessarily rejected by the author. Rather, the subtle inversion of that doctrine is combated, wherein the presence of suffering in the life of an individual may be assumed to be proof of God's judgment upon his gross sin. There is a deeper dimension in life than this; in the economy of God there is a mystery in the divine dealing with men which must be accepted humbly without loss of faith in God's providence.

On the other hand, Ecclesiastes represents a development in another direction toward a denial of the whole belief in individual rewards and punishments in this life or hereafter. God's moral government of the world, if it exists at all, is beyond our comprehension. The ordinary pursuits of man are vanity, emptiness, and weariness; they achieve no good end. God's administration of the world cannot be understood by man, for whether one is righteous or wicked, wise or foolish, death is the great leveler in which both good and evil, love and hatred, perish (Eccl. 8:16-9:6). Yet wisdom is indeed better than folly, and the proper life is one which enjoys the simple pleasures here and now in the fear of God. The portion which God has given every man is the enjoyment of his labor and of eating and drinking, while avoiding self-assertive folly, pride, and rashness of spirit and action.

The wisdom movement is deficient insofar as its theological base and intellectual interest are too narrowly fixed. It represents an extreme individualism in ethics and theology without a doctrine of society. In this respect Proverbs remains near the pagan source of wisdom in which society played no important theological role. In the canon of scripture Proverbs has the important function of supplying an explication of the meaning of the law for individual life. But to survive as a living force in Judaism, the wisdom movement had to undergo a more thorough acclimation to the doctrines of election and covenant. This was done, on the one hand, in the apocryphal Wisdom of Solomon, wherein eschatology is employed to overcome the difficulties of the writer of Ecclesiastes. On the other hand, the book of Ecclesiasticus exalts the Mosaic law, the study of which is actually the source of wisdom, and therefore is of universal validity.⁶⁷

2. The Covenant Law.—In Israelite law and prophecy, as distinct from wisdom, individual and social ethics were held together within the framework of covenant theology. If a man would act aright in the exercise of his social responsibility, he was immediately confronted with the will of the sovereign Lord of the covenant, which meant that he looked back to God's formation of the nation at Sinai and forward to the final redemption in the future. Precisely because of this faith the Israelite attained an understanding of his work and of his use of earthly goods which hitherto was unknown. The common law of the nation was part and parcel of the international law of the day, but in its adaptation to the needs of the covenant society a change of interior meaning occurred which necessitated also numerous changes in specific laws.

God's law in the covenant was not conceived as a penal burden to be borne. It was God's gracious gift to Israel that the nation, which previously had lived outside the benefits of law, might now know the security which is derived from justice. It was not an invention of men; it was the expression of the authoritative will of the covenant God. The king of Israel, unlike Hammurabi of Babylon, could not take credit for the law; it was not God's special gift to him alone. He was as subject to it as was the nation as a whole. Totalitarianism was lifted from the earthly to the heavenly sphere. The law thus envisaged a security and a freedom for the individual, who was not to be unrighteously oppressed by human power. To be sure, the individual person found meaning in life within the context of the covenant society, but his individuality was not lost in the society. God's command to the people of Israel was addressed also to him personally. The election of Israel included within it his own election, and for the first time in history work became a sacred and responsible vocation.

⁶⁶ Cf. Robinson, Inspiration and Revelation in O.T., chs. xviii-xx; contrast in part J. Coert Rylaarsdam, Revelation in Jewish Wisdom Literature (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1946).

⁶⁷ See further Rylaarsdam, ibid., pp. 27-46.

THE FAITH OF ISRAEL

Consequently, the covenant theology meant that the Near Eastern common law in Israel had to be revised in such a way as to provide for the equality of all citizens before the court of law. The limitation of revenge and the institution of a just penalty on the principle of "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth," was also a part of Babylonian law, but there it applied only to free men; for others compensation in money was sufficient. In Israel, however, all classes of society, no matter what their social status may have been, were included in the provision (Exod. 21:23-25; Lev. 24:19-22). The death penalty for embezzlement no longer obtained in Israel, and the mutilation of the body as a legal penalty was abolished.

Since Israel was once in slavery in Egypt, from which God had redeemed her, the righteousness of God in the law was seen to be especially solicitous of the poor and the weak in society. The sojourner who does not have full civil rights, and the widow and orphan who are defenseless against the powerful, must not be oppressed in any way (Exod. 22:21-24). The poor man has the same right in court as the rich, and his justice must not be wrested from him (Exod. 23:6). In Israel alone in the ancient world is there a prohibition against the taking of interest on a loan. The man of property should freely make loans to those in need, but he must not make the practice into an income-producing business. The poor man's need must not become the occasion for profit. If he gives his clothing as a pledge of repayment, it should be returned to him before sundown because it is all he has to wear. When the poor man cries to God, the latter will hear him for he is gracious (Exod. 22:21-27). In Israel alone there was for the first time an interest in the victims of slavery. In the covenant law there was registered "an open denial of the right of man to own man in perpetuity. This denial of the right of possession of man by man is as yet restricted to Hebrews only (cf. Neh. 5:8), but it is a step which no other religion had taken before."⁸⁸

In Lev. 19 we have an excellent summary of Israelite social legislation, together with the motive behind it. There we find instructions concerning gleaning that the poor and the sojourner may get food; against stealing, false swearing, oppression; about wages, gossip, impartiality in court; about honoring the aged, helping the deaf and the blind, caring for trees, cattle, and crops, forbidding sexual irregularities, mutilation of the body, unjust weights and measures, and so forth. The reason for all these specific regulations is given in vs. 17-18: "Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart. . . . Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself: I am the Lord." In vs. 34 the law is extended also to the sojourner. The whole meaning of economic and social life in Israel is thus seen to be the service of one's neighbor. The Israelite is commanded by God to love every member of his community, and he is to do so regardless of any attitude of love or hate exhibited toward himself (Lev. 19:17b; Exod. 23:4-5, where the enemy is specified; cf. Prov. 25:21). Though cast in legal form, the law of love is obviously not an ordinance which can be enforced in a human court of law. Yet since both lawgiver and judge are God, all of his commands are legally phrased to make one's duty vividly clear. Before the divine Judge every member of the community has an equal status; and God's requirement of the people who acknowledge him as their Lord is that they treat each other with a mutual respect and concern which transcend legal duty, but are rooted in the recognition of their common Lord, who has made them members together in the covenant community. Of course nothing is here said about love for those who are not members of the Israelite community. Yet the law of the covenant was not given originally for the government of the world, but solely for the one people. The wider reaches of the law of love could be faced only when decisions were being made regarding the relevance of the whole law for the governance not of a political, but solely of a spiritual and universal community (cf. Mark 12:31; Gal. 5:14; Jas. 2:8).

The Israelite attitude toward earthly goods is also determined by the theology. Property belongs to God, who gives it to his people as a loan (cf. Lev. 25:23). Land as the primary source of profit cannot be bought and sold at will. It belongs to God, who has given it to the community. There is no such thing as a natural and private right to the exploitation of property. Since the freedom and security of every community depended upon the land as the basis of its existence, each clan had the right to redeem any property that was sold. If this were not done, the property would automatically revert to the clan or family in the fiftieth or jubilee year (Lev. 25:13-17). While the jubilee may never have been observed, it nevertheless illustrates the aim of Israel's economy, which was to protect its citizens from every form of economic slavery.⁶⁹

⁸⁸ I. Mendelsohn, "Slavery in the Ancient Near East," The Biblical Archaeologist, IX (1946), 88.

The conception of God and the covenant faith thus brought about astonishing changes in the ancient common law when it was adapted as the basis for the Israelite economy. The prophetic protest against social iniquity was based squarely on the old covenant law in the attempt to see to it that this law was unconditionally enforced. In the great development of commerce and trade which occurred between the tenth and seventh centuries B. C. the danger of the misuse of economic power was vastly increased. The government, faced with the problem of taxation and armament, found it expedient to be lenient with those in possession of the new wealth. The landed peasantry found itself in difficulty: debt slavery increased; interest rates were charged; land was purchased at cheap prices, until great estates were formed and the old order of justice was completely overturned. Indeed, justice was at times destroyed entirely through the bribery of the courts. At the same time, the sanctuaries prospered with a worship which seemed to be sincere. Yet to the prophets every acknowledgment of the God of the fathers which led to a purely personal piety and a moral quietism was a dangerous and terrible idolatry. Obedience to the will of God involved more than an individual piety; it meant that one must hate the evil and love the good, and this involved the whole of man's social life in both its inner and outer manifestations. Israel was indeed the elect nation, but her calling and the success of her fulfillment of that calling were dependent upon the way in which her service of God bore witness to his mighty action in choosing a people from among the nations and binding them to himself in covenant.

D. Sin and Forgiveness.—The worship and service of God failed to bring to the Israelite the comfort, security, and peace which he so deeply desired and which God promised to the nation in election and covenant. The good life was to be found in a close personal relationship of communion and fellowship, in which man's proper attitude and activity were based on trust, love, and loyalty, on humility, integrity, and generosity. The desired and promised life did not exist when the communion was violated by the failure of proper attitude or action. This violation was sin which brought guilt and judgment. Thus the conception of sin was rooted deep within the spiritual life of man and in the knowledge of life's relatedness to God. The Israelite could not atone his misdeeds entirely and seek to repair their damage by making an outward atonement for this or that specific act, assuming thereby that the covenant relationship was re-established. One's whole being was involved, and the spiritual sins of pride and hardness of heart were more serious than the outward breach of a law. There was no way by which the tension within life between the will of God and the spirit of man could be removed except by the humble surrender of one's whole being to the gracious sovereignty of God.

⁶⁹ See further Bruno Balscheit und Walther Eichrodt, Die soziale Botschaft des Alten Testaments für die Gegenwart (Basel: Friedrich Reinhardt, n.d.); Eichrodt, "The Question of Property in the Light of the Old Testament," Biblical Authority for Today, ed. Alan Richardson and W. Schweitzer (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1952), pp. 257-74; Millar Burrows, An Outline of Biblical Theology (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1946), ch. xvii; Charles L. Taylor, Jr., "Old Testament Foundations," Christianity and Property, ed. Joseph F. Fletcher (Philadelphia: Westminster Press, 1947), ch. i.

1. The Conception of Sin.—The Old Testament abounds with portrayals of character in which the spiritual problem is always central and in which heroism is conceived in terms of faith and obedience. The frequent contrasts make this clear, as for example between Abram and Lot, Moses and the people, Samuel and Saul, Elijah and Ahab, Isaiah and Ahaz, Jeremiah and Zedekiah. The first name in each case is that of a man who possessed a wholeness and soundness of character. The close relationship existing between him and God was unimpaired by irresolution in faith and obedience. It is not that he was sinless (e.g., Abram and Moses), but that he possessed a wholesome relationship to God, with the result that through him God's work was done. This is what the Hebrew called tāmim, inadequately rendered as "perfect" in English translations. The second parties in the above pairs are not "perfect"; a barrier exists between them and God. Therefore they are not spiritually whole; they are weak, and their weakness issues in overt acts of sin.⁷⁰

It is this aspect of the conception of sin in the Bible which so differentiates it from the conceptions of wrongdoing in other religions. Sin as the personal violation of one's relationship with God, as the involvement of one's whole being in a haughty and rebellious act, and as the destruction of one's normal, healthy, and dependent integrity—such an analysis of the meaning of man's evil is completely unknown elsewhere. In Egypt there were many words denoting evil acts, but none of them are properly rendered "sin" in the biblical sense.

The Egyptian viewed his misdeeds not as sins, but as aberrations. They would bring him unhappiness because they disturbed his harmonious inregation with the existing world. . . . It is especially significant that the Egyptians never showed any trace of feeling unworthy of the divine mercy. For he who errs is not a sinner but a fool, and his conversion to a better way of life does not require repentance but a better understanding. . . . Man is not seen in rebellion against the command of God nor does he experience the intensity and range of feelings from contrition to grace which characterize the main personages of the Old and New Testaments. By the same token the theme of God's wrath is practically unknown in Egyptian literature; for the Egyptian, in his aberrations, is not a sinner disciplined and corrected.⁷¹

⁷⁰ For the significance of tāmim in Hebrew psychology and ethics see Ludwig Köhler, Theologie des Alten Testaments (Tübingen: J. C. B. Mohr, 1936), p. 155; Pedersen, Israel, Its Life and Culture, I-II, 336-77.

The above remarks about the conception of sin, or lack of it, in Egypt seem capable of being applied to other religions, ancient and modern. In no nonbiblical faith does there occur such a radical, profound, and penetrating view of human error as that occasioned by the doctrine of God in the Bible. The Mesopotamians understood themselves as subject to the divine will and decree, but they knew nothing of the righteousness of God in the biblical sense and the question of sin did not enter their minds. "Hence their penitential psalms abound in confessions of guilt but ignore the sense of sin; they are vibrant with despair but not with contrition—with regret but not with repentance."⁷² The problem of man in worship was to isolate and identify the particular offense which had angered the gods and to make the specific penance prescribed for its expiation. Human error was thus atomized and its remedy mechanistic.

For a chosen people conformance with the will of God can be a source of joy. For the Mesopotamians the divine decrees merely circumscribed man's servitude. Religious exaltation fell, for them, outside the sphere of ethics; it sprang from the awareness that they lived in conformity with the rhythm of divine life. This is what we have called "living in harmony with nature"—for in nature the life of the gods was manifest.⁷³

Yet while pointing to the central meaning of sin in the Bible, we should not infer that Israel had completely liberated herself from the ancient conceptual world. The remnant of an amoral, dynamistic view of holiness in the cultus, particularly in the earlier stages of life in Palestine, meant that the priests knew of a ritualistic, amoral view of sin as ceremonial uncleanness, for which expiatory rites were necessary. Furthermore, we infer from the teaching of the prophets that many of the people, especially in the middle and upper classes, found a purely cultic understanding of the nature of sin as extremely desirable and convenient because it left them free to divorce God's "thou shalt" from the newly arisen complexities of economic and political life. It was a mission of the prophets to denounce this divorce, and to indicate that the area of responsible obedience included every phase of human existence. No matter what the complexities and ramifications of the law may be, God's primary demand is a spiritual "perfection" (tāmim, wholesome wholeness, innocence, and integrity) which issues in just dealing, loyalty to one's covenant vows, and humility of attitude and action before God (Mic. 6:6-8).

2. Atonement and Forgiveness.—In priestly theology it would appear that the efficacy of the sacrificial cultus for the atonement of sins was limited. Leviticus, at any rate, makes no provision for sins done with a high hand, that is, with premeditation in a proud, arrogant, and rebellious spirit. The provisions of the levitical law appear to be confined to those sins committed unwittingly and without arrogant premeditation. In other words, sacrificial worship was efficacious in healing the breach in communion between the "tabernacled" God and his covenant community only when the sins were committed by sincere and law-abiding members of the community. In theory, at least, those who sinned with a high hand were to be deprived of membership in the theocratic society. In any event, such sinners could appeal only in repentance to God directly; their sacrifice could not make atonement for them.

For comparatively minor sins, therefore, in the committing of which no serious rebellion or haughty attitude was involved, an atonement rite performed in a spirit of worship was deemed acceptable to God. The latter would accept the offering as a "covering" for the sin. Where there are gross sins, the occasion for which is a hard or "uncircumcised" heart, a stiff neck, a "spirit of whoredom"—that is, where man is clearly rebelling against the covenant presence of God—then the sacrificial law which was given to the covenant community was no longer efficacious. The laws for worship were given to the "church," the community of the faithful. If one cut himself off from the "church" by flagrant sins, either of an interior or overt nature, or both, then he must not expect the law to cover his situation.

Does the gross sinner, then, have no hope? Israel's knowledge of the gracious nature of God was so deep that she possessed an extraordinary understanding of his forgiveness. Before the holiness and covenant presence of God the gross sinner stands condemned. Yet to him God extends his redeeming mercy. The plight of the high-handed sinner is that he stands alone, his communion severed—the most terrible fate of which the Old Testament can conceive (cf. Cain as murderer in Gen. 4). God's forgiveness means that he desires to repair the communion and to restore the offender into the sacred fellowship with himself and his fellows in the congregation (qāhāl) of Israel. Other religions of that day and later knew of divine holiness and goodness, as also of divine grace to those whom the gods deemed worthy of it. But this biblical conception of a redemptive, forgiving love, the purpose of which was to create community and to repair the breach between it and God, is as phenomenal as it is unique. It is radically different from the subtle, modern idolatry in the church which assumes that of course God will forgive because it is his primary business to do so (Voltaire).

⁷¹ Henri Frankfort, Ancient Egyptian Religion (New York: Columbia University Press, 1948), pp. 73, 77. Used by permission.

⁷² Frankfort, Kingship and the Gods, p. 278.

⁷³ Ibid., p. 279.

The vocabulary for divine forgiveness in the Old Testament is almost as extensive as that for sin. In Ps. 51, for example, the following expressions appear: "blot out my transgressions" (vs. 1, 9), "wash me," "cleanse me," "purge me" (vs. 2, 7), and "hide thy face from my sins" (vs. 9). When God does these things, the petitioner will possess a "clean heart" and a "right spirit" (vs. 10). The difficulty of the sinner is that he is "cast away" from God's presence and removed from the working of his spirit; but in forgiveness there is restoration unto "the joy of thy salvation" (vs. 11, 12). A very common expression for forgiveness is "to take away" or "to carry away" sin, employing the common Hebrew verb nāsā which means simply "to bear" or "to carry" (e.g., Exod. 34:7, translated above, p. 364). Also common is the conception of sin as a sickness which God "heals" (forgives), e.g., "I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely" (Hos. 14:4); "LORD, be merciful unto me; heal my soul; for I have sinned against thee" (Ps. 41:4); "He was wounded for our transgressions . . . , and with his stripes we are healed" (Isa. 53:5). Sickness and injury being so frequently conceived as God's judgment upon sin, his forgiveness could be expressed in terms of healing, usually accompanied by deliverance from the trouble.

All of the above are figurative expressions derived from various phases of the cultic and conceptual life (e.g., washing or wiping away, from lustration rites; "hiding the face," from atonement conceptions; etc.). The only abstract term for forgiveness is the verb šālah, a brief examination of which will indicate some of the conceptions involved. In thirteen (or possibly fourteen: Lev. 5:6 LXX?) cases in Leviticus and Numbers it is used for the declaration of forgiveness when the proper sacrificial rite is performed (cf., e.g., Lev. 4:20, 26, 31, 35). More frequently, however, it is used in a broader context (in thirty-two cases), which may be divided into four categories.

(a) In the Solomonic prayer at the dedication of the temple the structure is conceived as a place toward which prayer should be directed. When God hears the prayer, he will forgive (I Kings 8:30). When the person praying is in any kind of trouble, the forgiveness will be accompanied by a deliverance from the difficulty (I Kings 8:34, 36, 39, 50).

(b) As later in Christianity, the relationship between intercessory prayer and the operation of divine grace was very close. Only by virtue of the intercession of Moses was God prepared to pardon Israel in the wilderness wanderings (Exod. 34:9; Num. 14:19-20). Similarly, at the intercession of the prophet God forgave and removed the pestilence (Amos 7:2-3). The context of thought in this case has to do with the divine "repentance." The Hebrew word used for this repentance (nāham) has as its basic meaning the conception of compassion, pity, and sorrow. Intercessory prayer furnished the condition in which God could show his compassion; thus he "repents," not in the sense that he changes his mind, but in the sense that the changed situation permits him to change his action from punishment to redemption.

(c) God's forgiveness is also granted when a human being or a people repents. This is implicit in Jer. 5:1-7 and explicit in Jer. 36:3. The most common Hebrew expression for repent was the word "to turn" (shūbh). Even in the midst of the gross sin of Jehoiakim's time, if the people will "turn, every man from his evil way," God will forgive their sins (cf. also Isa. 55:7).

(d) Yet finally there is a forgiveness which God will grant at the end of the present era in the eschatological time when the conflicts of the present will be resolved. In this case the forgiveness is a free and unmerited act of God, independent of human repentance. Man will be given a "new heart" so that his rebellion will cease, and God will forgive the sins of the past (Jer. 31:34; 33:8; 50:20; cf. Isa. 40:2; Ezek. 36:25-38). These passages portray the reconstitution of God's people as a sacred community in fellowship with himself. Forgiveness is both an integral part and a consequence of this future redemption.⁷⁴

The conception of a personal reconciliation with God thus prevented the deepest ranges of Old Testament faith from conceiving of forgiveness solely as a cultic matter for which mechanical rites of atonement were considered magically effective. It also prevented an impersonal and purely legalistic conception of sin from taking a position at the center of religious attention. This does not mean, however, that these tendencies toward the misunderstanding of the free operation of the divine grace in the context of the total sin of man were eradicated. On the contrary, they survived and were developed in seemingly rigid and doctrinaire forms in Judaism. Indeed, the same thing has happened repeatedly in the history of Christianity. Yet in the latter there is no excuse for misunderstanding. In Jesus Christ the riches of Israel's faith are brought together into a clear focus and the elements unharmonized are either harmonized or set aside. The forgiving and redemptive love of God is seen in Christ's ministry to the sinners for whom Judaism had no message except through adherence to a formal and stultifying legalism. But this love was demonstrated most vividly in the vicarious suffering of Christ and in the creation of the redeemed fellowship, the new Israel, in his risen body.

⁷⁴ See Johann Jakob Stamm, Erlösen und Vergeben im Alten Testament (Bern: A. Francke A.-G., 1940), pp. 47-86; cf. J. Philip Hyatt, Prophetic Religion (New York and Nashville: Abingdon-Cokesbury Press, 1947), ch. x.

In the final analysis the promise of life to Israel, conditioned as it was upon the proper worship and service of God, was an eschatological promise, because the love and the wrath of God could not be resolved into harmony in the midst of the persistent violation of the covenant. In the atoning work of Christ the Christian sees God's forgiveness in a more radical form than was possible in Judaism, because the eschatological salvation for which Israel hoped was rescued from the limbo of embarrassment and re-created at the center of the new faith.⁷⁵

IV. The Faith of Israel

A. Biblical Faith and Biblical Theology.—In conclusion, what was said in the introduction must be reaffirmed—that the faith of Israel was not anchored in abstract, propositional statements of the type to which we have become accustomed in dogmatic theology. Indeed, if we define "theology" solely as propositional dogmatics, or as the systematic presentation of a series of religious ideas about God and man, then we shall be forced to conclude that the Bible cannot truly be exhibited in a "theological" manner. Those who insist on retaining the term "biblical theology" do so because they refuse to surrender the term "theology" entirely to the systematic dogmatician. Biblical faith can be expressed only by a different type of theology, one which is based on the confessional recital of the great acts of God. The unity of the Bible is to be found, therefore, neither in the realm of systematically presented ideas nor in the naturalistic development of a human organism in the evolving social process. Various levels of unity exist, to be sure, in both these spheres, but the basic unity lies in the intense awareness of the redemptive purpose of God as expressed in his historical activity.

It is for this reason that any discussion of Old Testament theology must begin not with God alone, but with God in relation to his elect people (see pp. 352-54). To do so means that the historical events of the Exodus and the wilderness wandering have to be taken seriously as primary data for theological reflection. The knowledge of God in the Old Testament was not formulated philosophically or abstractly; it was an inference drawn from what he had done in saving and constituting a people. Election and covenant thus became the means by which the true meaning of the patriarchal period was comprehended and by which the subsequent history was interpreted. From these events both before and after the Exodus the particular Israelite understanding of the nature of God came into being. What God had done revealed his lordship over history and his purposive action in history. He thus transcended both history and nature, and in so doing revealed the utter difference between himself and the gods of the nations (pp. 357-62). In the same light also his being and his relationship to the world and to man were comprehended (pp. 362-67). He is the living, active God whose relationship to man and to history can be depicted only by means of an anthropomorphic vocabulary. None of his attributes are understood as static qualities like the Greek conceptions of the transcendent good, truth, and beauty. The biblical attributes express, for the most part, the nature of God's activity: his love and grace, his righteousness and justice, his jealousy and wrath. His relationship to the world was therefore an active rather than static one, so that the gulf which his holiness set between himself and his creation was constantly bridged by his own mediums of revelation. The conception of man as a creature made in God's image, but also as a sinner, was derived ultimately from the nature of God's action, for the doctrines of creation, election, and judgment lie at the root of Israel's anthropology. Moreover, the knowledge of God's lordship over history and his purpose within it was the source of the biblical hope, and furnished the setting in which that hope unfolded as the successive crises revealed the more clearly the nature of God's intention and method of working in history (pp. 367-74).

The worship and service of God (as described in pp. 375-87) was the response of man to the God who had revealed himself in historical events. Pagan magic was excluded from worship since its occult and mysterious nature did not correspond to the open, clear, and definite means by which God chose to reveal himself. Most of the chief festivals of worship became historical commemorations of God's saving acts. Temple and sacrifice were shifted from the theological base on which they rested in paganism, and the conceptions of good and evil were tied into the covenant faith in which man met God as a sovereign Person.

⁷⁵ See further, Eichrodt, Theologie des Alten Testaments, III, 81-141.

In the churches which trace their lineage to the Reformation it is especially common to speak of the Bible as "the Word of God." When this phrase is interpreted to mean that the center of the Bible is a series of divinely given teachings, then it is certainly a serious misconception. The Bible is indeed filled with the words of God, but they are not the type of "words" which in themselves constitute a propositional theology. They are always definitely related to historical events. The law was rooted in the covenant at Sinai and was thus historically conditioned. The "word" which came to the prophets was at least in large part inferential in the sense that it was based upon the knowledge of God as known from past events which was used to interpret present happenings. If a prophet was accused of proclaiming a false "word" he could only rely upon his inner certainty and upon the future action of God for confirmation. New Testament theology is of a similar type to that of the Old. In the forefront stand the Synoptic Gospels, which are confessional histories of the life and death of Jesus Christ, written in the light of his resurrection. To speak of the divine work in Christ as "the Word of God" is to betray the faith except as we reinterpret the meaning of this "Word" as one which became flesh, in accordance with John 1 (that is, the Word is a Person, not a system of ideas). The theology of the epistles is not of a systematic nature, but an explication of the meaning of the event of Christ in the light of the whole biblical history of God's works and in the light also of particular situations which the letters were written to confront.

The word, the promise, and the law of God were thus not static abstractions in their original setting; they were an integral part of the historical work of God. A law or a word which accompanied one act might not fit precisely the historical situation and purpose of God in a subsequent event some centuries later. Furthermore, God taught his people by his acts, so that theological understanding was deepened with the passing centuries. Consequently, variety in biblical theology must be expected. Yet that variety does not constitute a series of different theologies; it witnesses to the unity of God, his purpose, and his saving acts which transcend the whole and keep all variety together in one unique book, the Bible.

The belief that historical events reveal the action, the purpose, and the will of God is of course a faith which, though not unreasonable, is nevertheless not subject to complete rational proof. Biblical theology as primarily an explication of God's unique historical work among one people in one particular epoch is thus more than an objective description of the historical process by which the people arrived at their conceptions. It is the attempt to put into communicable language the basis and implications of the faith. Thus a tension will always exist between the faith itself and our attempts to communicate it in rational language at a given historical period. The faith is greater than our attempts to express it and deeper than any one individual can conceive in his historical finitude. There is thus a sense in which every essay on biblical theology must inevitably be partial and unsatisfactory. Furthermore, the creeds of the church which preserve our historical continuity with the original revelation and discipline our tendencies toward pagan idolatry are not in themselves a substitute for the Bible. They are not sacrosanct in the sense that they bear the same authority as the Bible itself. The faith of the church must constantly be reformed and illumined on the basis of a fresh study of the biblical record. A relatively static authoritarianism, either of the Roman Catholic or fundamentalist type, so confuses the authority of the church and its creeds with the authority of the biblical faith that the tension which God places between himself and our human understanding is removed. And the removal of this tension is the first step in opening the doors of the church to idolatry.

